Prof. Briggs (N. Y. Evangelist, 1879) exults in the fact that "the great churches of Rome, Alexandria, and Asia Minor condemned the heresy," and that "the consolidation of Christian faith in creed and liturgy, effectually excluded Chiliasm more and more from the church, until it was banished for many centuries." Admit the crushing of our doctrine, and then ask by whom was it done, and how it was accomplished, and the historical answer certainly cannot be flattering to our opponents. The period of time, the many centuries, when it lay depressed, is sufficiently delineated by Romish and Protestant writers to set aside the extravagant eulogies bestowed upon them by Prof. B. in order to sustain his bitter anti-chiliasmic prejudices. But it does seem strange for a Protestant, and a professed scholar, to so far forget himself, that, in order to make a doctrine odious, he will exalt those who have been the most unrelenting persecutors of the forerunners of principles and a liberty in which the Protestant Church to-day rejoices; and to correspondingly degrade, as unworthy of the least attention, men who advocated those principles and that liberty, because they held to "Chiliasmic notions." Those who opposed the encroachments of the Papacy and resisted its abuses, are to be derided, because they said (D'Aubigné's His. Ref., vol. 3, p. 415) in their helplessness: "Let us lift up our heads, looking to the Lord, who will come and will not tarry." Individual members of the Romish Church, as well as protesting communities outside of it, who denounced hierarchical tendencies, resisted usurpations, and expressed a belief in a speedy Advent to remove existing evils and introduce a Sabbathism, are to be judged only as estimated by their cruel enemies, because they expressed sentiments too much allied with the Chiliastic. Why not go a step farther, and include the Reformers themselves, who also expressed such views, utterly antagonistic—as we shall show—to modern, Whitbyan theories of the Millennium?

Under the preceding Propositions reference has been made to this continuation, and Jerome's statements respecting many holding it in his day. Later on the traces are rarer, until they cease, unless we regard those testimonies that Döllinger has given in Prophecies of the Middle Ages, as favoring Chiliaism in some of their aspects. We pass them by for this reason: although opposed to the Romish, general, view of the Millennium, yet there is such an admixture of error that they cannot properly be regarded as Chiliaistic. Let us e.g. take one of the most noted, the Prophecies of Joachim, and the Evangelium æternum of the Fraticelli, and these were widely removed from the Primitive Chiliaism, losing sight entirely of the specific covenanted Theocratic Kingdom of the Messiah, which was the idea of the early Church. A brief mention of the scheme entertained, is sufficient to demonstrate this fact. These held that we have had a dynasty of the Father extending from Adam to the First Advent; then followed a dynasty of Jesus Christ, lasting 1000 years or more from that Advent; this last, in which they lived, was to be succeeded by the dynasty of the Holy Spirit (golden age), which was indefinite or limited, at the pleasure of the believer. A number of views, hostile to the prevailing Augustinian, may, for aught we know, have arisen from the remains of Chiliaistic belief still existing here and there. Some of the former advocates of the Papal doctrine renounced it for Chiliaistic views, as Le Père Lambert (a French Roman Catholic, whose "Expositions," favoring a Pre-Mill. Advent, restoration of the Jews, and reign of Christ, was translated into German by Von Mayer), Laounza (Ben-Ezra, a Spanish Jew, whose work, "The Com. of Messiah in Glory and Majesty," was translated by Edward Irving), John Baptist Pagini (a Roman Cath. Priest, in his work, "The End of the World, or the Sec. Com. of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ). The fact is that some Romanists could not drift so far away from the old landmarks, but what they would revive sentiments and the idea of the Millenaries, more accordant with Chiliaistic antecedents than the Popish notion, but these feeble utterances were crushed under the weight of Church authority. Here and there we have intimations of the continued existence of the doctrine even down to the 16th century. Thus e.g. Appleton's Cyclop., Art. Moise Amyrant, a French Calvinist theologian, born 1596, who "acting in concert with Richelieu, aimed at a reconciliation between the Protestant and the Catholic Church," wrote a work, "Against the Millenarists." Although knowing nothing of the contents of the work, its title implies that a growing class must have existed, or it would not have been issued. One thing is certain that no union could be effected between Protestants being Millenarians and Romanists.

Obs. 11. Various writers in tracing our doctrine have, through inadvertency or misapprehension of our belief, made the unscholarly mistake of attributing a revival of our faith to the extended belief in the Advent of Jesus to judgment about the year A.D. 1000 and succeeding dates, and, with evident relish, endeavor to make our system accountable for the calamitous results (so graphically described by Mosheim). But this belief arose from the Romish view, and not from Millenarianism. The proof is self-evident, and the least knowledge of the facts will make it apparent to every one. The Augustinian theory, so generally adopted by the Popish doctors, commenced the Millennium with the First Advent of Christ, and consequently, in agreement with this view, when the one thousand years, dated from the First Advent, expired, Popery, driven to a conclusion by its own adopted Millennial theory, looked for the Coming to Judgment, and, with its doctrine of the end of the world, etc., for a general destruction of all sublunary things. Now this was the opposite of Millenarian views, which made the Millennium future, to be introduced by a resurrection, and to be followed by a glorious restoration of all things. The misapplication of the Millenary (making it Pre-Advent) and of the Sec. Advent (making it Post-Millennial) is purely Romish error, and, in view of the extent in which it was held and the miseries that it entailed, is decisive proof how largely Millenarianism had been obliterated.

This mistake has been incorporated in several cyclopædias (as Appleton's, Brit., etc.) and also Millerism which lacks the purely Chiliastic features of a future Millennium, the doctrine of the Kingdom, etc. (although the parties sprung from Millerism have in most cases, as the majority of Sec. Adventists, returned to a more pure Chiliastic doctrine). Writers against our belief introduce this Romish observation derived from Augustinian teaching, most offensively against us, never regarding in the least the numerous replies made by us in explanation. In illustration: one of the most unfair and uncharitable performances is Prof. Sanborn's Essay on Millenarians (Bib. Sac., July, 1855), in which among other mistakes we are charged with the extravagances of the middle ages (when our doctrine was really buried under a cloud of darkness) introduced by Post-Millennialists, and with the errors of men who were Anti-Millenarians. Strange that learned men, when our doctrine is so accessible and history is so plain in describing our views and that of others, cannot discriminate between our Pre-Millennial position and that occupied by Post-Millennial and Anti-Millennial advocates. We sometimes are almost led to suspect that the oversight is intentional, but, in charity, trust that it results through simple misapprehension. As one (Brookes) has well expressed it: "the fanatical crowds that were so alarmed were not Pre-Millennialists, but Post-Millennialists." Hence it is unjust to burden us with the vagaries that belong, as all history attests, to our opponents. As this accusation is constantly repeated, we append several testimonies, which present the truth in the matter. Hagenbach, His. of Doc., vol. 1, sec. 202, quoting Lücke, etc., shows that the Augustinian view adopted to avoid Millenarianism as formerly entertained, was the cause of the expectation and commotion. Dr. Fisher, Art. "Mill.," M'Clintock & Strong's Cyclop., justly traces this expectation of Advent to Augustine's views, saying: "As the year of our Lord 1000 approached, it was a natural corollary that the judgment and end of the world would then occur." This is true, because the Mill. was then supposed to end, and the Popish ideas of judgment and its results were then to be realized. Compare Faber's Inquiry into History and Theol. of the Anc. Vallenses and Abigenses, p. 389, etc., Guizot's Civ. in Europe, p. 95, and the Arts. in Herzog and other cyclops.

PROPOSITION 78. The early church doctrine was revived after the Reformation.

Several hundred names, including some of the most eminent, learned, and pious in the church, are given in such works, as Taylor's Voice of the Church, Brooks's El. Proph. Interpretation, Seiss's Last Times, Elliott's Horæ. Apoc., Shimeall's Eschatology, Cox's Millenarian's Answer, Anderson's Apology, Time of the End, West's Essay on His. of Doc., and various others, embracing many living after the Reformation, who again revived the early faith of the church in the Kingdom of Christ still future, and to be set up at the Sec. Advent.

The works alluded to give many interesting extracts confirmatory of the Chiliastic views held at this revival of the doctrine. Bh. Newton (Dis. On Proph., No. 25), after referring to the suppression of the doctrine through the influence of Rome, says: "No wonder, therefore, that this doctrine lay depressed for many ages; but it sprang up again at the Reformation, and will flourish together with the study of Revelation." Appleton's Cyclop., Art. "Mill.," with all its one-sidedness, frankly remarks: "The Reformation of the 16th century gave a new impulse to Millenarian views," that the Anabaptist movement was only a "caricature of the old Christian doctrine," that "it was preached with enthusiasm by many sects and theologians of the 16th and 17th centuries," mentioning Wiegel, Comenius, Jurieu, Mede, Bengel, Oettinger, Hahn, Stilling, Lavater, and also Hass, Rothe, Hoffman, Delitzsch, Kurtz, Hebart, Thiersch, Nitzsch, P. Lange, Ebrard, Irving, Cumming, and others, as its advocates during this period and later. Abbott and Conant (Dic. of Relig. Knowledge) say: "These views (Chiliastic) may be traced to the earliest history of the church, and were advocated by the fathers up to the 4th century. They then declined, till the Reformation gave them a new impulse, since which time they have prevailed through the entire church to a large extent.

Obs. 1. Candor requires of us to state this peculiarity attached to those who were thus Chiliastic. (1) Some held strictly to the Primitive view, as contained in our argument, believing only in one Kingdom (while acknowledging the general Divine Sovereignty, etc.), still future, which was to accord with the Davidic covenant and related prophecies. The church, exceedingly precious, was regarded as only provisional and introductory to this Kingdom. (2) Others, with a cordial faith in such a future Kingdom, also upheld a Kingdom as present existing in the church—a kind of prelude to the coming one—thus retaining in part the Origenistic or Augustinian idea. (3) Some declare for a present Kingdom in the church, and also for a future one here on earth at the Sec. Advent, but incorporate with the latter mystical conceptions or spiritualizing deductions (which detract from the early view), as e.g. making the reign of the Messiah invisible, retaining the Son of Man during this period in the third heaven, etc., thus violating the express terms of the covenant and promises. (4) Others, again, with or without a decisive Church-Kingdom theory, have adopted certain salient features of Chiliaism (as e.g. the nearness of the Advent, the restoration of all things, the rise of the Antichrist and his destruction by the personal coming of Jesus, the first resurrection literal, the Sabbatism, etc.), so directly antagonistic to prevailing views and so much in harmony with our doctrine that they may be classed as, at least, partly Chiliastic. The first three, and some of the fourth class, reject the notion that the present dispensation, in any sense, contained the covenanted, predicted Kingdom of the Messiah; they all looked, however they may regard the church as provisional and even an introductory reign, to the Sec. Advent for the realization of the glorious Kingdom as promised by the prophets, as covenanted by God, and as believed in by the early church. This Kingdom, pre-eminently Messianic, they all believed was introduced by a personal Advent and a prior resurrection of the saints.

Hence on the great outlines they are a unit, however they may differ as to details. For they are all Pre-Millenarian in view, and look to the Kingdom to be set up here on earth after the Sec. Advent for the fulfilment of covenant and prophecy. In a subject so vast and complicated, it is reasonable, owing to human weakness and infirmity, to expect a divergence of view as to details, the order of events, and the meaning of various predictions. A greater divergency and antagonism of view, even pertaining to fundamentals, exist among our opponents, but this is no reason why we should reject their views, seeing that no doctrine of the Bible has escaped such treatment. It is therefore unfair to (as Brown) object to our doctrine because differences of opinion exist as to the fulfilment of details, and conceal the greater differences prevailing on their own side. Besides this, as our argument progresses, it will be shown that these differences largely and almost invariably result from a departure from the oath-bound covenants and the plain grammatical sense of the Word. The truth is, that some Pre-Millenarians are so largely leavened by the prevailing spiritualizing interpretations, that they cannot entirely rid themselves of its influence. It is also true, as the crudeness of the works indicate, that some Pre-Millenarians, without a careful study of the subject, have rushed into print and presented but a meagre and one-sided aspect of the doctrine, utterly failing to observe the force of the fundamental covenants.

Obs. 2. While some of the Reformers entertained partly Chiliastic views, others expressed themselves in a way contradictory to pure Millenarianism. But whatever their sentiments, not one of them believed in the modern Whittyan view of the Millennium. Those who were not Chiliastic, at least supported, as we shall show, the Chiliastic position thus far, that they did not adopt the idea of a Millennium still future, to be ushered in before the Sec. Advent. They were Augustinian in doctrine, and utterly refused the modern prevailing doctrine as anti-Scriptural and delusive (comp. e.g. the quotations from them under Prop. 175).

In reference to the Reformers we give place to no one in deep respect for them as devoted men of the church, but we have greater esteem for the authority of Scripture (Props. 9 and 10). The Reformers, with all their greatness, were fallible, and differed among themselves. Now it is the distinguishing feature of the Protestant Church in opposition to the Romish that when men differ among themselves the question of such difference is to be decided by an appeal, not to church authority, or to the weight of any man's writings, but to the Scriptures. This was the position of the Reformers themselves, and they frequently asserted that they themselves should only be followed in so far as their views corresponded with the Scriptures. They themselves acknowledged their liability to error; that many things in the Bible were still obscure to them; and that by study, prayer, continued application, progress would be made in the knowledge of the truth. A pompous amount of quotations might be adduced from them to sustain these points, but we think no one will dispute a fact that is so apparent and essential to progress.* For, if we blindly believe and only believe what some great and good men have said, we (a) yield the liberty of private judgment given by God ; (b) set up an infallibility unrecognized by the Word ; (c) render ourselves liable to error ; (d) dishonor the doctrinal position of Holy Writ ; (e) remove advancement in the knowledge of the truth ; (f) and place the writer whom we indorse in a false position. Augustine has so happily and delicately expressed this, when he answered a Donatist who had quoted the authority of Cyprian against him, that it may properly be introduced as illustrative of our opinion : " But now seeing that it is not canonical which thou recitest, with that liberty to which the Lord hath called us, I do not receive the opinion, differing from Scripture, of that man whose praise I cannot reach, to whose great learning I do not compare my writings, whose wit I love, in whose speech I delight, whose charity I admire, whose martyrdom I reverence."

---

* Comp. e.g. Mosheim Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 19, and Schlegel's note, Kurtz's Ch. His., vol. 2, sec. 30, D'Aubigné's His. Ref., Schmucker's Lutheran Symbols, and writings of Auberlen, Sprecher, Conrad, and a host of others.

2. It has been asserted by numerous writers that the Eschatology of the Reformers is, more or less, defective. Thus e.g. Anberlen (Div. Rev., p. 224, seq.) says, that " the Eschatology of the elder Protestantism is now generally admitted to be imperfect" (comp. Dörner's His. Prot. Theol., vol. 2, p. 170, etc., also Art. 2, Evang. Quarterly Review for Jan., 1875, written either by Dr. Brown or Dr. Valentine, one of the editors, Martenson, Ch. Dog., etc.). Various reasons are assigned for this by different writers, such as, that the defectiveness arose from their recent emergence from Popery (being unable to rid themselves entirely from its influence), from the bias obtained through the teaching of the later Fathers, especially Augustine, from their being trammelled by the popish notion of the church, from their attention being specially diverted to other subjects at that time more the objects of controversy, from their not being placed in a favorable position for the developing of the truth in this direction, etc. However explained, the fact remains, and their language, whatever the reason may be, sometimes implies doubt, sometimes a feeling after the old paths, and sometimes it is contradictory.*

3. After the Reformers occurred what they themselves were directly opposed to, viz. : their writings and confessions (especially the latter) were elevated to an authority equal to that of the Scriptures. All historians sadly testify to this unfortunate procedure. The impartial student must acknowledge that there is justice in the strictures of certain writers respecting the course taken by some of the followers of the Reformers. Thus e.g. Hallam (Introd. Lit. of Europe, vol. 2, p. 200) alludes to the right of Private Judgment, as an essential principle of Protestantism, but which was afterward constantly violated by the stringent imposition of Confessions, in the understanding of which Confessions no liberty was allowed, even in non-essentials. This gave force to one of the reproaches cast upon the Reformation by the adherents of Rome (and reproduced by Free Religionists, etc., of the present day), viz. : that after according liberty of judgment to reject the authority of the Romish church and form others, it then withdraws that liberty and devotes all who dissent from them to obloquy, heresy, and even to bonds and death. Hallam remarks : " these reproaches, it may be a shame for us to own, can be uttered and cannot be refuted" (comp. Milner's His. Literature, etc.). Hence it has been said (vol. 1, p. 370) that the Reformation " was but a change of masters" ; and if we are to credit certain rigid symbolists of our country and Europe, these old confessions (with a mass of superadded matter) are still to be our masters, to be received unqualifiedly, placed on a Romish footing of equality with the Scriptures. This spirit necessarily excluded proper development and true advancement : fettered by a bigoted confessional of standard by which everything drawn from the Scriptures is to * Compare also on this defectiveness Dr. Lange, in his Introd. to Rev., and p. 401 ; also the Art. " Antichrist," in Herzog's Encyclop., the remarks of the Com. in Lange's Com., 1 Thess., p. 24, and Dr. Lillie's note, etc. Dr. Kling, Art. " Eschatology," in Herzog's Encyclop., declares that the Reformers while resisting, on the one hand, the fanatical Anabaptist view, and, on the other, Popish errors, still held to a defective Eschatology, the original doctrine not being correctly held, but which was restored as the church advanced in her prophetic studies. The best proof of such a defective Eschatology is found in the fact that the most ultra-symbolists, who specially pride themselves on a strict adherence to Reformation doctrine, do not hold the Eschatology as given by the Reformers, as e.g. the time of the Millennium, the nearness of the Advent, the non-conversion of the world, and the Antichrist. Such, while opposing us, are very careful to conceal their own defect from the Reformer's teaching. Accusing us of a departure—as if it were fatal—they themselves are open to the same accusation, if it has any force.

---

be measured, the Confessions became the measurer of Scripture. But this is only part of the truth; for however extended this spirit, yet good and true men, followers of the Reformers, endeavored to restrain this spirit, so fatal to advance in knowledge. German, English, French, and other theologians of eminence have protested against this extreme confessional observance, and have shown that, owing to this proscription and the virulent controversies engendered by it, a fruitful source of continued ignorance upon various points, and a shutting of the door to advance in the truth, have been entailed. Hallam and others overlook this protest, because in the earlier period it unfortunately proved itself a small minority, which by degrees, however, has swelled to a large number. It is somewhat remarkable, illustrative of human prejudice and passion, that while, on the one hand, it was acknowledged that such confessions were fallible—the then expressed understanding of the Scriptures by their authors—they still were, on the other hand, held as certain, from which there could be no dissent without meriting censure and punishment. From all this (comp. Prop. 10) we learn, that while it is a duty and pleasure to honor the Reformers and their utterances (in so far as they accord with truth), we cannot, without detracting from our Christian manhood, and from the honor due alone to the Scriptures, elevate these men and their works to the position of the inspired prophets and apostles. If God had intended the Scriptures to be circumscribed by such assigned limits, provision undoubtedly would have been made to secure to us a confession not evidencing in its very construction the marks of human workmanship.

4. Simply as a reminder to our opponents (as e.g. Seiffarth) who urge the Reformers as if they were infallible, we illustrate the fact that, with all their greatness and valuable labors, they may also be in error in their interpretation of Scripture. Thus e.g. both Luther (Table Talk) and Melancthon (Initia Doctrinæ Physicæ), as shown by White (The Warfare of Science); and see his references to Bretschneider, Lange, and Prowe), opposed the Copernican system by appeals to Scripture, Joshua, the Psalms, Ecclesiastes, etc., proving that the earth is the centre of the universe. In their conscientiousness Luther calls Copernicus “an upstart astrologer” and “fool,” while Melancthon pronounces him guilty of “a want of honesty and decency to assert such notions publicly.” This teaches us that good and great men may misjudge and misinterpret, under the impression that they are doing God’s service.

Obs. 3. The subject requires that we should more particularly allude to the views of the Reformers, and those after them, who were not directly Chilianic in doctrine.<sup>1</sup> They (as e.g. Luther, Melancthon, Zwingli, Calvin, and Knox) occupied the Augustinian or Popish position (see works giving extracts from their writings, such as Elliott’s Horæ Apoc., Taylor’s Voice of the Church, etc.), viz. : that the church, in some sense, was the Kingdom of God (preparatory to a higher stage), and that the Millennial period (one thousand years) included this dispensation or gospel period (some of the Millennial descriptions being applicable only to a future period either in heaven or the renewed earth), and hence was nearing its close. But each of these recorded their belief, in the duty of every believer to be constantly looking for the Advent, in a speedy Advent, in there being no future Millennial glory before the coming of Jesus, in the church remaining a mixed state to the end, in the design of the present dispensation, in the principle of interpretation adopted, in unbelief again extending and widening before the Advent, in the renewal of this earth, etc.—doctrines in unison with Chilianism. The simple truth in reference to them is this : that they were not Chilianists, although teaching several points that materially aid in sustaining Chilianism (as e.g. in those enumerated), and in some, as Luther and Melancthon, holding that at the end of the 6th Chiliad—the close of six thousand years—Christ would appear and introduce a glorious Sabbatism (Prop. 143). They were thus really Anti-Millenarian in the sense of expressing faith in a proper Millennium yet to come, or in that of believing in a Millennium already past, and this can be abundantly proven from their writings, in their declarations of the future anticipated condition of the world, in their hopes of an Advent drawing nigh, and in their emphatic denial of a conversion of the world prior to the expected Advent. Therefore it is that neither Millenarians (excepting in the features stated) nor Whitbyans (i.e. believers in a future Millennium brought about without the Advent through present agencies) can wholly claim them.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Because Millenarians quote Luther, etc., to sustain certain features of our doctrine, we are sometimes unjustly charged as if we referred to them as express Chiliasts; and this too notwithstanding the explicit statements given by us respecting their doctrinal position. Many Millenarian works (as Elliott's, Brooks', Cox's, Seiss', Taylor's, and others) allow in full their Augustinian position, but only refer to them (1) to show that nowhere do they endorse the modern Whitbyan doctrine; (2) that they pointedly condemn the present prevailing view; (3) and that, in important points, they fully and unreservedly coincide with our Millenarian attitude. Our opponents of the Whitbyan school cannot claim them, seeing that their position is directly hostile to that of the Reformers. In the course of extended reading, we have yet to find a single sentence in the Reformer's writings, that our opponents can directly quote in their behalf as being in sympathy with the Whitbyan hypothesis. Our ability to do this in behalf of some of our views seems to be a tender matter with Whitbyan followers.

Our opponents very artfully quote from the Reformers such matter as they suppose is Antichiliasitic, but are very careful to avoid two kinds of utterances given by the same men: (1) those that are in cordial sympathy with Chiliastic doctrine; (2) those that are in direct conflict with the modern, Whitbyan notion. Prof. Briggs, in the N. Y. Evangelist, 1879 (republished in the Lutheran Quarterly), endeavors, by a concealment of the actual facts, to leave the impression that the Reformers were in accord with the prevailing modern view. Articles like these—and they are numerous—are insidiously constructed, and well calculated to prejudice the ignorant or unwary. Our opponents, when driven to the wall, fully acknowledge that the Reformers were wrong in their Eschatology relating to the Millennium. Scarcely any theologian adopts their view to-day, it having been discarded for the futurity of the Mill., is a question no longer debated. Consequently the Reformers are immensely more in agreement with us than with our opposers, as we show by our quotations from them. No one denies that the Reformers held to a present spiritual Kingdom preparatory to a future one (as many Millenarians also do), or that they rejected a proper Mill. age in the future (which is just as hostile to our Post-Mill. friends as it is to us), for the simple fact, which colored their Eschatology, is that they, more or less, adopted the Augustinian notion of a past, present, or existing Mill. age, identifying it with this dispensation. That the Reformers were opposed to the carnal, fanatical Anabaptist movement is what every Chiliast does, on the ground of locating the Mill. age after the Advent and after the res. and translation of the saints. Whitbyans, certainly, ought not to seek the shelter and authority of the Reformers in this indirect method (which is both unscholarly and dishonest, because it seeks by the suppression of their real views to make them seem favorably disposed), when, in the most fundamental things pertaining to their theory, they were directly in antagonism (comp. quotations from them e.g. under Prop. 175). It is strange that men have not the acuteness to see that when they endeavor to array others against us who have less sympathy with their own theory than with ours, they are only heaping up material condemnatory of their own views. What service is gained, or what proof is obtained in behalf of the Whitbyan "hypothesis," by showing that certain persons were not favorable to Chiliasm proper (although they adopted and taught certain prominent Chiliastic doctrines), when the same persons plainly reject the Whitbyan theory as unscriptural and misleading? What weight should be given to such testimony, which forms the staple of numerous essays against us? Compare for the Reformer's views Elliott's Horre Apoc., and Arts. in Herzog, M'Clintock & Strong, etc. Lange, Introd. to Rev., p. 67, etc., refers to Luther's views as that "the thousand years extend from the time of the Apocalypticist to Gregory VII.," and this is stated in numerous Pre-Millenarian works.

<sup>2</sup> The same is true of many theologians who followed the Reformers, for while opposed to the direct ancient Chiliasm of the Primitive Church they, adopting the views of the Reformers, held to no future Millennium before the Advent of Christ. Thus to illustrate: for example, Quenstedt (Theolog. Didactico-polemica, 4, p. 649), Hunnius (Epit. Credendorum, pp. 286, sex. 291), Hutter (Compend., p. 171), and others given by Dr. Seiss (A Question in Eschatology), with which compare Schmid's Dogmatics, etc. The intelligent and careful student will also notice (what happens frequently in late commentaries, etc.) that some theologians of this class while stating succinctly their belief in no future Millennium before the Advent of Christ, in other places drop expressions which either make their utterances contradictory or leave the impression that they were in doubt respecting their own position. The fact, however, as stated by us is this: that such a view is held by but few at present. The Protestant position has (as noticed by Hengstenberg, Apoc., vol. 2, p. 334, Stuart, Apoc., vol. 2, p. 463), in view of its Apocalyptic application to the Papacy, approached a Chiliastic one, and locates the 1000 years' reign in the future, after the overthrow and destruction of the Antichrist. It is unnecessary, because of the almost universal rejection of their Millennial theory, to enter into a detailed statement. Under other Props. will be shown (e.g. Prop. 158, etc.), the Scriptural and historical reasons which lead, inevitably, to its abandonment. The advocates of this view are mentioned e.g. by Lange, Introd. to Rev., and the denouncement of these "servile adherents to orthodoxy," etc., is given p. 401, etc.

Obs. 4. In noticing the history of Chiliasm, it is very important for the student to discriminate between the various beliefs in antagonism to it. By overlooking this some writers have made serious mistakes, (1) in calling those Millenarians who, before the personal Advent and the resurrection of the saints (both cardinal doctrines in our system) look for a Millennium (as e.g. Anabaptists, Shakers, Swedenborgians, etc.); (2) in making out those favorable to the Whitbyan theory (a) who oppose us and are really Anti-Millenarian, or (b) who decry Chiliasm, but are themselves Post-Millenarian, or (c) in producing those who are Millenarians as if opposed to it, as e.g. in quoting from their writings, as in the case of Bunyan and others, the belief in the conversion of the world, without knowing that when they come specifically to explain the manner of its accomplishment it is purely in the Chiliastic order. Hence the careful writer on the subject will distinguish between the various theories: (1) Pure Chiliasm as entertained by the early church, which held as distinguishing characteristics that the church was not the Kingdom, but that the Kingdom was dependent on a Pre-Millennial personal Advent, a Pre-Millennial resurrection of the saints, etc., when, after such an Advent and resurrection, the personal reign of Christ and the saints would be introduced; (2) mixed Chiliasm, (a) holding to the early view as stated, with the exception of making also the church a preliminary Kingdom, and (b) receiving all of the second, including the personal Advent and resurrection, but making the reign one in heaven, or invisibly; (3) the Augustinian or Popish view, which makes the church in this dispensation the Kingdom, and does not look for one to come in a still future Millennial period; (4) another Popish view, indorsed also by a few Protestants (Grotius, Prideaux, Bush, Vint, etc.), that the church is the Kingdom, and that the Millennial era is to be dated from Constantine's conversion; (5) the Anti-Millenarian theory, which, without any Millennial doctrine (or else making the Millennial descriptions apply to heaven), regards the church as a Kingdom, and denies that there will be any Millennium in the future; (6) the Post-Millennial view (which adopts either 3 or 4), but extends the church already (as Swedenborgians) into a New Jerusalem state; (7) the view of those who regard the church a Kingdom, but (as Shakers, etc.) have it in Millennial glory in their own organization; (8) the doctrine of such, who, without any Chiliastic Kingdom—also making the church a Kingdom—simply teach the nearness of the Advent and the destruction of the world (as Millerites, etc.); (9) the singular opinion of some (as Seventh-Day Adventists), who, also teaching that the church is a Kingdom, declare the nearness of the Advent, but consign the reign of the Messiah and of the saints during the one thousand years to the third heaven, to be followed by a renewal, etc.;

(10) the Whitbyan hypothesis, which makes the church a Kingdom, and looks for a higher stage of it in the future Millennial age, merging ultimately into the heavenly Kingdom; (11) the opinion of a few, that the church is no Kingdom, but will ultimately be incorporated into one in the third heaven; (12) the development theory, which teaches that, while an invisible Kingdom exists in the church, the church will still more and more develop itself into the outward form of a Kingdom, without noting any particular era for the same; (13) the Rationalistic view, that the church is no Kingdom, and none, in any proper sense, is to be expected; (14) and the notion of some (as Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchy men), that prior to the Advent and resurrection they could, through violence, etc., introduce the Kingdom of Christ in its Millennial greatness.

The reader will observe that nearly all in this list are based on the Alexandrian interpretation, and are the offshoots of the Origenistic system, discarding a grammatical interpretation of covenant and prophecy. Hence their direct antagonism to the Davidic covenant, and the promises founded on the same, and which is sought to be reconciled by special spiritualizing to suit the theory.

Obs. 5. A number of writers have sought to bring discredit on our doctrine by declaring that it never was embraced in any public and acknowledged confession of the church, either before or after the Reformation. A few remarks, indicative of the facts, may be in place, in order that the reader may decide for himself what weight is in the objection.

1. Even if this were true, two things are worthy of attention: (1) That Creeds and Confessions do not circumscribe the Word of God, or prevent a deeper and more Scriptural insight in Divine things, seeing that they are simply the expression of the understanding that certain persons or bodies have of the truth at a particular period. The fallibility of these Confessions is apparent, in that no two of them coincide in all particulars, and that one is antagonistic to another. (See Props. 9 and 10.) (2) Our opponents who present this objection weaken their own cause by urging it, because some of these Confessions contain Chiliastic features, or are in greater sympathy with our doctrine than with their own, and none of the leading ones indorse the Whitbyan theory. The objection would have force if the Confessions directly taught their own Millennium doctrine, but as this is not the case, it can only prejudice the ignorant or unreflecting.<sup>1</sup>

2. If we take the quite early creeds, the Apostolic and the Nicene, we find them held equally by Chiliasts and Anti-Chiliasts, for they contain nothing respecting the Kingdom or Millennium. If we are to take Gelasius' (Prop. 77, Obs. 7, note 1) explanation of the Nicene, then they were regarded as embracing Chiliastic views. Writers of ability have traced the Apostles' Creed to express Chiliasts, as e.g. to Irenæus and Tertullian. One thing, at least, is very evident to the student, that the brief allusions to Eschatology are of such a nature that both parties can heartily adopt them, since they only embrace some salient features without attempting to explain how, or in what order, they are to be realized.<sup>2</sup>

3. Coming to later confessions, we find them, the leading ones, to express Eschatology in such a form (as e.g. the fact of a resurrection, of an Advent, of a judgment, etc.) that Millenarians, Post- and Anti-Millenarians can cordially subscribe to them. It is, however, alleged that some have been specifically hostile to Chiliasm, and two, with evident relish, are brought forward as evidence, viz.: the Augsburg Confession and the English Confession of Edward VI.

(1) The Augsburg Confession. Knapp, Schmid, Shedd, and a number of writers assert that the Augsburg Confession positively condemns Chiliasm. On the other hand, Semisch, Auberlen, Floerke, Delitzsch, Spener, Bengel, Crusius, and others affirm the contrary. The intelligent reader will, in such a discussion, be influenced by the statements of eminent men who disinterestedly, and after mature consideration of the subject, declare that the Confession does not reprove and reprobate ancient Chiliaism as held by the Fathers, but only the form of doctrine as advocated by the Anabaptists. We refer in illustration to the paper drawn up by members of the Faculty of the University of Dorpat in reply to questions proposed by the Lutheran Synod of Iowa. It is signed by Drs. Havernach, Kurtz, Von Oetengen, Von Engelhart, and Volck, and fully answers the question, whether Chiliaism is in conflict with the Confession and the Lutheran Church, in the most decisive negative.*

(2) The Confession of Edward VI., brought forward by Shedd and others, can only be fairly and scholarly treated by considering: (a) That the Art., adopted in 1553, to which they refer, was only nine years afterward withdrawn (which fact they are very careful to keep from their readers), thus indicating that any censure intended was fully revoked. (b) That in the later revisions it continued to be omitted, thus showing that a condemnatory spirit was not indorsed. (c) That in immediate connection with the Confession was published "The Catechism of Edward VI.," drawn up by his Prelates (said to be Cranmer, Burnet's His., vol. 3, B. 4; or Neale, His. Puritans, vol. 1, p. 63, Poynt, afterward Bh. of Winchester), which contains, on the questions respecting "Thy Kingdom come," the strongest Chiliaistic views (see them given e.g. by Brooks, Cox, Taylor, etc.). (d) And that prominent Prelates (as Bh. Latimer, Arch. Cranmer, Bradford, etc.) who received the Confession entertained Millenarian doctrine.* (3) Coming to other Confessions, we find upholders of our doctrine and opposers of it, both holding to the same. Thus e.g. the Westminster Assembly. In proof of our position we refer to the fact stated by an Anti-Millenarian (hence disinterested), Dr. Baillie, that "the most of the chief Divines here" (meaning the Assembly) "not only Independents but others, such as Twiss, Marshall, Palmer, and many more, are express Chiliaists."* Again, if we refer to the Belgic Confession, produced by Shedd, Millenarians can most cordially subscribe to the Art. respecting the time of the Advent and the completion of the number of the elect. The same is true of many others, and it appears as if the language was purposely guarded to allow a common confessional union, which could only be done by avoiding direct Chiliaism or its opposite.

4. Several Confessions (confined to small bodies of believers) have Chiliaistic Articles. One of the most noticeable of these is that drawn up by the Baptists (for since they form a large organization, the same is discarded, or held only by individuals, or small portions of the Baptists) in A.D. 1660, and presented to Charles II., signed by John Bunyan and others (said to have represented "more than twenty thousand Baptists"), in which the purest early Patristic Millenarian doctrine is contained, discriminating the order of resurrection, making a literal first resurrection to occur at the Sec. Advent, having a glorious Messianic Kingdom then established, etc.*

<sup>1</sup> That they are directly opposed to the Whitbyan doctrine, looking for the righteous to predominate in government, etc., is evident by looking at e.g. Augsburg Confession, Art. 17, the Apology of the Augsburg Confession, and Articles of Smalcald (Müller's Symb. Buch., p. 245, 298). The Latter Confession of Halvita (Niemeier's Col. Conf., p. 485-6), and the Confession of the Westminster Assembly, and others as given by Seiss in A Question in Eschatology, pp. 33-40, with extracts. (Comp. Prop. 175.) The reasoning therefore of Prof. Briggs, and others, is totally irrelevant, and if it has any force whatever, must be decisive against themselves. For, while there is no creed or confession which directly and positively teaches the Whitbyan theory, we have some creeds (which we shall quote hereafter) that directly teach Chiliasm, and we have all the great leading ones to directly present prominent Chiliasmic doctrines held by us, and such as are utterly irreconcilable with the modern "hypothesis."

<sup>2</sup> Comp. King's His. Apos. Creed, Bh. Pearson On the Creed, Mosheim's Ecl. His., vol. 1, p. 79, and Murdock's note, etc., and notice the reference to Irenæus and Tertullian. Observe also that in the enlargement of the Creed, as now used, by the Romish Church the same features are retained so that both parties could still receive it. The eschatology of the Athanasian Creed follows the others, with more of a leaning toward Romanism. See the Creeds as given by Dr. Schaff in Creeds of Christendom. The Scriptural statements (using the exact phraseology), or the general expressions (without any attempt to explain order, etc.), were of such a nature as to allow both parties to adopt them as true; the difference and antagonism only appeared when the manner of fulfilment or realization was expounded. Thus e.g. to believe in a res. of the dead is the faith of all, but when the order and manner of the res. is afterward discussed (aside from the creeds) differences appear, etc.

<sup>3</sup> The reply is so admirable in spirit that we append a few extracts. It has been published in German as a Tract, and in English in the Evang. Quarterly Review and The Lutheran. Giving reasons drawn from Melancthon, Luther, and others, for the declaration: "There is no doubt that our Confession here (art. XVII.), has not in view the Old Catholic Chiliasm in its various forms, but that of the Münzer Anabaptists, and the fanatical errorists akin to them," the writers proceed as follows: "The fact, therefore, is incontrovertibly this, that the Augsburg Confession has only to do with the Anabaptist errors and efforts of those times. It places affirmatively the chief eschatological facts, in their principal features, over against the rejected error, without, for example, any special explanation as to how we are to understand the Coming of Christ, or the Last Day, what the Scriptures teach concerning the resurrection of the dead, and how the passage in Rev. 20: 1-6, in connection with the entire Scripture, is to be explained. Especially has it not at all yet expressed itself concerning the precise substance of the last question, namely: whether this prophecy must be looked upon as one already fulfilled, or as one, the fulfilment of which is yet future. Each one may answer these for himself, in such way as he may deem defensible by the Word of God and the consensus of church doctrine. We look upon these questions, neither as finally determined, nor as allowing, in attempts to solve them, a departure from the prophetic and apostolic word; further, that the attention which this subject commands is a characteristic feature, and one worthy of notice of the Church and theology of the present day. They are, in fact, yet open exegetical questions, every solution of which cannot be assented to; nor, on the other hand, is every Christian and theological conviction, resting upon an earnest and churchly-minded Scriptural investigation, which does not agree with old dogmatists, to be at once rejected with fanatical Chiliasm, or even to be suspected as Chiliasmic." After showing that church fellowship cannot Confessionally be denied to any one "on account of differences in the doctrine of the Chiliasmic Kingdom, concerning which our confession has not at all yet expressed itself," the writers continue: "We are indeed not able to see, under what churchly confessional claim it can be forbidden to the individual, and especially to the theologian, in the Lutheran Church, to search the prophetic Scriptures in the manner designated, and upon their basis to form a Christian and theological faith—conviction concerning the final acts of redemption; nor with what churchly right, inasmuch as our Church recognizes no exegetical tribunal, we can refuse to regard similar questions of doctrine, so long as the expressed saving faith remains, as anything else than they really are, namely: open questions." They add: "It is our conviction, that it is an error to suppose that there is nothing more given for faith and the Church to search after and to learn; or that it lies in the power of the Church, especially the more she nears her final goal, to go out of the way of these questions."

That the reader can see for himself that it does not, and cannot, condemn the Chiliasm of the Apostolic and later Fathers, we reproduce that portion of art. XVII. which is alleged as condemnatory: "they condemn those who spread abroad Jewish opinions, that before the resurrection of the dead, the pious will engross the government of the world and the wicked be everywhere oppressed,"—(the German: "they condemn those who circulate the Judaizing notion, that prior to the resurrection of the dead, the godly will establish a world-dominion and all the wicked will be exterminated")." Now every one can see that the form of doctrine here condemned is not the one entertained by the ancient Chiliasts, for not one of them locates this Kingdom prior to, or before, the resurrection, and not one of them teaches that this can be effected by the pious but only by the Sec. Advent and the power of the Messiah. The error thus reprobated belongs to the Anabaptists, and all that class (including also the Whitbyans) who teach that before the resurrection, and consequently before the Advent, and before the end of this dispensation, the Church will so advance, etc., that "the pious will engross the government of the world," institute a "world-dominion," and suppress the wicked. The Millenarian view, having for cardinal doctrines a prior Advent and resurrection, is not chargeable with so gross an error; and those who urge this Confessional objection are not sufficiently candid to acknowledge that it is condemnatory—if it has any logical force whatever—of the present prevailing Whitbyan theory of the Millennium.

The reader is referred to an art. on the question, "Does the Augsburg Confession condemn Chiliasm?" by Dr. Seiss in the Append. (Note D.) to The Last Times. He makes at length the following points: (1) By name Chiliasm is not condemned. (2) The description of the opinions condemned does not describe Millenarianism, for it is no doctrine of ours "that the pious are to have a separate Kingdom to themselves before the resurrection of the dead." We look for a Kingdom only after the resurrection, and the authorities in behalf of our doctrine are given. (3) Reference is made in the Confession to the Anabaptists, and it is decisively shown from historical authorities that the doctrine of the Anabaptists widely differed from the Millenarian. (4) The declarations of Luther, Melancthon, and others, are produced to indicate the same. (5) Millenarians of eminence and ability are adduced, who subscribed to the Confession, such as Spener, Bengel, and others. (6) That the Confessors did not sit in judgment over, and condemn the Apostolic and Primitive Fathers, who were Chiliastic, for whom in other places they profess esteem.

It is unfortunate and misleading, that even in Cyclopædias, His. of Doctrines, etc., efforts are made to link ancient and modern Chiliasm with the vagaries of Anabaptists and the Fifth Monarchy men, and hastily to infer that when these are confessionally or otherwise condemned by the Reformers and others, that this also is condemnatory of Chiliasm in all its phases. Such a line of procedure if applied to other doctrine, would leave but little for us to receive. The vagaries of Anabaptists, such as, that before the Advent and resurrection the promised Kingdom is to be established, that it is to be set up by human means and instrumentalities, that Christ will then reign through self-appointed prophets, vicars, kings, etc.—which Chiliasm pointedly repudiates, are fully described by Mosheim, Ranke, Hardwick, Miller, Walch, etc., so that a student cannot plead ignorance when indorsing such an error. So also with the Fifth Monarchy men; history (Burnet, Wilson, etc.), attests, that the Fifth Monarchy of Daniel, they expected (with perhaps few exceptions, as Tillinghast and others) to raise up through their own agency before the Coming of Christ, and contended, therefore, that all power, civil and spiritual, should be already given to them. Hence they entered into open rebellion against the existing powers, etc., a principle utterly at variance with ancient and modern Chiliasm.

Numerous testimonies expressive of the intended meaning of the art. could be given. And as our opponents persistently urge it as an objection, a few more are appended. Dr. Lange in several places (e.g. Rev. p. 351, Amer. Ed.) refers to this misinterpretation of the Confession, e.g. saying: "The elder Lutheran theology continues most involved in the toils of mediæval tradition. The slavish theology of the letter has found a support in the view of John Gerhard in particular. The Apocalypse, Gerhard declares, is a deuterocanonical book—the Kingdom of Christ will never on earth, not even at the end of the days, be one of external sovereignty (a sentiment dictated, doubtless by a misunderstanding of art. XVII. of the Augsburg Confession)—all the dead are to arise in one day—there is to be but one general resurrection of the dead at the Parousia of the Lord. Accordingly, it is further stated, the beginning of the Mill. Kingdom probably falls in the time of Constantine—Gog and Magog are to be regarded as significant of the Turka. A partialism for this prejudiced tradition can in general be regarded only as the sad fruit of partyism." (Comp. p. 401.) In Richter's Erklärte Haus Bibel, Tom. 6, 1134, in advocacy of our views, it is said: "The doctrine of the one thousand years' Kingdom, or Flower and Golden Time of the Church upon this present earth—which the prophets have so amply pictured—is thoroughly in accordance with the Evangelical Church doctrine, for in the 17th art. of the Augsburg Confession there is not a syllable (steht kein wort) about the one thousand years, nor about the one thousand years' Kingdom," etc. So the Berleberg Bibel, Tom. 6, pp. 397-399, advocates Chiliaism, and declares that the art. is not in conflict with it, but that "a mere carnal, world-kingdom is justly rejected." Thus others might be quoted, as Olshausen, Bengel, Steir, Auberlien, Delitzsch, Koppe, Piscator, Spener, Ebrard, Lisco, Roos, Kohler, Baurer Fr., and many others. Mallery (Prop. Times, vol. 5, p. 97) justly, in reply to Shedd, observes: "What the Augsburg Confession does condemn, is the now prevalent notion of a Millennium of righteousness and good government before the Lord's coming. It condemns the notion of the conversion of the world under the present dispensation, the idea now regarded as orthodox, but one which Luther constantly condemned." The student, too, will observe the force of the word "prior" or "before" used designedly, for, as we shall hereafter show by numerous quotations, the Reformers did believe that after the resurrection and after the Sec. Advent this earth renewed, etc., would be given to the pious and that they would gloriously reign—thus incorporating into their faith doctrines in sympathy with Chiliaistic views. As illustrative of view, we quote Koch (Das Tausendjährige Reich), who says: "Here, first of all, the false Chiliaism advocated in the time of the Reformation by the fanatical Anabaptists, is to be mentioned. They taught a future glorious Kingdom of Christ on earth, but imagined that the immediate erection of this Kingdom was a matter of the first importance to the Christian Church. By her own might, sword in hand, it must be established, just as it was attempted by Thomas Munzer to overthrow the Christ-opposed powers of this world (even as Israel overthrew the Canaanites formerly), in order to proclaim the Kingdom of Christ as the Fifth Monarchy, which was to succeed the four universal monarchies described by Daniel. Against this conception of the 1000 years' Kingdom—and only against this—was the 17th art. of the Augsburg Confession directed, which rejected the Jewish opinion that believers should enjoy on earth, before the resurrection, a worldly kingdom, after a general crushing out of the wicked. But not merely by the Augustana, but also by the Scriptures, is this false Chiliaism condemned, because, as already shown, the erection of the Millennial Kingdom, according to the prophets' words, is not the result of any such Church action, but comes only by means of the returning Lord, an event which the Church awaits with patience, and which at last it can only realize, not by works, but by suffering. Kindred with this false Chiliaism, is a conception of modern theology, according to which the Kingdom of Christ is to be realized by means of Church action, not, indeed, violently, but gradually and in a peaceful way. The sanctifying influence of Christianity is to evermore powerfully extend itself, in ever-widening circles, the power of sin evermore retreating before it, until, finally at the close of its historical development, all humanity shall be glorified into a Kingdom of God. Even this finer form of Chiliaism" (as e.g. given by Whitby, Edwards, Brown, Glasgow, etc.), "like the coarse form advocated by the Anabaptists, is condemned by the Apoc. of John. According to this, wickedness does not decline in the course of history, but rather ascends to its most fearful antichristian height, while on the other hand, also, the Church is purified by means of her tribulation, in the last time. Not the preaching of the Gospel, the moral influence of Christianity, puts an end to antichristianity, but the judgment of the returning Lord, with which the glorious Kingdom of God on earth makes an entrance." (Compare Starke, Steffann and Ebrard, p. 440, Lange's Com. Rev.)

---

* We refer the critical student to the incorrect usage of "Jewish opinion" and "Judaizing notion" in the art. For, as we have abundantly proven, in former Props., in quotations from our opponents, Jewish authorities, and recent works on the Doc. of the New Test., it is not even correct to associate the Anabaptist error with Jewish views, because the Jews associated a res. of the godly with the Advent of the Messiah and His reign, etc. It is only true, when taken in a limited sense, expressed e.g. by Jews who permitted themselves to be imposed on by false Messiahs. Here even it is proper to discriminate, so that injustice is not done to the Jewish expressed faith. The Jews, as a class, took no part in this movement.

<sup>4</sup> Brooks' El. Proph. Interp., Taylor's Voice of the Church, Cox's Millenarian's Answer, The Time of the End by a Congregationalist, Shimeall's Eschatology, and other works give the evidence respecting this Confession, and copious extracts from the Catechism and from the Prelates indorsing it, unmistakably proving that many who were Chiliaistic received it; and that, therefore, the withdrawal of the article was intentional "either" (so Brooks) "from the increase of Millenarian principles at this time; or at least from the conviction that they were not to be confounded with the extravagances of Cerinthus or of Munzer." Bickersteth (Prom. Glory, p. 93, note) refers to the opinion of the Reformers (Tyndale, Bradford, Latimer, Becon) and of Edward VI.'s Catechism, and then to

the speedy withdrawal of this art., adding : "The idea of a carnal Mill. of worldly pleasures is justly denounced by all thoughtful Christians. The common idea of the Reformers, derived from Rome and continued for some time after the Reformation, was, that the Mill. was past, an opinion generally now abandoned. The 41st art. was wholly withdrawn from the authorized Articles of 1562. The prevailing opinion of the Reformers was, that the judgment to come was to be expected speedily, without any intervening Mill., and that our Saviour would soon return in His glory ; and hence the services have nothing that interferes with our looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearance of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ ; and have also many expressions of confidence in His return, and the Kingdom then to be inherited by the saints."

<sup>a</sup> Brooks, El. Proph. Interp., p. 72, quotes the letter from Baillie (Let. No. 117, presented also in Anderson's Letter to the Author of Millenarianism Indefensible," and quoted in various works), and gives among the "many more" known to have been Millenarian, Ash, Bridge, Burroughs, Caryll, Goodwin, Gouge, Langley, and Sterry, all members of the Assembly. To these as expressing Chiliaistic views to some extent, Shimeall (Eschatology, p. 89) adds : Selden, Ainsworth, Gataker, and Featly. No wonder that Baillie writes that this "error so famous in antiquity" is "so troublesome among us." Prof. Briggs in his bitterness against Chiliaism affirms, most unjustly, that the Westminster Conf. rejects Pre-Mill. as error and heresy (Dr. Macdill follows him closely in the same unhistorical charge) ; now Dr. Craven in his reply to the grave charge (N. Y. Evangelist, Jan. and Feb. 1879), makes the following points, which serve as a most ample refutation. (1) The majority of the committee (viz. : Goodwin, Bridge, Caryll, and Greenhill—who had been members of the Westminster Assembly), who framed the Savoy Confession, were express Pre-Millenarians. (2) Pre-Millenarians prominently took part in framing the Confession, and evidently—as a compromise—to preserve unity and harmony, so worded the same, giving general and Scriptural statements (without any intimation of order or manner) that all could accept of it. (3) As a diversity of opinion existed relating to the events preceding and connected with the Sec. Advent, the only basis of union was to avoid a discussion of the order and manner of fulfilment, which was done. (4) The use of the phrases "day of judgment," "Kingdom," etc., as well as the adoption of Scripture on controverted subjects without explanation, did not forbid Pre-Mills. or Post-Mills. to accept of the same. (5) That the admission of Prof. Briggs that Pre-Mills. (as Sterry, Burroughs, and Goodwin) were in the Westminster Assembly, and utterly unconscious of being denounced and condemned, is sufficient evidence in our favor. (6) That these and other Pre-Mills. labored with Post-Mills. in the same Church, and were never tried and disciplined for their doctrinal views, is conclusive proof how the same were regarded. (7) That Homes' intensely Pre-Mill. work "The Res. Revealed," was indorsed by a committee (Caryll and Sterry) of the Assembly, is decisive that no condemnatory idea was ever entertained. (8) That the testimony of Baillie (Letters, vol. 2, p. 414-15), and of Masson (Life of Milton, vol. 2, p. 146), both opponents, as to the extent of the belief, and the eminence of its believers, is irresistible to any unprejudiced mind. (9) That Twisse, "a thoroughgoing Pre-Millenarian, should have been selected for the position of Moderator," is evidence either of the esteem in which Chiliaists were held, or of the number of Chiliaistic adherents in the Assembly, or of both. (10) Caryll, as one of the committee to whom Homes' Chiliaistic work was given, not only pronounces the book "very useful for the saints and worthy of public view," but states that its doctrines have "gained ground in the hearts and judgments of very many, both grave and godly men, who have left us divers essays and discourses on the subject." We leave the candid reader to say whether, in view of such facts, there is the slightest foundation for Prof. B.'s uncharitable deductions ; and whether the latter do not spring more from the heart than from the mind. The feeling and opinion even later is illustrated e.g. in the Life of Ed. Irving (by Mrs. Oliphant, p. 335) ; it being stated that the authorities of the Church tacitly admitted, by non-interference, attendance, etc., that the doctrine of the Millennium was "open to a diversity of view." We shall have occasion to quote this Confession under another Prop., as in sympathy with some Chiliaistic views, viz. : the looking for the Advent enforced as a duty without an intervening Millennial age, and the nonconversion of the world.

<sup>a</sup> The student is referred to Crosby's His. of the Baptists, vol. 2, App. 85. We give a few extracts to illustrate. The Confession declares the unalterable faith of the signers, saying, "for which we are not only resolved to suffer persecution to the loss of our goods, but also life itself, rather than decline from the same ;" and this enforces the Chiliaism as a deliberate conviction. It then plainly announces : "We believe that there will be an order in the resurrection ; Christ is the first-fruits, and then next, or after, they that are Christ's at His Coming ; then, or afterward, cometh the end. Concerning the Kingdom and reign of our Lord Jesus Christ, as we do believe that He is now in heaven

of the days, be one of external sovereignty (a sentiment dictated, doubtless by a misunderstanding of art. XVII. of the Augsburg Confession)—all the dead are to arise in one day—there is to be one general resurrection of the dead at the Parousia of the Lord. Accordingly, it is further stated, the beginning of the Mill. Kingdom probably falls in the time of Constantine—Gog and Magog are to be regarded as significant of the Turks. A partiality for this prejudiced tradition can in general be regarded only as the sad fruit of partyism." (Comp. p. 401.) In Richter's Erklärte Haus Bibel, Tom. 6, 1134, in advocacy of our views, it is said: "The doctrine of the one thousand years' Kingdom, or Flower and Golden Time of the Church upon this present earth—which the prophets have so amply pictured—is thoroughly in accordance with the Evangelical Church doctrine, for in the 17th art. of the Augsburg Confession there is not a syllable (steht kein wort) about the one thousand years, nor about the one thousand years' Kingdom," etc. So the Berleberg Bibel, Tom. 6, pp. 397-399, advocates Chiliasm, and declares that the art. is not in conflict with it, but that "a mere carnal, world-kingdom is justly rejected." Thus others might be quoted, as Olshausen, Bengel, Steir, Auberlen, Delitzsch, Koppe, Piscator, Spener, Ebrard, Lisoo, Roos, Kohler, Baner Fr., and many others. Mallery (Prop. Times, vol. 5, p. 97) justly, in reply to Shedd, observes: "What the Augsburg Confession does condemn, is the now prevalent notion of a Millennium of righteousness and good government before the Lord's coming. It condemns the notion of the conversion of the world under the present dispensation, the idea now regarded as orthodox, but one which Luther constantly condemned." The student, too, will observe the force of the word "prior" or "before" used designedly, for, as we shall hereafter show by numerous quotations, the Reformers did believe that after the resurrection and after the Sec. Advent this earth renewed, etc., would be given to the pious and that they would gloriously reign—thus incorporating into their faith doctrines in sympathy with Chiliasmic views. As illustrative of view, we quote Koch (Das Tausendjährige Reich), who says: "Here, first of all, the false Chiliasm advocated in the time of the Reformation by the fanatical Anabaptists, is to be mentioned. They taught a future glorious Kingdom of Christ on earth, but imagined that the immediate erection of this Kingdom was a matter of the first importance to the Christian Church. By her own might, sword in hand, it must be established, just as it was attempted by Thomas Munzer to overthrow the Christ-opposed powers of this world (even as Israel overthrew the Canaanites formerly), in order to proclaim the Kingdom of Christ as the Fifth Monarchy, which was to succeed the four universal monarchies described by Daniel. Against this conception of the 1000 years' Kingdom—and only against this—was the 17th art. of the Augsburg Confession directed, which rejected the Jewish opinion that believers should enjoy on earth, before the resurrection, a worldly kingdom, after a general crushing out of the wicked. But not merely by the Augustana, but also by the Scriptures, is this false Chiliasm condemned, because, as already shown, the erection of the Millennial Kingdom, according to the prophets' words, is not the result of any such Church action, but comes only by means of the returning Lord, an event which the Church awaits with patience, and which at last it can only realize, not by works, but by suffering. Kindred with this false Chiliasm, is a conception of modern theology, according to which the Kingdom of Christ is to be realized by means of Church action, not, indeed, violently, but gradually and in a peaceful way. The sanctifying influence of Christianity is to evermore powerfully extend itself, in ever-widening circles, the power of sin evermore retreating before it, until, finally at the close of its historical development, all humanity shall be glorified into a Kingdom of God. Even this finer form of Chiliasm" (as e.g. given by Whitby, Edwards, Brown, Glasgow, etc.), "like the coarse form advocated by the Anabaptists, is condemned by the Apoc. of John. According to this, wickedness does not decline in the course of history, but rather ascends to its most fearful antichristian height, while on the other hand, also, the Church is purified by means of her tribulation, in the last time. Not the preaching of the Gospel, the moral influence of Christianity, puts an end to antichristianity, but the judgment of the returning Lord, with which the glorious Kingdom of God on earth makes an entrance." (Compare Starke, Steffann and Ebrard, p. 440, Lange's Com. Rev.)

* Brooks' Et. Prop. Interp., Taylor's Voice of the Church, Cox's Millenarian's Answer, The Time of the End by a Congregationalist, Shimeall's Eschatology, and other works give the evidence respecting this Confession, and copious extracts from the Catechism and from the Prelates indorsing it, unmistakably proving that many who were Chiliasmic received it; and that, therefore, the withdrawal of the article was intentional "either" (so Brooks) "from the increase of Millenarian principles at this time; or at least from the conviction that they were not to be confounded with the extravagances of Cerinthus or of Munzer." Bickersteth (Prom. Glory, p. 93, note) refers to the opinion of the Reformers (Tyndale, Bradford, Latimer, Becon) and of Edward VI.'s Catechism, and then to the speedy withdrawal of this art., adding : "The idea of a carnal Mill. of worldly pleasures is justly denounced by all thoughtful Christians. The common idea of the Reformers, derived from Rome and continued for some time after the Reformation, was, that the Mill. was past, an opinion generally now abandoned. The 41st art. was wholly withdrawn from the authorized Articles of 1562. The prevailing opinion of the Reformers was, that the judgment to come was to be expected speedily, without any intervening Mill., and that our Saviour would soon return in His glory ; and hence the services have nothing that interferes with our looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearance of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ ; and have also many expressions of confidence in His return, and the Kingdom then to be inherited by the saints."

<sup>b</sup> Brooks, Ed. Proph. Interp., p. 72, quotes the letter from Baillie (Let. No. 117, presented also in Anderson's Letter to the Author of Millenarianism Indefensible," and quoted in various works), and gives among the "many more" known to have been Millenarian, Ash, Bridge, Burroughs, Caryll, Goodwin, Gouge, Langley, and Sterry, all members of the Assembly. To these as expressing Chiliaistic views to some extent, Shimeall (Eschatology, p. 89) adds : Selden, Ainsworth, Gataker, and Featly. No wonder that Baillie writes that this "error so famous in antiquity" is "so troublesome among us." Prof. Briggs in his bitterness against Chiliaism affirms, most unjustly, that the Westminster Conf. rejects Pre-Mill. as error and heresy (Dr. Macdill follows him closely in the same unhistorical charge) ; now Dr. Craven in his reply to the grave charge (N. Y. Evangelist, Jan. and Feb. 1879), makes the following points, which serve as a most ample refutation. (1) The majority of the committee (viz. : Goodwin, Bridge, Caryll, and Greenhill—who had been members of the Westminster Assembly), who framed the Savoy Confession, were express Pre-Millenarians. (2) Pre-Millenarians prominently took part in framing the Confession, and evidently—as a compromise—to preserve unity and harmony, so worded the same, giving general and Scriptural statements (without any intimation of order or manner) that all could accept of it. (3) As a diversity of opinion existed relating to the events preceding and connected with the Sec. Advent, the only basis of union was to avoid a discussion of the order and manner of fulfilment, which was done. (4) The use of the phrases "day of judgment," "Kingdom," etc., as well as the adoption of Scripture on controverted subjects without explanation, did not forbid Pre-Mills. or Post-Mills. to accept of the same. (5) That the admission of Prof. Briggs that Pre-Mills. (as Sterry, Burroughs, and Goodwin) were in the Westminster Assembly, and utterly unconscious of being denounced and condemned, is sufficient evidence in our favor. (6) That these and other Pre-Mills. labored with Post-Mills. in the same Church, and were never tried and disciplined for their doctrinal views, is conclusive proof how the same were regarded. (7) That Homes' intensely Pre-Mill. work "The Res. Revealed," was indorsed by a committee (Caryll and Sterry) of the Assembly, is decisive that no condemnatory idea was ever entertained. (8) That the testimony of Baillie (Letters, vol. 2, p. 414-15), and of Masson (Life of Milton, vol. 2, p. 146), both opponents, as to the extent of the belief, and the eminence of its believers, is irresistible to any unprejudiced mind. (9) That Twisse, "a thoroughgoing Pre-Millenarian, should have been selected for the position of Moderator," is evidence either of the esteem in which Chiliaists were held, or of the number of Chiliaistic adherents in the Assembly, or of both. (10) Caryll, as one of the committee to whom Homes' Chiliaistic work was given, not only pronounces the book "very useful for the saints and worthy of public view," but states that its doctrines have "gained ground in the hearts and judgments of very many, both grave and godly men, who have left us divers essays and discourses on the subject." We leave the cauid reader to say whether, in view of such facts, there is the slightest foundation for Prof. B.'s uncharitable deductions ; and whether the latter do not spring more from the heart than from the mind. The feeling and opinion ever later is illustrated e.g. in the Life of Ed. Irving (by Mrs. Oliphant, p. 335) ; it being stated that the authorities of the Church tacitly admitted, by non-interference, attendance, etc., that the doctrine of the Millennium was "open to a diversity of view." We shall have occasion to quote this Confession under another Prop., as in sympathy with some Chiliaistic views, viz. : the looking for the Advent enforced as a duty without an intervening Millennial age, and the nonconversion of the world.

<sup>c</sup> The student is referred to Crosby's His. of the Baptists, vol. 2, App. 85. We give a few extracts to illustrate. The Confession declares the unalterable faith of the signers, saying, "for which we are not only resolved to suffer persecution to the loss of our goods, but also life itself, rather than decline from the same ;" and this enforces the Chiliaism as a deliberate conviction. It then plainly announces : "We believe that there will be an order in the resurrection ; Christ is the first-fruits, and then next, or after, they that are Christ's at His Coming ; then, or afterward, cometh the end. Concerning the Kingdom and reign of our Lord Jesus Christ, as we do believe that He is now in heaven at His Father's right hand, so we do believe that, at the time appointed by the Father, He shall come again in power and great glory; and that at or after His coming the second time, He will not only raise the dead, and judge and restore the world, but will also take to Himself His Kingdom, and will, according to the Scriptures, reign on the throne of His father David, on Mount Zion, in Jerusalem, forever." "We believe that the Kingdom of our Lord will be an universal Kingdom, and that in this Kingdom the Lord Jesus Christ Himself will be alone, visible, supreme God and King of the whole earth. We believe that as this Kingdom will be universal, so it will be also an everlasting Kingdom, that shall have no end, nor cannot be shaken; in which Kingdom the saints and faithful in Christ Jesus shall receive the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls; where the Lord is they shall be also. We believe that the New Jerusalem that shall come down from God out of heaven, when the tabernacle of God shall be with them, and He will dwell among them, will be the Metropolitan City of the Kingdom, and will be the glorious place of residence of both Christ and His saints forever, and will be so situated as that the Kingly palace will be on Mount Zion, the holy hill of David, where His throne was." The Confession insists on a personal Advent, upon Christ's obtaining the government of the world, the saints reigning on the earth with Him, applying Dan. 7 : 27 ; Rev. 19 : 16 ; Ps. 22 : 28 ; Zech. 14 : 9. etc., to this period. The contrast in the present and future condition of saints is thus drawn : "For unto the saints shall be given the Kingdom, and the greatness of the Kingdom, under (mark that) the whole heaven' (Dan. 7 : 27). Though (alas !) now many men be scarce content that the saints should have so much as a being among them; but when Christ shall appear, then shall be their day, then shall be given unto them power over the nations, to rule them with a rod of iron (Rev. 2 : 26, 27). Then shall they receive a crown of life, which no man shall take from them, nor they by any means turned or overturned from it, for the oppressor shall be broken in pieces (Ps. 72 : 4), and their vain rejoicings turned into mourning and bitter lamentations, as it is written (Job 22 : 5-7)."

As to other Confessions, a number, indicative of the extent of belief, may thus be specified. The "Free Chris. Church of Italy," in Genl. Assembly at Milan, June, 1870, adopted the following Chiliastic doctrine : "Art. VIII. The Lord Jesus Christ will come from heaven and transform our body of humiliation into a glorious body. In that day the dead in Christ shall rise first, and the living who are found faithful shall be transformed, and thus together shall we be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, to be forever with the Lord; and, after His Kingdom, all the rest shall rise to be judged in judgment." The "Second Adventists," in their public expression of Faith (Taylor's Voice of the Church), declare their belief in the speedy Advent, the first and second resurrections separated by an interval of a 1000 years, the reign of Christ and the saints on the earth, etc. They are far more Chiliastic than the Millerites—the latter being chiefly distinguished for belief in an immediate coming and fixing the time for the same. "The Catholic Apostolic Church" (a succession of the Irvingites) presents in its Confession of Faith a strong Chiliastic belief, for which they are noted. Its leading doctrine is a belief in the speedy Coming of Jesus, and expresses it "as the only hope of deliverance to the sin-burdened and weary creation." (Comp. art. on, in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop. It has extended itself in England, Scotland, Ireland, Switzerland, France, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Austria, Germany, America, etc.) The "Seventh-Day Adventists," entertain several of the Chiliastic tenets. "The Brethren," or "Dunkards," as represented by Nead, in Nead's Theolog. Writings (see ch. 20, on "The Sec. Advent"), hold to the personal return and reign of Jesus, to a previous fearful lack of faith and persecution, to a restoration of the Jews, to a glorious Mill., to a first res. preceding, and to a second res. at the end of the 1000 years, to a great battle between Christ and His enemies, to the perpetuity of the race after the Advent, and to the removal of the curse and the Sabbatism. Thus many of the essential points of Primitive and Scriptural Chiliasm are incorporated. What number or particular body are thus presented the writer does not know. A few copies of The Brethren at Work, a Brethren or Dunkard periodical published at Lanark, Ill., fell into my hands, and they contained the advocacy of the Mill. and the personal reign of Christ (as e.g. March 21st, 1878), by James Wirt. "The Church of God" (see art. by Winebrunner, in Rupp's Orig. His. of Relig. Denom.) gives as an art. of Faith: "She believes in the personal coming and reign of Jesus Christ, Matt. 24 : 42-44 ; Acts 1 : 11 ; Phil. 3 : 20, 21 ; 1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17 ; 1 John 3 : 2 ; Rev. 1 : 17." "She believes in the resurrection 'both of the just and the unjust; that the res. of the just will precede the res. of the unjust.'" (In 1867, the Church numbered 11 elderships, 400 churches, 350 ministers, and over 25,000 members.) In conversing with ministers and members of this Church, they exhibited an intelligent Chiliastic belief, in marked contrast with many others. The "Plymouth Brethren," or Darbyites, entertain a prominent Chiliastic belief, being one of their chief characteristics, as any reference to their expressed faith will abundantly show. The "Harmony Society," or the Rappists (followers of Rapp, settled at Economy, Pa.), hold Pre-Mill. views. The nearness of the Millennium, introduced by the Sec. Advent, is a cardinal doctrine with them. The "Mennonites" (art. in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop. says) "in the 16th cent., held, in common with the Anabaptists, the belief in Christ's personal reign during the Millennium." Buck's Theol. Dic., art. "Mennonites," remarks, that Menno discarded the extravagant views of certain Anabaptists, but retained the doctrine of "the Millennium, or 1000 years' reign of Christ upon earth." How largely this doctrine continued among them, the writer is unable to say, for they now number altogether, it is supposed, about 200,000, divided into several branches. The "Apostoolians" (Ency. Relig. Knowl.), one of the branches, is decidedly Millennialian. The "Christadelphians" have largely incorporated Chiliaism, and make it essential to their system. It is most prominently presented in their published "Principles," and other works. Various offshoots of the "Pietistic movement" were largely affected by Chiliaism, as for e.g. the "Society of Korn" (art. on, M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.), which was under "the Millenarian influence of Jung Stilling and Michael Hahn." (The followers of Hahn in 1817 "numbered 18,000.") The "Moravians" favored Chiliastic views, however perverted by ideal and mystical conceptions. Writers professing to give the faith of the "Unitas Fratrum," present the Millenarian view, as e.g. Bish. Spangenberg in his last ch. of Exposition of Ch. Doctrine. Various parties, imbibing Spener's pietism and Oetinger's theosophy, incorporated Chiliaism, as e.g. the "Michaleans" (and in contrast with them the "Pregizerians"), of whom Kurtz (Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 291) says: "They had a common ground in their Chiliaism, and in the doctrine of restoration." Chiliastic views are dominant in small parties, as in the "One-faith people," in the adherents of Barbour, of Rochester, N. Y., and in the followers of Russell, of Pittsburg, Pa., as well as in others whose location has escaped the writer's recollection. The same is true of some German Millenarians near Tiflis, the capital of Georgia (Henderson's Bib. Researches in Russia, pp. 524-529, and Pinkerton's Russia, pp. 143-151). The first attempt to form a Universalist sect embraced distinctive features of Chiliaism allied with Universalism, as seen in the "Rellyanites or Rellyan Universalists" (Art. on, M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.), whose theory of Restitution is in the main allied with Chiliastic views, revived by Barbour, Russell, etc., in the Three Worlds and their respective newspapers. As this fact is not generally known, we quote the following from James Rely's (at one time connected with Whitefield) and his followers' belief: "In general they appear to believe that there will be a resurrection to life and a res. to condemnation; that believers only will be among the former, who, as firstfruits, and kings and priests, will have part in the first resurrection, and shall reign with Christ in His Kingdom of the Millennium; that unbelievers who are after raised must wait the manifestation of the Saviour of the world under that condemnation of conscience which a mind in darkness and wrath must necessarily feel; that believers, called kings and priests, will be made the medium of communicating to their condemned brethren, who, like Joseph to his brethren, though he spoke roughly to them, in reality overflowed with affection and tenderness; that ultimately every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength, and thus every enemy shall be subdued to the Kingdom and glory of the great Mediator." (Those who have recently revived this Restitution scheme, change some features, as e.g. the obstinate and recalcitrant are given over to "the second death," etc.) Even the Mormons, together with much that the Church receives in general, incorporate Chiliastic features. Jos. Smith in his His. of the Latter Day Saints (Rupp's Orig. His. of Relig. Denoms.) says: "We believe in the literal gathering of Israel, and in the restoration of the Ten Tribes;" "That Christ will reign personally upon the earth, and that the earth will be renewed and receive its paradisaical glory." But (Art. "Mormons," M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.) teach a gross future, illustrated by the future marriage, etc. (The influence that the association of Chiliaism with singular or fanatical views has upon many—who overlook the fact that the most precious and fundamental Christian doctrines are similarly treated—will be treated under Prop. 179)

· Obs. 6. The Chiliastic doctrine is not confined to any one branch of the Protestant Church. Its advocates are to be found in all denominations, more or less, and embrace men eminent for piety, abundant labors, and ability. The lists that are given in various works include Reformers, Martyrs, English Church Divines, Lutherans, Reformed, Westminster Assembly Divines, English Dissenters, New England Divines, Baptists, Presbyterians, American Episcopal Divines, Congregationalists, Missionaries, etc., forming a noble band of adherents to the early faith.

The student is referred to the lists given in Brooks's El. Proph. Interp., Taylor's Voice of the Church, The Time of the End by a Congregationalist, Seiss's Last Times, Shimeall's Eschatology, Elliott's Horæ Apoc., McCaul's The Old Paths, Wood's Believer's Guide, The Investigator, 4th vol., Manford's Apology for Millenarianism, Drummond's Dialogues on Prophecy, and Defence of the Students of Prophecy, Bryant's Millenarian Views, West's His. Pre-Mill. Doc., etc. Macaulay (Essays on the Jews, 1831) referred to this feature: "Many Christians believe that the Messiah will shortly establish a Kingdom on the earth and reign visibly over all its inhabitants. Whether this doctrine be orthodox or not, we shall not inquire. The number of people who hold it is very much greater than the number of Jews residing in England. Many of those who hold it are distinguished by rank, wealth, and ability; it is preached from pulpits both of the Scottish and of the English Church. Noblemen and members of Parliament have written in defence of it, who expect "that before this generation shall pass away, all the kingdoms of the earth will be swallowed up in one Divine Empire." While many of the names that we give are verified by a personal perusal of their works or extracts from them, many are presented on the authority of others, and we may thus inadvertently place some of those who are more thoroughly Millenarian with those who are less so, and the reverse. A complete list of writers, classified as to their exact views, is still a desideratum, and until this is done, injustice may unintentionally be done to authors.

Obs. 7. After the Reformation, however, the Reformers and others indorsed certain distinctive features belonging, as parts of the system, to Millenarian doctrine, we are chiefly indebted to a few leading minds for bringing forth a return to the old Patristic faith in all its essential forms. Prominently among these are the following: the profound Biblical scholar Joseph Mede (born 1586, died 1638), in his still celebrated Clavis Apocalyptica (translated into English) and Exposition on Peter; Th. Brightman (1644), Expositions of Daniel and Apoc.; J. A. Bengel (a learned divine, born 1687, died 1752), Exposition of the Apocalypse and Addresses on the same; also the writings of Th. Goodwin (1679); Ch. Daubuz (1730); Piscator (1646); M. F. Roos (1770); Alstedius (1643 and earlier); Cressener (1689); Farmer (1660); Fleming (1708); Hartley (1764); J. J. Hess (1774); Homes (1654); Jurieu (1686); Maton (1642); Peterson (1692); Sherwin (1665); and others (such as Conrade, Gallus, Brahe, Kett, Broughton, Marten, Sir I. Newton, Whiston, etc.), materially aided in directing attention to the Millenarian doctrine and to influence persons to Biblical study on the subject. When these were followed by men eminent for learning and marked ability (some have been mentioned, others will follow); when the leading poets and commentaries gave an additional impulse to Millenarian doctrine by their forcible portrayals and exegetical comments; when persons of the highest and lowest position, in all ranks and professions, of undoubted piety and usefulness, thus united in expressing Chilianistic views, the doctrine of the early church received correspondingly a revival and renewed strength in the hearts and hopes of believers.

The student is aware that when the revival of Pietism (a movement against a cold Philosophical and Symbolistic tendency) took place under Spener, Francke, and others, there was also a return to the Chilianistic faith. Admitting that in some cases it might have been allied with fanaticism, as Mosheim (vol. 3, p. 381) intimates, yet Mosheim (himself Anti-Millenarian) is uncanid when he says that they "also recalled upon the stage opinions long since condemned; asserted that the reign of a thousand years, mentioned by John, was at hand." The unfairness consists in this: (1) He seems to sanction the condemnation of the doctrine by the Romish Church; (2) he links this doctrine with extravagances, as if inseparable; (3) he forgets, having highly praised Spener, that Spener himself defended the Millenarian view as Scriptural, and not opposed by the Augsburg Confession ; (4) that works, specially written to set forth what were the real views of the Pietists (as e.g. Klettwich's), were suppressed, and that their doctrine, in the bitter controversies that ensued, was caricatured, etc. ; (5) Mosheim permits his spirit of hatred to the doctrine (as e.g. in the case of Peterson, etc.) to appear on several occasions, and hence is to be received with caution ; (6) the best devotional hymns and books, as well as practical works on religion, have sprung from that movement. It would be well, if the detractors of the Pietists possessed their piety, sincerity, usefulness, and ability.

Dr. Fisher in Art. " Mill." (M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.) remarks : " The Mill. doctrine, in its essential characteristics, has had adherents among some of the most sober-minded theologians of the Lutheran Church in later times. Of these, one of the most distinguished is John Albert Bengel, the author of The Gnomon, who defended his opinion in his Com. on the Apoc., published in 1740. He has been followed by other divines of repute ; and the doctrine has not been without prominent supporters among the Lutherans down to the present time. One of the latest of their number who has discussed this question is the Rev. A. Koch (Das Tausendjährige Reich, Basle, 1872). This writer endeavors in particular to refute the arguments adduced against the doctrine of a Millennium by the German commentators Hengstenberg, Keil, and Kleifoth." (Comp. Lange's estimate of Hengstenberg, etc., in his Introd. to Rev.) The Dr. also says : " In all the other various orthodox Protestant bodies, there are many who believe in the personal Advent of Christ for the purpose of establishing a Millennial Kingdom."

Obs. 8. There is a class of able men whose sentiments were favorable to Millenarians—who either express these in their writings, or speak approvingly of Chiliaistic works—and yet by many, at the present day, are supposed to be the contrary. In illustration of this, a number may appropriately be mentioned. John Wesley has often been claimed as Chiliaistic (and is so given by Taylor, Shimeall, and others), because of his chiefly adopting Bengel's views in Revelation, and of the views presented in some of his sermons. This has been denied, and utterances seemingly contradictory presented in proof. But this has finally been settled by a Methodist historian, Tyerman, in his Life of John Wesley, vol. 2, p. 523, etc. After giving very candidly Hartley's Mill. views from " Paradise Restored" (affirming the Pre-Mill. Advent, and the Mill. reign of Jesus, etc., which Wesley indorsed, see Works, vol. 6, p. 743), Tyerman then gives the fact that John Wesley read and approved of the same, writing (Meth. Mag., 1783, p. 498) to the author : " Your book on the Millennium was lately put into my hands. I cannot but thank you for your strong and seasonable confirmation of that comfortable doctrine, of which I cannot entertain the least doubt, as long as I believe the Bible." Tyerman most frankly and honestly (worthy of special notice) adds : " With such a statement, in reference to such a book, there can be no doubt that Wesley, like his father before him, was a Millenarian, a believer in the Sec. Advent of Christ to reign on earth, visibly and gloriously, for a thousand years. This is a matter which none of Wesley's biographers have noticed ; and yet the above is not the only evidence in support of it." He then refers us to a letter to Dr. Middleton (published 1749), in which Wesley indorses Justin Martyr's Mill. views, saying : " To say that they" (i.e. the Fathers of the second and third cents.) " believed this, was neither more nor less than to say they believed the Bible." Reference is also made to an article, " The Renovation of All Things," in Wesley's Arminian Mag., 1784, p. 154, etc. The adoption of the Millenarian Bengel's notes for the Apoc., in his Com. on the New Test., his expressed views on the Judgment Day (which we quote, Prop. 133), the deliverance of creation (which we quote, Prop. 146), and related subjects, is ample testimony.<sup>1</sup>

Some few have denied that Dr. Chalmers was Pre-Millenarian, against the express sentiments quoted by us of a Pre-Mill. Sec. Advent, a non-conversion of the world preceding that Advent (see Prop. 175), the renovation of the earth (Prop. 146). However he may have been influenced by some of the vagaries of Irvingism not to give great prominence to his views on the subject, yet, in behalf of the truth, his utterances are decided, as can be seen e.g. by comparing his Sabbath Readings, vol. 1, pp. 311 and 108 (comp. Proph. Times, vol. 4, p. 110, etc., for detailed statement). So also some have tried to claim Spener as Post-Millenarian, against the testimony of history and his own writings. It is well known to students that Spener defended Chiliasm, and showed that the Augsburg Confession was not opposed to a Scriptural doctrine. The enemies of Spener made his Chiliasm one of their points of attack, and Pietism (comp. Kurtz's Ch. His., Neander, Mosheim, etc.) was always, more or less, allied with Millenarianism. Some, attracted by his name, attempt to make out a very mild form of Chiliasm, but Dr. Kling, Art. Eschatology in Herzog's Encyclop., pronounces Spener a most decided Chiliasm, inclined even to the fanatical. (?) Prof. Stuart, and many others of our opponents, concede him to us. Dr. Brown of Gettysburg, in an Art. published in the Luth. Observer, even attempted to take John Bunyan from us, but the Confession of Faith (with which compare him on the "First Chapters of Genesis") quoted under Obs. 4, is a complete and overwhelming answer. As to Bish. Butler, it is sufficient to refer to his Analogy, Part 2, ch. 7, and to his Memoirs, p. 298 (quoted by Taylor, and others), where occur sentiments only in accordance with pure Chiliasm. In reference to Rev. Hall, the celebrated Baptist, it is evident that in his early life he was opposed to Chiliasm, as is seen in the production "Chris. Consistent with Love of Freedom," where occurs the phrase "the long-exploded tradition of Papias respecting the personal reign," but in the closing years of his life he materially modified his views, coming nearer to Bunyan's Confession. For (Duffield On Proph., p. 259) Mr. Thorp, of Bristol, England, conversed with him on the subject a few days before his decease, and he "regretted that he had not preached the Millenarian views he entertained." (May not others be found in this category; for the writer personally knows men who privately entertain Chiliasm, but never present it publicly).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Tyerman unhesitatingly classes among Millenarians, Charles Wesley (as various hymns evidence), Fletcher (as a letter to John Wesley positively asserts, written A.D. 1755. Fletcher's Works, vol. 16), Piers, and others. John and Charles Wesley's testimony is the more disinterested and valuable, since on the one hand they had to resist the indifference of others, and on the other, the fanaticism of Bell and others, who (so Tyerman) predicted the speedy end of the world. Rev. Dr. Naat (himself a leading Methodist) says (Art. "Christ's Mill. reign," in the West. Ch. Advocate, July 23d, 1879), after referring to the able Pre-Mill. advocates in the various denominations: "I admit that the Methodist Church is not so largely represented, and that at present Pre-Mill. views are unpopular among us, but it was not always so. Both John and Charles Wesley, Dr. Coke, as well as Fletcher and Whitefield, occupied Pre-Mill. ground, and also, as I am credibly informed, in our day, the late revered Secretary of our Miss. Soc., Dr. J. P. Durbin." Now in contrast we present the following: Prof. Worman, in his extended Art. "Methodism" (McClintock and Strong's Cyclop.), says: "The Sermons of Jno. Wesley, and his Notes on the New Test., are recognized by his followers in Great Britain and America as the standard of Methodism, and as the basis of their theological creed." If so, then there has been a wide departure on Eschatology. To indicate the same by way of illustration, we copy this notice, without comment, from the Luth. Observer, March 1st, 1878: "The Rev. Arthur P. Adams, Beverly, Mass., so Zion's Herald states, has been suspended from the Methodist ministry for holding and teaching doctrines at variance with those of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He held that Christ's Sec. Coming is near at hand, and that not until after the resurrection occurs can the redemption scheme of Christ be complete" (i.e. in results). It is proper to add, as Tyerman remarks, that Wesley was guarded, so as not to give place to extravagances; as e.g. on fixing the date of the Advent, Wesley (Meth. Mag., 1827, p. 392) says: "I have no opinion at all upon when the Mill. reign of Christ will begin; I can determine nothing at all about it; these calculations are far above, out of my sight." Tyerman then repeats: "Still, Wesley was a believer in the certainty of such a reign, and so was Fletcher, as we have already seen, and so was Wesley's friend, the Vicar of Bexley, Mr. Piers, and so seem to have been the writers of some of the hymns in the Meth. Hymn Book" (quoting several hymns with Pre-Mill. sentiments). Charles Wesley's Pre-Mill. hymns are quoted in detail in Proph. Times, 1866, p. 111, etc., Taylor's Voice of the Church, Time of the End, etc., and they are so decided in sentiment that it is a matter of surprise that any one should fail to appreciate them.

* Others, who entertained distinctive Chiliastic features and located the predicted Kingdom of Dan. 2 and 7 after the Second Advent, might be mentioned, as Archb. Cranmer (see the Catechism authorized by Edward VI., and written by him, on the phrase "Thy Kingdom come"), Archb. Newcome (see Bickersteth's Diss. on Proph., p. 106), Dr. Benson (see Notes on Ps. 76 : 10-13, and 98 : 4-9), Rudd (see Time of the End, p. 325), Toplady (see Sermons, Lib. 3, p. 470), etc. (Comp. Taylor's Voice of the Church and Seiss's Ap. to the Last Times, from whom a large number might be added.)

Obs. 9. It would be interesting to trace the rise of Millenarianism in this country. That it was early incorporated into the belief of many of the first preachers of this country is evident from the testimony of Cotton Mather, who himself heartily indorsed it. Thus e.g. in the Magnalia he testifies of Rev. John Davenport (died in Boston 1668), that he apprehended "the true notion of the Chiliad," and "preached and wrote" about the "coming of the Lord, the calling of the Jews, and the first and second resurrection of the dead, which do now of late years get more-ground against the opposition of the otherwise minded, and find a kinder entertainment among them that 'search the Scriptures;' and that" he asserted "a personal, visible, powerful, and glorious coming of the Lord Jesus Christ unto judgment, long before the end of the world." He calls Rev. Thomas Walley (died 1679), "our pious Chilust, Walley," who was like Mede, Davenport, Hook, and who understood "the First Resurrection to be corporeal," just as "some of the first and eminent teachers in the church believed." Reference is made to Rev. John Eliot (died 1690), as constantly pressing "the Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ;" the same intimations are given respecting Whiting, Samuel Mather, Increase Mather (Pres. Harvard College), himself, and others.

We append additional testimony. In the Preface to The Magnalia, Mather says: "The first and famous pastors in the New England churches did, in their public ministry, frequently insist on the doctrine of Christ's glorious Kingdom on earth which will take place after the conversion of the Jews, and when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in. It is a pity that this doctrine is no more inculcated by the present ministry, which has induced me the rather to preach and now by the press to publish, what is emitted herewith." And now that this must be understood in a purely Chiliastic sense, is evident from both what Cotton Mather and his father, Increase Mather, have taught on the subject. Thus e.g. Increase Mather, in his Discourse on Faith (A.D. 1710), and The Mystery of Israel's Salvation, teaches: "He (Christ) will then (at Coming) remove His throne from heaven to this visible world. Then will His visible Kingdom appear in the greatest glory; when also there will be a personal reign and residence of Christ in this lower world." "When they that corrupt the earth are destroyed, a new earth will succeed, in which shall dwell righteousness. Then will the kingdoms of this world become the Kingdoms of Christ, and He shall reign forever and ever," etc. But Cotton Mather is more plain: "It is well known, that in the earliest of the primitive times the faithful did, in a literal sense, believe the 'second coming' of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the rising and the reigning of the saints with Him, a thousand years before, the rest of the dead live again,' a doctrine which, however, some of later years have counted heretical; yet in the days of Irenæus, were questioned by none but such as were counted heretics. It is evident from Justin Martyr that the doctrine of the Chiliad was in his days embraced among all orthodox Christians; nor did this Kingdom of our Lord begin to be doubted until the Kingdom of Antichrist began to advance into a considerable figure, and then it fell chiefly under the reproaches of such men as were fain to deny the divine authority of the Book of Revelation, and of the Second Epistle of Peter. He is a stranger to antiquity who does not find and own the ancients generally of the persuasion. Nevertheless, at last men came, not only to lay aside the modesty expressed by one of the first Anti-Millenarians, namely, Jerome, but also with violence to persecute the Millenary truth as a heretical pravity. So the mystery of our Lord's 'appearing in His Kingdom' lay buried in Popish darkness, till the light thereof had a fresh dawn. Since the Antichrist entered into the last half-time of the period allotted for him, and now within the last sevens of years, as things grow nearer to accomplishment, learned and pious men, in great numbers, everywhere come to receive, explain, and maintain, the old faith about it." In the Student and Preacher, Mather is equally decisive: "The Son of God, about to descend, will inflict vengeance on them who know not God and obey not His Gospel; but He will manifest His Kingdom of the saints in the earth, which is to be possessed by our second and heavenly Adam; and this, we confess, is ascertained to us by promise, but in another state, as being after the resurrection." "They indulge themselves in a vain dream, not to say insane, who think, pray, and hope, contrary to the whole sacred Scripture and sound reason, that the promised happiness of the Church on earth will be before the Lord Jesus shall appear in His Kingdom." "Without doubt the kingdom of this world will not become the Kingdom of God and His Christ, before the preordained time of the dead, in which the reward shall be given to the servants of God and to those that fear His name." "The rest of the saints, and the promised Sabbath, and the Kingdom of God, in which His will shall be done on earth as it is in heaven, and those great things of which God hath spoken by the mouths of His prophets, all prophesying as with one voice; all shall be confirmed by their fulfilment in the new earth, not in our defiled and accursed earth." Rev. Joshua Spaulding (Lectures, pp. 221-2, etc.) speaks of "many Christians, who were looking, not for the modern Millennium, but for the Sec. Coming of Christ," etc., and adds: "I have had the testimony of elderly Christian people, in several parts of New England, that within their remembrance this doctrine was first advanced in the places where they lived, and have heard them name the ministers who first preached it in their churches. No doctrine can be more indisputably proved to have been the doctrine of the Primitive Church than those we call Millenarian; and, beyond all dispute, the same were favorite doctrines with the fathers of New England; with the words of one of whom, writing upon this subject, we shall conclude our observations upon their antiquity: 'They are not new, but old; they may be new to some men, but I cannot say it is to their honor.'" In another place (p. 191) he says: "The doctrine of the Millennium is truth; and the prevailing expectation, that it is fast approaching, and is now very near, is doubtless rational," etc. The same is true doctrinally of Thomas Prince (A. D. 1728 to 1758), pastor at Boston (so Spaulding's Lectures), of Dr. B. Gale (see Barber's His. Collections of Connecticut, p. 531, who also says: "This (Millenarianism) appears to have been the belief of pious persons at the time of the first settlement of New England," etc.).

The same early Chiliasm is traceable in other denominations. Thus e.g. in the early Lutheran and Reformed Churches quite a number of ministers entertained it. The writer was informed by his grandparents and parents that they conversed with such and heard them occasionally present Millenarianism. The brief biographical sketches remaining give us no idea of the form in which they held it, but a clue is obtained by the fact that the works of Bengel, Stilling, and others like them, were favorites and largely circulated. Books of German and English Chiliasts were held in esteem, and the writer has often been surprised to find among old people a detailed and correct knowledge of the doctrine, and on inquiry the reception of the same was generally attributed to the instruction of some old pastor or the reading of such works. In conversation with others, they recalled similar reminiscences.

Obs. 10. The progress of Chiliastic doctrine in this country, while immensely in the minority, has been highly respectable, as admitted even by our opponents. It embraces many of the ablest, most devoted and scholarly men that the church has produced.

The Luth. Observer (always, more or less, an opponent), in a notice (Oct. 25th, 1878) of a Pre-Mill. pamphlet, "Jesus is Coming," by W. E. B., says that our doctrine "has had eminent supporters in the Church. Such men as Sir I. Newton, Dr. Chalmers, Dean Alford, and Dr. Breckenridge have been among its advocates. And among the signatures to a call for a series of public meetings to be held in New York, in the month of October, are the names of learned and pious men representing all the denominations of Protestantism." Prof. Briggs, and a few others, evidently angry at the increase of Chiliasm in the Presbyterian Church, suggested discipline on the charge of "heresy," to which Rev. Dr. Mutchmore (quoted Messiah's Herald, Jan. 15th, 1879), of the same Church, replies: "It is best to allow our pastors to use their own judgment in preaching on the matter. What are we to do? Some of our most eminent men are Pre-Millenarians, and we have no article which is against the idea of Christ's personal reign on earth. It is all a question of interpretation, on which our highest bodies have never made any deliverance, and, in my opinion, they never should." Rev. Dr. Mackay, in his address at the Milday Conference (1879), speaking in reference to Chiliasm advocates as observed in his recent visit to the U. S. and Canada, said: "I thank God that in every city that I visited, in New York, Chicago, and elsewhere, the most spiritual men are rousing up to inquire and look into these things." Many such declarations might be given, but the reader can soon satisfy himself by glancing over the names following. We append a list—imperfect at best—of American and Canadian Chliasts, according to their Church relationship as far as known.

Prot. Episcopal Church: Dr. S. H. Tyng, sen., Dr. Tyng, jr., Dr. R. Newton, H. Dana Ward, Rev. J. S. Alwell, Rev. E. T. Perkins, Rev. Th. W. Haskins, Rev. Rob. C. Booth, Rev. L. W. Bancroft, Felix B. Brunot, Dr. Julius E. Grammer, Bh. T. H. Vail, Rev. T. W. Hastings, Bh. W. W. Niles, Canon Baldwin, Canon W. Bond, Bh. Southgate, Dr. F. Vinton, Rev. Morell, Bh. McLvaine, Bh. Henshaw, Rev. E. Winthrop, Rev. Morgan, Rev. Johnson, Rev. Farrer, Rev. Dobbs, Rev. Smith, Rev. Trenwith, Rev. Newton (Gambier), Bh. Bedell, Bh. Hopkins, Bh. Williams, Bh. Huntingdon, Bh. Odenheimer, D. N. Lord.

Reformed Episcopal: Bh. W. R. Nicholson, Rev. G. A. Reddles, Rev. W. V. Feltwell, Rev. B. B. Leacock, Rev. M. B. Smith.

Presbyterian: Dr. C. K. Imbrie, Dr. S. H. Kellogg, Dr. E. R. Craven, Dr. J. H. Brookes, Rev. W. J. Gillespie, Rev. H. M. Parsons, Dr. N. West, Rev. W. J. Erdman, William Reynolds, John Wannamaker, Rev. F. W. Flint, Rev. E. P. Adams, Rev. J. S. Stewart, Rev. D. E. Bierce, Rev. C. C. Foote, Rev. L. C. Baker, Rev. W. B. Lee, Rev. E. B. Davis, Dr. S. B. Wilson, B. Dubois Wyckoff, Rev. B. F. Sample, Rev. H. M. Bacon, Rev. D. Mack, Rev. E. P. Marvin, Dr. R. Patterson, Rev. R. C. Mathews, Rev. A. Erdman, Rev. J. R. Berry, Prof. J. T. Duffield, Saml. Ashhurst, Rev. Prof. R. D. Morris, Rev. D. B. Eddy, Rev. Wm. P. Paxon, Dr. Willis Lord, Dr. J. G. Reaser, Dr. Marshall, Dr. Felix Johnson, Dr. Kalb, Dr. F. E. Brown, Dr. Stanton, Dr. McCartee, Dr. Geo. Duffield, Dr. E. J. Breckenridge, Dr. Krebs, Dr. J. Lillie, Rev. B. C. Shimeall, Dr. Poor, Dr. Van Doren, Rev. Blauvelt, Rev. Dinwiddie, Rev. Laird, Matthews, Marquis, Congdon, Rev. Adair, Rev. Prof. McGill, Rev. J. C. Randolph, Rev. W. Hogarth.

United Presbyterian: Dr. J. T. Cooper, Dr. W. Y. Moorehead, Rev. J. P. Sankey, Rev. W. J. Gillespie, Rev. R. W. French, Rev. S. B. Reed, Rev. R. A. McAycal, Rev. D. A. Wallace, Rev. J. G. Galloway, Rev. J. S. McCulloch, Rev. W. W. Barr, Rev. G. Hayser.

Baptists: Dr. A. J. Gordon, Rev. J. D. Herr, Rev. J. Hyatt Smith, Dr. J. W. Bancroft, Rev. H. M. Saunders, Rev. J. P. Farrer, Rev. Alf. Harris, Rev. Jos. Evans, Rev. J. M. Stiffler, Rev. G. M. Peters, Rev. F. E. Tower, Dr. J. E. Jones, Rev. J. T. Beckley, Rev. J. J. Miller, Ed. S. White, B. F. Jacobs, Rev. C. Perrin, Rev. F. L. Chappell, Rev. Rob. Cameron, Rev. H. F. Titus, Rev. H. A. Cordo, Rev. G. M. Stone, Dr. S. H. Ford, Rev. A. J. Frost, Rev. J. C. Wilmarth, Prof. Dr. Weston, Rev. Barralle, Rev. Brown, Rev. Colgrove, Rev. Wm. Knapp, Rev. H. Knapp, Rev. J. C. Waller, Rev. Taylor.

Congregationalist: Dr. E. P. Goodwin, Rev. W. W. Clarke, Dr. H. D. Kithell, Dr. J. Wild, Rev. W. R. Joyalin, Rev. G. C. Miln, Rev. E. C. Hood, Rev. W. W. Syle, Rev. Myron Adams, Rev. G. R. Milton, Abner Kingman, Rev. Burton, Rev. Francis Russell, C. M. Whittlesey, Rev. Lorimer, Rev. Morton, Rev. Bancroft, Rev. Andrews, Rev. Cunningham.

Reformed Church: Dr. Rufus W. Clarke, Rev. C. Parker, Rev. J. B. Thompson, Rev. W. H. Clarke, Dr. W. R. Gordon, Dr. J. T. Demarest, Dr. G. S. Bishop, Rev. R. F. Clarke, Rev. Merritt, Rev. Ballagh, Rev. Brown, Rev. Dr. Forsyth, Dr. S. H. Giesy.

Methodists: Prof. H. Lummia, Rev. Jno. Parker, Dr. H. Foster, Rev. Jesse M. Gilbert, Geo. Hall, T. W. Harney, Rev. W. E. Blackstone, W. E. Grim, Dr. Geo. W. Brown, Geo. A. Hall, Dr. Marshall, Excell, Dr. J. P. Durbin, Rev. Dr. Nast.

Lutheran: Dr. J. A. Seisa, Rev. Laird, Rev. Dr. Oswald, Rev. A. B. Brown, Dr. J. G. Schmucker (and Drs. Helmuth, Lachman, and D. Kurtz, who recommended his Chiliasm work).

Moravian: Rev. E. Reineke, J. G. Zipple.

Chiliasm writers belonging to various bodies, such as Second Adventists, or branches: Hastings, Taylor, Andrews, Crozier, Bliss, Himes, Litch, Hale, Thomas, Wilson, Campbell, Reed, Coghill, Lyon, Chown, Cook, Woodruff, Catlin, Allen, Ramsey, Fancher, Parry, Chase, Coombe, Niles, Jacobs; Seymour, Champlin, Lumbard, Carpenter, Batchelor, Wellcome, Grant, Smith, Burnham, Libby, Brewer, Pratt, Shepherd, Flagg, Sutherland, White, Couch, Higgins, Burbank, Piper, Simpson, Cole, Hancock, Ballows, Austin, York, Teeple, Morgan, Preble, Chittenden, Cotton, Moore, Pearson, Miller, C. Palmer, E. K. Barnhill, S. A. Chaplin, etc.

Among other organizations are writers of the "Catholic Apostolic Church," "Plymouth Brethren," "Christadelphians" (Dr. J. Thomas and followers), and others.

Miscellaneous. Names that have fallen under observation as Chiliasmists, but whose exact Church relationship is unknown to the writer, such as Storrs, Beegle, Wendell, Ramey, Woodworth, Bh. Ives, Dr. Broadhead, Dr. McCarty, Lindsey, Forsyth, Rev. Geo. C. Lorimer, R. C. Matlack, Geo. B. Cramer, Rev. L. Osler, J. M. Orrick, L. B. Rogers, Geo. W. Tew, Rev. C. M. Morton, Rich. Aorton, Rev. Almond Baralle, Prof. T. W. Bancroft (Brown Univ.), Wm. Reynolds, Rev. C. Cunningham, S. J. Andrews, Rev. F. W. Dobbs, Dr. A. W. Pilzer, J. M. Haldeman, D. C. H. Marquis, Rev. Dr. Watson, Rev. Dr. Miller, Dr. J. R. Davenport, Dr. W. Lloyd, Rev. A. J. Patton, Rev. J. P. Newman, Dr. R. Jeffrey, M. Baldwin, Rev. Dr. Simpson (Louisville), Rev. Dr. Shaw (Rochester), Rev. Graves, Rev. Brookman, Dr. Williamson, Dr. Robinson, Geo. Reynolds (the last four in Canada), Rev. R. Campbell, Rev. W. Cadman, Thomas (of Canada), Rev. J. M. Weaver, Walter, John H. Graff, Rev. B. Philpot, Rev. S. Bonhomme, J. Harper, Anna Siliman, Dr. J. W. Hatherell, Darby, Thomas, Harkness, Bryant, Davis, Holgate, James Inglis, Dr. J. J. Janeway, Rob. Kirkwood, Rev. W. Newton, J. P. Labagh, Seth Lewis, Granville Penn, Dr. Wm. Ramsey, Hollis Read, Hugh White, Rev. John G. Wilson (Ed. Prop. Times), Jno. F. Graff ("Greybeard"), Woodbury Davis, D. M. Lord, Dr. Ramsey, Dr. Halsey, Dr. Harkness, A. D. Jones, B. S. Dwiggens, C. T. Russell, N. H. Barbour, J. M. Stevenson, J. P. Wheethes, Wiley Jones, J. H. Patton, W. J. Mann, B. Wilson, J. A. Simonds, B. W. Keith, G. M. Myers, A. B. Magruder, H. V. Reed, L. A. Allen, W. Laing, E. Hoyt, J. Pierce, T. Wilson.

Obs. 11. The advocates of Chiliasm in England, Germany, France, and other European countries form a band that contains names highly honored by the church, both as to attainments and usefulness in the service of Jesus.

We present the following without reference to their Church relationship.

England, Scotland, and Ireland: Dr. A. R. Fausset, Dr. W. P. Mackay, Bh. Newton, Sir I. Newton, Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Candlish, Horne, Bh. Trench, Bh. Ellicott, Twisse, Marshall, Elliott, Maitland, Birks, the Drs. Bonars, Bickersteth, Auriol, Fremantle, Byle, Palmer, Ash, Noel, Canon Hoare, Rainsford, Wood, E. Garbett, Bridge, Burroughs, Kelly, Cox, Caryll, Goodwin, Gouge, Wilson, Brock, Smith, Trotter, Langley, Sterry, Selden, Ainsworth, Gataker, Fealty, Greenhill, Stevenson, Shepherd, Dean Alford, Brooks, Pym, Dalton, Greswell, Burgh, Todd, Irving, Hewitson, Dr. M'Cauley, Anderson, Begg, McCheyne, Burns, Gilfillan, Hamilton, Cumming, Adolph Saphir, Frazer, Jamieson, Cochrane, Cunningham, Sabine, Hugh Miller, the Duke of Manchester, Lord, Jones, Habershon, Alexander, Tycho Brahe, Lord Napier, Leut.-Gen. Goodwyn, Haldane, Stewart, Rob. Montgomery, Preb. Auriol, Rev. M. Rainsford, Dean Fremantle, the Earl of Shaftesbury, Bell, Pruden, Baxter, Lord Radstock, Earl Russell, Rev. C. Skrine, Rev. E. Nangle, Rev. R. Chester, Capt. J. E. Dutton, Th. W. Greenwell, Rev. S. V. Edwards, J. Denham Smith, Capt. Moreton, Dr. C. B. Egan, Bh. Wordsworth, Rev. Gordon Calthrop, Rev. J. Gosset-Tanner, Rev. C. H. Hamilton, Rev. Grattan Guinness, Rev. S. Gravatt, Mr. Soltan, F. G. Bellett, Mr. Hyslop, Mr. Jenour, Dr. A. Saphir, Rev. E. Wilkes, Rev. C. H. Hamilton, Lord Carlisle, T. R. Andrews, Col. Sandwith, Preb. Cadman, Col. Rowlandson, Rev. E. H. Brooke, Rev. T. Flavel Cook, Rev. H. W. Webb-Peplow, Preb. Dalton, Rev. C. J. Goodheart, Rev. J. Wilkinson, Rev. H. E. Fox, Rev. F. A. C. Lillington, Canon Garbett, Rev. Rev. Frank White, E. J. Hytche, Rev. G. A. Sparks, R. J. Mahoney, Cheyne Brady, Bh. Horsley, Tillotson (a Westm. divine), Mede, Burnet, F. E. Hastings, Chas. Maude, Rev. W. Frith, Durant, Farmer, the Bishop of Cashel, the Bishop of Ripon, Admiral Vernon Harcourt, Hon. A. Kinnaird, Capt. John Trotter, Rev. Capel Molensaux, Rev. James Cochran, Rev. Walter Wood, Geo. Ogilvie, Hon. S. R. Maxwell, Rev. James Kelly, Rev. Dr. Wilson, Rev. W. Brock, Rev. W. Trotter, Rev. B. Wills Newton, Rev. Dr. Stevenson, Rev. W. Niven, Wattson, Waples, Roach, Pirie, Mansford, Mandeville, McCausland, Gregory, Bellamy, Rev. S. E. Pierce, Keach, Tait, Sirt, Wells, Coke, the Wesleys, Fletcher, Piers, Skeen, Brightman, Frere, Pitcairn, Carleton, Waple, Archer, Dallas, Brightman, Woodhouse, Wickes, Bayford, Villiers, J. Biencho, Beverly, Grimshawe, Woodroofs, Barker, Marsh, Dibdin, Fisk, Fremantle, Wilson, Reichart, Harrison, Holland, Wigram, Nolan, Burgh, Bh. Clayton, Cooper, Drummond, Eyre, Farmer, Ed. King, A. Jukes, Flemming, jr., W. Vint, Keith, R. Hort, Dr. J. Knight, P. Lancaster, Flemming, Frer, Th. Loader, Frey, Gregg, Girdlestone, Habershon, Hallet, Maitland, Hartly, the Duke of Manchester, Manford, Hawtrey, Homes, Dr. W. Marsh, Rob. Maton, J. Hooper, Rev. Hugh McNeile, Hon. and Rev. G. T. Noel, Dr. F. Nolan, J. Hussey, W. Perry, Rev. A. Pirie, Rev. A. R. Purdon, J. Furnes, Forster, Nath. Ranew, R. Roach, B. W. Saville, James Scott, Dr. Sayer Rudd, F. Sergeant, Wm. Sherman, Peter Sterry, J. G. Zipple, H. W. Woodward, J. H. Stewart, Tillinghast, Th. L. Strange, Wm. Thorpe, Wm. Whiston, Jos. Tyso, Jos. Tyson, El. Winchester, Jer. White, Leut.-G. H. Wood, Walter Wood, Wm. Witherby, H. W. Woodward, T. Whowell, Benson, Ambrose, Rev. Ch. Brown, Spurgeon, Burnet, Burk, Pope, Sherwood, Dr. G. Sharpe, Dr. S. Charnock, Wm. Cowper, Spalding, R. Clarke, Wm. Clayton, Bh. Cranmer, Charlotte Elizabeth, Gilfillan, J. Glass, Dr. R. Hurd, Wm. Wogan, Dr. I. Watts, Bh. Heber, Gen. J. Harlan, Rev. S. Johnson, Jno. Keble, Jno. Milton, A. M. Toplady, M. F. Tupper, Dr. Jno. Thompson, J. L. Towers, Rev. L. Way, Cressener, Jno. Fox, Dr. Margolionth, Denham, Niven, Nangle, Harker, Dr. Wilson, Dr. Stephenson, French, Dr. Leak, Gillson, Berks, J. Verner, Foskett, Scott, Phillips, Dr. T. J. Bell, W. S. Ross, Purdon, Harris, Code, Rob. Howard, Hon. W. Wellesley, Rob. Baxter, Henry Drummond, Dr. Rob. Anderson, Rev. Wm. Maude, Rev. N. Starkey, M. Redman, Esq., Rev. S. Garrett, E. Phair, Rev. J. Sabine Knight, Rev. J. Cochran, Hon. S. R. Maxwell, Reads, Wood, Moleneux, H. Smith, J. Kelly, Brack, W. Trotter, Wills Newton, Niven, H. Shephard, Dr. J. Wilson, Dr. Stevenson, Geo. Ogilvie, B. Wills Newton, Rev. T. J. Malyn, Rev. E. J. Hytche, H. Weymott, Rev. G. H. Pember, Rev. N. S. Godfrey.

Germany : Bengel, Jung Stilling, P. J. Spener, M. F. Roos, P. M. Hahn, J. M. Hahn, Peterson, Rothe, Auberlen, Martensen, Dörner, Christlieb, Luthardt, Delitzsch, Lange, Olshausen, Ebrard, Meyer, Baumgarten, T. C. K. Von Hofmann, Lechler, Riggenbach, Floerke, Schlegel, Krummacher, Steir, Kurtz, Christiani, Rinck, Pfeiderer, Koch, Schmid, Steffan, Düsterdieck, F. Semler, Typke, Gerken, Opitz, Leutwein, Rühle, von Lilienstern, Sander, Oetinger, Lavater, Crusius, Cocceius, Breithaupt, Piscator, Passavater, Lisco, Kohler, C. F. P. Leutwein, Dr. V. U. Maywahlen, Huss, Clötter, Michael, Hebart, Schneider, Gotlob Schultze, Jno. Dav. Schaeffer, Daubuz, Koppe, Fr. Baner, Freiderick Kletwick, Dr. J. Lange, Jno. G. Schoner, Dr. F. V. Reinhard, C. B. Reichel, Osiander, J. Nissen, Kling, Thomasius, H. Wilh. J. Thiersch, Alb. Köppen.

France and Switzerland : Prof. Godet of Lausanne, Gausson, Dr. J. Abbadie, Père Amelote, E. Guers, P. Jurieu, Lambert, Pierre Poirat, Lavater.

Holland : Van Oosterzee, Da Costa, Capadose.

Miscellaneous : F. W. Stuckert, Rev. D. G. Mallery, Rev. Paul, Roorda, Hebert, Gneis, Madam De Gasparin, Rev. R. Hamilton (Melbourne, Australia), Comenius, Jurien, Seranius, Altingius, Alsted, Riemann, Worthington, Seitz, Dreissenius, Jarchi, Kimchi, Abrahanel, Alabaster, Durant, Chas. Jerram, Mejanel, Coleman, Ben Ezra, Crool, S. A. Blackwood, J. G. Bellett, H. W. Soltau, Wm. Lincoln, H. Snell, Bh. Spangenberg (Moravian), H. Meynott, Esq. (Australia).

Obs. 12. The number of able commentators favoring, indorsing, and teaching Chiliaistic doctrine is not only creditable, but extremely satisfactory to the faithful believer, showing that men who specially devote themselves to the study and explanation of the Scriptures find Millenarianism clearly taught therein.

We instance the following : Bengel's Gnomon of the N. T., a work still in the highest esteem ; Olshausen's Com. on the New Test., a work repeatedly republished ; Gill's Expos. of the Old and New Test. ; Steir's Words of the Lord Jesus, still republished ; Alford's Greek Test. with Proleg. and Com., a standard work ; Lange's Com. of the Old and New Tests., especially the Amer. Edition, and particularly 1 and 2 Thess., Ed. by Dr. Lillie; Meyer's Com. on New Test., recently republished; Cocceius' Commentaries in "Opera Omnia"—was charged by his enemies with Chiliasm, Kurtz's Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 213; Die Berlenburger Bibel, 1726, 4 vols. large fol.; Richter's Erklärte Haus Bibel; Starke's Synopsis of the New Test.; Piscator's Com. on Old and New Test.; Coke's Com. on Old and New Test.; Jamieson, Brown, and Fausset's Com. on the Old and New Tests., a recent one, and Pre-Mill. in the parts edited by Fausset; Judge Jones's Notes on Scripture (in the republication this title was changed); Dr. Nast's Com. on New Test., only a part published.

Commentaries and Expositions on detached portions of the Scriptures. Greswell (Parables), Keach (Parables), Bonar (Lev. and Psalms), Tait (Hebrews), Byle (Exp. Thoughts, Gospels), Seiss (Lev. and Hebrews), Cumming (Parables, Rev., etc.), Lillie (Thess.), Schmuoker (Rev.), Daubuz (Rev.), Koppe (Thess.), Fry (Rom. and Psalms), Sirr (Notes on Luke), C. H. M. (Notes on Gen., etc.), Wells (Dan. and Rev.), Demarest (Peter), Delitzsch (Gen.), Sir I. Newton (Dan. and Rev.), Ebrard (Rev.), Skeen (Rev.), Haldane (Rom.), Mede (Apoc. and Peter), Brightman (Dan. and Rev.), Bengel (Apoc.), Goodwin (Rev.), I. Lange (Apoc.), Auberlen (Dan. and Rev.), Elliott (Apoc.), Lord (Apoc.), Buck (Math. 24.), Frere (Dan., Esd., and Rev.), Pitcairn (Ps. 2.), Carleton (Math. 24.), Waple (Apoc.), Woodhouse (Apoc.), Wickes (Apoc.), Bliss (Apoc.), Roos (Dan. and Rev.), Sander (Rev.), Kohler (Hag.), Birks (Dan.), Cressener (Apoc.), Hooper (Apoc.), Knight (Peter), W. Newton (Dan.), Pewn (Ezek.), Thompson (Math. 25.), Tyso (Ezek. etc.), Gausson (Dan.), Cunningham (Apoc.), Darby (Dan.), Holmes (Apoc. and Dan.), Tregelles (Dan.), Brown (Apoc.), Irving (Apoc.), Ward (Rev.), Wickes, (Rev.), Mandeville (Heb.), Waples (Apoc.), and others. Commentaries and Expositions that present some of the Chiliasm features. Clarke's Com. on the Old and New Test.; Jarohi's Com. Hebraicus; Kimchi's Com. on Prophets; Abrabanel's Com. on Prophets; Stuart's Com. Apoc. (gives the doctrine of a literal first resurrection); Altingius' Com. Jeremiah; Piscator's Com. on Old and New Tests.; Caryll's Exp. on Job; Gouge's Com. Hebrews; Passavant's Phil. and Eph.; Lisco's New Test.; Deprez On Daniel; and others.

We append a few statements respecting Pre-Mill. commentators. Alford (N. T., vol. 2, p. 350), speaking of the Apocalyptic interpreters since the French Revolution, says: "The majority, both in number, learning, and research, adopt the Pre-Millennial Advent, following the plain and undeniable sense of the sacred text." Dr. Ed. Beecher in The Independent (Aug. 24th, 1871), laments over the "increase" of Millenarian "power" as exhibited in recent commentators, saying: "This is true of Alford, Ellicott, Lange, and his co-laborers, especially Drs. Lillie, Auberlen, and Riggenbach. To these we must add the writings of English and American Millenarians, the older and the more recent. And there is at present no adequate counterpoise to the weight of authority of the commentators whom we have mentioned." This feature, thus frankly acknowledged by an opponent, is a source of gratification to us, and of thankfulness to God in raising up such advocates.

Obs. 13. Numerous writers, who, in their occasional works, give expression to Chiliasm belief, without entering largely in details.

Such as e.g. Milton, the various Pre-Mill. Commentators, Chalmers, Charnock, Wogan, Dornor, Mather, Nissen, Spurgeon, Talmage (somewhat contradictory), Gilfillan, Moody, Burroughs, Clayton, Coleman, Fox, and many others.

Obs. 14. Authors, who prominently set forth one or more essential features of our system, either in elucidation or defence of the same.

Such e.g. Woodward, Essays on Mill.; Thorp, Destinies of the Brit. Emp.; Crool, Rest of Israel; Frey, Judah and Israel; Winthrop, Premium Essay on Symbols; Abdial, Essays; Begg, Argument for the Coming of the Lord; Nathan Lord, The Millennium; W. Newton, Lec. on the first two visions of Dan.; and the writings of White, Thompson, Burgh, Tyso, Strange, Stewart, Beverly, Eyre, Flemming, Sirr, Labangh, and many others.

Obs. 15. Writers who give a very fair exhibit of the system of doctrine, showing the relationship that one part sustains to the other, are also quite numerous.

Thus e.g. Seiss' Last Times; Brooke's Maranatha; Demarest and Gordon's Christocracy; Bickersteth's Practical Guide; Brooks' Et. of Proph. Interpretation; D. N. Lord's Coming and Reign of Christ; Dr. McCaul's Old Paths, etc.; McNeile's Sermons on the Sec. Advent.; Noel's Prospects of the Church of Christ; Duffield's Diss. on the Prophecies; and the writings of the Bonars, Pym, Shimeall, Molyneux, Lord, Birks, Bryant, Ramsey, and many others.

Obs. 16. The controversial writers who have directly written in defence of Millenarianism against the attacks of opponents are worthy of notice.

Works specially designed to defend Chiliasm against objections are numerous. The following may be designated: Duffield's Mill. Defended, and Reply to Stuart; Shimeall's Reply to Shedd; The Theol. and Lit. Journal, Ed. by D. N. Lord, contains a large number of such articles; Dr. Craven's Reply to Prof. Briggs (N. Y. Evangelist, 1879); Dr. Moorehead's series of arts. in reply to Dr. Macgill (Chicago Instructor, 1879); Randolph's series of arts. (Danville Tribune, 1879); The Prophetic Times in its entire old and new series; Lillie's Notes on the Mill. Controversy (in his "Perpetuity of the Earth"); Anderson's Apology for the Mill. Doc.: Christocracy, by Drs. Demarest and Gordon; Bayford's Reply to Jones; Tyson's Defence of the Personal Reign; Drummond's Defence of the Students of Prophecy; The Literalist (5 vols.) contains some able articles; Manford's Apology; Spence's Defence of the Hope of Better Times; Sirr's First Res.; Prudon's Last Vials; Bryant's Mill. Views; Pym's Thoughts on Mill.; Maton's Israel's Redemption Redeemed; Ogilvie's Popular Objections; Cox's Millenarian's Answer; and, in brief, the writings of Seiss, Brookes, Bonar, Bickersteth, Cunninghame, and many others (for nearly all Chiliasmic works devote some space to the consideration of objections), besides the quarterlies, monthlies, and papers specially devoted to the advocacy of Pre-Mill. The work of Dr. Brown (Sec. Coming) was answered by Lord (Lit. and Theol. Journal), Bonar (The Com. and Kingd. of the Lord Jesus Christ), the Duke of Manchester (Ap. to the Finished Mystery), Wood (Tract), Scott, and others.

Obs. 17. Various writers in our religious papers, periodicals, simply either give their initials or conceal their identity by a nom de plume, while presenting articles of a Chiliasmic tenor, are not to be overlooked in considering the number of advocates.

Hence it is difficult to form anything like a correct estimate of numbers. In my own denomination (Evang. Lutheran) quite a number of persons are only known to me by occasional articles signed in this way. This is true of many others. Rev. Ebaugh in his brief His. of Mill. in Rupp's Orig. His. of Relig. Denom's, says: "The number of Christians who hold substantially the foregoing views of the Millennium [Chiliasmic], cannot be computed with any degree of certainty, but from the writings of distinguished divines, both in the European and American churches, we are warranted in estimating their number at many thousands already." We have also quite a number of Chiliasmic works given anonymously, such e.g. Time of the End, Spes Fidelium, or The Believer's Hope, Theopolis, The Sec. Com. of the Lord, Review of Scripture, Reign of Christ on Earth, Millennial Church, A Tenet of Millennium, Mulum in Parvo; or the Jubilee of Jubilees, The First Resurrection, Enoch, An Inquiry into the Sec. Coming, Das Tausendjährige Reich, Christ's Speedy Return in Glory, Abdiel's Essays, Second Advent, and others.

Obs. 18. Writers who are utterly opposed to the prevailing Whitbyan theory, and declare the nearness of the Advent, the non-conversion of the world before the Advent; the renewal of the earth, etc., are also to be considered, because on some salient points, essentially connected with our system, they manifest a decided leaning favorable to Chiliasm.

We instance e.g. Richard Baxter, Bh. Bale, Th. Watson, Th. Vincent, Jno. Durant, A. Grosse, Arch. Usher, Arch. Cranmer, Bh. Davenant, Bh. Ridley, Matthew Henry, Sayer Rudd, Geo. Benson, Jno. Howe, Bh. Latimer, Archd. Woodhouse, Romaine, Bh. Russell, Hammond, Alberus, Nicolai, Ringwald, Grotius, Prideaux, Bh. Taylor, Paul Gerhard, Lee, Quenstadt, Hutter, Jno. Knox, Httmnius, the Reformers (as quoted), Jos. Alleine, Aretius, Bradford, Toplady, Tholuck, Dr. Scott, Pareus, Archb. Newcome, Knapp, Dr. E. Hitchcock, Dr. Hales, Bh. Davenant, Flacius, Chytræus, Sandys, Keith, Gale, Dodwell, King, and many others.

Obs. 19. The controversial works, essays, and articles against us fully indicate the extent in which our doctrine is held.

Works that are directly written against Chiliasm may also be noticed, both as indicative of the extent of Millenarianism, and that the student may compare them with our line of argument. The controversial works of importance on the other side are the following: Brown's Second Coming; Gipp's On the First Res.; Hall's Reply to Homes; Hamilton On the Mill.; Jefferson On the Mill.; an anon. work, The Kingdom of Grace; Morrison Christ's Personal Reign; Waldegrave's Bamp. Lectures, 1854, Williamson's Letters to a Millenarian; Stuart's Strictures on Dr. Duffield; Vint's New Illustrations of Prophecy; Bogue's Dis. on Mill.; Bush On the Mill.; Pro. Brigg's arts. in N. Y. Evangelist, 1879, and repub. in Luth. Quarterly; numerous arts. in the reviews, quarterlies, relig. weeklies, etc., reiterate the statements of the above works; the brief statements found in works such as Barnes' Notes on Rev., Shedd's His. of Ch. Doc., Hodges's Sys. Div., etc. In our argument we freely present these and other opposing works, give their objections (over-looking none), and meet them in detail. We really are desirous for the reader to know, Scripturally and historically, the arguments on both sides, so that he may intelligently compare them, and decide for himself. We feel assured that in a candid comparison, our doctrine will lose nothing by it. Hence we commend the preceding for perusal, as well as the following: Carson's Personal Reign of Christ during the Millennium proved to be impossible; Hopkins' and Boyd's Second Adventism in the light of Jewish History; Warren's Parousia; Merrill's Sec. Coming of Christ; Clemens' Spiritual Reign, and the writings of Berg, Hengstenberg, Davidson, and many others.

Obs. 20. The greatest and most decided opposition to Chiliasm is that which springs from the adoption of the Whitbyan theory—a view that is incorporated in systems of theology, sermons, etc., and is the prevailing one.

Prof. Briggs, in his series of articles (in the N. Y. Evangelist, 1878), states that he, Dr. Hatfield, and others, hold "that the Millennium began in the past, and corresponds with the period of the church, or the Kingdom of God, on earth, in whole or in part." (See this view adverted to under Prop. 158.) This he pronounces "the church view," and the Editor of the Evangelist (Oct. 10th), flatly contradicts him, saying that "the common doctrine of the church" is the one that Whitby introduced, viz.: that the Mill. is still future and that it shall be ushered in by the preaching of the Gospel, etc. Now while neither are taught in the leading confessions of the church (but are contradicted by the statements in reference to the condition of the church itself, the nearness of the Advent, etc.), the editor is correct when he makes the Whitbyan theory the present prevailing one. Prof. Briggs' view is held by an exceeding small minority of Protestants, however popular it has been with the Papacy as "the church view." A few remarks, indicative of the modern origin—so recent as to be amazing, when its progress is considered—of the Whitbyan theory is in place. The His. of Doctrines informs us that when the Augustinean view was introduced it became, as opposed to Chiliasm, the popular doctrine of the Roman Church; and that it was, more or less, entertained by the Reformers. This continued until the appearance of Daniel Whitby (comp. Prop. 175, Obs. 4, and Prop. 127, Obs. on Rev. 20), an English commentator (b. A.D. 1638 and d. 1726), who in explaining Rev. 20:1-6, advocated what he calls a "New Hypothesis," viz.: a spiritual Millennium still future to be introduced by existing Gospel instrumentalities. This appropriation by Whitby of a new, unheard-of application has been unquestioned by able scholars, such as Bh. Russell, Archd. Woodhouse, Prof. Bush, and others. Indeed it materially differs from the Popish and Jesuitical dreams of a subjugation and conversion of the world under Papal supremacy; because such dreams of conquest were allied with the Augustinean theory, and regarded as the result of an already existing Mill. period—the latter being regarded as equivalent to the existing dispensation, while Whitby located his as future and distinctive in time and results. The nearest ancient approach, although differing from it, to Whitby's theory are the prophecies of Joachim (comp. arts. on in Cyclops, and Von Döllinger's Proph. of the Middle Ages, VII.), or the declarations of Roger Bacon, Dolcino, and men of that stamp. So the fanatical Anabaptist movement materially differs in the instrumentality used, but only sympathizes with it (Prop. 156, Obs. 4) in the effort to secure a world-wide dominion without the personal Advent preceding, and before the res. of the saints. Hence Pre-Millenarians, unwilling to associate the Whitbyan theory with such Popish and Anabaptist vagaries and dreams of conquest, assert (as Bh. Henshaw, Bickersteth, Dr. Lillie, Dr. Duffield, Dr. Seiss, Dr. Brookes, and others) that Whitby is the first writer who systematically presented the opinion, now so prevailing, that the Mill. age (1000 years) is future and will be introduced, without any Advent of Christ, by the preaching of the Gospel.* This theory denies the Pre-Mill. Advent of Jesus, the prior res. of the saints, the personal reign of Jesus and the saints on earth, and holds simply to a conversion of the nations then living, and to a spiritual reign of the then existing church. It has thousands of talented advocates, and is held by multitudes of pious and devoted Christians, being found entrenched in Sys. Divinities, religious works of all kinds, books of worship, hymnals, periodicals, etc. It is a matter of surprise that a theory of such "recent origin" (so Dr. John Lillie, who adds, "it is very questionable whether even so late as two hundred years ago, it had yet been heard of among good men,"—quoted by Brookes, Maranatha, p. 321-2) should have such an extended reception, and be so perseveringly upheld, when bringing the church into the predicted position of unbelief (comp. Prop. 177). Bh. Henshaw (An Inquiry concerning the Sec. Advent) pronounces it "a novel doctrine, unknown to the Church for the space of 1600 years. So far as we have been able to investigate its history, it was first advanced by Rev. Dr. Whitby, the commentator." (Comp. Dr. Seiss' Question in Eschatology, p. 47-50.) Some have questioned these statements, but no one has been able to produce a single writer of ability preceding Dan. Whitby. Historically, the modern view has no foundation whatever; it is "a novelty."

Obs. 21. Many, without having a definite Mill. doctrine (their notions of Mill. prophecies being vague), are influenced by the general deductions of the Whitbyan theory, and reject our doctrine chiefly on the ground of a still future conversion of the world under present instrumentalities, which is supposed to bring about an ample fulfilment of predictions relating to the Messianic Kingdom. (Comp. Props. 175 and 176, where this matter is discussed in detail.)

We have men, who will in eccles. bodies oppose our views, and yet at the same time confess (e.g. The Mass. Gen. Conference on the Mill., Proph. Times, vol. 4, No. 12), that they have not given the subject "that critical study which it demanded," and that "with all the objections to Mill. views, it is still difficult to see how many passages of Scriptures can be otherwise explained." And, without such study, and with such a confession of weakness, they are content with their Modern Whitbyan theory. Indeed, many of this class cannot be induced to study the subject. The Examiner (N. Y.), commenting on the late "Proph. Conference," after speaking favorably of the men conducting it, says: "Put the great facts of Christ's personal Sec. Coming, that it may occur at any time, that there will be a first res. of the righteous dead, and a second res. of the wicked dead, and that the final general judgment will then come, do not belong to the shadowy and fanciful imaginings of mere theorists."

Obs. 22. However respectable the number of adherents to our doctrine in whole or in part, yet they form but a small minority in comparison with the immense body that rejects the belief once so prevailing in the church.

---

* Dr. Craven in Lange's Com. Rev. p. 346, Amer. Ed., introduces the following footnote: "Elliott writes: 'Vitrings, however, who alludes to Whitby's as a work just published, makes brief citations from two earlier writers, Conrad of Mantua, and Carolus Gallus, as expressive of the same general view.' Hence, as these writers had but little influence in moulding the sentiment of the Church (for they are almost unknown, and our opponents, so hard pressed for authorities, failed to find them—for no one quotes them (Dr. Craven in his "Excursus" says: "This theory (Post-Millennial), which is the one most generally adopted by English-speaking Protestant theologians, was first fully developed by Whitby.")

The retention of the Augustinian theory or Constantinian view by some; the general adoption of a spiritualizing interpretation to sustain a Church-Kingdom view; the reception of the Whitbyan hypothesis; the issuing of works in which our doctrine is caricatured, misrepresented, and ridiculed; the linking of our doctrine with the vagaries and fanaticism of certain parties to make it odious; the incorporation of some parts of our system by smaller organizations that exerted but little influence; the parading of mistakes made by some rash writers both as to time and details; the influence of leading societies in their publications, their endowments, commentaries for popular use, periodicals, etc.; in brief, the unfriendliness of worldliness, sect, indifference, unbelief, prejudice, etc., has been exerted to overpower this ancient faith. Numerous instances will be cited as we proceed. The fact that great and good men—men eminent for piety and ability in the church—have aided in decrying the doctrine has had a powerful influence upon the minds of many (comp. Props. 177-180). Doctrinal belief is not, however, decided by numbers (Matt. 8 : 13, 14, and 22 : 14 ; 1 Cor. 1 : 26, 27, etc.).

Obs. 23. Writers that are evidently unacquainted with the literature and history of our doctrine dismiss it with some contemptuous allusion to "the ignorance and fanaticism" of its upholders. Certainly the eminent and venerable names presented are sufficient to redeem it from such charges. We are not concerned in eulogizing its advocates; this is done by our opponents and others.

As indicative of the treatment received, we present several illustrations. Dr. Mosheim (Ch. His., vol. 3, p. 393), notwithstanding the important concessions given by him, exhibits his animosity to the doctrine as follows: "The expectation of the Millennial Kingdom, which seldom exists in well informed minds, and which generally produces extravagant opinions." The editor of the N. Y. Evangelist eulogizes Prof. Briggs's one-sided articles, and then says (Editorial, Jan. 9, 1879) of Chiliasm, that it is "a delusion exploded many times," having a "a sporadic existence"; and even designates "the blessed hope" sneeringly, "the blessed appearance, as they call it." The slightest acquaintance with the history of Chiliasm, and the long line of revered advocates, should undoubtedly prevent the use of such language, unless the parties employing it desire the same to be attributed to improper motives. Consequently we find scholarly men, who desire to act honorably and justly, express themselves, although opposing our doctrine, as reverencing the pious and eminent Chiliastic advocates; they know enough concerning their honored lives, their labors of love, their sufferings for Christ, that, supposing them even to be in error on this point, they find sufficient redeeming qualities to secure a high respect and cordial esteem. Prof. Bush, whose eulogy on Millenarians we quote in the Preface, is an example followed by others. The Princeton Review, Ap., 1851, p. 187, concedes, as it well may, that we have in our ranks "minds too of devotedly pious men, who are also highly reputable scholars." Even Harria, in his Great Commission, where (pp. 115-117) he grossly misrepresents our doctrine and its advocates (comp. for a reply, Prop. 175), is still forced in candor to acknowledge: "We are aware, indeed, that among those who, for the sake of distinction, are called Millenarians, there are to be found divines of considerable reputation, and Christians of the greatest sanctity."

We leave a recent writer, an opponent (the author of God is Love—3 vols.—a work specially devoted against our doctrine), to testify both respecting its adherents and extent. He says (Pref., vol. 1) that he is personally acquainted with "a very large number of my most revered private friends, both among the clergy and laity, (who) are firm believers in the doctrine of a personal reign of Christ on earth." "They are alike eminent for the greatness of their talents, for their deep and sustained spirituality of mind, for their habitually close walk with God, for their exemplary conduct in the society and sight of their fellow men, and for their devotedness to the cause of Christ and of souls." He refers "to the fact that so many of my greatest Christian friends, equally remarkable for their gifts and graces, believe in the personal reign as the great central doctrine," etc. He refers to "the great extent to which that class of views are now adopted," especially in "in the Church of England," "among the Independents, the Baptists, and the Presbyterians," and largely advocated by "the Plymouth Brethren." He adds: "Millenarianism is spreading rapidly in nearly all parts of the country at the time at which I write." He remarks that all converted Jews are Millenarian, and referring to the efforts of "The Prophecy Investigating Society" in propagating the doctrine, says: "The clerical members of this society are, in the majority of cases, men of eminence in the religious world; while the laymen are, in every instance, men of acknowledged piety and high social position." He remarks, "Among the vice-presidents are the Bish. of Cashel, the Bish. of Ripon, Admiral Vernon Harcourt, the Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., and Captain John Trotter." He speaks of the preachers, whose sermons are published on the subject, as "most of them men of eminence;" refers to the ability of its advocates in Ireland, and then gives a list of publications, interspersed with high eulogies of various writers, who hold to what he is pleased to call "the Millennial delusion." He declares that "Millenarianism is making such rapid progress among all Evangelical denominations," so that he advocates the "adopting measures to arrest its progress" (his book being one based on the rejecting from Scripture, as interpolations, all teaching that favors our views!). This confirms Moody's (the Evangelist) statement in a sermon on the Sec. Advent: "Many spiritual men in the pulpits of Great Britain are firm in the faith. Spurgeon preaches it. I have heard Newman Hall say that he knew no reason why Christ might not come before he got through with his sermon." Dr. Fisher, Art. Mill. (McClintock and Strong's Cyclop.) says that an anon. work, The End of All Things (which is opposed to us), frankly declares that "more than half of the evangelical clergy of the Church of England are at this moment Millenarians." Dr. Moore writes from Wartburg, Ger., to the Central Presbyterian (1867), and after delineating the religious condition, says: "I find among the Evangelicals a great deal of Millenarianism; and the Sec. Coming of Christ is the great feature of the Gospel that swallows up all others with them." This agrees with Nast's (Com. Matt., 6:10) declaration, who speaks of "many Evangelical divines of Germany," and of "the most learned theologians of England and America" as Millenarian. Such testimony from opponents and sympathizers should certainly have sufficient weight to prevent that spirit of detraction so prevalent with some.

Obs. 24. Ignorance or malice, alone, can produce the charge of "heresy," so often, with evident relish, urged against Pre-Millenarians.

We give a few illustrations out of many such charges. Prof. Briggs, in the N. Y. Evangelist, Sept. 12th, 1878, pronounces Pre-Millenarianism a "heresy," and "the basis of a most pernicious series of doctrines, ever rejected by the Church as fanatical, visionary, and dangerous." (This certainly comes with good grace from one who professes to believe that the Church has been in the past, and now is, enjoying the predicted Millennium.) Dr. Berg in "The Sec. Advent of Jesus Christ, not Pre-Millennial," follows the same tenor, pronouncing "the doctrine of the Pre-Mill. Advent, and the so-called Personal Reign of Christ" to be not only "erroneous" but "pernicious," "yoked to the car of fanaticism," "the motive power of the wildest vagaries," characterized by "eccentric variations"; being "the favorite hobby upon which wild delusion has careered with whip and spur to perdition," "changing sincere fanatics into shameless impostors," etc. (This reads remarkable well from the man who strives to make the stone of Dan. 2 to represent the American Republic!) If the doctrine produces all this, it is exceedingly unfortunate for the wisdom of the Bible, that it contains so much in its plain, grammatical sense, in its structure and analogy, as to induce multitudes in the Primitive Church, and since, to believe and adopt it. If the doctrine has this tendency, and produces such persons, then it follows, that the Church has honored, and now reverences, men for their piety, usefulness, learning, etc., who are only "heretics." If the doctrine is so bad, demoralizing, and destructive, it is especially unfortunate for the Ch. Church, that through the first centuries of its existence, it can only trace its progress through such successful martyr, but hated "heretics." Our decided impression is, when we look at the men thus defamed—men who sealed their love for Jesus and His truth by abundant labors, toils, sufferings, and even death—that the time will come—if it be at the throne of Jesus Himself—when such wholesale, unchristian and most unjust charges will be deeply, if not bitterly, regretted by the persons urging them. The persons who bring this charge ought to have some consideration of their own accountability. Dr. West (Essay before the Prop. Conference on the His. of the Doc.) remarks: "And equally powerless is the attempt to stigmatize the holders of this hope as aiders and abettors of 'heresy.' That is a weapon that cuts fearfully in the opposite direction. Never has there existed a persecutor of God's saints on earth, since the dawn of Christianity, who was not an Anti-Chiliasit. The Apostate Church of Rome, idolatrous corrupter of every truth of God, and red with the blood of God's saints, was built and nurtured on an Anti-Chiliasitic creed. The first perversion of this hope was by a heretic, Cerinthus or Montanus. The first assault upon it was by the rationalizing Origen, who became a Universalist. The next was by Dionysius, who denied the Apoc. of John. The first official condemnation of it was by a Roman Pope. The early misrepresentator of it was Eusebius, an Arian, and let him who can, defend Whitby from the charge of becoming a Socinian. I dismiss the imputation with the remark, that if, in days to come, a personal Antichrist, more God-defying and blaspheming than he who sits in Rome, shall rise, one of the marks that will signalize him as the concentration of satanic energy and hate, will be that he is a pronounced Anti-Chiliasit. And just in proportion as such time shall approach, will this glorious martyr-truth revive, as all history shows, and to suffering saints will it be given again to witness for that same hope under which the first confessors of Jesus, comforted, supported and strengthened, sank singing to their tombs." The absurdity, the injustice, and the sinfulness of thus designating the founders, martyrs, confessors, missionaries, and ablest divines of the Church, is self-evident, but it is something that we are led to anticipate, Isa. 66: 5. It is the old charge reproduced: Spener (Dorner's "His. Prot. Theol.," vol. 2, p. 211) was opposed on account of his Millenarianism, and those who received his views were denounced as heretics—his name lives in freshness of honor, while the opponents are almost forgotten. So Auferien (Dis. Rev. p. 315) quotes Delitzsch as saying in reference to the wide-spread influence of Bengel: "To whom do we owe it, that the orthodox church of the present day, no longer brands the Chiliasitic view of the last times, as all books of systematic doctrine do, as heterodoxy, but has woven it into her own inmost life so deeply, that hardly a believing Christian can be found who does not hold it." (Thus indicating its hold in the Evangelical portion of believers.)

Obs. 25. Pre-Millenarianism is frequently, either through lack of knowledge or animosity, represented as indorsing the belief of bodies (e.g. the fanatical Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchy men, etc.) whose faith is directly opposite to it.

For Anabaptists, etc., see Props. 175, 179, etc., where their views are given in detail. We, however, present another illustration of our meaning. The Editor of the N. Y. Observer, (Sept. 1866) makes out "that Shakerism is composed of Millenarianism and Spiritualism." And as the result of his visit to the Shakers in Columbia Co., N. Y., says: "The Shakers believe He (Jesus) is now present in them, and that it is high noon of the millennium all around here." The truth is, that there is not a particle of affinity between Shakerism and Millenarianism. Their doctrine of the Second Coming of Jesus in the person of Ann Lee and of a present resulting Millennium is utterly opposed by our fundamental principles. No Chiliasit ever advocated such a delusion. Their doctrine best suits the Whitbyan spiritual reign theory, being the result of the spiritual, mystical system of interpretation repudiated by us. As to the Doctrine of a present Millennium, that accords best with Prof. Briggs' theory of a present existing Millennium. The fundamental position which distinguishes Millenarians from all others, is this: No Millennium without the personal coming and intervention of the same identical Jesus who ascended to heaven. To accommodate all this covenant and prophecies, to Ann Lee, is a complete perversion of the truth,—a sad prostitution of the promises pertaining to the Christship and the Messianic kingdom.

Obs. 26. Pre-Millenarianism is unjustly held accountable for the extravagances of its votaries, and even of its opposers.

We have referred to this, and give instances of both. It is only necessary to say, that no doctrine of the Bible has ever yet escaped being allied with error and fanaticism (but on that account ought not to be discarded), so this doctrine has not escaped the usual lot. We find it allied with error and extravagance from the days of Montanus down to the present day, but this should not deter any one from the reception of Biblical truth (which is not responsible for the affiliated error and fanaticism), especially when so many able and pious men have received it without incorporating those extravagancies, etc. (Compare Prop. 179.)

Obs. 27. Pre-Millenarianism, being chiefly related to Eschatology, is adopted by persons in all (or nearly all) denominations, but our opponents, overlooking this fact and its historical status, eagerly hold it up as related to some sect or sects, who incorporate it with other doctrines that are objectionable (compare Prop. 179).

Obs. 28. The newspapers and periodicals, partly or wholly devoted to an exhibit of Chiliastic doctrine, also evidence its extent.

The Theol. and Lit. Journal, Ed. by D. N. Lord, a Quarterly Review, only 13 vols., 8vo, published in New York; The Jewish Repository, changed to Expositor and Friend of Israel, London; The Investigator of Prophecy, London; The Bloomsbury Lent Lectures, 10 vols., London; The Literalist, 5 vols., Philad.; Pardon's Last Vials, London; The Quarterly Journal of Prophecy, Ed. by Dr. Bonar, London; The Presbyterian Review (Organ of the Scotch church, a no. of articles); The Prophetic Times, Philad.,—the old series edited by Dr. Seiss, the new by Rev. Wilson; The Israelite Indeed, or Nathaniel, New York, edited by Lederer; Way-Marks in the Wilderness, New York, edited by James Inglis; The Truth, St. Louis, edited by Rev. Dr. Brookes; The Rainbow, London, Ed. by Dr. Leask; Old Truths (Eng.), Ed. by Rev. Cox; The Watchman of Ephraim, England. Also such papers as "The Christian Herald" (London and New York), "The Christian Observer," "Revivalist," etc., contain Chiliastic articles. Besides these are the periodicals published by the Second Adventists, Christadelphians, Seventh-day Adventists, and various other bodies, which, more or less, largely teach Chiliastic doctrine, such as "The World's Crisis" (Boston), "The Gospel Banner and Mill. Advocate" (Geneva, Ill.), "The Proph. Watchman" (Harvard, Ill.), "The Herald of Life and of the Coming Kingdom" (New York), "The True Herald" (Plano, Ill.), "Herald of the Kingdom" (Birmingham, Eng.), "The Proph. Key" (Versailles, Ky.), and others.

Obs. 29. The survival of Chiliasm, amidst the opposition, ridicule, persecution, etc., of the past centuries, is worthy of notice. Dr. West (His. of the Doc.) has some forcible remarks on this point, showing "that only because it is an imperishable truth of God has it been able to survive the ordeal which it has passed." Considering the reproach attending it—the debasements and admixtures to which it has been subject; how offensive it was to Gentile rulers, to Gnostic and Alexandrian teachers, to Papal claims; the persecutions to which it was exposed; the obloquy heaped on it as heresy to crush it; the misrepresentations, abuse, hostility, etc., heaped upon it, as found in thousands of works; and considering the pious and eminent men who clung to it, taught it, and urged it upon others, it must be—as Chiliasts affirm—a truth found in the Divine Record, planted there by God Himself to inspire faith and hope.

Obs. 30. The number of missionaries holding our doctrine, who have gone to foreign lands and among the heathen, is not only gratifying, but evidences how widespread must be Chiliastic teaching.

Compare our remarks on the missionaries and missionary spirit, given more in detail, under Props. 175-178. In this connection we only say that a long list of missionaries, extending from the Apostolic church down to the present, who are Chiliastic might be given. Dr. West ("His. of the Doc.") says of its advocates: "that devoted missionaries like Duff the opener of India, Gutlaff the opener of China, Bettleheim the opener of Japan, Heber, Bertram, Wolff, Herschel, Poor, Lowry, and many more, were Pre-Millenarians, and are followed, if recent information is correct, by a majority of missionaries now in the foreign field, of the same faith." (Comp. Brookes, Maranatha, Seiss, Last Times, etc., for similar statements.)

Obs. 31. The Evangelists and Revivalists who are Chiliastic is conclusive evidence of two facts, viz.: that Chiliasm is not opposed (as some allege) to personal effort to bring men to Jesus, and that Chiliasm is taught by men who have access to large numbers of hearers.

The Evangelists, well known, who present our hope, are the following: D. L. Moody, Rev. G. F. Pentecost, G. C. Needham, T. W. Bonham, Halsey W. Knapp, Maj. D. W. Whittle, B. F. Jacobs, Rev. H. W. Brown, F. M. Rockwell, H. P. Welton, — Harry, — Moorehouse, P. P. Bliss, (see testimony of chairman of the Proph. Conf. held at N. York, 1878, Trib. Sup., p. 18), — Sankey, John G. Vassar.

Obs. 32. One remarkable feature connected with the history of Chiliasm must not be overlooked. It has been held by believers of all classes and the most opposite tendencies—men of the strongest Confessional tendency and men the most unconfessional; men hierarchical in teaching and men the most determined against it; persons who prided themselves in their orthodoxy and persons who rejoiced in their heterodoxy; persons highly Calvinistic and persons low Arminian—in brief, nearly all classes are represented. This arises from the fact that the doctrine is mainly confined to Eschatology (having, however, as we show, an important bearing on many related subjects), and could readily be incorporated in the various systems. Scarcely any other doctrine is found more widely diffused.

Simply to illustrate how parties the most diverse in view entertain it we point to organizations of believers who hold to it as a prominent article of faith. The "Holy Apostolic Church" is exceedingly high-church and ritualistic; on the other hand "The Plymouth Brethren" are the direct opposite. On the one hand the "Michaelians" (following Spenser's pietism and Oetinger's theosophy); on the other the "Pregizerians" (Kurtz, Ch. His. Vol. 2, p. 290-1) who laid the greatest stress on ordinances. The names that we give of its Primitive and succeeding advocates, down to the present day, clearly evidences this feature. This fact evidently indorses the idea that the doctrine must be distinctively taught in the Scriptures, seeing that so many, who are not united on other doctrine, find here a common scriptural basis,—some indeed more distinctively and systematically than others.

Obs. 33. The Conferences held at London, Milday, New York, and other places, in which the most eminent ministers and laymen of the various Protestant denominations participated, evidence the extent of the doctrine and its practical realization.

These Conferences, in view of the eminence, ability, etc., of their supporters, the various denominations so largely represented by leading divines and laymen, have directed public attention to the doctrine and its extent. It has alarmed Post- and Ante-Millenarians, so that Prof. Briggs and others protest, under the threat of Eccles. action, against their continuance, and call for a disbandment. Such menaces are a good sign, both of felt weakness in support of their own theories and of the strength manifested by Pre-Millenarians.

Obs. 34. The poets who have presented Chiliasmic views are both numerous and eminent.

The following may be instanced: Milton (Paradise Lost), Alex. Pope (The Messiah), Jno. Keble (The Christian Year), Charles Wesley (Hymns), Bh. R. Heber (Hymns), M. F. Tupper (Poems), Isaac Watts (Hymns and Psalms), Wm. Cowper (Task), Ed. Bickersteth (Yesterday, To-day and Forever), H. Bonar, (Hymns of Faith and Hope), Rev. L. Way (Palingenesia), Jno. G. Wilson (Psalms), S. B. Monsell (Hymns), Gerard Moultrie (Hymns), M. Habershaw (Hymns), and many others. Hundreds of hymns and psalms in the older Christian Psalmody are so opposed to the Whitbyan and Augustinian theories, so full of longing for the Sec. Coming as the "the Blessed Hope," so utterly faithless of the world's progress without the Christ, etc., that they strongly express Chiliasmic views.

Obs. 35. The design that God has, in thus greatly reviving the doctrine, is worthy of attention. He does not leave His truth without testimony.

Dr. West (His. of Doc.), pertinently, after referring to "the galaxy of illustrious names by which it is adorned, by what piety it is commended, by what unquestioned orthodoxy and scholarship supported, and how the Church seems to be rallying around it, as in the martyr age," says: "What an All-Wise Providence means to intimate, it is well to consider." (Comp. Prop. 174.)

Obs. 36. In conclusion, a brief résumé of our historical argument, to show its connection, is in place. The evidence in support of each step is ample and conclusive. Indeed, no other doctrine has a more clear and decisive proof in its behalf drawn from historical ground than this one. 1. We have shown that the Jews, before and at the First Advent, held to it, professing to derive it from covenant and prophecy. (Compare e.g. Props. 20, 21, 40, 44, 72, 74.) 2. Then we prove that John the Baptist and the disciples both entertained and preached the doctrine. (Compare Props. 38, 39, 43.) 3. Next, that the doctrine was still held after the death of Jesus. (Compare Props. 69, 70.) 4. Extended evidence is given that the apostles, after the ascension and after the day of Pentecost, still adhered to it. (Compare Props. 71, 72 with Props. 66-68.) 5. It is proven that our doctrine was generally, if not universally, received by the early churches, East and West, North and South. (Compare Props. 72, 73, 74, 75.) 6. This doctrine was perpetuated by the followers and successors of the first teachers. (Compare Prop. 75.) 7. That it was only changed and opposed under the Gnostic and Alexandrian influences. (Comp. Prop. 76.) 8. That the Papacy materially aided in crushing the doctrine, because obnoxious to her teaching, claims, etc. (Comp. Prop. 77.) 9. That, thus almost exterminated under Papal influence, there was a revival after the Reformation, since which time it has again been taught by able and devout sons of the church, as shown in this Prop.

PROPOSITION 79. The Kingdom of God, promised by covenant and prophets, is to be distinguished from the general and universal Sovereignty of God.

This is, owing to lack of discrimination, a most fruitful source of mistake. Take the Kingdom in its initiatory form and its covenanted and predicted aspect, and it will be found widely different from the Sovereignty that God exercises by virtue of His Godheadship. The latter indeed is the source of the former, but the Kingdom of covenant is a visible, outward Theocratic Kingdom, manifested here on earth, identified with a certain people, promised in a definite manner, and ruled over by "the man ordained." As we shall show hereafter (Prop. 81), it is a Kingdom specifically promised to the "the Son of Man," who is the Son of David. These, and other aspects of it, clearly distinguish it from such a sovereignty.

Obs. 1. It is but justice to say that many of our opponents (as e.g. Thompson, etc.) and others (as e.g. Van Oosterzee, etc.) justly discriminate between this Kingdom and God's Sovereignty, telling us that we must not make this Kingdom denote the Supremacy of God as manifested in Creation and Providence, in His "Universal Government over this and other worlds." They correctly inform us that the promised Kingdom is a special divine organization with Christ as its Head, and with believing subjects, etc., while the other is the sustaining, guiding, controlling, directing disposition, mediate and immediate, of the Universe under the Divine Headship. They teach us that the one is given by covenant promise, and that the other ever existed, even before this special Kingdom was promised to man. They properly direct us to the language of Christ and of His disciples in preaching that the Kingdom "is at hand," as justly implying that something which did not then exist was to be set up in the future. And they happily direct us to two passages, given by the same writer, as illustrative of the two, viz.: Dan. 6 : 26 and 7 : 13-14.

Indeed, if we were to gather the fragmentary evidences thus presented to us by various writers, we should have an abundant array of proof, much of it derived from those who have no sympathy with us. Those who constitute the Church a Kingdom are forced by simple consistency into this attitude. Hence Kurtz (His. Old Cov., vol. 2, p. 97) remarks : "It is essentially necessary to make a twofold distinction in the process of divine revelation ; that is to say, it is necessary to distinguish the preservation and government of the world in general, from the more special operations connected with the introduction and working out of the plan of salvation," etc. The sovereignty of "the Absolute," which figures so largely in many religious books, etc., and upon which so much stress is laid as "the Kingdom," is simply a decided removal from covenant and promise. The reader will compare Dr. Storrs' excellent remark, see Prop. 37, Obs. 7, as well as Kurtz's, Prop. 26, Obs. 3. Dr. McCosh presents the Universal Sovereignty ably in his "Methods of the Divine Government, Physical and Moral," so also Butler, Paley, Chalmers, the Duke of Argyll, and others; but this is only the source or foundation of this special manifestation of government. Dr. Craven (Lange's Com., Rev., p. 97), in his "Excursus on the Basileia," properly distinguishes between the two; and this is characteristic of numerous able Chiliasts.

Obs. 2. Others, however, do not discern between things that differ, and make the very Sovereignty which promises, overrules, bestows the means for attaining, and finally gives the Kingdom (Prop. 83), to David's Son—the Kingdom itself. Illustrations of this looseness will abundantly appear as we proceed in our argument.

Many excellent men mistake this sovereignty for the covenanted Kingdom, so that literally thousands, like that noble Christian, Alfred Cookman (Life, p. 359, etc., in some of his most eloquent utterances), locate the kingdom in the same, not seeing how it strikes at the root of the most precious promises given to man. Even some Millenarians, not fully grasping the covenanted truth, not consistently confining themselves to the Theocratic idea, also, in a measure, mistake and confound the Divine Sovereignty for, and with, the Kingdom of covenant. This is seen e.g. in the interpretation given to Christ's inheriting David's throne, which, over against the most positive covenanted declarations and predictions, they make the Father's throne in the third heaven, etc.

Obs. 3. It is noticeable that in works of Sys. Divinity this Sovereignty is placed under the part pertaining to God and His general government, and is separated from the promised Kingdom of Christ by treating of the latter under the Part relating to Christ and His work. A distinction is observed, made, and taught in a specific form, but practically it is ignored, and in definitions it is made to disappear, forgetting that thus a radical defect is introduced, and a palpable contradiction is involved. For, uniting the two and making them one, they at once make that, which they tell us was never (even for a moment), intermitted, the subject of recorded promises as something to come, to be inherited, etc.

Williamson (Theol. and Moral Science, p. 73) says: "The Kingdom of God! What is it? No more or less than the reign of God." This is true of the Divine Sovereignty, but it is not correct as he applies it, for on p. 311 he quotes "Repent, for the Kingdom of God is at hand," and ignoring the non-fulfilment of the imposed condition "repent," the non-intermittence of the Divine reign, he frames a new "spiritual kingdom, designating it as follows: "It is a new and more perfect dispensation." This illustration out of many is given to show how able writers confound source and result, cause and effect, and overlook a specific covenanted and predicted kingdom under David's son, with characteristics which, down to the present, have never yet been realized.

Obs. 4. The line of argument already presented (which forms but a small portion of the Scriptural reasons to be assigned), is amply sufficient to show, that a specified Theocratic Kingdom, incorporating the Davidic throne, which once existed, which was withdrawn, and which is promised to be restored under David's Son, is something widely different from the general Sovereignty of the Almighty over the universe. So plain, and simple, and self-evident is this Proposition, that no more space is required in its consideration.

We can indorse Dr. Moll's statement (Lange's Com., Pals. p. 306): "There is a distinction to be made between God's general government of the world, and that special one—the Theocracy—which He established on earth, in and through the seed of Abraham. Even in the imperfect and typical (?) form which it assumes in Old Test. history, this is described as His descending to the earth and His ascending to heaven. This theocracy, insignificant as was its origin in Israel, has a world-embracing destination. It shall gather into itself all nations, who, as one people of God, shall serve and adore one and the same heavenly King; and their princes shall accomplish those purposes which God has ordained for them, viz.: to be the leaders of their people to salvation, and their protectors in the service of God." Avoiding the typical, and keeping logically to the Theocratic idea, we receive and extend this language.

PROPOSITION 80. This Kingdom of covenant promise and prediction, is to be distinguished from the Sovereignty which Jesus exercises by virtue of His Divine nature.

This is distinctively shown by a simple fact (overlooked by the multitude) that the Kingdom is never promised to Him as "the Son of God" but as (the covenants and predictions demand it) "the Son of Man" or "the Son of David." The following Proposition will develop this feature; now it is only necessary to say, that (1) the Sovereignty of God introduces this special Theocratic Kingdom in the incorporated Davidic line, and (2) to constitute this a pure, unailing, perpetual Theocracy (viz. : God ruling as earthly King, etc.) the Divine is allied or incorporated with the person of this David's Son.

Obs. 1. It may be premised, in order to avoid misconception, that Jesus now in His Divine nature, in His Oneness with the Father, does exercise a dominion over all things. According to this nature He is Lord over all, and this is, in our estimation, most unequivocally taught in such passages as John 1 : 3 ; Col. 1 : 15, 19 ; Phil. 2 : 9, 11 ; 1 Cor. 8 : 6 ; Rom. 11 : 36 ; Rev. 1 : 5-6, etc. We fully admit the Divinity of Christ, revere His Divine attributes, make these essential to a proper Theocratic ordering, and acknowledge the Sovereignty that He possesses in His Divine right and possession. But independently of the actual realization of the Theocratic order as covenanted, and aside from the latter (for let the reader consider that when God Himself was Israel's Theocratic King, He did not cease to exert His general Sovereignty), this exercise of Divine Sovereignty is precisely the same as that we have been considering in the previous Proposition, viz. : God's Sovereignty, and differs materially from this predicted Kingdom which is promised to Jesus, "the Christ," not merely in virtue of His relationship to God but of that which He sustains to David as his Son, and to man as the Man. The reign, the dominion, or Kingdom that we are defending, is, in contrast with the other, that of His humanity (as covenanted), or, more properly speaking (embracing covenant as it relates to man, and God's own Theocratic right which is not the subject of promise), that of the Divine-Human. The Theocracy, by incorporating the Davidic kingship, embraces, as the grand instrumentality for its future re-establishment in sublime power and glory, the Divine-Human, now united in Jesus, the Messiah.

It has been well said by various writers (as e. g. Neander, His. Ch., vol. 1, p. 506, note, and Life of Christ, p. 143) : "The predicates 'the Son of Man' and 'the Son of God,' applied by Christ to Himself, have a reciprocal relation to one another, and imply a distinction as well as the conjunction and unity of the divine-human in Him." The careful student will observe that our argument receives additional force from the independent concessions made by able theologians, as e. g. Martensen (Ch. Dog., sec. 174), when he properly discriminate between the kingly power of Jesus, and the divine power belonging to Him as Logos, etc. Others distinguish in the same manner. Comp. e.g. Dorner's Person of Christ and kindred works.

Obs. 2. The early Chiliasts clearly distinguish between the Kingdom belonging to Jesus as the Divine-Human, and the Sovereignty vested in Him as God. Thus e.g. Lactantius ("Poem on Easter"), while firmly holding to the still future Kingdom of promise to be given to the Son of David, expressly asserts that Christ "reigns as God over all things, and all created objects offer prayer to their Creator." The idea, gathered from their writings, is this: in His Divine capacity He is represented as reigning, but this reign is not the reign of promise;—the latter is confined to a special covenanted outward visible manifestation of the human in conjunction with the Divine, in an externally Theocratic ordering.

Obs. 3. When Christ assumes the Kingdom at the time appointed, in view of His being the predicted seed of David, this does not by any means cause Him to lay aside the Sovereignty that He has with the Father over the universe. As Divine He is with the Father evermore, but as the Divine-human, He manifests Himself (and the Father through Him) on earth in a specified form of reigning adapted to humanity. Hence the predicted Kingdom is something that pertains not merely to the Divine but to "the Christ," i.e. the Divine-human united. The right comes to Him in the covenanted line through the human element (i.e. as the lawful seed of David) delegated by the Divine Sovereignty of the Father and rendered efficacious and Theocratic by the intimate and ever-enduring union of the Divine, thus constituting Him in the highest and purest sense the Theocratic King.

The reader is again reminded that this is fully illustrated by the Theocracy. When God condescended to reign as Theocratic King (i.e. to act in the capacity of an earthly Ruler) over Israel, two things were noticeable: (1) that this Theocratic rule was something diverse from the general sovereignty over all things; and (2) that when the former was assumed, the latter was not laid aside, but continued ever in force. The one was a special merciful manifestation in behalf of man, the other lies inherent in the Godhead and pertains to the universe at large.

Obs. 4. It is amazing that theologians, without observing the contradiction involved, confound the Divine Sovereignty with the covenanted Kingship of Jesus, and yet acknowledge that Rom. 14:9; Phil. 2:9; Heb. 12:2, etc., teach that "the ground of His dominion is to be found in His obedience unto death, the death of the cross" (so Oosterzee's Dogmatics). Now certainly the Divine Sovereignty is not grounded in any such contingency, but the Kingship pertaining to Jesus, as the Son of David, is based upon His obedience, etc. (comp. Props. 83 and 84).

Flavel, in his Fountain of Life, represents Jesus as now reigning under two heads: (1) "the kingly office of Christ, as executed spiritually upon the souls of the Redeemed, and (2) the kingly office of Christ as providentially executed for the Redeemed." The first is based on 2 Cor. 10:5, supposed to be especially confirmed by Luke 17:20, 21. He has, over against the express covenant that specifies with distinctness the throne to be occupied by Jesus, Christ's throne in the hearts of believers. The second is derived from Eph. 1:22 (a present realization being taken for granted), which is supported by an appeal to the Divine Sovereignty. Two things are noticeable in Flavel's ignoring of covenant and covenant promises: (1) the means are confounded with the end, and (2) without any regard to the context of passages, or to their reference to time (dispensation), they are quoted as applicable to his spiritualistic theory. Many writers, of usefulness and piety, follow the same illogical and unscriptural view of the kingdom.

Obs. 5. What Lange (Com. p. 268) observes in reference to the miracles of Christ, that "the distinction between the economy of the Father and of the Son must ever be kept in mind," is especially necessary in the study of this Kingdom; otherwise we will be led to a confusion of ideas and to palpable contradictions. There are some things which essentially belong to Jesus as the Son of God, as One with God; and there are other things which appertain to Him as "the Christ," the Divine-human. Two extremes are to be avoided: on the one hand to lay all stress on the Divine, and making, in this Kingdom, the human too subordinate; and on the other hand pressing the human to the exclusion of the Divine. Both are firmly and eternally united, and the very revelation of the Son of Man, as David's Son, will necessarily be an attestation to His divinity in the works that He will do, in the power that He will exercise, and in the relation that He sustains to the universe. The last feature is illustrated as given in Jno. 3:13 (comp. 6:62, and 17:5), where, according to some commentators (as Barnes, Lange, etc.), Jesus speaks of Himself as being in heaven at the very time He was also on earth speaking to Nicodemus (two ancient MSS. according to Tischendorf's N. Test. the S. and C. omit "which is in heaven"). Thus also when again present on earth, taking the Kingdom as Son of Man, this does not forbid His being, through the all-pervading attributes ascribed to Him, in heaven or in any part of the universe. These are deep things, and we must speak of them after the manner of man.

For we are not of those who think that the Person of Christ can be fully explained. He portrays Himself as a mystery, connected with the incomprehensible, revealed only to a few, and then only in some of His features. Much pertaining to Christ is still unknown, and has been the subject of controversy and impotent discussion. Hence the author has little sympathy with a class of writers who, in their exactness to define the Person of Christ rush to opposite extremes: the one party, while acknowledging the union of the divine-human, have the human completely absorbed in the divine; the other with equal preciseness making all human. Others receive, justly, all that is recorded, and therefore cleave to Jesus as "the Christ," being constituted such by a permanent union of the divine-human, both existing in ever-enduring harmony. Man is himself, in some respects, a mystery, and so long as it has been found impracticable to explain man (as e.g. union of soul and body) consistently and satisfactorily, it would be better (as indicative of modesty) to avoid attempting an accurate explanation of "the Christ." It is painful to read the varied and contradictory statements given in the writings of fallible men concerning Him, who, in the very nature of the case, being man and above man—man united with the Divine Mystery (God, the Incomprehensible)—is in a higher sense beyond our comprehension. We must rest satisfied with the description given of Him in the Word (which some writers portray with force and depth), without attempting to explain what the Bible has left indefinite and unknown.

Obs. 6. As if purposely to guard us against the error which is so largely prevalent, the phrase "Son of God" is not employed in direct connection with the Kingdom of heaven to be set up on earth. Indeed, our argument thus far indicates that such a declaration, as e.g. that the Kingdom is given to Jesus in view of His being the Son of God, would be utterly opposed to the Abrahamic-Davidic covenant, for it would virtually then be saying that God gives the Kingdom to God, phraseology so hostile to propriety that the Spirit avoids it (comp. Props. 82, 83, 84). The correspondence thus happily maintained between the requirements of the covenant (and that which is inherent with God) and the language of the New Test., is one of those indirect, but really powerful, proofs of the inspiration of the Word. The student is directed to a few peculiarities connected with this phrase. It is used, for instance, to denote the power, divine or miraculous, which was lodged in Him because of His relationship with the Father, as in Matt. 4 : 3, and 8 : 29, and 14 : 33 ; Mark 3 : 11, and 5 : 7 ; Luke 4 : 41 ; Jno. 10 : 36, and 11 : 4, etc. Jesus Himself clearly makes a designed difference between the two phrases, as in Matt. 26 : 63, 64. The High Priest uses the one, asking "whether Thou be the Christ, the Son of God?" Jesus, purposely to identify Himself with the covenants and the prediction of Daniel, employs in His answer the other, the "Son of Man." The delicate propriety, the beautiful consistency underlying this, stamps the Record as true and divine. The same is the case in John 1 : 49-51 ; for when Nathanael "saith unto Him, Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God ; Thou art the King of Israel," Jesus, with exquisite tact, silently acceding to the title thus given to Him, directs his attention to the title which specifically (see Prop. 81) belongs to Him as the King of Israel by styling Himself "the Son of Man" in the "hereafter." Uninspired men could not have kept up such a considerate and wonderful unity. This is preserved even in cases where a work (as e.g. the resurrection) is said to be done by Christ, which human power alone could not perform. Thus in John 5 : 25, where it is said that the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, He immediately adds, in order to avoid misapprehension, "and hath given Him authority to execute judgment also ; because He is the Son of Man." Miraculous, creative, divine power is lodged in Him because He is the Son of God ; but Judgeship, the revelation of Kingship—for He judges as King—appertains to Him "because He is the Son of Man." This change of title, this precise and guarded manner of expressing it, is sustained by the most weighty reasons. The predicate "Son of God" is given to show His ability to save, that requisite power is united with the human, as in Rom. 1 : 4 ; Heb. 4 : 14 ; 1 Jno. 3 : 8, etc. The predicate "Son of Man" is bestowed to identify Him as truly coming in the covenanted and Theocratic order.

The tendency of many Theologians is to exalt the divinity of Jesus to the almost total exclusion of the humanity, just as if the latter had performed its function and was not destined to remain in the future an important and essential factor in Redemption. So much is the latter ignored in the absorbing interest attached to the former, that its due relationship to covenants, to the purposes of salvation, to the Theocratic ordering, and to the history of the human race, is not observed. How often do we read expressions which ascribe the Kingdom of promise to "the Son of God" owing to the divine nature in Him, and arguments are plentifully adduced to prove that it must be so because of His Omnipotence, etc., while the real ground of the Kingdom being bestowed upon Him as "the Christ" is very differently represented in the covenant and by the prophets, viz. : the relationship of Jesus to David as the covenanted seed ; a relationship sustained, elevated, made rich in blessing, fruitful in honor and glory by the union of the divine. It is wrong, therefore, to estimate the human so lowly in the light of the divine, as almost to set it aside as if no particular value was to be placed on the same. Reuss (Introd., p. 16, His. Ch. Theol.), after saying that "God has no history," gravely asserts : "Any one who undertakes seriously, and without playing on words, to write a life of Jesus, by that very fact, and whatever may be the result of his labors, steps out of the strict enclosure of orthodoxy." Reuss forgets that Jesus is the Son of David as well as the Son of God, and that while the divine element, abstractly considered, cannot be limited by history, the Divine-human, the Christ, properly estimated from the Incarnation, has a history which must comport with the covenants and prophecies ; and that such a history, now and when completed in the age to come, is a vindication of the faithfulness of God, etc. A history, if now necessarily incomplete, is a sequence of covenant and prophecy.

Obs. 7. The Divine has elevated the human, held in conjunction for the pre-ordained Theocratic rule, to the Father's throne, i.e. "the Christ," the Divine-Human united in one Person is "set down with my Father in His throne," and that in virtue of His overcoming. Hence all power is lodged in Him both in heaven and in earth; He is exalted at the right hand of God; He is made "both Lord and Christ." This insures the ultimate fulfilment of the Christship—for the Divine Sovereignty thus linked by the union of the fulness of the Godhead bodily with the Man Jesus shows that through "this Man" (as Paul calls Him) the Theocratic arrangement in the Davidic line, indicated by His being "the Christ," will be carried out, and that thus God, in and through Him, will reign in the desired capacity of earthly Ruler over humanity. The present exaltation of Jesus, the resultant of His being esteemed worthy of the covenanted Theocratic position, is founded (1) on the Divine Sovereignty pertaining to Him as Divine; (2) on the contemplated and determined Theocratic rule; (3) on the provisional measures instituted by and through Him, mediatory, intercessory, etc.; (4) on the honor and glory that appertains to Him both in virtue of what He is now, and of what He will yet be when manifested as "the Christ" in the covenanted office. Hence while immeasurably (Eph. 1: 21, 22) exalted, as becomes a Theocratic King who is to rule on earth as God through David's Son, yet distinguishing as the Bible does between His inherent Divine Sovereignty as God and the future manifestation of the God-Man as Theocratic King, He is represented in the latter capacity as waiting, "expecting till His enemies shall be made His footstool," etc.

This expectant position of "that man, whom God hath ordained to judge the world" (Acts 17: 31), will be fully developed as the argument advances. Let it only be said, that believers rob themselves of much comfort and sustaining hope when only looking at the Divine they forget the exceeding preciousness contained in the sublime fact that a man, David's Son, is exalted above all dominion and power, thus unmistakably insuring the fulfilment of covenanted promises. The surety is thus given that the oath-bound covenant—which contains the blessings that a sin-cursed world requires—will inevitably be realized in every particular. The Davidic line, in which the Theocratic ordering runs, thus exalted in the Person of the promised seed, is a pledge given that "the sure mercies of David" will be abundantly verified at the time appointed by the Father. It is well too in this discussion to keep constantly in view that "the Christ," in His exaltation, at present sustains to us the relationship of Mediator, Intercessor, and Advocate. Mercy and forbearance are characteristic of His waiting and expecting position now; mercy and wrath of His Sec. Coming.

In Rev. 3: 21, Jesus is represented as in His Father's throne. This in "the Christ" results from virtue of the acceptance of His sacrificial work, His dignity as the intended Theocratic King, and the union of the Divine with him. But while thus exalted, the special manifestation of the humanity in its own right as Theocratic, is reserved (for reasons that will hereafter appear) for the future. This is manifest even in the passage itself where two thrones are spoken of, viz.: His own throne—His by covenanted legal right as "the Man ordained," and His Father's throne, His also because of His Divine relationship. Attention is directed to this, in order that a due discrimination may be made between what pertains to the general Sovereignty of the third heaven, and what relates to the special Theocratic rule here on earth, and which alone is exhibited in and through "the Man." Overlooking this, Waggoner (Ref. of Age) makes this reign of Christ on the throne of the Universe the one that he resigns, 1 Cor. 15: 24. But this cannot be so, seeing that God ruling as a Theocratic King does not necessitate the relinquishment of the other (Obs. 3), that Jesus acting as Theocratic King never gives up the oneness with the Father or the fulness of the Godhead, that the Sovereignty inherent to His Divinity ever remains unimpaired, that no honor or power, or exaltation belonging to the Christ shall ever be diminished. The mistake arises from two things: (1) forgetting that God, without yielding other rights, etc., can act in the capacity of Theocratic King, and (2) misapprehending 1 Cor. 15: 24.

Obs. 8. We do not lessen or lower the exaltation or power, or divinity, or glory of Christ, in thus referring the predictions and promises of the Kingdom covenanted to David's Son to an outward manifestation still future. (Comp. Prop. 203). Instead of detracting from Him, we exalt Him as high as the Record honors Him, seeing that we accept of its Divine utterances just as we find them, feeling assured that the literal fulfilment of the covenant itself in the Theocratic ordering will only the more clearly vindicate the foundation upon which it rests, viz.: Divine Sovereignty as exhibited in a special Plan of Redemption realized in all its fulness. Therefore we gladly receive the declaration that "all power in heaven and on earth is given to Me;" that He is above all earthly kings; that all things are subject to Him; that He can do all things in behalf of His people, etc.; but we add to all this, precisely what the Bible adds, that, aside from His Divine nature, we do not yet see "the Christ" as "the Son of Man" openly exercise this power, outwardly manifest this exaltation, visibly bring all things into subjection, and here on the earth perform all things that are promised. So far as the Kingdom pertaining to the Son of David is concerned, some things, and those too relating to the very re-establishment of it, are held in abeyance (as will be shown), until a certain period has arrived. By this faith, we honor "the Christ;" for in this way our belief is expressed that He will yet fulfil the precious covenants and the predictions of the prophets, just as they read; we evince our confidence that He is worthy, as David's Son, to receive what is directly promised to Him, and to which He is entitled, His inheritance, throne and Kingdom; we express our trust that He, thus reigning in a special and triumphant Theocratic manner, will perfect Redemption, not from a part but from the whole of the curse; we glorify Him in exhibiting His own faithfulness in Salvation, crowned as it will be by His promised Theocratic rule as "the Christ," showing forth the union of the human with the divine in the most conspicuous, honorable manner here on earth (comp. Props. 200, 201, and 204).

PROPOSITION 81. This Kingdom, thus covenanted, belongs to Jesus as "the Son of Man."

The Kingdom is primarily and exclusively (i. e. by covenant and prophecy) promised to the Son of David, although intimations are given (as e.g. in David's Son and David's Lord, and also in the perfect Theocracy instituted, etc.) that the Divine shall be united with that Son. We have only to refer to the Davidic Covenant where this is distinctly announced. Upon this Covenant is based the promise, repeated by the prophets, that the descendant of David should reign; and from the same, and its relation to humanity, arises the distinctive title "Son of Man." The kingdom, therefore, is pointed in harmony with covenant and promise, predicted as bestowed upon "the Son of Man," as e.g. Dan. 7 : 13. Hence, too, when Peter preaches his first sermon (Acts 2 : 30) he in the same strain declares "that God had sworn with an oath to him (i.e. David), that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, He would raise up Christ to sit on his throne."

Obs. 1. It is not our purpose to enter into a detailed account of the doctrine pertaining to the divine and human natures in Christ. Able writers (as Neander, Lange, Dorner, Hengstenberg, etc.) have done this, showing that both are necessary to constitute the Saviour, "the Christ." The Infinite and the Finite, the God and the Man, the Absolute and the Relative, are united in this the most astonishing of all unions. We dare not separate what God has joined, and we declare, (1) that such a union is perpetual, and (2) that its foundation—overlooked by many writers—is in the Theocratic Plan as purposed (comp. Prop. 199). But while this is so, our argument, in accord with the expressed Divine Purpose, makes much of the human nature and the important part it is yet to take in Redemption.

This union of the divine and human has been the battle-field between faith and false philosophy, revelation and proud reason. This great truth, one of the most profound and essential, has been, for the last years, the centre of strife between its foes and its friends. Work after work levelled against the divine in Christ has been issued and hailed with delight by unbelievers, while believers have sent forth an equal number in defence of the same. But in this contest, while the divine and human are both acknowledged by the Christian party, it must be sadly confessed that, in the effort to exalt the divine, too little stress has been laid on the human. It seems to be taken for granted, that the human, having accomplished its mission on the cross, is swallowed up in the divine; that its sole work is finished, and that it was no longer necessary to continue and carry out the Plan of the Divine economy. Now contrary to all this, the early church faith, while conjoining the divine with the human and making the former the supporter and ennobler of the latter, insists upon the human maintaining its distinctive and enduring relationship in the Christship of Jesus. It is to be lamented that able works written in defence of the Divinity of Jesus entirely overlook the strong argument derived in favor of the same by the relationship that the Humanity of Jesus sustains to the Theocratic order. A Theocratic King, if ruling as covenanted, must be both Man and God. While we may not run to the extreme of Robertson (Frederick, as quoted by Cobbe in Darwinism in Morals), saying "only a human God and none other must be adored by man," yet it is true that the incorporation of the Davidic line into the Theocratic order contemplates the manifestation of God in and through humanity as found in the predicted Son of David, so that he who beholds this Son sees the Father also, and this owing to the Theocratic position and relationship of the same. Hence justice to "the Christ," in any life of His, ought to show the requisite union of the Divine and Human in the Theocratic Plan, and, therefore, lay great stress upon the coming revelation of these essential factors.

Obs. 2. Various reasons are assigned by theologians for the use of this phrase "the Son of Man," a favorite with Jesus, such as its reference to the incarnation, to His relationship with man, to His being the predicted man, to his special peculiarity of personality, to His humiliation, condescension, and lowliness, to His being the ideal or representative man, etc. Now whatever of truth may be attached to any of these, the true reason for its usage appears to be the following: it is the peculiar, distinctive, predicted name of the Messiah given to Him in virtue of His covenanted relationship to the Kingdom. This is clearly seen, (1) by the covenant designating the Man, pre-eminently, of the seed of David to whom the Kingdom rightfully belongs; (2) by the fact that the Kingdom is promised to such an one in the way of identification and realization by David and others, and hence is, and properly must be, adopted by Jesus; (3) by the invariable linking of the name with the reception of the Kingdom by Jesus Himself, as e.g. Matt. 25:31-34; Matt. 16:27, 28, etc.; (4) by the remarkable—but too much overlooked—scriptural fact, that the Kingdom, when specifically promised, is always promised to the humanity of Jesus, i.e. to Him as "the Son of Man," and not to His Divine nature, i.e. to Him as "the Son of God." This naturally results from the covenant specifying Him as the Son of David to whom alone the Kingdom is promised. Of course, as the Kingdom is also God's, being a Theocracy, the Divine is united with this inheriting, but for the purpose of identification and consistency with solemn covenant declarations, Jesus selects the very title which accords with both covenant and prophecy, and which most directly indicates His covenant connection with the Kingdom itself. The reader is only reminded that it is so far sweeping in its range that it also embraces, aside from the distinctive reference to the seedship of Abraham and David (indicative of covenanted relationship to the Kingdom), a second headship of the human family in the person of a Second Adam, made such by the Redemptive process.

This interesting subject urges us to say something more respecting the opinions that are usually entertained concerning the phrase. These are far from being satisfactory, seeing that they do not meet the requirements of its usage and the connection it sustains to covenant and prediction. Thus e.g. to say (1) as Oosterzee (Ch. Dog., vol. 2, p. 528), that "the name Son of man" is a "figurative indication of the Messianic dignity," seeing that it is a real indication of the same, i.e. a real coming of such an one, based on the covenant with David. (2) That the name simply denotes the human nature of Christ is not sufficient, because it was not necessary to assume such a title to prove that He had a human body, but it was requisite to identify Him as the specific Man intended by the covenant. Dr. Campbell (Diss. on the Gospels) remarks, that the phrase meant that the Messiah "would be human, not an angelical, or any other being; for in the Oriental idiom, Son of Man and man are equivalent." This is only part of the truth; He was indeed human, a man, but He assumed the title because the covenant demands a man derived from the lineage of David, and this man promised is already designated by David (Ps. 80:17), and by Daniel (7:13), hence if Jesus is indeed the predicted promised One, it becomes Him to assume the name previously given to Him to distinguish

Him as the intended One from all other men. (3) Fairbairn indorses Campbell's view, but thinks that to it should be added the idea of a Divine Man, as it was in "the Son of man" that God was to appear to raise up man from his fallen condition, etc. Now while rejoicing in the divinity of the Man Jesus, and regarding it as a grand essential in the work of Redemption, yet planting ourselves firmly on the covenant and the development of it as presented by the prophets, it will be found that the phrase is not used to designate the divine nature of Christ, but His descent from David and His being the designated, pre-ordained One to whom the Kingdom, by virtue of such descent, rightfully belongs. It is freely admitted that with it can be associated other things, as His relationship to man and even to God, but logically the ground of the title lies in the covenant. (4) Some tell us that the name is to be taken in a typical sense; but that no type is intended is evident from the terms of the covenant, the birth of Jesus, the direct application of the name, and the future continued reception of the title. It indicates at His birth, in His life, at His Second Coming, a particular Man, i.e. the Son of David to whom the Kingdom is promised. (5) Others inform us that the name was "a mere periphrasis of the personal pronoun," but this is disproved by the use made of it by Stephen (Acts 7 : 56), by Daniel, David, and Jesus Himself. (6) Some declare that the name is only applied to a temporary humiliation, but that this is erroneous follows from His retaining the title in connection with His glorified and Kingly state (as seen e.g. Matt. 25 : 31; Mark 13 : 26, etc.). In this connection the strange utterance of Oosterzee (Theol. N. Test., p. 75) may be quoted: "It (i.e. Son of Man) is nothing else than the allegorical designation of the Messiah in His lowly appearance on earth, derived from the vision of the prophet Daniel 7 : 13, 14." Having sufficiently answered this unauthorized interpretation, it may be well to add, that Daniel, in the passage designated, does not speak of humiliation, but of exaltation, and with the period of Christ's highest glory the title is associated as various Scriptures testify. (7) Others merely find that it was assumed to identify Him as the predicted One, regarding it as an accommodation. But it is more than this: a permanent reality, and ever remaining such, as the Divine Purpose indicates in Christ's greatest exaltation. (8) We are gravely told by one writer that the title was chosen as the lowest to manifest His humility, and to prevent His disciples from being overawed by His majesty. This, in view of the continued use of the title at the Sec. Advent, etc., presents an exceeding low estimate of the name and its preciousness. (9) A favorite notion prevails that it was significant of His being "the model man," "the representative man," "the ideal of humanity," etc. Whatever of truth there may be in the abstract in such representations, they are too one-sided to embrace its full meaning and entirely overlook its covenanted relationship to the Kingdom. Various other meanings, differing but slightly from those given, are presented by authors, and we may conclude by saying, that while the name embraces in its comprehensive meaning allusions to the Incarnation, the Messiahship, the covenanted relationship, and an affinity to humanity as the Second Adam, yet, in virtue of His being the covenanted Man or Son of David, its meaning reaches far beyond the present into the future, indicating the future conjoining and manifestation of the covenanted Son of Man and His Kingdom. These two are inseparable, and the one suggests the other. Hence it is incorrect to say, as an eminent writer does, that we are not to "seek the explanation of this name in any views bearing on the future." To confine the name to His First Advent or to this dispensation, is to limit it within unauthorized bounds, for Jesus repeatedly shows that this name stands allied with, and most intimately related to, His final Advent and the revelation of His Kingdom. Van Oosterzee, in his Art. "The Son of Man" (Princeton Review, July, 1878), accurately says, what we also must not overlook, that the very assumption of this name, whatever the intention, evidences—as no other man assumed it as a significant title—that "He was conscious of being originally and essentially different from man, and infinitely more." This is true, but to it we must add, that Omniscience gave Him this very title in the covenanted line and Theocratic Purpose, seeing that in Him, as David's Son, God—the Divine—would thus draw nigh to man in man. Fausset (Com. Ezek. 2 : 1 and Dan. 7 : 13) says, the "title, as applied to the Messiah, implies at once His lowliness and His exaltation in His manifestations as the Representative Man at His First and Sec. Comings respectively." Whatever of truth in this, it does not sufficiently express the covenanted and predicted Theocratic relationship. (Comp. Dr. Schaff's "Excursus on the Meaning of the Title 'The Son of Man'" in Lange's Com. John, p. 98; much of which we can incorporate with our view.)

Obs. 3. The manner in which Jesus employs this name is strongly corroborative and enforcive of our line of argument. In the use of it Jesus speaks of Himself as of a third person instead of employing the pronominal or customary personal application. Writers say that this is a more intensive, dignified, majestic form of speaking, but Judge Jones (Notes on Matt. 16 : 27) comes the nearest to the truth when he writes : " Our God uses this form of designation as a titular distinction to denote His relation to this world as its Sovereign or Lord"—to which is to be added, in order to bring out the whole truth, that the same is founded on His covenanted relationship as the Son of David to whom David's throne and Kingdom (i.e. the Theocracy), and through the latter a world-dominion, is promised. It embraces then in its meaning the personal King to whom the Kingdom belongs, the perfected Redeemer and perfected Redemption through Him in accordance with covenanted promises, the exaltation of humanity and its intimate union with the Divine as intimated in the covenants, and, therefore, is a name that will never be laid aside, but continues forever perpetuated as most significant, descriptive, and real. For, in alliance with it is derived, as God has sworn, the salvation of mankind, not in prospect or in progress but completed, and, hence appropriately, the name is not merely applied to the incarnate Jesus but to the glorified Christ. If this were not so, a serious defect, vitiating our entire argument, would be found, but with it unity and an essential factor is astonishingly preserved.

With some surprise, we find even Renan (Life of Jesus, p. 144, who notices that the title "Son of Man" occurs eighty-four times in the Gospels, and always in the discourses of Jesus) saying : " But He is never thus addressed, doubtless because the name in question could be more fully accorded to Him only at the period of His Sec. Coming." This is true, for applicable as the name was to Jesus at His First Advent, yet it is pre-eminently so at His Sec. Advent, and the decisive proof is, that He Himself repeatedly and constantly thus refers it, making the future coming in power and glory in the establishment of the Kingdom the emphatic coming of the Son of Man (as e.g. Matt. 16 : 27 ; 26 : 64 ; 25 : 31 ; 19 : 28 ; Mark 8 : 38 ; 13 : 26 ; Luke 9 : 26 ; 21 : 27 ; John 5 : 27, etc.). The covenant promises demand this, and our faith in the covenant is strengthened by the significant phraseology of Christ. As already intimated, the God ruling in a Theocracy is taken for granted as fundamental to the idea of a Theocracy (hence even the Jews, as in the case of the high priest, looked for "the Son of God" to come and reign), therefore the phrase "the Son of God" is omitted and the phrase "the Son of Man" is substituted for the reasons assigned, thus giving us, if we will but receive it, the idea of God ruling in and through humanity. Dr. Schaff (The Person of Christ), therefore, correctly makes the title "Son of Man" one of elevation, dignity, instead of one of humiliation (so also Trench on The Parables, Nevin, and many others). This enables us also to appreciate the perversion of the title by others, as e.g. that it denoted (Amner) the Roman Republic, or (Grotius) the Fifth Kingdom, or (Berg) the United States, etc.

Obs. 4. The most fruitful source of misinterpreting this Kingdom arises from not discriminating to whom this Kingdom is specially promised. According to the covenant—and this must necessarily be the basis of a correct Scriptural representation—it is promised to the Son of David, the Son of Man. Not noticing this simple fact, leads to grave misapprehension. Many authors (as e.g. Priest, in Intro. to View of Mill.) assert that Jesus Christ now reigns in virtue of His Divinity and attributes as God, and, therefore, we are to expect no other reign. But this is a confounding of things that differ (comp. Props. 79, 80). No one refuses to believe in the Sovereignty of God as God, but this is materially different from a reign which is to be manifested in and through a Son of Man in a purely Theocratic manner, i.e. God in and through David's Son conde*scending to act in the capacity of an earthly Ruler*, which is the primary and true meaning of a Theocratic ordering as once witnessed and as covenanted. This Theocracy is given to this Son of Man (Prop. 83), and the reign is manifested through the glorified Son of David. Let it be repeated: it is not the Divine Sonship that constitutes "the Christ" (although an essential element), and it is not the Davidic Sonship that constitutes Him "the Messiah" (although essentially requisite), but it is the two inseparably united that makes Him "the Christ." Now while this is so, the covenant and prophecies, in view of the incorporation of the Davidic line in the contemplated and purposed Theocratic Kingdom, point out the Man, in and through whom this rule shall be manifested. Thus we have (1) the Son of Man, as presented by covenant the central figure; (2) with this Son of Man is united the Divine to insure a pure and perpetual Theocratic rule; (3) this reign being Theocratic, and under a manifested Son of Man, is diverse from the general Sovereignty of God; (4) that to encourage our faith in the covenanted Theocracy stress is laid on the future coming and reign of "the Son of Man."

It is, therefore, a distinctive title, constantly having a fixed, determined meaning, and not, as our opponents assert, susceptible of a variable or indefinite meaning. Thus e.g. Alexander (Com. on Matt. 10 : 23) overlooked this personal title, and pronounces the expression "till the Son of Man be come," "an indefinite expression meaning sometimes more and sometimes less, but here equivalent to saying, 'till the object of your mission is accomplished.'" And in the same comment, he makes it equivalent to "the Kingdom (i.e. the Church) of Messiah finally established." The simple fact is this: the phrase "Son of Man," in its covenanted sense, does not fit into a spiritualistic system, and hence arises the various and conflicting senses applied to it, making it to denote more or less by way of accommodation. The Pre-Mill. doctrine alone gives it one determined and continuous meaning, and consistently preserves it throughout. One of the most repulsive and unscriptural statements, given (Introd.) under the plea of "the illuminating power of the Holy Ghost," is Swormstedt's (The End of the World is Near, ch. 6.) who, in his astounding interpretation of Rev. 12, makes (p. 78-9) the man-child to be the Second Adam born at the time of the marriage of the glorified church, and this birth consists in the separation of the union of the Divine and human natures! We give his idea thus: "The divine purposes, for which the two natures of God and man were united in the person of Jesus, viz.: the atonement, and intercession, and the perfecting the Second Adam, the seed of Abraham, having been accomplished at the moment the man-child is born, the mysterious union of the human and divine natures existing in the person of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is terminated then, and the glorified spiritual man, who is the Second Adam, stands forth before the glorified church, separate and distinct from the Godhead." This is monstrous! evidencing but little knowledge of the Person of a Messiah, the Theocratic idea, the Second Adamship, the perpetuity of the Christ and of His Divine glory, the unchangeableness of Jesus. It is derogatory and dishonoring.

Obs. 5. The Theocracy is promised to this Son of Man, and this teaches us to anticipate two things. (1) The Theocracy is a visible, outward Kingdom. Now indeed overthrown, but its restoration promised under this "Son of Man," and so openly, so visibly that all flesh shall realize and acknowledge it. It is predicated of this Son of Man, that at His. Sec. Coming, He shall, through the power committed unto Him, overthrow His enemies and firmly re-establish the downfallen Theocratic Kingdom, and exhibit in an outward rule, an external organized form, the full realization of the Theocratic idea. (2) The very phrase "the Son of Man" implies and necessitates the visibility of His Coming and reign; to spiritualize it away destroys both its covenanted force and the fulfilment of covenant promise. Luther on this name, in his Dis. on Luke 21 : 25-27, remarks : " But, as He says, it is ' The Son of Man ' whom they shall see, it is clearly expressed that it is a bodily coming and a bodily seeing, in a bodily form, though it shall be in great power," etc. Luther is correct, for unless the Son of David comes thus to reign (glorified as to humanity), the covenant cannot be fulfilled, and the Theocracy cannot be established (comp. Props. 121 and 122).

A number of interesting features connected as results from the Kingdom being that of " the Son of Man," must be left for future consideration, such as the decided indication of a personal reign, as the early churches held, the suitableness and grandeur of the view that the Son of Man should in His glorified humanity exhibit His promised sovereignty in the very place where He lived in humiliation, suffered, and died, the elevation of humanity in and through Him, etc. Some of the views held on this point present a sad commentary of human infirmity, which thinks to improve covenanted and oath-bound language by spiritualizing it, making it to mean something very different from the expressed grammatical sense.

Obs. 6. " The Son of Man" is fully identified with the re-establishment of the Davidic throne and Kingdom by covenant and promise. In view of this, therefore, it was eminently proper for Jesus to employ this phrase in the manner recorded. If the reader turns to Psl. 80, he will find David referring to the elect Jewish nation brought out of Egypt, with whom God is angry so that it is overthrown and placed in the hands of the heathen. Imploring the Divine interposition and recalling the covenanted promises, he prays with faith and hope in the future restoration of the nation : " Let Thy hand be upon the Man of Thy right hand, upon the Son of Man whom Thou madest strong for Thyself."

To indicate how this idea of " the Son of man" was held by the Jews, we quote the following from the " Parables of Enoch," c. 46 : 1, 2 : " And then I saw one who had a head of days (i.e. was old, the Ancient of Days), and His head was white as wool, and with Him was another whose face was like the appearance of a man ; full of agreeableness was his face like that of the holy angels. And I asked one of the angels who went with me, who showed me all the secret things concerning the Son of man, who He was, and whence He was, and why He came with that head of days. And he answered and said to me, This is the Son of man who has righteousness, with whom righteousness dwells, and who will reveal all the treasures of secrecy, because the Lord of Spirits (God) has chosen Him. . . . And this Son of man, whom thou hast seen, will arouse the kings and the mighty from their couches and the powerful from their thrones, and will loosen the bonds of the mighty and break the teeth of sinners." He is also called " the Chosen One," the " Just One," and the " Anointed." In ch. 48 : 3, a pre-existence of the Messiah is asserted, and in ch. 2 : 7, it is said : " For previously the Son of man was hidden, and the Most High God preserved Him before His power, and revealed Him to the chosen ones." As to our application to the Messiah of Ps. 80, compare e.g. Alexander Com. loci, and Acts 5 : 31.

Obs. 7. Hence at the Sec. Advent there must be, in order to fulfil the oath-bound covenant made with David (viz. : that one " according to the flesh" must be raised up to sit on the restored Theocratic throne), a real, veritable Son of David. The humanity, glorified as it may be, cannot be ignored ; it is an essential factor in the Theocratic ordering. Therefore the coming of " the Christ" is represented as the Coming of " the Son of Man," i.e. a coming in the very humanity assumed under covenanted relationship.

Various writers (comp. e.g. Alford, Lillie, Braune (Lange's Com.), Ger. Ver., etc., render 2 John 7 " is coming in the flesh," i.e. is coming in humanity, referring it to the Sec. Advent, while 1 John 4 : 2 " hath come in the flesh" is interpreted of the First Advent. However this may be, the coming of humanity in glory is a result of the first coming in humiliation; and the one is just as reasonable and essential as the other. The Divine Plan requires both to effect the grand consummation. Even some of the apocryphal books do not rid themselves of this view. Thus e.g. in the Test. of the Twelve Patriarchs (Sec. Cent.), the reign is attached to the humanity without discarding the Divine: "The Lord God, the Mighty One of Israel, shall appear upon earth as man." The book of Enoch also employs the phrase "Son of Man." Martensen, Oosterzee, and many others have properly insisted upon the fact that the individuality of Christ must be so maintained that "even a glorified individuality, a spiritual body, cannot be conceived of, without limitations," otherwise "we are in danger of that error, which has so often appeared among mystics and Theosophists, which loses sight of a personal Christ in the general life of the Godhead; of the Christ of grace and salvation, in a pantheistic Christ of nature" (so Martensen). But if we were to assign a firm reason for such a view, it is found in the simple fact that covenant and prophecy, indicative of God's purpose, in their still future fulfilment imperatively demand it.

Obs. 8. The critical reader will not fail to notice that the Incarnation is a covenanted necessity, and that it forms a fundamental part of our system of faith; for without it the fulfilment of covenant promises would be impossible.

This doctrine, therefore, enforces the view of Dr. Dörner and others, of the necessity of the Incarnation, even apart from the fall. This we derive from the Theocratic ordering, by which the purest and firmest rule, theocratically, can be inaugurated and permanently secured. Again: while many systems make the Incarnation a central point in Theology, they either apply it mystically (as e.g. a present assimilating of the man into the Divine, as the Divine took upon itself man's nature and transformed it, etc.), or else they virtually end its career as a still working factor in the Plan of Redemption from the death on the cross, or have it so overshadowed and absorbed by Deity that in the future it presents no special prominence as a leading characteristic of the Kingdom. Firmly holding to the covenant, and the promises based thereupon, many views, extensively prevailing and imbedded in the faith of multitudes, must be discarded as both derogatory to "the Christ" in His future manifestation as "the Son of Man," and to the oath-confirmed covenant of God that positively requires this revelation of the Humanity of the King. It is not only Schwenkfeld (Kurtz's Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 155) that has the "human nature absorbed by the divine," but many have the same in a kind of pious mystical Pantheism, by which they think to exalt the Divine at the expense of the human, urged to it by the old, old gnostic feeling respecting matter. The Incarnation, so necessary and exceedingly precious, introduces us to the personality of "the Christ," as promised; it is provisional for the contemplated end. On the other hand, the "Turneyites" (The Ch. Lamp) hold that Jesus is not a true descendant of David's, not truly of his lineage, being "of the seed of David" but not "the seed of David," hence not truly David's son, but only David's Lord. Now this is flatly opposed to the Davidic covenant, for he was not merely a man, separate and distinct, but he was to proceed from the loins of David, according to the flesh (supernaturally as Isaac), and hence is constantly and invariably recognized as David's Son. Again, Fiske (The Christ of Dogma, p. 125 of the Unseen World), without a particle of proof, and over against express usage (John 1:51; 3:13; 4:27; 13:31, etc.), asserts, that in the Gospel of John, "the title Son of Man has lost its original significance, and becomes synonymous with 'Son of God.'" He makes a number of similar unfounded remarks, indicative of a desire to find flaws when they do not exist. Unbelief parades, with evident relish, the ideas of incarnation as presented in some mythologies, in order, if possible, to weaken the Christian idea, but we accept of the same as expressing a need and longing of humanity, viz.: that God should manifest Himself to man in a form indicative of union and accessibility. Neander (Life of Christ, 2:12) makes some remarks in this direction, showing that these "cravings of the spirit" express the "wish, even though unconscious, to secure that union with God which alone can renew human nature, and which Christianity shows us is a living reality" (com. Dörner on the Person of Christ). The Ch. Incarnation is not an isolated fact, but results from a regular, revealed Divine Plan, as will hereafter be shown.

PROPOSITION 82. This Kingdom is a complete restoration in the person of the Second Adam or Man, of the dominion lost by the First Adam or Man.

The reign of Christ as "the Son of Man" points us back to the fall in which humanity was so sadly involved, and then forward to the period when humanity, through this manifestation of this Son of Man, is fully restored to the blessings forfeited by the fall. Among these blessings a right royal one is grounded in the developing Plan of Redemption, by which man shall again be restored to the dignity of dominion through Him, who by virtue of His relationship to the human in the covenanted line, has obtained the forfeited right originally granted to man, and which, as King on David's throne, will be most gloriously exerted, being sublimely and irresistibly aided by the Divine united with Him.

Obs. 1. What the dominion forfeited by sin was to be, is clearly announced, e.g. by the Psalmist and Paul. We leave others inform us of its meaning and extent. Thus e.g. Barnes (Com. Heb. 2 : 6) says it constituted man "Lord of all things," that "all things were placed under the control and jurisdiction of man," that "all things were subject to Him and all obeyed." Man was made a little lower than the angels, and was the undisputed Lord of the lower world," etc. Kurtz (Sac. His., p. 39), states, that "he (mān) is appointed to have dominion over nature, as the representative of God, and to conduct it to its highest development." "The powers of man were intended, agreeably to the divine appointment, to be engaged in exercising dominion over all the earth." So also (Secs. 9 and 11, "Bible and Astron.," His. of Old Cov.) he was to be "ruler of all creation, of its varied forces and creatures." "The commencement was to lead to the goal, man's dominion over the whole earth." Hodge (Sys. Div., vol. 2, p. 102) says: "God constituted him (man) ruler over the earth. He placed, as the Psalmist said, all things under his feet." "It was therefore as a ruler that he wore God's image, or represented Him on earth." "It was therefore an absolutely universal dominion, so far as creatures are concerned, with which man was invested." (Comp. Commentaries on Heb. 2 : 6, 7 ; Ps. 8 : 5-8.) These writers then tell us that, as the Scriptures affirm, this dominion was, in a great measure, lost, and that man, shorn of his power, could no longer act as the representative of God.

Such testimony, as the student well knows, could be endlessly multiplied, seeing that on this point there is a uniform teaching running from the Apostolic Fathers down, through the Reformers, to the present time. But alas ! while fully admitting the fact, thousands are utterly unprepared to receive the logical result which Redemption in its restorative process introduces as the goal intended. Consistency requires, that if we believe in perfect Redemption, then we also must accept of the legitimate result following as indicated in these pages, viz. : an actual, real restoration of the dominion forfeited, through the Messiah, and not some other dominion in the third heaven or universe substituted in its place. The forfeiture and the restoration must, logically and Scripturally, refer to the same. We append the pertinent statements of a recent writer, as illustrative of much that might be quoted. Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 308-9) says: "Man's original inheritance was a lordship or dominion, stretching over the whole earth." . . . "When he fell, he fell from his dominion," . . . "the inheritance departed from him; he was driven from Paradise, the throne and palace of his Kingdom." And then follows a vivid portrayal of how "Satan was permitted to enter and extend his usurped sway over the domain, from which man has been expelled as its proper lord," etc. But then he vitiates his own concessions by making, in various places, the promises of a restoration to this forfeited dominion typical of something else. Multitudes make it equivalent to a reign in the third heaven, and religious literature is full of such erroneous conclusions.

Obs. 2. In the next place, all Christian writers on the subject inform us that this dominion is restored to man again through Jesus Christ, the second Adam. But, with the exception of Millenarian writers, they somehow confine it to Jesus in His Divine Sovereignty, overlooking what they themselves assert respecting its being given to the Man Jesus, and ignoring the fact taught that this dominion is relegated from and through Him to His brethren (the co-heirs). Such spiritualize the dominion, and do not allow its ultimate realization in the very place where it was forfeited, i.e. they refuse to believe in man's restored dominion over the earth, and make thus an imperfect Redemption. We hold that, as Scripture plainly teaches, this dominion is restored through the Son of Man; that those who inherit with Him share in its exercise; that it is manifested here on earth (being a forfeited dominion pertaining only to the earth); and that thus completed Redemption is experienced.

To illustrate how writers, in no doctrinal sympathy with us, insist upon the restoration of this dominion in Jesus as man, we quote Barnes (Com. Heb. 2 : 6, comp. Stuart's Com. on Heb. and Eccurs. IX.) : "It was not true (v. 8) that all things were subject to Him, and the complete truth of that declaration would be found only in the jurisdiction conferred on the Messiah—the man by way of eminence—the incarnate Son of God." After showing that Paul's argument is based on man's losing the control or power originally given, which is restored in Christ, he adds : "It is found complete only in the second man, the Lord from heaven (1 Cor. 15 : 47), the Lord Jesus, to whom this control is absolutely given." It is true that some endeavor to weaken Paul's reasoning in favor of the restoration of this dominion, by making Ps. 8 refer to man in general, and that Paul employs the language only by way of illustration or accommodation. But to this we reply : (1) Paul directly applies the Ps. to Christ; (2) the spirit and intent of the Ps. contains more than is applicable to man in general; (3) the apostle teaches us that the Ps. is not yet fulfilled in the pre-eminent man, saying : "but now we see not yet all things put under Him;" (4) the abundant references in other places of a forfeited dominion and the same restored under the Messiah sustains this interpretation; (5) the incarnation and subsequent exaltation of Christ confirms the delineation thus given; (6) the dominion under the whole heaven given at a future period to this man and His associated saints, shows that Paul, under the Spirit's guidance, saw a force and depth in the predictions which alone can be realized in and through the Son of man. Hudson (Debt. and Grace, p. 6) correctly observes : "The passage (in Ps. 8) can only be explained as a prophecy of Christ. This is required by the true sense of one important word, and is so understood by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews." Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1. p. 313), after advocating that "the renovated earth" is "the ultimate inheritance of the heirs of salvation," remarks : "And of what else can we understand the representation in the 8th Ps., as interpreted by the pen of inspiration itself, in the Epis. to the Hebrews, 2 : 5-9, and 1 Cor. 15 : 27, 28? These passages in the N. T. put it beyond a doubt, that the idea of a perfect and universal dominion, delineated in the Ps. is to be realized in the world to come, over which Christ, as the head of redeemed humanity, is to rule, in company with His redeemed people." (So compare Dr. Moll, Lange's Com. Heb. p. 54-5.)

Obs. 3. This dominion, here on earth, will be exerted by Jesus, the Man, through the re-establishment of the Theocratic ordering. It is the restored Theocratic Davidic throne and Kingdom, in its organized and associated capacity, under the leadership of the covenanted King that constitutes the leverage for the exertion of this dominion. The saints, made like unto Christ and associated with Him in His power, largely participate in it, all nature being brought into subjection to them. Thus the Scriptures will be amply fulfilled.

Obs. 4. Hence, while this dominion is even now lodged in the Son of Man, yet it is held in abeyance until the period of its manifestation in and through this Kingdom. This has already been shown by various considerations, and will appear still more conclusively as we proceed. Therefore it is erroneous (as a multitude of writers, including Hodge, Barnes, etc., just quoted), to say that this dominion was fully attained and realized by the incarnation and the exaltation of the Son of God. It certainly belongs to Him; but we must leave the Scriptures to decide respecting its actual realization. From the Covenant thus far provisionally fulfilled, the most glorious portion remaining in a state of abeyance, we can already see that it is a wrong inference to suppose an existing realization when the same is related with the restored Theocratic Kingdom. So long as the Davidic tabernacle is in ruins, this dominion cannot and will not be exerted. The dominion is given to Him as "the Son of Man" (Jno. 5 : 27; Ps. 8 : 7; Heb. 2 : 6, etc.), and this at a pre-ordained time (next Prop.). He is constituted the absolute Lord over all because He is "the Son of Man;" but this dominion pertaining to Him as the promised seed, related both to God and man, He did not fully (only on some occasions to indicate His power), exercise while on earth; He does not now as "the Son of Man" put forth the power with which He is invested, for He has not yet been revealed as the King, the Judge, the Maker of all things new, the Repealer of the curse—we see not yet all things put under Him, and He is awaiting the time when His enemies shall be made His footstool. But the period of time is coming when this will be done, and the dominion, held in restraint for purposes of mercy and love, will be exhibited with God-like power and glory. As the Son of Man, the Second Adam, He becomes the Lord of the world, but that Lordship is not yet manifested, it remaining veiled until certain preparatory purposes are accomplished and the time arrives for its blessed appearance through the covenanted Theocratic-Davidic throne;—for just as at the First Advent by the Incarnation the Christ is brought into direct relationship with humanity and from thence sustains His covenanted position in this particular, so also at the Sec. Advent by the Incarnation, as continued in "the Son of Man," "the Christ," in the inherited throne and Kingdom, is brought into direct Theocratic relationship with humanity, and from this revealed position exerts His power in behalf of that humanity with which He is identified.

Man, during the past ages, has sought to recover this dominion unaided and through his own power, and the Word represents it as a struggling of "beasts" for sovereignty, resulting in a mutual rending and destruction. Is this picture true? Let history attest, with its constant wars, overthrow of states and kingdoms, man being the "prey of man," bloodshed and slaughter, murder and rebellion, etc. The Scriptures teach us that this Jesus, appointed for the express purpose, alone can, and will ultimately, restore it. In this connection the student will observe that this second headship in Christ restores the human family to its destined but forfeited Theocratic rulership or dominion, and, therefore, to confine this headship simply to relationship to man and salvation from sin (which it includes), is to leave out a specific and most precious blessing. (Comp. e.g. Props. 120, 202, 204, and 207.)

Obs. 5. It is only in the Millennial age, when this Theocratic Kingdom is established, that this forfeited dominion is fully restored. This is evident from the vivid descriptions, not only of the universal and absolute rule of Christ, but also of the dominion and glory of the saints. Hence this era must be preceded by the Coming of "the Son of Man" (Prop. 119-121).

Such a restored dominion involves, as a matter of course, the personal presence and rule of the Second Adam here on the earth, where the First Adam would have exerted it. It teaches us that it is not a dominion exercised in the third heaven, for it is one committed to man and pertains to this earth. It is not to be sought in this dispensation, for down to the very end wickedness will abound. It is not to be found in the Church as at present existing, for down to the Advent the believer himself is under the pressure of the curse. It is, therefore, future, and associated with "the appearing and Kingdom," and with "the world to come."

Obs. 6. If such an external, outward dominion is lacking in the history of the earth, then an important restitution is wanting, and we receive an imperfect Redemption; with its restoration we obtain an important element of perfected Salvation. Writers abundantly admit that this dominion would have been witnessed here on earth if Adam had not fallen, but somehow they overlook the fact, that as the Redeemer is given to recover us from all the effects of the fall, it must, under the auspices of the restoring Second Adam, again be witnessed on earth when Redemption is completed. Simple consistency, the perfection of Redemptive work, the efficiency and honor of the Redeemer, the ability of God to save and the worthiness of the Saviour—all require this restored dominion.

The prevailing view, derived from the Origenistic, limits this dominion to a present reign of Christ in heaven; but this, aside from other considerations, vitiates even their own representations of its original design, viz. : to be "representative of God on earth," "a ruling for God over all the earth," "a dominion exercised over all things, bringing nature into subjection," etc. Taking their views of the original grant, none of these things are witnessed here on the earth; the Ruler is in heaven, and not on the earth, His followers are suffering and chastened, His rights as "the Christ" are unacknowledged by multitudes, etc.

Obs. 7. This dominion, promised, predicted and restored, is corroborative of the Biblical account of man's noble origin and high destiny, forming quite a contrast to the ignoble theories of recent scientists. And may we not suggest, that as the period of this restoration draws near, the efforts that are so persistently made by able men to degrade the origin of man to the lowest scale, is not altogether one of chance or fortuitous circumstances, but to the student and believer have a deeper and more significant meaning—being in accordance with the predicted characteristic of the times just preceding the restitution.

What the Roman Catholic writer, Schlegel (Phil. of His., s. 1), says, in opposition to the idea of man's low origin, we, in view of the Divine unity of Purpose thus manifested, can repeat: "We may boldly answer, that man, on the contrary, was originally, and by the very constitution of his being, designed to be the lord of creation, and, though in a subordinate degree, the legitimate ruler of the earth and the world around him; the vicegerent of God in nature." God will not allow sin to triumph in the utter destruction of this grant, but will evince that grace in Jesus, the Christ, that will secure the victory in this, as well as in all other, respects. Tholuck (Com. Rom. 5: 12) produces a Jewish Rabbi, who remarks: "The secret of Adam is the secret of the Messiah," "As the first man was the one that sinned, so shall the Messiah be the one to do us away." (Comp. p. 55, Lange's Com. Heb.)

PROPOSITION 83. This Kingdom is given to the Son of Man by God, the Father.

This bestowal of the Kingdom to the Son of Man by the Father, is clearly and explicitly taught in the covenant. Hence in agreement with it, we have the language of Dan. 7 : 13, 14 ; Isa. 49 ; Luke, 22 : 29 and 1 : 32, etc. The Divine Sovereignty insures it unto Him.

Daniel (7 : 14) says that "there was given unto Him (the Son of man) dominion, and glory, and a Kingdom, that all people," etc. Luke (1 : 32) : "the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David," etc. (comp. Ps. 2 and 110, etc.). The Saviour Himself seems to refer to this fact in the Parable of the Ten Pounds (Luke 19 : 15), "that when he was returned, having received the Kingdom," etc. It may be added : in view of the angel announcing that "the Lord God shall give," we have "the Ancient of Days" (in Dan.) interpreted as the Father (for to make the Son of man and the Ancient of Days the same is both harsh and inconsistent with the analogy of the Word). Because of the Theocratic nature of the Kingdom, and the Father bestowing this Kingdom upon the Son of David, it is sometimes called (Matt. 26 : 29) the "Father's Kingdom" (Matt. 13 : 39-43), "the Kingdom of the Father," because in this Theocratic ordering the Father and the Christ are one, both are associated together as in Rev. 11 : 15, and 22 : 3 ; because of the covenanted relationship of Jesus, it is more frequently spoken of as His throne and Kingdom. The different aspects under which this Kingdom is represented because of its Theocratic nature—the Divine participating in and enforcing the rule of the humanity—already enforces the idea of the perpetuity of the Kingdom (comp. Prop. 159). While it is difficult to say, on grammatical grounds (so Winer, Olshausen, Com. loci), that in Tit. 2 : 13 the great God and the Saviour Jesus Christ refer to the same person, yet it may be said : (1) that if it does (to Jesus), as many maintain (e.g. Beza, Clem. Alex., Mack, Matthies, Whitby, Bull, Usteri, Olshausen, Wiesinger, Horne, Middleton, Barnea, Bloomfield, etc.), then is it verified in the Theocratic personage and position of Jesus, in and through whom the Father is manifested (see Prop. 200). (2) On the other hand, if it refers to two persons or subjects, the Father and the Son as many others declare (as Ambrose, Grotius, Wetstein, Heinrichs, De Wette, Channing, etc.), then there is an evident allusion either to this period when the Father gives this Kingdom to the Son of man, or to the fact that a pure Theocratic ordering requires the intimate and enduring association of the Father with the Son in such a rule, so that the Father is manifested in and through the Son.

Obs. 1. This giving of the Kingdom by the Father to the Son of Man, shows, what has already been observed, that this Kingdom is something very different from the general Divine Sovereignty exercised by God. The Kingdom is an outgrowth from it, and the Divine Sovereignty will be exhibited through it, being constituted in the Theocratic form, which in its initiatory form was separated in its Rulership by two persons (i.e. God and David) but is now happily conjoined—making it thus efficacious, irresistible, and ever-enduring—in one, i.e., "the Christ."

Obs. 2. This Kingdom is given to the Son of Man at a particular, definite time. Now without entering into a discussion (see e.g. Prop. 121) concerning the period of time designated by Daniel, we only, at present, remark : (1) that as this Kingdom is unalterably associated with David's Son restoring the fallen Theocratic-Davidic throne and Kingdom (so both covenant and promise), and as such a restoration has not yet been experienced, it must, in the very nature of the case, be still in the future; (2) that the peculiar phraseology, corroborated by the prophets and applied by Jesus, unmistakably refers it to the Sec. Advent, which we have already seen (e.g. Props. 56-68), is the designated time for taking the Kingdom. Down to the present the covenant remains unfulfilled, and the Kingdom continues postponed until the times of the Gentiles have elapsed. The investiture, visible, is delayed for wise, and, to us accounted worthy to reign, glorious purposes. Hence, whatever may be alleged respecting the Divine nature of Christ, it is an established and plainly seen fact, that the Seed of David, as such, does not now reign as the covenant requires and the prophets described (i.e. a reign here on earth in the restored Theocratic order), but we are assured, both by the oath of God and the provisions already made, that when the proper time arrives, this will be verified.

Obs. 3. By simply keeping in the line of the covenanted Kingdom which the Father in the appointed time, still future, will bestow upon the Son of David, we know how to estimate that vast mass of mystical conceptions and spiritualistic descriptions given by Origen, Swedenborg, Randolp, and a host of others, of the predicted Kingdom being now already realized in some form, or to be experienced immediately after death. The Kingdom to exist necessitates, as a primary condition, the restoration of the Davidic throne and Kingdom, seeing that the Theocratic ordering is bound up with the same. A Theocracy, without such a restoration, is, as covenant and promise teach, an idle dream.

This serves to throw light on the rendering of Acts 3 : 21, a passage disputed by the Lutherans and Reformed (Olahausen's Com., vol. 3, p. 221, and foot-note of K.). The English version, although condemned by the Form of Concord, is evidently correct, seeing that the Kingdom is promised and given to the Son of Man as the Seed of David. Hence Peter, in strict accord with the facts as existing, represents Jesus as one whom the heavens receive until the time when He is manifested as King, and not as one who receives the heavens.

Obs. 4. Because we are told (Heb. 10 : 12), that "this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever sat down on the right hand of God," it is inferred that this exaltation of the human nature embraces the predicted rulership of the Son of Man. But in this very connection (next verse), as if to guard us against such an inference, it is added : "From henceforth expecting" (Barnes, etc., "waiting," ) "till His enemies be made his footstool." All commentators agree that this overthrow and subjection is still future, and the Scriptures teach in the plainest manner that it is connected with His Sec. Advent. This, therefore, fully corresponds with our argument, for the passage must be considered and interpreted in connection with many others.

Some press the word "forever" to an extent that would forbid a Second Advent; others, as Bloomfield, Barnes, etc., connect the phrase "forever" with the sacrifice (i.e. he never comes again to make a sacrifice); the writer has his doubts whether the sense of the Greek is correctly given, seeing that "forever" does not give the force of the preposition and of a word understood with which the adjective agrees. It is merely suggested, that as Jews were addressed and the subject was the covenant, the word was not supplied, being understood. Might it not be rendered, to keep up the connection, "ac-ording to or in conformity to the everlasting covenant," or in something similar, i. e. to verify this covenant it became necessary, etc. However rendered, one thing is certain : it cannot conflict with express covenant promises.

Obs. 5. The Sovereignty of the Father is the foundation, the security, that David's Son shall obtain this Kingdom at the allotted time, and, therefore, this Sovereignty is also represented as giving up into the hands of this Son of Man all his enemies. Hence, in view of the Oneness of the Father and Son, one class of passages intimate that the enemies of Christ are given into His power by the Father, and yet when the work of subduing these enemies is specifically stated and in detail, it is one assigned to the Son (sustained by His relationship to the Father), because the Father commits all judgment and the Judgeship to Christ as the Son of Man, and Jesus, at His revelation, is described as coming in vengeance, etc. Therefore it becomes the student to allow both classes of passages their due position and weight in the order of procedure.

Waggoner (Ref. of Age, p. 128), confining himself exclusively to the one class of passages, lays down this caption : "The work of subduing His enemies is never in the Scriptures ascribed to Christ, but that "the Father subdues the enemies of Christ and puts them under His feet." The simple fact is, that the Father does this in and through Christ Himself, Christ acting as the agent, and hence Christ is frequently represented in the Scriptures as the One coming in wrath, in vengeance to perform this work. Waggoner is induced to take this position in order to support a singular and favorite theory, viz. : the one thousand years' reign in heaven. But for the time he overlooks his own argument, and makes (p. 134) the following concession : " (1) The Father gives them (the enemies) to the Son. (2) The Son breaks them with a rod of iron and dashes them in pieces ; which dashing, as has been shown, takes place at His Coming." But to reconcile this incongruity, he resorts to a quibble unworthy of the subject, viz. : that "there is a great difference between having His enemies put under Him, and His destroying them." Indeed, admitting a difference (in the way we have indicated), how comes it that those very enemies, instead of being "subdued," etc., are represented (Rev. 19, etc., comp. Props. 115, 123, 161, etc.), as arrayed in open hostility to Christ, making war against Him, and are only brought into subjection, etc., by Christ and His armies. We dare not ignore the action ascribed to this Son of man at His coming, and what the Father performs through Him.

Obs. 6. The Kingdom being given by the Father to the Son of Man, we can, keeping this fact in view, appreciate the fact stated in 1 Cor. 15 : 27, 28, viz. : "But when He saith, All things are put under Him, it is manifested that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him," etc. (Comp. usage of present tense, Prop. 69, Obs. 9). As this point will be brought up under the perpetuity (Prop. 159) of the Kingdom, it is only necessary to add, that a Theocracy—in the very nature of the case, as seen in the form of the Kingdom, in its past history as given, and in the manner of its future restoration under David's Son—must ever retain the position of being subordinate to the Divine Will of the Father. This Theocratic idea Paul seeks to impress, and this very subordination is essential to our doctrine of the Kingdom, being indicative of a Theocracy here on earth.

This subordination is manifested in the investiture as described by Daniel ch. 7, and will be most strikingly exhibited at "the holy mount." The place of public inauguration by "the Ancient of Days" will be noticed under Prop. 166.

Obs. 7. Even if (which we do not acknowledge) we should be mistaken in ascribing Christ's present reign to the Divine nature (making it identical with God's Sovereignty) and not to the human, and which is specially exercised over the church, and yet not so specifically, outwardly, visibly (as covenanted), so that the church can now be styled the Promised Kingdom, it does not by any means follow that Christ as the Son of Man has not still a future Kingdom to come here on the earth over which He will reign. Whatever view may be taken of this intermediate state of Jesus, the covenant predictions relating to the future are too many and decisive to be set aside. It is proper to state this, since even some Millenarians, losing sight of the specific promises of the covenant, and overlooking to whom this Kingdom is given, viz.: to the Son of Man, also depart from the Primitive Church view, in so far as to indorse the Popish notion that Jesus, as Son of Man, now reigns in the covenanted Kingdom over the church, without however discarding the doctrine of the future visible throne and Kingdom for which we contend. Believing this to be an error calculated to embarrass and destroy a proper conception of the Kingdom, to weaken and obliterate the logical and Scriptural connection existing between covenant and fulfilment, we therefore, distinguishing between things that differ, the more strongly cleave to the oath-bound covenant, and, until we see a fulfilment commensurate with God's most solemn declarations, reject all theories which are presented in place of the Kingdom itself.

Our position simply is this: that before the Kingdom pertaining to David's Son can possibly be inaugurated there must be a restoration of the fallen Davidic throne and Kingdom; that any Sovereignty exercised by Divine right is not the covenanted Kingdom. The position of others is, that in connection with the future reign of Jesus here on earth, He has also a Kingdom now in the Church. As this theory will be examined in detail (Props. 89-110), we leave it with the remark: that opposers to Chiliasm sometimes endeavor to bring our doctrine into disrepute by concealing or denying that all Millenarians concede to Christ a present reigning, the one party as a Divine being (as God, being One with the Father) and exercising special care over the Church as its Head, Mediator, Intercessor, and Advocate; the other party, as the Son of man over the Church, the latter being regarded either as a visible or invisible Kingdom, to give place finally to a new and higher stage at the Sec. Advent. No Millenarian writer ever noticed by the writer but ascribes to Jesus, in some form, a present reigning—a present exercise of exalted power.

Obs. 8. The exact time when the Father will give this Kingdom to "the Son of Man" is not revealed. Signs are indeed given in the fulfilment of predictions, etc., by which an approximative (comp. Props. 173 and 174) knowledge may be gained, but the precise time is reserved by the Father as something exclusively pertaining to Himself, Acts 1:7; Mark 13:32; Matt. 24:36.

This gives us a clue to the perplexing passage given by Mark (13:32), that the Son did not know the day or hour. Now let it be noticed that this Kingdom is given by the Father to "the Son of man" at the Sec. Advent; hence it follows, (1) that Jesus speaks of this future period as "the Son of man," i.e. as David's Son; (2) that the Father retaining the prerogative of bestowing the Kingdom, the time of the Advent connected with the same is also thus retained as intimately associated with it. Consequently the Divine, the Father in Christ, could not reveal what exclusively belonged to the Father—what pertained to the Divine prerogative—and, therefore, while the descendant of David is inseparably connected with the Divine, yet the Divine in such a matter (for "My Father is greater than I") may deny to the humanity—David's Son—the precise knowledge of the day and hour, for the reason assigned. For David's Son takes the things belonging to the Father, and shows those that are allowed, the human being subservient to the will of the Father and to the knowledge imparted. Tillotson, Ser. on Mark 13:32, 33, attributes this not knowing to the human nature of Christ, referring to Luke 2:52, etc.

showing that the human nature did not necessarily, by virtue of its union with the Divine, know all things, or otherwise he could not, as man, be said to grow in wisdom, etc.

Obs. 9. When this Kingdom is given by the Father then will be perfected the covenanted arrangement concerning "the Man," as indicated in 2 Saml. 7 : 19 and 1 Chron. 17 : 17 (comp. the Davidic covenant under Prop. 49). Then in a completed sense can it be said, taking Bh. Horsley's rendering: "And this is the arrangement about the Man, O Lord Jehovah,"—"And Thou hast regarded me (David) in the arrangement about the Man, that is to be from above, O Lord Jehovah." Therefore it follows, taking covenant promises for our guide, that this Plan respecting the Kingdom is made in virtue of the humanity of Christ, His relationship to Man in the Davidic line; and God the Father will not allow this Plan to fail, but will in due time exhibit His Theocratic rule in and through "the Man ordained."

PROPOSITION 84. As this Kingdom is specially given to the Son of Man as the result of his obedience, sufferings, and death, it must be something different from His Divine nature, or from "piety," "religion," "God's reign in the heart," etc.

Our argument all along involves this, for we have (1) the Kingdom promised to David's Son ; (2) this promise based on the foretold affirmations that this Son shall be spotless, without sin ; and (3) the continued blessedness and perpetuity of the Kingdom asserted in view of the perfect character of this descendant of David. Numerous passages declare this ; hence, when we come to the Apostles, they plainly inform us that His exaltation and reception of dominion is due to His obedience, sufferings, and death. Two passages alone clearly present this to us, viz.: Heb. 12 : 2 ; Phil. 2 : 8, 9. The latter part of the Proposition follows as a natural sequence.

We now enter into a detailed statement in following Props., to show that the Church is not the covenanted and predicted Messianic Kingdom, in any sense whatever. This is the more requisite, seeing that able Pre-Mill. writers, forsaking the strictly logical and Scriptural ground, also—with our opponents—make a Kingdom to exist in the heart (God's reign), another in the Church, and a third still future which is to come. This is misleading, and perverts the precise portrayal of the Kingdom as given by covenant and prophecy. Hence the space devoted to this subject, and the meeting of every possible objection urged against us. The Christian student, desirous for truth alone, will candidly weigh our reasons assigned, and give them proper credit in so far as they are supported by the Word.

Obs. 1. The first clause of the Proposition is fully admitted by Commentators (as e.g. Barnes, etc.), and by Theologians (as e.g. Knapp, Ch. Theol., p. 351 and 355), as "acquired," so that in the language of Knapp, "He received it (the government) from His Father as a reward for His sufferings, and for his faithful performance of the whole work, and discharge of all the offices intrusted to Him by God for the good of man." This, of course, corroborates and confirms our previous Propositions respecting the Divine Sovereignty of the Father and of the Son, and of the Kingdom being promised to the human nature of Jesus and not merely to the Divine. It is matter of surprise to find, after the frank acknowledgment of writers on this point, that many of them subsequently overlook it, and ascribe this Kingdom solely to the Divine nature. Another thing must also here be noticed, while it is true that the Kingdom is thus acquired, it is not correct to conclude as e.g. Knapp does : "this government which Jesus administers, as a man, is not natural to Him, or one which He attains by birth, but acquired." This is opposed to the covenant promises, for it is distinctly announced as a prerequisite that He must be of the royal line of David. It is the distinctive Son of David to whom this Kingdom belongs by covenanted Divine right. He only confirms His right and title to it, as the Representative Ruler in such a Theocratic Kingdom, by the life and death which He manifested. Hence by these expressions we ought not to be led to reject the claims which Jesus has by virtue of His birth. This, as seen by previous Propositions, would be a grave mistake. The Father only confirms His right.

As illustrative of the doctrinal position of multitudes, we quote Reuss (His. Ch. Theol. of Apos. Age, p. 154), who says: "The Kingdom of God, which Jesus desired to make a reality, commences with His personal appearance on the theatre of the world. His Advent and the setting up of the Kingdom are one and the same thing, because He is the Head and cause of the Kingdom, and the cause cannot exist without the effect." Jesus is also e.g. the Head of the firstborn from the dead, and the Agent of the renewal of the earth, but the resurrection of the saints and the renewal has not yet transpired. This reasoning would be conclusive, if it could be proven that there was no postponement of the Kingdom. As it is, it begs the whole question, for we assert that there is nothing that our opponents allege concerning Christ's reign in the heart and Headship over the Church, which we cannot, and do not, cordially receive, claiming, however, that all this does not constitute a Kingdom, but is purely a provisional, spiritual, and providential oversight and rule tending toward the ultimate realization of the Kingdom itself. We distinguish between the means and the end; those who oppose us either blend the two together, or assume the former to be the latter. In the extract just given, the personality of the Saviour is made equivalent to the Kingdom's introduction (so many), and no heed is given to any Scriptures which restrict it, at least, to succeed an obedience rendered. Others, to save themselves from this difficulty, postpone the setting up of the Kingdom to His resurrection, or ascension, or to the day of Pentecost, but in their efforts to avoid one obstacle, plunge themselves even into greater difficulties (as e.g. if the Kingdom is "God's reign in the heart," was that postponed until then?). making it requisite to have a number of Kingdoms to meet the various contingencies.

Obs. 2. Some of the most eminent writers and commentators not knowing how to escape the dilemmas incident to their theory of a present existing Kingdom of promise, gravely tell us that this Kingdom is "piety," or "religion," or the most favorite phrase (as e.g. Dr. McCosh, and others), "God's reign in the heart." We leave them to reconcile a Kingdom of promise, specially covenanted to the Son of David in the line of his humanity, and for which He rendered Himself worthy on account of obedience, with such interpretations as these. If piety, religion, God's reign in the heart, etc., is the Messianic Kingdom, we may well ask what need of such promises of the Kingdom in the Davidic line and why not then date the Kingdom from Adam down to the present, seeing that "piety" or "religion," or "God's reign in the heart," has existed continuously? A host of questions suggested by our various Propositions indicate the utter absurdity of such a definition. Piety, religion, etc., are prerequisites to attain to this Kingdom, and are to exist in the Kingdom itself, but are far from constituting the Kingdom.

Obs. 3. The tender of the Kingdom to the Jewish nation, its rejection, postponement, the peculiar style of preaching of the first preachers—all go to show that "piety," etc. existed with a certain portion of the Jews, without the establishment of the Kingdom. Yet even those who advocate that Christ's Kingdom was only inaugurated after His death take this unguarded position, just as if these things were not previously exhibited. Their definition is inconsistent with their own admissions, and fatal to a distinctive Kingdom given to the Son of Man. It is not necessary to press this point.

An illustration, however, showing the inconsistency may be in place. Many eminent writers enforce this heart-reigning Kingdom theory (comp. Prop. 110), but when they come to explain the predictions (e.g. Dan., chs. 2 and 7) relating to this Kingdom they forget their own theory of a heart-kingdom, and affirm that the prophecies are realized in a visible, external manner through the establishment of the Ch. Church.

Obs. 4. It may, however, be well to give an illustration of the inconsistency of writers who insist on this Kingship of Christ's being exercised before He showed Himself thus worthy to receive it. Aside from many found in this work which declare that the Kingdom was manifested when Jesus appeared, lived, etc., (and mainly derived from this "piety," "God's reign in the heart" theory), we refer to, in many respects an admirable writer, Pressense. In his Sermon "On Jesus Christ as King," he has (1) Jesus King even in His humiliation; (this we admit, but the Kingship was held in abeyance); (2) Jesus King on the Cross (this we admit, but hold that His royalty was not manifested); (3) Jesus King in a signal manner after the resurrection; and all this to show that His Kingdom was established and manifested continuously from His birth. To all this, in connection with previous arguments against such a view, we only now say, how can such a Kingdom ruled over by Jesus during His life and at the time of His death be reconciled with the Scriptures which speak of, and the countless admissions of our opponents which advocate, an acquisition of a Kingdom of promise in virtue of His obedient life and death? Our theory is consistent and requires just such a position in the Son of David. The Divine Sovereignty only bestows this acquisition, and, when given, enforces it, but only in the covenanted Davidic line. Hence, to refer to the Divine attributes lodged with Jesus (such as His power over the angels, etc.), and from thence infer that He then exercised regal power, is evidence that the party making such an inference has no idea of the Scriptural difference existing between the Divine Sovereignty and the Kingdom (through which that Sovereignty will be gloriously displayed) distinctively promised to David's Son.

Obs. 5. This evinces what the covenant, etc., demands, viz.: a Ruler, who is such in virtue also of His humanity; and includes, that this Ruler has shown what no other Theocratic Ruler can do, His perfect adaptability for the position, i.e. to carry out the Divine Will in government. Keeping in view the goal of Theocratic government and its requirements, we find in the honorable obedience of Christ the most ample and satisfactory assurance that in His occupancy of the Davidic throne and Kingdom, He will indeed be a truthful and stable Representative of God. Therefore Peter says, 1 Pet. 1 : 21, etc.

In conversation with Rev. Dr. Rodgers on this point, he suggested that one reason why the sinfulness of the ablest and most highly honored of the Theocratic Kings (as e.g. David and Solomon) is so plainly recorded in Scripture, arises from the fact that thus is shown (1) the failure of mere mortals, through infirmity, to sustain the position perfectly, and (2) to evidence, by way of contrast through trial, the perfection of Jesus as Theocratic King.

PROPOSITION 85. Neither Abraham, nor his engrafted seed have as yet inherited the Kingdom: hence the Kingdom must be something different from "piety," "religion," and "God's reign in the heart."

We have shown that Abraham is to inherit the promises in this Kingdom (Prop. 49, etc.), and that saints inherit with him (Prop. 62, 63, etc.). The time of inheriting the Kingdom is specified, in accordance with our argument, e. g., in Matt. 25 : 34. Therefore to make "piety," etc., the kingdom is an incongruity.

To say that the Patriarchs were in this Kingdom, before the Advent of "the Christ," is a palpable absurdity; to infer that they and others are now in it, when it has not appeared in its covenanted form, and when it has been postponed to the Sec. Advent, is equally unworthy of credence.

Obs. 1. This is virtually to make "piety" inherit "piety." This is a substitution of the means by which the Kingdom is obtained for the Kingdom itself. The saints with Abraham, the Father of the Faithful, inherit the Kingdom because they are pious, religious, and acknowledge obedience to God. The ancient and the Christian believers receive their inheritance on the same conditions.

Consequently the "Plymouth Brethren" position, which would limit "the heirs of the Kingdom" to members of the Ch. Church, must be rejected as untenable. The positive statements of inheriting with the Patriarchs, the necessity of being engrafted and becoming the children of Abraham in order to inherit, etc., forbid such a limitation. Besides, such a view perverts the Scriptural idea of the election and its continuation (as previously presented in detail by us). It must never be overlooked, in order to avoid both extremes, that "heirs" are "heirs" of the same promise given to the Patriarchs, and that so long as simply "heirs" of the salvation and Kingdom included in that promise, they have not yet inherited. The time of inheritance is specific; it is determinately located at the Sec. Advent. To antedate it, or to substitute something else, or to fritter it away by a process of spiritualizing, or to limit it to modern believers, is to ignore the express, plain language relating to "the inheritance, not of law, but of promise."

Obs. 2. With the idea that believers now enjoy the Kingdom in the present dispensation, the most unjust reflections and comparisons are instituted derogatory to the ancient worthies. Some of these we have noticed, but to impress the matter another illustration is given from Reuss (His. of the Ch. Theol., p. 150), who seems to take it for granted that saints already have inherited, or are in the enjoyment of the Kingdom of God, to the disparagement of ancient worthies, thus:—"Before time the Kingdom of God presented itself to the imagination (!), now it reveals itself in the heart. Formerly knowledge, reflection, factitious duty conferred the privileges of the Kingdom; now it is the heritage of children and the childlike," etc. A mass of just such invidious representations might readily be presented, drawn from various writers utterly unscriptural and dangerous in tendency. The simple truth is, that they are destructive of the covenant promises, of the true hope, and of the Kingdom of God itself.

We give another: Beecher, Sermon on "The Future Life" (Ch. Union, Sept. 5th, 1877), after referring to the apostles being mistaken (comp. Prop. 74) in their notion of the Sec. Advent of Jesus, then adds: "The best Jews had a mistaken notion of the Kingdom of God founded on the old prophets; but when you look at what was the scope and teaching of the apostles, I think that you will find that it amounts simply to a knowledge addressed to men's hearts by the understanding, the intellect, acting through the ministry of the imagination—if you can get that sentence into your mind. It is an intellectual teaching; but it is expressed through the imagination," etc. All that we now say is this: if Beecher is correct in his degradation of ancient believers, who trusted in the plain and indubitable gram. sense of the Scriptures, then how miserably (as our history of the doctrine conclusively proves) those who sat under this intellectual preaching of the apostles failed to have their "imagnations" impressed and exercised. It required the "imagination" of Origen or Whitby to bring forth this intended "intellectual teaching," which tramples on covenant and prediction, and makes men—even school children—of to-day wiser respecting the Kingdom than John the Baptist and the inspired apostles, owing to a continuous inspiration. Alas! what new paths!

PROPOSITION 86. The object or design of this dispensation is to gather out these elect, to whom, as heirs with Abraham and his seed, Christ, this Kingdom is to be given.

This Proposition is thus presented to recall, at this point of our discussion, some conclusions previously arrived at. We have shown (1) Prop. 57, how the kingdom was rejected, (2) Prop. 58, why it was postponed, (3) Prop. 59, that during this postponement a seed is raised up unto Abraham, (4) Prop. 63, that this seed, composing the elect nation, is the one to whom the Kingdom is given. Therefore, whenever the design of this dispensation is distinctively referred to, it is to save them that believe, to proclaim the terms of salvation by which, if observed, men may become inheritors of Christ's Kingdom, to gather out such a body of elect ones.

Obs. 1. It is not necessary, under this heading, to notice two mistakes by which the affirmation of the Proposition is obscured by error, viz.: (1) the regarding this dispensation as the final one, and (2) the belief in the conversion of the world before the Sec. Advent. These will be made, hereafter, the subjects of special remark (as e.g. the first, under Props. 140, 138, 139, 137, etc., and the second, under Props. 175, 121, 122, 152, 153, etc.).

Obs. 2. If our argument has any logical force, based on the plain grammatical sense of covenant, and prophecy, and fact,—if it has any Scriptural weight in insisting upon a restored Theocratic order under David's Son here on the earth where the previous Theocratic rule was inaugurated, —then the absence of such a Theocracy in the form covenanted, itself is sufficient to indicate that a dispensation or ordering under the personal reign of David's Son is still future, and that the Millennial glory in the blessedness of nations will only then be realized.

Obs. 3. Our Proposition is, consequently, only formulating, or recalling, the conclusions arrived at under previous ones pertaining to the election. It has been shown (1) that there is an elect-people, Prop. 24, etc.; (2) this elect-people for a certain and fixed time, is discarded, Prop. 59, etc.; (3) another elect-people is gathered out, Prop. 61, etc.; (4) the former election, now held in abeyance, is fully restored, re-engrafted in order to fulfil the covenant, Prop. 66, etc.; (5) hence the design of this dispensation, or "times of the Gentiles," in which this continuation of elected ones, grafted in, is going on, is not to establish the Kingdom but to prepare the way for the final restoration of that Kingdom to the covenanted people, Prop. 65, etc.; (6) and that it is by our identification with that people that we also inherit with them, Prop. 64, etc. In the very nature of the case, this dispensation, as its progressive work indicates, can do no more than prepare the heirs for the Kingdom.

We see in this dispensation only that which unmistakably proves that the covenant will be fulfilled ; to say that in it the covenant is already realized, is either to ignore or misrepresent (if not to degrade) the most precious of its promises. As preparative, it is exceedingly precious ; as bringing present blessings and the prospect of the highest honor and glory in the future, it is indispensable ; as a link in the chain of Divine procedure, it is necessary to preserve and perfect a unity of Purpose.

Obs. 4. Our argument regards this dispensation (1) as preparative to the Kingdom ; (2) as introduced, because of the fall of the Jewish nation, to raise up a seed unto Abraham ; (3) as elective and not national in the sense that it gathers out of all nations a people for God ; (4) as extending to all nations in its offers of mercy, but resulting in no conversion of nations but of individuals only ; (5) as spiritual in its designs and operations, so that no introduction of an outward exhibition of God's Kingdom is to be expected in it ; (6) as one that will end in unbelief and Apostasy, just like previous dispensations, proving both the continued inherent depravity of man and the non-erection of the covenanted Kingdom ; (7) as one that is, therefore, an extraordinary manifestation of Divine grace and forbearance in Him who knows the end from the beginning ; (8) as one connected with probation, trial, suffering, chastening, bereavement, etc., and to exalt which into the position of the Coming one (freed from these evils), is to do violence to the Word ; (9) as one which, in the establishment and perpetuation of the Christian Church, stands forth as a constant sign or witness that God's purposes do not fail ; (10) and hence, as a standing proof that, however long delayed, the oath-bound Davidic covenant will be most amply realized.

Obs. 5. The covenanted relationship is recalled by the phrase, "heirs with Abraham." Having fully shown the necessity of this (Prop. 61, etc.), the reader may again be reminded how eminent writers, viewing this dispensation as final, take the position, demanded by their theory, that the prophecies pertaining to this Kingdom have no relation to Israel as a nation. This is productive of discordant interpretation, unduly exalting the present divine arrangement to the prejudice of the truth. We are gravely told (e.g. Alexander on Isa. vol. 2, p. 31) that it is not only an "error" but an "irrational extreme of making Israel as a race the object of the promises." Leaving former Propositions (such as Props. 24, 31, 33, 49, 51, 52, 63, 68, etc.), to speak for themselves, it may well be asked : how comes it that the Theocratic ordering is inseparably connected with the Jewish nation as such ? How comes it then that all the promises and threatenings revolve around that Jewish race as a central pivot, which is still recognized in the N. Test. as indispensable, since into that race we must be grafted, and to inherit we must be adopted as Abraham's children ? Why must we become Jews (i.e. of the seed of Abraham) in order to enter this Kingdom, if the promises are not given to that nation, and still pertain to them ? Why even in the time of rejection are they so wonderfully preserved, and why is their restoration so plainly predicted, unless the promises remain linked with them ? Why should the threatenings be carefully given to them and the blessings pertaining to the very same people, be taken from them? Surely it is illogical, if not worse, to appropriate the covenant promises to ourselves, and leave the curses to the Jews. God has united them and bound them together in an inseparable manner with that people, and seeing the latter so fearfully verified, enjoins upon us the belief that the former will also yet be realized. The "hope of Israel" is our hope; and such hope is greatly increased by an intelligent and consistent Scriptural interpretation of the design of this dispensation.

Obs. 6. Noticing the design of this dispensation and not overloading it with things that belong to a coming one, Christianity itself, as it exists, is susceptible of a more easy defence against the attacks of infidelity. Thus e.g. we can more readily account for its want of success in some ages, its retrogressions where once predominant, its declines and revivals, its union with much that must be discarded, etc., for these and other events do not affect its object, or prevent the carrying out of the design originally intended. Humanly speaking, these may cause a delay, but the delay itself is an experience of continued mercy and forbearance so that the design may be completed. On the other hand, bind upon this dispensation ideas and notions which really belong to the future coming age, and at once—in view of the Church's mixed character, the comparative meagre extension of real piety after eighteen centuries of preaching, the losses Christianity has sustained in countries where once it existed in all its vigor, the corruption of doctrine and practice, the virulent controversies and spirit often exhibited, etc.—a resort must be had to apologetic shifts, mystical subterfuges, and philosophical glosses utterly unworthy of a candid and noble defence. Is there a student who has not been saddened by the apologies of eminent believers in behalf of the gospel, who, hampered by a Church-Kingdom theory, feel themselves compelled to excuse and justify a want of success, etc., when no such special pleading is demanded by the design God has in view, or by the real facts in the case? God's plan, and the time employed by Him, in gathering the elect, requires on our part no object vindication.

Additional evidence in behalf of the Proposition will be found under Props. 87, 88, 89, etc. The reasons (additional) for the design are given under Props. 124, 142, 118, 120, etc. Others again are found under Props. 131-139, 140, 169, 154, 158, etc. We have already laid sufficient stress on Acts 15 : 14-16, so that we need not repeat, only saying that Dr. Brown, in his recent Com. on Acts, entirely omits to recognize the eclecticism indicated by the phrase "taking out of them." As illustrative of doctrinal position, we append the views of two men. Pressense (The Early Years of Christianity, p. 25) makes the "vocation" of the Church to be that of "illuminating and vivifying the world"—"to purify itself within, and to extend itself without, such is the twofold task of the Church, and the ages are given for its fulfilment." Here the preconceived idea of the conversion of the world through the Church suggests the vocation (comp Prop. 175). Now in contrast, we give Dr. Fausset's (Com. Dan. 7 : 11) brief comment: "The New Test. views the present æon or age of the world as essentially heathenish, which we cannot love without forsaking Christ (Rom. 12 : 2 ; 1 Cor. 1 : 20, and 2 : 6, 8, and 3 : 18, and 7 : 31 ; 2 Cor. 4 : 4 ; Gal. 1 : 4 ; Eph. 2 : 2 ; 2 Tim. 4 : 10 ; cf. 1 John 2 : 15, 17). The object of Christianity is not so much to Christianize the present world as to save souls out of it, so as not to be condemned with the world (1 Cor. 11 : 32), but to rule with Him in His Millennium (Matt. 5 : 5 ; Luke 12 : 32, and 22 : 28-30 ; Rom. 5 : 17 ; 1 Cor. 6 : 2 ; Rev. 1 : 6, and 2 : 26-28, and 3 : 21 and 20 : 4). This is our hope ; not to reign in the present world course (1 Cor. 4 : 8 ; 2 Cor. 4 : 18 ; Phil. 3 : 20 ; Heb. 13 : 14)." Pressense's view is inferential ; Fausset's is directly Scriptural.

PROPOSITION 87. The postponement of the Kingdom is the key to the understanding of the meaning of this dispensation.

So important is this fact that before entering into a direct description of the relation that the church sustains to this dispensation and to the Kingdom, we take the liberty of referring the reader to what has been proven concerning this postponement, Props. 58-68. If our position is correct (and we deem it, as the early church did, impregnable) then it follows, as a matter of course, that many things now applied by divines to this dispensation have no relation whatever to it.

The great point overlooked by many theologians is this: that there was a time in the history of Christ when the proclamation of a Kingdom near at hand totally ceased, as we have already shown; yea, not only ceased but gave place to an entirely different tone of preaching, viz.: the postponement of that Kingdom to the Sec. Advent. This, of course, materially aids, as our entire argument indicates, in showing why the present ordering is established and continued to the Sec. Coming. Another feature forgotten is the following: that it is impossible to comprehend the Kingdom without going back to the Old Test. idea of it, which conception once received and entertained prevents an improper view of the present dispensation. While the Old Test. idea is plain, having been carried out partially in an outward, external Theocratic manifestation, yet men, to evade its force, contend that it has proven a failure, not keeping in mind (1) that the failure was not in God's plan but in man's depravity, and (2) that God is providing the means, as predicted, for the ultimate realization of His Purpose, so that there shall be no failure in the future (comp. e.g. Prop. 201 and 202). If, as Neander and others, it is insisted that God originally desired such an outward Theocratic Kingdom, but, owing to man's perversity, gave up its prosecution in that form, and so modified His Plan that the present dispensation alone gives us a kind of spiritual Theocratic Kingdom in the Church, then it follows—(1) that God, starting out with the intention of instituting such a Kingdom, has been foiled in His own Plan; (2) that the perverseness of man can change God's purposes, although announced under oath (as to certainty) in the Davidic covenant; (3) that this dispensation, instituted to overrule that very depravity and insure the future realization of God's original Plan, which in no shape or form exhibits the previous Theocratic idea (as presented in its initiatory form and as given by covenant), must be viewed as an evidence of God's changeableness and inability to carry out His own Purpose of government.

Obs. 1. It is a rule, more frequently violated than observed, that for a correct understanding of Scripture we should pay attention to the particular dispensation to which portions of it are intended to apply. Volumes, otherwise containing valuable matter, are vitiated by bringing nearly all Scripture to be applicable to the present time, or dispensation. The distinctions made in Holy Writ respecting the promises and blessings are broken down, and the blessings, en masse, are heaped upon the Gentile believers. The "dispensation of grace to the Gentiles" (Eph. 3:2) is fully and completely identified with "the dispensation of the fulness of times" (Eph. 1:10), and the result is an interpretation which mingles and interweaves that which God's Purpose separates. The definite postponement of the Kingdom, once entertained, preserves us from this free and plastic moulding of Scripture to suit our own ideas of the fitness of things.

Just as the Old Test. points us to a future coming Messiah, so also does the New; just as the Old directs us to a still future incoming age of Messianic blessedness, so also does the New. Properly to discriminate is to understand. As God has fully evidenced the literal fulfilment of the prophecies pertaining to Jesus in the past, and—instead of abrogating such a continued fulfilment in the future by substituting a spiritual one—thus urges us to Abrahamitic faith respecting the unfulfilled, we receive, with gladness, this distinctive feature of the New Test. (corroborated by the Old), and unhesitatingly cleave to it in hope. Men too often interpret Scripture to suit their own ideas of what is suitable. When the Duke of Somerset (Ch. Theol. and Mod. Skep.) sarcastically refers to Paul's allegory: "After all this confusion of types the allegory fails, as commentators remark, in the very point which it was adduced to illustrate; since, according to Scripture, the Son of the bondwoman and his posterity were free of the law, whereas Isaac's descendants—the children of promise—became the slaves of the law;" and then in apparent triumphant triumph asks, "Are Protestants expected to receive Paul's allegories as the Word of God?"—we answer, Yes, by receiving Paul's own statement as to the time of fulfilment; not locating it in the past or present, but in the glorious future, when all the children of promise are gathered and inherit.

Obs. 2. Among the things which the postponement of the Kingdom effectually removes, is the prevailing opinion that the Church is the promised Kingdom of the Messiah. Admit the postponement, and it will be impossible to make the church, as present constituted, said Kingdom. For, if postponed, how could it be in existence? This prevents us from giving the church in its present fighting and struggling condition those exaggerated eulogistic praises which only pertain to it in the dispensation still future. This leads us carefully to discriminate what things appertain to past dispensations, what to the present dispensation, what to the church as now constituted, what to the church as she shall finally be manifested in glory with the King, what to the Kingdom itself, what to the future dispensation, and what to the eternal ages. The importance of such a position cannot be too highly urged, since upon it largely depend the views we take of numerous prophecies and promises.

This position also forbids many extravagances, as e.g. the Shakers (Nordhoff's Communistic Soc., p. 133), dating the last dispensation from the establishment of their church under Mother Lee, calling themselves the "Church of the Last Dispensation," or that of the Swedenborgians, Mormons, etc., applying to their rise, society, etc., promises that belong to a still future dispensation. These utterly ignore both covenant and postponement, and overlook the continued design of this dispensation (comp. Prop. 140, etc.). These extremes are only an outgrowth of conceptions, with which the Church is largely leavened, as will be hereafter shown.

PROPOSITION 88. The Church is then a preparatory stage for this Kingdom.

This follows from the preceding, for the church then resolves itself into an association of believers by which its growth, perpetuation, etc., is insured by the use of means of grace connected with such an organization, and by the care and oversight extended to it by its living Head. It is preparatory, because its office is, under divine assistance, to gather out of the nations the elect, i.e. those who are grafted into the Jewish Commonwealth, who shall, by virtue of adoption as Abraham's seed, be accounted heirs and inheritors of the Kingdom with Abraham. It is simply calling and preparing "the heirs of promise," the "heirs of that kingdom which God hath prepared for them that love Him."

In this gathering out of believers to form this elect people—the inheritors—is found the ground for a firm belief in the perpetuity of the Church. God's purpose, no matter how adverse at times the Church's circumstances, how hostile the world, how corrupt her mixed condition, etc., will and must be inevitably carried out. The number that God has predetermined will be secured, so that His Theocratic Plan may be realized in power and glory.

Obs. 1. Discarding the simple truth of the Proposition, eminent men of ability have arrayed themselves against each other, contending for some favorite church theory, manifesting an amazing variety of definitions, subtle divisions, imaginary distinctions, and irrelevant display of learning. This has resulted mainly from elevating the church into a Kingdom under the mistake that this dispensation being final, and the prophecies locating the Messiah's Kingdom here on earth, the church must of necessity be the predicted Kingdom. This has borne its fruit in the way indicated, and also, what is more sad, in covering up the covenant promises pertaining to the Kingdom, in spiritualizing them to make them consistent with human opinions, and in arraying themselves as hostile toward the preaching of the disciples and apostles, until at the present day, with here and there a few exceptions in all denominations, but little faith is exercised (as predicted), either in the Pre-Millennial Advent of the King, or in the future establishment of His Kingdom, as covenanted, here on earth.

Obs. 2. If we are wrong in this, and other Propositions linked with it, it can be easily decided against us by producing a passage where the church is directly called a Kingdom. A due examination will reveal the fact that no such Scripture can be found. Such a vital, foundation doctrine is inferred; and the influence comes the more naturally, since, overlooking the postponement, and regarding the preparatory stage of the church in a light different from that which the covenant throws upon it, it was taken for granted that a Kingdom being preached as once nigh, must have come.

And, as a literal Kingdom, such as covenant and prophecy describe, did not come, it was supposed that the church then must be it. The Origenistic interpretation, so destructive to early Millenarianism, appeared as the patron and champion of this inference, until under its wide-spread influence, the inference was changed into a supposed axiomatic truth. Being also in the line of ambition, etc., it was tenaciously held by all who were favorable to hierarchical tendencies, and any who rejected it as inference and assumption were regarded as heretics. Indeed even now, it is so deeply imbedded in religious belief and system, that to call it by its true name, a mere inference, is to excite prejudice, bitterness and wrath in the hearts of some who profess to love the truth for the truth's sake.

Obs. 3. We are not surprised that the result just mentioned should follow, for if it can be shown that the covenanted Kingdom is something different from the church; that the Kingdom is held in postponement until a certain predetermined number of elect are gathered; that the church is appointed to gather and cherish these elect, and hence is preparatory in its action, then this view of the Kingdom, showing that the church's relation to this Kingdom is a subordinate and preparatory one, prepares us to appreciate the claims of Popery, Puseyism, hierarchical tendencies, nationalizing churches, and a host of similar exclusive demands put on faith and practice, all of which are founded on the assumption that the church is not preparatory to the predicted Kingdom, but is in truth the covenanted Kingdom itself. Our doctrine is too humiliating for such, and therefore fails of acceptance.

The Church-Kingdom idea is deeply rooted in prevailing Theology and Literature. It is a notion long held in veneration, embellished by eloquence and poetry, supported by philosophy, strengthened by policy, power, and age, enriched by the cumulative reason of many centuries, and the mistaken concessions of piety. Ideas consecrated and cemented by the expressed opinions, attachments, and submission of men of ability and learning are not to be eradicated, saving by a higher hand, when fulfilling His own counsels and covenanted promises. It will require the secret stage of the Sec. Advent with its momentous results, and the incoming Antichrist with his persecution of the Church, before this notion—so fruitful in causing unbelief—will be discarded by the Church.

Obs. 4. As stated, it is owing to the view taken of this Kingdom, that such widely antagonistic notions are published respecting the church. One writer, e.g. accepting of the prophecies pertaining to the Kingdom and applying them to the church as now constituted, emphatically declares that the Mission of the church is a failure. This is announced by a host of writers, and is hailed with delight by multitudes with the addition, that hence prophecy (inspiration) is found unreliable. Another writer, receiving the same predictions as also declarative of the church's present position, endeavors to meet the requirements of prophecy by exaggerating the church's progress, etc. One author, seeing a non-fulfilment of prophecy, places Christianity on a level with other religions, predicting its mergence into a universal religion adapted to meet the longings of the prophets. Still another writer receives the same predictions as illustrative of the church's Kingdom state, and to establish this point, proceeds to fasten on the obvious grammatical sense another and widely differing one to make prophecy and history correspond. While another accepts of the predictions in their plain grammatical sense, finds in them the true Mission of the church which is no failure, locates their fulfilment as a comparison of Scripture indicates, needs no immoderate exaltation to make church and prophecy tally, sees in their non-fulfilment no reason for invidious comparisons, and forces upon them no sense that would be discarded by the universal laws of grammar and rhetoric. This, to the student, indicates what influence is exerted upon our theological opinions by our views of the church. This only points out a few diverging lines, others will be presented as we proceed.

Obs. 5. The Romanist and the Protestant have made the question of the church a battle-field, in which many a past strife is noted by history. The Romanist making the church the Kingdom of God (called in the Dog. Decrees of the recent Council "the Kingdom of Christ") set up here under a specific form of government, held that by becoming obedient to that church the soul alone was brought to Christ, so that the Kingdom was the power that led to Christ, etc. The Protestant, who accepted of the Romanist idea of such a Kingdom, held that by faith, in and obedience to, Christ the soul was made to enter the Kingdom of heaven. The former made the church as a Kingdom a condition of salvation, the latter, a means of preservation and development to the saved. But both in one form or other, forced both by Scripture and the actual condition of the church, made this church or Kingdom a preparatory stage for another and higher Kingdom still in the future. A singular feature in the controversy is this: that both parties agreed in making this Church the Kingdom of Christ either as Son of Man, or as Son of God, or both united, and the higher Kingdom in the future at the end of the age, they made, against express Scriptures, to be exclusively the Kingdom of the Father or of the Divine. To the latter view, the student will find but few exceptions.

Obs. 6. Many, impelled by the idea that if the church is a Kingdom there ought, of necessity, to be a unity, have sought for this in various ways—in an outward union of believers, in an exact agreement of doctrine, in some form of church government, etc. Whereas, if they had retained the belief of the earliest age respecting the church, they would have seen that the uniformity they sought after is not a prerequisite. Diversity, as seen in the Apostolic Churches by contrasting the Jewish and Gentile, is not opposed to the Scriptural idea of the church. For, not being regarded as a Kingdom but as a preparatory stage for the Kingdom, some latitude was allowed in its external manifestation and even in non-essential doctrine and practice (see e.g. decision of Council at Jerusalem, Acts 15:19, 28) while unity was based on fellowship with Christ and consequent adoption as Abraham's seed.

Obs. 7. It is our deep conviction that the word ekklesia, translated church, was designedly chosen to express what the church really means. Let the reader notice how we have shown that to raise up a seed unto Abraham certain elect, those of like faith unto Abraham, are chosen out of the nations. The word therefore, ek out of, and kaleo I call, denotes to call out of, and hence means precisely what the Apostles in Council, Acts 15:14, denominated its object to be, viz.: to call out from among the nations a people, etc. Why was the word rendered church chosen in place of the more familiar one synagogue, unless it be that the former more explicitly expresses the idea intended? (Vide Prop. 175, and Comp. Hagenbach's His. Doc., vol. 1, p. 194.)

PROPOSITION 89. Christ in view of this future Kingdom, sustains a peculiar relationship to the Church.

Christ, now, in virtue of His divine nature, has absolute control over all nations, over the church, etc., but He only exerts that Sovereignty (Props. 79 and 80) as God in Providence, etc., not as the Son of Man (e.g. Props. 81-83), David's Son, in His human nature. That nature is also highly, immeasurably exalted because of its union with the Divine, and of its being intended for the coming visible Theocratic Government to be (Prop. 200) the Representative Ruler of God. This Rulership now belongs to David's Son, is His both by right of covenanted birth and obedience, but is not yet realized and will not be until the establishment of the Kingdom. For, we have no distinctive announcement of its actual participation in reigning as covenanted until the Second Advent, at which time it is plainly and specifically stated that He reigns not merely as the Son of God, but really and truly as the Son of Man.

Obs. 1. Indeed, if we refer to the covenant, this must be the case, for the Kingdom directly covenanted to David's Son is not a reign over other worlds, over the universe, or over the church as a church—is not even a reign in the third heaven, or some place outside of this earth—but is pointedly stated to be a reign over David's Kingdom, which is extended to embrace the whole earth. To say then, whatever may be the honored position of Jesus in heaven, that He now is reigning in the covenanted, predicted Kingdom of promise, is directly opposed to God's oath-bound covenant. This gives us then the proper idea of Christ's relationship to the church. As Divine, One with the Father, the church is under His care and protection; as Son of Man He sustains a Headship over the church; as the future revealed King, His interest in the church is deep and abiding.

Obs. 2. To avoid misconception, and the charge of lowering Christ's dignity or position, it may be in place to repeat that we most cordially receive and hold to what is said concerning Christ in Eph. 1:20-23, and other passages. But with the aid of a comparison of Scripture, we avoid the conclusion that many arrive at, as e.g. in Eph. 1:20-23, that the authority vested in Him is now in all respects exercised. We hold, that so far as its actual exercise and realization is concerned, part of it must be regarded prospectively, as seen e.g. by verse 22 compared with Heb. 2:8, i.e. that part referring to the Davidic covenanted Kingdom, in the world to come. (Comp. Alford, Steir, Meyer, etc.)

Obs. 3. The Headship of Christ over the church refers not so much, as is supposed, to Rulership over the church as to His being the Chief or Head of Rulers, i.e. that the church is in some peculiar and distinctive manner associated with Him. What this is, will appear under the Props. (154 and 156) relating to the reign and priesthood of the saints. Christ Himself intimates this distinction when He calls faithful believers "brethren" and not "servants." The church is represented as Christ's body, simply because that body are "co-heirs," joint inheritors with Him in the Kingdom, and therefore they are purposely never called "the subjects of the Kingdom"—a phrase coined by man and contradictory to both the honor and position of the body, which takes a much higher rank. It is inconsistent, to say the least, to call "inheritors" of a Kingdom, the subjects of it.<sup>1</sup> Individual subjection or allegiance does not constitute a Kingdom, lacking as it does the essentials of a Kingdom, such as are promised. Jesus is called, and by right, and in the covenanted manner, is, "the King of the Jews," "King of Nations," "King of the World," but is never called "the King of the Church." The nearest approach to the latter is found in our English version Rev. 15 : 3, where He is called "King of the Saints," but this is opposed by some of the earliest of the MSS. (as e.g. the Sinaitic and Alexandrine) and various versions, so that it is rendered "King of the Nations," "King of the Worlds," "King of the Ages," and in the Greek texts in general use, it is given "King of the Nations" (comp. Lange, Alford, etc., loci Tischendorf's N. T. etc.), which is more in accord with the general tenor and spirit of the Word. The saints, elected to be associated with Christ in Rulership, are indeed subordinated to Christ. He is the Head, the Chief, and they being also kings with Him, it is rightfully His title to be styled "King of Kings," seeing that the latter are inferior to Him, but while subordinate, their rank, etc., elevates them as brethren and joint rulers above that of mere subjects in the ordinary use of the Word. They are truly subjects in one sense only, viz. : in the one given, e.g. 1 Cor. 11 : 3.

<sup>1</sup> The reader will of course discriminate here : the Church is subject (Eph. 5 : 24, etc.) to Christ, and this, in the very nature of the case, is indispensable, but this subjection is preparatory to the future glorification and exaltation of the Church, for when allied with Him in glory, this subjection is swallowed up in joint rulership, etc. with Christ, though still subordinate, as David's Son is to the Father ; and hence our argument merely is, that believers, in view of their future position, are never called "the subjects of the Kingdom," which is opposed to their being "kings and priests reigning with Christ" in the Kingdom. Believers are "heirs," and not the subjects of the covenanted Kingdom. Origen (Ag. Celsus, B. 4, ch. 10) refers "the Kingdom of God," as "reserved for those who are worthy of becoming its subjects ;" we prefer the Scriptural phraseology, if it were only to remind us of future exaltation and glory.

Obs. 4. The Kingship of Jesus Christ, as David's Son, the Theocratic Ruler, is to be manifested in a period of time, called by way of pre-eminence "the day of the Lord," "the day of Jesus Christ," etc. This will, under Prop. 138, be shown to be still future, dating from the time of His Second Advent. The covenant promises, if actually fulfilled, require this ; and hence until their realization, the church occupies the position of waiting (e.g. 1 Pet. 1 : 7, 13) for this Revelation of Jesus as King. During this expectation all things are working in behalf of the election, the contemplated gathering, the manifestation of the Sons of God. The Head is preparing the members, by the bestowal of blessed privileges, sacred ordinances, rich experience, and His own ever-abiding Presence, for the coming exaltation of the Kingdom. Communion with Christ and with each other necessitates a churchly arrangement, so that the requisite elect may be taken out from among the nations to place the future Theocratic Kingdom on an immovable basis.

As simply illustrative of the conclusions adopted against us, we refer to a writer in the Princeton Review (Ap., 1851, p. 196), who endeavors to prove that "the Church is the Kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ," in view of a spiritual reign in the heart and the Headship of Jesus. But aside from the numerous considerations hereafter presented by us against the theory, we may well ask, whether such an alleged Kingdom is a restoration of the Kingdom of God withdrawn from the Jewish nation on account of their sinfulness. Is there a single mark by which an identification can be made out, when we are assured by God Himself that the same Kingdom (Theocracy) overthrown is the identical Kingdom re-established? To resort, by way of apology and explanations, to types and spiritualizing, is to declare that God's words, sworn to, mean one thing in the plain grammatical sense, but are to be understood in a sense which men add to it to accommodate their respective Kingdom theories.

Obs. 5. In this postponement of the Kingdom, specifically promised to the Son of Man, we do not, by any means, detract from that power which is given to Jesus, or deny that to His will all things are subject. The question to be answered is, does He now exercise that power and make manifest that subjection in the covenanted Kingdom? The reply comes unhesitatingly, that we see no such Kingdom yet established which meets the requirements of covenant and prophecy, if the latter are received in their plain grammatical sense. Indeed, our opponents concede to us that so far as the church itself is concerned, that power is held in abeyance and its manifestation delayed, as is evidenced by the existence of tares mingled with the wheat, of different forms of evil, of kingdoms opposed to His will, etc. This conception, in the light of the covenant, the preaching of Jesus, the postponement of the Kingdom, etc., we apply to the church so far as the Theocratic-Davidic throne and Kingdom are concerned, showing that the former cannot with any consistency be substituted for the latter.

Obs. 6. Overlooking the design of the establishment of the Christian Church, viz. : to raise up a seed unto Abraham by gathering out of the nations a people for His name, until the throne and Kingdom, now desolate, shall be restored to its covenanted position, has led to some remarkable features in philosophizing. Deeming the church a Kingdom, and seeing how little in its external history it exhibited the ideas we attach to a Kingdom, some eminent writers have presented us with a kind of Christianized pantheism, which endeavors to make out a systematic organic development by asserting a continuation of the Divine and human natures of Jesus Christ in believers through the church, thus elevating the latter into a Kingdom. To make out such an organic history, the Papacy and a host of outgrowths are embraced, as in the main legitimate results of Christianity itself, etc. If a spiritual interpretation does not suffice, a mystical is added to exalt the church into the proportions of a kingdom; and when stripped of its persuasive generalities, it resolves itself into "a perpetually growing incarnation of God and deification of man," or "the development of the Divine essence in man." The trouble is, that this drag-net draws too much weight for the strength of its meshes. When compared with the simplicity of the covenant, with the history of believers and of the church, with the union and fellowship as presented by the Word, it is merely man's hypothesis. Its refutation has preceded, and will follow.

Thus e.g. Rev. S. Miller, advocating Dr. Nevin's theory, in his Mercersburg and Mod. Theology, p. 41, etc., forms a Kingdom, embracing the divine-human life, drawn from Christ, which he designates a "new Kingdom," not in the sense of renewed, but entirely new. This Kingdom, according to his view, was only inaugurated by the divine-human life of Jesus, and is entered by the person who partakes of the divine-human nature of the Christ. This mystical conception is, as our line of argument conclusively shows, utterly opposed by covenant, prophecy, the preaching of John, Jesus, the disciples, and apostles, etc. The Word always speaks of this Kingdom as something visibly, externally manifested in the form covenanted. Even if we were to adopt Miller's notion that the Church is an organism starting in the person of Christ, and being "a continuation of the Incarnation" by the imparting of the humanity or life in Jesus, it would not follow that it is the covenanted, predicted Kingdom. In a conversation with him (for he was an honored uncle of mine) on this point, he said he might receive Chiliasm and still retain his view, on the ground that this was preparatory, or as a stage in his development theory. Shortly before his death, he made Chiliasm a study (with what result the writer does not know), being deeply impressed by the historical argument in its favor. One remark of his deeply impressed the writer, viz. : that Eschatology had not received the attention that it deserved, in view of the end contemplated by Redemption, for, evidently, the prevailing views were defective, lacking Scriptural unity.

PROPOSITION 90. Members of the Church, who are faithful, are promised this Kingdom.

There is only one kingdom, Prop. 35, etc. Saints who become the seed of Abraham, are to receive, inherit this kingdom of promise, 1 Thess. 2 : 12 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 5 ; 2 Pet. 1 : 11 ; Matt. 25 : 34, etc. The Kingdom preached by the Baptist, Jesus, and the disciples continues to be proclaimed, Acts 8 : 12 ; 14 : 22 ; 20 : 25 ; 28 : 31, etc., and believers become "heirs" of it, Jam. 2 : 5. The wicked shall not inherit it, 1 Cor. 6 : 9. The apostles represent themselves and co-laborers as working for it still future, Col. 4 : 11 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 5 ; 2 Tim. 4 : 18 ; Heb. 12 : 28, etc.

Obs. 1. This Proposition is only intended to specify one of the results arising from preceding Propositions ; and it is decidedly corroborative of our argument that the Scriptures employ language to indicate the futurity of the Kingdom. If the church is the Kingdom, and believers are now in it, why designate them "heirs," etc., of a Kingdom? If the future Kingdom, as Theologians so confidently assert, is only a continuation of such a Kingdom, why employ then the specific language of inheriting a Kingdom still future, if that is only a prolongation, etc., of this one, and the inheriting has already commenced? If believers already by entering the church, enter into the promised Kingdom of God, and if this Kingdom is merged into a future one, it would be somewhat inconsistent to urge them to strive for that which they already possess ; or, at least, the language ought to be so changed that they are urged to retain their hold upon a present Kingdom lest they forfeit the future prolonged one.

The early Church view is content, and so are we, to receive the language unchanged as confirmatory of our doctrine, so that, as Clement (sec. Epis.), it exhorts all that "all may attain to the Kingdom of God," asserting that in the future "we shall enter into His Kingdom, and shall receive the promises." But such is not the teaching of monkish theology, Roman Catholic, and even in much of Protestant Divinity, which declares that being already in the Kingdom you shall obtain the continued Kingdom. The incongruity, to say the least, of representing "heirs" as already possessing the Kingdom is scarcely noticed, and even the appointed time of inheriting, specifically located at the Sec. Advent, is ignored. This only shows how prejudice can refuse to receive the plainest statements of the Word. Believers are not in this Kingdom, but "called unto" it (1 Thess. 2 : 12 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 5, etc.) ; the passages which are supposed to teach the contrary will be noticed in detail under following Propositions. For the present, it is sufficient to say that the Bible is not contradictory, and the few places which are alleged to be contradictory must, in the nature of the case, be explained by the general analogy on the subject. Oosterzee (Ch. Dogmatics, vol. 1, p. 67, and vol. 2, p. 696) introduces a division, "Of the Church, or the Training School of the Kingdom." The idea of a training school is excellent, suggested both by Scripture and experience, but to make the notion still more distinctive and Scriptural, we suggest "the Training School for the Kingdom," which is one of the objects intended by the Church.

Obs. 2. Making the church the promised Kingdom, and believers in the enjoyment of it, has logically led some of our opponents (not all, for many recoil from it in view both of experience and the sad history of the church), to proclaim, that the promises relating to the reign of the saints are now also fulfilling. We leave one of the earliest give his view. Thus, e.g. Augustine (City of God, B. 20. s. 9) says: "The church could not now be called His Kingdom, or the Kingdom of heaven, unless His saints were even now reigning with Him;" and endeavors to make out such an existing Kingdom by showing that the saints now reign, summing up: "in fine, they reign with Him who are so in His Kingdom that they themselves are His Kingdom." Leaving the reign of the saints for a distinct Proposition (154) it is sufficient to say that earlier Fathers distinctly oppose Augustine in his wholesale and mixed interpretation. Thus e.g. Barnabas (Epis. ch. 6) declares, that saints do not rule now; and speaking of the promised dominion adds: "We ought to perceive that to govern implies authority, so that one should command and rule. If therefore, this does not exist at present, yet still He has promised it to us. When? When we ourselves also have been made perfect (so as) to become heirs of the covenant of the Lord."

This notion that saints now possess the Kingdom, now have dominion, etc., has wrought great mischief, as Eccl. History attests, not only in hierarchical tendencies, in perverted and extravagant claims of authority, but also in fanaticism, as e.g. Anabaptists, Mormons, Hackett, the Prophet who was proclaimed (July 16th, 1832) "the sole Monarch of Europe," and many others. Our doctrine closes the door against all such claims and vagaries. The reign of the saints, as delineated in the outlines of the Divine Purpose, confirms our position.

Obs. 3. Only believers are promised this Kingdom. Faith and its fruits are essential to its inheritance. This is pointedly declared in Scripture, as e.g. Gal. 5:21; Eph. 5:5, etc. If the Jews were accounted unworthy because of lack of faith, etc., to receive this Kingdom—if they were rejected and a seed must be raised up unto Abraham, we may rest assured that it will be, it must be, "a righteous seed." This becomes the more necessary in view of the position that this seed is to occupy in the Coming Kingdom, viz.: that of co-rulers with Jesus Christ. Therefore the Word assures us that even out of "the many" but "few" will be chosen, and those only because they are believing and faithful.

In opposition to Holy Writ we have the theories of man. Thus e.g. Kingsley (Sers. on Nat. Subjects, 1 Ser., p. 14) makes man by nature a member of Christ and inheritor of the Kingdom of heaven. He so secularizes the Church, calling it the Kingdom of Christ, of heaven, etc., that the world is the Church and the Church the world, including all men, but specially manifested as a Kingdom when recognizing its relation to God. Some Amer. Universalists entertain very much the same view, so that all men belong to it by right, and will ultimately be identified with it; now the Kingdom, however, is only exhibited in and through those who acknowledge the truth, etc. The same idea is given to us by Prof. Seeley, author of Ecce Homo (p. 339) when making the Church a Kingdom, he says that it is such because "based upon a blood-relationship, the most comprehensive of all, the kindred of every human being to every other."* This notion is paraded by the Free Religionists, Humanitarians, etc., and is covertly stated by some who desire to be regarded as orthodox. Such opinions, however, are flatly contradicted by the Word of God, not only in the distinction made between the righteous and wicked, but by that feature which our entire argument enforces, viz. : that "Salvation is of the Jews," not because it originated or was at one time identified with them, but because it pertains, by covenant relation, to them. To them the promises were given, not to all men ; and the only way to obtain the promises with them is to be engrafted into the true olive tree. Now all are invited to become the seed of Abraham, but comparatively few accept of the terms of adoption. Instead of being related to the Kingdom of God by nature, by a common humanity, by the assumption of our nature by Christ, we must by the obedience of faith present ourselves in the line of the covenanted, chosen people ; and when, in the predicted time, God shall restore that chosen people to its forfeited position, the engrafted ones inherit the Kingdom with the Son of man.

---

* This idea of blood-relationship reminds one of what Bungener (The Preacher and the King, p. 205) states of a certain La Tremouville, who, in his pride of birth, his arrogant dependence on blood-relationship, declared: "God would look twice before He damned me." Many, who make no such claim, still feel themselves good enough for God's Kingdom, without any heart and life preparation, not realizing that God is no respecter of persons.

Obs. 4. In Matt. 16 : 18, 19 Jesus seems to distinguish between the church and the Kingdom by placing the Kingdom of heaven in opposition to it, enforcing the idea that the church leads to, or is appointed as a means to attain unto, the Kingdom. The church is founded and, in addition, the keys of the Kingdom are (Prop. 64) committed to it, so that through its instrumentality believing members may finally inherit the Kingdom. It would be an easy matter to select from our opponents a multitude of writers who indorse this view, that in this passage the church leads to the Kingdom, but in correspondence with their theory make the Kingdom one in the third heaven and not one on the earth. Others include in the expression both the church and the third heaven, while others confine it exclusively to the church. Its true meaning must be sought for in other passages, as in the covenant and specific announcements of the Kingdom.

Obs. 5. The passage Matt. 8 : 11, 12, when "many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the Kingdom of heaven, but the children of the Kingdom shall be cast out," etc., not only confirms (1) the Proposition ; (2) the election of the Jewish nation ; (3) the offer of the Kingdom to the covenanted people, but it also establishes (4) the fact, that the church is not the Kingdom here mentioned, seeing that this Kingdom is related in the covenanted manner with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Hence commentators generally apply this Kingdom either to the third heaven or to the one still future.

Obs. 6. Flesh and blood cannot inherit (i.e. to become a ruler in it) this Kingdom, 1 Cor. 15 : 50. Just as it is with the Head, the Mighty One, that the covenant and promises demanded an immortal Ruler, so it is with His members, the body. As King He is to be manifested in His glorified form—a David's Son possessing all that is requisite to fulfil the Word ; so also the saints, as co-heirs, kings and priests must be in their glorified condition before they receive the Kingdom. Hence, while in the church, in flesh and blood, they only await the promises—hope and pray for their realization. The church, then, instead of possessing a Kingdom, as actually existing according to promise, only possesses it in anticipation, in looking for and expecting its arrival.

Obs. 7. Prophecy does not predict a Kingdom to exist between the First and Second Advents of Christ as a prelude to the Kingdom of the Eternal Ages. To make out such a prediction, Prophecy must be wrested from its connection, or else it must be spiritualized to make it sufficiently accommodating.

The extravagances in this direction culminate when men of learning and ability make themselves out to be already in "the New Jerusalem state," in "the enjoyment of Millennial glory," in possession of "the latter day glory," etc. The Church in its present imperfect state is eulogized until it assumes the portraiture of the predicted Kingdom, but such eulogies are at the expense of a consistent interpretation and of the real history of the Church. As this infatuation, derived from Origenistic sources, is so general, it may be proper to pass over some views in detail, although our argument, based on the covenant, scarcely needs the addition.

PROPOSITION 91. The Kingdom of God is not the Jewish Church.

This is evident from the Theocratic government by which State and Church were united; from the same as administered under the Theocratic-Davidic arrangement; from the overthrow of the throne and kingdom while a churchly arrangement remained; from the preaching of John, Jesus, and the disciples, saying "the kingdom of God is at hand," showing that it did not then exist but was promised to be "at hand" or "near" on condition of repentance; and finally from the rejection of the Kingdom and its postponement until after "the times of the Gentiles." Whatever churchly or religious organization existed among the Jews after the overthrow of the Kingdom, they themselves, as we have shown, did not regard the Kingdom of God as existing just prior to the First Advent.

Obs. 1. This Proposition in this form is the more necessary, since many writers spiritualizing this reign into "God's reign in the heart," "piety," etc., endeavor to make out that the Kingdom was actually realized without the cognizance of the Jews, and in opposition to the first preaching. We would rather accept of the expectations of the pious Jews, of the direct preaching of the disciples, etc., than of such a theory, simply because the former is in accord with the most solemnly pledged covenant of the Word, while the latter totally ignores the oath-bound promises.

Obs. 2. This Proposition is yielded to us by many of our opponents, some already quoted, who make the Christian Church something new, and hence a Kingdom in a form in which it did not previously exist, although a continuation of the Jewish Church. But if the Christian Church is a prolongation of the Jewish in another form with increased light, privileges, etc., it goes far toward establishing the Propositions that follow concerning the church. If the one was no Kingdom as admitted, then the other following is none, for these writers to make out a union between them, tell us that members of both are justified by faith, saved by grace, adopted by God, and participate finally in the same promises and redemption. Real consistency requires both to be elevated to the position of a Kingdom, which some do, although hostile to covenants and promises. Logically there is no escape here, and those writers are really the most consistent (although opposed to the facts as they existed), who make no discrimination between the Jewish and Christian Churches, pronouncing both to be the Kingdom of God for the reason that the characteristics of believers at the present day in the church are precisely the same (as e.g. faith, obedience, love, hope, etc.), that they were in the Jewish Congregation. Hence, if certain traits, qualifications, characteristics, as many assert, denote the Kingdom, then the Kingdom existed in both churches. The latter, however, remains unproven.

Obs. 3. We find on this point the most contradictory statements. Writers who fully admit that the Kingdom is to be established only under Christ, and who even tell us that this dispensation is thus distinguished, are forced by the interpretations given to the Kingdom itself to locate it back of this dispensation in the Jewish Church; and then to reconcile their theory inform us that the Kingdom existed in one form in the Jewish Church and now it is exhibited in another in the present Church. But all this is antagonistic to the most prevalent and confidently given interpretation of the Kingdom. If the Kingdom is what Dr. McCosh, and others, inform us, "God's rule in the hearts of men," then no difference should be made between the churches, for such a rule has ever been manifested. Such a Kingdom has ever existed even before the Theocracy was set up; such an experience is compatible without the establishment of a Kingdom here on earth, as we see in Adam, Abel, Enoch, etc. Gratefully accepting of God's Sovereignty, of the duty of obedience to Him, etc., it does not follow, as shown by preceding Propositions, that this constitutes the predicted Kingdom. If it does, then covenant language has no definite meaning; then the Prophets and the early Preachers miserably mistook this Kingdom, promising as in the future what learned men tell us ever existed. No! that class of writers, equally learned and more scriptural, are correct when they assert that the predicted Kingdom is one that had no existence at the time of the Advent, and that it is one which Christ Himself is to establish.

Obs. 4. Any definition of the Kingdom under Christ, which affirms nothing more than was experienced by the pious Jews at the First Advent, is most certainly defective. Such are "God's reign in the heart," "religion," etc. Such definitions should, in the very nature of the case, excite a mistrust that there must be error somewhere, because opposed in spirit to express prediction and promise. The Jews, such as Simon and others, were utterly ignorant of the honor they possessed of being already incorporated with a Kingdom they waited, looked, and prayed for. Such definitions, however well meaning, are virtually a lowering of Scripture promise and of the intelligence of ancient worthies. Feeling this deeply, sadly, we write plainly for the sake of the truth.

Obs. 5. The reader's attention is recalled to our argument which clearly shows, under Propositions pertaining to the covenants, etc., that the Church itself as it existed before the formation of the Theocracy was no Kingdom here on earth; that such a Kingdom was first presented when the Theocratic form of government was instituted, God Himself condescending to act in the capacity of an earthly Ruler over the nation, and State and Church were firmly united in mutual support. After this government was overthrown or temporarily set aside, owing to the unworthiness of the nation, the Church remained as previous to the Theocracy; but it is never recognized by the Prophets as the Kingdom—the believer being directed to look for and await its coming. This posture of waiting the pious portion of the nation occupied.

Obs. 6. It is right, therefore, to say, that the Church has always existed and even, as some do, to declare, that the Christian is a continuation of the previous Church in another form and with added privileges ; but it is wrong to assert that the Church, without the previously ordained visible Theocratic order in actual union with it, is the Kingdom of God in the sense given by covenant and Prophet. It lacks the God-given distinguishing Theocratic arrangement which can alone elevate it to the position of a Kingdom here on earth, viz. : God through man acting in the manifested real capacity of earthly Ruler.

Obs. 7. To illustrate how the Jewish Church is elevated, in a circumlocutory way, to the position of a Kingdom, we select an example. Thus Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 65) affirms (quoting Owen's Prel. Diss. to Hebrews to sustain his point), that the Church has always existed ; that Christ did not take one away to set up another ; that the Christian Church is the same as that before the Advent ; and afterward in his work calls this Church, which he has made identical, the Kingdom of God. The truth is, that all who take Fairbairn's position respecting the Church, and then designate it "the Kingdom of God," cannot avoid logically making (notwithstanding their disclaimers to the contrary that Christ's Kingdom was only established at His Advent, and is the only Kingdom of promise), the Jewish Church the same Kingdom.

Obs. 8. This last is attempted in another quarter, judging from the book notices in the Evang. Review (Oct. 1873), and Scribner's Monthly (Dec. 1872). Abbey, in a work called "The City of God and the Church Makers," takes the ground that the Christian Church and the Jewish are not only the same, but that they are one, beginning in Eden, basing their essential likeness as the same Christian Church, City of God, or Kingdom of heaven in Christ, He being an eternal person, etc. While there is propriety in the efforts to rebut the antagonism which some erect between the Old Test. and New Test. churches, yet there is the same old mistake of recognizing the Sovereignty of God or of Christ as constituting the Kingdom, and an ignoring of the plain covenanted fact that the Kingdom is promised to Jesus Christ, not merely in virtue of His divinity, but as Son of David, the predicted Son of Man. This simple and undeniable truth, in connection with the history of the covenanted development, overturns all such theorizing. All notions of the Kingdom that do not stand the test of the Covenant must be discarded.

Those who affirm that the Church is the Kingdom of God, and claim that John the Baptist was in the Kingdom, are met and confounded by even a single passage, Mat. 11 : 11, where the least in the Kingdom is represented as greater than John, showing that by the Kingdom something else than the Church is denoted. Some, such are the contradictions involved, forgetting their own definitions of the Church as a continuous Kingdom, apply this passage, for fulfilment, to believers after the day of Pentecost. (Comp. Prop. 39). The least reflection will show that the Jewish Church had not the covenanted characteristics of the Kingdom, for as Daniel (7 : 22) says, the time had not yet come that the saints possessed the Kingdom, etc.

PROPOSITION 92. This Kingdom is not what some call "the Gospel Kingdom."

Having met with the phrase "Gospel Kingdom" in writings, and having heard it from the pulpit, this favorite expression of some may require a few remarks. By the phrase is evidently meant either this dispensation or the church or religion, or the proclamation of the gospel. It is a phrase of human coinage, nowhere found in the Bible, and is incorrect when applied to the present time. The gospel is good news, glad tidings concerning the Kingdom. Hence the phrase is never found in the writings of careful authors.

Obs. 1. It is strongly corroborative that the language of the Bible falls in so accurately with our line of argument. We read of "the Gospel of the Kingdom," seeing that the Gospel itself has no power to produce the Kingdom, but is simply preliminary to it, designed to call the elect, who become "heirs" of the Kingdom.

A writer (Proph. Times, 1873, p. 105) makes a distinction between "the Gospel of the grace of God" and "the Gospel of the Kingdom of God," which appears, in some respects, to be well founded. The favorite terms of some theologians, such as "the Kingdom of grace," "the Kingdom of the cross," "the mediatorial Kingdom," are not found in Scripture, and while freely acknowledging the astonishing and unmerited grace existing in the Church, and that the future Theocracy is one of grace, yet the titles, however well intentioned, are not applicable, being misleading in their nature. When Jesus directly predicts the results of the preaching of the Gospel of the Kingdom, it is never intimated that any one of them is to form out of the Church, or believers of the Gospel, a Kingdom. The passages which are wrongfully inferred to teach the contrary will hereafter be examined in detail. The means are by multitudes mistaken for the end, as e.g. by the Homilist (quoted by Nast, Com. on Matt., p. 323), which makes the Gospel to be "the Kingdom of God," because it produces "the reign of God over all the powers of the soul." To "preach the Gospel," or to "preach the Kingdom" (e.g. Luke 9 : 2, 6), is to present motives, etc., urging and inviting persons to become worthy of it when it, the Kingdom, comes in power and glory.

Obs. 2. Aside from other considerations, we have shown (Prop. 59, Obs. 5), that the Kingdom was tendered to the Jews but owing to their sinfulness was to be taken from them (i.e. could not inherit or receive it), and was to be given to another chosen, gathered people. The Kingdom was taken from the Jewish nation, but the nation, as all admit, retained the Gospel—the privileges of this dispensation, of the church, of religion, in brief, of all that pertains to the Gospel. It follows, therefore, as a national sequence that if the Kingdom was taken from them, that Kingdom did not consist in "the Gospel Kingdom," whatever meaning may be attached to it, for to this, if it denotes the present dispensation of the Gospel, the nation was made first accessible, the preaching of the Gospel commencing at Jerusalem. Other objections will be noticed in what follows.

We append Dr. Brown's (Com.) comment on Matt. 21 : 43 : "Therefore I say unto you, 'The Kingdom of God'—God's visible Kingdom or Church, upon earth, which up to this time stood in the seed of Abraham—'shall be taken from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof,' i.e. the great evangelical community of the faithful which, after the extension of the Jewish nation, would consist chiefly of Gentiles, until 'all Israel should be saved.'" But (1) the Church was not taken from them ; (2) this very "nation" thus called is of the seed of Abraham, natural and engrafted ; (3) that the bestowal of this Kingdom is future, when the "nation" is gathered (comp. Props. 57-66). Some commentators, not knowing what to do with the passage, owing to their Church-Kingdom theory, conveniently pass it by. Those especially who take the ground (induced by Heb. ch. 11, Gal. 3 : 8 ; Heb. 4 : 2 ; 1 Cor. 10 : 2-4 ; Eph. 2 : 19, 20 ; 1 Pet. 1 : 10, 11 ; Jude 14, 15 ; Dan. ch. 7, etc.) that the Ch. Church is only a continuation of the more ancient Church, are pressed by the passage. Imagination is the basis of numerous interpretations and applications.

PROPOSITION 93. The Covenanted Kingdom is not the Christian Church.

Desirous to respect and honor that overwhelming majority of able and learned men, who hold and teach that the Christian church is the Kingdom of Christ predicted by the prophets and so solemnly covenanted to Him, yet truth and justice demand an unequivocal denial of this doctrine. The reason for such denial is found in the terms of the covenant itself. The church possesses none of the characteristics of the kingdom promised to David's Son. The Theocratic relationship, the throne and kingdom of David, are lacking.

Obs. 1. The Christian Church is an association of believers in Christ, who, led by the same consciousness of God, truth and spirit, accept of the terms of salvation, repentance and faith, and continue in the use of the means of grace appointed by the Redeemer. It is an association exclusively for religious purposes, separate and distinct from civil or secular interests. It is different from the Kingdom once established in that State and religion are separated, hence involving no civil or State relationship, for members of all nations and States, without absolving their allegiance due as citizens to their respective civil powers, can become members of this exclusive religious organization. It is different from the Jewish Church, before and after the Theocratic rule, in that it embraces new ordinances, discarding the Mosaic, and is open to both Jew and Gentile by an expression and experience of faith in Jesus Christ. It was formed solely on account of the rejection of the Kingdom by the Jews, in order that through it a body of believers might be raised, through whom finally, when all gathered, the Kingdom might be reorganized in the most effective and triumphant manner. Originated for this special purpose it was designed, as its commencement proves, to be separate and distinct not only from the Jewish State but all other States. Union with secular powers was not contemplated, because it was not in accordance with the design of its establishment, viz. : to call and gather out of the nations and kingdoms a believing people. If the object had been to organize a Kingdom, we then undoubtedly would have had a specific form of government given to us, and direct declarations concerning the union of State and Church, and the exercise of civil and political power. The absence of such directions abundantly confirms our argument. It is necessarily outward so far as the persons, ordinances, assemblies, expansion, form of worship, etc., is concerned ; and inward, so far as individual experience, adoption, union with Christ, etc., relates. It is a community of saints, who, while occupying various positions in life, are not deprived by it of civil, social, or family relations, but rather by the formation of such a community find their conduct in all these relations regulated and controlled. Having no ecclesiastical constitution for government (such as were afterward produced by human invention), given by divine authority, it rests in a few indispensable commands respecting its organization and perpetuity, acknowledging in these the Sovereignty of God and the Headship of Christ, and constantly realizing by obedience to the religious and moral precepts, of which it is the guardian, that it is under Divine guidance, and in reality the product of Divine power and grace.

This interpretation of the Church, with the exception of the excessive High Church view, which, against the testimony of both Scripture and History, insists upon the immediate establishment of a Hierarchy, and with the exception of that of Erastianism, which, against the Apostolic order, prescribes a union of State and Church, is substantially that adopted by many of our opponents, who, however, are forced by their theories to add to it the notion of an existing predicted Kingdom. Aside from the latter idea, when we read the interpretations given by various writers directly of the Church, we find but little difference from the one presented, and none to necessitate the view that it is a Kingdom. Neander tells us that the Church is "a union of men arising from the fellowship (communion) of religious life; a union essentially independent of, and different from, all other forms of human association." Then what he adds enforces our position instead of his own: "It was a fundamental element of the formation of this union, that religion was no longer to be inseparably bound up, either as principal or subordinate, with the political and national relations of men," etc. (See Ch. His., sec. 81, ch. 4. and then compare sec. 52 where he contradicts this by giving the Church such relations and a world dominion.) We might well ask, Why not so bound? There must be some substantial reason. Mosheim (Inst. of Eccl. His.), in his preface, is guarded not to call the Church a Kingdom, whether intentional or not. Admitting that as an association it is governed by certain laws and institutions, and has its officers, he calls it "a society or community" formed by the body of Christians. Dr. Hagenbach, in his Acad. Address on Neander's services as a Church historian (Bib. Sacra, Oct., 1851), shows that according to Planck in his His. of the Origin and Formation of the Christ. Eccl. Constitutions, the Church is no Kingdom, but a union of individuals voluntarily coming together, bound by the same religious belief, etc. Da Costa attributed, according to Hurst (His. of Rationalism, p. 360), only "a relative value to the Church of the Gentiles, the Church before the Millennium," referring us to the Millennial era for a proper and developed Kingdom. This is the position of many Millenarians (Da Costa being regarded one), and seems partly also to be the idea of some of our opponents, especially of Neander, in his view of the final world-dominion. These few quotations are amply sufficient to illustrate our own view, that in the definition of the Church there is nothing that requires us to entertain the idea that it is a Kingdom.

The reader can find numerous illustrations in various Confessions, His. of Doctrines, Sys. Divinities, Theological writers, Works on the Church, Controversial Essays, etc. In this wide field the student will find every shade of opinion, from that of an association of believers to Schleiermacher's "living organism, i.e. the body of Christ" (or Lange's "the planting and development of the salvation and life of Christ in the social sphere," and "the typical commencement of the world's transfiguration"); from that of a simple congregation of receptive men and women to Schlegel's "great and divine corporation," "free, peculiar, and independent corporation," or to the most extravagant idealistic and mystical conceptions, or to the sterner idea of an existing, conquering Kingdom in a visible form (as e.g. Papacy, destined to a world-dominion. High-Churchism, Low-Churchism, Broad-Churchism, Spiritualism, Mysticism, etc., have here a favorite topic, but always, with few exceptions, considered isolated from the covenanted relationship. Many of the definitions could be adopted, provided the assumed transformation into a Kingdom were set aside. The most simple definition is that of the Apostles' Creed adopted in an art. in the Princeton Review, Ap. 1853, entitled "The Idea of the Church," viz.: that the Church is "the communion of the saints," in which, leaving out the notion of "a monarchy, an aristocracy, or a democracy," two affirmations are presented: (1) "the Church consists of saints, and (2) of saints in communion—that is, so united as to form one body."

Obs. 2. The first churches and the apostolic Fathers and their immediate successors, as already shown had no conception of the Church being the promised Kingdom of the Covenant and Prophets. They looked and prayed for its speedy coming at the Second Advent. Origen was the first one who made the Church the mystic Kingdom of God (see p. 112, Voice of the Church, by Taylor). Others followed in his interpretation; and if we narrowly examine history it will be found that two things materially aided in entrenching and extending this notion of Origen's. The first was the Hierarchical encroachments which such an opinion sustained and flattered. The second was the fact that religions everywhere, among the Romans, Greeks, Egyptians, Asiatics, etc., were firmly united with the State, thus paving the way for a similar union and the exhibition of the Christian religion in a sphere not inferior to Pagan.

The student will be amply repaid in tracing these influences in confirming the Origenistic notion, and thus giving power into the hands of designing, and even of conscientious men. Against this conversion of the Church into a Kingdom there was a protest, which was ultimately silenced as the Papacy increased in power, until finally it was only held by the Paulicians and Waldenses (see p. 126, Voice of the Church, by Taylor). Coming down to the Reformers, great allowance must be made for them, seeing that the magnitude of the work before them scarcely allowed it to be consummated within the period of their lives. They could not readily rid themselves of all the prejudices engrafted by former Church relationship, and resulting from the growth of centuries. Their immediate successors, as all Church historians sadly acknowledge, instead of prosecuting the work of Reformation, engrossed themselves in disputes, and pressed each other on points of differences—many non-essential—until as a measure of advancement they seized the former Church idea, and taking advantage of the Kingdom notion as a source of protection and strength, they granted fatal concessions (which the Reformers refused), even to Royalty and the civil magistrate, vesting to a certain extent ecclesiastical power in their hands, uniting Church and State, elevating the civil head to a religious position over the Church, which speedily brought forth its bitter fruit in proscriptions, disallowance of freedom to individual conscience, heresy-hunting, the imposition of extended symbols and formulas, depositions, imprisonments, banishments, and even in some cases, death itself. The leverage underlying all this was the unfounded doctrine, that the Church being a Kingdom here on earth, a real power in actual sway over men, such power was to be manifested and exerted in an external authority felt and acknowledged by all. For the exertion of such authority, civil and ecclesiastical power were, more or less, combined. While history abundantly attests this to be the case with their followers, the Reformers themselves held views which it is difficult to explain as consistent with the notion that the Church is the predicted Kingdom of Christ. They speak of the Church as a voluntary association for strictly religious purposes, and with all their concessions to the civil magistrate, they still emphatically declared that Church and State were separate in their existence, and they could not merge the one into the other. (Neander's Ch. His., Mosheim's Ecc. His., Fisher's His. of Ref., etc.). Their language is sometimes contradictory, but that they opposed, on the one hand, a secular rule of believers, and, on the other, an absorption of religious power by the civil head is positively stated. The contradictions that we find noticed by historians clearly indicate that they had no well-defined and authoritative conception of the Church as a Kingdom. Indeed, we find them using language respecting the future manifestation, and even speedy, of Christ's Kingdom at the Second Advent, the very spirit of which is opposed to the Church's now exerting a predicted kingly authority, and which fully accords with our own doctrine. The reader will find extracts given from Luther, Calvin, and others, by Taylor (Voice of the Church), by a Congregationalist (Time of the End), by Brooke's (El. of Proph. Inter.), by Elliott (Horos Apoc.), and others, which are difficult to reconcile with any other theory than that of the doctrinal position of the early Church, viz.: anticipating the Kingdom of Christ to be set up at His Second Coming. With all the honor that is due to these noble men, with respectful consideration of their vast and splendid services, yet the student feels that on some important points they are indecisive, indistinct, and somewhat contradictory. Hence their opinions, whatever they are, must be subjected, as they themselves desired and expressed, to the test of Scripture (Prop. 10).

Obs. 3. One class of our opponents who contend that the Jewish Church which existed at the First Advent was no Kingdom, certainly cannot make the Christian Church such, if the Kingdom as they inform us only denotes "God's reign" for that was characteristic of the Jewish Church. Another class, too circumspect to fall into so palpable an inconsistency, insist upon the points of identity between the Jewish and Christian Church, and pronounce them to be one and the same Kingdom of God. That this is erroneous will appear from the following considerations (1) The announcements of the Kingdom with which the New Test. begins is opposed to it, Prop. 19; (2) the expectations of the pious Jews, Props. 20, 47, 40, 41, and 43; (3) the condition of the Church does not accord with predictions of the Prophets respecting the Kingdom, Prop. 21; (4) the Church does not correspond with the preaching of John, Jesus and the disciples, Props. 22, 23, 38, 39, 54, 42, 44; (5) the Church is not like the Kingdom of God once established, lacking the Theocratic arrangement once instituted, Props. 25, 27, 28, 29; (6) the Church is not like the Kingdom once established, overthrown and promised a restoration, Props. 31, 32, 33; (7) the Church is not the Kingdom, otherwise the disciples were ignorant of what they preached, Prop. 43; (8) that the Church is the promised Kingdom is opposed by the covenants, Props. 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 52; (9) the preaching of the Kingdom as nigh and then its postponement is against making the Church a Kingdom, Props. 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, etc.; (10) the preaching of the apostles after Christ's death confirms our doctrine, Props. 70, 71, 72, 73, etc.; (11) the Church was not taken from the Jews but the Kingdom was, Prop. preceding, etc.; (12) the Church is not the Kingdom because it will not be given until the elect are gathered, Props. 62, 63, 65, 68, etc.; (13) The Second Advent is the period when the Kingdom is established, Prop. 51, 52. In brief the Propositions preceding all contain so many reasons for not making the Church the promised Kingdom of David's Son. The simple fact is, that if we once take the covenanted promises in their plain sense, and view the testimony of Scripture sustaining such a sense, it is utterly impossible to convert the Church into the promised Kingdom without a violation of propriety and unity of Divine Purpose. The remaining Propositions that follow, nearly all, are additional proofs sustaining our doctrine.

Incidental proof corroborative of our position, can also be alleged. Thus e.g. the conduct of the apostles, after the Christian Church was established, to conciliate the Jews in attending the sacrifices and services in the temple, and adhering in many respects to the laws and customs of Moses, can only be satisfactorily reconciled with our view, that the Christian Church (just as the preceding Jewish) is preparatory to the Kingdom. If a Kingdom was established, as Fairbairn and others assert, then the charge of unbelievers, that they had but an imperfect notion of the Kingdom and its proprieties, remains in force (and crushing, because if imperfect in knowledge on so important a matter as the goal, how can we trust them in other matters?) But from our standpoint we see only a matter of prudence, a manifested desire to avoid difficulty, etc., which, connected with things non-essential, was far from being inconsistent with a correct view of the church, its meaning and design. In the controversy between Paul and Peter, our opponents forget what they previously asserted respecting Peter's knowledge of the Kingdom in Acts, ch. 2 and 3 (excepting some, who tell us that even in those sermons he manifested great ignorance, possessed only "the husk," etc.)—for they inform us that Peter had low ideas respecting the Kingdom. They forget also that Paul's objections to Peter were based (1) on the rites and ceremonies being non-essential; (2) non-essential, but yet burdensome and leading to bondage; (3) non-essential, but yet calculated, if pressed too far, to obscure repentance and faith in Christ; (4) non-essential, so that even he (Paul), for the sake of conciliation, attended to some rites, but without sacrificing Christian truth. Nowhere does Paul base his rejection of Mosaic rites, etc., upon the fact of a Kingdom being established, but upon the fact of the provision made through Jesus for salvation, and the call of the Gentiles through repentance and faith. The Church-Kingdom theory feathers the shaft which infidelity (so e.g. Duke of Somerset, Ch. Theol., p. 76) sends against inspiration, seeing that Paul is pressed as the exponent of a Kingdom, over against Peter, James, etc. Our attitude and belief indicate no such antagonism. If one is overtaken in weakness by the effort to conciliate the prejudices of the Jews, this only intimates the nature and design of the church, and is no reason for the rejection of fundamental truth, because it is a mere matter of conduct, probationary discipline, test of character, etc., to which the apostles, having to fight the good fight of faith, were, like all other men, subject—the very church relationship evidencing the same.

Obs. 4. Some occupying higher ground, take the view that the Kingdom of God existed continuously before and in the Christian Church, asserting that the form of the Theocracy was changeable and temporary (so Kurtz, His. of the Old Covenant, p. 110), but that the essence was retained and transferred to the Christian Church, thus forming an unbroken Kingdom of God. To this we observe: (1) That the Theocratic arrangement as specified in the Davidic covenant is not changeable or temporary. It is promised by oath that His throne and Kingdom as established in His Son is eternal; (2) to make it temporary is equivalent to saying that God's effort to act as an earthly Ruler was a failure; (3) the only change that was made in the form was that caused by the Jews seeking a visible King and in this God acquiesced, and incorporated the principle, as we have shown, in His purpose of Redemption; (4) admitting the change of form, then the Church has less honor than the past Theocracy, in that it has not God for its earthly Ruler, and that, therefore, in this respect, there is a retrogression from the higher Kingdom to the lower; (5) it overrides with inconclusive proof the reasons we have already presented for the contrary view.

To avoid repetition, it is taken for granted that the reader has passed over the previous Propositions, and hence a mere reference to the line of argument is deemed sufficient. The answer to Kurtz is found in the Davidic Covenant, the prophecies based on it, and the first preaching derived from it. It is a most solemnly pledged truth, confirmed by the oath of the Almighty, that the Theocratic order, as under David, will be restored and most gloriously perpetuated at the appointed time under his Son, our Lord Jesus Christ. Hence it is impossible to allow to the church the features of a restored Theocratic Kingdom as covenanted; for there is no restored Jewish nation, no restored tabernacle of David, no restored earthly rule of God, no Theocratic rule manifested through David's Son, etc. Men may claim that this or that church is "the Theocratic Kingdom" (so Papacy), or "the Kingdom of God" (so many Protestants), or "Christ's Kingdom on earth" (so Shakers), or even "the New Jerusalem state" (so Swedenborgians), etc., but all, without exception, lack the covenanted and prophetic marks, so that a firm believer in the Word cannot allow any of them this coveted honor.

Obs. 5. It may be well in this place to illustrate the arguments that are employed by others to elevate the Church into a Kingdom, and we therefore select a work which has been specially written to perform this service.

In The Kingdom of Grace, ch. 2, the author gives us his Scriptural, and other authority. The Church is a Kingdom, (1) because "the Kingdom of God is within you," forgetting that this was addressed to the wicked Pharisees who were so unconscious of a Kingdom within them that they inquired concerning it, see Prop. 110; (2) "My Kingdom is not of this world," which we also teach, as will be shown under its appropriate heading, see Prop. 109; (3) that Jesus claimed to be King, which claim we admit to be just, but is far from proving the establishment of the Kingdom; (4) Jesus did not set up any direct claim to occupy David's throne while living, which we admit and clearly point out the reason for not so doing, viz.: the postponement of the Kingdom, see Prop. 58, etc.; (5) that David's Kingdom was not of heavenly origin as the church:—this is incorrect, as the reader will see by referring to Props. 26, 31, etc., and the covenant Prop. 49, all proving that it was God's own ordering, the throne and Kingdom claimed as His own, and the King himself being divinely consecrated or anointed to his position; (6) that Christ has not yet raised up David's throne, and therefore it is argued, that He never will,—this argument is presuming to point out what is right and proper for Deity to perform, and has been already answered; (7) the preaching of John, "Repent, for the Kingdom of heaven is at hand," is "evidently the gospel dispensation," for nothing else appeared near at hand but this, etc.—the reasoning is this: the Kingdom was predicted as near, the church was established, and hence the church is the Kingdom, which overlooks the change in the style of preaching, Prop. 58, and the postponement, Prop. 68. He continues (8) quoting Isa. 9 : 6, 7, and bases the alleged fact of the church being the Kingdom on, "of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end," saying: "This expression is, in my view, fatal to the theory of Millenarians; for, according to the principles of that theory, the government of Christ is to have no increase after the Second Advent. The elect will all have been gathered in against that great day, when the Son is to be revealed in glory from heaven." It is surprising to charge our theory with a doctrine which it pointedly repudiates, as can be seen by the early church view and the history of our doctrine down to the present, which insists on the reign of Jesus on the restored throne and Kingdom of David over the Jewish nation, and the spared Gentiles, etc. (9) Refers us to Rev. 3 : 21, claiming from the passage that Christ is on His throne, and now reigns in the predicted manner, but (a) the Word says that He is "set down with my Father on His throne," indicating great exaltation, but contrasted still with the "my throne," which in a special manner belongs to Him as Son of man; (b) he makes in this theory, as a present result, all the saints now rewarded, crowned, associated with Christ in His rule, against the most direct teaching to the contrary; (c) and following His theory, as given in another place, he makes these same rewarded and crowned saints lay aside their received honor to appear at the judgment-bar and receive their sentences; (10) He asks what advantage would it be to have Christ's visible throne on earth, for He could only be seen by a few; those in foreign countries, as China and America, could not see Him, unless "they should have new organs of vision given to them," etc. This is altogether unworthy of notice, and is only reproduced to introduce the remark: suppose after all that the apostolic Fathers and that long line of noble witnesses to the Kingdom as covenanted, and as held by Millenarians, are correct, would not such writers, who speak so disrespectfully of the Saviour's throne, its lowness and degradation if planted here on the earth, appear before that King with the deepest confusion? Brethren, who think that they do God's service by opposing us, should at least exhibit the respect due to discussions in which the Saviour's glory is involved. This observation is the more necessary in view of what follows. (11) For, he makes sport of the dominion attributed to Jesus by Millenarians, taking only as much of it as happens to suit his style of witticism. Thus (a) he refers to Winthrop (Lectures), arguing that the original grant of dominion (Gen. 1 : 26-28), lost by the fall, is restored by the Second Adam, giving as proof Ps. 8, comp. with Heb. 2 : 5-9. (b) He examines this with the following result: (1) Adam reigned personally over fish, fowl, cattle, creeping things, etc., so the Second Adam must do the same, and "what a glorious Kingdom this will be of our blessed Saviour! But we did not know that this was the Kingdom which He bought with His precious blood." Comment is unnecessary, for argumentation that can stoop to such absurdity, disallowing the dominion we give to Jesus, is unworthy of a serious reply (comp. Prop. 203). (2) He informs us that the phrase "Son of Man," in the 8th Ps., has not "the remotest allusion whatever to the man Christ Jesus,"—that it denotes man only, and sarcastically inquires whether the animals, etc., are to be also resurrected over whom He is to reign. (3) He says that Heb. 2 : etc., only applies to man so far as dominion over animals, etc., is concerned, and not to Christ; objects to Winthrop's making "the world to come" to mean "the inhabitable earth to come," on the ground that we are not at liberty to add a word as understood;—that we make by such application to Christ verses 8 and 9 contradictory;—that Son of man when it has a reference to Christ begins with a capital letter; that our theory makes David's language unmeaning, which only indicates humility, for David could not say, "Who is Jesus Christ that thou visitest him," etc. Against this argument based on the dominion promised to "the Son of man," it is sufficient to say, (1) that it is opposed to the views of multitudes who are hostile to Millenarianism. The commentators, as e.g. Barnes, Stuart, etc., decide in our favor—while theologians of all classes almost universally contend that Winthrop's argument is correct. (2) That it is in opposition to the early church view, and in direct conflict with the promises given to Christ; that as the Second Adam, the Son of man, all things shall be in subjection to Him. (12)

Lastly he refers to Ezek. 36 : 23-28 (admitting the literal restoration of the Jews), Ezek. 37 : 11-14, and Dan. 2 : but as these passages will be discussed under Propositions, we leave them with this conclusion : Such is the line of argument which a work devoted to make out the church a Kingdom, a visible and spiritual one, is only able to produce. From it the reader cannot fail to see that it infers such a Kingdom, being utterly unable to produce a decisive passage which declares either that the Son of man now reigns as predicted or that the church is at present His Kingdom.

The reasons given by Brown (Sec. Coming) are of a similar nature (only not so disrespectful in tone), and the Scriptures relied upon to sustain a present Messianic covenanted Kingdom are the following : Acts 2 : 29-36, Zech. 6 : 12, Rev. 5 : 6, and 3 : 7, 8, 12, Isa. 9 : 6, 7, Acts 3 : 13-15, and 3 : 19-21, and 4 : 26, 28, with Ps. 2, Acts 5 : 29, 31. As all these passages are frequently referred to and explained,—as they have no reference to a present existing Kingdom as covenanted (that being inferred),—as they must be considered in the light of the general analogy of the Word,—it is sufficient, for the present, to allude to them, so that the student may observe the exceeding slight foundation upon which the prevailing view rests. A direct passage in favor of the Augustinian view cannot be produced ; it is supported entirely by inference, as e.g. Fairbairn (On Proph.) infers it from the two discourses of Peter in Acts ; and Mason (Essays on the Church, No. 1), after correctly defining the church, supposes it to be the Kingdom of God, because he infers that such passages as Isa. 68 : 12, Isa. 49 : 23, Isa. 6 : 3, 5, and especially “He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles,” must apply to the present existing church. Now, we cannot, for a moment, allow that a Kingdom the subject of covenant and prophecy, the object of faith, hope, and joy, can be left, if really established, to mere inference. And more, we cannot believe, that if set up as many theologians tell us, the early church for several centuries would be unconscious of the same.

Obs. 6. A main leading feature in this effort to make out of the Church the predicted Kingdom of the Messiah, is found in applying to the present, things relating to the Church which are spoken of as prospectively (the present used as the future, Prop. 65, Obs. 9), as e.g. Heb. 12 : 22, 23. Promises are given which can only, as we shall hereafter show, be realized by the Church as a completed body. This principle must not be overlooked, as e.g. the marriage of the Church, which (1) one party confines to the Church now on earth as married to Jesus ; (2) another asserts is done as every believer enters the third heaven, so that recently a prominent theologian delivered a funeral discourse in which he made a distinguished minister, deceased, sitting down and already enjoying the marriage supper, etc. ; (3) while still another declares the same to be still future as the Scriptures and the early Church locate it, viz. : to occur only at the Second Advent. It will be satisfactorily seen, as we proceed, that many promises, that are only to be realized in the future Kingdom, are seized and appropriated to the Church ; and this is not only done by the Popes quoting and applying to themselves, as earthly Heads of the Church, Millennial predictions, but by Protestants in their laudation of Churches. This is done not only from motives of self-interest and ambition, but with a sincere desire to indicate the honor, stability, and perpetuity of Christ's Kingdom. Well may the former be attributed to some of the representatives of the Papacy who even appropriated descriptions applicable to Jesus unto themselves, while the latter is seen in the well-intentioned denomination of the Church by the phrase “the City of God,” given by Augustine, followed by the multitude, and recently re-introduced by Mansel, Abbey, and others. It is notorious that the names Israel, Judah, and Jerusalem are regarded by a host of writers as synonymous with the Church, without any regard to the connection of the prophecy that the same Israel, Judah and Jerusalem acted and overthrown for its sinfulness, is to be restored to favor, and is thus meant. The curses pronounced, are all carefully heaped upon them severally and shown in their case to be sadly realized, while the blessings promised to the identically same nation and city are taken from them and carefully bestowed upon the Gentile churches. Is this honest to the Record?

Obs. 7. This view of the Church, as we have already seen (Prop. 78), is not inconsistent with the earliest creeds. Those modern phrases and definitions so current are unknown to them. They embody a Scriptural idea of the Church, and are consistent with the doctrine received by the first churches (Props. 72-76). The later confessions of various denominations, generally, when speaking of the Kingly office of Christ and His Kingdom either deal in general expressions susceptible of different interpretations, and therefore indecisive; or else passages are quoted which teach both the Kingship of Christ and His Kingdom, but are practically misapplied by not more explicitly asking when the same shall be manifested. Thus in looking over several, Isa. 9 : 6, 7 is the favorite passage with them in making the Church the Kingdom of the Messiah. Instead of asking when this is to be verified, leaving parallel passages and the preceding context of Isa. 9, which predicts this to occur in union with the Jewish nation at a time of mighty national deliverance (see verses 3, 4, 5, Barnes, Hengstenberg, Gesenius, etc., loci), they appropriate the passage isolated and torn from its connection. In one confession, more plain than others, it is asserted that "Jesus Christ hath here on earth a spiritual Kingdom which is His Church," etc., and the proof texts given are Matt. 11 : 11 and 18 : 19, 20. Neither of these texts have a direct bearing and are inferred (wrongfully) to teach it.

Obs. 8. The same is true of works on Systematic Divinity. Thus, e.g. Dr. Hodge in his recent work gives as proof texts Isa. 9 : 6, 7 ; Ps. 2, etc., which only assert that Christ shall be king; also Dan. 7 : 13, 14 ; Ps. 45, 72, and 110 ; Luke 1 : 31-33, without attempting to show that they are correctly applied, but in a manner, as if such an interpretation was never questioned by the early church and many witnesses in the church. This is characteristic of many of them, and is especially weak when the design is to give a systematic view of Christian doctrine thoroughly founded on the Word in a clear and decisive form. Theologians of eminence take singular and contradictory views of the church as a Kingdom. One of the latest, Dr. Thompson (Theol. of Christ, ch. 10), endeavors to define the Kingdom of God. He opposes the view of Dr. Oosterzee, who makes the Kingdom of God a new thing not formerly in existence; he tells us, "To the men whom Christ addressed, the Kingdom of God was no new idea, or rather, it was no new phase; but it can hardly be said to have represented any definite idea to a generation that had so far lost the meaning of their own law and history,"—this against the preaching of John and the disciples, see Props. 39, 43, etc. After correctly and forcibly stating that this Kingdom is based on a Deliverer and redeemed people, although probably in a sense different from ours, he then informs us that the Kingdom is "not simply his providential government over the world at large, nor his universal government over this and all worlds" (thus sustaining our Propositions on the Sovereignty of God the Father and the Son); "nor the king and high priest set up in His name; but the presence and power of God felt and acknowledged in the hearts of those that trusted in Him and did His commandments" (comp. Props. 84, 85, 110, etc.). Subsequently he represents it as "the idea of a living present God who dwelt in the hearts of all true worshippers, as a monarch living among his subjects." Such a Kingdom he says Jesus preached, meaning "the presence of God as a Saviour realized to the soul," and gives utterance, under what he calls "a spiritual conception of the Kingdom," to a number of things as embraced in the preaching of Jesus that, so far as the Record goes, Jesus Christ never proclaimed. In reply, see the Props. on the preaching of Jesus and disciples.

If Jesus really did preach such a Kingdom as Thompson claims, it ought to be decided and established by the Gospels, but these unmistakably prove the contrary by the stubborn fact that neither the Seventy nor the Twelve comprehended the nature of the Kingdom to be such as he teaches. Another proof will be found below in next Prop., Obs. 2. We are indeed told that the more devout and spiritual, such as Zacharias, Simeon, Joseph of Arimathea, expected just such a Kingdom, but this is not only unproven, but contrary to the general, universal expectation of the Jews, Props. 20, 21, 40, 44, etc. Again, he declares that "the Kingdom consists in doing the will of the Father;" that "coming to the realization of God in His supreme Lordship over the soul, is the Kingdom;" that the Church, "held together by a personal faith in Him, did not constitute the Kingdom of God in the most pure and absolute sense;" that "the external, visible Church may shadow forth that Kingdom," while "the true Church of Christ" (i.e. as we understand him, true believers in union with Christ, hence the invisible Church) "is identical with the true Kingdom of God." All these definitions are of human origin; not one is to be found in the Bible (those expressions from which it might be inferred will be subsequently examined in Props. 108, 109, and 110), and every one of them mistakes the requisite qualification for entrance into the Kingdom, for the Kingdom itself. Repentance, faith, obedience, union with Christ, etc., are essential for inheriting, but do not constitute the Kingdom itself. The covenant forbids it.

Obs. 9. The church, as we have shown, being designed to gather out and raise up those who should be rulers in, inheritors of the Kingdom, it is necessary for them to possess certain qualifications. Those just mentioned are specified, and therefore true believers, instead of being in the Kingdom, are represented as being in a state of probation, of trial and testing. The very nature of probation is opposed to the idea of the Kingdom as given by the Prophets, and hence in the Epistles believers are exhorted to hold fast to faith and obedience that they might attain unto the Kingdom, 1 Pet. 1 : 7 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 5-11, etc.

Obs. 10. The church, instead of being represented as a Kingdom, is held up to us as a struggling, suffering people, Col. 1 : 24 ; 2 Tim. 1 : 8 ; 2 Cor. 1 : 5 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 4 ; 2 Pet. 4 : 12, 13, etc. The founders, the apostles, themselves suffered, Acts 14 : 20 and 9 : 16 ; Eph. 3 : 13, etc. Saints are to fill up the measure of Christ's sufferings, Acts 14 : 20 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 5, etc. Saints have endured martyrdom, and as such are still waiting until the body is completed. Take the descriptions given of Christians still groaning (Rom. 8 : 23), as given by Delitzsch (Ser. Ap. to Sys. Bib. Pyc.), in their trials, temptations, struggles against sin, etc., and how can this possibly be reconciled with the idea of a Kingdom such as the Prophets predicted under the Messiah, e.g. Isa. 25, etc.? "Pilgrims and strangers" in the Kingdom as promised, is something incredible. Tertulian (Treat. on Prayer, ch. 5), teaching that the Kingdom in the Lord's prayer is not the church, whilst admitting, as we do, that "God reigns in whose hand is the heart of all kings," locates the Kingdom, petitioned for, in the future at the end of the age, and in view of the present condi- tion of believers rebukes those who pray that this age may be protracted, on the ground that such a petition is virtually opposed to the spirit of the Lord's Prayer, and virtually asks for a delayment or detention of the Kingdom, saying, "Our wish is that our reign be hastened, not our servitude protracted," etc. Such should be our spirit and prayer. For "the disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his Lord," and if Christ, whilst on earth, instead of reigning as Son of Man, suffered for us, etc., we should, in our pilgrimage, anticipate reproach and suffering and not reigning or the enjoyment of a Kingdom. The sad history of the church teaches us that there is a deep and abiding meaning in Luke 12 : 49, and that she has indeed had a time of fire, and her trials indicate that this is not yet the Kingdom of peace under the benign reign of the Messiah as delineated by the Prophets. Individuals truly have peace with God in believing, but if faithful do not find it with their fellow-man, the world, or even in a great extent in the church itself.

Obs. 11. Those modern phrases of ministers and people, "of extending, enlarging, building up, etc., Christ's Kingdom" are not to be found in the New Test. They are the result of viewing the church as the Kingdom. The absence of such phraseology and eulogies of the church derived from Millennial descriptions must also have some weight with the student. For, if the church is what the many tell us, then surely we ought to find the portrayals of it as a glorious Kingdom to be extended by believers given by inspired men. But our argument logically and scripturally shows that such language from them would be fatal to the covenant itself. Christ Himself personally, and not men, can build up this Kingdom at the appointed time.

Much is said in books, sermons, hymns, prayers, etc., under the impulse of misguided zeal, respecting the Church's building up the Kingdom of Christ. This is a remnant derived from Popish sources, and reminds one of the Spiritual Exercises of Loyola (Littell's Liv. Age, vol. 122, p. 646), commending to the Order "the contemplation of the Kingdom of Christ Jesus under the similitude of a terrestrial king, calling out his subjects to the strife." The believer certainly carries on a warfare, constantly and unremittingly, if faithful, against temptation and evil, and in behalf of the truth and God's appointments, but never in behalf of an existing Kingdom. The latter is never asserted, and is, therefore, of human origin. What must we say, then, when bodies of Christians send forth circulars and proclamations urging believers to pray for the upbuilding, etc. of a present existing Kingdom, when in fact none exists in the sense they suppose, or, when an official oath is required of ministers (as in Prussia, established in 1815, and renewed in 1835), in which they swear that they will "extend in my congregation the Kingdom of God, and of my Lord and Master Jesus Christ," when such a Kingdom is given by the Father (Prop. 83) to Jesus at (Prop. 66) His Sec. Advent? Strange were man's wisdom, if the covenants are forsaken, leads him! Such a mode of procedure is unbecoming the eminent divines who have, unreflectingly, indorsed it, and may safely be left to others, as e.g. Mormons; for so Miss Eliza R. Snow, the Mormon Prophetess in the poem "Our Prophet, Brigham Young:"

"Help him to found thy Kingdom
In majesty and power," etc.

Obs. 12. The church is not this Kingdom of prophecy, because the establishment of the church does not meet the conditions of the prophecy respecting the period of suffering, etc., preceding the Kingdom. Notice (1) the views of the Jews (Van Oosterzee, Theol. of N. T., p. 53), that they expected the Messiah to come in a time of great trial; (2) this derived from the declaration of the Prophets, as e.g. Zech. 14; Dan. 7 and 12 ; this the language also of Jesus to the Pharisees, Luke 17, Matt. 24 ; (3) but instead of war, etc., as portrayed by Zech. and others, the Christian Church was established in a time of peace. The destruction of Jerusalem was afterward witnessed. This period of general peace is much admired and lauded by writers, and justly so, but their inquiries in this direction only proves the more conclusively that the church cannot be substituted for the predicted Kingdom, inasmuch as the very commencement of the former is not in accord with what is prophesied of the latter.

If the student refers to Props. 115, 123, 133, 147, 160, 161, 162, 163, etc., he will find the Scriptures relating to the period of war, suffering, etc., just preceding the establishment of the covenant Messianic Kingdom, showing that there is a wide and material difference between the First and Second Advents. And may it be most reverently said, that this very distinction of the condition of things as witnessed at the First Advent, and as shall be observed at the Second, is one of those incidental but forcible proofs of an all-pervading Plan which God purposes to complete.

Obs. 13. That such a Kingdom is not to be sought in the Christian Church appears also from the views entertained by our opponents of the general judgment. If the judgment exists in the form and manner given by them, and the believers, as well as unbelievers, are to be judicially tried at the end of the world, etc., then it is difficult to reconcile such a judgment with present admittance into the Kingdom of Christ, for the simple reason that the Scriptures assure us that entrance into by inheriting the Kingdom is inconsistent with a future judging of such persons. For such admittance is represented as a reward for previous well-doing and results from an investigation and approval of character (Matt. 25 : 34 ; Luke 22 : 29, 30 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 5, etc.).

Obs. 14. Those who believe that the church is the Kingdom, differ widely among themselves as to when it was established and in what it consists. As we have repeatedly seen, the time of its commencement varies, and a copious variety of definitions exist. This in itself would be undecisive, as differences in opinion may exist, and yet the truth may be in some one of them, but such, when they are found in the same party, clearly show that with them the subject is more or less involved in obscurity, giving rise to numerous conceptions of it. One theory steadfastly adhered to indicates at least unity, whilst several feebly conjoined, or antagonistic, manifests weakness. If we take the descriptions of the prophets and covenant promises, it is impossible to believe that the Kingdom of God should possess such characteristics that its commencement cannot be definitely and decisively fixed, and that its meaning cannot be precisely given. If we look at the prophetic announcements of the conspicuous nature, etc., of the Kingdom, it seems incredible that it should occupy the indefinite position assigned to the church.

As soon as spiritualizing is applied to the Kingdom, then antagonistic interpretations and opposite definitions are given, until we have in the same person two, five, ten, and even twenty different ones (see Prop. 3). This is the case with even the most recent writers, so that e.g. one (Van Oosterzee) makes Christ the Founder of this Kingdom at His First Advent, and another (Thompson) has Christ only reviving what previously always existed. The utmost latitude is given to generalities, which mean nothing, and qualifications for the Kingdom (and even the Gospel, preaching, etc.) are elevated into the Kingdom itself. Surely all this—in the light of positive prediction that the Kingdom when established is something recognizable by all men, something that all will acknowledge as indisputable in its manifestation—should prevent us from accepting this Origenistic view of the Church).

Obs. 15. Making the church the Kingdom of God is a plain violation of some important rules of interpretation. Thus, e.g. take those given by Horne (Introd., vol. 1, p. 393) on the doctrinal interpretation of the Scriptures, and we have a constant disregard paid to rules 1, 3, 5, 6, 10, and 11, and (p. 407) to rules 1, 2, and 3. For, as already repeatedly intimated, the view so generally entertained respecting the church is one of pure inference, whilst the general tenor concerning the Kingdom, the covenant and predictions in which it is specially discussed are practically ignored, preference being given to a few isolated passages (easily reconcilable with the general analogy), or to parabolic captions, which, in the nature of the case, must only be explained in the light of the more extended and detailed accounts given of the Kingdom. Besides this, our doctrine is the only one which preserves a consistency in the Old Test. idea of the Kingdom as held by the pious Jews, as preached by John and the Disciples, as covenanted, and which does not degrade the ancient worthies into an ignorant or mistaken people; interpreting as it does the Biblical view of the Kingdom in accordance with the ancient language, expectations, covenant, preaching, etc., and not with the Origenistic ideas and more modern modes of thought and spiritualizing.

Consequently we must logically and Scripturally reject any theory, no matter by whom advocated, which would make the Church, or religion, or piety, or the Gospel, or the dispensation, or the qualifications for eternal blessedness, equivalent to the Messianic Kingdom. Covenant, prophecy, provisional measures, fulfilment, ancient faith, all forbid it. The Church, however exceedingly precious and necessary, is in no sense the Kingdom, being simply preparatory for the Kingdom. Sustained as it is by the Divine Sovereignty; upheld as it is by the presence and authority of the Head, it has not the characteristics of the promised Kingdom. It is sad to find that men who exert a wide influence upon theological teaching do not discriminate in this matter, as e.g. illustrated in Robinson's Greek N. T. Dic., which makes the Kingdom to be the Christian dispensation, and then a principle in the heart, and then a people under the influence of holiness, and then to be perfected at Christ's Kingdom. (Comp. e.g. for reply to such places as Prop. 59, Obs. 8; Prop. 65, Obs. 2; Prop. 68, Obs. 1; Prop. 66, Obs. 1; Props. 67 and 70, etc.) Such definitions overlook the most simple statements in reference to this Kingdom, as e.g. that this Kingdom is allied with a Coming of the Messiah—not in humiliation, but in glory; with a restoration—not dispersion—of the Jewish nation; with a completed gathering of the saints, etc.

PROPOSITION 94. The overlooking of the postponement of this Kingdom is a fundamental mistake, and a fruitful source of error in many systems of Theology.

One of the most important events connected with the history of Jesus (Props. 58, 66, etc.) is entirely ignored by the multitude; an event, too, plainly stated, and upon which result fearful (to the Jews) and merciful (to the Gentiles) consequences. This remarkable event, interwoven into the very life of Jesus as a controlling force, is the postponement of the once tendered Kingdom to the Sec. Advent.

Obs. 1. This doctrine, noticed by, and influencing the faith and hope of the Primitive Church, is now, under spiritualizing and mystical ascendancy, passed by in numerous Commentaries, Lives of Christ, Systems of Divinity, Introductions to Theology, Histories of Doctrine, Practical Theology, and Exegetical Works, just as if it had no existence. The fact is, that many writers, with their minds prejudiced and blinded by a previous training, never even suspected its existence; for, following the lead of others, swayed by previously given systems of belief and exegetical indorsements by favorite authors, they receive their guidance without mistrust as in accordance with the truth.

The leaders themselves proceed thus: overlooking the postponement of the Kingdom, and assuming that a Kingdom was somehow established, they proceed, one in this fashion and another in that, to find this Kingdom somewhere, if not visibly at least invisibly, associated with the Church or the Divine Sovereignty. In their estimation, and assumption of an unproven theory, a Kingdom must be erected, if it takes four, six, eight or more Kingdoms in different stages and places, with various meanings attached (comp. Prop. 3), to make it out, and this moulds the interpretation of Scripture, for every passage not in harmony with it must be spiritualized until it is forced into an agreement. And this creature of pure fancy, so antagonistic to the covenanted Kingdom, which they are pleased to give the title of "the Kingdom of God," some even, like the author of Ecce Homo (p. 23), consider "greater than prophecy had ever attributed to the Messiah Himself." In brief: the Prophets and the Covenants are "too materialistic," "too Jewish" for this retined spiritually conceived Kingdom. Alas! men, eminent for piety, ability, and usefulness, materially aid in this wide departure from the primitive truth. While some of those theories form pleasant pictures, and are finely portrayed, still, like some of the imaginary paintings of the old masters, they have no reality upon which they are based—they, however widely spread and deeply rooted, are only the results of human suppositions. The writer has often been saddened to find believers, from whom he has derived much valuable information on various subjects when entering into the discussion of the progress of doctrine, entirely discard the Primitive Church view as if it had never been so generally and publicly entertained, although the postponement forms the basis of the call of the Gentiles, the establishment of the Ch. Church, and the distinctive Chiliastic views of the early Church (referring the Kingdom, etc., to the Sec. Advent). Some writers even suppose that the preaching of Jesus as the Christ is the present realization of the Kingdom in the person of Jesus. They illogically make the "preaching of the things concerning the Kingdom" the equivalent of the Kingdom itself.

Obs. 2. A truth so fundamental to a correct understanding of the Doctrine of the Kingdom, is buried under a load of prejudice, preconceived opinion, mysticism, etc. Infidel and Orthodox, unbelievers and believers, alike maintain on this point a friendly relation. Thus e.g. Renan (Life of Jesus) makes Jesus set up an ideal Kingdom, which is to appear immediately, and which, he tells us, is established. Dr. McCosh, in replying to Renan (Christ and Positiv., p. 243), admits the establishment of the Kingdom, and designates it a spiritual one. Rejecting the early church view (founded on the plain, unmistakable, grammatical sense of Scripture, and received directly from inspired men), which found a profound meaning in this postponement, and heartily embracing the Origenistic interpretation, which sadly mars the covenants and recognizes no postponement, this must necessarily have a moulding influence, a coloring power over all related subjects. One of the most radical defects in modern theology is found on this point, and, so long as persevered in, certain avenues of knowledge are closed; mystical interpretation; vain attempts to conciliate the Divine utterances with prevailing theories of church and state; labored, unavailing efforts to trace a methodical progress in the teaching of the Saviour and disciples; spiritualistic applications which effectually degrade the ancient faith of the church; the overshadowing and ignoring of highly important truth—these and other evils attend such a position. Thousands of volumes attest to the fact that, with this link missing, it is in vain to form a complete, perfect chain in the Divine Purpose, and at the same time preserve the integrity of the preaching of John, Jesus, and the disciples.

The sad consequences of overlooking this postponement is e.g. duly exemplified in the work (John on the Apoc. of the N. Test.) of Rev. Desprez (commended by Drs. Noyes, Williams, and Stanley). This writer, no doubt urged on by the critical attacks of unbelief in this direction, fully and frankly acknowledges all that we have stated concerning the preaching of the Kingdom and its expectation by the apostles and their immediate successors; but overlooking the plain and distinctive Scriptures which portray its postponement, he arrives precisely at the same conclusion with the destructive critics, viz.: that all this matter referring to a Jewish Kingdom, to the Second Coming of Christ, and to the final re-establishment, must be ruled out as no part of the Word of God (being the result of Jewish prejudice, misapprehension, etc.), because the lapse of time has fully demonstrated that nothing of the kind occurred as they expected. Alas! when accredited ministers of the Gospel give themselves up to such fearful destructive and delusive criticism to the delight of unbelievers! Of course, such an attitude at once eliminates a large proportion of the teaching of the Gospels and Epistles, utterly rejects the Apocalypse as revolving around a chimera, sets aside the covenants and God's oath as untrustworthy, and overshadows all the remainder with a heavy pall of doubt. If Desprez is correct, what confidence can we possibly have in the apostles, or in the utterances of any of the inspired writers; for if in error on the leading important subject of the Kingdom, why not also in error on the resurrection, the atonement, and, in brief, all other doctrines? No! never can such outrageous, dishonoring interpretation be received, although Desprez boasts of a phalanx of interlaced shields (of proof), for it lacks coherency in that it totally ignores the proof given by these writers themselves respecting the postponement of the Kingdom. The past is no criterion in the sense alleged by Desprez (although it proves the correctness of the postponement), and he had better wait until "the times of the Gentiles" are fulfilled before he thus decides. If Gentile domination ceases, if the Jewish nation is restored, and Jerusalem is no longer downtrodden, etc., and then the Kingdom does not come, it will be in place to receive his criticism; until then it amounts to nothing.

Obs. 3. The rejection of the postponement of the Kingdom, is a rejection of the only key that can unlock the singular and otherwise mysterious sayings of Jesus. The consistency of the Divine narration of Christ's Life, and of the faith and conduct of His disciples before and after His death, is alone preserved by its adoption. We have learned and able treatises on this life of Jesus, which give varied and subtle theories in order to reconcile events and sayings, and to preserve the unity of Purpose, but every one of them, even those written by believers (as Neander's, Lange's, Cave's, Fleetwood's, Milner's, Pressense's, Taylor's, Farrar's, Beecher's, etc.), must, more or less, resort to the favorite "germ" theory, to "a hidden leaven development," by which is understood that the truth is at first concealed or enveloped in language which—if understood as it reads, according to the letter, is error—the "growing consciousness" of the church, by a spiritualizing process through such men as Origen, Augustine, Jerome, etc., is to bring forth in its developed form, having discarded "the husk."

Volumes, some from most gifted, learned, and pious writers, are filled with just such mystical and philosophical reasoning, and all arising from a misconception of the covenanted Kingdom and an ignoring of its postponement. Another class of learned writers, rejecting in part the Origenistic principle of finding a concealed meaning or another sense, subjecting the New Test. to a searching grammatical interpretation, find that such a Kingdom, as we argue for, was promised, preached, and fondly expected, but, overlooking this postponement so explicitly declared, tell us that Jesus, failing in the designed restoration of the Davidic throne and Kingdom (expecting but not receiving aid through angelic interference—so Renan), He then contented Himself, under the pressure of circumstances, to sacrifice His life and found a spiritual Kingdom. Some men (Wolfenbüttel Fragments, pub. by Lessing, etc.) declare that Jesus in His efforts to establish a Kingdom, failing of the popular support, miserably perished, the victim of ambition. Becker (in his Univ. His. for the Young, quoted by Hurst, His. Raf., p. 190) thinks that Jesus received the idea of putting forth His claims from John and John's father, and that an arrangement was made between them to take advantage of the predictions relating to the Messiah in the Old Test., with the same result. Bahrdt, and many others recently, exult and triumph over this fancied interpretation, without in the least noticing how the expressive language and predictions of Jesus, in postponing this Kingdom, refutes their scandalous and vindictive assertions. What must we think of men who only take as much of the Record suitable for the purpose of condemnation, and carefully leave unnoticed the very testimony included in the same?

It may be suggestive, if not instructive, to contrast two classes, who both ignore the reasons assigned for and the predictions of Jesus relating to this postponement. In Ecce Homo, the writer informs us: "He (Jesus) conceived the Theocracy restored as it had been in the time of David, with a visible monarch at its head, and that monarch Himself." "Christ announced the restoration of the Davidic Monarchy, and presented Himself to the nation as their King; yet, when we compare the position He assumed with that of an ancient Jewish king, we fail to find any point of resemblance." Now let us consider the reply of Ecce Deus (p. 333) to Ecce Homo, viz.: that the Davidic Kingdom was only "typical" (just as if the covenant included a type) "of government and purpose which lie beyond the merely political horizon." And the writer argues from the fact that because such a restoration was not effected at the First Advent and since, Jesus never announced the restoration of the Davidic Monarchy (i.e. the language descriptive of it is "typical" of something else), and then, satisfied with his illogical reasoning, in his own fancy triumphantly concludes: "If the facts contradict the theory, what confidence can be placed in the theorist?" Precisely so: both writers ignore plain facts as given by Jesus and the apostles respecting the Kingdom, and not content with leaving these out of the question, confess that their unbelief is grounded on a non-fulfilment of prophecy and prediction, just as if God is bound to fulfil them, not according to His own Purpose and Time, but, to accommodate Himself to their mode of exercising faith. Such writers had better wait until "the times of the Gentiles" have ended, until the elect are gathered out, until the Sec. Advent arrives, until Christ's intermediate predictions are fulfilled, before rashly giving us those conclusions. We see from this what estimate to place on rationalistic criticism, which concludes, because the Kingdom that was covenanted, predicted, and preached was not at once realized; that, after all, Christ's relationship to the Old Test. was one of mere accommodation to circumstances; and this is arrived at by persistently turning away from Scripture, which tells us why it has not yet been realized and when it is to be witnessed. The same is true of that class, who, because the Kingdom did not appear in the form grammatically expressed, declare that the language applicable to it must either be understood spiritually or as pertaining to the Church—i. e. a Kingdom, in some form, visible or invisible, must be recognized to suit preconceived views.

Obs. 4. Let the student reflect over the singular attitude of the Primitive Church, viz. : in view of this very postponement laying the greatest stress upon Eschatology or doctrine of the last things, looking forward with hope and joy to a speedy Advent, the re-establishment of the glorious Theocratic Kingdom under the Messiah, etc., and can such a state of things be satisfactorily explained to take place under inspired teachers and their immediate successors without condemning the doctrinal position of the early church and reflecting upon the founders of the church, unless the same doctrinal teaching is accepted as Scriptural? Leaving the history of the doctrine for future reference, it is sufficient for the present to say that the idea of the postponement of the Kingdom had a most powerful influence, for at least three centuries, in moulding the doctrinal views of the church. Hagenbach (His. of Doc., vol. 1, p. 74), in summing up the general doctrinal character of the early church period, indicates this feature, when he says : "The doctrine of the Messianic Kingdom ruled the first period. This turned upon the point that the Lord was twice to come : once in His manifestation in the flesh, and in His future coming in judgment."

It has been remarked by many (as e. g. Ecce Homo, p. 22), that at the First Advent there was a general expectation that the Messiah would, by an irresistible and supernatural exertion of power, crush His enemies and establish His Kingdom, and that "this appeared legibly written in the prophetic books;" that He was rejected by His countrymen because He refused to put forth such power, etc. We have seen, under various Propositions, why He refused to exhibit such power. The time had not yet arrived, for the moral conditions imposed were not observed by the nation. But notice : the Primitive Church, instead of spiritualizing those prophecies, only postponed the fulfilment to the Sec. Advent; the traditional doctrine, the general expectation derived from the prophets, still continued in the Church, only allied with the Second Coming of Jesus. The apostles, instead of correcting this opinion, favor it by speaking of Him as one who, in strict accord with the prophets, shall come with supernatural power to destroy His enemies, etc., while the last revelation (the Apoc.) informs us that He will come "to make war," etc. The student, if judicious, will carefully consider this correspondence, and seek for its basis where alone it is to be found, viz. : in the Scriptures themselves. This meets the objections urged in various works, as e. g. Hengstenberg's The Jews and the Ch. Church.

Obs. 5. Writers commenting on the passage, "Nevertheless I tell you the truth, it is good for you that I go away; for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you," etc. (John 16 : 7), have much to say concerning the coming of the Holy Spirit as an advance doctrinally, etc., but fail to tell us why the Holy Spirit, whose special (for He had been previously present), manifestation is thus announced, could not come unless Jesus went away. This was necessary, because the sinfulness of the nation had postponed the predicted promised Coming of the Spirit with the Kingdom (comp. Prop. 170), hence a special interposition of the Saviour was requisite both to prepare the way for the gathering out of the elect and to give an assurance of a future fulfilment by an inchoate fulfilment secured through the obedience and exaltation of Christ.

This also enables us to answer the question proposed by unbelief, why Jesus Christ does not personally manifest Himself, at least now and then, to remove the unbelief of the world. The reply is, that having been rejected by the covenanted elect nation, and that nation suffering the consequences of such rejection, the Kingdom itself being postponed until the time arrives for the removal of the inflictions imposed, the withdrawal of the Messiah is part of that punishment entailed. Until "the times of the Gentiles" are ended, an open, visible manifestation cannot be reasonably expected. Besides this, the engrafting of Gentiles is, as we have shown, done on the principle of faith and not of sight. It ill becomes the dignity of the King to appear before the time fixed for the cessation of punishment and the gathering out of an incorporated people by faith. Killen (The Anc. Church, p. 46) asks the question, why so little notice is taken of the seventy in the New Test., and answers, because it was typical or symbolical of the future transmission of the Gospel. They could, however, be no type of the future, owing to their exclusive mission and message. The answer is found in the speedy postponement of the Kingdom ending their mission to the nation, and a sufficient amount of evidence being produced to show both the tender of the Kingdom and the rejection of the Messiah.

Obs. 6. The postponement of the Kingdom (with the events connected therewith), being the truth itself joining other truths in an intelligent and satisfactory manner,—is admirably adapted to meet and remove the objections of the Jews. The Jews, abiding by the plain statements of the Old Test., survey the various prevailing theories, advanced respecting a present existing Messianic Kingdom, and finding them one and all antagonistic to the covenanted and predicted promises, reject Christianity itself,—as if this humanly interpolated view was a part of Christianity (which it was not for the first three centuries). Compare Prop. 193.

Thus e.g. the objection urged by Rabbi Crool (Restoration of Israel), against Jesus as the Messiah, is, that He did not sit on David's throne or set up the Davidic Kingdom as it was predicted by the prophets and as covenanted; and also, that the Jews, instead of the promised peace, joy, exaltation, etc., under the Messianic Kingdom (if it really commenced at or immediately after the First Advent), found trouble, suffering, dispersion, etc. Now to such objections, the postponement, with the Scripturally given reasons for its occurrence, affords the only satisfactory reply, seeing that we leave the covenanted Kingdom intact, the covenants and predictions just as they are written, and the promises to the Jewish nation, in its covenanted relationship, to be yet fulfilled in all their greatness and glory.

Obs. 7. This acceptance of the taught postponement effectually removes the chief argument against, what some are pleased to call, "prophetical literalism." Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 495, Ap. F.) attempts to make the charge preferred against his system (viz.: that it is calculated to repel Jews), to recoil upon us by boldly asserting that "prophetical literalism, essentially Jewish," aids the Jews in rejecting Christ, because we claim that many things referring to Christ still remain unfulfilled. (Comp. preceding Obs.) This is unfounded: for we show a sufficiency, already fulfilled, literally, in Jesus to justify His being received as the Messiah, while the main leading objections relating to the covenants, the Kingdom, the covenanted position of the nation, its supremacy as predicted, etc., are answered by us without any perversion of Scripture under the plea of spiritualizing, accommodation, a better sense, etc. The proof is found in the conversions effected by the relative systems.

We hold to the covenants as given to the Jews; accept of the predictions received by them; indorse as they did the literal fulfilment respecting the Kingdom, so that we are not guilty of that spiritualizing of promises into a vague and invisible fulfilment so exceedingly unsatisfactory to a Jewish mind. We do not take the promises expressly given to the Jewish nation and heap them, without regard to their connection, upon the Gentiles. Our position, and the proving the fulfilment of covenant and promise in the future; our showing a postponement to the Second Advent of predictions especially near and dear to the Jewish heart, must necessarily be more acceptable to Jewish faith than the wholesale disclaimers of popular systems. The Jew finds in our system of belief a harmony with the language of Scripture that he sees in no other; and so much is this the case that many Jews have accepted of the Messiah under its influence, as witnessed in the numerous Jews who have been Millenarians, publishing Millenarian works and editing Millenarian periodicals. Indeed Fairbairn breaks the force of his own objection, for if our "prophetical literalism is essentially Jewish" it cannot be hostile to, but must be favorable to, the Jews. Besides this, it is worthy of notice, when once the principles of interpretation of the Alexandrian school (indorsed by Fairbairn) predominated, conversion among the Jews became fewer and fewer, until finally, under the spiritualizing system, they for centuries almost entirely ceased. And it was only after a more literal interpretation of the Bible was revived, that conversions among them increased. (Comp. works of McNeil, Margolionth, Brooks, Bicheno, etc., and sermons before the London Soc. for the Conv. of Jews by Cooper, etc., etc.)

Obs. 8. The most amiable piety, as well as the grossest unbelief, is alike arrayed against an acknowledgment of this postponement, owing to the pervading influence of the church-Kingdom theories. It is observable that the former even in its comments on things which are utterly inconsistent with the state of the predicted Messianic Kingdom (which the prophets make one of peace; release from suffering, deliverance from enemies, etc.). endeavors, by the force of the sheerest inference, to conciliate such a state of things now existing with the prophetic delineation of a Kingdom in a peaceful and flourishing existence.

Thus, to illustrate: Steir (Lange's Com. Matt., vpl. p. 199, Doc. 1) attributes the intimations of Jesus that His disciples must endure persecution, tribulation, etc., to the fact that a Kingdom very different to the one expected must intervene. But where is this intervening Kingdom, combined with suffering, etc., covenanted or predicted? Jesus, too, nowhere says that His followers must endure tribulation in His Kingdom; more than this, in view of the covenanted and predicted blessings, He could not truthfully say it, for one single utterance of this kind would raise up an irreconcilable antagonism. The New Test. perfectly agrees with the Old, fully sustains the gladdening consistency, by attributing to and associating with the Messianic Kingdom only happiness, blessing, honor, and glory. Once to be in the Kingdom is freedom from all evil and deliverance from the curse. The peculiarity has already been noticed, that in the Old Test., so far as the Kingdom is concerned, there is no discrimination between the First and Second Advents. So much is this the case, that if we had only the Old Test. and knew nothing of the First Advent, as separate and distinct from another, we also, like the Jews, would believe this Kingdom to be subsequent to His First Coming. (We have shown why this feature became necessary, because of the tender of the Kingdom at the First Advent.) While this is true, the postponement of the Kingdom, in view of the refusal of the nation to comply with the required moral conditions, indicates what coming is meant, not the coming to humiliation, rejection, and death, but the coming in glory. We are, therefore, not at liberty to change the nature of the Kingdom in order to accommodate it to the state of things existing during this period of postponement.

Obs. 9. The Kingdom being thus postponed, and the process of the gathering out of the elect now going on, is sufficient reason why no additional Revelation is necessary. The Apocalypse of John, to encourage our faith and hope, includes all that is additionally required to be known, appropriately closing the direct Divine communications, and confirming the voices of the Prophets. Jesus Himself refrained from penning down anything, contenting Himself with the testimony of chosen witnesses, because He foresaw that such writing, if given, would have been perverted by His enemies and employed against Himself in accusation to the Roman power (as was even done through His reported words).

For the same reason, in part, the Apocalypse is given in symbolical language, and the apostles (as Paul in Thess.) are guarded in their expressions. After the reader has passed over our entire argument, the reader will find abundant reason why the Kingdom is mentioned in the Gospels and Epistles without entering into the specific details given by the prophets, and why the same is represented under symbolic forms in the Apocalypse. Taking into consideration the nature of the Kingdom, the restored Theocratic-Davidic throne and Kingdom, which necessarily embraces a restored Jewish nation, etc., a more extended and detailed notice would unnecessarily (owing to this postponement) have excited the jealousy, hostility, and persecution of the Roman Empire.

Obs. 10. Jesus having come to fulfil the Prophets, and that fulfilment being in large part postponed to the Sec. Advent, the statements of the Prophets remain and include in them a sufficiency of information needed. To fully know what His mission was, and how it will be eventually realized, we must refer not merely to His life, to the preaching and testimony of His disciples, but also to what the Prophets have written, ever remembering that the covenants form the basis of all pertaining to the Kingdom. From these united, the doctrine of the Kingdom can be clearly adduced.

We strongly suspect (giving it as a suggestion) that in view of the postponement, and this being merely a preliminary stage to the final ushering in of His Kingdom, He, foreseeing (as has happened) how the words of the Prophets descriptive of this Kingdom would be perverted from their literal meaning and torn from their connection to sustain Church and hierarchical claims—He, foreknowing how His own words as reported would be changed in their meaning for the same purpose, left as little as possible on record indorsing the preliminary nature of this dispensation, in order to avoid additional perversion and spiritualizing of language; and in order, above all, to make the covenants, and predictions pertaining thereto, the objects of continued humble faith and hope. The prophecies that He has fulfilled, the testimony of Himself and disciples, the incorporation of all this in a regular Divine Plan possessing unity of Purpose, and which is only sustained and manifested when the prophecies which He is to fulfil at His Sec. Coming are included, evince that we possess a sufficient guide.

Obs. 11. By this postponement the special Davidic covenant remains unfulfilled (excepting that David's Son and Lord is born, and qualified for the immortal reign), and "the tabernacle of David" continues "fallen down" and "in ruins,"—"The house" remains "desolate." It demands the harsh interpretation to deny or spiritualize away existing facts. Yet men, involved in a system which, of necessity, must have the predicted Kingdom in actual establishment, endeavor to get rid of all this in the most summary way. Thus e.g. take any prediction relating to the Messiah reigning on David's throne (as e.g. Isa. 9:7, etc.), and see how it is connected with (1) a fearful overthrow of the nation, preceding, and (2) a deliverance of the same nation, contemporaneously with the reign. Take prophecy after prophecy, and notice how the rule of David's Son is inseparably allied by the Prophets with the Jews nationally, and well may we stand surprised at the bold presumption which rudely severs this connection made by inspired men, giving the curse to the Jews and the blessings (promised to the same nation), to Gentile nations. Why such an unjust and arbitrary interpretation? Simply because the Alexandrian-monkish theory, having the predicted Kingdom unpostponed, must in some way bend these prophecies to suit its pre-determined condition. Alas! great and good men have been engaged in this destructive work, forcibly reminding us that "the wisdom of man is foolishness with God," and that "the things of God" can only be obtained by observing what the Spirit has recorded and retaining what is written unaltered.

We give numerous illustrations from eminent men, who, with an honest desire to honor Jesus, deliberately change the divine record of facts. Unbelievers take a much shorter method to get rid of the covenanted and predicted Kingdom, as e.g. Tuttle (The Career of the Christ. Idea in History), who reiterates and compresses an old view: "He (Jesus) was actuated by a grand political motive, which met with a sad defeat; then we observe the sorrow of disappointment. The temporal scheme is laid in the dust." Both parties, the one believing and the other unbelieving, do not allow the Scriptures to present their own testimony on the subject; both come to the Word with preconceived views of its teachings, and under a pious prejudice or a hostile feeling, explain the same so as to make it harmonize with their respective opinions. Both do injury to the truth as revealed: the one, by so dressing it up that its natural appearance disappears; the other, by attempts to destroy it. The one party may, indeed, plead a sincerity of purpose, and the other may give as its motive the claim of reason, etc.; but the truth, God's truth, as written, is dependent for its realization upon neither of them, and will find its ultimate verification notwithstanding the misconception of its friends or the cavils of its enemies. Some few, however, properly discriminate, and realize the importance of this postponement. One of the best articles on the subject is from the pen of Dr. Craven (Lange's Com. Rev., p. 95), which fell under the writer's notice after these Propositions had been worked out. It was a gratification to find the same so strongly corroborated by such a scholar; and the student will be amply repaid by a perusal of his "Excursus on the Basilea."

Obs. 12. The evidence in behalf of this postponement has already been given (e.g. Prop 58, 65, 66, 67, 70, etc.), but it may be instructive to notice how the passages affording it are treated by many. Thus e.g. consider what Jesus said to the Jews (Matt. 23 : 37-39; Luke 13 : 34, 35), respecting His leaving their house desolate until a certain period elapsed, viz.: until "the times of the Gentiles" were fulfilled, and until the predicted time (as e. g. Zech. 12 : 9-14; Joel 3 : etc.), of their repentance and willingness to receive the Messiah. This "house" receives singular treatment at the hands of those who overlook the postponement of the Kingdom. Forgetting how this word is used in the Davidic covenant and by the Prophets, we have a variety of significations given, which are not in accordance with the covenant, or the Prophets, or the facts as they existed when Jesus spoke. Grotius, Meyer, and others make "the house" to be the city of Jerusalem; De Wette and others, the city and temple; Theophylact, Calvin, Ewald, Barnes, and others, the temple; Lange, and others, the temple, city, and land. But how could those be "left desolate," i.e. remain in continued desolation; for history shows that the temple (as indicated Mark 13 : 1, 2, etc.), by the additions made by Herod, was a splendid edifice, while the city and land were far from being desolate. The same history, however, informs us what was desolate and remained desolate, viz.: the Davidic Kingdom which was overthrown,—the Davidic tabernacle which was fallen down,—for the Jewish nation, instead of having their former covenanted Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, were under the rulership of the Roman Emperors. This corresponds precisely with what David himself predicted, Ps. 89 : 38-45. Let the careful student but reflect: if Jesus came to fulfil the Prophets, He will use the word "house" as they employed it, and especially as it was given in the covenant. This He did, taking the word to denote the fallen Davidic house or Kingdom, which was indeed "desolate" for a long time, and, being left by Him in that state, continues so to the present day. Let the reader but notice how the word is employed in the covenant itself, how it is used by the Prophets, (as e.g. Jer. 22 : 5, "this house [Davidic] shall become a desolation"), that neither temple, nor city, nor land were desolate at the time the words were spoken, and he will see that consistency requires the interpretation that we have given. This might be abundantly confirmed by quotations taken from the Prophets, but one or two references will be amply sufficient. Thus Amos 9 : 11 explicitly states that the tabernacle of David itself, fallen and made desolate, shall be restored, and no ingenuity can make this fallen throne and Kingdom or house the throne of the Father in the third heaven (to which the Davidic throne is likened by many writers). So likewise Hos. 3 : 4, 5. Christ, as our argument evinces, could not, owing to the nation's disobedience, restore this fallen, desolate tabernacle of David, and therefore tells the nation that this desolate "house" shall be left thus until another era, when the words of the Prophets shall most assuredly be verified.

The careful student will observe that, owing to this foreknown postponement, certain prophecies are framed to meet its foreseen condition, and others to correspond with it as an already determined fact. Thus e.g. Dan. 2 and 7, as connected with the ultimate re-establishment of Israel, does not refer in the slightest manner to the first Coming of the Christ. The subject-matter is Gentile domination, and as the Messiah's Kingdom, which is to supersede the same, was not then set up but postponed, the prophecies only, and in strict accordance with what has taken place, direct our attention to the Sec. Advent, when this will be accomplished. Thus also Jesus, after He announced the postponement, gives an epitome of Jewish destiny (Matt. 24, Mark 13, Luke 21), and only when the Sec. Advent arrives does Jewish tribulation cease. Thus again the Apoc. is so framed, that from beginning to end it directs the eye of faith to a Sec. Advent in power and glory, which shall overcome all enemies and bring in a realization of covenant promises. In none of these, extended as they are, is the slightest hint of a Messianic Kingdom already existing (as many teach), but the postponement being assumed as an accomplished fact, believers are spoken of as suffering, tried, tempted, persecuted, etc.—enduring things which never, never can be—as the prophets predict—associated with the Kingdom of the Christ.

Obs. 13. To Millenarians it may be observed, that a remarkable announcement of the postponement of this Kingdom, its ultimate establishment in the restoration of the tribes of Israel with the glory that shall follow, is found in Isa. 49 : 1-23 (Comp. Alexander's version), in Micah 5 : 2, 3, 4 ("give them up until," etc.), in Zech. 13 : 7-9, etc. This feature, the postponement, will be corroborated by many succeeding Propositions,—forming a regular series of connected reasons confirmatory of this important characteristic of the Divine Plan.

Obs. 14. Neander (Ch. His., vol. 1, p. 36) sees clearly that to preserve unity, it is requisite to advocate a restoration of the Theocracy, but, unfortunately, overlooking this postponement and wedded to a church-Kingdom theory, he connects such a restoration with the First Advent instead of placing it, where the Scriptures do, at the Sec. Advent. No Theocracy has been established, as covenanted, from the First Advent down to the present, for that which is the kernel or life of the Theocratic idea is lacking, viz. : God condescending to rule over man in the capacity of an earthly Ruler.

Obs. 15. This doctrine of the postponement rebuts the unbelieving attacks against the Messianic Kingdom and the attempted explanations concerning it.

As e.g. that Jesus having failed to realize the Kingdom "by political means," and seeing "the folly of military Messianism," He then "relied implicitly on the establishment of His Messianic throne by the miraculous display of the divine power ;" but this finally gave place to "the idea of spiritual supremacy, through the religious reformation of His people." (So Abbot, p. 243, Freedom and Fellowship, being a reiteration of Renan and others.) This is a complete ignoring of the Record, and a reversing of that which is plainly written, being pure assumption without a particle of historical proof to sustain it. Where e.g. is the least evidence that Jesus changed the popular idea (admitted to have been at one time entertained by Himself), of the Messiah into "the sublime idea of a spiritual Christ ruling by love," etc.? Aside from no such a change being expressed in the New Test., it is also refuted by the Primitive Church being utterly unacquainted with such an alleged transmutation.

Obs. 16. The postponement indicates that a very large Judaistic element remains yet to be realized in fulfilment.

Neander (Ch. His., vol. 1, p. 339) and others assert that Christianity is "the fulfilment of Judaism." This is true, but only in a limited sense (as e.g. relating to the sacrificial and ceremonial law) for in the higher sense (viz. : the Theocratic) there is still lacking the fulfilment of the covenanted Kingdom with all that pertains to it. In the very nature of the case, if God's promises are ever fulfilled in their plain, unmistakable grammatical sense, much that is "Jewish" must eventually be incorporated. Our argument will necessarily develop this feature as we proceed.

Obs. 17. This view also shows how ungrounded is the insidious (and to the philosophic mind, fascinating) theory, so prevalent, of distinguishing between the Gospels, making them different types or stages of expression.<sup>1</sup> The simple fact is (comp. Prop. 9 and 10), that the Gospels are a unit in representing the leading subject of the Kingdom and of the King, and all of them have the same Jewish covenanted position presented.

<sup>1</sup> As e.g. Bernard (Bampton Lectures, Lec. 2, The Progress of Doctrine), making Matthew a Gospel from the Hebrew standpoint; Mark, a Gospel more disengaged from the Jewish connection, adapted to Gentiles, with a "habit of mind colored by contact with Judaism;" Luke, a Gospel passing from Jewish associations to those "adapted to a Greek mind, then, in some sense, the mind of the world;" John, a Gospel still more removed from Judaism, and planted upon universal principles, etc. The objectionable feature (admitting characteristics and peculiarities belonging to each Gospel) in such unwarranted distinctions, is the total ignoring of "the Jewish conceptions" (necessarily) of each, the fundamental Jewish covenanted position of each, and that none of them show any progress in the direction of Gentilism, but the reverse, viz. : striving to bring Gentiles to the acknowledgment of the Jewish covenanted Seed as the Messiah (which is sustained by the Acts and Epistles, showing that Gentiles are urged by the acceptance of this Messiah to become "the seed of Abraham," etc.).

Obs. 18. Unbelief,—rejecting the Messianic position, its rejection by the nation and the resultant postponement,—endeavors to deteriorate the actions of Jesus by ascribing to mere human passion what evidently was caused by the legitimacy of His station and His treatment by the nation.

Thus e.g. unbelievers assert that at the beginning of His ministry, Jesus was most amiable and mild, but that a change of disposition took place, owing to opposition and His expectations not being realized, so that He sternly rebuked and denounced His opponents. This is artfully represented as a deterioration of character—an indication of human frailty. The reader will observe, however, that the unity of character was preserved to the end, as witnessed e.g. in His weeping over Jerusalem and lamenting its doom, and in the utterances at His apprehension, trial, and crucifixion, when grossly insulted and deeply suffering. The alleged sternness and reproof was based on the rejection of the Kingdom by the representative men of the nation, who refused the condition of repentance and delighted in their sins. He, therefore, as was requisite to His position and tender, portrays their corruption and unfitness for the Kingdom. The Theocratic ordering perversely refused by non-repentance, exposed their own King—seeing their secret machinations for His death—to a righteous indignation, mingled with bursts of compassion. In the very nature of the case, such an indignation is not only just, but it is the very thing needed to complete the chain of evidence, since it is not merely enforing holiness as a prerequisite, but it harmonizes with His claims of Messiahship. It is the rejected King speaking to His despisers, and His language, denunciatory and stern, adds force to the validity of His claims upon them, when He points out to them their moral unfitness for entrance into His Kingdom. He speaks as the Messiah, with authority, and His enemies felt the same. This whole subject of the postponement, also, proves how untenable are the theories of a late origin of the Gospels, for such a delicate and consistent presentation of the same could not have been the result of the periods alleged.

PROPOSITION 95. If the church is the Kingdom, then the terms "church" and "kingdom" should be synonymous.

Those terms ought, if such is the fact, to be convertible or interchangeable without vitiating the sense. That they are not synonymous can be readily tested by every one. The numerous definitions and conflicting opinions of those who entertain this view already sufficiently indicates that they are not to be substituted, the one for the other.

Obs. 1. It may be proper to illustrate the application of the test. A few examples will suffice, as the subject is too momentous to be triflingly touched, being forced to it by the argumentation of our opponents. The word church is used for (1) an individual congregation. This usage of the word, of course, will not bear the test, for then there would be as many kingdoms as there are congregations. (2) For the general body of believers. Passing by the passages which would then make believers to inherit the church, and which would teach that the church itself shall inherit the church, we select such as Eph. 5 : 23-30, in which the church (i.e. Kingdom) was once so lost that Christ "gave Himself for it" (comp. Eph. 1 : 7 ; Gal. 2 : 20, etc.), that it needed special sanctifying and cleansing "with the washing of water by the word," etc. Or, Acts 20 : 28, where the church (i.e. Kingdom) is to be fed, "which He has purchased with His own blood," phraseology applicable to believers and not to the predicted Kingdom. Take every place where the word church occurs, and either in the passage itself, or in the context, or by a parallel passage, the notion of believers in their associated capacity is understood. But let us take the word kingdom and substitute for it that of church, and the result is seen e.g. in Mark 11 : 10 ; Luke 12 : 32 ; 22 : 29 ; 21 : 43 ; Mark 9 : 47 ; Acts 14 : 22, etc.

If the Church is synonymous with the Kingdom, then what becomes of the notion held by many that the Kingdom is invisible, seeing that the Church is spoken of as something visible, externally manifested, as e.g. Matt. 18 : 16, 17 ; Acts 8 : 1, etc., being used in the same sense so far as visibility is concerned, as that in Acts 19 : 32 (Greek : where it is employed in a secular sense).

Obs. 2. But the absurdity of making such terms synonymous will be more clearly seen if we take the definitions given of this Kingdom, and observing their intimate connection with this church notion. Selecting the example afforded by Dr. Thompson (see preceding Prop., Obs. 8), we are told that this Kingdom consists in "the presence and power of God felt and acknowledged in the hearts of those that trusted in Him and did His commandments," etc. Put this "spiritual conception" in place of the Kingdom or church, and sad work will be made of God's oath-bound covenanted promises. If this is all that is meant, then the most solemn pledges given by God will be set aside and remain unfulfilled. It is strange that men of ability are so wedded to this mystical conception of the Kingdom that they cannot see how, with their own theory of Christ's delivering up the Kingdom (1 Cor. 15 : 24), if the Kingdom be such as above, or "God's reign in the heart," etc., then such "a presence," etc., or "reign" once "felt and acknowledged" will also be given up. Or, select any one of those definitions, and substitute them for "Kingdom," in Matt. 8 : 12 ; 16 : 19 ; Mark 11 : 12, etc., and it will be found that they directly introduce a confusion of ideas, making the Scriptures inconsistent and contradictory.

Take for example Dr. Neander's (given in detail under Prop. 106) definition and apply it to the first New Test. text where the Kingdom is mentioned (Matt. 3 : 2), and it then reads as follows : "Repent ye : for the whole of a series of historical developments, or a great assemblage of coexistent spiritual creations is at hand." Or, take Dr. M'Cosh's favorite, and then we have : "Repent ye : for God's reign in the heart is at hand." Comp. Prof. Lummis's Essay "The Kingdom and the Church" (read before "The Proph. Confer." at N. York), in which the inconsistency of making Church and Kingdom synonymous, the absurdity of men talking of advancing and building up this Kingdom, the inability of making a Methodist Kingdom, Lutheran Kingdom, etc., and of saying that the Church (if Kingdom) is "within you," is shown. This synonymous nature is so much taken for granted, and so confidently held, that the titles of books indicate it, as e.g. Maurice's "Kingdom of Christ," Jarvis's "His. of the Mediatorial Kingdom," Gray's "Mediatorial Reign," Symington's "Mediatorial Dominion of Jesus Christ," Uhdén's "New England Theocracy," Wilson's "Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ," an Anon. work, "The Inner Kingdom."

Obs. 3. Such substitutions are unwarranted and dangerous, although presented by most able men. Neander (Life of Christ, S. 82) informs us that while the name kingdom is "borrowed from an earthly kingdom," "was immediately taken from the form in which the idea of the Divine community was represented by the Jewish nation," yet this idea is to be discarded and a "symbolical" one is to be substituted. This exchange of ideas is, however, unproven, and merely assumed to sustain the theory that the church, in some aspect, is the Kingdom. If this is so, that the first preachers of the Kingdom presented the leading subject (i.e. Kingdom) of their discourses in symbolical language, we may well ask, If the Kingdom was symbolical, why not then repentance, faith, and everything else connected with this Kingdom? For, if the main subject is such, why not the subsidiary? This leads us where some have, from a false premise, logically landed, making the whole teaching of Jesus and the apostles a symbolical or typical one of that religion of humanity which is now arising.

PROPOSITION 96. The differences visible in the Church are evidences that it is not the predicted Kingdom of the Messiah.

Having alluded to this, it may be well to particularize. The Kingdom, as promised from the details of prophecy, is to exhibit a visible outward unity. So much is this admitted by our opponents, that they are seeking for and advocating such a unity. The feeling is almost universal that prediction demands it; and hence all, not finding it yet existing, anticipate it in the future. Isaiah, chs. 60, 61, 62, 65, etc., are conclusive. But, on the other hand, such a state or condition has never been realized in the church after eighteen hundred years of trial, and therefore we conclude that the church, not exhibiting the characteristics predicted of the Kingdom and connected with its establishment, is something different from that Kingdom.

Obs. 1. Let the unbiassed student contemplate how schisms, etc., are foretold in the church (Acts 20 : 29, 30 ; 1 Cor. 11 : 19 ; 2 Tim. 4 : 3, 4 ; Rom. 16 : 17, etc.) ; how it was organized amidst dissensions and antagonism even among its leaders (on the subject of circumcision and observance of the law) ; how it affected compromises concerning the law and the ritual ; how it arose without a direct verbal abrogation of Mosaic institutions, so that some followed the latter and others annoyed the Gentiles who refused the same. Christ Himself, Paul tells us, was preached a contention. These and other marks of weakness, infirmity, etc., certainly prevent us from accepting the church as the predicted Kingdom, seeing that the latter is to come in a very different manner. Its beginning (i.e. church's) is not that assigned by the Prophets to the Kingdom of promise.

Even the Apostolic Church evidenced great infirmities, as noticed in Ch. Histories by Schaff, Kurtz, Neander, etc. As illustrative, we only quote Conybeare and Howson's (1 c. 1, p. 488) statement : " It is painful to be compelled to acknowledge among the Christians of the Apostolic Age, the existence of so many forms of error and sin. It was a pleasing dream which presented the Primitive Church as a society of angels ; it is not without a struggle that we bring ourselves to open our eyes and behold the reality. But yet it is a higher feeling which bids us thankfully to recognize the truth, that ' there is no partiality with God, ' that He has never supernaturally coerced any generation of mankind into virtue, nor rendered schism and heresy impossible in any age of the Church." This feature has never been lessened, but has increased until e.g. in England alone, according to " Whitaker's Almanack" (1879), there are 174 distinct denominations and sects. The notion of a Kingdom is utterly opposed to the predictions relating to the Church, viz. : its militant nature, a fighting and struggling Church, which shall ultimately, by apostatizing (2 Thess. 2) and by lack of faith (Luke 18 : 1-8), fall under the power, as a punishment, of a culminated Antichrist, and endure a fearful persecution (e.g. Rev. 14, Dan. 7, etc.).

Obs. 2. The progress of the church teaches the same. Surely a Kingdom established by Jesus in fulfilment of the prophecies could not possibly have the conflicting elements that the church has so lavishly shown. Antagonism in belief, compulsion in requirements, dogmatism in teaching, religious warring, persecution, error, false doctrine, etc., are incorporated with her history. Corruption not merely external, but imbedded in the very framework of her organization, and transmitted for centuries (diversity of Ch. government, belief, and practice); antagonism even in relation to the most important things (sacerdotalism, baptism, Lord's supper, etc.); exhibition of a spirit hostile to Messiah's Kingdom, even in the most noble of Christian men [as e.g. Luther's treatment of Zwingli, Zwingli's resort to the sword, Calvin's treatment of Servetus (Mosheim's His. of Servetus), Melancthon's epistle to Calvin, Oct. 14, 1544, commending Servetus's execution (Calv. Epis. No. 187, p. 341,) etc.]—these are landmarks, not of Christ's Kingdom but of a preparatory stage subject to infirmity, characteristic of all, even of true and noble believers. While here and there enlightened piety exists, willing to fellowship with and acknowledge as brethren in Christ all who repent and believe in Him, yet multitudes, organized bodies, counting their ministry by hundreds and their laity by hundreds of thousands, stand forth in doctrinal exclusiveness, even in the same denomination (as e.g. some of the symbolical Lutherans, High-Church Episcopalians, Close Com. Baptists, etc.), condemning all others, denouncing all others, sitting in Christ's seat and claiming Christ's prerogatives of judging, excluding all others of a diverse faith from the Kingdom of heaven, here and hereafter.

This is done too by those whom, in spite of their weakness and dogmatism, we must recognize as conscientious brethren in Christ. While the absurdity of such a position, claiming that outside of its own special communion there is no true Church, but only robbery and damnation, has been ably set forth by numerous writers, yet it is a sad fact that multitudes still slavishly cling to it with tenacity and zeal. Does such a Church, thus divided, etc., bear the imprint of Messiah's Kingdom? No! never ought such a portraiture as history but too faithfully gives, be mistaken for the divine one presented by the inspired prophets. Blindness voluntarily assumed alone can make such a mistake. The divisions and controversies are not merely between different denominations, but between branches of the same Church, as e.g. between Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Moravians, Baptists, Methodists, Lutherans, Reformed, etc. The lack of union and intercommunion is sometimes most painfully manifested, as e.g. in an exclusive spirit of clericalism or sacramentarianism, which refuses acknowledgment and fellowship with others, and even with each other. All Churches are, more or less, thus leavened. The Roman Catholics, complacently overlooking their past bitter divisions and contests, point to the differences, etc., of Protestantism; Protestantism, overlooking the design intended by the Church, meets the charge by endeavoring to make out an invisible unity, which is truly so "invisible" that no one has yet been able to discern it. Two extremes are to be avoided, both suggested by the Church-Kingdom theory, in contemplating the strange and painful pages of Ecclesiastical History; on the one hand Goethe's declaration: "Mischmash von Irrthum und von Gewalt," which looks only at the evidences of infirmity and wickedness; and on the other, Chateaubriand's painting a beautiful ideal of the past and present, which ignores the corruptions, errors, and sinfulness manifested. Truth suffers by either method; and the Church cannot be utterly condemned or unduly exalted without doing violence to it. Neither blackening nor whitewashing, neither defaming nor extravagantly praising, meets the divine portraiture as given in the Scriptures.

Obs. 3. These differences, division into sects, etc. are not given under the impression that the church has not, in a measure, carried on the design intended by its organization. When the object for which the church has been established is duly estimated, we find that amidst all its weakness and imperfection, prosperity and adversity, fightings within and without, it has been forwarding and accomplishing the same. Hence, we give place to no one in a high appreciation of the church; and yet, in relation to her the truth must be told—indeed has already been recorded—lest we exaggerate her position, and dishonor the truth itself. Ecclesiastical History, Dogmatics, such works as Dorner's His. of Prot. Theology, etc., give painful evidence that controversies, bitter and unrelenting, have been waged between portions of the church, between good and great men. Passing by the lack of charity, the self-exaltation, the narrowness and bigotry, the confessionalistic zeal, the personal contentions, defamations, etc., we find that in important points, both theoretical and practical, devoted men of God were in direct opposition to each other. Were it not for a few things held in common, such as faith in Christ, the antagonism would be complete. Such a state of things, deplorable as it is, does not vitiates the design to be accomplished by the church, which is, as James asserted in the Apostle's Council, to gather out a people for His name. This, notwithstanding the hindrances and obstacles mentioned, has been carried on down to the present day. These evils may to some extent have retarded and hindered the work, but still it has been going on toward completion. No age, no century, no year, with its encompassing infirmities, but has brought forth, through the church, the called and adopted. But to convert this design into the Kingdom itself requires an imagination and a faith strong enough to plant—against the direct testimony of holy men of old—these evils, these conflicting elements into the Kingdom of the Son of Man. Whilst this diversity, etc., cannot be charged to the teaching of Jesus and the Apostles (for they warned us against it); whilst it is evidence of the probationary and not kingly condition of the church which could not be avoided without destroying man's free moral agency, yet they have come to pass, and the church grievously erred in giving place to them. Explanations and apologies do not lessen the naked facts, and cannot break their force. Unbelief may foolishly level them against Christianity, when Christianity itself in the New Test. pointedly condemns it; piety, on the other hand, just as foolishly endeavors to palliate the same by claiming it as a necessity, a requisite historical growth, etc.; still the facts remain, and can only be explained by placing them where the Bible does, viz.: in the depravity and weakness of man.

To a considerate mind, the very condition of the Church, instead of reflecting in the slightest degree upon the Divine Truth, most abundantly confirms it; for, without unduly exalting the Church into a Kingdom bearing on its bosom a mass of corruption, he sees that amidst all this diversity, error, hostility, etc., the one great, grand design has never been lost sight of, i. e. to save them that believe. If it be said that these evils are not inherent, but foreign outgrowths, we may even admit this without weakening our argument, seeing that we proceed on the ground that such a picture as the Church has presented is not the one drawn by the prophets. Whether produced legitimately or not, whether necessary developments or not, they resulted in the Church, and as firm believers in divine inspiration, we cannot, dare not receive the Church as the Kingdom predicted by inspired men; for if we do, to that extent do we make those men untruthful and their record of the Kingdom an impossibility to be realized as presented by them (i. e. in the grammatical sense). We cannot e. g. reconcile with the prophetic record of the increased and constantly expanding power of Messiah's Kingdom, the losses which the Church has sustained in the past in Asia, Africa, Greece, etc. The prophets, instead of losses, give us glorious permanent and eternal retention. Hence, while discarding the notion of the Kingdom, we cling to the observable gracious design of the Church as promised and developed in her history. This gives the proper antidote to a class of books ably written, which artfully, and in many respects most truthfully, represent the weakness, positive evil, incorporated with and extended by the Church, and from this deduce that the prophecies, being unfulfilled, the predictions are merely human opinions. We believe with Lord Bacon, who long ago observed, in answer to the Papal argument of unity, "that the Church of God hath been in all ages subject to contentions and schisms; the tares were not sown but when the wheat was sown before. Our Saviour Christ delivered it for an ill-note to have outward peace. And reason teacheth us that in ignorance and implied belief it is easy to agree, as colors agree in the dark; or if any country decline into Atheism, the controversies wax dainty, because men do not think religion scarce worth falling out for; so as it is weak divinity to account controversies an ill sign in the Church." So long as tares and wheat continue mixed—which is down to the Sec. Advent—so long will this state continue.

Obs. 4. This leads to a brief consideration of the unity of the church. The notion of a Kingdom attached to it, involves that of unity. To carry out the design of the church does not necessarily require unity; unity indeed would facilitate its execution, and for various reasons it is desirable, and hence is enjoined, but really is not essential, as the history of the church conclusively proves. "Them that believe" are found in all denominations; those that are savingly united to Christ are found in Roman Catholic and Protestant churches; admixture of error, difference in Ch. government, etc., has not prevented, in the opposing camps, persons to become justified by faith, adopted by grace, and engrafted as the elect. The prayer of Christ, so often quoted, for union has special reference to the ultimate end of the church, and is identified with the manifestation of His glory (see Prop. 184). Many contend that union now is essential, or at least necessary. Keeping in view the object intended by this dispensation, we may concede its desirableness to expedite the gathering of the elect, but it is not absolutely requisite for this purpose. At the very commencement of the Christian Church, as every historian concedes, even in the Apostolic age, there was a tendency (even among the Apostles), to diversity, which has continued down to our day, and we are assured by the Word will continue until Christ ushers in the Mill. Kingdom. Just as God has used the peculiar temperament, disposition, style, etc., of men in giving His Word, so He also employs the various temperaments, dispositions, talents, etc., of men in gathering out; but whilst in the former diversity exists without breaking the unity of that Word being under the restraining influence of inspiration, the latter amidst its diversity has no such restraining medium, saving that Word which is already given. Therefore, the unity is not to be sought in the utterances of the church as such, not in its outward external form, not even in its inward experience and feeling, but only in three things: (1) in working out, consciously or unconsciously, a common design, i.e. the salvation of believers; (2) that every member savingly united to Christ, whether recognized or not, whether agreeing in all things with us or not, sustains the relation of brother and joint heir with those who also thus believe; (3) the common relation that all believers sustain to Christ even now, and which is finally to be openly manifested. Therefore, the efforts of those who urge for unity among brethren, without the exclusion of a diversity which is inseparable from a probationary state, are to be commended.

Such as the labors of Dr. Schmucker, the Christian Alliance, and others. The Augsburg Confession, Art. 7, pointedly says: "That subordinate differences do not abolish the unity of the church." This unity, as the reader sees, does not bear the marks of the covenanted and predicted Kingdom, being more of a spiritual and invisible nature, and preparative to the unity that shall be manifested when the Christ and His members are revealed.

PROPOSITION 97. The various forms of Church government indicate that the Church is not the promised Kingdom.

Taking the prophetic record, which gives the Messianic Kingdom a uniform government with a uniform faith, it is impossible to accept of the church, with its diversified forms of government, as an intended exhibit of the Kingdom.

Obs. 1. While men differ in their interpretation of the church, yet it is generally admitted, excepting by the Roman Catholics and a High-Church party, that Christ did not found His church with an accurately defined and fixed form of government for its associated capacity, but left the forms it should assume in society, and among nations, to the development made by Providence and human agency. This view, perhaps slightly but not materially modified, is the belief of multitudes. If we accept of it, then it refutes the notion of the church being a Kingdom, for it admits at once that the church at its commencement lacked one of the essentials of a Kingdom, viz.: a regularly constituted form of government. With our doctrine of the church and Kingdom this omission remarkably harmonizes; so much, indeed, that it is requisite. If the Roman Catholic doctrine is correct, that such a Kingdom under a regularly constituted government is found in the church, then an important and serious objection would be raised up against us. Millenarianism has ever resisted her doctrine as an invasion of the Messiah's rights and privileges, and as hostile to the early church view; for her doctrine cannot be maintained, being merely the result of the hierarchical growth of centuries, and lacks a Scriptural foundation. The very design of the church does not require such a government, it being fully met by the simple organization, few rites, sacraments, worship, and rules which are given.

It is remarkable how guarded prophecy is, not to allow the Church-Kingdom theory to find encouragement in its portrayals of the future. Thus e.g. Dan. 2 and 7 (comp. Props. 104, 121, and 160), in which we find that the nominal conversion of the Roman Empire under Constantine and the resultant form of church government patterned after the civil, is unacknowledged. The transformation formed no Kingdom of God (as multitudes vainly dream) for the Empire still remains symbolized as a beast down to the end. Its Christianity, nominal and hierarchical, pregnant with bitter evils and future persecutions, properly remains unrecognized. The simple fact, Scripturally attested, is this, that during these "times of the Gentiles," believers, instead of inheriting a Kingdom, are members of civil government, and are taught to render civil obedience, acknowledging earthly kings and rulers to be such over them. Let the student refer to Props. 3, 58, etc., and see the diversity existing respecting the time when this alleged Kingdom was inaugurated, and he will find additional reason for rejecting the prevailing view, because a Kingdom, to be such, must, of necessity, have some form of government allied with it, but this vagueness, indistinctness, lack of form, is opposed to the notion of such having been founded.

Obs. 2. Some hold that by virtue of the church being a Kingdom, Christ rules over it by a vicegerent (i.e. the Pope); others, by a divinely appointed and regularly descended Episcopacy; some, by the rules of the State, forming State religions; others, by the ministry and officers of the congregation; some, by individual congregations who in the aggregate form the Kingdom; others, by General Councils, Conferences, Assemblies, or Synods; and others, by the associated union of the civil power with the church either as primary or subordinate. There is a variety to suit all inclinations. Again, some tell us that the church is a Kingdom, but that no one form of government is prescribed, it being left optional with the church to organize that form best adapted to contingencies; others, that the government of the church must be so shaped as to accommodate itself to the civil; others, that the New Test. leaves the whole matter discretionary with every individual congregation to assume one; and still others inform us that the church, whilst a Kingdom, is not one in the strict sense of the word, only symbolically, but is a society of believers governed by the moral law and the institutions of the New Test., its members being still subject to the civil power, etc. History is filled with the bitter contests arising between the advocates of these opinions, and every party nearly can enroll its martyrs who fell in defence of its peculiar tenet of church government. Is such a sad diversity consistent with the idea of Christ's covenanted Kingdom? The idea of a stable, well-ordered, acknowledged, and duly enforced government is connected by all the prophets with the Messianic Kingdom, but if the church is it, what party can rightfully claim it? So little is this the predicted Kingdom that there is no one here (excepting we take the infallible Pope, or Young, or others, who claim to speak by inspiration) to decide when believers differ among themselves respecting the government itself. Is it not strange that intelligent men continue to insist upon having such a Kingdom present, when they differ so essentially among themselves concerning such a weighty matter as the form of the Kingdom? Can we imagine that when Christ's Kingdom as covenanted and predicted is once truly set up, that it will be in a shape so undecisive and peculiar, that men will contend with each other as to its nature and form? No! never! In the day that the Lord is King over all the earth (Zech. 14), and His majesty and power is seen in giving and enforcing law, in restoring and upbuilding with Godlike energy and force the Davidic throne and Kingdom, men will not find it so insignificantly or enigmatically expressed that its organization, etc., can become a question like the preceding.

Singular episodes are to be found in this diversity. We mention a few as illustrations of the inability of man to preserve a consistency when violating the Divine order relating to the Church. Some German divines, thinking that the Church as a Kingdom, to be truly such, must have some point of external unity, insist (as e.g. Rothe and Thierachs—see Pressense's review of them, Early Years of Christianity, p. 411-412), that the apostles must have held a second Council at Jerusalem, in which they instituted the Episcopate! Savonarola, under the influence of this Kingdom notion, claimed that Christ had condescended to become the peculiar Monarch of the Florentines (Roscoe's Life of Lorenzo de Medicis, p. 345). The Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchy men, Mormons, etc., with this Church idea have claimed a special Kingdom of God as existing among themselves. Fanatics have duly taken advantage of the notion, and carefully incorporated it into their schemes. Eccl. History (especially English and Scotch) contains numerous instances where national establishments of religion were discarded on the ground that they were opposed to the nature of Christ's Kingdom, while the very men who made such an objection made themselves liable, on the same ground precisely, of rejection, because they too set up the Church separated from the State as the Kingdom. Edward Irving, in his work Church and State, overlooking, even while expounding prophecy, the design of this dispensation in gathering out a people for a future divinely constituted Church and State, makes in his argument a divinely constituted State practical.

and as, in a measure at least, existing. This plunged him into opinions intolerant, etc. The notion of "The Divine Right" is indeed ideally correct, but we must not forget the period when God Himself shall practically and really manifest it in a chosen King and His associated selected kings. This view of the Church and the State was one cause of Irving's troubles, leading him to endeavor to realize the impossible, that which was in the future and in God's own performance. Such allusions as these could be multiplied, which are given not for the sake of showing an abuse (for the abuse of a doctrine does not disprove the doctrine itself), but rather how variously men are influenced by the notion that in some way or other the Kingdom of Christ is to be now witnessed.

While thus employing the diversity existing as evidence that the Church is not the Kingdom, we must not be understood as opposed to a form of Church government as a necessity for its growth, etc. Hence we are compelled to dissent from the exceeding lax views of the "Plymouth Brethren" respecting Church government. It has been the universal opinion of the Church, following the Apostolic age, that the Holy Spirit, in and through the Church, called the Ministry, such a call being confirmed by a mediate act of the Church. The Church, in its official capacity, is the instrument to determine, by examination, the validity of the call, in order to avoid imposition, etc. This has been the universal rule, founded on Scripture, however disputes, etc., arose respecting the grades of the ministry. We cannot, therefore, sympathize with the "Brethren's" tirade against "Clericism," simply because, if followed, it would result in disintegration and perversion. Hence, to make baptism an ordinance not in, but outside of the Church dependent on the individual and the teacher, is unscriptural (leaving out an ordinance of the Church); and to make the ministry dependent on the will, or vagaries, or supposed inspired influence, of individuals, is also unscriptural (making the Church virtually dependent upon influences outside of it, and over which it has no control). The authority—if any is claimed—depends not upon any official voice of the Church, but upon the ipse dixit of this or that one claiming to be directed by the Spirit of God. The door is thus opened to claims and pretensions that pride, love of notoriety, etc., will speedily avail themselves of, owing to human depravity. Alas! extremes in the Church have already borne a mass of deadly fruit; even with the greatest care and utmost watchfulness, unqualified and uncalled men have been foisted on the Church, but human weakness, with no proper checks, untrammelled, and with power to claim a ministerial position, will be sure to manifest itself. Studying such passages as 2 Tim. 2 : 2, and those referring to the appointment of Elders, as well as the intimations of a continued ministry in the Church, and then linking with these the universal custom of the early Church, as testified to by history, that a ministry, no matter in what forms (for that is another question, touching the Hierarchy, etc.), was perpetuated in and mediated by the Church, it seems to us strange that men, evidently sincere and pious, will set themselves up at this late day as alone right in discarding all "Clericalism," and the whole Church from the days of the apostles in the wrong. The result is, that however honest in their views, they are only injuring the truth by associating such demoralizing opinions, unnecessarily disquieting others in their Church relationships, and increasing the number of sects by forming, with special and extraordinary high spiritual claims, another. The effort to make the eldership an exceptional and mere introductory office is unsuccessful and unhistorical. So the effort to overthrow the view, that men in the Church, and by virtue of their position in the Church as teachers, are not to perpetuate a ministry (as exemplified in Timothy, Titus, and Barnabas) by some act of setting them apart (thus giving them an official recognition), is both unscriptural and unhistorical. To leave the distribution of the Lord's Supper to a direct intimation of the Holy Ghost is fanatical and substituting human imaginings for divine inspiration. To leave the Holy Ghost, on an occasion of discipline, to designate who shall be, for the occasion, the Elders or rulers, is, to say the least, dangerous, and may cause personal feeling or prejudice to triumph. To allow special and specific claims to eldership or rulership, etc., under the specious plea of being directed by the Holy Spirit, is the visionary notion of a mystical enthusiasm, and tends to bring us under the subjection of false claims and pretenses. The entire theory (as illustrated e.g. Holden's Ministry of the Word, and Corinth and Sects) is calculated to lead astray and impair the usefulness of its upholder. For it raises up an antagonism to other Churches, which, to say the least, is uncharitable and unchristian. Thus Holden (Corinth and Sects) declares emphatically that a man who has the truth, and is conscientious, cannot go to any of the Churches (saying that of the "Believers") to worship, for in doing so he virtually connives at schism, sectarianism, etc. It will be well indeed for these "Brethren" if they have the piety, usefulness, etc. that many in these Churches manifest. This intense bigotry (and there are others who just as freely condemn the "Brethren") is the natural, logical outgrowth of their system, and evidences that it is based on error.

PROPOSITION 98. That the church is not the Kingdom promised to David's Son was the belief of the early church.

This has already been distinctly shown under Props. 69-75, but some additional remarks to enforce the same can be readily given.

Obs. 1. If the church is the predicted Kingdom of God, we certainly ought to find some direct passage teaching this, either in the writings of the Apostles or their immediate successors. But such an one cannot be found. For two reasons it ought to be contained in the Epistles. (1) If the Apostles at one time in their ministry misapprehended (as learned men tell us on Acts 1 : 6, but which we deny), the nature of the Kingdom, then surely at a later period when, as we are again told, they understood that the church was meant, we should reasonably expect that on so vital a matter some decisive utterance should be given, explanatory of the mistake made in their previous preaching and confirmatory of a change of view. Simple justice to the truth and to themselves required this at their hands, in view of their peculiar position. (2) The Jews held that the predicted, covenanted Kingdom was an external, visible reign of the Messiah on the restored Davidic throne, etc. Now in consequence of having continually to meet such prejudices, it is peculiarly significant that they employ no reasoning so prevalent at the present day, viz.: that the church is the Kingdom, etc., when such would have been in place and eminently proper if the Jews were in error. If the reader says that other errors of the Jews were not noticed, we reply, that all that were of importance in their relation to the Christian dispensation the Apostles met and refuted. And this one, if really an error, is of such magnitude and weight, had such a direct influence, sustained such a relation to the very thing they were taught to proclaim, viz.: "the Gospel of the Kingdom," that it is impossible to believe that they would have passed it by without a distinct rejection and a substitution of the truth. A whole nation under a mistake respecting the Messiah's Kingdom which the Apostles were especially commissioned to preach; and yet an error so fundamental is not directly corrected, but must be inferred or implied! Is it reasonable or credible? The truth is, that no such repudiation of error was needed.

Obs. 2. At the risk of repetition, it may again be said, that the declarations of the Apostles concerning the nearness of the Advent (Prop. 74) prevented them from entertaining the view that the church is the promised Kingdom of Christ. How could they believe the church to be such as the glorious Kingdom predicted, e.g. by Daniel, whose dominion was to be world-wide and everlasting, when they were constantly looking for the consummation? We confess no sympathy with Dr. Neander's method of reconciliation when, referring to this point, he exonerates the Apostles by showing that they were still under Jewish forms of thought, but that the seeds of truth then sown by them would, by a foreordained development, finally be stripped from this apostolic shell or husk. We dare not take such liberties with apostolic men, and admit that they were mistaken in so consequential a matter; for if we do, what assurance have we that they did not also misconceive other truths, enshrouding them also in "husks"? Did the Spirit which promised to lead them into truth, which was specially given to them to impart, conduct them to a lower plane of knowledge, and contradict the inspiration given to Daniel? Were the Apostles, claiming inspiration, more fallible than, say, Origen or Augustine, or Jerome, or Eusebius, etc. Receiving the admissions of a host of writers (as e.g. Watts, Essay prefixed to World to Come) that "the Christians of the first age did generally expect the Second Coming of Christ to judgment and the resurrection of the dead in that very age wherein it was foretold;" that "the primitive Christians imagined the day of resurrection and judgment was near," etc., it follows that they could not possibly admit the Origenistic view of the Kingdom. (Comp. Neander, Mosheim, Kurtz, etc.)

Obs. 3. The strongest possible argument that the Apostle Paul could have used to convince the Thessalonians that they were mistaken as to the imminency of the Advent, would have been the modern one concerning the church, i.e. that Christ's Kingdom was established in the church, and that according to Daniel and the prophets a long career of honor and dominion was before it, for it would be folly to suppose that a Kingdom just newly set up should so speedily come to an end without fulfilling the prophecies. Let the student reflect on the situation, on the abundant predictions concerning the Kingdom, and then let him consider that if the church was really intended to meet the prophecies of the Kingdom, surely such an appeal, so simple, consistent, and convincing, would have been spoken. Inspiration, however, to be consonant with itself, could not thus give it. Instead of designating the church a Kingdom they (the Apostles) teach that it is a probationary and preparatory stage to the Kingdom. In the very Epistle (Hebrews) that above all others was designed for the Jews, and where, if anywhere, the church should be specifically (if such) elevated to the position of Messiah's Kingdom, we have, instead of this, language employed which is eminently calculated to confirm the Jews in their idea of a Kingdom still future. Taking e.g. the phrase "the world to come," knowing the notions that the Jews (Prop. 137) attributed to it, and representing Jesus as the One to whom it would be subject; speaking of "the rest" as future and that it is "a keeping of the Sabbath" without explaining that it was very different from that anticipated by the Jews (Prop. 143) under David's Son; declaring that the covenant promises are realized only in Christ when He "should come the second time unto salvation,"—these, and the whole drift of the Epistle, are to the effect that the church must wait for "the appearing and Kingdom."

Obs. 4. Neander (His. of Plant. Ch. Church, vol. 2, p. 176) thus gives Paul's view: "Such an universal sovereignty in reserve for the Kingdom of God, Paul certainly acknowledged; but the thought was then, and must have continued to be, not familiar to his mind, that such a supremacy of the Kingdom of God was to be formed by that developing process which Christ compares to the leaven, through the natural connection of causes and effects under the Divine guidance." Neander argues that by this developing process the Kingdom of God would by degrees assume a supremacy "brought about under other conditions than those of earthly existence by the Second Advent of Christ." It is but too true, that such a theory built upon the parable of the leaven, was unfamiliar to Paul; it cannot be found in his writings, and yet he was also (more so than Neander) familiar with the parable. This theory, which its advocates so learnedly prefer, and which is claimed to have been developed through "the life of the church" (rather through Hegelian philosophy), was unknown to the early church. For the sake of the truth, "the simplicity and ignorance" of Paul is vastly to be preferred to the philosophical "leaven theory," which overrides the most solemnly given promises, and oath-confirmed Davidic throne and Kingdom,—and which assumes that Apostles, to whom the parables were explained by Christ, who conversed much with Jesus respecting the Kingdom, and who were specially guided by the Spirit, knew less about the parables than uninspired men following centuries after.

Obs. 5. So little, indeed, did the first Christians hold the notion that the church is the Kingdom, that they refused even to allow the saints after death to have ascended into the third heaven (see Brooks' El. Proph. Inter., Bickersteth's Guide, etc.), and be in the enjoyment of it, placing them in an intermediate state, awaiting in Hades the coming of the Kingdom (so, e.g., Justin Martyr explicitly declares). And even down to Tertullian, who is willing to make an exception in behalf of the Patriarchs, Prophets, and Martyrs, this intermediate state or Paradise "is not, properly speaking, the Kingdom of heaven, into which they will not enter until after Christ's Advent." (So Neander, His. of Dogmas, p. 252, vol. 1.) How then if even unwilling to admit this, as Justin informs us, could they constitute the church a Kingdom? Hence, in the earliest writings, there is not a decisive passage which teaches the prevailing modern view. While the Fathers insisted on the universal government of God, the Headship of Christ over the church, yet they do not designate the church the Kingdom of God, or profess to be in the Kingdom, but represent themselves as looking for it still future. Barnabas, Irenæus, Justin, and others freely give us their opinions, and they fully correspond with our doctrinal position. This fact alone is strongly corroborative of our belief.

Let the reader refer e.g. to Prop. 93, Obs. 10, and observe how Tertullian explains the Lord's Prayer. "Thy Kingdom come" cannot be prayed for by those who already possess it. The disciples (as we have shown, Props. 43, 44, 54, 55, 68, 70, etc.), who prayed it, had no idea of the modern notion engrafted on the prayer. They prayed it, looking for a Kingdom to come visibly in the future under David's Son. We may well ask, How could the Divine Master give them such a prayer, with such a clause in it, which, as the facts evidence, was eminently calculated to confirm them in expecting the covenant to be realized in its plain grammatical sense? Would Jesus give them that in prayer which He foreknew would be (if the modern notion is correct) grossly misunderstood and perverted? No! consistency, the covenants and prophecy, require us to understand the Kingdom prayed for as not then in existence, but as future and certain to come. The prayer is given, without explanation, in view of a well-known covenanted Kingdom, generally anticipated. (The delicacy, exquisite, expressed in the word "Thy," in its Theocratic ordering, relating to David's Son, is seen e.g. under Props. 83, 200, etc.) The clause "Thy will be done on earth," etc., is not now verified even in the Church (e.g. Props. 96 and 97), and, so long as it remains in its present mixed character, cannot be. The "will" of God respecting the earth is easily seen if the eye of faith is directed either to the past or to the future; in the past, it is reflected before the fall, and in the future it shines forth in the renewed earth. To make it manifested now as originally intended, as covenanted and predicted, is to cover it over with the passions, frailties, etc., of poor humanity. (Comp. Prop. 105.)

PROPOSITION 99. The opinion that the church is the predicted Kingdom of Christ was of later origin than the first and second centuries.

In the first centuries Millenarianism was prevalent and generally held, Props. 72-76. It was entertained in the form that we now advocate, and, in the very nature of the case, could not receive the opinion stated in the Proposition. The Fathers all looked and longed for a speedy appearance of the Kingdom under the personal reign of Jesus. The opposers of Chiliasm in the third century first gave a different interpretation to the church, by which it was transformed into the Kingdom of Christ.

Obs. 1. The opposers mentioned designed such an exchange to offset the idea of a coming Kingdom of Christ here on earth. If they could point to an already existing Kingdom over which Christ then reigned as predicted, it would go far to demolish the Chiliasm doctrine of the future Kingdom. The Origenistic interpretation was admirably adapted to bring about so desirable a substitution, and through its flexible and mystical manipulations the work was accomplished. Origen was about, if not, the first one who introduced "the novelty."

Obs. 2. In justice, however, to Origen himself, we must add, that while paving the way for others, and expressing himself somewhat like many moderns, yet even he frequently writes guardedly, perhaps undecidedly. Thus e.g. in his "De Principiis" when making a Kingdom to exist here on earth in the church, he speaks of the church (B. 1, ch. 6) "which is the form of that Kingdom which is to come," and (in B. 3, ch. 6), he goes on to show that "the form" of a Kingdom does not include the reign of Christ, but only that of Christ's agents, for speaking of "the consummation and restoration of all things" when "those better institutions" will be introduced, he adds: "For, after his Agents and servants, the Lord Christ, who is King of all, will Himself assume the Kingdom." As we cannot tell whether Rufinus added to this or not, we are content to receive it as also Origenistic, and proof that he himself could not entirely rid himself of the early church doctrine of a Kingdom still future belonging pre-eminently to Jesus Christ.

Obs. 3. After the Roman Empire nominally became Christian, then, indeed, a host of writers sprang up, who lavished the Kingdom upon the church with so liberal a hand, that the union of state and church under Constantine and his successors was pronounced to be not only the Kingdom of Christ, but the Kingdom in Millennial bloom, even to a New Jerusalem condition. (See Eusebius and Jerome.) When the Papacy was unfolded and in power, it was impossible, with its idea of vicegerency, etc., to expect any other than an anti-chiliasitic view of the church. This brief synopsis, with Props. 76, 77, 78, and what follows, is amply sufficient for the present.

The Popish Church is called "the Kingdom of Christ" in the Dogmatic Decrees of the recent Vatican Council, thus only confirming the ten thousand previous utterances. Out of a multitude of illustrations, it is sufficient to give Bh. Vaughan (Gladstone's Vaticanism, p. 55), who says that the Church has been created "a perfect Society or Kingdom," "with full authority in the triple order, as needful for a perfect Kingdom, legislative, judicial, and coercive." (Comp. Arch. Manning's Vatican Decrees, p. 43, and as illustrative of this "perfect Kingdom" read the lives of the Popes.)

Obs. 4. The history of the doctrine of the church should not influence any one to reject the truth itself. The Scriptures, in the cautions and warnings given, teach us to anticipate the result witnessed. No doctrine of the Bible, however important, but has been perverted and abused by men, and has been allied with error and even extravagance. The doctrine of the Kingdom has not escaped the withering touch of depravity; and as we read, again and again the testimony comes how enthusiasm, mysticism, fanaticism have sought to engraft upon it the most outrageous and blasphemous assumptions, even to the extent that persons have given themselves out to be the king of such a Kingdom. Reflection, however, enables us to perceive that such abuse and perversion are only, in the light of prophecy, corroborative evidence of the truthfulness of Scripture.

This notion of the church being the covenanted Kingdom of Christ (instead of being, what it really is, a preparatory stage for the future introduction of the Kingdom) is deeply rooted in prevailing Theology, and even in literature. It is an idea long held in veneration, fortified by great names, embellished by eloquence, supported by philosophy, strengthened by policy, power, and age, enriched by the cumulative reasoning of many centuries and the concessions of piety, so that, in view of its position, dimensions, and intrenchments, the person who ventures to meet it is almost placed like one in "a forlorn hope." Ideas, consecrated and cemented by the expressed opinions, attachment, and submission of multitudes, embracing men of the highest ability, piety, and learning, are not to be eradicated, saving by a higher hand, when fulfilling His own counsels and covenanted promise. The notion, as we have abundantly shown, is variously presented, and is so general that it is even adopted in the titles of books, as e.g. a history of Congregationalism in New England is designated by its author, H. F. Udden, "The New England Theocracy"; a history of the church is called by the writer, Dr. Jarvis, "The History of the Mediatorial Kingdom," etc. Under its influence the most extravagant claims have been enforced, not only by the Papacy but by Protestantism. Sects have taken advantage of the opening, and pretended that their several organizations were the predicted Kingdom. The Mormons (Seward's Travels, p. 19) declare, "that, according to divine promise, the Kingdom of God came upon the earth immediately after the departure of the Saviour; that this Kingdom has a key; that the church early lost it, and that the Latter Day Saints have found it," etc., being the Kingdom. Enthusiasts have pressed it to an extreme.

Obs. 5. With infidel writers no view of the church is satisfactory. Thus e.g. the Duke of Somerset boldly informs us, that the early church doctrine, once entertained, but properly rejected by the church, does not satisfy modern thought and wants, being too "deeply colored by the popular traditions and poetical imagery of the Hebrew race." On the other hand, the doctrine substituted by the church in the place of the one rejected is contrasted with the early one, and being found so diverse, the deduction is drawn, that the Word itself is unreliable, erroneous, etc. Or, contrasting the modern church views with the prophecies, they claim that one or the other is incorrect, etc. The Kingdom not existing, as predicted, in the church at present, causes them to refuse the Biblical account ; the Kingdom professedly in the church is obnoxious to them, and leads to the same refusal on the ground that it does not correspond either with the early church or the record.

PROPOSITION 100. The visible church is not the predicted Kingdom of Jesus Christ.

The covenant forbids the idea to be entertained, for the Davidic covenant and the promises based on it, as we have shown, remain unfulfilled, unrealized in the church. This Proposition is advanced in this form only to direct attention to the fact, that many writers affirm that the visible church itself is the kingdom. The arguments already advanced refute this notion, but leaving these to speak for themselves, we give some additional observations.

Obs. 1. Aside from Roman Catholic and Protestant divines, who declare in the most positive manner (as e.g. Bellarmine—Fisher's His. of Refor., p. 465—Romanist, says that the church-Kingdom is as tangible as the Republic of Venice, and Gresley—in his True Churchman—a Protestant, who takes the same ground), that the visible church is the Kingdom, it is painful to follow the inconsistent and half-way utterances of a large class of writers, who on one page affirm the same and on another page, confronted by its mixed state, conclude the contrary, or else concede a kind (lower) of Kingdom to the external ("a shadowing forth") but the true notion to the internal or invisible church. In the latter, a distinct and uniform theory is lacking; whilst in the former, claim can be made, at least, to a unity, etc., for it contains a form of government, having its rulers, subjects, etc.

An illustration of these two opinions may be in place. Thus e.g. whatever may be the Scriptural and historical value of presbytery itself, under the idea, taken for granted, that the visible church is the Kingdom, Rev. Porteus gives us a Prize Essay with preface by Dr. Bonar, bearing the significant and far-reaching title. "The Government of the Kingdom of Christ: An Inquiry as to the Scriptural, Inevitable, and Historical Position of Presbytery." Again, e.g. Schmid (Bib. Theol. of the New Test., p. 250) clearly sees the difficulty of making the visible church in its present state the Kingdom of God, and yet forced by this theory to find an outward development of the Kingdom of God here on earth, and such a church being the only thing present to which it can be attached, he gives us this paradoxical assertion: "It may be said that the church is not in any respect identical with the Kingdom of God; but yet the actual Kingdom of God on earth coincides with the church." To prove this we are led into mystical and philosophical reasoning, based solely on assumption, and which is afterward contradicted by his own showing, that the church is the Kingdom because baptism, the Lord's Supper, Christ's Word, are "the groundwork of God's Kingdom on earth," etc. The efforts to soften and tone this down to a spiritual nature does not deliver him from palpable contradictions, as e.g. in one place telling us that these ordinances thus related to the Kingdom are external and outward, then in another that the Kingdom upon which these external ordinances are based is inward, and then still in another that the Kingdom is also outward, working from external ordinances, and from within outwardly. A theory that needs such a confused bolstering requires no special comment, although some of the most able men, forced by a preconceived notion, tenaciously cling to it. And it is a matter of amazement that many men, like Neander, who insist so strongly that the invisible church is the Kingdom predicted, finally, by a series of mystical transfusions, have this same invisible Church-Kingdom made an outward visible Church-Kingdom here on earth, thus violating the fundamental principles of the very theory which causes them in the first place to adopt the invisible ; for, if correct, the church should always in this dispensation possess the same characteristics, undergoing as it does the same leavening process described by him. Fuller (Strictures on Robinson's Sentiments, Let. 3), to indicate that the church is a Kingdom, says : "The church of God is represented as a city," etc., and quotes as confirmatory Isa. 26 : 1, 2. But this passage does not refer to the church as now constituted, as is apparent from the context, following as it does the resurrection of the saints, the complete overthrow of all enemies, and the restoration of the Jewish nation. Passages which refer exclusively to a still future dispensation are thus constantly applied to this one, without the least attempt to show that they are properly used. This is only a continuation of the Papal view. Thus e.g. a recent Romanist, Dr. Alzog (Univ. Ch. His., vol. 1, p. 153), says : "Christ, therefore, recognized the necessity of such an institution, founded a visible church, which He calls indifferently the Kingdom of God, the Kingdom of Heaven, and the Kingdom of Christ." It is this idea that infused such a spirit (see Spiritual Exercises) into Loyola and others, and is the basis of the infallibility doctrine (as also exemplified in the Metropolitan, Arch., Macarius, teaching the infallibility of the Czar—the Greek Church being leavened with the Church-Kingdom idea), as brought out in the recent Sermons, Lectures, etc. of Rev. Burke and others.

Obs. 2. The reader will notice, that the visibility of the Kingdom in the church is a matter fully admitted by a host of our opponents. Even those who cleave to the invisibility of it (i.e. under the invisible church), as at first and now constructed, in some way bring ultimately out of this invisible a visible Kingdom. They, notwithstanding the inconsistency involved, are simply compelled to this by the testimony of prophecy, which (as e.g. Dan., chs. 2 and 7), unmistakably predicts such an outward, visible dominion. The singular feature in this is the following : in the construction of such a visible Kingdom either as now existing or as it shall ultimately in the future, they find no difficulty in the declaration "my Kingdom is not of this world," in making out the church to possess a world dominion, having church and state united, etc., but the same passage is persistently paraded, and false inferences drawn from it, against the visible Kingdom, the world dominion when presented by Millenarians. Another fact is to be observed in this controversy, that all divines, who oppose our view, agree that either now or at some future time when the church has this external development predicted by the prophets, the phrases Kingdom of heaven and Kingdom of God are applicable to a visible state here on the earth. This feature is then yielded to us by the large majority of our opponents ; if not universal, it is generally held. If so, it should certainly aid in removing prejudice against us.

The works on the Church, Church and State, Ecclesiastical Polity, Church Government, etc., evidence this widespread notion, derived from the prophecies. Many of the ideas advanced are fundamentally correct, but the mistake which vitiates the whole is the transference of the fulfilment from the period after the Sec. Advent to the "times of the Gentiles," between the First and Second Advent. A multitude of able writers advocate a present visibility of the Kingdom, a present realization of the prophecies, and a Theocracy already established, as can be seen e.g. in Jewell's Apol. for the Church of England, Hooker's Ecccl. Polity, Buckle's His. of Civ., vol. 2, p. 271, Gladstone's State in Relation to the Church, and Macaulay's Essay on same, Warburton's Alliance of Church and State, Paley's Defence of the Church, etc., etc.

Obs. 3. The prophecies so decisive of a visible manifestation of Christ's Kingdom, it being something that all men can see and realize in its organized and exerted power, drives some to a singular classification and division of the church, such as that the Kingdom is (1) the church, (2) the church in the Millennial age, and (3) the church in heaven ; or, as a commentator has it, (1) the church an internal Kingdom, (2) the church an external Kingdom, (3) the church as a future Kingdom, and (4) the church in heaven. A Kingdom is often formed (as e.g. Olshausen, Com., vol. 2, p. 172) at the will of the writer to suit the occasion. The Kingdom instead of being one (Prop. 35), is really made into several. And in some instances, if we understand the authors correctly, one within the other. This, in the light of prophecy, is evidently incorrect. Dr. Neander (Life of Christ, Sec. 52) feels that there is a difficulty in making the church a Kingdom to accord with prophecy without an external, outward manifestation of governing power ; therefore, he mystically distinguishes two stages of the Kingdom ; first, a hidden or inward condition, and then the second stage was by means of the first "to establish His (Christ's) Kingdom as a real one, more and more widely among men, and subdue the world to his dominion." And this reality is to be witnessed in "a real world dominion," "a perfect world dominion," an "universal empire." Now aside from this theory being flatly contradicted by the parable of the tares and wheat, etc., it certainly looks, with his "leaven theory" to alone accomplish it, suspicious and accommodating to make the Kingdom (1) unreal or ideal, and then (2) real or the ideal realized. Multitudes embrace the notion, that in some way the church must be the Kingdom, because they suppose that it will ultimately in this dispensation become universal and exhibit outwardly, more and more, the form essential to a Kingdom. We request the reader to notice the important concession made by it, viz. : it admits an outward, visible form requisite to fulfil prophecy, and that the church has not yet attained to the period when this is to be manifested. Such admissions, as far as they go, materially confirm our own doctrinal position.

Probably one of the most vigorous efforts to make the church the promised Kingdom of Christ is that found in the Scottish Church in its struggles with Popery and Prelacy. (See the Epitome given by D'Aubigne in his Germany, England, and Scotland, chs. 4, 5, and 6.) Opposing the pretensions of others, the assumption is taken that such a Kingdom is to be inferred from the headship and kingship of Christ. During the entire discussion there is no discrimination made between the Divine Sovereignty and the Kingdom promised to the Son of David ; the covenants, which underlie the whole subject, are totally ignored (in grammatical sense), and issue is made on isolated passages of Scripture torn from their connection and unity. It is supposed that the church is the Davidic Kingdom (spiritualized) ; it is taken for granted that Jesus now sits on David's throne (but how the Father's throne is thus substituted does not appear) ; and Luke 1 : 32, 33 is often quoted, without any attempt at explanation, as if applicable to the present. The holding of His Kingdom in abeyance for purposes of mercy and love (to gather out a people) ; the postponement of the Kingdom to the Sec. Advent (clearly taught) ; in brief, those characteristics which evidence the preparatory nature of the church and its non-identity with the Kingdom—are left out of sight, and the greatest stress is laid on visible sacraments, a visible ministry, a visible government, etc., without excluding the invisible. A writer (anon., but withal Protestant) builds his entire argument that the church is the Kingdom upon "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock," etc., laying special stress on the words "And I will give unto thee the keys of the Kingdom of heaven" (for which comp. Prop. 64, etc.). Indeed, the Reformed Presbyterian Church, or Covenanters (see an Art. on, by Rev. Hutcheson, in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.), makes not only the church the covenanted Messianic Kingdom, but even includes the State : "They consider the church and the State as the two leading departments of Christ's visible Kingdom on earth." This is done by ignoring the grammatical sense of the covenants, spiritualizing the predictions, applying to the present what belongs to the future, and misapprehending the "times of the Gentiles" and the design of this dispensation. But it is a legitimate following out of the principles of Calvin (from which others swerve), for Calvin's rule in Geneva resulted from the misconception that "the Kingdom of God" was to be realized in the lives and society of the people (comp. Fisher's His. Refor., p. 217, etc.; D'Aubigne's His. of Refor., etc.). He so framed the State that the Church through a consistory had the controlling influence, and the State was only co-operative in enforcing a code, which was the resultant of the opinion that God's Kingdom was established in the Church, and that a sort of Mosaic legislation under an alleged existing Theocratic organization was in place, by which all—even such as were not predestined unto salvation—were forced, by penalties, upon their good behavior and obedience. History records the sad conflict, and infidelity, overlooking the conscientiousness (however mistaken) of "the venerable company," makes itself merry at the expense of the trivial and bloody stringency (repeated again in Puritanism) of its laws, without considering that men who sincerely entertained such views of the Kingdom of Christ could not, if really honest in their convictions, act otherwise. This mistaken doctrine affords an apology for a code which advocated coercion in matters of religion, and made the State, as in the Papacy, the executioner. Neal (His. of the Puritans), when summing up the differences between the Puritans and the High-Church party, adds finally that both insisted upon a uniformity of worship and of "calling in the sword of the magistrate for the support and the defence of their several principles." The spirit of the Papacy is by some most strenuously enforced, as e.g. illustrated in Cartwright (Disraeli's Cal. of Authors, vol. 1, p. 365, note), who made out a Republic of Presbyters to be superior to all sovereigns, for the latter "were to be as subjects; they were to veil their sceptres, and to offer their crowns as the prophet speaketh, to lick the dust off the feet of the church" (misapplying the prophet). He says: "The monarchs of the world should give up their sceptres and crowns unto Him (Jesus Christ), who is represented by the officers of the church." Alas! by a perversion of Scripture, honestly and most tenaciously held, what disastrous results, what crimes, what persecution and death, have resulted. Those who desire this Church-Kingdom theory "run to seed" may refer to the dying testimony of Alex. Campbell, as given in the London Quarterly Review, 1851, p. 165.

Obs. 4. A number of authors, who declare that "the church on the earth, or the body of the faithful, is a true and visible representation of Christ's Kingdom, the Kingdom of Grace, the mediatorial Kingdom," also say, "the Patriarchal Church, the Jewish Church, and the Christian Church are but different names for the same church—they are all the Church of Christ." Identifying the two, making one and all the same Kingdom, i.e. Christ's, they involve themselves in the absurdity that the Kingdom especially promised to David's Son, said David's Son held in possession before David's Son was ever born! The most fatal objections, as preceding Propositions show, beset this theory on all sides. Even the simple matter of John's preaching sets it aside; for, if correct, then John's preaching of the Kingdom was equivalent to his saying, "Repent, for the church is at hand." But how could such a declaration be made, if the church, as Christ's Kingdom, existed previously and at that time? One writer, however, thinks that he finds the solution in saying that the church had previously to John's time existed "under types, in a typical state." This only involves the subject in still greater absurdity. For, while all admit that types existed that were to be superseded, nearly all also retain the reality of the church itself; but this theory makes the church itself unreal, simply "a shadow of good things to come," thus constituting it in itself a mere typical establishment or Kingdom, instead of its being, what it really was, a real, organized, visible establishment having and observing some typical ordinances.

Obs. 5. Men of the greatest reflection, such as Rothe, Coleridge, Arnold, and others, seeing the past and present condition of the church, and frankly acknowledging that it does not in its visible aspect correspond with the conditions imposed by prophecy, and yet hampered by a theory which requires them to regard the church as a sort of embryotic Kingdom or state, they contend that the church will not be complete, i.e. assume the predicted aspect, until it is absorbed in the state, or the state is identified with the church—ecclesiastical perfection being civil perfection, the state constituting the church—the present separate condition of the church being only provisional. Thus deep thinkers have of their own accord adopted the early church view, that the present state of the church is only provisional, but they certainly mistake when they (i.e. some of them) attribute the ultimate result, i.e. the development into a visible Kingdom such as prophecy demands, to the progress of the human race through religious, moral, mental, social, scientific, etc., influences, instead of, where prophecy places it, to the personal intervention and power of Christ. This will be examined in detail hereafter, and it is sufficient now to say, that the covenant itself, descriptive of the Kingdom, forbids our acceptance of such a theory. The line of argument adopted by them makes, however, valuable concessions, equivalent to what we contend for in this future Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, as e.g. the perfect union of church and state. The Millenarian view is not specially concerned in adopting any of their ideas; only it insists, that with such opinions certainly no serious objection can be alleged against the visibility, etc. of the covenanted Kingdom as entertained by us. Their statements even go farther than we have seen in Millenarian writings. Thus e.g. according to Rothe, the state is finally to absorb the church, taking up Christianity in itself and becoming the Kingdom of God (consummated, Dr. Lange adds); and according to Bluntschli the church will yield up its specifically Christian character, thus paving the way for the culture of Mohammedans, Japanese, etc. In all this, the admission is constantly made that the visible church, as now constituted, does not yet present the predicted appearance of the Kingdom. In pressing their theory to make it correspond with prophetic announcements, they, without the guidance of the description of the Kingdom already solemnly covenanted, go to unnecessary lengths; on the one hand, making an enslavement or subjugation of the church under the state; or, on the other, such a radical change of the church that in this dispensation it loses its specific character. We, however, show that in the future Kingdom there is a perfect union of church and state under one Head without absorption or prejudice to either one or the other.

Again, we caution the student that able Pre-Millenarians hold to the idea that the Church is a provisional or introductory Kingdom, or as some call it, "an embryotic Kingdom" or "a Kingdom in mystery." But not one holds that this is the proper covenanted and predicted Kingdom, for they all teach that the Sec. Advent can alone introduce it. The few passages which cause such Pre-Millenarians to retain this view, will come up hereafter for detailed examination. We vastly prefer the simple, plain grammatical sense to guide us in connection with the general analogy of the Word, which, as we have already seen, reveals to us only one distinctive Messianic Kingdom. To such who may read this, the writer simply points to Luke 17 : 22, and reminds them that this period of time, during the absence of the Son of man, cannot possibly—aside from the Divine Sovereignty and the headship of Jesus over the church—bring us into the enjoyment of a Kingdom, although it brings us the faith, hope, and joy of "heirs." Taking the view advocated by us, it introduces a consistent logical position. As illustrative of the vague and inconsistent interpretations which the other involves, we select an esteemed writer. Dr. Nast (Com. on Matt. 16 : 19) makes the church the Kingdom of heaven, but not satisfied, and evidently realizing a discrepancy, he adds: "Yet the visible church and the Kingdom of heaven are not, in every respect, identical." But he fails to tell us in what respect they are identical—a task which no one has yet undertaken. Such a statement at once vitiates his own application. But in an Art. in

The West. Ch. Advocate, Aug. 6, 1879, opposing Bh. Merrill's view that the sending of the Comforter was the coming of "the Son of man," he justly adds: "The 'ecclesia' (church) is not the 'basileia' (Kingdom) in the Biblical sense of the term, and therefore the establishment of the Ch. Church on the day of Pentecost was not the coming of the Kingdom Christ had referred to in the promise, Matt. 16 : 28."

Obs. 6. The unsatisfactory correspondence of the present condition of the church with the condition of the Kingdom of God as delineated by prophecy, has led sincere and ardent Christians, with most honorable motives, to agitate and press for constitutional amendments, by which states and nations, civil governments, are to become identified with the church as a sort of allies or guardians of Christianity. This is done under the supposition that in this way the Kingdom of Christ will be established and extended to meet the requirements of prophecy; and much laudation is expended in this direction. As our entire argument in all its phases is opposed to such a theory, we may very briefly say, that this is to be rejected, (1) as opposed to the covenanted Kingdom; (2) to the design of this dispensation and of the church itself; (3) to the time when (under last trumpet), and the order under which (Second Advent) this is to be accomplished; (4) to the representations of the church in this dispensation as separate and distinct; (5) to the predicted overthrow and destruction of states and kingdoms at the end of this dispensation. Indeed, we have no prediction that the church in this age can accomplish it; for a comparison of prophecy teaches us that down to the very Advent of Jesus the church, instead of being in the condition represented by such writers, is more or less oppressed by the state, and at the very ending of the age endures a terrible persecution. Moreover, the Bible, when alluding to such unions, represents them as unsatisfactory and oppressive, even going so far as to represent states and governments identified with such a union (e.g. Roman Empire) as beasts, a whore, and mother of harlots. Whatever may be thought of the last assertion, whether conclusive or not, one fact confirms such a Biblical representation, viz.: that history teaches that the union of church and state has almost always resulted in a positive injury to the church—the state imposing its confessions, fettering by its symbolical deductions, lording it over believers, and frequently wielding the sword of persecution. Experience has shown that it is impolitic and dangerous to lodge a controlling power over the church in the state, and any movement in this direction ought to be avoided. Let us be content with our "stranger and pilgrim" allotted condition until the time comes when God and His Son shall unite church and state, not under rulers liable to corruption, etc., but under tried and immortal ones.

Obs. 7. Many of the last class also profess to guard their view against some objections by upholding the unchanged condition and supremacy of the church, making the state a very subordinate part in the future programme. But in doing this they sacrifice in a great measure the prophetic announcements of the greatness and extent of the world-dominion of the Kingdom. It conduces to a vagueness which proves very unsatisfactory, and it produces in abundance glittering generalities, which in themselves establish nothing.

Obs. 8. It is a truth, that a vast number of works are published in the interest of controversy and of doctrine respecting the church, in which the most important of all the questions concerning the church is either taken for granted or else entirely ignored. The leading, fundamental question, whether the church is truly the covenanted Kingdom of God, is, in many instances, entirely untouched. Under the assumption that it is such, we are treated to an immense array of learning and disquisition entirely based on an alleged and arrogated doctrine. No proof is even attempted; just as if the assumption had never been questioned. This itself is evidence of great weakness.

Obs. 9. Just in proportion as the notion that the visible church is the Kingdom of God is entertained and extended, in the same proportion will there also be an extravagant idea of superiority and supremacy over others. This is true from the earliest period when this was asserted, down to the recent establishment of Mormonism, which also claims "a visible Kingdom of God," "the Latter Day Kingdom," the stone of Dan., ch. 2, which is to be converted into the mountain (so Elder Pratt, etc.). This opinion, arbitrarily received, has had a most powerful influence among the nations, and it has proven a most fruitful source of aggrandizement, contention, and oppression. Out of it has sprung those hierarchical tendencies accepted by Roman Catholics and Protestants, and to it even the most liberal of Reformers have made sundry concessions which has hampered Reformation itself.

Arrogance, animosity, and even bloodshed have been some of its bitter fruits as witnessed in the Latin, Greek, English, and other churches; and down to the present day its claims are characteristic of various antagonistic parties. It has urged popes, kings, queens, bishops, etc., to enact and enforce arbitrary and cruel penal laws; and it has proven the root from which has proceeded a growth of misery, persecution, and martyrdom. It is a sad truth, that if we once admit that the visible church, in any one of its forms, is the Kingdom of Christ on earth, we close the doors to the exclusion of freedom of investigation and of private judgment, elevating said church into the position of a dispenser and arbiter of God's Word in the form (confession) it then may possess. This is abundantly made manifest by the pleas of Popery and of national establishments in the past. And we do not blame these for pressing very logical claims; for, if the premise be once conceded, i.e. that the visible church is such a Kingdom, then the rest legitimately follows. Consistency then demands an outward unity, and, in the efforts to secure such unity, force must be employed, and as a result, violence is done both to religion and man. The edicts of the first Christian Emperors become a model of church authority; the fulminations of certain Councils are cherished as the lawful exhibitions of authorized dominion; the canons and work of fallible man are elevated to tests of allegiance, resulting in crimination, excommunication, and anathema. The fountain itself being impure, the stream flowing from it, whatever pure and refreshing springs alongside of it may commingle with it, will carry on this impurity.

Obs. 10. This claim of making the visible church the Kingdom of God has been conducive to infidelity. Arrogating to itself such pre-eminence, the imperfection so palpably existing (e.g. its contentions, retrogressions, lapses, diversity of faith, conflicting creeds, various systems of interpretation, church government, etc.) has vitiated in the eyes of such not only the claim itself, but unfortunately Christianity along with it. The device of making an invisible Kingdom to meet their objection did not materially alter the case; for they observed that even the purest and truest of believers retained imperfection and antagonism in belief even as to the nature of this Kingdom, etc.

The Encyclopædists rejected, and in more recent times numbers have arisen who repudiate the church because of its attempting to occupy such a position. Sneeringly but truthfully they point to the prophecies and then to history, telling us that the church, if a Kingdom, does not correspond with the description given by prophecy: sarcastically but fairly they refer to the early preaching and faith of the church in this Kingdom, and laughingly contrast it with the preaching and faith now extant on the same point; and from these infer that either the prophets, or the disciples or the apostles, or the church, or all together, were mistaken. Others, however, pretending great friendship for the church, more soberly point out the same, and discard divine revelation, retaining a belief in a religion of humanity. These endeavor to show that such claims that the church put forth were probably necessary in the march of human development, but that now they must give place to another new Kingdom of heaven, predicted by themselves, as a result of a new development of progressive humanity. If you reply to these also, that the Kingdom must be conceived of as purely spiritual and invisible, they answer that what pertains to humanity, its amelioration, and elevation, must, if it professes organization, form, etc., be also exhibited externally, and that growth, extension, etc., as predicted, can only be predicated of such. In looking over this controversy, the fact remains that the church has set its claim so high that it cannot be successfully sustained. Even the efforts of Neander and others to set this claim in a philosophical light has by no means retarded the progress of infidelity, for it is widening and extending in all countries, probably in many cases, with this change, that it now, under the garb of professed regard, accepts of the church as a Kingdom, not in the light, however, of Roman Catholicism, or Protestantism, but of a part of the natural, inevitable development of the races of men, placing this church and Kingdom, with ill-disguised contempt and a flourish of learning, among the Oriental and other religions of the world. Without pretending that our doctrine would have met with a better fate at their hands (for the root of infidelity is in the heart and not in the head), yet it is true that the simple design which we hold that the church was to accomplish, and the position which she was to occupy while carrying it out, being so widely different from this pompous claim, and being more consonant with history and Scripture, if entertained in place of the other, would have rendered many of the arguments now arrayed against the church so irrelevant and worthless that they never would have been broached. In the first centuries of the church infidelity could and did not, in view of the faith generally entertained, employ them.

Obs. 11. The simple predicted facts, that the visible church is to be overcome by the Antichrist (comp. Props. 123, 162, 160, 161, etc.), and that the church is saved by the personal Advent of Jesus when under the most terrible of persecutions in the future—are sufficient in themselves to show that the nature of a Kingdom, as covenanted and predicted, does not appertain to the church. For, when the Kingdom is once established, all prophecy declares that, instead of being overwhelmed by its foes, it obtains dominion over the nations and ever afterward retains the same. No Antichrist can then give the option of worship or death.

If it be alleged that "the gates of Hades shall not prevail" against the church, we fully agree by saying that while the saints are persecuted and under its death-dealing blows enter Hades, Jesus, who has the keys of Hades, will deliver them at the first resurrection (Prop. 125-129). The church, however persecuted, is safe; our argument only insists upon it that persecution and a low, oppressed condition of the church is incompatible with the predictions relating to Christ's Kingdom, and that, in consequence, the church is only a preparative stage for the incoming Kingdom.

PROPOSITION 101. The invisible Church is not the covenanted Kingdom of Christ.

Whatever of truth we may concede to the theological division of the church into the invisible and visible, neither of them meets the conditions imposed by the covenant. Instead of an invisible Kingdom, the covenant and the prophecies relating to it unmistakably point out a visible Kingdom, outward and universal in a world dominion. So plainly is this stated, that even those who advocate that the invisible church is the predicted Kingdom of Jesus, in some way, either by development or by copious outpourings of the Spirit, etc., make this invisible Kingdom assume ultimately the form of a visible one.

Let the student but consider the Kingdom covenanted to David's Son, a real, visible, external Theocracy here on the earth, and he will see at once that to transmute this into an invisible, indefinite Kingdom is to take undue liberty with the Divine Record, and to introduce an element perverting the proper application of much Scripture.

Obs. 1. This division of the church into the visible and invisible is of comparative recent origin. Dr. Knapp (Ch. Theol., p. 471) traces the use of these terms, saying: "These are, indeed, new, and have come into use since the Reformation." Many able Divines have since then employed them, whilst others reject them. So far as our argument is concerned, it is immaterial whether they be received or not; for the church may indeed be invisible, if by that is only meant the body of real and true believers who are saved, and also visible, if by this is denoted a mixed body containing believers and professing believers, without, however, constituting either of them a Kingdom. Reference is therefore only made to the use of the terms to indicate that they were never thus employed in the early history of the Christian Church.

Oosterzee's (Ch. Doqm., vol. 2, p. 700, etc.) reasoning is unsatisfactory, inconclusive, and contradictory. The key-note of his argument is found in the sentence: "As Christ was the fulfilling of prophecy, so in a certain sense is the church the fulfilling of the Theocracy, though under an entirely different form." But Christ fulfilled prophecy only to a certain extent; much remains yet to be fulfilled at His Sec. Advent. The reference to "the Church" being "a fulfilling of the Theocracy in a different form" is pure conjecture to help out a preconceived Church-Kingdom theory; and the whole finds its proof in the parable of the leaven applied to the church and the world, instead of to the individual believer. The contradictory part is found (p. 702) when, speaking of the church as "an independent society of a moral, religious nature," he says: "Its members are, as such, not yet citizens of the Kingdom of God, but must be regenerated and trained up within its bosom," and yet insists that, as a spiritual, mystical body, its members are citizens of the Kingdom of God, which spiritual, invisible Kingdom will finally be visibly realized. That is, he seeks refuge for his theory in the invisible church for the present, and ultimately in the visible. He admits that this distinction of visible and invisible church "was not made, or was scarcely made, by the oldest teachers and fathers of the church," but that it "slowly reached the desired development."

Strange that believers for centuries lived in the church utterly unaware, unconscious, that they were in the predicted Kingdom of God. Admitting the spirituality of the church, its union by faith with the Head, the interest and power of Christ exerted in behalf of the church, its preciousness in its means of grace, etc., yet all this by no means elevates it to the position of a Messianic Kingdom. Covenant and promise, entirely unrealized in it, forbids the idea, and forces us to receive the Word, which teaches that it is introductory, preparatory in its nature—the means introduced to secure a desired end. Simple consistency demands this view of the church and Kingdom. Litton (The Church of Christ) quotes the Romanist theologian Moehler as defining, “that the difference between the Protestant and the Romanist view of the church may be briefly stated as follows: The Romanist teaches that the visible church is first in the order of time, afterward the invisible; the relation of the former to the latter being that of cause and effect. The Lutherans (Protestants), on the contrary, affirm that the visible church owes its existence to the invisible, the latter being the true basis of the former.” The student will appreciate Litton’s remark: “He adds, very justly, that this apparent unimportant difference of view is pregnant with important results.” Our line of reasoning does not require a consideration of these, and we only add that many eminent Protestant divines have rejected the view of an invisible church, as a theory introduced to combat the Romanist objection of a succession, etc. Thus e.g. we instance Rothe (Beginnings of the Ch. Church and its Constitution, p. 109), who expressly declares that the church is alone visible, and tracing the rise of the idea of “the invisible church,” pronounces it “a mere hypothesis, a pure fiction, a notion involving a contradiction,” and presents (Introd.) a series of reasons why it should be rejected. It is very sad to find in many, otherwise excellent, writers the two ideas combined and appropriated to the Kingdom of God, for the invisible Kingdom offers an easy application of passages which cannot be made to fit a visible Kingdom, although both do violence to covenant and prophecy. Of course, such writers as Bunsen (comp. Art. Bunsen’s Church of the Future, in North Brit. Review, Nov., 1847), in their ideal of a national church, are, as a logical sequence, hostile to an invisible church (comp. Litton’s Church of Christ, in its Idea, Attributes, and Ministry).

Obs. 2. To illustrate how men write on this point, we select several examples, which, whilst confirming our previous Proposition, also affirm the contrary to our present one. Van Oosterzee (Theol. of N. T., Sec. 41), explicitly says: “The church or congregation of the Lord is by no means the same as the Kingdom of God and of Christ. This latter is a perfectly spiritual society whose ideal will be fully realized in the future; the former is the union of those who are already here on earth, through faith and love, members of the Kingdom.” Again, Dr. Luthardt, (Apol. Lec.—see Quarterly Review, Jan., 1873) makes “the church now in the form of a servant over against the Romish view, which makes the church in ‘her outward reality the Kingdom of God,’ whilst in the Reformed view ‘the eternal Kingdom of God has its home in that inner nature of the church; this temporal form of the church, on the contrary, is only the external covering in which the treasure of the Kingdom is deposited.’ These are very mystical conceptions of the Kingdom, and they originate from an effort to observe a consistency which the mixed condition of the church does not outwardly allow. Thinking that from the captions attached to the parables, the phrase ‘the Kingdom of God within you,’ etc., that a Kingdom must in some way be found, this one that cannot be seen, being spiritual, beyond our perception, is thus presented for our acceptance. The simple truth is, that it is even more inconsistent than the opinion entertained that the visible church is the Kingdom, for the latter, at least, corresponds with the visibility and external manifestation insisted on by the covenant and prophets. But its inconsistency is still more apparent by its being flatly contradicted by—adopting their mode of interpretation—the parables, upon which they rely. Thus, e.g. if the church is the Kingdom of heaven in some form, then the parable of the Virgins includes the whole ten, not merely the five wise (i.e. spiritual), but the five foolish (i.e. not spiritual). So also the parable of the tares and wheat, on the same principle, being prefaced by "the Kingdom of heaven," includes in the same church the tares (i.e. those not possessed of "the inner nature") and the wheat (i. e. those having "the inner nature"). Admit the church as the Kingdom, and there is no escape from this dilemma, provided the parables are (on their own theory) consistently applied (comp. Prop. 108). This application of the Kingdom to an invisible church to avoid one difficulty is too one-sided; and it only plunges them into a still greater one. Such a refined view of the Kingdom ignores and disbelieves the oath that God made to David, that in and through his Son a Kingdom, even David's then visible and outward, should be set up, that all men would recognize and obey, owing to its distinguished external exertion and manifestation of power. It is strange and sad, that some of the most eminent and talented men of the church, blinded by a subtle theory, cannot and will not see how antagonistic such a theory is to God's faithful promises. No wonder that we are so carefully cautioned to beware of mere human wisdom.

We again refer to some eminent Pre-Millenarians, who hold, evidently, to some kind of a Kingdom connected with this invisible theory, for they designate a present existing Kingdom as "the Kingdom in mystery." Unable to comprehend exactly their meaning, I will quote the definition given to this "Kingdom in mystery" by Rev. Dr. Brookes, in The Truth, vol. 4, No. 3, p. 101: "It is not equivalent to the Church, but it indicates the peculiar sphere here below in which the ascended Christ is carrying on His work, or, in other words, it refers to what is called Christendom." This is entirely too vague and indefinite to meet with acceptance, and really is not needed in the interpretation and application of Scripture. Such a view, however, is not in conflict with Pre-Millenarianism, because the covenanted and predicted Messianic Kingdom is not placed in this dispensation, but in the one following the Sec. Advent; but we object to it, on the ground that it is not required by the Word, and that it only burdens the doctrine with a Kingdom-theory which tends to confuse the student and mars the simplicity of inspired statements. Others introduce a confusion of ideas, evincing an imperfect knowledge of the covenanted Kingdom, as e.g. Swormstedt (The End of the World Near, p. 114) makes "Christ's Kingdom represented in the world by the visible church;" then he has "the gospel net or invisible Kingdom" drawn up to heaven, and when this earth is purified, "then this invisible Kingdom is to be let down again in the midst of this new Eden," and with Christ becomes "a visible and temporal power." Such representations require no reply. Some Pre-Millenarians mistake the Divine Sovereignty (comp. Props. 79 and 80) for this present Kingdom. Even Lange (Bremen Lectures, sec. 8) falls into this error, and, therefore, speaks (p. 221) of "the still conceded Kingdom of God, which is finally to be openly manifested at the Sec. Advent. Faussat (Com. Rev. 20 : 6) more guardedly says: "As the church began at Christ's ascension, so the Kingdom shall begin at His Sec. Advent. Außerlen in his Biblical Doctrine of the Kingdom of God (a brief epitome is given by Nast in his Com. on Matt. 6 : 10) maintains our doctrinal position, but in connection has the church also a Kingdom, for in The Prophet Daniel (p. 372) he correctly portrays the future Kingdom as not merely internal but also external, outward, "Israelitish, but by no means carnal, a Kingdom of glory, precisely as the prophets have pictured it, and whom Jesus contradicts in no part," etc., but confuses the whole subject and ignores the covenanted conditions requisite for a Messianic Kingdom, when in the connection he says: "Thus the Kingdom of God has different periods. It has appeared in Christ, Matt. 12 : 28; it spreads in the world by inward, hidden spiritual processes, Matt. 13 : 33; but properly as a Kingdom in royal glory, it comes only at the Parousia, Luke 19 : 11, 12, 15, even as the Lord Himself has taught us to pray, day by day, 'Thy Kingdom come,' Matt. 6 : 10." (The passages referred to we examine in another place.) So Schmid in Bibl. Theol. of the New Test. advocates Chiliasm, but holds to a number of Kingdoms, or stages, or developments, as e.g. "As the Kingdom of God on earth, it is, in the first place, in fellowship of men. It also embraces humanity as a whole, without limitation to any particular part thereof, in contrast to the choice of the Jewish people. The Gospel will be preached to the whole world. It also comprises heaven and earth, and likewise the coming periods of the world, both before and after the judgment." The reader can see from this brief extract that the writer has no distinct conception of the one covenanted Kingdom, but mixes the Divine Sovereignty, church, person of the king, dispensations, etc., all together in a bewildering manner. So Theurer (Das Reich Gottes, p. 36-9) affirms the Millenarian doctrine as held by us, but has a present existing Kingdom which finally gives place to a higher. Thus compare Ebrard (Ch. Dogm., p. 747-9, vol. 2), Shenkel (Ch. Dogm., 2 Ab., p. 1195-6), and many others whom we esteem as able defenders of Chiliasm. One of the most consistent articles on "the Kingdom of God" is that given by a writer with initials "M. A.," in the Proph. Times, July, 1873. A proper conception of the Kingdom is also presented by "Senex" in some articles in the Luth. Observer of 1880. The same is true of others, a tendency being observable to return to the Primitive Church view. This is especially observable in the Excursus on the Kingdom by Dr. Craven, p. 93, etc., Lange's Com. Rev., a perusal of which will amply repay the reader.

Obs. 3. The doctrine that the invisible church is the Kingdom of God was unknown to the early church. Even amidst the controversies which shortly raged between antagonistic parties respecting the church, no one,—although in churches planted shortly before by inspired men who ought to have known it—broached such an idea. Neander (His. of Dogmas) acknowledges this, and says that they overlooked this distinction. Such an acknowledgment, coming from such a source, is the more valuable, since it is a favorite theory of Neander's that the invisible church is the Kingdom (although he has it finally merged into a visible Kingdom). But the manner in which he accounts for this distinction being overlooked is highly objectionable. His theory, as shown in his different works, is the progressive development, one by which the truths given by the Apostles were only "germs" to be developed by the future growth of the church. We have already protested against this germ principle when applied to doctrine, Props. 4, 9, 10.

For while we freely admit growth in numbers and even in knowledge, etc., we admit none in Biblical doctrine. The doctrinal truths enunciated by the apostles were not merely germinal truths leading to others or enlargement to another form, as from the seed to the stalk, and then to the flower and fruit. No! it was, as a distinctly announced doctrine, the whole doctrine. By this we do not mean that it would not be suggestive of thought and even, by comparison, lead to other truths, but we mean that, as far as the apostles revealed doctrine or truth, it is so complete in itself—i.e. no seed to sprout into something unlike itself—that no part of it can be safely omitted or transmuted without making it in so far imperfect. Hence to say that the invisible Kingdom doctrine is the result of a growth of knowledge in the church is to do it at the expense of the truth itself (that is to say, the Kingdom idea was imperfect), and at the risk of the reputation and veracity of the first teachers of Christianity. Neander even, in some places (as e.g. p. 5, His. of Dogmas), throws a guard around this developing process conformable to our position and hostile to some of his own deductions, viz. : "not that we obtain anything absolutely new, but we have a deeper insight of its contents." Such a deeper insight is obtainable, however, not by a growth of the doctrine itself, but by a comparison and study of the Scriptures containing it. In order that the critical reader may see how an able writer transmutes the Church-Kingdom theory, we refer again to Dr. Neander (Plant. and Train. Ch. Ch., p. 499, etc.). The Church is "the particular idea," related to the Kingdom of God "as the more general and comprehensive one." Hence : "The idea of the church is subordinate to that of the Kingdom of God, because by the latter is denoted either "the whole of a series of historical developments, or a great assemblage of coexistent spiritual creations." (The student can readily test this mystical conception—that overrides covenant and amalgamates the Divine Sovereignty—by employing it as synonymous for the Kingdom.) He then makes the Jewish Theocracy a type of this Kingdom. (We have proven, in detail, that it was no type, and the predictions of its ultimate restoration prove it be none.) Then, in opposition to some of our opponents, he says : "The Kingdom of God was not first founded by Christianity as something entirely new," but was grafted on to the old, extended to all people, transformed, and made "spiritual and internal." And the proof of such transformation is, Eph. 2 : 19, 20, Rom. 11 : 18, the unity of God's people founded on the apostles and Jesus Christ. (A unity that we most heartily adopt, but which says nothing of the Kingdom.) Then he admits that Christianity at first allied itself with the Jewish view of the restoration of the Theocracy (thus confirming our past propositions) in a glorious outward form under the Messiah, and placed this in the future "as the perfected form of the Theocracy;" "but in accordance with a change in the idea of the Kingdom of God, a different construction was put on this opposition of Christianity; it was transformed from the external to the internal, and withdrawn from the future to the present." (This change, he informs us in various places, was brought out in "the consciousness of the church"—whatever this may mean—but we have traced it directly to the Origenistic and Alexandrian influence, and is in direct conflict with the Word.) He then defines the change thus: "By faith in the Redeemer, the Kingdom of God, or of the Messiah, is already founded in the hearts of men, and thence developing outward, is destined to bring under its control all that belongs to man," so that "the Kingdom of Christ coincides with the idea of the Church existing in the hearts of men, the invisible church, the totality of the operations of Christianity on mankind." (Thus a principle actuating men is elevated into the covenanted Kingdom, lacking every covenanted characteristic. For the heart-Kingdom, see e.g. Props. 110, 84, 85; and for the unscriptural statement of its working outward until it conquers all, see e.g. Prop. 175.) But then to reconcile the passages which locate a Kingdom of Christ in the future, he admits that this Kingdom now present is only the germ of the future, and that this future Kingdom "Paul represents not as something which will spontaneously arise from the natural development of the church, but as produced, like the founding of the Kingdom of Christ, by an immediate intervention of Christ." Hence he divides the Kingdom into an inward (1 Cor. 4 : 20), an inward in connection with the future (1 Thess. 2 : 12), and a consummated Kingdom (2 Thess. 1 : 5). Mistaking the Divine Sovereignty for the Kingdom, he appeals to it as confirmatory, and also to the headship of Jesus, the victory of the church, etc. (This mixture and floundering under several Kingdoms are fully met in our Propositions.)

Obs. 4. It is remarkable to notice how, in the advocacy of the invisible church as a Kingdom, its advocates involve themselves in a sophistry inconsistent with their own development theory of a growth of this invisible Kingdom until finally at some time in the future it shall become visible as a world dominion, etc. Taking the same able writer as an exponent of this view, we find him (Life of Christ, sec. 213) explaining the phrase "the Kingdom cometh not with outward show" to mean "cannot be outwardly seen by human eyes," and in a foot-note adds: "The antithesis is, that it reveals itself invisibly, so as to be seen only by the eye of faith." Now if it is only the object of faith, something not tangible, how comes it that its nature is so changed by growth that it is converted from the unseen, excepting as viewed by faith, into the real, tangible, visible Empire here on earth? If in the region of invisibility, it ought in consistency remain therein according to its mode of propagation. No wonder that we find so many contradictions in its advocates, even so gross as the following: in sec. 52, at the consummation, Neander has this world renewed and all converted, "a real world dominion," and then again, sec. 214, at the same time it is "a corrupt world;" in one place it is invisible and in another visible, etc. The theory is not sufficiently plastic to cover every Scriptural passage and description, and hence refuge is taken in what another of its adherents calls "varied forms."

A more systematic effort is found in Rev. Miller's Mercersburg and Mod. Theol. (p. 41), in which a "new Kingdom" is advocated as arising from a partaking of the divine-human life of Jesus Christ, so that a new Organism is constituted. This mystical conception, however plausibly presented, ignores the covenanted position of the humanity of Jesus, the covenanted Kingdom, the postponement of the Kingdom, etc., and is based on the development theory (incorporating the continued development of Christ's humanity in believers), already sufficiently noticed. Like all other theories of the kind, it largely rejects the grammatical sense, and is addicted to spiritualizing. Its positions are amply met in various Propositions.

Obs. 5. This adhesion to an invisible Kingdom is based on the supposed ground, that according to some passages we are taught that Christ will not have an earthly Kingdom. These passages we will examine hereafter, and now only allude to the fact, that when these same writers come to describe the Millennial era of the church, this ground of objection no longer exists, and they have to all intents and purposes an earthly Kingdom, i.e. a Kingdom visible and extending over all the earth. The Kingdom then, once held to be "hidden" or "concealed" in the church, "to be in but not of the church," is manifested openly to all the world, holding all under its direct influence and dominion. Surely the advocates of such a system should not object to our doctrine, which observes a consistency in the manifestation of the Kingdom by fully explaining how and when this occurs, without resorting to an unexplained and mystical growth, which, in the very nature of the case, cannot produce the transformation claimed. If the Kingdom is unseen and at the same time unchangeable as claimed; if it is as a writer (Proph. Times, vol. 2, p. 97) declares, "the Kingdom of God is simply where God reigns—this Kingdom is within—it is spiritual," and ever remains, as contended for, the same, we ask, How can it then become the seen, the outward Kingdom of the Prophets? Here among these writers we find the most hopeless floundering, and every reader can for himself see the utter antagonism of their spiritual theories by comparing their utterances on the texts "my Kingdom is not of this world" (John 18 : 36), "the Kingdom of God is within you" (Luke 17 : 21), with those derived from Dan. 2 : 34, 35, 44, 45; Dan. 7 : 14, 27, and Rev. 11 : 15. In the former we have an invisible Kingdom in the church, and in the latter the same church becomes a visible Kingdom. It is scarcely necessary to refer to even a greater diversity existing among such writers : e.g. extending this covenanted Kingdom from the heart of the believer to an extent commensurate with the universe itself, etc.

Obs. 6. To indicate the vagueness of argument employed in this direction, reference is made to a leading and excellent writer. Olshausen (Com., vol. 1, p. 264), to prove the existence of a spiritual Kingdom in opposition to the Jewish idea of the Kingdom, says : "As the carnal man makes his God for himself, so he makes the Kingdom of God for himself. The spiritual man has a spiritual God and a spiritual Kingdom of God." This, however, proves too much, for on the same principle we can prove that the Saviour is wholly spiritual and is not the Son of Man; we can deny the bodily resurrection, the renovation of the earth, or anything that is outward or external. Just such unfounded premises lay the foundation for an immense amount of deduced reasoning on this subject.

Reuss (His. Ch. Theol., p. 150), in order to prove the spirituality or invisibility of the Kingdom, quotes John 18 : 36, Matt. 22 : 21, Luke 12 : 13, and the temptation of Christ. Such is the slender foundation upon which to rest so important a doctrine. Literally, multitudes follow such guidance, excepting those who have it already outwardly manifested, or such who deny any future visible revelation (comp. for such proof, Props. 108, 109, and 110).

Obs. 7. It is certainly curious to notice how even unbelievers avail themselves of this invisible Kingdom theory. Thus e.g. Renan, with great complacency, and perhaps lurking sarcasm, claims that if the church repels him, and others of like faith, "let us console ourselves by reflecting on that invisible church, which includes excommunicated saints and the noblest souls of every age."

Perhaps the earliest advocates who carried the invisible church or Kingdom theory to an extreme were the Petrobrusians (Kurtz, Ch. His., vol. 1, p. 456), who rejected an outward or visible church, and only received one as in the hearts of believers. Some recent sects are largely reproducing the same features.

PROPOSITION 102. Neither the visible nor the invisible church is the covenanted Kingdom.

This has been shown by preceding Propositions, as e. g. Props. 75, 90, 91, 93, 68, 94, 96, 98-100.

Obs. 1. Some make the visible church the Kingdom, others the invisible; some unite both in the same Kingdom, and others that both are the same Kingdom, but in two different, a higher and a lower, aspects. Having shown that neither one nor the other is the predicted Kingdom, it follows, from the reasons given, that a combination of both cannot transform them into such a Kingdom.

Obs. 2. It is not surprising that the Papacy should so tenaciously hold to the doctrine that the church is the Kingdom, since everything so distinctively Popish, as Bellarmine (quoted by Bowers, Pref. to His. of Popes) assures us, depends upon it. For out of it proceeds the Pope's supremacy, the vicegerent rule, the entire papal governmental machinery. It is the foundation upon which the superstructural pretensions are built. If this is removed, the whole falls. It is also consistent for those who hold to what the Germans call Cassero-papismus, or for those who advocate hierarchical tendencies in any form, to adhere to such a doctrine. But it is not necessary for pure Protestantism, as is evinced in the history of the early church, for which see the candid confession of Neander under Props. 49 and 101. Our view admits of nearly all that is said by a host of esteemed writers concerning the church, excepting that of its being already constituted a Kingdom. The latter theory is not only of no practical use in the working of the church, but is really dangerous in its tendencies, as is seen from the use made of it by various parties. Thus, e.g. on the one hand, by those just alluded to; and on the other by Free Religionists, Humanitarians, etc., who build the most extensive of Kingdoms on the foundations laid by the orthodox, expressing the same in the most eloquent terms. Here and there, indeed, we find a writer who holds to the early church doctrine of the church, that it is no Kingdom, and occasionally attention is called to it in church papers (as e.g. Luth. Observer, April 25th, 1873), but thus far with so little logical connection and argument that it has scarcely aroused attention. Then we also find many writers (Millenarians), who, conceding that the church is a Kingdom in some way, yet distinctly announce that it is not the covenanted and predicted Kingdom of Jesus, which they assert is still in the future. Then, again, we have another class (as e.g. Prof. Seelye, Bib. Sacra, Ap., 1866, pp. 228-234), which, whilst indorsing the prevailing view of the church being the predicted Kingdom, confesses that the doctrine of the church—i.e. what the church really is and its relations—is not yet understood, having hitherto been considered only as involved in other doctrines and not as a promiment theme standing alone—vital, it is true, but yet imperfectly comprehended, and which they regard as the great question of our time, etc.

Such confessions indicate that the prevailing doctrine is far from being satisfactory, and accords with one made to the author by a professor in one of our colleges, who acknowledged that he preached on the subject until he himself felt that his deductions, drawn from the general view, were inconsistent. Indeed, is it not time to discard a doctrine which causes some of the ablest defenders of Christianity to fall into palpable contradictions? Thus e.g. Dr. McCosh (Christ and Positiv., p. 245) makes the Kingdom "a mixed Kingdom," admitting both good and bad, and on the same page he has it, "the reign of God in men's hearts," which can only apply to the good. In one place he asserts for Christ's language to Nicodemus that only those who have realized "the new birth" are in the Kingdom of God, and then in another place he deduces from the parables of tares and wheat, and drag net, that "the tares" and "bad fish," who, of course, have not experienced such a birth, are also in the Kingdom of heaven. The only way to rid themselves of such contradictions is to erect several Kingdoms, one within the other, or to establish several existing phases of the same Kingdom, but such procedures do not logically help the matter, seeing that they are in opposition to covenant and prophecy. Again, an excellent writer who attempts to avoid Dr. McCosh's "mixed Kingdom," gives us the following arrangement. Van Oosterzee (Theol. of New Test., p. 70) says: "Even with the idea of the Christian Church, that of the Kingdom of God must not be confounded. The church is only the inadequate outward form of the Kingdom of God—the Kingdom of God itself is a spiritual communion." In a foot-note he adds: "the Kingdom of God, on the other hand, until its glorious manifestation includes the outward church, which is in but not necessarily of it, comp. Matt. 13 : 41." Here we have: it is, and it is not; it is in, but not of it; it includes it, and it does not include it as part of it, etc. Alas for the Kingdom, if such nice mystical distinctions are needed to ascertain what the Kingdom of God is as proclaimed by covenant and prophet. Why not discard a theory which produces from the same fountain both sweet and bitter waters, from the same tree sweet and sour fruit?

Obs. 3. The very idea of the Christian Church, as given by these same writers, forbids the notion of a Kingdom, viz.: that "it is a religious, moral institution," or "a society of exclusively religious interest, independent of and distinct from political relations and duties;" or as some have it, the same "disconnected from the state or civil compact;" or "an organization of believers for religious purposes, which does not interfere with their civil and other rights;" or even Schlegel's opinion, that it is "a free, peculiar, independent corporation." Such, and many other definitions of like spirit, might be adopted without bringing in the idea of a Kingdom. They do more, they prevent its adoption. Let the reader turn back to our argument, by which, under the Theocracy and the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, God Himself gives us His idea of what constitutes the Kingdom of God, and we find this distinctive element of a Kingdom, lacking in the Christian Church, and in these definitions of the same. In the Theocracy, which gave outward form and prominence to the Kingdom, the religious and political commonwealth, the church and the state were, by Divine constitution, identical, one. A separation was never made which allowed a distinction between citizen and worshipper. It was this feature which gave force and validity to the idea of a Kingdom, and just so soon as the separation was effected by the overthrow of the Jewish state, the distinctive idea of a Kingdom then existing, also, as the nature of the case demanded in consistency, vanished. This arrangement, this fundamental union we have already proven was God's own expressed definition of a Kingdom, and when this was lacking all the holy men deplored the overthrow of the Kingdom and predicted its restoration. This feature, without which the Kingdom is impracticable as God has covenanted, was tendered to the Jews at the Advent of Jesus, conditional on repentance. It was rejected. The Christian Church followed, but this church also lacks the Theocratic peculiarity which exalts to the position of the Kingdom of God. The question is, Will it always be lacking? Will God's efforts at restoration always prove a failure? Is God's Kingdom, which requires, as essential to its very existence, the union of church and state, never to be re-established? Multitudes assert this, and cling to an organization wanting God's requisite order to constitute it His Kingdom, and pronounce it against precedent, covenant, and promise, the Kingdom. God's promises will be verified in their appointed time; present failure does not imply continued; the Divine Purpose, delayed by depravity, is even merciful in this period of detention, manifesting grace toward us Gentiles. When the time of "the appearing and Kingdom" comes, then will the appointed Son of Man, the covenanted David's Son, restore that Theocratic feature which elevates to the position and dignity of the Kingdom of God, a Kingdom in which, as formerly, worshipper and citizen, church and state, are one. Since, then, no such union as precedent makes necessary to God's idea of the Kingdom, called and appropriated as His, is to be found in those definitions, or in the church itself as organized by the Apostles, we ask, Is it proper to give it this designation?

Can it be possible that David's Son has a real Kingdom here on earth, when David's throne and Kingdom are overthrown? When Jerusalem is downtrodden? When Jesus declared (Matt. 23 : 39, Luke 13 : 34) that He would be absent from it, leaving it desolate, until a certain return? Alas! men by ignoring the express language of the covenant, and by an unwarranted substitution, set up another as the Messianic Kingdom, overlooking the simple fact that no Kingdom (so called) can possibly be acknowledged unless it restores (as e.g. Isa. 1 : 26, 27, etc.) the identical Theocracy withdrawn. It is self-evident—as we have shown in detail—that the twelve and the seventy, who were preachers of the Kingdom, had not the remotest idea of such extraordinary transmutations as have appeared engrafted, by human reason, on the doctrine of the Kingdom.

Obs. 4. If the church is the Kingdom of God, then the student, if candid, and allowing the prophecies their plain grammatical sense, must see that the condition of the one is not like the predicted condition of the other. Hence the result follows, as in Schleiermacher, Arnold (see Fairbairn On Proph., p. 96), and others, that the prophecies must be regarded in another light than that of a predictive one. Then the prophecies as given remain unrealized, and they must be received only as the longings of humanity, the expressed desires of man respecting the destinies of the world. An important and fundamental element of prophecy is frittered away, until an unreliable human one alone remains. The God-derived power is left out, and a man-derived substituted. Why this result in the minds of so many scholars? Simply because of the attempt to fit, by the wholesale, prophecy concerning the Kingdom into something which it is not designed to embrace; these men, finding no just and reliable fulfilment, are driven to the opposite extreme so injurious to the Word itself.

If the prophecies are taken in their plain connection and meaning (and not simply a verse here and a verse there), it is simply impossible to predicate a fulfilment in the church. Thus e.g. take Daniel's four monarchies (Props. 104, 121, 160), and we find that the church existed at the side of them without being recognized as a Kingdom, that the church was oppressed by them until the Kingdom came, and that the Kingdom was given after them in a regular succession, at which time and afterward the dominion of the saints is represented as supreme, etc. This feature will be urged under several Propositions.

Obs. 5. The question back of that of the Kingdom itself, which must be decided, is that referring to the literal, grammatical sense of the Word, Prop. 4. If it is assumed that a higher and more spiritual meaning is attached to the recognized grammatical one, then the Kingdom is at the pleasure of the interpreter; if the grammatical sense is alone firmly retained, then it is impossible to construct out of the church the predicted Kingdom. Awarding to the church her just position and mission, we are forced logically to accept of the covenanted Kingdom in the form delineated by covenant and prophecy.

This objection to the plain grammatical sense as held by the early church is common ground for the infidel and the spiritualizing believer. Renan employs it as a reason to set aside the literal notion of a Kingdom, and thus to show that the first teachers were mistaken (in this way attacking their credibility and inspiration); Neander argues from it that they only presented "the husk," which contained "the kernel" that uninspired men afterward developed. The author of Eccs Homo on the one side, and the writer of Eccs Deus on the other, are both agreed to relinquish the idea of a Kingdom as found in the plain, unvarnished grammatical sense of covenant and prophecy. Thus, unbeliever and believer stand shoulder to shoulder, mutually supporting each other, in attacking the Kingdom as originally preached and believed. Having assumed that some ideal, or the Church, is intended, they either assume that the language itself is a mistake, or that in and under it is concealed a conception which, in some way, must fit the estimate they have formed. The more ultra, indeed, seeing the Church, and believing it to be the only result that shall ever be witnessed in confirmation of covenant and prophecy, declare that Christ and the apostles misapprehended its nature, and hence reject both the Church and the Kingdom. One eminent writer in his apologetics and eagerness to vindicate the Church as a Kingdom, even ventures to the unwarranted length to assert that if the Kingdom had been established as preached by John the Baptist and the disciples (Acts 1 : 6), it would have been "a sinful measure." What lack of knowledge this evinces of God's oath-bound Davidic covenant and the precious, ennobling Theocratic ordering (comp. e.g. Props. 81, 82, 200, 203). And what sinfulness to sneer at and ridicule a Kingdom postponed to the Second Advent, when such is God's own arrangement. Ignorance can alone tender an apology for such conduct.

Obs. 6. Take any history of dogmas, and if impartial, it will enable us readily to trace in the doctrine of the church that the present mixed interpretation and confounding of it with the Kingdom of God is the growth of centuries. In the first and second centuries the church was simply a community of believers, who, as is evidenced by the action of the Apostles in reference to the Jewish and Gentile Christians, were united by a common faith in Christ, without basing unity in a complete outward uniformity. Fellowship with Christ in the use of the ordinances appointed, and in obedience to the Word, was the test of union, and no one arrogated to himself precedence in the way of authority. The church was nowhere called the Kingdom; for the church, instead of admitting itself to be the Kingdom, was looking for the speedy coming of the Kingdom. Admit that it was, as one remarks, "a sensuous interpretation," it is sufficient for our purpose to receive the admission that the Apostolic Fathers had no other than this "sensuous" conception of the church. It may indicate weakness, but we confess that "a sensuous interpretation" of so important a doctrine, having the advantage of nearness to apostolic times, and remaining for so long uncontradicted, is far more credible than the later refined and spiritualized ones, because of its accord with Holy Writ.

Carefully tracing the doctrine, we soon see the entering wedge which mars the simplicity of the early church view. Dr. Neander has well and candidly pointed this out, in his various writings, as taking place in the history of the Gnostics. The notion, founded on that of a Kingdom, of an outward unity gradually obtained the possession of men's minds and resolved itself in endeavors to manifest the idea by definite form in the visible Church. Antagonism to Millenarianism also contributed to the entertainment of such views. It exhibited itself in claims of authority in sacred things, in planting the germs and fostering the growth of a hierarchy, until finally the suggested and fostered ideal presented itself, practically exemplified in the Papacy. Here was indeed a Kingdom, with subjects, laws, rulers, and a central power, visible, and exerting extensive dominions. It was the predicted Kingdom of heaven! It would surpass our limits to show how the unguarded language of really sincere and good men were made subservient to this development, or to indicate how during this growth protests here and there were pronounced against this theory and its resultant effects. For centuries it remained the controlling and enforced view; taught by a Church in which both laity and clergy were compelled to follow its teaching with unquestioning obedience. It is not surprising that the meaning of the Kingdom should be almost eradicated, when for ages the Bible was scarcely read, and was only interpreted by persons wedded and subservient to the Hierarchy itself. To evince how imbedded this notion, that the Church was the Kingdom, had become, it is only necessary to refer to Chancellor Gerson. In the fifteenth century, when the reaction took place in the University of Paris respecting the relation of the Papacy to church and state, Chancellor Gerson, the leader in the controversy, hampered by the prominently retained idea that the Church was the Kingdom of God, and that as such it needed an outward expression of unity and power, conceded "the whole Hierarchical Order as necessary for the organism of the Church." Conceding the premise from whence the conclusions naturally flowed, retaining the foundation upon which the system is built, his opposition was consequently very one-sided and lacked in radical force.

Coming to the Reformation, two antagonistic Churches are arrayed the one against the other. The Roman Catholic vested all authority in the Church simply because it was, per se, the Kingdom of God, as tangible, Bellarmine informs us, as the Republic of Venice. The Reformation, unable altogether to rid itself of the insidious and life-interwoven notion of the Church-Kingdom, endeavors to check the hierarchical Church position by advocating the authority of the Word of God, the universal priesthood of believers, etc., and by turning to the early Church view respecting the Church. The latter was in a great measure attained; the fundamental maxim was laid down that the Church is a community of believers in Christ, and embraces all such; the utterances were almost entirely scriptural, and were only marred in the efforts to conciliate the Roman Catholics, or to favor civil government. To some extent there was a departure from the primitive simplicity, which need not be wondered at, considering the age and the influences surrounding the Reformers. Indeed, at times, as Neander, Mosheim, and recently Fisher, in his His. of the Reformation, show, Luther advocated precisely the government adopted and practised by the early churches, but regarded it, in view of the condition and training of the Germans, impracticable in his time. It would be interesting to note how on various occasions the entire truth seemed on the point of enunciation. We have only place for the following exhibit of doctrine in remarkable correspondence with the early one. In the Augsburg Confession (Art. 7) "the Church is the congregation of the saints, in which the gospel is correctly taught and the sacraments are properly administered." Provision is made against the Catholic external unity by asserting that "for the true unity of the Church nothing more is required than agreement concerning the doctrines of the gospel and the administration of the sacraments." But lest this Article be misconstrued to mean that all in the Church are saints, and thus pave the way for the shafts of the enemy, Art. 8 is added: "Although the Church is properly a congregation of believers, yet in the present life, many hypocrites and wicked men are mingled with them." The Reformers advocated an outward Church, embracing good and bad, although admitting also, that to the pious alone, in view of the demarkation in the future life, the name properly belonged. So that while, as Dr. Knapp and others state, Luther first employed the term "invisible" in his reply to the Roman Catholic party in answer to the question, "Where, then, was the true Church before him," yet Neander (His. of Dogmas, p. 687) shows that "the idea of the invisible Church was for a time held to be doubtful" by both Melancthon and Luther. "Melancthon himself says: 'These passages treat not of a Platonic idea, but of a visible Church.'" "And Luther says: 'They say the Spirit must do it. The merciful God preserve us from that Christian Church in which there are only saints.'" From these and other expressions, and from the Confession itself, it seems that in all probability they used the term invisible to denote true believers in a sense very different from the later engrafted ideas. They endeavored to avoid, on the one hand, the Donatist idea that the Church ceased to exist when unworthy members were attached to it, and, on the other, that it can exist exclusively of wicked, unregenerated men. Hence Neander (p. 685, vol. 2) remarks: "The distinction was therefore made between the proper and improper Church." This, in response to attacks of Romish theologians, was taken up and enlarged by their successors, until an inner and outward Church, the inner exclusively confined to the good, was advocated, the inner especially forming "the Kingdom of Christ," "a spiritual Kingdom," also in a manner outwardly manifested. Zwingli (Neander, His. of Dogmas, p. 686, vol. 2) has two churches, one of all who profess Christ, embracing good and evil; the other, in the true sense, composed of all believers. Calvin also (Insti., B. 4) has the external composed of professors; the internal or true Church of the elect of God. The same division characterizes nearly all Reformers and divines; and with it nearly all included the Kingdom of Christ, either related to the one or to the other, or to both; and in this last respect departing from the original simplicity of the doctrinal position of the Church. Among these, however, as we have already stated, there were many who professed the belief that the present Kingdom appertaining to the Church was only a prelude to a future and still more magnificent manifestation of the Kingdom, such as the prophets describe, and which was in a higher and more significant sense the promised Kingdom. The history of the doctrine, regarded in its connection with apostolic times, has nothing in it of sufficient weight to deteriorate our view; rather the indications of departure from the early one, the manner in which it was produced, the fruit that it bore, the varied definitions it gave rise to, etc., are decidedly favorable to our line of argument. The fact is, that in view of the predicted blindness and lack of faith in Christ's coming and Kingdom, characteristic of the world and the Church before the Sec. Advent, the prevailing view so deeply entrenched in the Church—the departure from the Primitive belief so widely extended—is open to the gravest suspicion (comp. Prop. 174). The Augustinian view of the Church is the one largely adopted, and the influence of The City of God is widely felt. Comparatively few theologians but feel the preponderating tendency, and give way to it. This is the position of the multitude—just as the Word predicts.

PROPOSITION 103. This Kingdom is not a Kingdom in the third heaven.

Some writers, especially in answering Millenarians, inform us that the Kingdom of Christ, of God, or of heaven, is now in heaven, where the redeemed now dwell, and that it will continue to remain there after the resurrection. Aside from its direct conflict with covenant and promise, it is easily rebutted by Dan. 2 and 7, Rev. 14, etc., which describe the Kingdom as one existing here on earth over the whole world.

Obs. 1. Whatever the authority and power of Christ in the third heaven in His Divine and human natures (Props. 80, 79, 83, etc.), the same does not meet the conditions either of prophecy (Prop. 35, etc.), or, especially, of covenant, Prop. 49.

Simply to illustrate the conflicting views, we give Gregory (Four Gospels), who, hampered by a preconceived notion, finds a difficulty to define the Kingdom; for on p. 126 he makes it, God reigning in the hearts of men; on p. 146, influenced by the expression "Kingdom of heaven," he makes it a Kingdom in heaven above; and on the following page he makes the Church a manifestation of the Kingdom, etc. Many writers have two co-existing Kingdoms, one on earth and the other in heaven, and some call the one "the militant Kingdom," and the other "the triumphant Kingdom." Any absurdity, under the specious language of pious phraseology, is eagerly received, and, without examination, reiterated. To indicate how men flatly contradict themselves when leaving the scriptural basis of the early Church, we give another illustration from Lange's Com. Acts 14 : 22. In the doctrinal part (1) Lechler declares that "the Kingdom of God," here mentioned, is "something that lies beyond the bounds of this world," etc. He affirms that believers, "as long as they are passing through tribulations or afflictions, have not yet entered into the Kingdom of God," and concludes: "'The Church' and 'The Kingdom of God' are not equivalent terms: the former is the court; the latter, the sanctuary, or rather the holiest of all (Heb. 9 : 2, 3)." Now let the reader turn e.g. in the same Com. to Acts 3 : 19-21, Doctrinal (6), and here on earth after the Sec. Advent a complete restoration to blessedness, etc., is presented in accord with our views (comp. Prop. 144, where the language is quoted).

Obs. 2. The Kingdom is not, as held by some, e.g. Dr. Lange and others, the church in heaven before the Second Advent in a triumphant state called "the Kingdom of glory." This theory is derived from mistaking the Divine Sovereignty for the specialty promised Kingdom to the Son of man, and probably from a desire to cover up what defects may exist in several lower grades or phases of Kingdoms simultaneously in operation. But this is exceedingly unscriptural; and the theory can be traced directly to the Origenistic interpretation. It is utterly unreliable, from the simple fact, already abundantly proven, that this Messianic Kingdom is based exclusively on the covenant and the prophecies elucidative of the covenant, and neither of these promise a Kingdom in the third heaven, or any other part of the universe; but explicitly predict its establishment

Here on the earth, with a world-wide dominion, etc. If believers are to be heirs with Abraham, according to promise, then to behold our inheritance with faith it becomes us to confine ourselves to these promises. If so, then it is impossible to find any one given to Abraham that has not a direct reference to this earth, or to his seed here on earth. Not one refers to the third heaven, or to any place outside of the earth itself. What we are to understand by the words "heaven," "heavenly," etc., will be duly considered under Prop. 107, and what relationship the earth under Messiah's rule will sustain to the third heaven has already been intimated and will again receive consideration. Having also shown that the saints have not yet received the promises, not yet inherited, etc. (Prop. 85, 90, 91, etc.), it follows, that they have not received the Kingdom. This Romish view, which has a leaning toward Paganism, is indeed popular and deeply rooted, so that the poet writes, and many devoutly sing :

"With thee we'll reign, with thee we'll rise,
And kingdoms gain beyond the skies ;"

but it is in direct antagonism to the Kingdom promised to David's Son and to His brethren.

Lindsay's Art. Millennium in Encyclop. Brit., by exalting and pressing the intermediate state beyond its scriptural representation, forms an objection against us. Thus : saints are happy in heaven ; it is inconsistent to bring them to this earth from a higher to a lower stage of enjoyment. But this is begging the question, for (1) it takes for granted what remains unproven, viz. : a present inheriting of the Kingdom and forfeited blessings ; and (2) that our doctrine brings the saints from a higher to a lower stage, seeing that we expressly teach the contrary. Lindsay then adds something, which we have seen advocated by no Millenarian author, viz. : that the saints "then return to heaven to permit their enemies for a season to reign in their stead." He may have found some crude writer to express this view, but it is opposed to the universally expressed views of ancient and modern Millenarians, and cannot, therefore, without injustice, be charged to us.

Obs. 3. Another theory concerning this Kingdom being in the third heaven during the thousand years or Millennial age, will be noticed under a following Proposition.

"The Perfectionists" (Nordhoff's Com. Societies, p. 268) also say that at the destruction of Jerusalem, A. D. 70, "the final Kingdom of God then began in the heavens ; that the manifestation of that Kingdom in the visible world is now approaching ; that its approach is ushering in the second and final resurrection and judgment ; that a Church on earth is now rising to meet the approaching Kingdom in the heavens, and to become its duplicate and representative," etc. This theory ignores the covenant, etc., and substitutes the Divine Sovereignty for the Davidic throne and Kingdom, spiritualizing the Theocratic idea.

Obs. 4. The early church had no idea that this Kingdom was received at or after death (see Prop. 98, 136). Whatever the view concerning the intermediate state, whatever the condition allotted to the pious, one thing is certainly affirmed, that they looked for the Kingdom, the inheriting, crowning at the Second Advent of Christ and not at death. The departed were also represented as waiting for the Kingdom, and the whole period during which the bodies of the saints were not restored was characterized as one of expectation, waiting for redemption, Rom. 8 : 23. The non-crowning of Paul, during the intermediate period, the reception of the Kingdom at the time of "regeneration" or "restitution," etc., was decisive.

This most conclusively rebuts the amazing declaration of Archb. Whately (Corruptions of Christianity, p. 131), when he actually makes, after the ascension of Jesus, the apostles to "establish the Kingdom of God, over which He had placed them, saying: 'I appoint unto you a Kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me,'" and this in fulfilment of "the Kingdom of heaven is at hand." Surprising that he did not notice the period of fulfilment at the restitution of all things, the disclaimer that Paul made of now reigning, the period of crowning, inheriting, etc., at the Sec. Advent.

PROPOSITION 104. The Christian Church is not denoted by the predicted Kingdom of the Prophets.

Having already shown what the Kingdom is according to the covenants, it may be well to briefly direct attention to the prophets. In the nature of the case, both (i. e. covenanted and prophetic) announcements coming from the same source, they must correspond, or else unity, and with it credibility, is destroyed. The Proposition is amply sustained, as the observations following indicate, and also the various corroborating proofs taken from the Prophets under a large number of Propositions (comp. e. g. Props. 121, 132, 133, and 159).

Obs. 1. Taking the establishment of the Kingdom for granted, and overlooking the postponement, has led to a wholesale appropriation by the church of predictions relating exclusively to the Kingdom still future. We select of those thus applied, Dan. 2 : 31-45 ; Dan. 7 : 1-28 ; Isa. 25 : 6-9 ; Isa. 2 : 1-5 ; comp. with Micah 4 : 1-8, and then one or two that, while also partially arrogated, our opponents would rather not quote very liberally, viz. : Zech. 14 : 1-21 ; Isa. 63 : 1-6.

We remind the reader of one fact as fully presented in past Propositions, and demonstrated both historically and scripturally, viz. : That the view we take of the prophecies pertaining to the Kingdom accords in every respect with those entertained by the Church in the first centuries. It is passing strange, to say the least, that the early believers, east and west, north and south, should, under the leadership of men who organized and perpetuated the Church, place, as we do, the fulfilment of those predictions at the Sec. Advent of Jesus, and not, as many now do, at the founding of the Ch. Church. These prophecies, too, are so prominent, so magnificent in proportions, such landmarks in the Divine Redemptive plan, that they must have largely occupied the attention of the apostolic and succeeding age.

Obs. 2. Taking Dan. 2 : 31-45 and 7 : 1-28 as descriptive of the same Kingdom (so admitted by all our opposers, as e. g. Barnes, Brown, Stuart, etc.), we save space by considering them together, seeing that the one is an amplification of the other. For the same reason we avoid a description of the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman Empires, denoted by the image and the beasts, for this has been done by many able writers, as e. g. Mede, Bh. Newton, Sir Isaac Newton, Faber, etc., and recently by Auberlen, Delitzsch, etc.; and the same is fully accepted by leading writers opposed to our doctrine, as e. g. Barnes Com., Pres. Edwards His. Redempt., Brown Ch. Sec. Coming, etc. The student will find by a fair comparison of these Scriptures with each other, and then with history, that no other position in reference to them can be maintained. Hence the almost general agreement existing between Millenarians and Anti-Millenarians thus far concerning them. But as soon as we come to the Kingdom set up by God and given to the Son of Man, the Church-Kingdom theory applies the same to the Christian Church, affirming, as e.g. Barnes, that it was set up at the First Advent or day of Pentecost, or as e.g. Bush, at a supposed Second Coming of Christ at the destruction of Jerusalem, or, as others, at some intermediate period, at the birth, baptism, death, resurrection, or ascension of Christ. At least, whether the establishment be as notable for its conspicuity as the prophecy intimates or not, the Kingdom is represented to be equivalent to the Christian Church. Now in opposition to this view, the following reasons, drawn from the predictions, appear conclusive.<sup>1</sup>

1. The Kingdom is set up "in the days of these kings." It is supposed that this means in the days or time when one of these empires exists, and the inference is drawn that the church, being established under the fourth Kingdom, it is certainly the undivided Empire that is meant. But against such an inference we allege (a) the simple fact that the phrase "these kings," following the description of the divided form of the Roman Empire, most naturally refers to the kings or kingdoms existing in such a divided state, and which fact is corroborated by other prophecies; that this Kingdom is set up after the ten horns (Dan. 7; Rev. 18:12-17, comp. with Rev. 19:11-21, etc.), or ten kingdoms are in existence. The expression in Dan. 2 thus accurately corresponds with other predictions, and forbids our receiving the Christian Church as denoted, because it was established long before the Roman Empire was thus divided. (b) One Kingdom follows the next chronologically, and we are not at liberty to make a change to the contrary unless expressly specified. Accepting of this, "these kings" refer to the later ones, those in the divided form, or else we have the fourth and fifth Kingdoms contemporaneous.<sup>2</sup>

2. The smiting, whatever it may mean, does not occur in the undivided form of the Roman Empire, and yet the smiting is contemporaneous with the establishment of the Kingdom. In Dan. 2:34 it is explicitly stated that "the stone" "smote the image upon the feet." Therefore not only the legs (Eastern and Western divisions), but the feet and toes appear before the smiting process. This is significant of the period, and the reference cannot be made to the church, because that appeared long before the division into legs and feet. The church came during the consolidated period of the Empire, and therefore it is not intended, seeing that the entire image is presented before the stone enters upon its work of demolition.<sup>3</sup>

3. Taking for granted their own theory respecting Dan. 7, they have the Son of man receiving this Kingdom, as the prophecy plainly contradicts, before the ten horns have arisen. The church was for several centuries in existence, according to their own interpretation, before they arose. Hence, the church cannot be meant by the Kingdom, for the prophecy locates the appearance of the Ancient of Days and the bestowment of the Kingdom after the horns have appeared.<sup>4</sup>

4. Not only this, but the location of the Kingdom is placed not only after the appearance of the ten horns, but after three have fallen, and after the rise and extended progress of another horn called the "little horn," which is in correspondence with what precedes the Advent in Rev. 19. The church, therefore, cannot possibly be this Kingdom, as the time of its establishment so widely differs from that of the prophecy.<sup>5</sup>

5. The smiting of the stone, the overthrow of the image and beast, the entire action of setting up the Kingdom, is in such accord with what John states in the Apocalypse, that the outlines are conceded by nearly all of our opponents to be the same. If so, the whole matter still appertains to the future, and again is indicative that the church is not meant. This argument is only available with those who concede, as e.g. Barnes Com loci, that the Beasts of Dan. and John are identical, etc.<sup>6</sup>

6. The stone comes, the Son of man comes, at the time when the Kingdoms are to be destroyed, and the prophecy proclaims this to be one of the objects contemplated by the Coming. The fact that the church, instead of destroying earthly Kingdoms, has herself been in danger, been persecuted and terribly smitten by such Kingdoms, again shows that the church is not intended.<sup>7</sup>

7. The testimony of Jesus Himself, when at His First Advent He refers to or quotes these prophecies, is in favor of locating them still in the future, at least so Barnes and others. Thus, e.g. Matt. 21 : 44 has reference, according to Barnes, to the judgment-day, and Matt. 26 : 64 relates also to the future Advent and not to the First. The latter passage is fully appropriated by Jesus as Messianic, just as the Jews understood it, from whence the charge of blasphemy. This Kingdom is only given to the Son of man at this Coming, referred by Jesus not to the first but a future one, and therefore it is not the church. (Comp. Prop. 121).<sup>8</sup>

8. The horns and the little horn are represented as existing down to this Coming, and during their presence and exertion of power, the saints, just as has occurred in the church but will not in the Kingdom, have been oppressed and persecuted. Such a condition of the saints is not in accord with their condition in the Kingdom, and hence the church and the Kingdom are not the same.<sup>9</sup>

9. At the Coming of the Son of Man, etc., as here predicted, there can be no reference to His First Advent, because that was a Coming in humiliation to suffer and die, whilst this is a Coming in triumph to rescue saints after they have endured a period of trial, etc. Hence this is not the Coming which preceded the Ch. Church, but must be the same alluded to in Rev. as preceding the Mill. age. From this Paul evidently obtains "His appearing and Kingdom," admitted by all to be future.<sup>10</sup>

10. The declaration of the prophecy is, that the church was in a struggling condition "until" "the time came that the saints possessed the Kingdom." This language clearly implies that during the period when this oppressing hostile power existed, the saints did not possess the Kingdom.<sup>11</sup>

11. The setting up (as Tregelles, Fairbairn, etc.) of thrones (not casting down), "the judgment set and the books opened," etc., locates the coming of the Ancient of Days and that of the Son of man, just where John locates the judgment under the last trumpet—Rev. 11 : 15-19 ; Rev. 15 : 15-19 ; Rev. 20 : 4—still in the future. Therefore, these are not descriptions of events preceding the establishment of the Christian Church. (Comp. Props. 121, 132, 133, 134, etc.)

12. The giving of the Kingdom, dominion, etc., implies at once a rulership, power, exaltation, etc., a fulfilment of which is thus far contradicted by the history of the church. It embraces actual dominion over nations, their subjection, etc., which has never been realized.<sup>12</sup>

13. When the power of this Kingdom is once exerted, it includes a continued, unremitted exertion and manifestation of the same, which does not correspond with the wavering, often weakened condition, relapses, losses, etc., of the church. (Comp. Prop. 159.)

14. This judgment, bestowment of a Kingdom, possessing a Kingdom, all imply in the saints actual personal rulership, something which is promised in inheriting a Kingdom still future, and in a reign of the saints also still future. Seeing such a correspondence, and knowing that instead of reigning the saints have been suffering more or less, we cannot apply this to the Christian Church past or present. (Comp. Prop. 154.)

15. The time when this Kingdom is set up is a time of dire vengeance, as the slaying of the beast, giving his body to the burning flame indicates; this agrees with the vengeance to be inflicted at a future coming recorded in Rev. 19, etc. Hence, a Kingdom before this period of retribution is not described. (Comp. Props. 115, 123, 147, 161, etc.)<sup>14</sup>

16. The smiting of the stone is also a representation of vengeance. It demolishes, breaks into pieces, makes like chaff or dust, and utterly roots out. This teaches violence, not conversion, etc., as some contend to support a theory, but the utter removal of hostile powers, as our argument demands, and as illustrated in the closing portions of the Apocalypse. Kingdoms antagonistic to the truth, wars resultant from them, etc., exist down to the Second Advent; but that period, as Paul tells the Thessalonians, is a time of terrible smiting or vengeance. The church has exhibited no such power, and therefore is not denoted.<sup>14</sup>

17. The entire narration of the prophecy makes the natural impression that this Kingdom is not set up beside the image or beasts to be contemporaneous with them, and to be engaged in a continued series of smiting processes, but that at a certain period (as Rev. 11 : 15) it will be manifested, and that in connection with their removal.<sup>15</sup>

18. That the operation of the church is not meant is evident from the predictions relating to the same, which do not correspond with the prophecy. Thus, e.g. instead of these Kingdoms being spiritually consumed or absorbed, as men confidently tell us, we find (Rev. 19, etc.) them arrayed against Christ and making war. The condition of the world at the Sec. Advent does not coincide with the proposed conquest of the world attributed by interpreters to the church.<sup>16</sup>

19. The Coming of the Son of man is personal, seeing that symbolical representation is laid aside, and it is characterized as a Coming of the Son of man. Leaving the discussion of the personal Advent to another Prop. (131), we now adhere to the view of the Jews of such an Advent (i.e. personal) here delineated, and which Neander and others concede the inspired Apostles and early church held to, in looking for the Advent itself as not very remote. All that we now suggest is, that the very structure of the prophecy is calculated to make such an impression, viz.: that the Messiah would personally come, and a Kingdom, etc., would be given to Him. Inspired men and their immediate successors could not see a fulfilment of the prophecy in the First Advent, and have located its realization at the Second. We are content to accept of their opinion, if it is "Jewish," etc., in its cast.<sup>17</sup>

20. The Kingdom, dominion, etc., is to be in the territorial limits, the very place occupied by the image and beasts, but if the church is meant, how comes it, unless we indorse the assumptions of the Romish and Greek Churches, which do not meet the conditions of the prophecy, that the church after so long a trial has never exercised such dominion within those limits? In place of it, those Kingdoms have existed often to the detriment and persecution of the church, and instead of being subdued or absorbed are either independent of, or exercise a lordship over, the church. If it be said, that this will yet occur, the reply is, that according to the prediction (if the church is meant), something of the kind ought to have already taken place and to have manifested its continuance. For, as our opponents admit (Barnes, loci Com., p. 155), the language affirms that power, etc., once obtained shall never diminish or decrease."

21. A real, visible, outward Kingdom is to be witnessed. This is the clear announcement of the prophecy, if it has any meaning whatever, seeing that it is to occupy the very position, place, territory, etc., previously taken by the image and beasts. It is a mere quibble to pronounce against this on account of the prophecy being symbolical. Let it be such, yet the image and the beasts symbolize real, literal, visible Kingdoms, and the last Kingdom, being portrayed with symbol and then without, must, in the very nature of the case, be the same, unless we violate the propriety of language. Hence, the language cannot be spiritualized away into an invisible or spiritual Kingdom. So decided is the language, that many who oppose us concede that at some time still future, the church will assume this very characteristic."

22. The prophecy implies forcibly that when this Kingdom is set up it will be done so conspicuously that all will know definitely the period of its setting up. The action of the stone and of the Ancient of Days, the judgment set, the vengeance inflicted, etc., all indicate such stupendous events, that, taken in connection with the description of the Kingdom itself, it forbids that hesitancy, vacillation, etc., characteristic of the theories of the Church-Kingdom already examined. The latter cannot even precisely define its commencement, sometimes having several.

23. When this Kingdom is established, it is not only continuously, with triumphant power, perpetuated, but is in itself, just as established, pronounced a perpetual or everlasting Kingdom. It is not susceptible of change in form. This is clearly taught. But the Church-Kingdom theory, according to its idea of 1 Cor. 15 : 24 (see Prop. 159) merges this Kingdom into quite another one, changes it into one that materially differs, some even removing it, transformed, from earth to heaven, making this dispensation, called the Kingdom, to end, etc.

From these considerations, and especially from that arising in a preservation of covenanted promise, of Divine Unity of Purpose, of consistency between earlier and later prediction, we are forced to the conclusion that the church by no means meets the conditions imposed by the prophecy. Keeping constantly before us the covenanted Kingdom, we fail to see any of the distinctive marks of the same in the church, and we dare not substitute another in its place. Prophecy does not contradict covenant promise. Therefore the assumptions of Popish doctors, who make the Papal dominion the Fifth Monarchy down to the more recent ones of Swedenborg and the Mormons, who specially claim (as Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchy men, Shakers, etc.) in their respective cases a fulfilment of Dan. 2 and 7, etc., are to be rejected as not only extravagant but arrogant, because in direct conflict with covenant, prediction, and fact. At the same time it may be proper to notice, in the briefest manner, the objections that are presented against our view. They are given by a writer (Kingd. of Grace) as follows : (1) "The stone cut out of a mountain" indicates that the Kingdom "has a small beginning," etc., equivalent to the church's. Much depends on what is meant by the Stone. Writers differ regarding its meaning. Our opponents generally explain it to mean the church, and some have ingeniously raised up a Kingdom of the Stone (Regnum lapidis), and a Kingdom of the mountain (Regnum montis), as if two Kingdoms or stages were predicted.* Amidst the diversity of meaning attached, we must keep in view the parallel passages which aid to explain it; and thus we find, that by the Stone is symbolized Christ Himself. The reasons for this opinion are these: (a) Christ is predicted as the Stone, Gen. 49:24; Ps. 118:22, 23, etc.; (b) Christ applies the image of the Stone to Himself, Matt. 21:44; (c) the term referred to Christ by the Apostles, Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:6-8, etc.; (d) the action performed by Christ at His Second Advent, as delineated in various prophecies, fully corresponds with that of the Stone; (e) the Stone, Son of Man and King of Kings, are identical in their relationship to the Kingdom; (f) the primitive Fathers, who had the advantage of nearness to the apostolic age, apply the Stone to Christ. Taking this for its meaning, we find that this Son of man, David's Son, the Stone, did come in humility, and that its smiting, grinding power (Matt. 21:44; Rev. 11 and 19, etc.) is held in abeyance until the end of the times of the Gentiles. The prophecy says nothing of growth while in action; the representation is that of demolition, and the result, i.e. the Kingdom, is stated as following, not as accompanying the same." (2) The expression "without hands" signifies "nothing else than that it was to be a spiritual and not a temporal Kingdom." But to this we reply: (a) The reference to the church is presumed not proven, whilst this supernatural characteristic is confirmatory of Christ being the Stone. According to the prevailing view, "cut out of a mountain" is not even symbolic; it is only added as an expressive figure. On the other hand, we find that "mountain" is a symbolical equivalent for "Kingdom;" we find Christ directly sprung from the royal line of David, and recognized, not merely from the past but the certainty of the future, as "cut out of a mountain," i.e. descended from the Kingdom or mountain belonging to God, and this too "without hands," i.e. by Divine agency, supernaturally, as the miraculous conception of Jesus in the royal line of David through God's Spirit confirms. (b) "Without hands," denoting such agency of God's is also to be exerted at the Second Advent, as e.g. Rev. 11, etc. Divine, supernatural power is to be manifested at Christ's "appearing and Kingdom." (c) Making this Kingdom only spiritual, and therefore invisible, violates the plain statement of the prophecy. (3) Becoming a "great mountain" means that, insignificant at first, it will spread until co-extensive with the whole earth, which can only be predicted of the church. To this we answer: The Stone appears, but we are taught is rejected by the very nation to whom the Kingdom appertains; but this same Stone thus rejected is the chosen one, held in abeyance until the period of its manifestation. The imagery of figurative language is preserved under what is related of the Stone, i.e. its becoming a great mountain; and the time when this is to be done must be obtained from other predictions. Christ being the representative of the Kingdom, the figure is appropriate, seeing that in the image the first kingdom is represented by Nebuchadnezzar personally, "Thou art this head of gold," in view of the sovereign power invested in him; so also with Christ, now indeed the rejected one, He is the Stone which at the period of its future manifestation will break in pieces and convert into chaff the Kingdoms opposed to Him. (4) But "this Kingdom was to be set up in the days of the four preceding kings, or in the days of the Roman Monarchy," and "this can only be said of the church." Leaving the fact that this proves too much—for the same author has the church or this Kingdom existing long before the head of the image arose—and passing also the fact that we have already shown that the Kingdom is set up in the divided form of the Roman Empire, we concede that at some time during the divided existence of the beast or toes of the image, it must be set up. This implies, then, their present and future existence. Now the weakened and divided condition of the once united and formidable Empire is evident. Faber and others have conclusively proven from historical documents that there has been a continuous Roman power existing down to Francis II., reinstated by Napoleon I., claimed by others, and efforts made for its revival in Italy and elsewhere. The non-existence and revival are clearly taught in Revelation, and the identity of the beasts of Daniel and of John are fully admitted by many writers. (Comp. Prop. 160). We say nothing now of the admissions even of many, that the Roman power was perpetuated in the Papal power, which exists down to the present. But whatever opinion may be formed concerning these explanations, one thing is certain, that the Kingdom of Christ is to be erected after the Roman Empire has been disrupted, and from the description of the disruption itself, a long time after it has occurred. The time we are living in still proclaims that such is its condition, for the limits once occupied by the Empire are now the territory of a number of Kingdoms. Such, and such only, is the predicted posture of affairs when this Stone, this Son of man, shall come. Daniel, therefore, confirms our doctrinal position, which will be more decisive when we come to speak of the promise made to him personally under the Prop. of the resurrection."

<sup>1</sup> The student will observe that we enter upon the consideration of these prophecies prepared by the powerful scriptural evidence afforded by the past history of the Theocracy, its fall and promised restoration, the Davidic covenant attested to by oath, the postponement of the Kingdom, etc., and that no interpretation which destroys the unity between these can be received as correct. Prophecy only predicts one Kingdom of God, in the Theocratic form, to exist here on earth, and we may rest assured that, if the Word is truly inspired, there will be no conflict between one and another portion of Holy Writ. In addition: several opinions, entertained by a few, respecting a portion of Daniel, are so utterly untenable and have been so ably answered by other writers and commentators, that they require no special attention. Such e.g. is the view of Amner and Grotius, that by the Fifth Kingdom is to be understood the Roman Empire having become Christian, which is to endure many ages, and the Son of man (which Jesus appropriates to Himself personally) symbolizes the Roman Republic contrasted with the monarchies, etc. (Lord's Lit. Journal, Jan., 1857, p. 499, note). Or, Prof. Stuart's (Com. on Dan.) idea, that the Fourth Kingdom refers to the dynasties of Syria and Egypt immediately succeeding the reign of Alexander the Great (comp. the reply of Barnes, Com., and others). Black, in Messiahs and Anti-Messiahs, departing entirely from the ancient and continued interpretation, regards the four parts of the image as descriptive rather of races than of nations i.e. to the descendants of Shem, Ham, and Japheth, under the sway of Satan as Antichrist. The "Antiochus Epiphanes theory" is (Auberlen on Dan.) a favorite one with modern Rationalistic interpretation. Destructive criticism endeavors to revive and enforce the objections of Celsus and Porphyry, and, not satisfied with this, endeavors to break the continuity and force of the predictions by making the Medes and Persians two of the four Kingdoms, and urging that Alexander and his successors form two (comp. Birks's Mod. Thought, p. 192, etc.). Extravagances are fastened on these predictions on all sides. Thus e.g. a Pope can approvingly quote them (Littell's Liv. Age, Aug. 10th, 1872) as a threat against the German Empire, "that by and by there will fall from the Mountain a little stone which shall break the head of the Colossus;" the Jesuit Vieri (Von Döllinger's Essay on Proph. Spirit) can interpret: "God will again raise up your King, and elevate his Portugal to be the heart and the centre of a new universal empire, the Fifth according to the prophet Daniel, since the Fourth, the Roman-German, is already falling in pieces, and will be dissolved at the coming of Sebastian. In the time of this Fifth Empire all Jews and heathen will be converted; and thus the prophecy about one Shepherd and one fold will be fulfilled. Dr. Berg makes America the Fifth Empire, reproducing the opinion of Sir. Th. Browne (Works, Tr. 12), and which, as stated by Dr. Johnson, is in accordance with the interpretation and expectation of Dr. Berkeley, viz. : "that America will be the seat of the Fifth Empire" (comp. Prop. 168); Davis (Seven Thunders) insists that the stone is the American Republic, which is destined to demolish European despotism, and overthrow thrones, etc., commingling Christ and the Republic, and applying the army (Rev. 19) to the Republic; others confidently and exclusively refer the Fifth Kingdom to their peculiar and distinctive church or sect. Such vagaries can be dismissed; for as Fairbairn (On Proph.) says: the efforts to make the succession of Kingdoms different from that anciently, ordinarily, and generally entertained, have "palpably failed. They have been thoroughly refuted by Hofmann, Hengstenberg, and latterly by Auberlen" (to which may be added, Lord, Birks, Barnes, Newton, Mede, Elliott, Cumming, Frere, Bonar, Bickersteth, Brooks, and many others). The natural legitimate interpretation, according as it does with the plain language and the facts of history, cannot be set aside by those mentioned. Bh. Newton (On Proph., vol. 1, p. 217) well remarks: "All ancient writers, both Jewish and Christian, agree with Jerome in explaining the Fourth Kingdom to be the Roman." The learned Mede (Works, quoted by Newton, p. 217) says: "The Roman Empire to be the Fourth Kingdom of Daniel, was believed by the Church of Israel, both before and in our Saviour's time; received by the disciples of the apostles and the whole Christian Church for the first three hundred years without any known contradiction. And I confess, having so good ground in Scripture, it is, with me tantum non articulus fidei, little less than an article of faith." The interpretation therefore, really worthy of consideration, is that which consecutively leads down to the Roman as the Fourth Kingdom, and this we thus notice preparatory to the contemplation of the Fifth. The only point in the adverse criticisms and speculations deserving the least attention, is that of making it a question whether the divided portion of Alexander's Empire after his death is to be considered as part of the Third Kingdom, or whether they (for it was divided into four parts) are to be regarded as separate and distinct Kingdoms (so Davidson, etc.). That they are the former is evident: (1) that a portion of the body or a beast symbolizes as well a succession as an individual; (2) that the same symbolizes a succession, even when divided or undergoing changes; (3) that such a change is indicated in ch. 7, by the horns springing out of the same beast; (4) that the successors were Macedonians or Grecians; (5) that all ancient authors speak of Alexander's Kingdom and that of his successors as being the same; (6) the Empire was simply divided among successors, and each one acknowledged his portion to be a part of the same; (7) the Jews always spoke of these several portions as pertaining to one characteristic rule, calling them by one name, the Kingdom of the Grecians; (8) the next Empire was stronger than the brazen, which is not true of the divided Grecian Kingdom; (9) the Fourth reaches down to the end (comp. Prop. 160), whereas the divided form of the Grecian has long since disappeared; (10) that to make such a radical change destroys the unity of the prophecy and prevents a proper incorporation of the subject-matter that follows in its natural order.

<sup>2</sup> It is noticeable what influence a preconceived opinion will have in guiding writers in their interpretation of this passage. A recent one (Fairbairn, On Proph., p. 295), who comes to Daniel with the determination to find the Christian Church, as now existing, delineated by the Fifth Kingdom, gravely tells us: "It (the vision) does not indicate at what particular time, or even under which worldly dominion the Kingdom represented by the Stone should begin to develop itself on the theatre of the world," although he admits that it must be referred to the period of the last power as "the natural inference obviously." So others evince a lack of candor, seeing that the action of the Stone (aside from its being the last in the order of time and place) is represented as taking place on the feet of the image, whereas Fairbairn and others, in plain contradiction of the language, will have the smiting process, or action of the Stone, to begin, not on the feet, but on the body, even before the legs and feet are in existence. They also forget that in ch. 7, the bestowal of the Kingdom (corresponding with ch. 2) is after the Fourth Kingdom has run its career, and is to be brought to its end. Where is the consistency of a criticism, so forced that it does violence to the express delineation given by the Spirit? It will not avail to say, as some do, that the Stone was in existence and "taking form," etc., before smiting the feet, for that is begging the point at issue by adding to the vision mere assumption. The latter proves too much, for if, as Fairbairn states, it took some time for the Stone to be organized and to put on "a form in which it could act extrane-ously upon the affairs and destinies of the world," we are therefore to understand that for several centuries previous to the formation of the feet, it did not "act extraneously upon the affairs and destinies of the world" (for the distinctive stated work of the Stone begins when the feet are planted, and not before), which notion, pressed out by a Church-Kingdom theory, by no means agrees with his own presented idea of a Kingdom. In addition, a number of particulars that will be enumerated, as well as the general analogy of prediction on the subject, compels us to this location of "these kings." Tregelles (On Dan., p. 19) justly says: "These kings, cannot mean the four successional monarchies, because in that case the plural form could not be used, seeing that they do not co-exist as the holders of power," and therefore he refers the phrase to the divided form of the Roman Empire, when (as we shall show, Prop. 160) a number of kings exist contemporaneously, according with the fuller details of Rev. This is corroborated by the time of smiting. Hence Fausset (Com. Dan. loci) gives this note: "Rather 'in the days of these kings' answers to 'upon his feet' (v. 34) i.e. the ten toes (v. 42) or ten kings, the final state of the Roman Empire. For 'these kings' cannot mean the four successional monarchies, as they do not co-exist as the holders of power: if the fourth had been meant, the singular and not the plural would be used." Many other writers of ability take the same view, locating "these kings" in the future, because Gentile domination continues and the action of the Stone, as predicted, has not been witnessed. They are made to relate (as Dan. 7, Rev. 13 and 17, etc.) to the divided form of the Fourth Empire.

<sup>3</sup> Arguments might be derived from the admissions of our opponents, who, when commenting on the ten horns, Kingdom, etc., in Revelation, forgetting their own interpretations of Daniel as relating to the Church, make the divided form the period of smiting, etc. (Comp. e.g. Barnes Dan. and Rev.) The toes are by many supposed to designate exactly ten divisions or ten Kingdoms, and accordingly many Protestant and Roman Catholic writers have designated exactly ten Kingdoms, but they differ among themselves in producing the same Kingdoms. It seems more correct to suppose that the toes simply represent such divisions without being pressed to the exact number of ten. Division is intended, but whether the number is more or less than ten is of no material consequence. If it can be shown that such divisions took place, that is sufficient, otherwise, to be very exact, it must be shown (1) that one leg of the image is longer than the other, seeing that one portion of the Empire lasted longer than the other; and (2) that five divisions occurred in the eastern and five in the western portion, as five toes are on one foot, and five on the other; the legs, according to commentators, etc., represented the divided form of the Empire. This, like making a parable to have a definite meaning in the particulars required for filling up to complete the representation, would be pressing a symbol so closely as to endanger its unity. If it is, however, expressive of the ten horns of Dan. 7 (which may be the case), then we are not to seek for these divisions in the past, but in the future (comp. Prop. 160). In Dan. 2, a general chronological epitome of history is given without entering into details; in Dan. 7 more of the latter are given, and in view of the "little horn," the ten horns are specifically given as existing, but (just as in Revelation) existing previous to and at the Sec. Advent. But our line of argument does not require us to enter into particulars, or to discuss the divisions, the proof necessary for our purpose being independent of the same.

<sup>4</sup> This is so plain, and the chronological order of the prophecy so regular and consistent, that even Augustine, the great leader of the modern Church-Kingdom theory, dare not apply this Kingdom of Daniel to the Church, but to a period after the Second Advent. Thus (City of God, B. 20, c. 23) he locates this Kingdom after the still future Antichrist, after the Sec. Advent, and places it in the third heaven (comp. for reply to last, Prop. 103). But this reference to the third heaven is a palpable violation of the prophecy, which speaks of a Kingdom here on the earth, "under the whole heaven," where these previous Kingdoms existed. He enforces one feature thus: "He who reads this passage, even half asleep, cannot fail to see that the Kingdom of Antichrist shall fiercely, though for a short time, assail the Church before the last judgment of God shall introduce the eternal reign of the saints." He makes the number "ten" an indefinite number, and the times, three and a half years.

<sup>5</sup> This is even felt by the spiritualizing Jerome so forcibly that he, with Augustine, locates the fulfilment in the future. Thus (On Daniel 7) he remarks: "Therefore let us say what all the ecclesiastical writers have delivered, that at the end of the world, when the Kingdom of the Romans is to be destroyed, there will be ten kings, who will divide the Roman world among themselves, and an eleventh will arise, a little king, who will overcome three kings of the ten kings," etc. He makes Dan. 7 : 13 refer to the personal coming of Christ, and applies the whole, not to the present existing Church, but to the future. The words "king" and "kingdom" he regards as convertible, as seen by comparing verse 17 with verse 23 in Dan. 7 (comp. Storrs's Diss. on the Kingdom of Heaven, who says: "The Hebrew term which commonly signifies king properly means kingdom," and refers to Dan. 8 : 21 and 7 : 17). The student will see at once that persons who lived before the division and breaking up of Roman unity could not possibly apply such prophecies—as now done—to an existing Church, because they were linked with events that had not transpired.

* Without indorsing the opinions or position of every writer, attention is directed to the following, who give much illustrative of our meaning: Auberlen's Prophecies of Daniel and the Rev. of St. John, Frere's Combined View of the Prophecies of Daniel, Ezeckiel, and St. John, Roos's Exposition of Daniel, and Comparison of them with the Rev. of St. John, Faber's Diss. on the Prophecies and Sacred Calendar of Prophecy, besides various works either on Daniel or on the Apocalypse which illustrate and enforce the one by reference to the other, such as Elliott's, Lord's, Schmucker's, Daubuz, Ebrard, Brightman, Bengel, and others.

† Writers who endeavor to soften the prophetic language and make it representative of moral and spiritual influences, still are forced to admit (as e.g. Barnes, Com. loci): "The language here would seem to imply some violent action, some positive crushing force, something like that which occurs in conquests when nations are subdued." Comp. the concessions of Fairbairn (On Proph., pp. 449, 447, 465, etc., where he admits that the language embraces more than mere conversion, etc. Our position is corroborated (1) by the fact that the Primitive Church, instead of smiting, was so smitten that many churches were finally exterminated; (2) that the prophecy (Dan. 7 : 21) indicates the persecution of the saints; (3) that, as will be shown, at the Sec. Advent the powers arrayed against God's people will be terribly smitten, with which this prophecy accords.

‡ This indicates how erroneous is the view of Mede, Cotton Mather, and others, that Daniel describes a "twofold state of the Kingdom, viz. : a Kingdom of the Stone and a Kingdom of the Mountain—the Kingdom of the Stone from the resurrection of Jesus to His Sec. Advent, and the Kingdom of the Mountain from the revelation of Jesus when He comes to destroy His enemies. Dan. 2 and 7 describe the same order, and as Jesus referred the same to Himself at the Sec. Advent, as the action of the Stone is identical with what takes place at His Sec. Coming, and as the time of the display of the Stone's power, etc., is still in the future (cannot be attributed to the undivided form of the Roman Empire, etc.), it is impossible to receive the theory. To do so vitiates the regular order, and introduces an antagonism. The same is true of Lange's (and others) engrafting upon Matt. 26 : 64 a reference to the present as well as to future Advent. The express order enumerated of fulfilment forbids it, and it would not be attempted if there were no Church-Kingdom to be supported.

§ Such considerations, besides those derived from the non-fulfilment of the covenant, largely influenced the early Church. In their oppressed, persecuted state under the Fourth Empire, it was simply impossible for believers to imagine themselves in that Kingdom of God which all the prophets predicted would afford an immediate and enduring release from Gentile domination and oppression. They never supposed themselves to be in a Kingdom which was to overcome those around, and then boasted as e.g. Romanists afterward. (Thus e.g. in the beginning of the twelfth century—Ranke's His. of the Popes, vol. 1, p. 22—the Provost Gerohus said: "It will at last come to this, that the golden image of the Empire shall be shaken to dust, every great monarchy shall be divided into tetrarchates, and then only will the Church stand free and untrammelled beneath the protection of her crowned high priest.") Their hope of the fulfilment of Daniel related to the future—to the personal Coming of the Messiah. They never could advocate (with their view of the overthrow of the Theocracy, the postponement of restoration to Sec. Advent, and the preparatory nature of the Church) the notions entertained e.g. by Jewel (Apol. for Church of England), or Hooker (Ecol. Polity) that a Theocracy was thus restored and must be exercised, or even by the Scottish Kirk Sessions (Buckle's His. Civ., vol. 2, p. 271), or the Genevan Church Council (D'Aubigne's His. Ref.), enforcing government on the plea of a revived Theocratic order, giving the power into the hands of the saints. Ten thousand arrogant and unscriptural claims, offensively and one-sidedly paraded by Buckle (His. Civ.), Lecky (His. Morals), and others, are set aside by retaining the simple, rational, logical interpretation of Daniel in reference to the Kingdom.

|| Justin Martyr (Dial. with Trypho) quotes Dan. 7, and refers its fulfilment to the future. In ch. 32 the Jew Trypho is represented as objecting to its applicability to Jesus Christ because His coming was in humiliation, and that He was crucified. If Daniel's prediction were to be confined to the First Advent and to the Church, then the exception stated would be well taken, seeing that nothing commensurate with Daniel's prediction took place. Justin correctly meets the objection by showing that the prophecy will be fulfilled at the Sec. Advent. Now, this alone, aside from numerous other considerations, effectually disposes of Reuss's (His. Chris. Theol., p. 349) theory, that "the fact of the veritable appearance of Christ implies the immediate setting up of His Kingdom," or Oosterzee's (Ch. Dog., vol. 2, p. 528), that "the effect of His appearing plainly shows that He has in reality founded that Kingdom of God which was looked for by kings and prophets." We confess our utter inability, with the early Church, to see such a "reality" (comp. Prop. 42-68), finding it opposed by covenant, prophecy, postponement, and history. So Ueberweg (His. Philos., vol. 1, p. 266) wrongfully applies Dan. 7 : 13, 14, to the First Advent, and against the order of prediction and the plain facts of history, says that Jesus then "had the courage to found a Kingdom of God." Thompson (Theol. of Christ) quotes e.g. Dan. 7 : 27 as now fulfilled, because a believer with prayer becomes "a spiritual power," or "a co-worker with God in the realm of spiritual agencies," thus placing him among the "providential forces that rule the world." This only shows how hard pressed our opponents are to find a support for their theory.

<sup>11</sup> Several objects are evidently designed by the prophecies (1) to indicate the ambition of these four Kingdoms, to obtain, if possible, a universal lordship or dominion over the earth; (2) the fearful threatenings of God, given by Moses, etc., were to be realized under this Gentile domination; (3) the prosperous and triumphant career of these Kingdoms in contrast with the depressed condition of God's people; (4) the ample deliverance that would yet be brought through the Messiah after the predetermined course of these Kingdoms; (5) the full bestowal of the dominion that these sought but failed to realize but only in the covenanted line and manner; (6) and, hence, are designed to sustain the faith of believers under such trials, assuring them that such powers would come to a final end (comp. Prop. 164), and that God's promises would be verified. Lord (Lit. and Theol. Journal, 1860, p. 305) well suggests that in this Gentile ordering God allows an exemplification to take place, on a decisive scale, "of what fallen man is as a ruler of his fellow-men," as essential to show what is in man, what he will do when in power, and to demonstrate the necessity—in order to have a perfect government—of Christ's assuming the Theocratic rule.

<sup>12</sup> The sway of the Romish Church is no fulfilment of the prediction, lacking the extent, unity, continuance, etc., given by the prophecy. It is only a caricature of the promised Messianic Kingdom, a self-appropriation of the work of Jesus.

<sup>13</sup> The reader will observe that this vengeance is poured out upon these because (Dan. 7 : 9-11, Rev. 17 : 12-14, and 19 : 19, etc.) they are directly hostile to and make war against Christ. Prophecy corresponds as to the time of and reason for infliction. To see the difference between prophecy and some writers : Schlegel (Phil. of His., Lect. 10) makes the Jewish Covenant and the old Revelation of the Hebrews the first corner stone, the Greek language the second foundation stone, and the Roman Empire the third foundation stone of the Christian religion or Church. The Church is not founded on that that perishes.

<sup>14</sup> Fairbairn (On Prop., p. 297, see preceding § 7, note 1), although admitting that such monarchies are "doomed to perpetual destruction," strives hard to make this smiting and destroying the work of the Church, as now existing, by means of moral and spiritual influences (so Barnes, Edwards, Brown, etc.). But where is the historical proof (aside from the tenor of the prophecy and the analogy of the Word), when all history asserts that the Church has been the best ally that earthly kingdoms have possessed in supporting their claims, pretensions, divine right of kings, etc. Take the Roman Kingdom, and is it not abundantly confirmed that when divided and weakened, it was upheld by the Church through its nominal conversion and ecclesiastical connection with the same? Gibbon and others plainly teach us how the Church, in many an emergency, supported and revived the sinking civil power. Even Grotius, with his singular view of the Fifth Kingdom, must acknowledge that the sublime sense is that Christ Himself, according to 1 Cor. 15 : 24, will put an end to all earthly empires. The question to be answered is, When? Tregelles (On Dan., p. 20) properly discards, as untenable, the action of the Stone as representing the results of grace or the gospel, and indorses the view "that destroying judgment on Gentile power is here spoken of;" which power Jesus ascribes to himself personally, Matt. 21 : 42, 44. Fausset (Com. Dan. 2 : 4) says : "The falling of the Stone on the image must mean destroying judgment on the fourth Gentile power, not gradual evangelization of it by grace; and the destroying judgment cannot be dealt by Christians, for they are taught to submit to the powers that be, so that it must be dealt by Christ Himself at His coming again." The contrast in the utter removal of these Kingdoms, and the substitution of this fifth dominion, fully sustains such a view. The fact that this Stone is not presented as a foundation stone (i.e. preservative), but as a judgment stone (i.e. destructive), confirms the same. So also the image is not presented as something transformed or changed by the action of the Stone, but a complete demolition of it is expressed. The regular succession of downfalls, and the Stone appearing (not when the Church was established and the Roman Empire was in its strength, but) when the image is completed (i.e. in the days of the feet) corroborates our position. And this is confirmed by the following: The "breaking to pieces" in Dan. 2 : 40 (comp. Dan. 7 : 7, 19, 23) is admitted by all to indicate violence, but the same phraseology is applied to the action of the Stone, and consistency demands a like interpretation. Therefore we need not be surprised at Fairbairn's concessions (On Proph., pp. 449, 447, 465, etc.) that the language denotes more than simple conversion.

<sup>15</sup> This was the uniform opinion of the ancients, and is remarkably exhibited in the delicacy of Josephus (i.e. not to offend the Roman power, as noticed by Bh. Newton, On Proph., p. 195—taken from Bh. Chandler's Defence) in refusing to explain the Kingdom of the Stone (Antiq., B. 10, ch. 10, s. 4), the apology of Jerome (as presented by Newton, p. 192), the dread expressed by Tertullian and others. Sulpicius Severus (Sacred His., B. 2) gives the general view previously held (but in his day beginning to be questioned), when he makes the Fourth Kingdom the Roman, and insists upon Christ's coming to reduce the same and "establish another everlasting Kingdom." If the reader desires to know how generally this was entertained, he need only notice how the previously prevailing Millenarian views (comp. Props. 73-78) necessarily embraced it as a distinguishing feature. This old interpretation was not flattering to Roman power nor to Papal pretensions, and it was coldly treated, as evidenced e.g. by Calmet (see Newton On Proph., p. 206).

<sup>16</sup> For decisive proof the reader is referred to Props. 123, 147, 175, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 171. While God's purpose in reference to the establishment of the Church is fully carried out (viz. : to gather out the elect), it is also true that down to the very Advent organizations hostile to the truth shall exist and yet fearfully oppress the Church. Instead of being absorbed, conciliated, they shall persecute the saints. The culminated Antichrist must yet arise in his dreaded career of supposed triumph over the Church. What Irenæus (B. 5, c. 25, 26), Cyril (Hier. Cat. 15, c. 6), even Jerome (Hier. Com. loci) and Augustine (City of God, B. 10, c. 23—see these and others given by Newton, in Diss. 13 and 14) said respecting the then future Antichrist and the oppression of the Church can still be repeated, for these predictions relating to the great final catastrophe are far, very far from being exhausted. In the nature of the case, then, it is misleading and dangerous to attach to the Church a work which she is utterly unable to perform, and which will only be done in her behalf when overwhelmed in the depths of an awful persecution. The delineation given of the future of the Church by Paul, John, and others is directly opposed to the prosperous and triumphant state of this Kingdom, when established by Jesus.

<sup>17</sup> Compare Luther's opinion (D'Aubigne's His. Ref., v. 2, p. 166, and Elliott's Howe Apoc., v. 2, p. 133, etc.) on the personal coming of "the Son of man," as well as that of many others given by Taylor (Voice of the Church), Brooks (El. Proph. Interp.), A Congregationalist (Time of the End), etc. D'Aubigne (vol. 4, p. 123) also says: "The Reformer, dreading lest the end of the world should arrive before he had translated all the Bible, published the prophecies of Daniel separately—"a work," said he, "for these latter times." "Historians relate," added he, "that Alexander the Great always placed Homer under his pillow: the prophet Daniel is worthy not only that kings and princes should wear him under their heads, but in their hearts; for he will teach them that the government of nations proceeds from the power of God," etc. This indicates Luther's esteem (and what a rebuke to modern neglect!) for Daniel.

<sup>18</sup> Take the territorial limits, and see the fearful inroads that Gentile domination has made upon the Church. Thus e.g. take a map of the Roman Empire as it existed for some time after the Church was established, and to-day we find immense portions of the territory without a Christian Church, and large portions of it, which once boasted of such a Church in a flourishing condition, have fallen back into a state of unbelief and degradation. The facts of history are thus antagonistic to the prophetic portraiture.

<sup>19</sup> Out of a multitude of testimony on this point, we select Dr. J. G. Schmucker's (Exp. of Rev., notes on ch. 20 : 6): "We are assured by Daniel that after the four universal Empires, the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Macedonian, and the Roman, which are there symbolized by the parts of a human image and by four beasts (ch. 2 and 7), the God of heaven shall set up a Kingdom, the dominion whereof shall be given to the Son of man, and all people, nations, and languages shall serve and obey Him. Now, as the preceding four are temporal monarchies, homogeneity compels us to consider the Fifth Empire one of the same nature; or otherwise these prophecies would appear an impenetrable riddle, and the words without a certain signification, of no use to the Church." He therefore advocates the visibility of the Kingdom, in the establishment of "a Theocracy among His people," etc., calling it "such a government as the personal Kingdom of Christ" will introduce.

<sup>20</sup> Reference has been made (Obs. 2, 7, note) to this twofold theory. Fausset even (Com. Dan. 2), hampered by the Church-Kingdom theory, makes "a Stone-Kingdom" now existing in this dispensation as preliminary to "the Mountain-Kingdom;" the one he designates "the Kingdom of the cross," and the other "the Kingdom of glory." But this is utterly opposed to the prophetic time given in the prediction when the Stone enters upon its mission, as evidenced e.g. in the simple announcement: "Thou savest" (i.e. as the context shows, until the complete formation of the image down to his feet) "till that a Stone was cut out without hands." This locates the period of manifestation precisely with that of "the Son of man" in ch. 7, long after the Church has been established, as already shown. So Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming, p. 2, ch. 3) labors to make the Stone the Church developing itself ultimately into the mountain stage. (The proof derived from the mustard seed and leaven will be examined under Prop. 108.) Our reasoning fully meets his view. We only add: the action of the Stone, instead of indicating a feebleness in beginning, etc., presents us with the exact reverse, viz.: that of a mighty power, which successfully overthrows earthly Kingdoms, it being the exerted power of Him who is the head of this "mountain" ("mountain" symbolizing the Kingdom and the "stone" the destructive agency). The action of the Stone and the work of Jesus at His Sec. Coming are identical, as the prophets describe, and we cannot be mistaken in the application. It is absurd to assert in behalf of the Church-Kingdom theory (as Brown, p. 344), that "this heavenly Kingdom appears in the first instance, simply as 'the saints of the Most High,' worn out and given into the hands of the little horn of the fourth beast," etc., for this is to locate the Kingdom, against the prediction, before and not after the tribulation of the saints.

<sup>21</sup> Lord (Lit. and Theol. Journal, Jan., 1854, and Oct., 1860) makes the Stone the symbol of risen and glorified saints—the kings who reign in the Fifth Empire and extend it over the earth—who obtain the government of the world, etc. Now, while this would correspond with the promises (Prop. 154), while believers are designated "stones" (1 Pet. 2 : 5, Eph. 2 : 21, etc.), yet as this work is specifically applied to Christ Himself (the co-operation of the saints being implied or taught in other passages), and the singular is employed, expressive by way of pre-eminence of "the Stone," we vastly prefer the early Church interpretation, which is expressed by Severus (Sac. His., B. 2, p. 67), "But in the Stone, cut out without hands, which broke in pieces the gold, the silver, the brass, the iron, and the clay, we have a figure of Christ. For He shall reduce this world, in which are the Kingdoms of the earth, to nothing, and shall establish another everlasting Kingdom." Thus many others, some referring to 1 Cor. 15 : 24, Ps. 2 : 12, Isa. 63 : 1-6, etc. The only objection of force made against this view is the following: that the change from a Stone to a Mountain is unsuitable to Christ. But there is a beautiful application in this very change to David's Son, as the Son of man. For when He comes, He comes, according to covenant promise, to claim His right and heirship to the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, which, when restored, is necessarily—as infidels have ridiculed it in contrast with these four Empires—a small Kingdom (and mark—in the prophecy, as king and Kingdom are convertible, the figure of the Stone is dropped, v. 44, and that of a Kingdom substituted, as Christ is the Head, which performs this work and extends and perpetuates itself), but which under His auspices immediately advances to a world-wide dominion, overcoming all opposition. There is propriety in directing attention to the central figure, the great Agent and King, who, from His covenanted position on the weak (compared with earthly powers) Davidic throne, waxes great and mighty over all the earth. The work that He accomplishes requires time, and prophecy indicates this feature. The figure of the Stone (and not of another metal) may have reference to the weighing (judgment) of nations in God's scale of justice, a Stone being used as the medium (as e.g. Deut. 25 : 13 marg., Prov. 16 : 11 marg.). Gill (Com. loci) mentions Rab. Simeon Ben Jochai, Saadiah Gaon, Rab. Abraham Seba, and one of the ancient Midrashes or Expositions, as applying this Stone to the Messiah. This was a Jewish opinion, so that our opponent, Dr. Brown (The Sec. Com., p. 352), remarks: "Prebendary Lowth says, 'The Jews agree that by this Stone is here (Dan. 2) meant the Messiah.'" And (p. 352) he adds, to show how it was perpetuated: "The fathers were fond of illustrating the miraculous generation of Christ by the Stone's being 'cut out of the mountain without hands,' and thus the application of the word to Christ seemed to have gained a footing." The early Church view is well illustrated by a brief sentence from Hippolytus (Treat. on Christ and Antichrist): "After a little space, the Stone will come from heaven, which smites the image," etc. While able to incorporate much that Wilson (Proph. Times, N. S., 1876, p. 166) says in relation to the Kingdom (it being inseparably associated with the Stone, which is its Head), yet we cannot make the Stone itself to be "the Kingdom of God," because of its being expressly appropriated, pre-eminently, to the Christ personally. It is true, however, that the Kingdom cannot be dissociated from Him, for the one embraces the other; still in the prediction special attention is directed to the Head as the powerful source of these judgments. Hence some, as Fausset (Dan. loci), unite the two together. Berg's theory (The Stone and the Image) that the Stone is the American Republic, destined to overthrow despotism, or that of some Spiritualists, of its being spiritualism extending itself, may be dismissed without comment. So also Wild's notion of England and America's supremacy. The Luth. Obs., Oct. 26th, 1877, reports that a missionary of the American Sunday-School Union states that a zealous sectarian preacher "asserted his belief that David's Stone cut out of the mountain is the Methodist Episcopal Church." Indeed, those who hold that this Kingdom is the Church, and who are at the same time exclusive, may in their self-complacency think that their own exclusive Church is thus favored. But sober-minded men of all churches despise such a sectarian exclusive appropriation.

"The idea of forming a Fifth universal Empire, to be nominally Christian, was a favorite idea of Constantine, Charlemagne, Charles V., Napoleon I., and others, but according to Scripture it can never be realized under human auspices. It will only be fulfilled under the supernatural agency of "the Christ" at His Sec. Advent. This same dream of conquest and a universal Kingdom excited the imagination and fired the ambition of various Popes. It also is a favorite with a class of Protestants, as e.g. The Sermonizer (vol. 1, No. 2, p. 22) on "The Messiah's Kingdom," says, "This will only be brought about by human co-operation"—thus entirely overlooking the predicted condition of the Church, under Gentile domination, at the Sec. Advent.

Obs. 3. If we turn to Isa. 25 : 6-10, the reasons are convincing why this noble prophecy should not be applied to the church in this dispensation. (1) If we take the prediction to describe one period of time here on earth; if we are not at liberty to separate the prophecy, and apply part of a sentence to the church here and another to the church in heaven, part of it to the church now and part of it to the church in the distant future, etc., then the condition of the church has never been that described by the prophet; for instead of the grand deliverance and glorious blessings promised, the church's condition has been the reverse, and shall continue thus down to the Sec. Advent. (2) The church, v. 9, is represented as waiting for this period. (3) The context shows that this "mountain" or Kingdom is preceded by terrible judgments upon the nations of the earth, corresponding with the concluding portions of the Apoc. and the portrayals of the Sec. Advent. (4) The context shows that it is connected with the deliverance of the Jewish nation and with "the land of Judah." (5) The time agrees with the gathering of the nations (ch. 24 : 22; ch. 25 : 10-12; ch. 26 : 5-8 and 20, 21), and vengeance inflicted, Rev. 19, 15, and 11, etc. (6) The figurative language of context (Rev. and Matt. 24, comp. e.g. with verse 23, ch. 24); the reigning after the judgments in Jerusalem according to covenant promise; the destruction of a city (chs. 25 and 26), corresponding with that of Babylon in the Apoc.; the sparing of some people, after these judgments, who shall glorify God; the appearance of God in a critical, distressful period of time; the triumphant song sung at that day "in the land of Judah;" the obtaining at that time of a strong city; the removal of the wicked; the non-resurrection of the wicked dead

(ch. 26 : 14, comp. with Rev. 20 : 5)—these things so accurately correspond with what is to occur, still in the future at the Sec. Advent, that we cannot appropriate these to the church. (7) This Kingdom is established on the earth (not in heaven), and embraces the removal of the curse, of events that are only linked with the Sec. Coming. Thus the resurrection of the saints, which Paul in 1 Cor. 15 : 54 expressly quotes and applies to such a resurrection, and which must occur before the Kingdom comes, and the removal of tears, of rebuke, etc., which exactly agrees with what John and others apply to the future Kingdom. Indeed, if we leave the text and context speak, and be contrasted with the facts of history and with what is predicted in the future, it is impossible to find a fulfilment of them in the church or world. This feast undoubtedly corresponds with the predicted future one in the Apoc.

Obs. 4. The favorite prediction seems to be Isa. 2 : 1-5 and Micah 4 : 1, which, as all admit, describe the same Kingdom. But that these do not refer to the church as now constituted is evident from the context. The immediate connection, as in Micah, chs. 3 and 4 and in Isa. 2, demands a restoration of the identical Zion that was ploughed, the same Jerusalem that was made heaps, and the same mountain of the house that was overthrown. The downfall was literally accomplished, and the Prophet not only, without a change, necessarily advocates a complete and triumphant restoration (just as the covenant demands), but to avoid any mistake in the matter, conjoins the one with the other, specifies a supremacy (Mic. 2 : 8) to Jerusalem, and (11, 12, 13) points out the gathering of nations and their complete overthrow. Besides this, the blessings of this Kingdom, as in the cessation of war and the perfect safety of the citizen, has never been realized, and we are assured will not (for express passages teach war down to the Advent itself) until Christ comes again. The terrible overthrow of Isa. 2 : 10-22, etc. is in such agreement with the closing chapters of the Apocalypse, that we must locate them both at the same period.

So plain and decisive are these predictions that it is a matter of amazement that the Church has ever departed from the early Church belief, sustained as it is by the fair grammatical sense and analogy of the Word. Justin Martyr (Dial. with Trypho), referring to Micah 4 : 1, etc., declares those as "destitute of just reason who did not understand that which is clear from all the Scriptures, that two comings of Christ are announced—one in which a suffering, inglorious, dishonored, and crucified Saviour is preached; but another in which He shall come with glory from the heavens," etc. To show the contrast and evidence how the prophecies are appropriated in behalf of the Church, without any regard to their connection, etc., we quote from the father of the modern prevailing theory and mode of application. Origen (Ag. Celsus) thus interprets Isa. 2 : "Each one of us, then, is come 'in the last days' where one Jesus has invited us, to the 'visible mountain of the Lord,' the Word that is above every Word, and to the 'house of God,' which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and the ground of the truth. And we notice how it is built upon 'the tops of the mountains' i.e. the predictions of all the prophets, which are its foundations. And this house is exalted above the hills, i.e. those individuals among men who make a profession of superior attainments in wisdom and truth," etc. Alas! that such a method of interpretation should even yet obscure most precious portions of Holy Writ! For some ruthlessly divide what God has joined together, applying part to the earth and part to heaven, part to the present and part to the future, etc.

Obs. 5. If we turn to Zech. 14, we have, as predicted in other places, the Jewish nation in a fearful position (not the one at the destruction of Jerusalem in the first century, but a still future one), by a gathering of nations against it, a Divine interposition in its behalf, the Advent of Christ and of His saints, the triumph of the Jews, the Kingship of the Lord then over the earth manifested, the safety and peace of Jerusalem, the plague poured out on the enemies, the sparing of some people, the worship tendered to God, the service and holiness—all these things are entirely consistent with our argument concerning the Kingdom as covenanted and identified with the Jewish nation, as exhibiting a theocratic manifestation in the appointed manner hereafter, while they cannot be applied to the past history of the Jews or of the Church without gross violation of text. This chapter of Zech. gives such a remarkable order of the events, and insists so pointedly on the exaltation of the Jews, that our opponents find it the most difficult of all passages to spiritualize.

Obs. 6. In order to apply "the year of my redeemed" (the Jubilee), and the "salvation" (forgetting that Christ also comes the second time unto salvation) of Isa. 63 : 1-6 to the Church, the exact reverse of the prophecy is advocated. The coming of the King in vengeance, treading the people in anger and fury, is transposed into a gracious coming and converting power; and the blood of the enemies staining His raiment is changed into Christ's own blood on the cross! Surely when such liberties are required by a theory to preserve its consistency, is it not time to consider its validity?

It is a matter of surprise that so clear a thinker as Dr. Schaff (Lange's Com. Matt. p. 489) should apply this to the passion of Christ (comp. Props. 162 and 166). Numerous sermons by eminent men pervert this Scripture, and as Dr. Moore (Lange's Com. Isa., p. 673, after such a given specimen) well says: "It is strange that an eminent modern preacher (Ziethé) should so misrepresent the teaching of this passage. If we wish to lead men to contemplate Christ as the Man of Sorrows, by whose blood we are redeemed, we should choose a passage of Scripture that exhibits Him in this character. But it is either culpable ignorance or something worse to affirm that the Scripture before us contains the lessons set forth in the above-mentioned heads of a sermon." This rebuke is merited by many who utterly pervert and misapply its meaning. Calvin justly calls this "a perversion of Scripture." No one, however, follows the extreme of Jerome, to make the bloodshed to be that of demons. Comp. the judicious remarks of Weber, quoted Lange's Com. Isa., p. 673, who correctly locates its fulfilment to "the judgment that will befall the antichristian persecuting world in the last days."

Obs. 7. Thus we might present one prediction after the other, and in each case show, either by the context, text, or parallel passages, that the Kingdom described by them is still future. For, notwithstanding the assurances given and the eulogies passed on the Church, it is a plain fact that no such predictions, having a direct reference to the condition of this Kingdom, have ever been realized in the history of the Church. And if it were not for this Church-Kingdom theory, no one would make the attempt to wrest and pervert them in this direction. Take, e.g. Isa. 65 : 17-25 (comp. with v. 9), and the ablest of writers, as Pres. Edwards, Alexander, etc., apply this to the Church even to the extent that "the new heavens and new earth" have appeared (although some admit also that it has a future reference). But if we leave inspired men give their testimony, we find that the location of this "new heavens and new earth" is indeed still future, 2 Pet. 3 : 13; Rev. 21 : 1. Moreover, if we concede that they have been already created, then surely the results of such a new creation should be fully exhibited in the Church. Is it true, however, that the voice of weeping has ceased in her, that the longevity has been realized, that the safety, peace, and happiness predicted has been attained? No! the sad experience of individual believers and of the Church forbids such an appropriation.

But many of our opponents (even Alexander, e.g. Com. Isa., vol. 1, p. 226), as we shall show under Props. 148-151, make numerous concessions which are antagonistic to their own Church-Kingdom theory. Many predictions are appropriated by setting aside the grammatical connection, or by making that which might interfere with the Church theory emblematic and figurative. Thus, to illustrate: few commentators do justice to Acts 15: 13-17. They have much to say about the call of the Gentiles enforced by the passage, but make the restoration of the fallen tabernacle "an emblem (so Barnes, etc.) of the favor of God," etc., violating the order laid down, and substituting a sense not found in the text. To understand the connection of James's reasoning, it is absolutely requisite to notice the covenanted aspect of this Davidic tabernacle (with which the apostles were familiar), the context and text of Amos, and the facts stated by Peter, Paul, and Barnabas, suggesting James's reference. If this is done, then we have: (1) the rejection and overthrow of the Davidic Kingdom; (2) the preservation of some of the nation (in order to make a future restoration possible); (3) a fearful slaughter of the Jews; (4) a call extended to and accepted by the Gentiles to become also God's people; (5) this work of grace, including Jews and Gentiles, then going on; (6) this to be followed by a rebuilding or restoration of the Kingdom, now fallen and in ruins; (7) the result following.

Obs. 8. Many of the predictions are so exalted in their nature, and promise such a continued and ever-abiding blessedness, that it is absurd to predicate them of the Church in this age. Besides this, the identical language, ideas, and blessings are incorporated by John with the crowning period of restitution here on earth, so that it is a violation of all propriety to extend them to any other time of manifestation. The reader will perceive this by comparing, e.g. Isa. 60, with Rev. 21 and 22. Again, a fair interpretation must, as the connection requires, always link such predictions with a future restoration of the elect nation in its favored Theocratic position under the sublime reign of the predicted David's Son. These are inseparable, as the covenant teaches, and these the Prophets always unite.

The student can readily see, by a reference e.g. to Art. "Kingdom of God," in M'Clinck & Strong's Cyclop., how the Church is transmuted into a Kingdom. The process is plainly stated, as drawn from Knobel, "On the Prophets." Thus, when the prophets describe a deliverance from "political calamities," we must attribute "a higher sense," viz.: deliverance from "error and sin;" when they describe a restored people, God again dwelling among them in a restored and perpetuated Theocracy, we must again apply this "higher sense," viz.: it means reconciliation to God, access to Him, union of His people in faith, etc.; when they portray special provision for temporal wants, the blessings of life, civil duties, health, offspring, harvests, etc., the "higher sense" is again applied, viz.: it denotes spiritual good, the graces of the spirit enjoyed, etc.; when they delineate God's people, "supremely blessed in the enjoyment of all earthly pleasures," this "higher sense" elevates the meaning into spiritual pleasures, "eternal life," etc.; when they predict "the re-establishment of their people into a mighty state, which should endure upon the earth in imperishable splendor as an outward community," then the "higher sense" duly applied makes this "a religious invisible community." The student will observe (1) the admissions made that the prophets really predict these things in the plain grammatical sense, but (2) that this must be changed by "a higher and spiritual sense." Alas! what absurdities are engrafted on God's Word by the assumed superior reason of man. According to this principle, the interpretation, the meaning of the Scriptures, is left at the mercy of this assumed "higher sense," which in one is this, and in another that, as fancy, or imagination, or alleged influence of the spirit, or some favorite opinion suggests. In the Art. "Baptists" (Ency. Relig. Knowl.), in the Introd., it is asserted that the visible organized Church is "the Kingdom of God foretold by the prophet Daniel, and announced by John the Baptist as at hand, Dan. 2: 44, Matt. 3: 2." (What a departure from John Bunyan's position.) Dr. Mason (Essays on the Church, No. 1) correctly defines the Church, and then designates it the Kingdom of God, and for the support of such an affirmation quotes such passages as Isa. 66 : 12, Isa. 49 : 23, Isa. 6 : 3, 5, and especially "He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles." Schmucker (Evang. Luth. Cat., p. 66) gives, in order to transform the Church into a Kingdom, Acts 5 : 31. These and other writers do not consider that their representations are utterly opposed by the general analogy of Scripture, as shown ; by the epitomes of history, as given in Matt., chs. 24 and 25 (comp. Mark and Luke), and 2 Thess., ch. 2 ; by such statements as Matt. 9 : 15, Matt. 23 : 39, Luke 17 : 22, Luke 21 : 31, etc. ; by the numerous reasons logically united as already given. The disposition is general to take the whole matter for granted, and then to quote Scripture without the least regard to its connection or order of fulfilment. It is even a sad fact that Apologists (e.g. Row, "Ch. Evidences," Bampton Lectures, 1877, p. 211, etc.), taking for granted as a fact that the Church is the covenanted and predicted Kingdom, present it as evidence why the Scriptures should be received as a Divine Revelation, viz. : through the fulfilment of prophecy exhibited in a matter of fact. Alas ! the fact does not exist ; it is wholly imaginary, as the least comparison between covenant and the Church abundantly proves. Such statements are misleading and injurious to the truth. A strong and reliable argument can be built upon the existence and mission of the Church, without introducing material that weakens the whole structure. A simple statement of the design of the Church and this dispensation has far more weight with infidelity than all the high-flown and exaggerated eulogies so lavishly employed ; for the former is seen to be actually in progress and realized, while the latter exists only in the imagination of the eulogizers, being opposed both by Scriptures and history.

PROPOSITION 105. The Lord's Prayer is indicative of the fact that the Church is not the covenanted Messianic Kingdom.

Jesus, in teaching His disciples to pray for a future, coming Kingdom, undoubtedly taught them to pray for the same Kingdom covenanted, predicted, and which they preached. He certainly desired them to pray understandingly, and, therefore, the views entertained by them respecting the Kingdom remaining uncontradicted to the end (Acts 1 : 6), and which must have inspired the use of the petition, are certainly correct (comp. Props. 37-45, and 54-68).

We call the student's attention to the fact that we have already quoted numerous able opponents, who frankly admit that down at least to the ascension the disciples of Jesus fully entertained the idea of the Kingdom expressed by us. A multitude more might be thus quoted, as evidenced by their enforced and fatal concessions when commenting e.g. on Acts 1 : 6. We refer to this in order to say : Is it reasonable to suppose that Jesus would give His disciples a prayer in behalf of the Kingdom, knowing as He must what construction they would place upon it, unless, if mistaken in their apprehension of it, He would also enlighten them as to its meaning, so that they could offer it up intelligently and with a proper hope? The fact that we do know with what sentiments these preachers of the same Kingdom prayed this prayer—specially instructed, too, as we are told, in private—goes far to sustain our position. If candid, those who oppose us will find this prayer, as understood and used by the disciples, a blow to their excessive spiritualizing of the promises.

Obs. 1. The petition "Thy Kingdom come" (Matt 6 : 10, Luke 11 : 2) cannot appropriately be prayed by one who is already in the Kingdom, for the sentiment expressed looks to futurity. The disciples to whom it was given, and evidently used it, had no idea whatever of the modern notions engrafted on the prayer. They prayed it looking, as we have in detail proven (as many of our opponents frankly admit), for a Kingdom to come visibly in the future, and this Kingdom was the Theocratic-Davidic restored under the Messiah. We may well ask, How could the Divine Master give them a prayer with such a clause in, which, as all the facts show, they—if the modern view is correct—grossly misunderstood, without some explanation? Our line of argument conclusively proves that such an explanation was unnecessary (and hence was not given) because they had the true idea of the Kingdom, when they prayed for the Theocratic Kingdom to come. Jesus, knowing the view of the Kingdom held, by giving this petition in its present form, indorses the disciples' opinion as a correct one. The integrity of the Divine Teacher, and His express assurance that He gave them the mysteries of the Kingdom (Prop. 11), forbid any other position.

There is an exquisite delicacy (which man could not have conceived) in the prayer, "Thy (i.e. the Father's) Kingdom come." The delicacy and propriety arises from Christ's position in the performance of an allotted mission, and in thus avoiding the word "My"

(which, as He and the Father are one, He might truthfully have employed), and in expressing the Theocratic relationship that the Kingdom sustains to the Father, and implying that the Kingdom is given (Prop. 83) by the Father, because of the obedience of Jesus (Prop. 84). Again, foreknowing His ultimate rejection by the nation and the consequent postponement of the Kingdom, the petition is purposely couched in language indefinite as to the time when it should come. Again, the clause annexed to this petition, "Thy will be done on earth," etc., is indicative of the result of this Kingdom coming, as stated by the prophets. But we add: The simple fact is evident that God's will is not verified in the Church, as her checkered history attests, and so long as she remains in her mixed condition, cannot be. The "will" of God respecting the earth is easily read if we but direct the eye of faith either to the past or to the future, as given in the Word; in the past it is reflected before the fall, and in the future, it shines forth in the renewed earth. It is, therefore, readily perceived, and any view that fails to grasp these two marks of the "will" falls immeasurably below the reality. To make it manifested now is to cover it over with the weakness, frailties, passions, etc., of poor humanity, and is to ignore the plainest statements in the predictions (e.g. 2 Thess. 2) relating to the Church.

Obs. 2. The petition "Thy Kingdom come," is a prayer that one distinctive Kingdom should come, not two or more; not that one should be within the other, not that one should be a prelude to the other. The disciples only recognized in the petition one Kingdom; the early Church adopted the same belief, and we see no reason for a change of faith, seeing that the covenanted and predicted Messianic Kingdom, as expressed in the plain grammatical sense, is the one evidently denoted.

It is a matter of surprise that able and eminent men pervert this prayer by making out a variety of Kingdoms prayed for, as e.g. one writer (Bernard) has three Kingdoms petitioned for, viz.: "The Kingdom of Providence, the Kingdom of Grace, the Kingdom of Glory." (Comp. Prop. 3, and observe that all the meanings there noticed are, more or less, incorporated with this prayer.) Others have a visible and an invisible, a present and a future Kingdom in it. Some make it "piety," or "religion," or "God's reign in the heart," or "the spread of Christianity," or "the victorious development of the Christian Church," or "grace," or "power," or "the gospel," etc. Even Pre-Millenarians, forgetful of the logical covenanted meaning that the phrase undoubtedly possesses, while carefully insisting that it necessarily includes the still future Kingdom here on earth after the Sec. Advent, tell us (as e.g. Alford) that it embraces "the fulness of the accomplishment of the Kingdom of God so often spoken of in prophetic Scriptures, and by implication all that process of events which lead to that accomplishment," and so another (Lange) says it means, "the Kingdom of heaven in its spiritual reality, including both time and eternity." Hampered by a Church-Kingdom theory, the interpretation and application must be such that the prayer includes a petition for the Church, bringing out a prayer for Lange's "threefold Kingdom of grace, of power, and of glory." The absurdity of many of these interpretations appears if we but substitute them in the petition for the word "Kingdom," especially when contemplating the disciples as uttering them with their Jewish views. Meyer (Com. loci) is logically and scripturally correct when he asserts that the "Kingdom" simply denotes "the Messianic Kingdom." Dr. Schaff (Lange's Com. loci, Amer. ed.) objects to Meyer's rejecting all ecclesiastical and spiritual meanings attached to the petition, saying that he "forgets that the one for which he contends exclusively, the Messianic Kingdom, does in fact include or imply them all." But this reply to Meyer is suggested by the idea that the Church in some way must be included or implied, which view was certainly not entertained by the disciples and the early Church. Meyer's position is the correct one, historically and scripturally, and this opinion is steadily gaining ground with students. Nast (Com. loci) says that the view that this Kingdom "is not to be applied to the Church of God before the second visible Coming of Christ," "is held by many Evangelical divines of Germany at the present time, and has gained of late also the assent of some of the most learned theologians of England and America." (He adds: "Yet the Pre-Mill. theory has not yet been fully met, and is certainly entitled to far more attention and examination than it generally receives.") Yet Dr. Schaff is correct in so far, that when we pray for the Kingdom to come, the petition includes the preparative work of the Church that it may be hastened, but this preparatory stage is not the Kingdom itself.

Obs. 3. Attention is directed to the fact that critics (like Lightfoot, Schoetgen, Gregory, etc.), indorsed by various commentators, assert that Jesus collected this prayer out of Jewish Eschatologies, and prove the assertion by giving every sentiment expressed in full as drawn from them. If this be allowed, and Jesus did this purposely, it is only another proof of the correctness of our interpretation and application, seeing that Jesus thus, in the highest possible manner, indorses the Jewish views (comp. Props. 40, 44, 47, 20, 21, etc.) of the Kingdom by taking their own expressions, and framing them into a petition to heaven. Every Jew who employed it would, of course, use it in the sense indicated, and it is a mere begging of the question to declare that Jesus placed one sense on it and the Jews quite another; for if this were true, which it is not, it would invalidate the integrity of the Teacher, making Him to conceal the truth and leave His hearers under a wrong impression and in error.

We refer, as illustrative of the Observation, to what Barnes, Com. Matt., p. 83, footnote, says of the usage or language of the Jews, and which "were doubtless familiar in the time of Christ." Thus, he says, that the Rabbins declared, "That prayer in which there is no mention made of the Kingdom of heaven is not a prayer."

Obs. 4. The quite early Church entertained our view of this petition, as is apparent from the Eschatology affirmed by them, seeing that they looked for the speedy Advent, etc. The modern engrafted views were foreign to their simple faith. The extracts that we have already given from them, exhibiting their belief in the covenanted Kingdom, forbids any other view, and so imbedded was this in the Church that even Augustine (Cuming, Lects. on Romanism, p. 207) could not transmute this Kingdom into "the Kingdom of Grace" (as was done by Ambrose and others), but held that it meant "the Kingdom of glory."

Tertullian (De Oratione) makes this prayer to be one for the coming of the Kingdom at the Advent still future, and thus urges this petition to be used: "Wherefore, if the appearing of God's Kingdom belongs to the will of God and to our earnest expectation, how can some pray for a lengthening out of the age, when the Kingdom of God, for which we pray that it may come, tends to the consummation of the age? We wish to reign earlier, and not to serve longer. Even if it were not prescribed in the prayer, about praying for the coming of the Kingdom, we should, of our own accord, offer that petition, hastening to the fruition of our hope. . . . Yes, Lord, let Thy Kingdom come with the utmost speed! The wish of Christians, the confusion of the heathen, the joy of angels, for which we struggle; yea, more, for which we pray." Cyprian and others refer the petition to the Kingdom still future, Cyprian e.g. saying: "That we who first are His subjects in the world may hereafter reign with Christ, when He reigns." The early Church linking, as Paul does, "the appearing and Kingdom" together, virtually made this petition a prayer for the Sec. Advent of Jesus, and the petition of Rev. 22:20 one including the Kingdom. In unity with this early view of the petition the student will find many utterances since the Reformation, e.g. Luther's (Meurer's "Life of," p. 33), Bish. Latimer (Investigator, vol. 1, p. 170), Archb. Cranmer (Brooks's Essays, p. 12), Bish. Newton (Diss. on Prop., p. 587), Baxter (Works, vol. 2, p. 555), Increase Mather (Discourse on Faith), Spaulding (Lectures, p. 123), and hundreds of others for every Pre-Millenarian writer strenuously holds that, if it does embrace more in its meaning, its main, great reference is to this Kingdom on earth after the Sec. Advent."

Obs. 5. The petition "Thy Kingdom come" assumes, by its allusion to futurity, that the Kingdom did not then exist. This forms corroborative proof of the position taken by us in previous Propositions, over against the utterances that it was present when Christ gave the prayer.

We have already presented numerous testimonies respecting the assertion that the Kingdom was already actually in existence. Others, as illustrative, may be added. Prof. Lummis (The Kingdom and the Church) quotes Dr. Warren, Pres. of Boston University, as saying: "The Christian Church is the Kingdom of God on earth viewed in its objective or institutional form. God's Kingdom among men is as old as human history." Beecher (Christian Union, Dec. 29th, 1875) defines the Kingdom to be "a state of mind," or "a Kingdom of character, and not a Kingdom of place or of organization," or "the development of human nature into spiritual manhood," and being thus allied to piety or religious growth, it is something that has always existed. Hence, when we pray "Thy Kingdom come," we only pray for spiritual things, spiritual growth, etc. If Jesus really intended such a meaning to be foisted on the idea of the Kingdom, He certainly used the most extraordinary language by which to convey it, owing to the precise, definite meaning attributed to it by the Jews and disciples.

Obs. 6. The expression "Thy Kingdom come" expresses faith in the realization of the covenant, and the predictions based upon it. What Kingdom is the proper subject of prayer, if not the Theocratic-Davidic? Faith, in its usage, is manifested that God's oath to David will be respected, that it is His determinate purpose to have it restored, and that God will institute the means and arrangements for its recovery. The Theocracy is, as we have proven, God's own Kingdom; He being the Ruler in it, gives force to the "Thy."

John Ruskin, in The Lord's Prayer and The Church (Contemp. Review, repub. in The Library Mag., Jan., 1880), observes: "I believe very few, even of the most earnest, using that petition (viz.: Thy Kingdom come), realize that it is the Father's—not the Son's—Kingdom, that they pray may come, although the whole prayer is fundamental on that fact: 'For Thine is the Kingdom, the power, and the glory.' And I fancy that the mind of the most faithful Christians is quite led astray from its proper hope, by dwelling on the reign—or the Coming again—of Christ; which, indeed, they are to look for and watch for, but not to pray for. Their prayer is to be for the greater Kingdom to which He, risen and having all His enemies under His feet, is to surrender His, 'that God may be All in All.'" Here are quite a number of mistakes, resulting from a total misapprehension of the covenanted Kingdom. 1. The Divine Sovereignty is not the Kingdom. Props. 79 and 80. 2. The Kingdom is both the Father's and the Son's; being Theocratic, Jesus is the representative of God, e.g. Prop. 200. 3. Admitting the doxology (comp. Lange's Com. loci, New Version of New Test, Variorum of New. Test.), the "Thine" refers to this Kingdom being given to David's Son (Prop. 81), and that the fulness of the Godhead sustains it. 4. The oneness of the Father and Son cannot be thus ignored. 5. The perpetuity of Messiah's Kingdom is thus flatly denied (comp. Prop. 159). 6. The ignoring and denial of prayer for the coming and reign of Jesus, in the light, e.g. of Rev. 22 : 20, Tit. 2 : 13, 1 Pet. 4 : 7, etc., is surprising.

Obs. 7. "Thy Kingdom come" embraces the idea of a conspicuous, visible, external coming, so that every one would be cognizant of its coming. The adoption of the Jewish language itself, which included this, is evidence sufficient to inculcate it. But aside from the reasons already assigned, and others that will appear under appropriate headings, it amply subserves our present purpose to say, that the Jewish view (which is eminently Scriptural), that an extraordinary exhibition of the Supernatural would be manifested (as e.g. in the resurrection of the righteous) with the re-establishment of the Kingdom, alone enforces this idea.

The establishment of the Church did not introduce the supernatural results confidently anticipated in the resurrection of the saints, the removal of evil, etc., but while preparatory in its nature and imparting inestimable blessings, it left the righteous still under the curse, oppressed, burdened, chastened, etc. The visible consequences, as delineated by the prophets to be the immediate issue of the restored Theocracy, were all lacking. Hence no coming of a Kingdom was witnessed as covenanted and predicted.

for instead of a visible organized Theocracy, uniting Church and state, all-powerful and all-conquering, the Church exhibited an organization persecuted by the state, sustained by the blood of martyrdom, struggling and fighting to maintain an existence against encroachments from within and without. If we are to follow the teaching of the Word, we must conclude that the Jewish view, held by the disciples, is the correct one, viz. : that so marked are the distinguishing characteristics of the reintroduction of this coming Kingdom under the Messiah that no one can possibly mistake its time of commencement. Now, over against this, observe, as we have largely quoted, the conflicting views of our opponents, who select various beginnings, several of them united, etc. We give another illustration : " An Inquirer," in the Ch. Union, Jan. 16th, 1878, makes the Christian Church to be organized at the time of the Translation. The Editor (evidently recalling how eminent men fixed the same at the birth of Jesus, His baptism, the confession of Peter, His public entry, His death, His resurrection, His ascension, the day of Pentecost, and the destruction of Jerusalem), in reply, says : " It seems to us to be impossible to fix the date of its beginning as it is to fix the hour when the oak tree first begins."

Obs. 8. Prophecy, if the Church is the Kingdom prayed for, should, by way of encouragement, and in answer to faith, show that the prayer is realized in its delineation of events. But the reverse of this is true, as e.g. seen in Dan. 2 and 7. Auferien (The Proph. Daniel) remarked the absence of any portraiture of the Church (and its sham imitation of a Theocracy when Church and State were united under Constantine) when God unfolds the history of the Fourth Monarchy, the Roman world-power excepting only as it suffers under the persecution of earthly Kingdoms. (The same absence is noticeable in the epitomes of Matt. 24, Mark 13, Luke 21, 2 Thess. 2.) Now if our opponents are correct with their theory, it seems reasonable that when an Empire is leavened and transformed into a nominal Christian power by the Church, such a change ought to be recognized, if it is a legitimate answer to such a petition. On the contrary, down to the end " the beast" remains " a beast."

Auferien, thoroughly Chiliastic as he is, and able in his prophetic studies, embarrassed by an existing, invisible Church-Kingdom, explains the omission by saying, that as the prophet only describes " the course of the world-powers, hence the Kingdom of God enters the horizon at that point where it begins to be a real and external power of the world—that is, at the Second Advent of Christ." This explanation, while unsatisfactory to those who hold the visible Church to be a Kingdom, is equally so on any hypothesis that it is a Kingdom, seeing that the distinctive characteristics belonging to a Kingdom are only manifested at the coming of the Son of man, when the fourth beast and his brood are to be destroyed. The existence of such a Kingdom must first be proven, before its omission is thus accounted for in a prophecy. The omission itself, as conceded, decidedly favors our view. We insist that (as Prop. 35) the prophets and covenants describe only one Kingdom : they know absolutely nothing of those additional assigned by human reason, prejudice, and ambition.

Obs. 9. This petition must be, if Scripture is to give in its whole testimony, viewed in the light of the postponement of the Kingdom (comp. Props. 58, 66, 67, etc.). The simple fact that the Kingdom believed in by the disciples, and for which they prayed when using this phrase (and for which Jesus gave it to them), was postponed to the Second Advent, forbids our incorporating with or substituting for it any other Kingdom, alleged to be visible or invisible. If we do this, we take an unwarranted liberty with the same.

In addition to our reasons previously assigned in detail for the postponement of the Kingdom, the attention of the advanced student is directed to an exceedingly interesting Scripture, which, if we are to take the general analogy, teaches the postponement, and shows us how to understand this petition. We refer to Dan. 9 : 26, to the clause " shall Messiah be cut off, but not for Himself." It is admitted by able commentators that the rendering "but not for Himself" was adopted (so Barnes, etc.) "from the common view of the atonement—that the Messiah did not die for Himself, but that His life was given as a ransom for others." Barnes, however, asserts that the marginal reading is the correct rendering: "And shall have nothing." So Hengstenberg insists upon translating, "and is not to him," i.e. "there was nothing to him," that is, the authority, dominion over the covenanted people would cease. Tregelles' rendering is, "and there shall be nothing to Him," i.e. no Kingdom. He says (On Dan., p. 102) that the common application to Christ's sacrifice must be rejected as "placing a most true and important doctrine upon an insufficient basis," and adds: "I believe that the words simply imply 'and there shall be nothing for Him;' He will be rejected, and His earthly Kingdom will be a thing on which He will not enter." Now this position is amply sustained by the facts in the history and the declarations of Jesus, viz.: that when thus cut off, rejected and crucified, He did not establish a Kingdom, but it was postponed to the Second Advent, when, according to promise, He will come again and erect it. This reference to not having, as Messiah, a Kingdom by the expressive "nothing" (comp. Barnes, Lange, etc.), should certainly prevent us from attributing to Him, in this direction, something of a Messianic Kingdom. The unity of the Word forbids it, for as e.g. in the parable of the nobleman, the Kingdom is distant and the position of the servants in this dispensation is assigned. Even the admissions of our opponents strengthen our position, as e.g. Dr. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming, ch. 3), quoting Dr. Urwick, and conceding that Luke 19 : 11-27, Matt. 25 : 19, shows that the Kingdom to be set up was to be long delayed.

Obs. 10. Eminent divines take this petition, and in dedication and missionary sermons, employ it to denote the present existing Church, and vigorously and eloquently exhort their hearers or readers to help, by special labor and efforts, to make the Kingdom come. That which is the special work of the Lord Jesus (Prop. 129, etc.), under the Divine bestowment of the Father (Prop. 83), men, by a perversion and misapprehension, undertake to perform themselves (Prop. 175).

This widespread notion is found in thousands of published works and appeals. Simply to illustrate: The official oath required of ministers in Prussia, established in 1815 and renewed in 1835, was one in which they swear that they will "extend in my congregation the Kingdom of God and of my Lord and Master Jesus Christ." They may have succeeded, by God's grace, in urging piety, spiritual growth, etc., upon some, but as to a Kingdom, judging from the history of the Church in Prussia and the bitter struggles since then, no trace of one can be found. Waldegrave (New Test. Millenarianism, Sec. 2) assumes the Church to be the veritable Kingdom of Christ, and referring to the usual passages adduced in its behalf (which we shall notice), declares very emphatically, that, whatever this Kingdom is, our Lord taught that it was gradually and widely to extend its bounds by the preaching of the gospel (but fails to give one passage which asserts this idea, he transforming "the gospel of the Kingdom" into the Kingdom itself), and then triumphantly adds: "Is it possible that, after all, Christ did not intend His people to recognize in that Kingdom, when it should be set up, the very Kingdom of the Messiah? Is it possible that, after all, that Kingdom was not to come for eighteen centuries, at least?" The only reply that need now be given is this: Can Waldegrave point out the time when the Church first recognized herself to be the Messianic Kingdom? If so easily recognizable, why do he, and others who believe with him, make so many different Kingdoms, and differ so materially as to the beginnings? Why did the early Church employ this petition in the Lord's Prayer, without the least idea of the Messianic Kingdom having come, and why do they locate it at the Sec. Coming of Jesus? What are we to do with the Scriptures that expressly teach a postponement? Such questions can be multiplied, all of which he, however, completely ignores, complacently satisfied with the merest inferences drawn from Christ's present exaltation, the Divine Sovereignty, etc. Such affirmations like these are abundantly supported by assertions, but direct Scriptural proof is lacking in every one of them.

Obs. 11. "Thy Kingdom come" is the prayer of those who are "heirs," for they have an interest in it. It is the prayer of those who are called," and the usage of this petition indicates an appreciation of their "high calling." It is a prayer designed to stimulate faith and hope, to wean from the world, to qualify us for a future "abundant entrance." It is a prayer which honors the Father who bestows it, honors the Christ who receives its glory, and honors the Holy Spirit, whose wonder-working power will be exerted in its behalf. It is a prayer that fell from the lips and heart of David's Son, expressive of His own desire, and it has encouraged, consoled, and strengthened the hearts and lives of multitudes of believers. To appreciate it properly, we must study its distinctive meaning, denoting as it does a well-defined ("Thy") Kingdom, which the Father has promised most solemnly under oath, and which David's Son receives from the Ancient of Days at the allotted period—a Kingdom bringing completed Redemption and the most precious blessings.

We only add: The Kingdom that we pray for is not one that shall fall terribly oppressed under the Antichrist; it is not one whose members shed their blood in behalf of the truth, reaping the vengeance of earthly powers, but it is a Kingdom which the Word, truthful and consistent, always represents as exalting its rulers in honor and glory, and in extending peace and happiness to its subjects. To this divine portraiture we cling; for it we long and pray. In reference to the ardent praying and longing for this Kingdom, compare e.g. Olshausen, Com. loci., Nast, Com. loci., Alford, etc. Nast remarks: "According to Olshausen the one leading idea is the ardent longing after the Kingdom of God, which constitutes the burden of all the prayers of God's children." But, it may be added, we should pray intelligently as the disciples—to whom the prayer was given and who preached this Kingdom—prayed. Much prayer in this direction is confused, and mingled with human opinions. In sadness, too, we must say that multitudes, if they really apprehended that the coming of this Kingdom is inseparably linked with the Sec. Advent, and that to pray for the one is really to pray for the other, would feel no interest in the prayer—yea, would dread its use—although identified with "the blessed hope" and perfected redemption. So long as they can apply it to the Church, or to the third heaven, or to a very distant future, they can employ it, but to give it the ancient Chiliaistic interpretation and application, although amply supported by the analogy of the Word, is beyond their personal desires, for the speedy coming of the Messiah, although it be "unto salvation," is unwelcome or visionary to them.

Obs. 12. Pre-Millenarians are a unit in the application of this petition to a future Messianic Kingdom at the Sec. Advent. Some, indeed, as we have pointed out, being under the influence, more or less, of the prevailing views respecting the Church-Kingdom theory, think that the Church is also embraced in the petition (which we deem illogical and inferential), but such an application is expressly affirmed to be secondary or a lower sense. And it must, moreover, be borne in mind that even then, not one of these contends that the Church is, in any sense, the covenanted and predicted Messianic Kingdom. They unite in regarding it as simply preparatory to the Kingdom of covenant and of Dan. 2, 7, etc., which is to be manifested at the Second Coming of Jesus. Therefore all Pre-Millenarians unite in regarding the petition as embracing that still future Kingdom.

We thus again call attention to this uniformity of belief, as some of our opponents have called it into question, as if we prayed, longed, and hoped for different Kingdoms at different times. Thus e.g. Dr. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming, ch. 7) professes himself to have gotten "entangled and nearly despairing," at the variance and confusion of Pre-Millenarians respecting "the period and the nature" of Christ's Kingdom. This is hardly complimentary to himself, seeing that they are easily classified: (1) Those who make the Church simply preparatory, and have the Theocratic Kingdom restored at the Sec. Advent. (2) Those who make the Church an initiatory Kingdom, but locate the proper covenanted, outward Kingdom at the Sec. Advent. (3) Both of these locate the cove-nanted and predicted Messianic Kingdom at the Sec. Coming of Jesus—some correctly extending it beyond the one thousand years, others limiting it to the Mill. period. (4) As to details, a diversity exists, as is natural on such a subject (mainly arising from interpreters being still influenced by some of Dr. Brown's principles), but the points of union are clear and distinctive : (a) the covenanted Kingdom is at the Sec. Advent ; (b) this Kingdom is Theocratic in its nature ; (c) this Kingdom is visibly under the rulership of Jesus and the saints (some making the visibility of the rulers constant, others occasional) ; (d) the Church is only provisional ; (e) this Kingdom introduces the promised blessings, restitution, etc. Dr. Brown increases the supposed diversity by quoting persons who are strictly Pre-Millenarian, agreeing with us only in a few points. Now one should suppose that Dr. Brown's side must have perfect unanimity, seeing that he employs such a course of reasoning against us, which, if it proves anything, only shows that men, on important subjects, make mistakes. Instead of going to the numerous meanings, beginnings, etc., given to the Kingdom by others of our opponents (with whom Dr. Brown agrees), we will but briefly refer to Dr. Brown's own statements respecting the Kingdom to exhibit the wonderful unity of doctrine that his system presents, and this is the more satisfactory since it comes from the alleged champion against us, and forms, from his own writings, a strong answer to his charge of variance and confusion. On p. 106 of "Christ's Sec. Coming" he quotes the commission (Matt. 28 : 18-20) which is designed "to establish His (Christ's) Kingdom upon earth ;" on p. 130 he maintains that Christ's Kingdom was "in being before His ascension," but, on p. 136, was "formally recognized" and newly commenced at His ascension (for p. 138, etc., he asserts that Jesus is on David's throne in the third heaven, and p. 136, this is "a Kingdom of salvation or grace," preached by the apostles, and denoted by "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of heaven is at hand"). In his Com. on Matt. 4 : 17, he informs us, "Our Lord sometimes speaks of the new Kingdom as already come—in His person and ministry ; but the economy of it was only 'at hand,' until the blood of the cross was shed and the spirit on the day of Pentecost opened the fountain for sin and for uncleanness to the world at large." Com. Matt. on the petition, "Thy Kingdom come," he remarks, that this Kingdom is "a moral and spiritual Kingdom, which the God of grace is setting up in this fallen world, whose subjects consist of as many as have been brought into hearty subjection to His gracious sceptre, and of which His Son Jesus is the glorious Head. In its inward reality of it, this Kingdom has existed ever since there were men who 'walked with God,' etc. "When Messiah Himself appeared, it was, as a visible Kingdom, 'at hand.'" "On the day of Pentecost was a 'glorious coming' of this Kingdom," i.e. of this visible. Com. Matt. 21 : 43, "the Kingdom of God—God's visible Kingdom, or Church upon earth." Com. Rom. 14 : 17, the Kingdom of God is "Religion." This is a fair specimen of that system which he adopts as so clear and self-evident, built, as the student can see, upon a total perversion of covenant language and prediction. While guarding himself from many of the absurd meanings engrafted by Barnes and others, on the Kingdom, a sufficiency remains to show that the plain grammatical sense of covenant and prophecy must be completely set aside before such a belief can be entertained. Alas ! how such men of ability lead the Church into blindness and unbelief.

We turn from such an interpretation of the Lord's Prayer to those given by Pre-Millenarians with thankfulness, as evidence that the early faith is expressed in hope. Bh. Newton (Diss. on Prop., p. 587) observes : "In the general, that there shall be such a happy period as the Millennium ; that 'the Kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the Kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High' (Dan. 7 : 27) ; that Christ shall have 'the heathen for His inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for His possession (Ps. 2 : 8) ; that 'the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea' (Isa. 11 : 9) ; 'that the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, and all Israel shall be saved' (Rom. 11 : 25-26) ; in a word, that the Kingdom of heaven shall be established upon earth, is the plain and express doctrine of Daniel and all the prophets, as well as of St. John ; and we daily pray for the accomplishment of it, in praying 'Thy Kingdom Come.'" Hon. Gerard T. Noel (Perspectives of the Church of Christ, p. 10) says : "It may confirm the view here given of the future (Pre-Millennial), to inquire into the nature of that felicity which our Lord Himself has taught us in our prayers to expect. It would be natural to suppose, that in the selection of blessings which He condescended to make the subject of our prayers to God, the consummation of His own work of mercy would find a marked place. The supposition is consistent with fact. He has concentrated a prayer for the completion of His own work, in the two remarkable expressions : 'Thy Kingdom come,' 'they will be done on earth as in heaven.' Can we refuse to admit that our Lord here bounds our view to this scene on earth? In heaven, that is, in the other regions of the universe of God, His will is already done; but here we are surrounded with a scene of rebellion, anarchy, and sorrow. Does He then teach us to pray for a translation from this unquiet land to another and distant orb? He puts no such request within our lips; He directs us to pray for the establishment of His Kingdom, and this Kingdom appears to belong exclusively to this material earth. 'Thy will be done in earth, as in heaven.' Is not the inference twofold: first, that the earth is the theatre of His Kingdom; and secondly, that conformity to His will is the absolute enjoyment of heaven? and that no loftier supplication can be associated with our thoughts than that the hallowed sceptre should be replaced in human hands, even in the hands of the mighty Antitype, 'the second Adam, the Lord from heaven.' Such testimonies could be reproduced from many able and eminent Chiliasts, and eloquently expressed (as e.g. by Bonar, Seiss, Bickersteth, Brooks, etc.). In addition to this, we might readily bring forth a mass of evidence to show that many writers of ability, cannot, and do not, limit this petition to the church as now constituted, but refer it to the future, after the Second Advent. Thus e.g. Barter (Saint's Everlasting Rest, p. 438), in the peroration of his work, after expressing his most fervid desires for the speedy coming of Jesus and the resurrection of believers bursts forth: 'Return, O Lord, how long? O let Thy Kingdom come.' Thy desolate 'bride saith, Come!' for Thy Spirit within her saith, Come; and teacheth her thus to 'pray with groanings, which cannot be uttered; yea, 'the whole creation saith, Come, waiting to be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God.'" We conclude with the utterance of one of the Reformers. Archb. Cranmer wrote (so Burnet's His. vol. 3, B. 4), the Catechism drawn up by the English Prelates, and authorized by Edward VI. in 1553, and the following question and answer will be of interest, as indicative of the views then entertained. "Q. How is that petition, Thy Kingdom come, to be understood?"

"Ans. We ask that His Kingdom may come, for that as yet we see not all things subject to Christ: we see not yet how the Stone is cut out of the mountain without human help, which breaks into pieces and reduceth to nothing the image described by Daniel; or, how the only rock, which is Christ, doth possess and obtain the empire of the whole world given Him of the Father. As yet Antichrist is not slain; whence it is that we desire and pray that at length it may come to pass and be fulfilled; and that Christ alone may reign with His saints, according to the divine promises; and that He may live and have dominion in the world, according to the decrees of the holy Gospel, and not according to the traditions and laws of men, and the wills of the tyrants of the world."

PROPOSITION 106. Our doctrine of the Kingdom sustained by the temptation of Christ.

The Church-Kingdom view endeavors to sustain itself by referring to the temptation of Jesus, informing us that He was tempted by Satan "to adopt the worldly idea of Messiah's Kingdom," i.e. to receive just such a literal Kingdom as covenant and prophecy describe, but which we are to discard, as it is alleged Jesus did, as "sinful," and substitute a "spiritual Kingdom."

Obs. 1. This, however, is far from being sober, sound exegesis, being wrongfully inferred. The Kingdom offered to Jesus, as our opponents admit when they explain Rev. 11 : 15 or Dan. 7 : 14, 27, etc., is, taking their own explanations (as we have already seen), the very Kingdom and world-dominion tendered by Satan. And in this consists the force of the temptation : the first temptation is based on the actual existence of hunger and of real power lodged in the Christ ; the second on the protection promised to servants of God and God's ability to protect ; and so the third is also based on facts, viz. : the promised Kingship of the Messiah on David's throne and Kingdom, and the consequent attainment of Supreme Rulership over the world. Each temptation depends upon the reality of the thing proposed, and hence none of the things around which it entwines for support are to be removed, but only the manner of presentation and the design intended by the tempter are to be controverted. (For temptation, see Matt. 4 : 1-11 ; Luke 4 : 1-13 ; Mark 1 : 12, 13.)

Obs. 2. Hence, it is inconsistent to withdraw that from the temptation, which these same writers in their comments on Rev. 11 : 15 admit will ultimately be realized, viz. : "a real world-dominion." The far-fetched and one-sided comments of some who find in the third temptation "a negation of all the Chiliastic schemes of the synagogue" are refuted (1) by the third temptation, having no point or force if it had not, like the others, been based on the promises of God in that direction, and (2) by Jesus not denying that this honor would indeed be His, but, as in other cases, emphatically objecting to the manner in which it was to be obtained.

Uhlman (The Sinlessness of Jesus) has well observed that Jesus was tempted both as man and as the Messiah. Two of the temptations appeal to Jesus "if He be the Son of God," but one significantly omits this phrase, thus tacitly assuming the covenanted Messiahship to David's Son—"the Son of man." A friend, Rev. Rowe, suggests that as there is a declaration of "being forty days tempted of the devil," we may have, in the narrative, only the more salient or significant temptations selected and reproduced.

Obs. 3. So unguardedly do able men express themselves on this subject that we find Neander (Life of Christ, ch. 2 s. 27) declaring, "He regarded the establishment of a worldly Kingdom as inseparable from the worship of the devil ;” and argues from this that Christ’s yielding to the establishment of such a Kingdom would have been “sinful.” It is admitted that the manner suggested by the devil would have been sinful, and to this Christ properly objected, but Neander travels beyond the record and confounds things that are different when he asserts that the possession of “all the Kingdoms of this world” would have been in itself sinful. If this is necessarily sinful, then the promises which bespeak this very thing are sinful ; then the Kingdom under the Theocracy uniting State and Church, then the literal language of the prophecies which describe it, then the visible outward world-dominion embracing in its rule all earthly Kingdoms, as Neander advocates in his Ch. His., etc.—all these too are sinful. It is true, that under the Messiah’s reign such earthly Kingdoms would undergo a change to fit them for that delightful union of Theocratic union of Church and State, but the very tender of the devil is such that nothing is reserved of them, but given for any purpose or transformation that might, suit the Saviour. Therefore we firmly and consistently abide by the record which teaches that Christ rejected the worship of Satan by which the tender was bound, and not that He refused because He would not have “a world-dominion” here on the earth. Besides this, as we have seen, Prop. 83–9, the Kingdom is given to the Son by the Father, and the acceptance of the offer of Satan would have been a direct insult to the Father.

Out of a multitude of assertions that Satan presented the Jewish and covenanted idea of the Messiahship, which tempted Jesus, and which He rejected owing to its “falseness and carnality,” we give the following illustrations : Shenkel (Hurst’s Life and Lit., p. 122) says : “He was tempted to believe that the Messianic Kingdom was merely to take the prophecies of the Old Test. in their literal signification. The Jews were full of the Old Test. Messianic idea, and Christ was inwardly tempted to accord with it. His whole triumph over these inward stirrings was His great preparatory work for the accomplishment of His design.” Alas ! what a Saviour this presents ! Woolsey (The Relig. of the Present and of the Future, p. 35, remarks of the temptation : “It was an endeavor to divert Jesus from the aim of setting up a spiritual Kingdom, and to induce Him to establish such an one as His countrymen were wishing for and expecting.” (Why, then, e.g. leave the preachers of the Kingdom—if thus spiritual—in ignorance down to His ascension, Acts 1 : 6 ?) Woolsey (p. 29, etc.) correctly lays stress on the point that the temptation was specially intended “for Jesus in His official station as the Messiah,” but he utterly misapprehends the meaning of Messiahship when he says that it was designed to test Him “whether He would remain true to the spiritual idea of the Messiah.” The temptation is accounted for from Woolsey’s standpoint, viz. : that the official title and office is wholly spiritual, a position which cannot be proven from covenant, prophecy, or promise. Much is written on this point irrelevant, imaginary, and derogatory of covenant and prophecy.

Obs. 4. The temptation would have failed in cogency and adherence, if such power had not, in some way, been the object or design of Christ’s mission. It was derived from the covenant itself, and its allied predictions, and promises of supreme authority and acknowledged Rulership over the earth. It pertained to the humanity of Christ, and not merely to His divine nature : to the former was the rulership covenanted, the former was tempted and tried, and the former came forth out of the temptation pure and sinless, just such a King as the predicted Theocratic Kingdom restored needs in order to secure the solidity, stability, etc. connected with it. Even such writers as the author of Eccle Homo, who endeavor to make the temptation of Jesus a mental operation, still insist that the Saviour must have had in view the Messianic predictions which represented the Messiah enthroned in Jerusalem on David's throne, swaying the world in triumph and glory. If the foundation of the temptation be sought in the promises of the Word of God, then we find it firmly laid. Satan did not mistake in the Messiah's power of making bread, of His being under the special providence of the Almighty, and thus he made no blunder concerning the authority to be vested in Him. Satan's mistake was in not fully apprehending that this Kingdom, owing to the unrepentant state of Jews and for gracious purposes of mercy, was to be postponed for a definite period, and that when the time arrived it was to be given to David's Son by God Himself, and could not, in the nature of the case, be obtained by an act of worship to himself. The temptation does not vitiate the power of creating, the Divine oversight and protection of God, and the final subjection of "all the Kingdoms of the world" to Christ.

As this temptation is unjustly urged against us, men forgetting that Jesus, while rejecting the manner of Satan's proposals, did not deny either the miraculous power, the tender of Divine protection, or the ultimate world-dominion belonging to Himself—it may be well to add a few words. Kurtz (Sac. His., s. 130) remarks: "The three forms of his temptation were governed by one design—to induce Him to adopt the carnal Messianic expectations of the Jews; these converted the Kingdom of God into a Kingdom of the world." Neander (Life of Christ, ch. 1, s. 45), on the third temptation, says: "We consider it as involving the two following points, which must be taken together, viz.: (1) the establishment of Messiah's dominion as an outward Kingdom, with worldly splendors; and (2) the worship of Satan in connection with it, which, though not fully expressed, is implied in the act which he demands, and which Christ treats as equivalent to worshipping him." Such interpretations abound, all admitting that a visible Kingdom with the Messiah as King was embraced in it, but all, with few exceptions, declare that the temptation was based on a mistaken notion. They—overlooking their own concessions of a future visible Kingdom—gravely tell us that the Jews were mistaken in their interpretation of the covenant and prophets, and that Satan also likewise misapprehended the Scriptures, for no such outward Kingdom was designed for the Messiah. But this is a wrong inference, founded on the supposition that Satan proposed something which could not be realized, and which did not appertain to the Messiah. In the first temptation Jesus does not deny that He is hungry and able to make bread; in the second, He does not deny that He is the Son of God, and under special protection; and in the third, He does not deny the Kingdom or dominion which is to be given to Him, but only rejects the mode by which it is to be obtained. As observed, if such a Kingdom is not covenanted, predicted, and intended, the temptation would not have any force. Therefore, it is mere assumption to say, that the temptation is intended to teach that the Kingdom of Christ would not be visibly established here on the earth, and that the invisible Church is to be substituted for such a Kingdom. The exact reverse is the truth. Satan's temptation embraced a condition that was derogatory to God's honor; it embraced a right in bestowal which only belongs to God; and it overlooked the time and manner when the predicted Theocracy should be restored.

Obs. 5. In this connection, the conjecture of Eccs Homo is very derogatory to the character of Jesus. The supposition that Christ was tempted to employ force in the establishment of the Kingdom, and that this is the key to the whole matter, is utterly unfounded, and, notwithstanding the faint praise and professed laudation of Christ, stabs vitally. Is it true that the Messiah was so influenced by the prophecies that He was Himself tempted to grasp the Kingdom by violence, but milder thoughts prevailed; what, then, becomes of the character attributed to Him, and which He justly claimed? The theory is unworthy of Christ, and borders on the blasphemous; it destroys the clear conception of His mission and removes His oneness with the Father. The theory is broached under the idea that, mistaken in one Kingdom, an outward dominion, as the prophets predict, another, inner and spiritual, is substituted. Proposition after Proposition, in reference to preaching, covenant, postponement of Kingdom, etc., refutes such a notion so unworthy of Jesus.

The conjectures, that it is mythical, added afterward to exalt the character of Jesus; that He was tempted perhaps by one of the Sanhedrim to entrap him; that it was merely suggested to Him, or a dream, are not worthy of a reply, because we see ample reason for this temptation as a test or trial of One who was to occupy the covenanted Davidic Sonship and the Second Adamic position. It vindicated His complete fitness for the Theocratic glory—being One who was in perfect union with the Father.

Obs. 6. The reality of the world's possession by Satan is claimed by him: "All this power will I give Thee, and the glory of them; for that is delivered unto me: and to whomsoever I will, I give it" (Luke 4: 6). This reality is abundantly sustained by the titles given to him, "the Prince of this world," "the god of this age." He endeavors to assume the lordship and dominion forfeited by Adam, and how he succeeds is vividly portrayed in the Apocalypse, etc., especially exhibited just before the open revelation of Jesus, in the person and confederation of the Antichrist. Therefore it is that Revelation represents Satan as bound, so that the Sovereignty of this world is securely in the hands of the once tempted Jesus.

Jesus, to whom "all power is given," now leaves Satan, "Prince of this world," but will, as promised, eventually "take to Himself His great power and reign." The reason for this delay is involved in the merciful provision made to gather out a people who, like the Master, shall be made perfect under temptation and trial. We refer to this under several Propositions.

Obs. 7. Ebrard on the temptation of Jesus (Gospel His., p. 207) remarks: "But when Satan offers the whole world to Jesus, he reminds Him of the power which he exercises over this world of sinners. The promise which he makes, if He will but worship him, involves, therefore, the tacit threat, that he will let loose the whole terrible force of sin to resist His progress, if this proskunesis is refused. This threat on the one hand, and on the other the possibility of ruling over the whole of this glorious earth in carnal security and ease, were calculated to render the choice so difficult, that only one in whom the fulness of absolute holiness put forth fresh energy from moment to moment, could have been in a condition to resist the temptation." How soon, terribly, and extendedly the powers of sin were let loose, history, in the person of Jesus and the progress of the Church, painfully attests. But this threat, tacitly implied, culminates in the final great struggle, when all the forces of Satan are marshalled against Jesus and His army, to prevent Him, if possible, from securing this world-wide dominion (comp. Props. 161, 162, 163).

Krummacher, in a sermon (quoted by Nast, Com. Matt. 4: 1-11), remarks that Satan "makes with his offer the covert insinuation that, by virtue of his dominion in heathendom, he has the power to turn the whole world against Jesus if He rejects the proposal." Many writers declare that this was a falsehood of Satan's—an assumption of power beyond his ability. Fully admitting and joyfully receiving the fact that Jesus eventually, because of His resistance of temptation and obedience, becomes the victor, yet Satan is truthful also in this claim of power as frequently partially manifested in the past, and ultimately completely exhibited in the culminated Antichrist with the kings of the earth and their armies, prostrating the Church in dire persecution, and arraying themselves against Jesus (comp. Props. enumerated, and likewise 164, 165, 115).

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

CATALOGUE OF

FUNK & WAGNALLS'

Publications.

---

Young's Analytical Bible Concordance.

On an entirely new plan. Containing every word in Alphabetical Order, arranged under its Hebrew or Greek original, with the Literal meaning of Each, and its Pronunciation. Exhibiting about 311,000 References, marking 30,000 various readings in the New Testament. With the latest information on Biblical Geography and Antiquities. Designed for the simplest reader of the English Bible. By ROBERT YOUNG, LL.D., author of "A New Literal Translation of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures," etc., etc. Fourth Revised, Authorized Edition. Printed on heavy paper. One large volume, 4to, cloth $5.00; sheep $6.00; Fr. im. morocco, $7.00; half morocco, $9.00. full morocco, $12.00. Every copy of this, the authorized and correct, edition has on the title-page "Authorized Edition," and at the bottom of the page our imprint.

Analytical Bible Treasury.

Designed for the use of Teachers and Divinity Students. By ROBERT YOUNG, LL.D., author of the Analytical Concordance, etc., 4to, cloth, $2.00. CONTENTS: (1) Analytical Survey of all the Books, (2) Of all the Facts, (3) Of all the Idioms of the Bible. (4) Bible Themes, Questions, Canonicity, Rationalism, etc. (5) A complete Hebrew and English Lexicon to the Old Testament. (9) Idiomatic use of the Hebrew and Greek Tenses. (7) A complete Greek and English Lexicon to the New Testament.

Concordance to the Revised New Testament.

An Analytical Concordance to Eight Thousand Changes of the Revised New Testament. By ROBERT YOUNG, D.D., LL.D. author of Young's Concordance to the Bible, etc. 8vo, 25 pp., price 40 cents. 12mo, 72 pp., price, paper, 40 cents.

Apostolic Life.

Apostolic Life as revealed in the Acts of the Apostles, from the Ascension of Christ to the Withdrawal of Peter. By JOSEPH PARKER, D.D. Author of "Ecce Deus," "Inner Life of Christ," etc. 8vo, cloth. Price, $1.50.

---

NOTE—The above works will be sent, post paid, on receipt of price.

Biblical Lights and Side Lights; or,

Ten Thousand Biblical Illustrations, with Thirty Thousand Cross References, consisting of Facts, Incidents, and Remarkable Statements for the use of Public Speakers and Teachers; and also for those in every kind of Profession, who for illustrative purposes desire ready access to the numerous and interesting narratives contained in the Bible. By REV. CHARLES E. LITTLE. 8vo, cloth. Price, $4.00.

Biblical Notes and Queries.

A general medium of communication regarding Biblical Criticism and Biblical Interpretation, Ecclesiastical History, Antiquities, Biography and Theological Science, Reviews, etc. It answers thousands of questions constantly presented to the minds of clergymen and Sunday-school teachers. By ROBERT YOUNG, LL.D., author of the Analytical Concordance to the Bible. Royal 8vo, cloth, 400 pp. Price, $1.75.

Bible Work; or,

Bible Readers' Commentary on the New Testament. The text arranged in Sections; with Readings and Comments selected from the Choicest, most Illuminating and Helpful Thought of the Christian Centuries. In two volumes. Vol. I. The Fourfold Gospel. Vol. II. The Acts, Epistles and Revelation. With Maps, Illustrations and Diagrams. By J. GLENTWORTH BUTLER, D.D. Royal 8vo, cloth, 800 pp., per vol., $5.00; sheep, $6.00; half morocco, $7.50; full morocco, gilt, $10.00.

Blood of Jesus.

By Rev. WM. REID, M.A. With an Introduction by Rev. E. P. HAMMOND. Paper, 10 cents; cloth, 40 cents.

Burial of the Dead.

A Pastor's Complete Hand-Book for Funeral Services and for the Consolation and Comfort of the Afflicted. By Rev. GEORGE DUFFIELD, D.D., and Rev. SAMUEL W. DUFFIELD. Entirely practical, wholly unsectarian, and far in advance of all other Manuals of the kind. Cloth, 75 cents; limp leather, $1.00. Arranged for ease of reference, in four parts: I. Scriptural Forms of Funeral Service. II. An exhaustive Biblical Study on the subject of Death. III. A short treatise on the Funeral itself, as it is found in the Bible. IV. Texts, Topics and Hints for Funeral Sermons and Addresses.

Christian Sociology.

By J. H. W. STUCKENBERG, D.D., Professor in the Theological Department of Wittenberg College. A new book in a fresh field. Exceedingly suggestive and practical. 12mo, cloth, 382 pp., $1.00.

---

☞ The above works will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Commentary on Exodus.

A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Exodus, with a new translation by JAMES G. MURPHY, D.D. New Unabridged Edition, with Preface and Notes by John Hall, D.D. 2 vols., paper, 233 pp., $1.00; 1 vol., cloth, $1.50.

Commentary on Mark.

Studies in the Book of Mark, for Teachers, Pastors and Parents. By Rev. D. C. HUGHES. Critical, Exegetical, and Homiletical. 8vo, cloth, $1.50.

Commentary on Luke.

A Commentary on the Gospel of St. Luke. By F. GODET, D.D., Professor of Theology, Neufchatel. Translated from the Second French Edition. With Preface and Notes by John Hall, D.D. New Edition, printed on heavy paper. 2 vols., 8vo, 584 pp. paper, $2.00; 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, $2.50.

Commentary on Luke.

A Suggestive Commentary on Luke, with Critical and Homiletical Notes. By W. H. VAN LOREN, D.D. Edited by Prof. James Kernahan: London. 4 vols., 8vo, 1104 pp., paper $3.00; 2 vols., 8vo, cloth, $3.75.

Commentary on Acts.

A Critical and Exegetical Hand-book to the Acts of the Apostles. By HEINRICH A. W. MEYER, Th.D. With Preface, Index, and Supplementary Notes to the American Edition. By William Ormiston, D.D., LL.D. 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, $3.00.

An American Edition of Meyer's valuable, critical and exegetical commentaries by HEINRICH A. W. MEYER, with Preface, Notes and Introduction, by several eminent American scholars, will be issued during the year at the very low price of $3.00 per volume. Uniform with Meyer's Commentary on Acts.

Commentary on Romans. (Meyer's)

Edited by TIMOTHY DWIGHT, LL.D., of Yale. (Ready.)

Commentary on I. and II. Corinthians. (Meyer's)

Edited by TALBOT W. CHAMBERS, D.D., New York. (In Press.)

Commentary on St. John. (Meyer's.)

Edited by Prof. A. C. KENDRICK, D.D., Rochester. (In Press.)

Commentary on St. Matthew. (Meyer's.)

Edited by GEO. R. CROOKS, D.D., Drew Seminary. (In Press.)

Commentary on Mark and Luke. (Meyer's.)
Edited by M. B. RIDDLE, Rochester. (In Press.)

Commentary on Galatians, Ephesians and Philemon. (Meyer's.)
Edited by . (In Press.)

Commentary on Romans.

Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans. By F. GODET, D.D., Professor of Theology, Neuchatel. Translated from the French by Rev. A. Cusin, M.A., Edinburgh. The Translation Revised and Edited, with an Introduction and Appendix by TALBOT W. CHAMBERS, D.D. 1 vol., 8vo, 544 pp., cloth, $3.00. Uniform with Meyer's Commentary on Acts.

Commentary on the Catholic Epistles.

Commentary on the Catholic Epistles. By JOHN T. DEMAREST, D.D. A thorough work. 8vo, 650 pp., $2.00.

Godet on John.

An entirely new American Edition, translated de novo, and edited by TIMOTHY DWIGHT, LL.D., will appear in a few weeks. Those who purchased Godet on Luke and Romans need no commendation on this work. 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, $3.00.

Companion to the Revised New Testament.

Explaining the reason for the changes made on the Authorized Version. By ALEX. ROBERTS, D.D., member of the English Revision Committee, with Supplement by a member of the American Committee. Also, a full Textual Index. Authorized Edition. 8vo, 117 pp., paper, 25 cents; 16mo, 213 pp., cloth, 75 cents.

Companion to the Revised New Testament.

Contributions to a New Revision; or, a Critical Companion to the New Testament. By ROBERT YOUNG, D.D., LL.D. 12mo, 392 pp., cloth, 75 cents.

* * One-half of each page is left blank for notes. Prominent words in the text are numbered.

Compend of Baptism.

The cream of the literature on the Baptism Controversy. Its aim is, by brief but exhaustive exegesis, to elucidate and establish the fact clearly that affusion is at least as classical and scriptural a mode of Baptism as immersion, and that infants are entitled to it as their biblical right. By WILLIAM HAMILTON, D.D. 12mo, 390 pp., cloth, price, 75 cents.

Complete Preacher.

A Sermonic Magazine. Containing nearly one hundred sermons in full, by many of the greatest preachers in this and other countries in the various denominations. 3 vols., 8vo, cloth, each $1.50; the set, $4.00.

\** The above works will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.*

Conversion of Children.

Can it be Effected? How Young? Will they Remain Steadfast? What Means to be Used? When to be Received and how Trained in the Church? By Rev. E. P. HAMMOND, the Children's Evangelist. Should be studied by all lovers and teachers of children. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Early Days of Christianity.

By CANON FARRAR, D.D., F.R.S. This standard work needs no commendation. Printed from imported plates without abridgment. Paper and press-work excellent. Substantially bound in brown or green cloth. Authorized Edition. 8vo, cloth, 75 cents; paper, 40 cents.

From Gloom to Gladness.

Illustrations of Life from the Biography of Esther. By Rev. JOSEPH S. VAN DYKE. A companion book to "Through the Prison to the Throne." Rich in suggestive and practical thoughts. 16mo, 254 pp., cloth, $1.00.

Fulton's Replies.

Punishment of Sin Eternal. Three Sermons in reply to Beecher, Farrar, and Ingersoll. By JUSTIN D. FULTON, D.D. 8vo, paper, 10 cents.

Gilead: An Allegory.

Gilead; or, the Vision of All Souls' Hospital. An Allegory. By Rev. J. HYATT SMITH, Congressman from New York. Revised Edition. 12mo, cloth, 350 pp., $1.00.

Gospel of Mark.

From the Teacher's Edition of the Revised New Testament, with Harmony of the Gospels, List of Lessons, Maps, etc. Paper, 15 cents, cloth, 50 cents.

History of the Cross.

The Lamb in the Midst of the Throne; or, the History of the Cross. A theological work, treating the condition and tendencies of modern religious thought as related to the pulpit, and some of the grave questions of the day. The author has sought to bring out the universality of the relations of Christ's death as an expiation for sin, and as a moral reconciling force. The style is fresh and vigorous. By JAMES M. SHERWOOD, D.D., editor for many years of The Presbyterian Review. 8vo, 525 pp., cloth, $2.00.

History of English Bible Translation.

Revised and Brought down to the Present Time by THOMAS J. CONANT, D.D., Member of the Old Testament Revision Committee, and Translator for the American Bible Union Edition of the Scriptures. A Complete History of Bible Revision from the Wickliffe Bible to the Revised Version. 2 vols., paper, 8vo, 284 pp., 50 cents; 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, $1.00.

The above will be sent, post paid, on receipt of prices.

Holy Bible.

The "Perfect" Edition of the Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments, together with Cruden's Concordance; the Psalms in Meter; A Comprehensive Bible Dictionary fully illustrated; a Pictorial History of each of the Books of the Bible; Biographical Sketches of the Translators and Reformers; the Lives and Martyrdom of the Holy Apostles and Evangelists; Egyptian, Jewish and Biblical Antiquities; Cities of the Bible, with descriptive Scenes and Events in Palestine; Biblical Scenery, Manners and Customs of the Ancients; Natural History, Religious Denominations, Science and Revelation; Temple of Solomon; History of Jewish Worship, etc., etc. Profusely illustrated, elegantly bound. Royal 4to, 1663 pp. A, American morocco, raised panel, gilt back, $9.00; B, fine French morocco, antique panel, full gilt, $11.00; C, fine German morocco, massive panel, full gilt, $13.50; D, genuine turkey morocco, elegant panel, full gilt, $16.50.

Home Altar.

An Appeal in Behalf of Family Worship. With Prayers and Hymns for Family Use. By Rev. CHARLES F. DEEMS, LL.D., Pastor of the Church of the Strangers. Third Edition. 12mo, cloth, 281 pp., 75 cents.

Homiletics.

A Standard Work, invaluable to Clergymen. By JAMES M. HOPPIN, D.D., Professor in Yale College. New Edition. 8vo, 809 pp., cloth, price, $3.00.

Homiletic Encyclopedia.

A Homiletic Encyclopedia of Illustrations in Theology and Morals. Selected and arranged by Rev. R. A. BERTRAM. Royal 8vo, cloth, 892 pp., $2.50; sheep, $3.50; half morocco, $4.50.

Homiletic Monthly.

Devoted to Homiletics, Biblical Literature, Discussion of Living Issues, and Applied Christianity. I. K. FUNK, D.D., Editor. Subscription price, $2.50 per year; single numbers, 25 cents. Volumes III., IV., V., VI., each 8vo, cloth, 724 pp., $3.00.

The Homilist.

By DAVID THOMAS, D.D., author of "The Practical Philosopher," "The Philosophy of Happiness," etc., etc. Editor's Series. 12mo, cloth, 368 pp., tinted paper, $1.25.

How to Pay Church Debts

And How to Keep Churches out of Debt. By Rev. SYLVANUS STALL. 12mo, cloth, 280 pp., $1.50.

---

The above works will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Inner Life of Christ.

These Sayings of Mine. Sermons on St. Matthew's Gospel, Chaps. I.-VII. By JOSEPH PARKER, D.D. With Introduction by Dr. Deems. 8vo, cloth, $1.50.

Servant of All. Sermons on St. Matthew's Gospel. Chaps. VIII.-XV. By JOSEPH PARKER, D.D. A sequel to the above volume. 8vo, cloth, $1.50.

Things Concerning Himself. Sermons on St. Matthew's Gospel, Chaps. XVI.-XVIII. A sequel to the above volumes. By JOSEPH PARKER, D.D. 8vo, cloth, $1.50.

Manual of Revivals.

Practical Hints and Suggestions from the Histories of Revivals, and Biographies of Revivalists, with Themes for the use of Pastors, before, during, and after special services, including the Texts, Subjects, and Outlines of the Sermons of many distinguished Evangelists. By G. W. HERVEY, A.M. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

Metropolitan Pulpit.

The Metropolitan Pulpit, containing carefully prepared Condensations of Leading Sermons, preached in New York and Brooklyn, Outlines of Sermons preached elsewhere, and much other homiletic matter. Vol. I. Royal 8vo, cloth, 206 pp., $1.50. Vol. II., cloth, enlarged. (Metropolitan Pulpit and Homiletic Monthly.) 388 pp., $2.75. The set $4.00.

Preacher's Cabinet.

A Handbook of Illustrations. By REV. EDWARD P. THWING, author of "Drill-Book in Vocal Culture." Fourth Edition, 2 vols., 12mo, paper, 50 cents.

Popery.

Popery the Foe of the Church and of the Republic. By Rev. JOS. S. VAN DYKE, author of "Through the Prison to the Throne," etc. 8vo, cloth, 304 pp., $1.00.

Pulpit and Grave.

A volume of Funeral Sermons and Addresses, from leading Pulpits in America, England, Germany and France; Sketches of Sermons, Obituary Addresses, Classified Texts, Scripture Readings, Death-bed Testimonies, Point on Funeral Etiquette, etc. Edited by E. J. WHEELER, A. M. 8vo, 365 pp., cloth, $1.50.

Pulpit Talks

On Topics of the Time, including "Religion and Science," "Religion and Social Organization," "Religion and Popular Literature," "Religion and Popular Amusements." By Rev. J. H. RYLAND, D. D. 12mo, 46 pp., paper, 25 cents.

Revised New Testament

With New Index and Concordance, Harmony of the Gospels, Maps, Parallel Passages in full, and many other Indispensable Helps. All most carefully prepared. Cloth, $1.50. Other bindings, from $2.50 to $10.00.

Revisers' English.

A Spicy Criticism on the English of the Revisers of the New Testament. By Rev. GEO. WASHINGTON MOON. 12mo, cloth, 75 cents.

Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge.

A Religious Encyclopedia; or, Dictionary of Biblical, Historical, Doctrinal and Practical Theology. Based on the Real-Encyklopädie of Herzog, Pitt and Hauck. Edited by Philip Schaff, D. D., LL. D., Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, assisted by Rev. Samuel M. Jackson, M. A., and Rev. D. S. Schaff. Complete in three large volumes. Royal 8vo, per volume, cloth, $6.00; sheep, $7.50; half morocco, $9.00; full morocco, gilt, $12.00. Sold only by Subscription.  Full descriptive circulars with Testimonials sent, gratis, to any address.

The Theocratic Kingdom.

The Theocratic Kingdom of our Lord Jesus the Christ, as covenanted in the Old, and presented in the New Testament. An exhaustive work on Eschatology from the pre-millenarian standpoint. By Rev. G. N. H. PETERS, A. M. In three large vols., 8vo, cloth, $3.00 each. (In press.) Send for an exhaustive prospectus and specimen pages.

Theology of the Old Testament.

By Dr. GUST. FR. OEHLER, late Professor Ordinarius of Theology in Tubingen, Leipzig. This American edition is edited by Prof. GEO. E. DAY, D. D., of Yale College, and compared with the latest German Edition (1882). A very great work. It has been introduced as a text book in Yale, Princeton, New Brunswick, Lane (Cincin.), and other Seminaries. Royal 8vo, cloth, $3.00.  Send for prospectus.

Thirty Thousand Thoughts.

This great work contains the best thoughts, Illustrations and Literary Gems of the world's ablest books on almost every subject, homiletically arranged. It is the result of researches made by a score of contributors. Edited by Rev. CANON SPENCE, M. A., Rev. J. S. EXELL, M. A., Rev. C. NEIL, M. A., Rev. I. STEPHENSON, M. A. A most valuable, and carefully arranged work. To be completed in six or seven volumes, large 8vo, cloth, per volume, $3.50. To be issued every three months.

 The above works will be sent, post paid, on receipt of price.

Thoughts of John Foster.

John Foster ranks among the most original and suggestive writers of this century. His style equals the terseness and strength of that of Butler, Clark or Barrow; his imagination is more ardent and powerful than that of Taylor or Coleridge, and his conceptions dazzle with their splendor, and awe with their majesty. By W. W. EVERTS, D. D. Cloth, 12mo, $1.00.

Through the Prison to the Throne.

Illustrations of Life from the Biography of Joseph. By REV. J. S. VAN DYKE, author of "Popery the Foe of the Church and of the Republic." 16mo, cloth, 254 pp., $1.00.

Treasury of David.

Containing an Original Exposition of the Book of Psalms: A Collection of Illustrative Extracts from the whole range of literature; a series of homiletical hints upon almost every verse, and lists of writers upon each verse. By REV. CHARLES H. SPURGEON. 8vo, cloth, per volume, $2.00; sheep $2.75. Complete in Seven Volumes, Six now ready.  Sold separately or in the Set.

Vol. I., Psalms 1-26 (inclusive) Vol. II. Psalms 27-52; Vol. III., Psalms 53-68; Vol. IV., Psalms 69-103; Vol. V., Psalms 104-118; Vol. VI., Psalms 119-124; Vol. VII., Psalms 125-150.

Miscellaneous Works.

Bulwer's Novels.

Leila; or, the Siege of Granada: and, The Coming Race; or, The New Utopia. By EDWARD BULWER, Lord Lytton. 12mo, 284 pp., leatherette, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Child's Guide to Heaven.

By REV. E. P. HAMMOND. Paper, 10 cts., leatherette, 25 cts.

Christmas Books.

Containing A Christmas Carol, the Chimes, the Cricket on the Hearth, The Battle of Life, The Haunted Man. By CHARLES DICKENS. 2 vols., paper, 270 pp., 8vo, 50 cents; 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, 75 cents.

Calvin.

John Calvin. By M. GUIZOT, Member of the Institute of France. 4to, paper, 15 cents; 12mo, 160 pp., cloth, 50 cents.

Cyclopedia of Quotations.

The Cyclopedia of Practical Quotations, English and Latin, with an Appendix, containing Proverbs from the Latin and Modern Languages; Law and Ecclesiastical Terms and Significations; Names, Dates and Nationality of Quoted Authors, etc., with Copious Indices. Contains 17,000 classified quotations and 50,000 lines of Concordance. By J. K. HOYT and ANNA L. WARD. Royal 8vo, 900 pp., cloth, $5.00; sheep, $6.50; half mor., $8.00; full mor., $10.00.

 The above works will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Deems Birthday Book.

Selections from the Writings of REV. CHARLES F. DEEMS, D.D., LL.D., Pastor of the Church of Strangers, New York. Arranged by SARAH KEABLES HUNT. The book has for a frontispiece a very fine vignette portrait of Dr. Deems. Cloth, $1.00; gilt edges, $1.25.

Diary of a Minister's Wife.

By ALMEDIA M. BROWN. (Complete Edition.) 8vo, paper, 30 cents; cloth, handsomely bound, $1.50.

Drill Book in Vocal Culture.

Drill Book in Vocal Culture and Gesture. REV. PROF. EDWARD P. THWING, (Sixth Edition.) 12mo, paper, 115 pp., 25 cts.

Eastern Proverbs and Emblems

Illustrating Old Truths. Selected from over 1,000 volumes, some very rare, and to be consulted only in libraries in India, Russia, and other parts of the Continent, or in the British Museum. All are classified under subjects. This book is a rich storehouse of emblems and proverbs. By REV. A. LONG, member of the Bengal Asiatic Society. 8vo, 280 pp., cloth, $1.00.

Gathered Lambs;

Showing how Jesus "the Good Shepherd" laid down His life for us, and how many little Lambs have been gathered into His fold. By Rev. EDWARD PAYSON HAMMOND, author of "Child's Guide," etc. A book for children. 12mo, 176 pp., paper, 10 cents; cloth, 40 cents.

Gems of Illustration.

From the writings of Dr. THOMAS GUTHRIE, classified and arranged. A priceless book for clergymen and all public teachers. Second Edition. 8vo, 196 pp., cloth, $1.50.

Giving or Entertainment; Which?

A Clear, Concise Discussion on Church Entertainments in Contrast to Giving. By Rev. JOSEPH S. VAN DYKE, author of "Through the Prison to the Throne," etc. 12mo, 32 pp., paper, 25 cents.

Gospel by Mark, in Phonetic Spelling.

The Gospel by Mark, in Phonetic Spelling. By C. W. K. Issued to illustrate the reform in spelling as suggested by an able advocate of this movement. Paper, 15 cents; cloth, 40 cents.

Henry Ward Beecher.

A Sketch of his Career, with analysis of his power as a Preacher, Lecturer, Orator, and Journalist, and incidents and reminiscences of his Life. By LYMAN ABBOT, D.D. Finely illustrated. 8vo, 600 pp., cloth, $3.00; sheep, $4.50; half morocco, $6.00; full morocco, gilt, $7.00; memorial copy, extra fine, $10.00.

Send for illustrated circular.

The above works will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Statement of his Doctrinal Beliefs and Unbeliefs before the Congregational Association of New York and Brooklyn, October 10, 1882. Paper 10 cents.

Heroes and Holidays.

Talks and Stories about Heroes and Holidays. Short illustrated lectures to Boys and Girls by twenty-one preachers in United States and Great Britain. Edited by Rev. W. F. CRAFTS, A.M. 12mo, 265 pp., cloth, $1.25.

History of England.

A Popular History of Society and Government in England from the Earliest period to the Present Times. By CHARLES KNIGHT. Tables of Contents, Index, Appendix, Notes and Letterpress unabridged. 8 vols., 4to, paper, 1370 pp., $2.80; 2 vols., 4to, cloth, $3.75; 4 vols., $4.40; 1 vol., sheep, $4.00; 2 vols., $5.00; 1 vol., Fr. im. morocco, $4.50; 2 vols., $25.50.

This is the most complete, and in every way the most desirable History of England ever written. The former price of this History was $18.00 to $25.00.

How to Enjoy Life.

Clergymen's and Students' Health; or, Physical and Mental Hygiene, the True Way to Enjoy Life. By WILLIAM MASON CORNELL, M.D., LL.D., Fellow of the Massachusetts Medical Society, Member of the American Medical Association. (Fifth Edition). 12mo, cloth, 360 pp., $1.00.

Hymns for All Christians.

Compiled by CHARLES F. DEEMS, D.D. LL.D., and PHERE CARY. (Fifth Edition). 12mo, cloth, 75 cents.

In Memoriam.—Wm. Cullen Bryant.

A Funeral Oration. By HENRY W. BELLOWS, D.D. 8vo, paper, 10 cents.

Is Romanism Good Enough for Romanists?

This is a sermon in tract form, very earnest, bristling with facts. It has excited already wide interest. By JUSTIN D. FULTON, D.D. Single number, 6 cents; 50 copies, $2.50; 100 copies, $4.00.

Lothair.

By Rt. Hon. B. DISRAELI, Earl of Beaconsfield, 2 vols., paper, 256 pp. 50 cents; 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, $1.00.

Lectures by Pere Hyacinthe.

"Respect for the Truth," "Reformation of the Family."
"The Moral Crisis." Translated from the French by Rev. LEONARD WOLSEY BACON. 8vo, paper, 15 cents.

Leech's Reply.

An Incisive Reply to Ingersoll's Attack on the Bible. By S. V. LEECH, D. D. 8vo, paper, 10 cents.

☞ The above works will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

"My St. John."

A remarkable pastoral experience by JAMES M. LUDLOW, D.D. "A most pathetic and interesting story, which has brought tears from many eyes." 32mo, 10c.; 50 copies, $3.50; 100, $6.

Pastor's Record.

For Study, Work, Appointments and Choir for one year. By Rev. W. T. WYLIE. 12mo, paper, 50 c.; cloth, 75, leather, $1.

Robert Raikes' Centennial Addresses.

Delivered at the Raikes Centennial Celebration, by Rev. Drs. J. P. Newman, Thos. Armitage, Rufus W. Clark, Chas. S. Robinson, R. S. Storrs; and others. 8vo, paper, 10 cents.

Rock that is Higher than I.

This is a beautiful gift book suitable at all seasons. By Rev. JOHN EDGAR JOHNSON. 8vo, cloth, 75 cents.

Sartor Resartus.

The Life and Opinions of Herr Teufelsdröckh. By THOMAS CARLYLE. Paper, 176 pp., 25 cents; 8vo, cloth, 60 cents.

Standard Hymns.

With Biographical Notes of their Authors, Compiled by Prof. ED. P. THWING. 12mo, paper, 6c.; fifty or more, 5c. each.

Talks to Boys and Girls about Jesus.

With Bible Links to make a Complete and Chronological Life of Christ for the Young. Edited by Rev. W. F. CRAFTS. 12mo, 400 pp., cloth, 75 cents, illustrated, $1.50.

Talks to Farmers.

A new book of nineteen Addresses to Farmers. 12mo, 360 pp., cloth, $1.00. By Rev. CHARLES H. SPURGEON.

Traps for the Young.

A new, thrilling, but prudent description of the author's adventures with crime, and in bringing the victims to justice. A book for parents, divested of all improper language or representations. By ANTHONY COMSTOCK, of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, author of "Frauds Exposed." 12mo, cloth, $1.00.

Wall Street in History.

Giving the History of this Street from Colonial Times to the present date. By MARTHA J. LAMB, author of "History of New York," editor of "Magazine of American History." Copiously illustrated; 4to, cloth, $2.00.

What our Girls Ought to Know.

A book of practical hygiene for girls, containing excellent advice and valuable information. The author was a physician of large practice; a graduate, resident physician and teacher of Natural Sciences, in the Mass. State Normal School; graduate of the Woman's Medical College, New York. 12mo, 261 pp., cloth, $1.

Net The above works will be sent, post paid, on receipt of price.

The Standard Series.

Best Books for a Trifle, printed in readable type, on fair paper, and in manilla, wholly without abridgment except Nos. 6-7, 9-10. All Books with star (*) (15 vols.) are also bound one volume, cloth, $3.50. ~~★~~ Books with dagger (†) are also bound separately in cloth. See prices elsewhere.

No.	Price.	No.	Price.
*1. John Ploughman's Talk. O. H. Spurgeon. Carlyle on Choice of Books. 4to. Both	$0 12	44 Goldsmith's Citizen of the World. 4to.....	$0 20
*2. Manliness of Christ. Thomas Hughes. 4to.....	10	45. America Revisited. George Augustus Sala. 4to.....	20
3. Essays. Lord Macaulay. 4to. 15		46. Life of C. H. Spurgeon. 8vo	20
4. Light of Asia. E. Arnold. 4to. 15		†47. John Calvin. M. Guizot. 4to	15
*5. Imitation of Christ. Thomas à Kempis. 4to.....	15	†48-49 Dickens' Christmas Books. Illustrated. 8vo.....	50
*6-7. Life of Christ. Canon Farrar. 4to.....	50	50. Shairp's Culture and Religion. 8vo.....	15
8. Essays. Thomas Carlyle. 4to.	50	†51-52. Godet's Commentary on Luke, Ed. by Dr. John Hall. 8vo, 2 parts, both.....	2 00
*9-10. Life and Work of St. Paul. Canon Farrar. 4to, both....	50	†53. Diary of a Minister's Wife. Part I. 8vo.....	15
*11. Self-Culture. Prof. J. S. Blackie. 4to.....	10	†54-57. Van Doren's Suggestive Commentary on Luke. New edition, enlarged. 8vo.....	3 00
†12-19. Knight's Popular History of England. 4to, both.....	2 80	†58. Diary of a Minister's Wife. Part II. 8vo.....	15
*20-21. Buskin's Letters to Workmen and Laborers. 4to both.	30	59. The Nutritive Cure. Dr. Robert Walter. 8vo.....	15
22. Idylls of the King. Alfred Tennyson. 4to.....	20	†60. Sartor Resartus. Thomas Carlyle. 4to.....	25
23. Life of Bowland Hill. Rev. V. J. Charlesworth. 4to.....	15	†61-62. Lothair. Lord Beaconsfield. 8vo.....	50
24. Down Geology. Charles Kingsley. 4to.....	15	63. The Persian Queen and Other Pictures of Truth. Rev. E. P. Thwing. 8vo.....	10
25. Alfred the Great. Thos. Hughes. 4to.....	20	64. Salon of Madame Necker. Part III. 4to.....	15
26. Outdoor Life in Europe. Rev. E. P. Thwing. 4to.....	20	†65-66. The Popular History of English Bible Translation. H. F. Conant. 8vo. both....	50
27. Calamities of Authors. I. D'Israeli. 4to.....	20	67. Ingersoll Answered. Joseph Parker, D. D. 8vo.....	15
28. Salon of Madame Necker. Part I. 4to.....	15	†68-69. Studies in Mark. D. C. Hughes. 8vo in two parts..	60
29. Ethics of the Dust. John Buskin. 4to.....	15	70. Job's Comforters. A Religious Satire. Joseph Parker, D. D. (London) 16mo.....	10
30-31. Memories of My Exile. Louis Kossuth. 4to.....	40	†71. Reviser's English. G. Washington Moon F. E. S. L. 12mo	20
*32. Mister Horn and His Friends, Illustrated. 4to.....	15	†72. The Conversion of Children. Rev. Ed. P. Hammond. 12mo	30
33-34. Oration of Demosthenes. 4to.....	40	73. New Testament Helps. Rev. W. F. Crafts. 8vo.....	20
35. Frondes Agrestes. John Buskin. 4to.....	15	74. Opium—England's Coercive Policy. Rev. J. Liggins. 8vo.	10
36. Joan of Arc. Alphonse de Lamartine. 4to.....	10	†75. Blood of Jesus. Rev. Wm. A. Reid. With introduction by E. P. Hammond. 12mo.....	10
37. Thoughts of M. Aurelius Antoninus. 4to.....	15	76. Lesson in the Closet. Chas. F. Deems, D. D. 12mo.....	20
*38. Salon of Madame Necker. Part II. 4to.....	15	†77-78. Heroes and Holidays. Rev. W. F. Crafts. 12mo, 2 pts., both.....	30
39. The Hermits. Chas. Kingsley. 4to.....	15	79. Reminiscences of Rev. Lyman Beecher, D. D. 8vo....	10
*40. John Ploughman's Pictures. O. H. Spurgeon. 4to.....	15
*41. Pulpit Table-Talk. Dean Hamsay. 4to.....	10
*42. Bible and Newspaper. O. H. Spurgeon. 4to.....	15
*43. Lodon. Rev. C. Colton. 4to	20

~~★~~ The above works will be sent, post paid, on receipt of prices.

The Standard Library, 1883.

Previous Numbers (1-70) of this Library are known as STANDARD SERIES.

The set (26 books), paper, $5.00; cheap cloth, $10.00; fine cloth, extra paper, $16.00. 26 adjustable covers, with name of each book on back (for paper edition), $2.75; single cover, 15c.

All books of this series are 12mo in size.

80. Oliver Cromwell. His Life, Times, Battlefields and Contemporaries. By PAXTON HOOD, author of "Christmas Evans," etc. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, $1.00.
81. Science in Short Chapters. By W. MATTIEU WILLIAMS, F.R.A.S. Author of "Fuel of the Sun," etc. A leading scientist in England. 312 pp. Paper, 25 cents, cloth, $1.00.
82. American Humorists. By Rev. H. R. HAWES, M.A. A distinguished clergyman of London. Author of "Music and Morals, etc." 192 pp. Paper, 15 cents, fine cloth, 75c.
83. Lives of Illustrious Shoemakers. By WILLIAM EDWARD LINKS. A book of "Self Help." 288 pp. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.
84. Flotsam and Jetsam. A Yachtsman's Experiences at Sea and Ashore. By THOS. GIBSON BOWLES, Master Marine. 276 pp. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.
85. Highways of Literature. Or What to Read and How to Read. By DAVID PRYDE, M.A., LL.D. Author of "Great Men of European History," etc. 168 pp. Paper, 15 cents, fine cloth, 75c.
86. Colin Clout's Calendar. The Record of a Summer—April to October. By GRANT ALLEN, author of "Vignettes of Nature," etc. 235 pp. Paper, 25 cents, cloth, $1.00.
87. The Essays of George Eliot. Collected and Arranged, with an Introduction to her "Analysis of Motives." By NATHAN SHEPPARD, author of "Readings from George Eliot," etc. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.
88. Charlotte Brontë. An Hour with Charlotte Brontë; or, Flowers from a Yorkshire Moor. By LAURA C. HOLLOWAY, author of "Mothers of Great Men and Women," etc. 156 pp. Paper, 15 cents; fine cloth, with steel engraving of Charlotte Brontë, 75 cents.
89. Sam Hobart. The Locomotive Engineer. A workman's Solution of the Labor Problem. By JUSTIN D. FULTON, D.D. 255 pp. Paper, 25 cents, cloth, $1.00.
90. Successful Men of To-Day, and what they Say of Success. Based on facts and opinions gathered from Five Hundred Prominent Men. By Rev. WILBUR F. CRAFTS, A.M. A Book of Self Help. 276 pp. Paper, 25 cents, cloth, $1.00.
91. Nature Studies. By GRANT ALLEN, ANDREW WILSON, THOMAS FOSTER, EDWARD CLOOD and RICHARD A. PROCTOR. A sterling volume. 264 pp. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.

The above works will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

- 92. India: What can it Teach Us? A course of lectures delivered before the University of Cambridge. By F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M. With an Introduction and Notes by Prof. Alexander Wilder, M.D. 288 pp. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.
- 93. A Winter in India. By Rt. Hon. W. E. BAXTER, M.P. A fascinating story of a journey through India. With map. 154 pp. Paper, 15 cents, fine cloth, 75 cents.
- 94. Scottish Characteristics. By PAXTON HOOD, Author of "Oliver Cromwell," "Christmas Evans," etc. 315 pp. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.
- 95. Historical and Other Sketches. By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE. Edited with an Introduction by David H. Wheeler, LL.D. 288 pp. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.
- 96. Jewish Artisan Life in the Time of Jesus. By Prof. FRANZ DELITSCH. Translated from the latest German edition, by Bernhard Pisk, Ph.D. Paper, 15 cents, fine cloth, 75 cents.
- 97. Scientific Sophisms. A review of current Theories, concerning Atoms, Apes and Men. By SAMUEL WAINWRIGHT, D.D., author of "Christian Certainty," etc. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.
- 98. Illustrations and Meditations; or, Flowers from a Puritan's Garden, distilled and dispensed by C. H. SPURGEON. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.
- 99. French Celebrities. Part I. Brief Biographies of Marshal De MacMahon, Leon Gambetta, Jules Grévy, Louis Blanc, Charles De Freycinet, Victor Hugo, Ferdinand De Lesseps. By ERNEST DAUDET, and others. Paper, 15 cents, fine cloth, 75 cents.
- 100. By-Ways of Literature. Or Essays on Old Things and New, in the Customs, Education, Character, Literature, and Language of the English-speaking People. By DAVID H. WHEELER, LL.D. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00.
- 101. Martin Luther. His Life and Times. By Dr. WILLIAM REIN, Eisenach, Germany. Based upon Köstlin's "Life of Luther." Translated. Paper, 25 cents, cloth, $1.00.
- 102. French Celebrities. Part II. Brief Biographies of Jules Ferry, George Clemenceau, Ernest Renan, Henri Rochefort, Challemei, Lacour, Jules Simon, Erckman-Chatrion, Paul Bert, and Alphonse Daudet. By JULES CLARETIE, and others. Paper, 15 cents, fine cloth, 75 cents.
- 103. Christmas in a Palace. A traveler's story by EDWARD EVERETT HALE. 12mo. Paper, 25 cents, fine cloth, $1.00; Holiday edition, cloth, $1.00.
- 104. With the Poets. A selection of English poetry. By CANON FARRAR. Paper, 25 cents, cloth, $1.00.
- 105. The Life of Zwingli. The Swiss Reformer. By JEAN GROB. Translated. Paper, 25 cents, cloth, $1.00.

The above works will be sent, post paid, on receipt of price.

The Standard Library, 1884.

ISSUED BI-WEEKLY.

Set, 26 Books in Paper, $5; Adjustable Covers (26) with name of each book on back, $4.75. Set, 26 Books, in cheap Cloth, $10. Set, 26 Books, fine Cloth, extra paper, $18.

Announcement.

1. The Standard Library, 1884 Series, will contain 26 books, one to be issued every two weeks. The paper, binding, etc., will be the same as "1883 Series."

2. Some nine of the books will be fiction, by many of the ablest of our writers; the other books will be, also, all new—not heretofore published in America.

3. Each book will be 12mo in size, with clear type, good paper, and bound in signatures (not inset), the same as cloth books are bound.

4. The books will be bound in heavy cover paper, with artistic design printed in two colors, making the book an ornament for any parlor table.

5. The books will stand erect on the Library shelf the same as a cloth-bound book. THE TITLE will be PRINTED ON THE BACK, also on the side.

PRICES:—Paper, 15c. and 25c. per volume; cloth, 75c. and $1.00.
Subscription (26 Books), paper, $5.00; cloth, $16.00.

Send for "Standard Library" Catalogue.

108. Story of the Merv. Epitomized from the "Merv Oasis," by the author, ED-MOND O'DONOVAN. A story of travel in Central Asia. 12mo, paper, 25 cents; fine cloth, $1.00.

109. Mumu and the Diary of a Superfluous Man. Two Novels. By IVAN TURGE-NIEFF. Translated from the Russian. 12mo, paper, 15 cents; fine cloth, 75 cents.

108. Memories and Rime. A story of Western Life, sketches of travel in Europe, and various poems. By JOAQUIN MILLER. 12mo, paper, 25 cents; cloth, $1.00.

109. Christianity Triumphant. Its defensive and aggressive victories. By J. P. NEWMAN, D.D. 12mo, paper, 15 cents; fine cloth, 75 cents.

NEW BOOKS BY

JULIAN HAWTHORNE,
JOAQUIN MILLER,
GEORGE P. LATHROP,
Etc., Etc.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE,
JOHN HARBERTON,
Capt. ROLAND COFFIN

45
f

Small, illegible mark or text fragment.

OCT 15 1945

315.

THE
THEOCRATIC KINGDOM
OF OUR
LORD JESUS, THE CHRIST, AS COVENANTED IN THE OLD TESTAMENT, AND PRESENTED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY
GEO. N. H. PETERS, A.M.,
EVANG. LUTH. MINISTER.

---

"A wise man will hear, and will increase learning."—PROV. 1 : 5.

"Give instruction to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser : teach a just man, and he will increase in learning."—PROV. 9 : 9.

---

VOL. II.

FUNK & WAGNALLS

NEW YORK
10 AND 12 DEY STREET

1884

LONDON
44 FLEET STREET

All Rights Reserved

Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1884, by
FUNK & WAGNALLS,
In the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington, D. C.

Tappan Pres. Assoc'n.
9th.
5-8-1924

TO

REV. S. SPRECHER, D.D., LL.D.,

EX-PRES. OF WITTENBERG COLLEGE AND PROF. OF THEOLOGY,

THIS VOLUME IS RESPECTFULLY

Dedicated.

REV. AND DEAR SIR: As a token of personal regard, of due appreciation for counsel received and words of encouragement given in hours of deep despondency, of indebtedness for valuable instruction in Theology, rich suggestions in friendly and Christian converse, and for a true brotherly treatment (when needed because of the views presented within the following pages), you will excuse the liberty taken in dedicating the following volume to yourself. The esteem and love of years urge me to manifest my gratitude in this manner. Besides this, to your instructions are many indebted for being impressed with the maxim given by Bacon: "I hold every man to be a debtor to his profession, from the which, as men of course do seek to receive countenance and profit, so ought they of duty to endeavor themselves by way of amends to be a help and ornament thereto." The feeling thus expressed, honorable since it manifests a proper love, you have constantly instilled, and which, if even exhibited in weak and imperfect efforts, must prove a source of gratification to you, being, at least, evidence that your precepts are remembered by your pupils. These volumes, and others in course of preparation, are only an outgrowth of the spirit inculcated by yourself, and as such will meet with your favorable notice. Not that I presume that everything contained in this work will meet with your approval, for in a work abounding with so many topics (all in the field of controversy), it is scarcely likely that we should be of the same opinion on every point; but I presume on that enlightened and Christian spirit which prompted you frequently to assert that truth never will suffer when investigations after it are carried on with reverence and submission to the paramount authority of Revelation. For, as you once ingeniously remarked, even if the result of such discussion should be one-sided, or to some extent erroneous, it will lead others to enter into a renewed examination of the subject and to a more correct statement of the matter. In your official and private relations you have exemplified, what is justly regarded as a happy sententious saying, "In essentials, unity; in non essentials, liberty; in all things, charity;" and therefore I feel assured that my present tender of affection, with the imperfections attached to it, will not prove an exception to your uniformly charitable regard.

With deep respect and brotherly affection I subscribe myself

Most fraternally yours,

GEO. N. H. PETERS.

“How accessible is the language of Scripture, although few can penetrate into its depths. What it contains, open to all, it utters like an intimate friend, to the heart of learned and unlearned alike. And what it conceals in mysteries it does not present in lofty language, which the sluggish and untaught mind dare not approach, like a pauper before a man of wealth; but invites all in simple speech, whom it nourishes, not only by manifest truth, but excites by concealed truth—the same truth being sometimes more manifest, sometimes more concealed.”—Augustine Epis. 137 to Volusianus, sec. 18.—Quoted by Dr. NEANDER, p. 214, Mem. of Ch. Life.

“Something of the future must live in him who would benefit his age.”—ROTHE, in Stille Stunde.

“We stand upon the position that there is a possible revelation, which is not the most distinguished product of reason, but a divine work of redemption by him whom we appeal to as the Son of Man and the Son of God, who ‘died for our sins and rose again for our justification.’ It is in the Holy Scriptures that we find the revelation which supplies the immortal wants of our conscience. Apostolical Christianity does not come to us as the first theological elaboration, the first system in a series. It is Christianity itself and consequently the primitive type, from which we ought never to wander. It is the norm and rule of Theology. Within these limits we freely admit the liberty of thought. Variety of opinions has nothing which frightens us; and we would regard uniformity and unanimity on secondary points as a fearful evil.”—M. DE PRESSENSÉ.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

---

PROPOSITION 107.—The passages referring to heaven in connection with the saints, do not conflict with, but confirm, our doctrine of the Kingdom.....	11
PROP. 108.—The formula, "Kingdom of heaven," connected with the parables, confirms our doctrine of the Kingdom.....	16
PROP. 109.—An examination of the passages of Scripture, supposed to teach the Church-Kingdom theory, will confirm our doctrine of the Kingdom.....	32
PROP. 110.—The passage most relied on to prove the Church-Kingdom theory, utterly disproves it.....	39
PROP. 111.—The Kingdom being identified with the elect Jewish nation, it cannot be established without the restoration of that nation.....	48
PROP. 112.—The Kingdom, if established as predicted, demands the national restoration of the Jews to their own land.....	55
PROP. 113.—The connection of this Kingdom with Jewish restoration necessitates the realization of their predicted repentance and conversion... ..	75
PROP. 114.—This Kingdom being identified with the elect Jewish nation, its establishment at the restoration embraces the supremacy of the nation over the nations of the earth.....	92
♦ PROP. 115.—The Kingdom is not established without a period of violence and war..	102
PROP. 116.—This Kingdom is a visible, external one, here on the earth, taking the place of earthly Kingdoms .....	117
PROP. 117.—The Kingdom of God re-established, will form a divinely appointed, and visibly manifested, Theocracy.....	123
PROP. 118.—This view of the Kingdom is most forcibly sustained by the figure of the Barren Woman.....	130
PROP. 119.—The Kingdom of God is represented, in the Millennial descriptions, as restoring all the forfeited blessings.....	141
PROP. 120.—This Kingdom, with its Millennial blessings, can only be introduced through the power of God in Christ Jesus.....	152
PROP. 121.—This Kingdom, of necessity, requires a Pre-Millennial Personal Advent of Jesus, "the Christ".....	161
PROP. 122.—As "Son of Man," David's Son, Jesus inherits David's throne and kingdom, and also the land of Palestine.....	199

PROP. 123.—The Pre-Millennial Advent and accompanying Kingdom are united with the destruction of Antichrist.....	208
PROP. 124.—This Kingdom is delayed several thousand years, to raise up a nation or people capable of sustaining it.....	224
PROP. 125.—The Kingdom to be inherited by these gathered saints requires their resurrection from the dead.....	227
PROP. 126.—In confirmation of our position, the Old Testament clearly teaches a Pre-Millennial resurrection of the saints.....	244
PROP. 127.—In support of our view, the Apocalypse unmistakably teaches a Pre-Millennial resurrection of the saints.....	264
PROP. 128.—The language of the Gospels and Epistles is in strict accord with the requirements of a Pre-Mill. resurrection.....	295
PROP. 129.—The Jewish view of a Pre-Mill. resurrection, requisite for the introduction of the Messianic Kingdom, is fully sustained by the grammatical sense of the New Testament.....	311
PROP. 130.—This Kingdom is also preceded by a translation of living saints.....	314
PROP. 131.—This Kingdom embraces the visible reign of Jesus, the Christ, here on earth.....	340
PROP. 132.—This view of the Kingdom confirmed by the judgeship of Jesus....	352
PROP. 133.—This view of the Kingdom fully sustained by the "Day of Judgment".....	362
PROP. 134.—Our view of the Judgment (and, as a consequence, that also of the Kingdom) is fully sustained by the passage of Scripture, Matt. 25: 31-46.....	372
PROP. 135.—The doctrine of the Kingdom in full accord with the scriptural doctrine of the judgment of believers.....	385
PROP. 136.—The doctrine of the Kingdom in agreement with the doctrine of the intermediate state.....	394
PROP. 137.—This doctrine of the Kingdom sustained by the phrase "the world to come".....	404
PROP. 138.—This doctrine of the Kingdom fully corroborated by "the day of the Lord Jesus, the Christ".....	409
PROP. 139.—The Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, as covenanted, is sustained by what is to take place in "the morning" of "the day of the Christ".....	414
PROP. 140.—The doctrine of the Kingdom confirmed by the phraseology of the New Testament respecting "the end of the age".....	420
PROP. 141.—This Kingdom necessarily united with the perpetuity of the earth.....	427
PROP. 142.—The Kingdom being related to the earth (extending over it), and involving the resurrection of the saints (in order to inherit it), is sustained by the promise to the saints of inheriting the earth.....	439
PROP. 143.—The early church doctrine of the Kingdom is supported by "the Rest," or the keeping of the Sabbath, mentioned by Paul.....	448
PROP. 144.—This Kingdom embraces "the times of refreshing," and "the times of the restitution of all things," mentioned Acts 3: 19-21.....	461

PROP. 145.—This Kingdom includes “the regeneration” of Matt. 19 : 28.....	473
PROP. 146.—This Kingdom is associated with the deliverance of Creation.....	479
PROP. 147.—This Kingdom is preceded by a wonderful shaking of the heavens and the earth.....	494
PROP. 148.—This Kingdom embraces the New Heavens and New Earth.....	499
PROP. 149.—This Kingdom is preceded by the conflagration of 2 Pet. 3 : 10-13....	506
PROP. 150.—The establishment of this Kingdom is not affected by the extent of Peter’s conflagration.....	510
PROP. 151.—This Kingdom is identified with “the New Heavens and New Earth” of Isa. 65 : 17 and 66 : 22 ; 2 Pet. 3 : 13 ; and Rev. 21 : 1.....	524
PROP. 152.—This Kingdom is connected with the perpetuation of the human race..	535
PROP. 153.—This view of the Kingdom, with its two classes (viz., the translated and resurrected saints, glorified, forming one class, and mortal men the other), is for- cibly represented in the transfiguration.....	554
PROP. 154.—This Theocratic Kingdom includes the visible reign of the risen and glorified saints, here on the earth.....	570
PROP. 155.—This Kingdom exhibits Jesus not only as “the King,” but also as “the Priest”.....	601
PROP. 156.—The doctrine of the Kingdom enforces the future priesthood of the saints.....	607
PROP. 157.—This doctrine of the Kingdom enforces the future ministrations of angels.....	618
PROP. 158.—The doctrine of the Kingdom aids in locating the Millennial period....	622
PROP. 159.—This Theocratic Kingdom of the Lord Jesus, the Christ, will never come to an end.....	630
PROP. 160.—This Kingdom will be set up in the divided state of the Roman Empire.	639
PROP. 161.—This Kingdom will not be re-established until Antichrist is overthrown.	668
PROP. 162.—This Kingdom will be preceded by a fearful time of trouble, both in the Church and the world.....	731
PROP. 163.—This Kingdom revealed will be preceded by the predicted “Battle of that great day of God Almighty”.....	751
PROP. 164.—This Kingdom ends the Gentile domination.....	773

THE
THEOCRATIC KINGDOM
OF OUR LORD JESUS THE CHRIST.

---

PROPOSITION 107. The passages referring to heaven in connection with the saints do not conflict with, but confirm our doctrine of the Kingdom.

In urging this Kingdom it is said that such promises as Matt. 5 : 12, Matt. 19 : 21, etc., refer to the third heaven, and from thence it is inferred that the Kingdom is the state of the saved, triumphant Church in heaven. But we have already shown (Prop. 108, etc.) that Covenant and prophecy describe a Kingdom here on the earth "under the whole heaven"; that for wise purposes the Kingdom has been postponed; that Christ now remains in heaven until the period of manifestation arrives; that He comes from heaven and the Kingdom is inherited—these and other reasons indicate that there is no conflict between the two, but that, as specifically announced (as e.g. Zech. 14 : 5) the saints come with Him, and then follows the reign over the earth (as e.g. Zech. 14 : 9)—hence such passages must not be understood as embracing or inferring the Kingdom itself.

Obs. 1. That large class of writers who concede the renewal of the earth and its occupancy by the saints, etc., do not, of course, press these passages to an eternal inheritance and Kingdom in the third heaven. The concessions that they make are all that are requisite for our view (Props. 140-152).

Obs. 2. The meaning of the phrase "Kingdom of heaven," and its derivation have already been given (Props. 19, 45, etc.); we now only add that those nearest to the latter, viz., the Jews, disciples, and the early Church, found no difficulty in the phrase in applying it to a Kingdom here on earth established under Divine auspices and power.

It was only when men proceeded to forsake the Covenant and to spiritualize the promises that "heaven" (i.e. the third heaven) was substituted for the Kingdom, and even applied to present believers in the Church. When Augustine, Ambrose, and others (Cumming's Lec. on Romanism, p. 206) could interpret the word "heaven" in the Lord's Prayer to mean "the souls of all believers," it was very easy to erect the Papal views upon the same. It is surprising, however, that eminent Protestant theologians should follow such a perversion of Scripture, so that even Knapp (Ch. Theol., 8. 159, 2, (2) etc.) transfers the Kingdom to heaven, thus expressing the opinion of a vast multitude, but forgetting his own concessions (8. 155, 2, (2)) of the renewal of the earth for a "beautified abode of man" and "a Kingdom at the end of the world." It certainly is contradictory to adopt both views, for if the Kingdom is in the third heaven it cannot be on the earth, and if it is on the renewed earth, it certainly is not in heaven. The pure Popish view does not involve such an antagonism (seeing that it places the Kingdom forever in heaven), while this Protestant application, half Popish and half Chiliastic, is palpably contradictory.

Obs. 3. In the consideration of this subject it must not be overlooked, that "heaven" is employed as a symbol or figure of honor, station, authority, power, and political or civil supremacy. This is admitted by numerous writers, thus e.g. Horne (Index to Symb. Lang., Introd., vol. 2, p. 465) makes it denote in Isa. 51 : 16 "a political universe," "a Kingdom and polity"; Alexander, Com. Isa., 34 : 4, refers it to political states or authorities and Kingdoms; several Coms. explain "the war in heaven," the casting out of heaven into the earth of Rev. 12 : 7-9, to denote the overthrow of Satan from power, etc.; Barnes, Rev. 6 : 14, makes it equivalent to "the high places of the earth," and explains this to mean places of power, station, etc.; many writers regard the "new heavens" of Isa. 65 and 66, as indicating prosperity, honor, exaltation, and others as delineating a new civil and religious union, etc. Such references, which can be found in every variety and form, show that the word is also employed to denote things on the earth. Hence, Prof. Bush and others define it when thus used, a symbol of "a state or position of great conspicuity"; but we incline rather to that of others which explain it as "a position or state of authority or dominion." In Luke 10 : 18 "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven," Neander explains: "from the pinnacle of power which he had thus far held among men."* This Observation is corroborated by the use made of the word in connection with Satan, as in Eph. 6 : 12 where he is represented as being in "the heavenly places," or "heavenlies." See the marginal reading, and notice that it is the same place precisely that the saints shall occupy, Eph. 1 : 3. Satan now has the Kingdoms or heavenlies of this world (hence the offer made at temptation); he is "the Prince of this world"; he is "the Prince of the power of the air" (referring to the fact that the political powers, etc., typified by Sun, Moon, and Stars, are in his power); and we are assured that the time is coming when this power shall be taken from him and be bestowed upon the saints. It is promised to believers that they shall possess the greatness of the Kingdom under the whole heaven; that they shall occupy the high places of the earth; and this again is represented as an occupancy of the "principalities and powers in the heavenlies" (Eph. 3 : 10, 11), and as being "blessed in the heavenlies in Christ," Eph. 1 : 3. Keeping in view that future blessings are spoken of (Prop. 65, Obs. 9) as present owing to the present heirship of these heavenlies in Christ and to the certainty of attaining to them when the appointed time comes for the overthrow of him who has usurped those heavenlies, there is no difficulty in determining the general design of such passages. It throws additional light upon the phrase "Kingdom of heaven," as indicative of a Kingdom of power and dominion, a Kingdom manifesting, like that of heaven itself, the highest stations of honor and irresistible power over the earth. We are now sitting "together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus," just as we have arrived at the New Jerusalem (Heb. 12 : 22), that is prospectively, and this will be shown under the Prop. (154) of the reign of the saints. The reconciliation of things in heaven (Col. 1 : 10), and the gathering of all things in the heavenlies in Christ ("in the dispensation of the fulness of times," Eph. 1 : 10), are also in a great measure to be applied to the restoration of authority and dominion over the world ; for, as all prophecy unhesitatingly directs, it is still some time in the future when these Kingdoms, these heavenlies, now in the possession of Satan, shall become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ. These "heavenlies" also may thus be called, because the authority in them rightfully belongs to God, which authority is now fettered by them and remains more or less unacknowledged.

---

* Barnes's note Com. loci, is unsatisfactory, making the lightning fall from heaven instead of Satan. Saying nothing of the quibble which destroys the force of Satan's falling, we find that in other places Satan is spoken of as in heaven, as e.g. Rev. 12 : 7-9; Eph. 6 : 12, marg. reading, etc.

Obs. 4. The predicted Kingdom of the Messiah, David's Son, is nowhere specified to be a Kingdom in the third heaven (Prop. 103), but "of heaven" or rather "of heavens" or "of heavenlies." According to the Covenant it could not be in heaven, but it is of heaven ; that is, given by God, made as God designs it, fashioned after the will of heaven, and containing in itself "heavens," or "heavenlies," i.e. most eminent stations of power and dominion. Besides this, whatever might be allowed in this intermediate (always excepting the Kingdom itself) state, we find that at the period of time designated for the setting up of this very Kingdom, Christ Himself, as the Inheritor, the Son of man, leaves heaven and with His saints proceeds to establish this identical Kingdom of heaven, and His saints inherit it. The fact that He thus leaves heaven and appears on earth, that a Kingdom specially His is connected with His appearing, etc.—this should impress us not to draw inferences from passages and directly oppose them to the general current of the Word. Thus e.g. that class like the following : "Rejoice, for great is your reward in heaven," Matt. 5 : 12, and others of similar import. Aside from the plural form "in heavens" or "heavenlies" which is in accord with what has been stated, we might dismiss this with the remark that what "heavens" are denoted is simply taken for granted. But grant that the third heaven is meant, and that the plural form is used to impart grandeur, etc., even then it is easy of explanation without confining the parties themselves to the third heaven to obtain the reward of the Kingdom. God in heaven takes cognizance of actions and it is represented that a book of remembrance is kept (Daniel informs us that some Books are opened when the Kingdom is established), and that at the Coming of the Judge the award will be assigned. The reward of every one then in view of conduct, is awarded, and that award is kept in heaven, as in the case of the seventy returning who were (Luke 10 : 20) "rather to rejoice because your names are written in heaven," and of the disciples (Luke 12 : 32) to whom it was said "it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom." The reason of this resolves itself in a reward determined on before the period of its reception, a principle that all theologians adopt. Christ who is our life is in heaven, and what we shall do or endure for His sake, shall elevate us as joint heirs with Him at His Coming ; the reward itself being increased or diminished, so far as mere rank, position, etc., is concerned, proportioned to our use of talents, privileges, etc. But these positions are predetermined for certain characters ; hence Jesus said, that no one should occupy His right or left hand, excepting him to whom the Father may give the honor. This is the key-note to all such passages. All positions, according to the will and foreknowledge of God, are prepared for this manifestation of the Sons of God, Mark 10 : 40. This inspires hope ; hence in Col. 1 : 5 we read of "the hope which is laid up for you in heaven," and which hope is to be realized when Christ shall appear, 1 John 3 : 2, 3 ; Tit. 2 : 13, etc. Just as the hope does not remain in heaven but descends to earth a blessed reality, so we find by a comparison of Scripture that in every case the reward designed for us is only realized at the Sec. Advent upon earth. Thus to illustrate : in Phil. 3 : 20, "our conversation (citizenship, community, political society, Parkhurst, Wahl, Bloomfield, etc.) is in heaven"—the predetermined order or arrangement or "administration" is there, the title or award that gives adoption or heirship or judgeship, but to avoid the very inference that so many make and to remove any objection that any might allege from the stand-point of the Covenant, the Apostle adds, "from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ," etc., thus uniting its realization with the Advent of Christ (comp. Meyer's Com. loci). So the Hebrews (Heb. 10 : 34-37) are told that in view of their enduring sufferings and spoilings "ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance," but well-knowing "the hope of Israel," he guards it by adding : "for ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and He that shall come will come and will not tarry." Thus placing the reception of the promise where the entire tenor of the Record does, viz., at the Second Advent. In 2 Tim. 4 : 8, the crown laid up in heaven for Paul is to be given only in the day of the Lord's appearing ; in 1 Pet. 1 : 4, 5, 7, the inheritance "reserved in heaven" is "ready to be revealed in the last time," "at the appearing of Jesus Christ ;" in 2 Cor. 5 : 2 it is "the house which is from heaven," and which when exalted to the heavenlies is eternally in the same ; and in Rev. 21 : 2 the New Jerusalem, itself in heaven, is "coming down from God out of heaven," and the Bible leaves it here without a withdrawal. Taking these and other illustrations, all pointing to the future, not in heaven but here on earth, for a realization of reward, crown, etc., awarded, we see the force of the express passages which refer this period to the time when the Son of man sits on the throne of His glory, and the inheriting of the Kingdom, the reception of the peculiar stations of honor and authority, the bestowment of "the heavenlies," once usurped by Satan, shall be duly and happily experienced.

The inferences drawn from the most simple passages (as e.g. "For of such is the Kingdom of heaven," i.e. those accounted worthy of the Kingdom have a childlike, etc., disposition, making it equivalent to entrance now into the Church or after death into heaven), of an inheritance received immediately after death in heaven, etc., has led to various extravagances. It forms e.g. the foundation upon which the Popish doctrine of the intercession of saints is erected. This is forcibly illustrated in the case of Pope John XXIII., who raised the question of "the beatific vision," declaring that none of the dead saints would enjoy it until after the Judgment Day. He was accused of heresy and of taking a course opposed to the interests of the Church. For the question was at once raised, "If the saints stand not in the presence of God, of what use is their intercession? What is the use of addressing prayers to them?" (Draper's Intel. His. Europe, p. 394.) It is the basis of the canonization of saints, the profuse and intemperate exaltation (i.e. rewarded, crowned, etc.) of believers in Protestant funeral discourses, and the ten thousand unscriptural works on heaven as the Christian's home, inheritance, etc. The reader will find additional reasons for our position under Props. 120, 131, 132, 135, 136, 137, etc., so that the clearer and express language, the explanatory, must give us the proper conception of such passages. When this earth has a God-man for its Ruler, a Theocratic ordering manifested in its glory, a God again dwelling with man and disseminating His blessings, the will of God done on earth as in heaven, etc., then we have "the heavenly country" which (Heb. 11 : 16) the Patriarchs sought, and this is consistent with the inheritance covenanted to them, which then is "filled with the glory of the Lord."

PROPOSITION 108. The formula "Kingdom of heaven" connected with the parables confirms our doctrine of the Kingdom.

The contrary is asserted by all opposed to us, and as the Church-Kingdom view mainly obtains as a Scriptural basis its rise and defence from it, it deserves attention.

Obs. 1. A few preliminary thoughts are, however, in place. (1) The reader will recall our Prop. concerning the mysteries of the Kingdom. The parables were given respecting the secrets of the Kingdom and were in themselves designed to conceal some things that were necessary. Lange (Com., Matt. 13) correctly shows that the common notion (viz., that they were adapted to weak and carnal understandings) entertained, is erroneous. But Lange does not go far enough, for if we are to take the testimony of Jesus Himself, they were far from being designed for popular instruction, being in point of fact employed to conceal some very important truths.<sup>1</sup> Jesus says that He spoke plainly to His disciples, but in parables to the people, clearly distinguishing between plain and hidden truth. In Matt. 13 : 13 ; Mark 4 : 11 ; Luke 8 : 10, He says that the parable is used that the people may not comprehend. The reason for this lies in their foreknown depravity and rejection of the Messiah, in their being unable to receive the intended postponement of the Kingdom and contemplated ingrafting of the Gentiles. 'To appreciate the parables in all their fulness it is absolutely necessary to keep in view the Covenant and the Divine Purpose in its fulfilment, as shown in previous Propositions.' (2) The depth of these parables cannot be apprehended unless we especially keep in mind what afterward occurred, viz., the postponement of the Kingdom, which, impressed by the foreknowledge of Jesus, gave a coloring to them highly marked and distinctive. By doing this, we avoid the perplexity of commentators in reconciling the one with the other (as e.g. the parable of the Leaven with that of the Tares) ; and we make them accurately correspond with Covenant, prophecy, and the actual history of the Church. The parables having reference to the Kingdom of God must, as is the case, have reference to the rejection of Jesus and the consequences resulting therefrom, otherwise they would not be adapted to meet the exigencies of Christ's position.' (3) If the parables delineate the Kingdom of God in the Church as now currently believed, why is it that the Apostles did not ascertain this fact and use them as now popularly employed ? If e.g. the parable of the Leaven, or of the Mustard Seed means what Neander and a multitude inform us, how comes it that those under special instruction and guidance did not so understand them, as admitted by Neander and these writers, and as proven beyond all dispute by Acts 1 : 6 ? Why did they still labor under " a sensuous interpretation," " Jewish opinions," etc., when as we are confidently told, " the reference to the Kingdom is so plain ;" and why was this ignorance of the Apostles perpetuated in the churches founded by them ; and why was it left for an uninspired man (such a doubtful source) as Origen to present the leverage by which the parables were lifted to their generally accepted position ? Strange that it took several centuries before men arose who were able to obtain a correct understanding of them ! In this estimate of the Apostle's knowledge of the parables—for we take that given by eminent men—no account is taken of the special private instruction of the Apostles, but because these, as they concede, did not militate against the notion of the Kingdom as entertained by the pious Jews (witness Acts 1 : 6), did not prevent the retention of "Jewish conceptions," they are not to be regarded. If the parables really mean what so many popular works ascribe to them, the Thessalonians and others might have received a ready and crushing answer to their views of the Kingdom ; and the Apostles themselves could not have consistently preached a near, expectant Advent. Let any man with unprejudiced mind consider the opinions that the Disciples, Apostles and early Church entertained, and then compare them with those now so prevalent, and he will see abundant reason for a most careful re-examination of the whole subject, for between the two there is a most decided conflict. If the parables were designed, as some assert (Lange Com., Matt., vol. 1, p. 237), to show the difference between the true Kingdom of Christ and "the carnal" expectations of the Jews ; how comes it then that they did not restrain such "carnal" anticipations—with private instruction and the express declaration that they should understand them added—in the disciples and Apostles themselves ? This must be satisfactorily answered, or else the very preachers of the Kingdom stand before us self-deceived and ignorant. Our doctrine, however, clears them of such inconsistency, and places them in a position of correct knowledge and proper appreciation of the parables.* (4) In this discussion, the vital difference that exists between our view and that of others is, that we hold that the parables teach what is preparatory or introductory to the Kingdom, whilst they maintain that the parables refer directly to a Kingdom already in existence, and describe its condition, etc. The latter opinion is brought out in the general affirmation (Lange's Com., cap. to Matt. 13), that Christ presents in them "the founding and development of His Kingdom through all its phases, from its beginning to its end." Aside from the fact that they themselves tell us that the Church was founded previously and hence could not, on their own showing, be founded then, this caption affirms more than can be proven, but nevertheless is taken for granted, without decisive—only inferential—proof, and forms the key-note of the entire interpretation. The former idea, forced upon us by the exact promise of the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, prophecy, history of the Church, example of the disciples, etc., forms, on the other hand, the guide for our interpretation of the parables. In the application of these two principles we now propose to test the language of the parables themselves and see to which one they most accurately correspond. There is no difference, of account, between us as to the definition of a parable, and with them we hold that the main thing to be sought for is the truth pointed out, or taught by the narrative, or course of action presented.* (5) We are not to be understood as basing our doctrine on the parables, for we cheerfully adopt the rule given by Horne (vol. 1, Introd., p. 395) and others, that no doctrine, or article of faith, is to be established from a parable, simply because all such, however illustrative and confirmatory, in order to be understood and appreciated, presuppose and require a previous acquaint- ances with doctrine. It is in this respect that so great a man as Neander fails to give satisfaction. In the introduction to his admirable Church History, he finds his doctrine of the Church-Kingdom upon the parable of the Leaven; and the entire History and other works are pervaded by its influence. It was in this direction that his sincere mind sought to escape from difficulties alleged against Christianity; but whatever the motive, it certainly was a mistake to draw so important an inference from so slight a source. A doctrine permeating such noble monuments of learning and research should have had a stronger foundation underneath it than a parabolic one.* (6) Covenant and prophecy promise only one, and that a permanent, Kingdom to the Messiah, David's Son. Nothing is said of an inferior and then superior one, of one existing before the Sec. Advent as a prelude to another, of several successive stages in a progressive direction; for the decided impression made is, that one Kingdom alone is described as existing under "the reign of the Messiah." Hence, this theory of successive stages, etc., so conveniently grafted on the parables to make them, if possible, consistent with each other, ought, if correct, to find corroborating evidence in its support outside of the parables, either in Covenant or prediction. But unfortunately the only proof adduced in its behalf comes from two of the parables themselves. The parabolic form is a convenient refuge for all mystical interpretations, being admirably adapted to secure, as some do, a Kingdom in the visible Church, or, if necessary, in the invisible, or even in both, owing to its caption. (7) Again, it must be borne in mind that quite a number of the parables, as many writers (especially Greswell) have shown, are prophetical in their nature. They predict matters which relate to the Kingdom of God. This prophetical meaning is so self-evident that it needs no discussion. We only refer to it to add that, if they possess such a characteristic (as any good classification at once indicates), then they ought to be explained, not isolated but in accord with the general tenor of prophecy.

<sup>1</sup> In addition to what was said under Props. 11-15, it may be advisable, in view of the important bearing on the subject, to introduce other writers who fully indorse our position. Thus Lange (Com. Matt., pp. 235 and 239) also contends that they (the parables) were designed in a measure to conceal the truth. Storr (Diss. on Parables, s. 10) fully admits that they "also answer the end of clothing them (the subject) in obscurity, and become obscure allegories or enigmas if propounded without any explanation." After stating that many were thus uttered, he assigns the reasons, that the Jews were not then prepared for appreciating the doctrine of the Kingdom, and that it was done to prevent them from deriding Christ, etc. (Smith, New Test. His., p. 284) rejects the idea that parables were designed as "a condescension to the ignorance of the great mass of mankind," and points out the fact that Christ first taught without a parable, and only when met with unbelief and scorn does He teach in a parabolic manner. The question of the disciples (Matt. 13 : 10) implies their astonishment at this change, which indicated that "He was speaking to the multitude in the parables and dark sayings which the Rabbis reserved for their chosen disciples." He also says: "He had chosen this form of teaching because the people were spiritually blind and deaf (Matt. 13 : 13), and in order that they might remain so (Mark 4 : 12)." He adds, that parables were given to reveal "the seekers after truth." Kleuker (quoted by Lisco, Introd. p. 17, to Parables), remarks: "It was the design of the parables of Christ, like the old prophetical delineations of His coming, to describe things, indeed, according to the whole compass and internal truth, yet still, like the former, to carry with them a certain darkness, so that those alone could see into the spirit of them who sought it with full sincerity of mind; no others understood anything of it, and what they understood they made no other use of than to fret themselves and oppose Christ." Gerlach (Lange's Com., vol. 1, p. 242) says: "the parables are like the pillar of the cloud and of fire, when darkness was presented to the Egyptians, but light and brightness to the Covenant people. They resemble the husk which preserves the kernel from the indolent, and for the earnest and diligent." A multitude of such references, indicating that the parables are not so easily comprehended but require study and application to understand their meaning, might be presented, thus paving the way for what follows.

<sup>2</sup> As has been abundantly proven in previous Propositions, the foreknown and actually realized rejection of the tender of the Kingdom, conditioned by repentance, making a new ordering requisite in order to prepare for the Kingdom, gives that peculiar and distinctive aspect to the parables which was so perplexing to the Jewish hearers who anticipated an immediate setting up of the Messianic Kingdom, a hope from which even the disciples could not at once divest themselves. To comprehend the parables, therefore, the student must observe what Kingdom is covenanted and predicted; why it was not established at the First Advent, what was the mode of Divine Procedure during the postponement, etc., as presented in Props. 19-73. The parables cannot be opposed to the outer-bound Covenant.

<sup>3</sup> Hence it is that the peculiar teaching of the parables, in the form given, is strong proof of Divine inspiration. Reference is not now made simply to the exact fulfilment of the prophetic element in them, but to the manner in which Jesus evidences the exceeding delicate position in which He was placed. For, foreknowing the rejection of the Kingdom by the representative men of the nation and the consequent postponement of the Kingdom until a people are gathered (repentant and believing) and until His Sec. Advent, He now vindicates His foreknowledge and presents the result (that has happened thus far) in a form least repellant to the Jewish mind and expectation. We assert, in view of what has already been proven respecting the Kingdom, that no mere human intellect could have devised such a skillfully arranged mode of conveying the most unpalatable (i. e. to Jews) truths.

<sup>4</sup> The student is requested to ponder Mark 4 : 34, etc., where it is said that "He expounded all things to His disciples" so that it might be fulfilled (v. 11), "Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the Kingdom of God; but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables." Now the parables are given to illustrate things pertaining to the Kingdom; is it reasonable to suppose that the principal thing, viz., the Kingdom itself, would be left untouched in this private expounding, especially when these disciples were sent out to preach the Kingdom? No; and yet all this private teaching and explanation of the parables only confirmed them in the covenanted Messianic Kingdom (so e.g. Acts 1 : 6, etc.). Hence we affirm, that if the parables and the expounding of them privately by Jesus did not remove the Jewish conception of the Kingdom out of the minds of the disciples especially favored and appointed as preachers of the Kingdom, the parables ought not to have that influence to-day; for if it does (as many contend), it lowers the authority of the Apostles (accusing them of gross misconception and of having preached a Kingdom never to be realized), and it represents the teaching of Jesus and His sending them forth as such preachers in an invidious light. This also sets aside a favorite theory of some European and American writers, who think the parables describe "a Kingdom of God in mystery," i. e. a hidden Kingdom, because the mysteries of the Kingdom were given to the disciples. But we have shown (Props. 11-15) that the Kingdom is one thing and the mysteries pertaining to it quite another. Neither Covenant nor prophecy present us a hidden Kingdom; for, as we shall logically show, its re-establishment as a Kingdom is dependent upon the restoration of the fallen-down Davidic tabernacle. The disciples and Apostles knew nothing of such "a Kingdom in mystery"; and so also the early Church were ignorant of it.

<sup>5</sup> Farrar (Life of Christ, vol. 1, p. 324) makes the parables illustrate the reception, value, results, and extension of the Gospel of the Kingdom, i. e. the truths pertaining to the Kingdom. To this no particular exception might be taken, but when he afterward makes the Gospel of the Kingdom the exact equivalent of the Kingdom itself, then serious objection arises. Sirr (The First Resurrection, p. 37) presents a view that is deserving the attention of the critical student. He makes the Kingdom of heaven as employed in the parables to be equivalent to "the Supernal rulers," because (according to Scapula, Schlessner), the word kingdom (in Greek) often denotes "supreme power" or "king," etc. Since the plural form "heavens," or "heavenlies," is used, we then have "the supreme power or rule of the heavenlies" as thus illustrated through the parables. However this may be, it is not requisite to adopt it, being in some respects different to the general usage respecting the phrase (comp. Props. 22, 23, and 45).

<sup>6</sup> Trench's remarks (On Parables, Introd. p. 39), as corroborative, may well be quoted. "Once more, the parables may not be made the first sources of doctrine. Doctrines otherwise and already grounded may be illustrated or indeed further confirmed by them; but it is not allowable to constitute doctrine first by their aid. They may be the outer ornamental fringe but not the main texture of the proof. For, from the literal to the figurative, from the clearer to the more obscure, has been ever recognized as the law of Scripture interpretation. This rule, however, has been often forgotten, and controversialists looking around for arguments with which to sustain some weak position, one for which they can find no other support in Scripture, often invent for themselves supports in these." He refers to Irenæus, Tertullian, etc., as entertaining the same opinion.

Obs. 2. If the Kingdom of God is what is so popularly represented, viz., "God's rule," or "God's reign in the heart," or "the body of believers," then, as a matter of course, if they are synonymous, it would be appropriate to substitute one or the other of these in the place of the heading of the parables. Let any one test this, and he must see by its evident unfitness that such is not the case. Hence having found by Covenant and prophecy in the Old Test. the Kingdom of God, let us come to the parables and regard them from this position, and see whether they do not fully correspond with the one Kingdom promised and predicted. In this way we avoid making the unfounded distinction of a select higher measure of information for the initiated and an inferior degree for the unlearned, which Fairbairn justly condemns; and at the same time preserve the more private instruction afforded to the disciples from degenerating into substantially (Acts 1 : 6) what all received, i.e. they remained, with their special advantages (according to our opposers) just as ignorant. This removes the notion that there are secret doctrines imparted by them that should not be made known to all over against the precise declaration, Matt. 10 : 27. And also, it proposes to correct the idea entertained by many writers, that the parables "tended virtually with the mass of His hearers to increase their ignorance and misapprehension of the truth" (Fairbairn, note to p. 26, Introd. to Lisco's Parables). This sadly reflects on the ministry of Jesus. If the Kingdom is what Fairbairn pronounces it to be, a purely spiritual affair, then indeed we admit this was the case, and Christ the Light appears with an obscured disk. But take our doctrine of the Kingdom and apply it, and the Light is untarnished, for then, instead, the Kingdom is truthfully and correctly represented, its postponement intimated, the preparatory stage of gathering out portrayed, and the unbelief and rejection of the truth by the Jews is rendered the more culpable. We unhesitatingly say that, if the Kingdom, the main leading covenanted subject preached, is what so many style it, then it was the duty of Christ to so plainly proclaim it that, at least, His own disciples should not say what they did, Acts 1 : 6. Having already vindicated Christ's preaching, it is not necessary to enlarge. Therefore, we only add : that the Jews did not receive the truth because a spiritual Kingdom was presented in it for their acceptance, but for the reason that these parables, before the setting up of the Kingdom, imposed upon them preparatory duties and intimated a period of time to intervene, which was unpalatable to their hearts and expectations. Hence the parable itself, the real truth contained in it, proved to be instrumental, just as Paul indicates 2 Cor. 2 : 14-17. Truths hitherto concealed may indeed be found in them, reference to higher truths still future may be indicated, but never is the leading subject, that of the Kingdom, thus concealed. Covenanted as it is, firmly bound by the oath of the Almighty, it cannot be transmuted into a mystical or spiritual Kingdom by a hidden process, without a violation of unity, language, and Covenant.

Attention is again called to the fact that the peculiar teaching of the parables in the form given is strong proof of Divine inspiration. Reference is not now made simply to the exact fulfilment of the prophetic element in them, but to the delicate position of Jesus and the extraordinary tact evidenced by them. The Jews expected the Messianic Kingdom; Jesus foreknew His rejection by them and the subsequent postponement of the Kingdom; now in these parables this foreknowledge is clearly shown, and the result is presented in a form least repellent to the Jewish mind. The change from the direct form of teaching to the parabolic which excited the astonishment (Mark 13 : 10) of the disciples is readily accounted for in view of this contemplated postponement, especially when it is considered that the parabolic form was introduced (so numerous Harmonies) after the representative men of the nation had commenced consulting and conspiring against Jesus. Because of the moral obliquity (Matt. 13 : 13) evidenced by the nation, He now teaches in parables in order that they may remain in it (Mark 4 : 12), and carry out their plans to the end; the parabolic form being intended only for those who humbly sought the truth, believing in Jesus. The direct appeal being rejected, repentance being refused by the nation, the postponement of the Kingdom and the processes in preparation for its ultimate re-establishment demand the veilment of the parabolic—a form admirably adapted to the contingencies then sprung up. For, aside from other considerations, the caution thus exercised by Jesus avoided an unnecessary persecution by the Roman power; the Kingdom being thus veiled under a form and preparatory measures that had the least tendency to excite jealousy and animosity.

Obs. 3. In passing over the parables we shall only select that class which have the formula "Kingdom of heaven" attached to them, being supposed specially to favor the prevailing view. If these are satisfactorily explained, the rest will need none.

1. The parable of the Tares and Wheat, Matt. 13 : 24-30 and 37-43. Keeping in view the covenanted Kingdom as it was promised, the peculiar position of hearers and the Speaker, the former expecting this Kingdom and the latter foreknowing its rejection and postponement, we have the only practical key to the formula itself. Something is understood, which the then present general expectations of the Jewish hearers (Prop. 20, etc.), supplied, viz., the Kingdom you expect is to be introduced as follows; or the Kingdom of heaven that you anticipate requires the following. As a preacher of "the Gospel of the Kingdom," the parables fall within His Mission, and above all things His hearers desire to know when it will be established. The call to repentance leaves it indefinite and dependent; hence Jesus, as the Divine Teacher, proceeds to satisfy a pious curiosity or laudable desire, and in this parable locates the establishment of the Kingdom at the period of the harvest. To obtain the force of the parable it is requisite to supply the idea of the setting up of the Kingdom as to manner and time and then notice what things Jesus teaches are required before this will be done. 'The Kingdom is not likened to any particular one thing in the parable but to the final result, the end. For if it were, then it would be likened to "a man," for, taking the theories prevailing, that is expressly asserted. But it is not likened to "a man" or to his acts, or to "the good seed" which grows into wheat, or to "the field" which is the world, or to "the tares" which are mixed with the wheat, or even to "the harvest;" but all these are used to indicate how certain things must be accomplished until "the end of the age," when the righteous, the gathered wheat, shall "shine forth as the Sun" in the Kingdom. That this is a correct interpretation of the parable will appear from the following: (1) by linking the Kingdom only with the harvest as do Joel and John; (2) by expressly mentioning the Kingdom as following the harvest; (3) by locating the Kingdom at the end of the age; (4) by the correspondence existing between the parable and Matt. 25 : 31-46; (5) by otherwise making the Kingdom (if the Church) a mixed one, utterly opposed to covenant promise; (6) a mixed condition of tares and wheat down to the very end of the age itself, forbids the fulfilment of Millennial descriptions, as e.g. "all shall be righteous," etc. The positive manner in which Christ puts His language is also expressive of what Paul says Rom. 4 : 17, "*callet*h those things which be not as though they were,"—the present tense is employed, as the Kingdom, although future, is regarded by the Divine Mind as a certainty, a determined realization. Hence the Kingdom of heaven, an ordained, fixed arrangement, is to be obtained in this way and time. This is the meaning of Jesus, a meaning in accord with all other Scripture.'

2. Then follows the parable of the Mustard Seed, Matt. 13 : 31, 32, to which the same principle must be applied. According to our position it would denote that the promised Kingdom of heaven is not brought into existence at once as they, the hearers, expected; it demands time and preparation; it requires small beginnings, a small seed, a Christian Church, or first an individual, then a family, then a nation, then a people adopted into that nation, until finally, when all this preparative growth has been experienced, the tree, i.e. the Kingdom appears and it will be found greater than all herbs (i.e. other kingdoms), affording abundant shelter. The tree alone represents the Kingdom, and this Kingdom is shown to be the result of an intervening growth or work, a constant accretion or gathering. A tree too is significant of a Kingdom, Dan. 4 : 10, 20; Ezek. 31 : 3. The small flock by constant accessions to its number will ultimately at the manifestation of the Sons of God become a mighty nation, a strong people, etc. "When it is grown" it "becometh a tree." If we turn to Mark 4 : 34 in immediate connection with this parable, it is said, "and when they were alone He expounded all things to His disciples." In this private explanation, the interpretation suggested by us was undoubtedly the one impressed upon the disciples as their preaching the Kingdom proves, for they knew nothing of the modern ideas grafted on this parable, as Acts 1 : 6 clearly indicates. Either the expounding of Jesus amounted to nothing or availed nothing, or else it confirmed the disciples in the covenanted Kingdom as believed in by them. The latter is the truth, honorable both to Jesus and Apostles.'

3. The most important of the parables is that of the Leaven. Matt. 13 : 33; Luke 13 : 20-21; it being employed more than any other in the development Church-Kingdom theory. The opinion that this refers to the Church is beset with difficulties, for then this parable contradicts that of the Tares and Wheat, which asserts that instead of the whole being leavened there shall be down to the Advent a mixed condition. Many passages corroborate this, that neither the world nor the Church shall be thus leavened. Besides this, if the leavening process is carried out, it is constantly progressive, and does not accord with the relapses, retrogressions that history records. In the efforts to reconcile this parable with a theory, one (Lange, vol. 1, 248) says : "the woman is an apt figure of the Church;" another (as Trench, Lisco, etc.) makes the leaven the Kingdom; another (Lange, loci) informs us that the three measures of meal is the visible Church (Welt-Kirche). Many find refuge in the invisible Church, others in the Gospel Kingdom, or the Gospel truth, or Christianity. Some, to avoid a contradiction of the parable of Tares and Wheat, confine it exclusively to a delineation of piety in the heart of the individual believer, and make the Kingdom existing in the individual. Another class (as e.g. Vitringa, Gurtler, Teelman, Cyril, Darby, Paine, Seiss, etc.) make this leaven used in a bad sense, equivalent to error, false doctrine, corruption, and apply it in the history of the Church. Thus a variety of views are entertained concerning its meaning, indicating that, from the desire of nearly all to unite it in some way with an existing Kingdom, the Church is selected, either visible or invisible, either in its aggregate or individuality, as the Kingdom denoted.

But remove the notion, taken for granted, that the Kingdom must now be found and the parable corresponds with the preceding ones. As in usage the leavening process is only a preparatory one, so it is here; the leaven is the Divine Word of the Kingdom, it leavens a definite measure of meal, i.e. a predetermined number who are to be adopted as the Sons of God. The gathering out process, and the detention of the Kingdom until this is accomplished, is thus presented, preserving the unity of Scripture. The leavened meal is initiatory to the formation of bread, so this Divine Process is introductory to the Divine Purpose of establishing the Kingdom. The people and the disciples are taught, that previous to the setting up of the Kingdom a definite number of the elect must first be obtained, and the manner in which this is done, by gradual appropriation through Divine truth, is also intimated. If it denotes, what so many believe, is it not strange that the disciples, preachers of the Kingdom and having the advantages of private instruction concerning it, should not be able to comprehend its meaning to be, as alleged, a complete overthrow of their expectations of a covenanted Kingdom. It is true, that Christ most delicately, and thus vindicating His Divine foreknowledge, teaches them that their hopes cannot be at once realized, that a postponement or preparatory stage or leavening process is necessary, but He does not, and cannot as a Covenant-sealing Saviour, destroy their hopes of the Kingdom. The confidence with which they preached the Kingdom proclaims this fact. With this view we can adopt and incorporate many valuable remarks recorded by the various writers on the parables, discarding the engrafted Origenistic Church-Kingdom idea, and adhering to the one that the Kingdom of heaven will appear when the certain number, represented by the three (sacred number) measures of meal, are obtained by the power of the truth. In this manner we preserve the unity of Scripture, the consistent preaching of instructed disciples. Again, by reference to the connection of this parable in Matt. 13 : 34, 35, we find that it embraces "things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world." Now it is taken for granted that "the secret thing" pertains to the nature, the spirituality of the Kingdom, but that this is a wrong inference is apparent from the declarations of the Apostles who found this secret or mystery in the postponement and consequent call of the Gentiles, as is proven by Eph., 3 : 4-6 ; Col. 1 : 26, 27, etc., thus fully according with our interpretation.<sup>3</sup>

4. The parables of the Treasure and of the Pearl, Matt. 13 : 44-46, need no special notice, as the simple idea running through them is this : that as men exhibit their interest in, and willingness to sacrifice all for, something that is very precious and costly, so we ought to do the same in behalf of the Kingdom of God. It again indicates a preparatory stage in the individual and that he can obtain an abiding interest, inheritance, in the Kingdom itself. No one but can see that if we press the captions of these two parables, as is done in others, they become at once contradictory — for the one likens the Kingdom to the treasure and the other likens the Kingdom, not to the pearl but to the merchantman, thus indicating that Christ's design was only to show what spirit should actuate us in seeking His Kingdom. This excludes all those forced and constrained expositions which abound in several writers, especially in Vitringa. Faith seizes upon the treasure God offers, and is willing to surrender all to obtain the abiding hope which it inspires, and its ultimate enjoyment.<sup>4</sup>

5. The parable of the Net, Matt. 13 : 47-50, resembles that of the Tares and Wheat, and therefore requires no explanation. The design of this dispensation is represented, the postponement indicated in a preparatory gathering which shall continue until the end of the age. The mixed condition until the final separation is a prominent feature. The Kingdom, owing to its rejection by the nation, requires this previous casting of the net and its results.<sup>5</sup>

6. The parable of the King and his Servants, or of the Unmerciful Servant, Matt. 18 : 23-35, shows the correctness of our deductions concerning the heading of the parable ; for our entrance into the Kingdom of heaven is here conditioned on our brotherly forgiveness. As the servants render their account to the King, so shall we also finally to the great King. A preparatory qualification is requisite. Of the same tenor is the one of the Laborers in the Vineyard, Matt. 20 : 1-16, showing that previous to the bestowment of the reward a preparatory service is demanded, and that all thus engaged will receive their just dues. Lange, and others, make the vineyard the Kingdom of God, but it is likened to the householder who is represented as following a certain course of action, illustrative of what God will also do in the final settlement. We are taught that certain things are necessary before we can enter into that Kingdom, and that the principle actuating the householder will eventually influence the Judge in his arbitration of affairs. The parable of the Royal Wedding, or the Wedding Garmet, Matt. 22 : 1-14, clearly points out that the Church is not the Kingdom of God, because the parties are represented merely as invited to the wedding. Before the Kingdom is introduced, represented under the figure of the Son's wedding, a preliminary stage is introduced ; and owing to the conduct of the guests first invited a further postponement is indicated until a certain gathering is obtained, thus accurately corresponding with our line of argument. This dispensation of grace, resulting from the perverse refusal of the invited Jewish nation, is designed to secure the requisite guests for the marriage feast at the end of the age.

7. As we proceed the parables become still more distinctive of our position. The parable of the Ten Virgins, Matt. 25 : 1-13, refers us by the word "then" directly to the period of the Second Advent, as is admitted by all our best critics. We are by its peculiar arrangement and connection limited to a certain period of time when such a separation of the wise and foolish shall be made. The time of the Kingdom and that of the coming of the Bridegroom and marriage are the same ; and in view of an indefinite (i.e. to man) postponement of the same, and of a preparatory state of preparation, we are exhorted to be watchful, occupying the position of wise virgins.<sup>6</sup> The parable following, that of the Talents, Matt. 25 : 14-13, inculcates still more forcibly this preliminary, intervening period before the Kingdom can be established. For we have (1) the allotment of specific duties, (2) the withdrawal of the person into "a far country," leaving his servants behind, (3) "after a long time the lord of these servants cometh and reckoneth with them," (4) the reward of the faithful servants is the assignment of rulership in the Kingdom, (5) and its connection with what follows, verses 31-46. Here is a pointed and significant delineation of the postponement of the Kingdom as various Propositions inculcate.

8. Thus we might pass over all the parables and in each case show how they fully correspond with the interpretation given. This, however, is unnecessary in view of the ample illustrations already presented. But we cannot in justice to ourselves close without directing marked attention to the parable of the Ten Pounds, Luke 19 : 11-27, which most forcibly confirms our position. This parable was introduced as follows : " He added and spake a parable, because He was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the Kingdom of God should immediately appear." It is reasonable to suppose that the parable will throw light on the anticipated appearance of the Kingdom, especially as it was supposed to be connected with His then visit to Jerusalem. Now let any unprejudiced reader study this Divine utterance, expressly given to meet the notion of a speedy establishment of the Kingdom, and he must, if language has any force, arise from such a contemplation of it with a deep conviction that it teaches distinctly and vividly a protracted postponement of the Kingdom, the identical postponement so repeatedly advocated in these pages. We have (1) a nobleman going into a far country ; (2) the design of going is to obtain the title, right, etc., to a Kingdom ; (3) then he will return ; (4) but his stay is a prolonged one, for time is given for trading, etc. (as in the parable of the Talents " after a long time the lord of those servants cometh," etc.) ; (5) the Kingdom that he receives is located where the nobleman lived, " his citizens," etc. ; (6) he returns, having received the right of ruling ; (7) during his absence his servants are required to be faithful to an imposed trust ; (8) when he comes back to reign he has a reckoning with his servants ; (9) and assigns to the faithful a rulership in his received Kingdom. Here is a decided answer to the theory that the Kingdom was established at the First Advent or shortly after, for we have in the nobleman an undoubted representation of Jesus, of His removal, of His injunctions upon His servants during the period of His departure, of His return with authority to appear as the covenanted King, of "His appearing in His Kingdom" (2 Tim. 4 : 1), and of His awarding stations of honor and ruling to the faithful.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The parable has reference to the ultimate Theocratic purpose, and hence Krummacher (quoted by Trench, On Parables, p. 42), however he vitiates his utterance by making the parables illustrative of the Kingdom's (i. e. Church's) " progressive development," is correct in saying : " The parables of Jesus have not primarily a moral but a politico-religious, or Theocratic purpose." Our position fully indicates this and makes them teach, in view of the intended postponement, what are the preparations for the Theocratic Kingdom. Let the reader now observe how utterly antagonistic this parable is to the Church-Kingdom theory. The prevailing view is that the Kingdom is now within the hearts of believers, but how reconcile it with this mixture, as e. g. Dräseke says (Lange's Com. Matt., p. 249) : " what a strange mixture in the Kingdom of heaven,"—yes, indeed, strange if it were true. Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 397, foot-note) remarks : " The parable of the Tares and Wheat represents the Divine Kingdom as continually to the end, more or less, intermingled with corrupt principles and false members." We know that this is true of the Church (for alas ! experience and history as well as prediction proclaim it), but how does Fairbairn explain this when, in other places, he makes the Kingdom equivalent to God's reign in the heart, and how does he reconcile it with the purity, universal righteousness, etc., ascribed to Christ's Kingdom, or even to the preparatives, as given to Nicodemus, essential to entrance therein ? How can they reconcile it with their heaven theory of progressive development ? Every one who indorses a Church-Kingdom theory comes to this parable to find insuperable difficulties, as e. g. seen in Olshausen's exposition (Om. loci), to whose help Dr. Ebrard comes with this aid by way of explanation : " The Kingdom of God exists not in visible separation from the world, but as mingled with the world as a Church. Hence again, the Church is not identical with the Kingdom of God, but a blending of the Kingdom of God and the world." Comment is unnecessary at such a wide departure from primitive simplicity, and the less so in view of the comments of these men on the text, "My Kingdom is not of this world." In the days of the Donatist contest the Catholic party (Augustine, etc.) declared the field to be the visible Church, and the tares and wheat were mixed in it, while the Donatists held that the field was the world and the tares and wheat were mixed, not in the Church but in the world. Neander (His. Dogmas, vol. 2, p. 395) remarks that "the distinction in the idea of the Church as visible and invisible might have led to an agreement." Scarcely; but the idea of the world having the Church in it and the same thing being predicated of the Church in the world, might have produced it.

Three points connected with this parable are worthy of attention by the student. 1. Dr. Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., ed. 1879, p. 276), after claiming that the parable teaches "a simultaneous judgment of all the wicked and righteous both dead and living," acknowledges in a foot-note that there is "a defect" in the parable because it could not properly represent the dead tares of past ages, and this defect he assumes (in view of the Saviour's deficiency) to supply: "The defect here is that it cannot represent those corrupt members of the Church visible who have been in the field (to use the figure of the parables), but are removed out of it by death, generation after generation, before Christ comes. And yet we have seen above" (viz., his opinion of a simultaneous res. and judgment of all with which comp. Props. 125-129, etc.) "that all these are meant as the tares to be gathered and burned when Christ comes. Though the figure represents only the wicked then living, the parable as a whole teaches that the tares represent the children of the devil at large." We presume that the Saviour used language sufficiently precise to convey His intended meaning, and this is corroborated by the numerous statements of the actual result at the Sec. Advent which this parable illustrates. 2. Again, Dr. Brown (part 2, ch. 2) objects to our use of the parable on the ground that we have tares, more or less, existing in the Mill. age, as seen e.g. in Isa. 65, Zech. 14, and in the admissions of Pre-Millenarians as McNeile, Elliott, etc., which, he claims, involves an inconsistency, viz., that the tares ought to cease. But (1) we claim the parable as specially teaching the following points: (a) the non-conversion of the world during this dispensation; (b) the general admixture of tares and wheat until the harvest; (c) the exhibition of such a mixture at the time of the harvest; (d) the separation at Sec. Advent, (e) the time when this is done, not sooner than the harvest; (f) the exaltation of the righteous, following the harvest; (g) the destruction of the tares; (h) and claim that, with McNeile, Elliott, etc., there is no Millennium as predicted and described during this dispensational mixture of tares and wheat, as proven e.g. by the condition of the field at the time of the harvest, and by the harvest itself. And (2) in reply to Brown's objection that tares also exist in the Mill. age; (a) allow them to be there, this parable and its application is limited by the harvest; (b) we show that so far as the Jewish nation is concerned (whatever may be the initiatory result) "all are righteous," and that as the Kingdom extends its sway (Zech. 14, Isa. 60, etc.), righteousness is extended over the nations; (c) that in the Kingdom itself no such admixture of tares and wheat as now exists is admissible; (d) that under the Theocratic sway the ultimate outcome is a universal righteousness over the whole earth; (e) that the results of the present dispensation and of the Millennium are widely different as represented by the Holy Spirit; (f) that if, as Dr. B. holds, the parable represents the condition—mixed down to the end of the Mill. age and then a transference to an eternal state, there is no possible way for the fulfilment of Mill. descriptions as written, and the predictions must be set aside as exaggerated; (g) that in justice to our views, our opponents must distinguish—as we do—between the glorified and unglorified conditions coexisting. 3. For the advanced student (thus forestalling a point cleared up in some of the last propositions), attention is called to the statement of the Teacher that the tares are to be gathered first. Now how can this be reconciled with a previous gathering of the saints, the first-fruits, who escape the tribulation, etc. There is no discrepancy, but a beautiful harmony, simply because the parable relates to the time of the harvest and not to the gathering of the first-fruits. After "the first-fruits" are gathered the tares continue and the wheat also, as seen by those coming out of the tribulation; the mixed condition is not changed by the taking out of the 144,000, but exists down to the time of the harvest, at which time this parable is realized both in the Church and in the Jewish nation. We have no occasion for Barbour's mental ideal gathering, for the plain, direct teaching of the Scriptures is that before the Messianic Kingdom is exhibited in the place of manifested royalty, before the Kingdom is established in visible power and glory and the righteous shine forth as the sun in that Kingdom, the wicked are first removed and de- stroyed. This is the divine order as illustrated e.g. in Mal. chs. 3 and 4, Rev. chs. 19 and 20, etc. Jesus in the parable only brings forth the general results and does not introduce every particular. Barbour's theory (making this the time of the harvest, wicked churches the bundles, himself and others the wheat driven out and thus separated) is a perversion of the parable, a misapplication of its teaching, and an ignoring of the general analogy on the future separation at the Sec. Advent.

Graff, in Lay Sermons, No. 8, says: "The Kingdom of heaven—which literally signifies the rule of the heavens—is the phrase employed in the Scriptures to denote the Church in its earthly relation, composed of good and bad." We may well ask where? For (1) we have proven in detail that the phrase has a definite distinctive meaning relating to the express covenanted Kingdom (which Graff admits is still future); (2) such an application overrides the reasons assigned against it under the previous Propositions, and is itself opposed by multitudes of those who reject this admixture in the Kingdom; (3) if derived from the parabolic teaching it makes a parable the foundation (and not illustrator) of doctrine; (4) it makes the parables contradictory, for the same formula is applied to the parable of the Mustard Seed, Leaven, etc. The fact is noticeable that these things in the parables illustrate how ultimately this rule of the heavens predicted by Daniel (as given at a set time by the Father) and enforced by the Covenant, is to be manifested. All these things relate to (as in parable of the Sower "the seed" is "the word of the Kingdom," i.e. a word which tells of and prepares for the Kingdom; and in that of the tares "the seed are the children of the Kingdom"—a Jewish phrase—i.e. children pertaining or relating to—i.e. such as shall receive—the Kingdom) the Kingdom. It will be well to consider that in the interpretation the seed is sown not in the Church but in the world, that the tares come up afterward among the wheat (thus descriptive not of the world but of a certain class), but it is not requisite to push it to the extreme (as Barbour, etc.) that "the bundles" are Church organizations, etc. We insist that as Jesus positively interprets "the field is the world" (and as a consequence the implication follows, that the Church is in this field), it is vain for persons (as e.g. Calvin, Lisico On Par., p. 69) to make "field and Church" synonymous. It is simply a perversion of the parable to interpret it as Fowle (Contemp. Review, May, 1873), viz., as foretelling the fall of Judaism: "the good seed are the children of Christ's Kingdom, the bad seed is perverted Judaism, the harvest is its coming complete downfall," (he adds that "perhaps" the destruction of Paganism was also foreshadowed). The "harvest" has a far more definitive future Scriptural application than this one imposed.

The early Church, thoroughly Millenarian, understood the Tree to be manifested under Christ at His Sec. Coming. Somewhat similar figures were introduced, as e.g. the Vine mentioned by Clement (First and Sec. Epis.) the ripened fruit of which they only hoped to enjoy in the age to come. One of the earliest writers who made the tree equivalent to the Church in its present state, was Nicetas. In the Fragments (Ante-Nicene Lib., sec. 4), we learn something of the fanciful manner in which this parable was treated, thus: "Matt. 13 : 31, 32, The word which proclaims the Kingdom of heaven is sharp and pungent as mustard and represses bile, that is, anger, and checks inflammation, that is, pride, and from this word the soul's true health and eternal soundness flow. To such increased size did the growth of the word come, that the tree which sprang from it (that is the Church of Christ established over the whole earth), filled the world, so that fowls of the air—that is, divine angels and lofty souls, 'dwelt in its branches,'" (so comp. Vitrings's medicinal allusions to mustard and his fanciful comparisons, which others, possessing but little taste and sense of propriety, have imitated). While more recent commentators have justly rejected the nonsense engrafted upon the parable, yet many of them infer from it a condition of things that was never intended when e.g. Lange applies it to "the visible Church generally" or Barnes to "piety in the renewed heart or the Church," or Alford to the inward Church-form. (They differ also concerning the seed, some making it Jesus, others piety, and others the Christian Church, without observing that piety and the Church existed previously, etc.) Much better is the interpretation of Alford that "we must beware of imagining that the outward Church-form is meant," or of Judge Jones, "it is the tree which represented the Kingdom, but the tree was the slow product of the seed then about to be planted," or as a learned divine (Dr. Sprecher, in personal conversation), that "the seed was not necessarily the Kingdom, for the tree, when it was grown, was more likely to represent it." The consistent interpretation must be one that applies the seed and growth to a preparative process by which from small beginnings—insignificant to many—a Theocratic ordering will ultimately be realized. The Divine Purpose has planted that which will finally, when all things are ready, stand forth in manifested power and glory.

Brown (the evangelist) and others make the whole parable illustrative of the progress of evil, the birds also being symbolical of evil, and the tree, like Daniel's, is to be cut down and extirpated. Whatever force such a view may have we are not prepared to receive the same, preferring the good sense usually attributed to it rather than the bad one thus engrafted. For the Kingdom of heaven cannot be either likened to, or be introduced by, that which only is evil. Hence when Lincoln (Lec. on Rev., vol. 2, p. 103), as the Plymouth Brethren generally do, makes the tree "the great Babylonish tree," and the birds "clericals," it is done more to enforce preconceived views than to sustain harmony between the relation of the Kingdom idea and the parable. Dr. Tregelles (On Dan., p. 202) suggests the correct train of thought when he points out that such a tree should spring from so small a seed. This is true: the seed was in the Theocracy which history almost entirely ignores (and at which unbelief makes itself merry) in contrast with the mighty empires of the Gentiles—it is in the Church, gathering out by degrees its rulers, which men now deride, etc., but it will spring up into the tree with its sheltering branches. Brookes (Marantha, p. 267) has well observed: "No interpretation of the parable of the Mustard Seed, or of any subsequent parable can be sound which makes our Lord utter a flat contradiction to His own testimony as given in the two first parables which He Himself explained," for as Trench (On Par.) has pertinently stated, Jesus in explaining the two first "intended to furnish us with a key for the interpretation of all." This is eminently correct as to the application of the whole (i.e. they cannot be contradictory to each other, etc.), but it certainly cannot apply to the imagery and details of every other parable, seeing that they introduce others. Hence we need not, if so minded, to follow Brookes in making the birds of the air to represent wicked ones, and thus introduce into the parable the notion of a mixed condition of good and evil, because wicked ones are thus represented as seeking and obtaining a place or lodgment in the Church. It does not necessarily follow that because something is used in a bad sense it must invariably retain, whenever employed, the same sense, not being susceptible of a good one. The introduction of such a principle and a persistent adhesion to it would introduce confusion, as every student of the Bible knows. The usage of a word, etc., must be determined by the general design or scope of the passage.

<sup>3</sup> Drs. Seiss, Brookes, Tregelles, etc., make the Leaven the emblem of evil, and certainly introduce weighty reasons worthy of consideration arising from the scriptural usage of the word. These are the only ones that affect the position taken here, seeing that the others proposed against the prevailing view (such as, that the world is not thoroughly leavened or converted, and not continuously, to the Advent, that it must be explained not in conflict with the parable of the Tares, etc.), do not exist against us. We prefer the good sense of leaven, simply because of its connection with the Kingdom idea as stated under the previous parable. The same principle must in consistency be applied to both. Aside from this, "leavening the whole lump" can only be applied in the way indicated or as next in preference to the individual believer (the three measures of meal being supposed by some to have a reference to the threefold—spirit, soul, and body—nature of man), because evil does not leaven all, even at the Second Advent, for this would contradict two of the parables, that of the tares and that of the drag-net, seeing that wheat and good fish exist down to the end. If applied to the period of tribulation even when Antichrist is triumphant and the Church driven to dire extremity by persecution, even then the multitude coming out of tribulation shows that not all are leavened by evil. Notwithstanding, as the opinion preserves the unity of teaching (i.e. does not make them contradictory as to the conversion of the world through the Gospel), and has strong reasons in its behalf, it is worthy of attention. Indeed, the one given by us, or the application to grace in the individual (which gives a good meaning), or this reference to evil, must be accepted as most consistent with the express covenanted Kingdom.

<sup>4</sup> Tregelles (On Dan., p. 206), denies that this parable of the Treasure hid in the field can be individualized, for then, he alleges, the doctrine is taught, opposed to Christian faith, that if we give up all for Christ we procure salvation, saying: it "shows us what Christ did for His people; they were in the world, and because they were given into His hands to redeem, He bought the whole for their sake." We prefer the common view, making it equivalent to take up the cross, denying ourselves, forsaking all for Christ, which is the practical evidence of an exercise of Christian faith. So Tregelles (p. 207) makes the Pearl the elect Church and Christ the purchaser. Brookes (The Truth, vol. 4, No. 9), makes the Saviour the seeker (leaving the ninety-nine, etc., Luke 15: 4 and 19: 10), the saints being the Pearl. Rev. Fox (The Truth, vol. 4, No. 3) interprets: "The Pearl of pre-eminent value is the ransomed Church. The Purchaser is the Lord of Glory. The price was His own blood. He gave up all and bought the field, and now the treasure remains hidden until the redemption of the purchased possession. Rom. 8. Then will be the glorious manifestation, Eph. 5: 25-27."

<sup>5</sup> The Kingdom is not (as Heubner) "the apostolic or ministerial office in the Church," or (as another) "the Church as an institution of grace," etc., but it is, as covenanted, the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom to which men are called by the Gospel, and for which they are gathered in the Church, and the fitness for which is finally to be tested at the end of the age.

<sup>6</sup> Lange (Com. Matt., p. 447) correctly makes this parable to be verified at the beginning of the thousand years, and in this he is sustained by the early Church and a multitude of interpreters. Even Neander (Life of Christ, s. 258) admits that it was designed to set vividly before the disciples the necessity of constant preparation for the uncertain time of Christ's Sec. Advent, but he fails to see how much this concession opposes his favorite Church-Kingdom theory, seeing that such a constant looking for the Advent is hostile to his universal leavening process, etc. Barnes (Com. loci) concedes the validity of our position, when he makes the phrase "then the Kingdom of heaven shall be likened," to be applicable only to the period of the Sec. Advent of the Son of man. We add, the lowest possible form of interpretation is that employed by many, who take portions of this parable (e.g. v. 13) and, wresting it from its connection, apply it to death—a procedure utterly misleading and calculated to injure the truth. Compare Prop. 181.

<sup>7</sup> This parable alone conclusively proves the strictly scriptural and logical attitude of the early Church (whose faith is now derided by the substituted wisdom of man), and, if received in its entire connection, repudiates the far-fetched inferences that it taught (so Lisco, etc.) that no "earthly and visible Kingdom" would be established. How can such a doctrine be possibly engrafted on it when (1) it forms a reply to the immediate establishment of such a Kingdom and contains no repudiation of it, (2) but (as Calvin admits, quoted by Lisco, against his own theory) teaches (a) that there is no "hope of a present Kingdom," (b) that it is postponed by his departure, (c) that, without any change of meaning but, in continued answer to the inquiry, at his return the Kingdom anticipated will be set up. The whole parable enforces (1) that during this postponement there is no Kingdom here (as Lisco, Calvin, etc.), (2) but that it will appear at His Sec. Coming. The treatment that this parable has received under the influence and prejudice of a preconceived Church-Kingdom dogma is certainly a remarkable one in the history of interpretation. Judge Jones (Essays, Literalist, vol. 3, p. 41) remarks: "in reference to this parable Greswell (On Parables, vol. 4) says, 'that the difficulty or rather the impossibility of explaining it satisfactorily and consistently, upon any other principle than that of a reference to the Millenary dispensation, contributed as much as anything else to confirm his own belief in the futurity of that dispensation and in fact, first to draw his attention seriously to this subject. The difficulty which was felt by himself he is persuaded will be felt by any other person who shall attempt to explain the parable without doing violence to it, and to find a counterpart for it in any economy or in reference to any Kingdom of Christ whether past or to come but that.'" Waggoner (Ref. of Age), to build up his theory of a thousand years' reign in heaven lays much stress on the phrase "having received the Kingdom," forgetting that the actual reign is connected with his return (comp. Props. 83-90), that the whole scene after the return (as many writers have noticed) is laid here on the earth, and that no mention is made (as Waggoner's notion demands) of a transfer of this Kingdom from earth to heaven. It is a matter of surprise to find concessions where we would scarcely expect them. Thus e.g. Henry (Com. loci) says: "That which they thought should immediately appear Christ tells them will not appear till this same Jesus, which is taken into heaven, shall in like manner come again, see Acts 1: 11." Dean Trench says: "He went to receive solemn investiture of that Kingdom which He had purchased with His blood, and which hereafter He shall return and claim as His own, sitting on the throne of His father David." The critical student will observe that the force of the postponement leaves no room for the substitution of another Kingdom in the place of this one, or the making of a germinal one to develop into the covenanted Messianic one. The subject matter, the general analogy, refers all along to but one Messianic Kingdom. To indicate the manner in which our opponents have to deal with this parable in order to make it fit into their theory of the Kingdom and to wrest it from us, we give, without comment, Williamson's (Letters to a Millenarian, p. 61) view, viz., that "the return" is "a returning after His resurrection" (!) which he calls a coming "the second time" (!). We thus set aside the broad statement of Russell (Our Lord's Return, p. 54), when he says: "The Scriptures everywhere recognize the Church as the Kingdom of God," but as proof only refers to the parables. The Church in no sense, in no manifestations, in no peculiarities, is the same as the covenanted and predicted Kingdom of God, and Russell constantly falls into the error of substituting the Divine Sovereignty or the preparatory for the Kingdom itself.

Obs. 4. It would be an easy matter to criticise the inconsistencies and contradictions engrafted on these parables by the Church-Kingdom theory, but such a course is not needed by our argument, seeing that they are readily detected and exposed. Yet an illustration may be in place because of the influence exerted by the distinguished writer. If we take the last parable we find that Dr. Neander, in order to make the Church the Kingdom, handles it in a very illogical manner. He makes this absence of Christ, His return, and the establishment of the Kingdom to refer to a very brief period—to His death, ascension, and immediate return (the servants having a few days to trade in, etc.). He vainly endeavors to conceal the difficulties environing his interpretation by general phrases (which do not exclude the Second Coming), and utterly fails to make his interpretation fit into his own theory. The proof is this: Previously (Life of Christ) he informs us that the Kingdom of God had already come, that it was even then in progress of development, and declares that while Christ is absent during this brief interval "His agents advanced His Kingdom," that when Christ ascended to heaven He was "appointed Theocratic King," and immediately after such an appointment returns (spiritually is our conjecture) to exercise His royal power. Here he has a Kingdom already founded, then this Kingdom is left for the purpose of being appointed "Theocratic King," and then a return is made to exercise this kingly authority thus received, so that the reply that Christ gave to those who thought that the Kingdom would immediately appear was in substance the following: You are mistaken; the Kingdom is already here: the interval of my absence makes no difference in its existence; that interval embraces but a few years at most, etc. (see p. 239 Life of Christ). But even this interval is reduced to a few days, for in Sec. 243 he interprets the triumphal entry into Jerusalem as expressive "that the Kingdom of God had come and that He was the promised Theocratic King," so that the departure and the appointment were unnecessary for the appearing of the Kingdom. Such a style of interpretation needs no comment beside the language of the parable itself; and, we may add, it never would have been attempted by so able a man if he had not been fettered by a preconceived doctrine that the Church is the Kingdom of God. Alas! when so great and good men fall into such palpable contradictions.

The reader can extend the self-evident contradictions involved. Thus e.g. after this supposed immediate return the bestowal of rewards is to be engrafted to accord with the parable. But this resolves itself into, as facts attest, an assignment to suffering, persecution, and martyrdom. Can we credit such a forced interpretation? The student will also observe how it utterly demolishes Dr. McCosh's (with many others) theory, that the Kingdom is "God's reign in the heart." If this is true, how could the truthful Jesus present a parable in answer to such an introductory question, which places the Kingdom not as then present in the hearts of believers, but as future—dependent upon His going away and future return. The absurdity and unscripturalness of the Church-Kingdom theory is seen on all sides as the converging testimony of Scripture appears. We now append as a fitting conclusion Dr. Craven's (Lange's Com. Rev. p. 100) remarks: "Matt. 13: 31-52. It is contended that in the parables of the Mustard Seed and the Leaven especially Jesus taught concerning the Kingdom, that it begins silently and imperceptibly in the heart and in the community, and gradually increases. The force of the argument is derived from the assumption that in these parables the thing next to the verb of comparison is that to which the Kingdom is compared—that in one case it is compared to the mustard seed and in the other to the little leaven which the woman hid. But if this rule hold good in one case it must in all others; and under its operation we have the Kingdom likened (v. 24) to the sower, (v. 45) to the merchantman, (22: 1) to the householder, (22: 2) to the King, etc. Manifestly in all these instances we must pass over the next thing to the verb of comparison to seek for the object of comparison. Doubtless the true explanation of the phrase 'the Kingdom is likened,' etc., is the one given by Alford on Matt. 13 : 24, 'is like the whole circumstances about to be detailed,' i.e. the entire parable presents a truth concerning the Kingdom. With this explanation, unity as to the nature of the Kingdom (which on the current interpretation is lacking) is brought into this whole series of parables, and these and all the other parables are brought into beautiful consistency with all the other teachings of our Lord. The series in Matt. may be regarded as setting forth that nothing impure, imperfect, or immature, can have place in the Kingdom—in such case the good grain, the mighty tree, the thoroughly leavened lump, the treasure separated from the field, the pearl, the good fish, will represent it."

PROPOSITION 109. An examination of the passages of Scripture supposed to teach the Church-Kingdom theory will confirm our doctrine of the Kingdom.

The Propositions already given, and the concessions of candid writers like Neander concerning the apostolic views, indicate that all such passages are susceptible, by a fair comparison of the Word and interpretation, of a consistent explanation in accord with covenant, prophecy, and the position of the early Church.

Obs. 1. The passage usually quoted against us is the one in John 18 : 36, "My Kingdom is not of this world; if my Kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered to the Jews, but now is my Kingdom not from hence." There is not the remotest declaration here that the Church is the Kingdom, but it is inferred on the ground that a Kingdom was established and that this describes a purely spiritual one which must be the Church. Leaving the parties who use this Scripture against our doctrine of a visible, real world-dominion to reconcile it with their own alleged objections drawn from it, when advocating the same visible world-dominion in describing Millennial portrayals, etc., we content ourselves with merely giving the reasons why this passage is not only not hostile but in actual harmony with our doctrine. The view that we have all along maintained is this, viz., that this Kingdom, Theocratic-Davidic, is of divine origin and is specially claimed as God's, He Himself being the Ruler in and through the reigning King; that this Kingdom, being not of worldly but divine outgrowth, is promised to Jesus Christ as the promised David's Son; and that, owing to the foreknown rejection of the Messiah, etc., is postponed to the ending of this age or dispensation. The language of Christ accurately corresponds with our previous propositions, for we have (1) "My Kingdom," a Kingdom belonging to Jesus as covenanted; (2) "is not of this world"—it is a Kingdom, as we have already shown, not of a human-devised order of arrangement, not of earthly derivation, but heaven-derived and belonging to a renewed order of arrangement, in the future, to "the world to come," having been, as prophets and as Jesus Himself, previously predicted, postponed; (3) "if My Kingdom were of this world, then would My servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews," i.e. if it were not of "the world to come," if it were not postponed to the end of the age and to a new order of things, then would I not be in the power of the Jews for then even my servants would fight, but the Kingdom being postponed from the First to the Second Advent, my servants do not interfere with the authority of Cæsar; (4) "but now is My Kingdom not from hence," i.e. but now, during the present order of things, owing to this very postponement my Kingdom is not of this world. This itself would forbid the idea of the Church Kingdom, and as the emphasis is on the word "now" there is implied that at some future time, as our argument demands, His Kingdom would be established. Besides this, the peculiar and significant "but now" implies even more, viz., that His Kingdom will ultimately, although not at present, embrace a jurisdiction or dominion over the world, crushing and overcoming all resistance, which corresponds with what is predicted, Rev. 11 : 15, "the Kingdoms of this world are become the Kingdom of our Lord and His Christ, and He shall reign forever and ever." Our view causes no antagonism between the two passages, but receives and harmonizes both of them ; for, as the prophets describe the Kingdom, it is not world-derived but will at a certain period of time manifest itself in the appearing of the King and exhibit a world-dominion.

The way this passage is pressed beyond its natural meaning reminds us of the interpretation given by some fanatics to another, "all things are lawful for me." We commend, on the other hand, the language of Van Oosterzee (Ch. Dog., vol. 2, p. 621) : "With regard to the nature of this Kingly dominion it is to be observed that it must be ascribed to the Lord, not in a metaphorical but in a natural sense. Wrongly would any derive the opposite from the frequently misinterpreted words of John 18 : 36. This saying of the Lord indicates only that—which no one doubts—this Kingdom is not of worldly origin, but as the Kingdom of truth establishes itself in the hearts of men ; but by no means that it is not at all a Kingdom, destined also visibly to come." Thus, without denying its plain meaning, he endeavors to incorporate with it his Church-Kingdom view. Schlegel (Philos. His., s. 10) does the same, as follows : "The expression 'My Kingdom is not of this world,' does not imply that it was not to be in this world a real and effective power, with a form and organization clearly defined. Many have read so much or inferred so much from this declaration, that they could not adopt an easier or more polite method of shutting out this divine Empire of truth from the world." So Schmidt (Bib. Theol., p. 247) remarks : "According to Matt. 12 : 28 and 11 : 12 ; Luke 17 : 20, 21, the Kingdom exists on earth, and all nations on the earth shall receive it, Matt. 13 : 31, 33 ; 8 : 11, 12 ; 24 : 14." Compare Seiss's view, p. 338, Last Times, and his quotations from Tholuck, Stier, Krummacher, Trench, Alford, Luther, and King. Turning from these utterances (opposed to the idea of invisibility), we give a few others in accord with our view. Demarest and Gordon (Christology, quoted p. 192, Nathanael, vol. 11), say : "Christ said 'My Kingdom is not of this world' (Cosmos), John 18 : 36 ; but He also said to His Apostles, 'Ye are not of the world' (Cosmos), John 15 : 19. The two propositions are identical ; if the first one proves that Christ's Kingdom shall never be literally on the earth, then the second proves that the disciples, to whom He addressed these words, were not then literally on the earth, because neither were of the 'Cosmos.' On the other hand, if it be true that while the disciples 'were not of this world' (John 16 : 16), they might remain in it (John 17 : 25), it is also true that this Kingdom is not of this world, and yet shall be in it ; for what may be said of Christ and His disciples can also be said of His Kingdom. The import of the passage is transparent. Christ's Kingdom, in its origin, form, spirit, economy, nature, and object, is not in any of these respects like the kingdoms of earth, such as Cæsar's. The anticipation of the saints will be realized, Rev. 5 : 10, 'we shall reign on the earth.'" Comp. Brookes's El. Proph. Interp., p. 149, and his quotation from Koppe, which however misapprehends the real facts in the case at the future setting up of the Kingdom, when denying that a resort will be made to violence—which is contradicted by the predicted action of the stone, the war with Christ and His army, Rev. 19, the overthrow of Antichrist and all enemies (see e.g. Props. 115, 123, 147, 161, 162, 163, etc.). Christ's servants were not then to fight, and to say that they never will, is to contradict the most express predictions in God's Word. Sirr (The First Resurrection, p. 89), "My Kingdom is not of this world, is not derived from it, if My Kingdom were out of this world, that is, were world-derived, then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered to the Jews, but My Kingdom is not now, henceforward, or here, that is, in the world. From this place we learn that the Messiah's Kingdom was not to be world-derived. It is to be given directly by the Father, and to be based on the ruins of every earthly dynasty. It was not to be set up at that time. There is a time to come, viz., the Palingenesis, commencing in the restitution of all things, when it shall thenceforward be set up here. Such is the direct, plain, natural import of the place before us. Were this the only passage in the Bible bearing on the subject, I would here take my stand and assert that Christ must yet be King over all the earth." Judge Jones (Notes, p. 343, etc.) has excellent remarks, insisting upon a Kingdom in the future, world-embracing, etc., but vitiates much by not properly discriminating between the Divine Sovereignty (Props. 80, 89), and the covenanted Kingdom of David's Son. He correctly notices that as Christ assumed that He should have a Kingdom in the future and hence that He was a King, this was observed by Pilate, who instantly drew the inference, "Thou art a King, then." The impression left on Pilate's mind is evinced by the super-description of the cross, "This is the King of the Jews." The student can easily add to such quotations. Christ positively asserts that His Kingdom was not then in existence (Props. 56, 57, 58), and hence not the Church, but would be at some time in the future.

The student will observe that the stress lies on the two statements, "not of this world," and "but now." King (Mors. of Criticism, vol. 1, p. 421), correctly says of the first clause: "It might be translated or at least paraphrased, My Kingdom is not derived from any powers or authority in this world." This is precisely the truth concerning a Theocracy, for to be such it must be heaven or God-derived. Now mark well: it is of this Theocracy that the declaration is made, and that it was not then to be established (being, as we have shown, postponed to the Second Advent). This language, therefore, in its appropriateness and force, alone harmonizes with our position. For if the spiritual Kingdom (invisible reign, etc.), were denoted, the latter clause would not be true, for our opponents say that was in existence. The emphasis that may be laid on "this world" (and which confirms our view) has been well expressed by Krummacher (Suffering Saviour, p. 248): "He only asserts that His Kingdom was not of this world, and clearly intimates by laying the emphasis on the word 'this,' that another aeon than the present would certainly see His delegates seated on thrones, and His word and Gospel the magna charta of all nations" (comp. Steir, Words of Jesus, loci). In opposition to our view, our opponents push the first clause to an extreme which (comp. Schlegel's Philos. of His., sec. 10) will not allow a Kingdom in the world at all of "a real and effective power with a form and organization clearly defined," but which expressed opinion they themselves again flatly contradict when—overlooking this passage—commenting e.g. on Dan. chs. 2 and 7, Rev. 11 : 15, etc. The history of the interpretation and application of this passage would form in itself an interesting essay: the primitive view, the Papal opinion, how it was used in the struggle against the Popes (as e.g. in the contest of Louis XIV. in 1682, when—Mosheim's Ch. His., vol. 3, p. 309, note 81—it was employed as evidence that the civil and temporal should be separated from the spiritual power), how it was understood by the Reformers and their successors (as e.g. what inconsistencies were observable in its use, being employed against the Popes when those using it claimed for the Church a kind of Theocracy which could enforce obedience, etc., through the civil power, etc.), the various interpretations succeeding (and the contradictions again involved, etc.). The perversion and abuse of this Scripture is something remarkable, and a sad commentary on the weakness and prejudice of human nature. Employed as a weapon against others it became a deadly shaft when turned against themselves—charging others with forming a Kingdom of this world, they proceeded to do the same thing, only claiming a higher degree of spirituality. In view of the great stress constantly laid on this passage, we may refer to the decided opinion expressed by Dr. Craven in his "Excursus on the Kingdom" in Lange's Com. Rev., a most admirable paper. He remarks (p. 100) that the "now" "may be regarded as a particle of time: My Kingdom is not now established," and then pertinently asks whether Jesus would inform "a heathen" of the truth (alleged by our opponents) and conceal it from His disciples after the experience of Luke 22 : 29, 30, and continued to conceal it after the experience of Acts 1 : 3; Luke 24 : 45. Craven's view makes a consistent whole, avoiding antagonisms between the preaching and teaching of disciple and Master. It is the only interpretation that will do it.

Obs. 2. Rom. 14 : 17, "For the Kingdom of God is not meat or drink; but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." From this is inferred that the Church or piety is the Kingdom. But this passage must be explained in accordance with the general tenor of the Word, and if this is done then the idea of the Apostle is that the Kingdom we hope to enter is not one of (leading to or tending to, e.g. Rom. 8 : 6, etc.) meat and drink (hence no need of the contention, etc., previously mentioned concerning meats), but one of righteousness, peace, and joy. Or, the Kingdom is not obtained by meat and drink but by righteousness, etc. If we are to understand it differently and by way of inference, then some passage direct and explicit, teaching that the Church is the Kingdom, ought to be produced to prove its correctness (comp. Meyer, Com. loci). Matt. 6 : 32, "But seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness" only has reference to seeking an interest in the Kingdom; for, as many commentators admit, the connection in which it stands in Luke 12 : 31 shows this, Jesus having immediately added : "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom," etc. The passage in Luke 16 : 16, "the law and the prophets were until John; since that time the Kingdom of God is preached and every man presseth into it" (also Matt. 11 : 11-12) has already been alluded to, and the satisfactory explanation given by Judge Jones (Notes on Matt. 11 : 12) proves that instead of every man pressing into it, every man, i.e. the generality of men pressed against or resisted it, which accords with the historical facts as given by John 1 : 11; 12 : 37; Rom. 11 : 8, 11, 12; Matt. 23 : 13, etc. This interpretation sustained by the language prevents it becoming contradictory to others.* The passages found in Matt. 16 : 28; Mark 9 : 1; Luke 9 : 27; Matt. 10 : 23, will be examined in connection with the transfiguration, Prop. 153. The language addressed to Nicodemus, John 3 : 3, 5, is of such a nature that we have a preparatory work described preliminary to a future seeing and entering into the Kingdom, or, as will be shown under the Prop. relating to the resurrection it is so far-reaching that it also includes that birth of the Spirit which Jesus Himself experienced, viz., that of the resurrection from the dead, which is preliminary to the inheriting, etc., of the future Kingdom.

Meyer, Com. on Rom. 14 : 17, makes a direct reference to "the Messianic Kingdom which shall be set up at the Sec. Coming of Christ." Other writers, as Craven, Lummis, "Senex," etc., give the same interpretation. Matt. 11 : 11 has been already sufficiently noticed; but it may be observed additionally that if the current explanation of Matt. 11 : 11, 12, and Luke 16 : 16 is the correct one then it proves too much for the Church-Kingdom advocates, for (1) it ignores the theory that the Christian Church or Kingdom was only established on the day of Pentecost; (2) it makes a Church or Kingdom existing from the days of John into which persons entered and John the Baptist the least one of all that entered; (3) and it introduces an antagonism between two supposed Kingdoms. The palpable contradictions into which leading popular commentaries fall can readily be tested by any reader if he will take the trouble to compare their comments on these passages, and then see how quickly they forget them when explaining the day of Pentecost or even Acts 1 : 8, etc. A theory that introduces such confusion and antagonism is, to say the least, open to grave suspicion of unsoundness.

Obs. 3. It is supposed that the most direct Scripture in support of the Church-Kingdom theory is found in Col. 1 : 13, "Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness and hath translated us into the Kingdom of His dear Son." This undoubtedly is the strongest proof text that can be presented in favor of the prevailing view. But (1) if we receive our version as it stands the language is easily reconcilable with the principle that future blessings are spoken of as present, as exemplified in Heb. 12 : 22, 23, etc. (comp. Prop. 65, Obs. 9). This is a peculiarity of Paul's, so that in Rom. 8 : 30 he has those who are justified also glorified, when, as is taught in the same chapter, the period of glorification is still future. In the context itself the allusion to the inheritance of the saints and deliverance from darkness indicates the same, seeing that "the inheritance" is only bestowed at the Sec. Advent and that a complete deliverance from darkness (which includes death and the grave) is only obtained at the Coming of Christ. This Scripture must be explained according to the general analogy of Scripture, and it is too indefinite to form the foundation of so important a doctrine as that of the Church-Kingdom. (2) Some authors, however, give a different rendering from our version, making the reading "changed us for the Kingdom of His dear Son," contending that the preposition "eis" should be translated "for" as, e.g. in Luke 9 : 62, etc.<sup>1</sup> Either view will secure uniformity of promise, etc.<sup>1</sup> A passage from which it is inferred that John was then in the Kingdom (i.e. Church) is found in Rev. 1 : 9, "I, John, who am your brother and companion in tribulation and in the Kingdom and patience of Christ." The best comment on this is to be found in 2 Tim. 2 : 12, "If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him," or in Rom. 8 : 17, "If children, then heirs; heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together." Commentators (as e.g. Bloomfield, loci) frankly admit this explanation and think that reference is made to the hope of the Kingdom expressed in verse 6. Hence John declares in the most decided manner his strong faith and hope of sharing in the Kingdom.<sup>2</sup>

---

* Let the student see the excellent and satisfactory explanation of Dr. Craven, p. 96, Lange's Com. Rev., as well as the statement given, in detail, under a previous Proposition.

<sup>1</sup> Thus Reed, etc., renders : "Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and changed us for" (or unto, in respect of, in order to, see Graves on Prep. eis) "the Kingdom of the Son of His love." Lyon and others "and hath transferred us over unto the Kingdom," etc. Ward "hath changed us into a better way toward the Kingdom," etc. Wakefield : "For delivering us from the power of darkness and removing us into the Kingdom of His beloved Son." We are content to receive the version as it stands, satisfied to explain it by the general analogy of the Word. Comp. the remarks of Craven (Lange's Com. loci and Excursus), who, if the common rendering is to be received, gives it a de jure force. Comp. Variorum.

<sup>2</sup> Other renderings are given, as e.g. Wakefield's, "I, John, a sharer with you in enduring the affliction of the Kingdom," etc., but we are satisfied with our version. Rev. Hosford (Bib. Sacra, Ap., 1866, p. 310) explains it, "sharer with you in the hope of the Kingdom," and this explanation is presented by numerous writers. Ward (Proph. Times, vol. 12, p. 39) well observes that "the idea that John is with us in tribulation, and is at the same time in the Kingdom of heaven, is inconsistent with itself and with 'the glorious Gospel of the blessed God,' and, therefore, he regards the passage as equivalent to saying, I, John, who also am your brother and companion in tribulation and "in patient waiting for the Coming and Kingdom of Jesus Christ." That is, being now in tribulation, he patiently hopes for deliverance in that Kingdom of Christ's which he is about to delineate. The critical reader is reminded that such phraseology as our version gives was current among the Jews (Knapp's Ch. Theol., s. 99, 1), so that "when a proselyte was received, he was said to be admitted into the Kingdom of heaven, or, of God"—that is, he then became one of "the children of the Kingdom," and as such was entitled to the Kingdom with the other sons or heirs. The certainty of future inheritance was thus expressively denominated. The critical student will observe one feature, in the next Prop. we meet the prevailing view that the Kingdom is not something into which John or a man enters, but is something which enters into John or a person—so conflicting and directly opposite are the views we have to oppose. Tischendorf's New Test., loci, has the mss., S. and A. to give, "in tribulation and the Kingdom and patience in Jesus (A. in Christ)." The passage evidently must be interpreted by the general analogy. Comp. Variorum, etc.; especially Craven, Lange's Com. Rev., p. 103, who quotes Trench as saying : "As yet, however, while the tribulation is present, the Kingdom is only in hope; therefore he adds to these, as that which is the link between them, 'and patience (endurance) of Jesus Christ;' cf. Acts 14 : 22, where exactly these same three, the tribulation, the patience, and the Kingdom occur," etc.

Obs. 4. Several other passages are occasionally urged against our view that may be worthy of attention. Thus 1 Cor. 4 : 20, "For the Kingdom of God is not in word but in power," is thus employed, but it really sustains our position because we all along contend that it is not produced or established by "word" but by "power," not by speech but by authority. If the ancient (Bloomfield, loci) and some modern commentators are correct in making the word "power" an equivalent for "miraculous power," then it is still stronger on our side. At least the language is a rebuke to certain ones who thought that they were rulers, possessed authority, etc., and the appeal is that if they were such their power should be manifested, although Paul himself professes not yet to reign. But if the passage does refer to the power exhibited through the Apostle himself (as in ch. 2 : 4), then the idea is that the Kingdom of God is proclaimed, preached by him not in word, "not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." In any case the verb, being omitted, must be supplied by the force of the context, and therefore is not very decisive in a question of this kind, especially as the word "power," on which critics differ, has a material influence in deciding what is to be supplied. Again, such passages as Luke 22 : 16 ; Matt. 26 : 29 ; Mark 14 : 25, require no particular notice, since over against the few who make a fulfilment in the Church in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the immense majority of those who hold to the Church-Kingdom view concede that it has no reference to the Church here in this dispensation. They indeed refer it to the third heaven, etc., while we regard its fulfilment connected with Luke 22 : 29, 30. Finally many inconclusive inferences are drawn from the phrase in the Lord's Prayer "Thy Kingdom come," the main one being that it is praying for a Kingdom already present, and that its power, etc., may be extended, etc. But this is in direct opposition to the words of the petition which is—as the last saint will do—praying for something to come ; the force of which is admitted by later Fathers, commentators, and others, so that they (as e.g. Cyprian, Augustine, etc.) tell us that the Kingdom meant is the Kingdom of glory or the third heaven. That it has an undoubted reference to the future is evident from the annexed clause, "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven," which by numerous passages we find will not be done before but after the Second Advent. Besides this the prayer is given to the people with the then prevailing belief that the Kingdom of promise was still future, and as we have seen from Jewish expectations, etc., fully accords with the preaching of the Kingdom. A theory must be hard pressed for argument that can change "Thy Kingdom come" into a present, existing one. The Church-Kingdom is grafted upon it irrespective of real fitness and against the protests even of many of our opposers.

Having several times referred to the Lord's Prayer (see Prop. 105), but little need be added. Against the prevailing view which would engraft upon it "the spread of Christianity," "the extension of the Christian Church," "the increase of God's reign in the hearts of the children of men," "the development of the power of religion," "the Church now and the Kingdom of glory in heaven," the Church in its development, the completion at the Sec. Advent, and the events which shall lead to its glorious transformation," etc., etc., we only now, in behalf of Meyer's (Com. loci) scriptural interpretation of the Kingdom prayed for being "the Messianic Kingdom" (understood in the Millenarian sense), propose to the reader two considerations. (1) How comes it that those nearest to the Apostles, and who, it is reasonable to suppose, ought to be the best acquainted with the nature of the Kingdom petitioned for, adopted the Chiliasitic view and prayed for a Kingdom still future to be ushered in at the Sec. Advent? How, with their views of the Advent, etc., could they entertain the modern notions? Hence, the use of the prayer in the apostolic and immediate age enforces our position. (2) It has been proven by Lightfoot, Schoettgen, Gregory, etc., and which is indorsed by various commentators, that Jesus brought together in this prayer what was already in use by the Jews, since they give every sentiment in full taken from Jewish sources. If this is so, then it strongly corroborates our attitude. For, Jesus thus incorporating them without explanation, virtually and emphatically indorsed the Jewish view of the Messianic Kingdom. This He does, too, framing them in the form of a prayer, which in itself is so sacred as to exclude the notion of prevarication, accommodation, etc. It was given to Jews, and mark it, to Jews who went forth and preached the Jewish conception of the Kingdom (Prop. 43, etc., comp. Acts 1 : 6), and hence when they prayed it they did so with Jewish conceptions. Now is it credible that Jesus would give a prayer so framed that He knew His disciples would thus employ and understand it, when He, as modern theologians assert, placed another sense on the words? No! never. We only add that all other passages are readily incorporated and consistently applied by our doctrine. Thus e.g. 1 Thess. 2 : 12, "who hath called you unto His Kingdom and glory" (Lange's loci calleth you into His own, or Amer. Bible Union, "is calling you into His," and comp. Notes of Alford and Lange), only asserts, what we firmly hold, our high calling to both—united—Kingdom and glory. The nearness of Matt. 3 : 2, etc., has been fully explained; the Kingship of Jesus, John 18 : 37, etc., for He was "born King of the Jews," only evidences that in His humiliation we must distinguish—as our whole argument proves—between a King de jure and a King de facto. (Craven in Lange's Rev., p. 95, points this out and adds: "The fact that He is now exalted to the throne of universal dominion, Eph. 1 : 20-22, no more proves that the Kingdom is now established on earth, than did the universal government of God in the days of Daniel prove that the Kingdom of God was then established on earth. We must distinguish between a Kingdom on earth and a Kingdom over earth, which includes earth as a revolted province." With this compare e.g. Props. 79 and 80.) All passages, either directly or indirectly bearing on the subject have been, or will hereafter be, introduced, so that the reader can in every case judge for himself in reference to the consistency of our application.

PROPOSITION 110. The passage most relied on to prove the Church-Kingdom theory utterly disproves it.

Desirous to call especial attention to this passage of Scripture, it is reserved for a separate Proposition. In a careful reading and study of the Church-Kingdom theory, it will be found the most frequently quoted, and adduced as an authority, from Origen down to recent writers as Dr. McCosh, and including a host. In view of the learning, ability, and high standing of those who thus employ it, this Scripture (viz., Luke 17 : 21) deserves marked attention:

Obs. 1. Before discussing the passage itself we may briefly advert to the manner in which it is employed. It is amazing that, notwithstanding the just criticisms of able commentators, the most prominent men will continue to quote it in support of a spiritual Kingdom without the least attempt to show how it can be consistently and logically thus applied. They use it as if no difficulties of any kind were attached to it, and as if it did not prove too much for their own theory. To give a recent example : Dr. McCosh in replying to Renan (Christ. and Posit., p. 245) adduces the passage to prove that "the Kingdom was to be a reign of God in men's hearts" without seeing that if such is its meaning then the wicked Pharisees had already this Kingdom "within" them, for the words were directly addressed to them. When men of acknowledged ability will quote Scripture so loosely it is saddening to the heart, and causes but little hope that many will duly weigh and examine the passage. It is true some allowance must be made for the manner in which such an interpretation is entrenched in the Church itself, and thus becomes unless particular attention is directed to it, part of its theological equipments. Thus, e.g. Dr. Woodhouse (Transl. of Apoc.) lays down as a canon of interpretation that the Kingdom predicted in Revelation is a spiritual Kingdom and to prove it quotes, italicizing it, "the Kingdom of God, says our Lord, is within you, Luke 17 : 21," which canon is indorsed and adopted by Horne (Introd., vol. 2, p. 383). Thus it is erected even as a foundation upon which to build an interpretation. Neander is more guarded, translating (Life of Christ, s. 213) "Behold the Kingdom of God is among you," and in a foot-note opposes the rendering "within you" as inconsistent because it "would not suit the persons addressed, for they were as yet strangers to the Kingdom of God," etc. But bound by his theory to find the spiritual Kingdom he apprehends it in the preceding phrase, which he renders "the Kingdom of God cometh not with outward show (cannot be outwardly seen by human eyes), and in a note adds : "The antithesis is, that it reveals itself invisibly, so as to be seen only by the eye of faith." He afterward forgets and contradicts his own definition of this Kingdom, making it in the course of development a real, out- ward, visible world-dominion. Many such illustrations can be given, found in commentaries, etc., which find here a spiritual Kingdom in one or the other of these sentences, and then make this same inward, invisible Kingdom—a Kingdom only seen by the eye of faith—transform itself somehow into a visible outward Kingdom. This singular transformation notion, so hostile to what they call “a higher spiritual conception,” is evidence that there must be something faulty in the theory itself. The reader need scarcely be reminded that this passage, with the interpretation that it denotes “God’s reign in the heart,” is a favorite one with Spiritualists, etc., to confirm spirit revelations, claims to inspiration, etc. Various sects have built largely on it as indicating special inward light, knowledge, authority, etc.

The interpretation given by believers is well adapted to the use made of it by unbelievers. Thus e.g. Renan (Life of Christ, p. 106) employs it in the interest of humanitarianism as “a true Kingdom of God which each one bears in his heart”; it is “the universal Fatherhood of God,” etc., but remarks that later in the life of Jesus it took more of a Jewish complexion which was connected with “a speedy renewal of the world.” Rob. Dale Owen (The Deb. Land) employs it as Dr. McCosh and others, to denote a Kingdom in the heart, or “the divine, indwelling spirit of truth,” or a kind of ethical, spiritual development. This is the old mistake of confounding the Divine Sovereignty with the covenanted Theocracy, which e.g. Jerome (quoted by Neander, Christian Life, p. 241) expounds, in “From Jerusalem and from Britain the Kingdom of heaven is equally open to you, for the Kingdom of God is within you.” Sermons in every variety not only reproduce Jerome’s statement but (as Dr. Lowrey and others) actually apply the Millennial predictions, en masse, to this Kingdom in the heart, as e.g. illustrated thus: “When we read that the wilderness and the desert shall be made glad we must understand this to refer to the wilderness and desert places of our own hearts.” Writers, whose earnest piety must be admired, thus confound the Divine Sovereignty, God’s universal rule, with the Covenanted Kingdom (comp. Props. 79–90), and chiefly base their conclusions upon this passage misinterpreted, as illustrated e.g. in Flavel’s Fountain of Life. One distinguishing feature in this class of writers is, that without any regard to the context of passages, or their reference to dispensation or time, they are all equally quoted as applicable. Others (as e.g. a writer in Proph. Times, vol. 11, p. 156) have (1) “the reign of God over the heart,” (2) God’s reign in and over the Church, (3) and a Kingdom “to come—something future.” But this is only a reiteration of the old misapprehension, a confounding of things that materially differ, a mistaking the means for the end intended, a substituting of sovereignty for the Kingdom covenanted to the Son of man, and an ignoring of express Covenant promises and the strictly logical facts connected with the Kingdom. It is calculated to prevent a proper conception of the Kingdom covenanted to David’s Son. Farrar (Life of Christ, vol. 2, p. 137) takes the common view, and says that “even they (the disciples) did not fully realize that the Kingdom had already come,” and that they looked forward to some glorious future for its arrival. We only now say that the preachers of a Kingdom, specially appointed and sent forth by Jesus, were far better qualified (comp. Props. 43, 44, etc.) to judge in this matter, and form an estimate of the Kingdom than men are at this late day. Of course, Farrar’s view ignores the abounding passages relating to the postponement (Props. 58, 66, 67, 68, etc.). Even so excellent a writer as Christlieb (Mod. Doubt, p. 416) falls into the error of quoting this passage to sustain the notion of an existing Kingdom “within man,” and adds, “and yet this opinion gains ground.” Alas! this is but too true that it is gaining ground, rooting out the early Church belief, and preparing both the Church and the world for the predicted state of unbelief on this very subject. This heart-Kingdom theory put in the place of the covenanted Kingdom cannot be sustained by the Covenants, by the predictions, by the bestowal of the Kingdom to David’s Son, by the postponement, by the time when it is to be inaugurated, by the means employed at its establishment, etc. It is simply an unwarranted substitution of something, which has always existed (Prop. 84) for a specifically covenanted Theocracy pertaining to David’s Son. Beecher (Ch. Union, Jan. 15th, 1879) gives this increasing belief as follows: “I (Jesus) came to establish a Kingdom that consists in man’s dispositions, and not in an outward and visible Kingdom.” This passage is a favorite with all the mystical and spiritualistic theories, making the Kingdom to be “the predominance in the soul of man of right dispositions," etc. Entire works, as e.g. The Inner Kingdom, are based on a wrong inference taken for granted, viz., "The Kingdom of heaven, Christ said is within us; it is not a physical state; it is a condition of the soul." The Swedenborgian (Christ is Coming; but how? p. 14) is more consistent when he spiritualizes not merely a part but the whole, and makes the Lord Jesus's Coming into the heart to raise up this Kingdom, His Second Coming. Alas!

Obs. 2. The passage, Luke 17 : 20, 21, must be taken in its entire connection. (1) "And when He was demanded of the Pharisees when the Kingdom of God should come." The question when the Kingdom should come determines the answer. And we may well ask the question whether Jesus will give that information to the Pharisees which He uniformly denied to His own disciples during His ministry (Mark 13 : 32) and even after His resurrection (Acts 1 : 7). Would He give that (i.e. exact time) to His enemies which He withheld from His friends? (2) "He answered them and said, the Kingdom of God cometh not with observation." Perhaps no word has received such singular treatment as the word "observation" here; its primary, distinctive meaning is discarded and a meaning given to it which Judge Jones (Essays on the Com. of the Kingdom of God, p. 51) justly remarks "cannot be extracted from it," and as a further proof of it the reader may be challenged to produce another place, either in sacred or secular literature, where any critic has attempted to force any one of these meanings (i.e. outward show, pomp, splendor, etc.) either upon the word 'parateresis' or 'observatio.'" Discarding then all those far-fetched secondary engrafted meanings, and leaving even the highly ingenious (perhaps correct) and critical interpretation of Judge Jones, we are willing to accept of the plain meaning of the word as given by critics, viz., denoting (Olshausen) "the act of perceiving or of observing," (Kypé) "scrupulous attention or observation," etc. Thus then, the Kingdom of God cometh, not as something whose approach may be attentively perceived, observed, considered, i.e. like that of a visible object gradually or even swiftly approaching. It will not come indicating its coming by sending forth any observable signs. This is the simple meaning and it corresponds with the general tenor of the word. This Kingdom is linked, as we have shown, with the Sec. Advent; "the appearing and the Kingdom" (as in the following verses) are united, 2 Tim. 4 : 1. No one will be able to observe its coming, for it comes as the Advent itself, suddenly, unexpectedly, like a thief, illustrated in the parable of the Ten Virgins and by its comparison with the lightning and the days of Noah. So concealed is its approach that it becomes "a snare" to the world, and even to the Church; for its coming is dependent on the fulfilment of "the times of the Gentiles," the completion of a certain number of the elect, the Advent of Christ Himself, which things are not observable to man, being known only to God. There is nothing in the Kingdom itself to indicate the time of its establishment. (3) "Neither shall they say, Lo here! or Lo there!" Not being observable for the reasons just assigned no one is able to direct attention to it in the manner indicated.'

(4) "For, behold, the Kingdom of God is within you." Surely He did not mean that the Pharisees who addressed Him and to whom He spoke, had the Kingdom within them individually, personally. The phrase "within you" is susceptible of an easy and consistent solution. Let the reader consider the Propositions in which we showed conclusively that this Kingdom is covenanted to the Jewish nation; that it is an elect nation; that this Kingdom belonged so exclusively to them that the public ministry of John, Jesus and the disciples was confined (Prop. 54) to that nation; that the Kingdom was tendered to it; that on its refusal (through its representative men) to repent, the Kingdom is postponed and the people who are to receive it as an inheritance with Christ are grafted into that elect nation, etc., and all these considerations show at once how this Kingdom was "within" them. It was truly "within" the nation, it being the elect nation. The persons addressed were part of the nation and chief men of it, and Christ, in strict accordance with covenant relationship and fact, told those very unbelievers, that in view of the tender of this Kingdom to the people of the nation, and of its being preached within the nation, and of its being identified with the nation in the throne and Kingdom of David, this Kingdom is within them. It is connected with them, and within their reach on condition of repentance. It is also equivalent to the expression in Luke 11 : 20, "the Kingdom of God is come upon you," or Matt. 12 : 28, "come unto you," i. e. has attained unto you or pertains to you. The word "within" receives its force from the restriction thrown around the Kingdom by the covenant relationship of the nation, and therefore it has or it is, come "upon" them, "among" them, "within" them, as it could not at that time come to any other nation or people. This is evidenced from the fact that this very Kingdom thus come within the nation is taken from it and given to another engrafted people. If it did not in a high and peculiar sense belong to the nation, it could not be taken from it. Hence the "within you" addressed to these unbelieving Jews is most expressive of their covenanted relationship and the glorious privileges that they as a nation enjoyed. Restricted as it was to that nation, the opportunity was presented of a blessed change, but instead of repentance and faith and a consequent establishment of the Kingdom, a sad history of wickedness intervened.*

(5) If the context following is noticed it confirms our interpretation. He now addresses the disciples : "the days will come when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and ye shall not see it" (v. 22). This, in reply to the question when the Kingdom shall come, indicates what we have already proven, the indefinite postponement of the Kingdom; for the line of Christ's remarks makes the decided impression that the Kingdom will not soon be established, owing to His departure, and that the time of His return and its manifestation is concealed. None of the disciples then living shall see and enjoy it during their lives; and, comparing John 17 : 11, 12, 13; Matt. 9 : 15, etc., these days of absence extend down to our own time, and will only end when the day of the Lord Jesus (Phil. 1 : 6; 1 Cor. 1 : 5, 8; 2 Cor. 1 : 14; 1 Thess. 5 : 2, etc.) shall be revealed. In verse 23 He cautions against deceivers who shall pretend to found this Kingdom, which again intimates that it will not come very soon. In reply to the question when, He, taking the fundamental fact that the Kingdom itself is dependent on His appearing, directs attention to the sudden and unmistakable (v. 24) Coming of the King, of the Son of man "in His day." And (v. 25) directly shows that the Kingdom cannot soon appear, because of His suffering and rejection by that generation. Then He points out the condition of the world at the period of His Advent, that it will be a season of forgetfulness, unbelief, etc., as in the days of Noah and Lot. And yet at such a period, when men almost generally shall discard the notion of the imminency of His coming and the setting up of His Kingdom, this question of the Pharisees shall be realized, for "even thus will it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." This is followed up by a parable representing a period of trial as intervening, that although such trials were before them men should pray and not faint, because although God "bear long with them" (expressive of delay) He shall finally deliver them, concluding with the deeply impressive question (alas, so abundantly verified in this day), "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" Jews and Gentiles, with here and there an exception, discard all faith in this personal Coming of the Son of man, and the Kingdom covenanted to Him and identified with that Coming. The delay is to them ample evidence that it never will be witnessed. Now in the direct answer to the Pharisees, and the added remarks to the disciples, together with the corroborating state of the Church and world, we have reiterated, what has already been proven, that the Kingdom was nigh to the Jewish nation, that, owing to their sinfulness, it was not established but is postponed to an indefinite period in the future, viz., "to the day when the Son of man is revealed" (comp. Props. 56-68).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Bloomfield, Com. loci, has well observed that many professed versions are rather interpretations sought out. Van Oosterzee (Lange's Com. Luke, loci) explains: "literally, with or under observation, so that it can be recognized and observed by outward tokens, and that one could exclaim with assurance, Lo here, lo there!" To this Craven (Lange's Rev., p. 96, foot-note) attributes the idea "it cometh not with the signs of a gradual approach." The idea of a sudden, unexpected Coming—especially to the Jewish nation, to whom this is specially addressed—is particularly impressed; and how this will be verified is stated in immediate connection with the Advent. Various propositions, hereafter, will develop, in detail, this very feature.

<sup>2</sup> Dean Alford, Com. loci—"The misunderstanding which rendered these words 'within you,' meaning this in a spiritual sense 'in your hearts,' should have been prevented by reflecting that they are addressed to the Pharisees, in whose hearts it certainly was not. We have the very expression, Xen. Anab., 1 : 3, entos auton. See also John 1 : 26, and 12 : 35, both of which are analogous expressions" (comp. Neander, Obs. 1). It is noticeable that even those who in some form admit of a present existing spiritual Kingdom are unwilling to concede that this expression teaches it. Thus e.g. Steir (Words of Jesus, loci) expressly says: "It does not, as superficial expositors dream (here and verse 37), refer the Kingdom of Christ to the invisible region of the heart." Dr. Brown (Com. loci) cannot, with his views of the Church, make this a purely "internal and spiritual character," declaring, "But it has its external side too." They find especial difficulty to harmonize this saying with their engrafted spiritual views, with e.g. their (Fairbairn, etc.) expressed opinions of the Kingdom portrayed in the parable of the Tares. It is sufficient to say that if this Kingdom is "God's reign in the hearts," or "pious dispositions," it is only requisite to apply it (as synonymous) to e.g. Matt. 3 : 2, or 4 : 23, or 8 : 12, or 11 : 11, or 16 : 28, etc., and notice the absurdities introduced. An interpretation to be valid must be consistent and in agreement with the Kingdom wherever mentioned. The prevailing view is that of the Romanist, Dr. Butter (Life of Jesus, p. 358), who says that "the Kingdom of God within you" denotes "that interior one (Kingdom) which God possesses in the souls of the just, after destroying these the empire of the devil, by the doctrine of the Gospel and by the infusion of the Holy Ghost; in other words, by faith and charity he reigns triumphantly in the hearts of all his elect." Lyon, Thomas, and others render "the majesty of the heavens is among you," but while this introduces a more consistent application (thus avoiding the contradictions by a reference to the person of Jesus) this is not the usual meaning of the phrase (as is readily seen by attempting to make it synonymous with numerous other passages where the phrase occurs), and is not the Jewish conception and usage, thus violating the general analogy of Scripture on the subject.

<sup>3</sup> We have purposely avoided taking any liberties with our version, accepting of its rendering, although if we were to take those made by Neander, MacKnight, Phavorinus, Jones, and others, it would, in several places, confirm still more our view. But such aid is not necessary and therefore no appeal is made to it.

Obs. 3. Because of the free use made of this passage, a few more remarks on the meaning of "observation" are in place. Coming to this Scripture with a preconceived notion of a Kingdom spiritual and invisible in this dispensation, the multitude engraft on the original word such expressions as "outward show," "splendor," "pomp," "outward display," "external display of majesty," etc., which do not legitimately belong to the word translated "observation," but are given to it, to suit a theory, on the ground that such things are observed! As Judge Jones (Philo-Basilicus, Essays) has at length shown, nowhere else is it even attempted to render such a meaning.* Commentators who employ this secondary sense (as e.g. Bloomfield, Olshausen, etc.) frankly admit that this secondary sense only becomes a conjectural one, because they cannot find another example to verify it. Surely this in itself should be already sufficient reason for the student to regard the secondary sense with suspicion, but we have two additional ones to add. (1) This secondary sense is not true even of the Church. The Church comes with observation, as e.g. on the day of Pentecost. It was established with "outward show" and is perpetuated with the same, having a preached Word, ministers, officers, external ordinances, etc., and the saints are to be a light, a witness of the truth to the world. The faithful body of believers is to manifest itself as a testimony to all, and, of course, this cannot be done unless they can be observed, etc. (2) This secondary sense is not correct concerning the Kingdom of Christ. Let the reader notice what the Covenant demands, what the prophets predict, respecting this Kingdom. Is it not to come with such "outward show," such "splendor" and "external majesty," that it shall arrest the attention of, and be witnessed by, all living? Is it not to occupy the place of other kingdoms and to be exalted to the sovereignty of the world? Multitudes of passages teach this; and the least consideration of the predicted glory of the Kingdom, its universality, the restoration of the Jews connected with it, the worship of nations, etc., will at once show that, when it arrives, it will be the great and absorbing object of "observation." Indeed so evident is this, that we find admissions on all sides conceding it, even although opposed to a previous interpretation of the first part of the passage. Thus, e.g. Schmidt (Bib. Theol. of the N. T., p. 246), after spiritualizing this Kingdom, admits that "the Lord also depicts in v. 24 this same Kingdom as appearing visibly." Olshausen (Com. loci) advocating the spirituality of the Kingdom in the reply to the Pharisees also claims that in the same chapter it is alluded to as external, external in its perfection. Having already pointed out the inconsistency of this development theory of a claimed higher (spiritual) position to a lower one, it is only necessary to add that all such admissions prove the correctness of our interpretation of the chapter, and the incoherency of their own theory.

Van Oosterzee (Lange's Com. Luke, p. 268) rejects the idea that this is to be pressed to exclude the visibility of the Kingdom. While we cannot receive his explanation entire (because contradictory), yet we indorse this utterance: "Not seldom has the saying, that 'the Kingdom of God comes not with observation,' been misused and exaggerated, in the sense that this Kingdom will never on earth display itself in a glorious form worthy of itself. No; the Kingdom of God comes not with observation, but when it has once come, we shall nevertheless be well able to say: Lo here!" But he rejects (p. 266) the view of Chrysostom, Luther, etc., that "within you" means "in your hearts," and gives his reasons for preferring the translation "in the midst of you." The fact is, that the elect condition of the nation necessitating the offer of the Kingdom—bringing it nigh to it—is too much overlooked, and that the relationship of these "children of the Kingdom" to the tender offers the most ample and satisfactory explanation. Spiritualize it, and then ask whether such spiritualisms can explain either the language of the prophets as to its world-dominion, or what Kingdom was really taken from the Jews.

---

* See Philo-Basilions's Essays in Literalist, vol. 3, and Essay No. 4, where reference is made to Campbell, Ravanelli, Munthe, Scott, Cartwright, Illyricus, Michaelis, Bloomfield, Kype, etc. So also compare Dr. Clarke (Com. loci), who refers to Kype and others having shown from Greek writers that it means "scrupulous observation," i.e. it will be easily discerned. Olshausen (Com. loci) says: "It denotes literally the act of perceiving, of observing, and then, secondarily, everything that excites observation."

Obs. 4. The meaning that so many deduce from the expression "within you," is not only opposed by ourselves but finds opponents among many who have no sympathy with our doctrine, and who are in doctrinal position with the Church-Kingdom party. Advocating a spiritual Kingdom, yet they cannot find it a consistent measure to take the phrase "within you" as indicative of God's reign in the heart," etc., for, as they tell us, this would prove too much of the unbelieving party addressed. Hence Neander takes the position (see Obs. 1, above) that it ought to be rendered "among you." Olshausen informs us that Paulus, Fleck, Borneman, De Wette explain it, "among you." The marg. reading also gives "among you." Bloomfield (loci) gives "among you." Barnes (Com. loci) gives both "within" and "among you." On the other hand Dr. Campbell, Dr. Jones, and many others insist on retaining "within you." So far as the sense of the passage is concerned, either one or the other would suffice, although our preference is for the latter. Again, in the efforts to avoid the prevailing application of the "within you," some, as Dr. Neander, assert that "the Kingdom of God was manifested in his own appearance," and, as Prof. Whiting explains it, "the King is among you." So also Dr. Thomas and the Christadelphians generally. Whatever truth (Prop. 56) there may be in King and Kingdom being convertible, yet the peculiarity of the expression embracing a word that legitimately means "within," and the use of the previous word "observation" forbids the application of this to the person of Jesus Christ, for then He would be "within" those unbelievers and He could not be observed. Besides this, such an explanation is forced, being derived from the third one given by Cornelius à Lapide,* and which was based on the Divine Sovereignty of God; while the Kingship of Christ, in view of the foreseen rejection, is held in abeyance, being founded on His covenanted humanity and His relationship to God, after the performance of an allotted mission (Props. 81-90). The explanation given under Obs. 2 is in correspondence with and unites the statements of the Old and New Testaments, and accurately accords with the then existing status of the Jewish nation.

Obs. 5. This Kingdom "within you" could not be the Christian Church, for that was afterward instituted and it was not anything that the Pharisees were in personal actual enjoyment of, and to apply it either to the person of Christ or to a spiritual reign is to bring it into conflict with covenanted expectations and the preaching of John the Baptist, Jesus, and the disciples (Props. 19-23 and 38-49).

Hence, even Bloomfield (loci) says, that to make this phrase significant of "the internal and spiritual principle" "is forbidden by the context." How he can reconcile his own view with such an admission is something that we cannot understand. Enemies and friends concede to us all that we require.

---

* Vide Philo. Basilicus's quotations from Cornelius à Lapide, p. 17 Essays, Lit., vol. 3.

Obs. 6. While the approach of the Kingdom itself is not discoverable by any observation, being dependent on the secret knowledge of God Himself as to the time and to the completion of the number of the elect, yet this does not forbid a certain approximative knowledge concerning the period of its approach. While not in itself giving forth any visible signs of its Coming, yet the Divine Spirit has given us other signs, other events as a kind of guide by which we may know, more or less, the nearness of its Coming. Jesus Himself enumerates a lengthy series of events, and emphatically adds, Luke 21 : 31 ; “So likewise, ye when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the Kingdom of God is nigh at hand.” Having already used this passage in sustaining the postponement of the Kingdom, it is only necessary to say that neither the Church, visible or invisible, nor “God’s reign in the heart,” could be denoted, since “these things” specified are running their course down to the present day. Still attention is directed to “these things” to urge us to watchfulness and anticipation of the Coming of the Kingdom undiscoverable by any outward, visible signs. Even the believing, owing to this lack of external observation of the Kingdom, are represented as in danger of having its approach coming upon them most unexpectedly, while the world, rejecting those merciful and gracious predictions, is buried in slumber and caught in “a snare,” or “net.” But few, wholly dependent on faith and not on the Kingdom itself presenting preliminary external signs for observation, will accept of the prophecies pertaining to this matter and be looking for, watching for, and awaiting with hope the Kingdom. These signs, not of the Kingdom itself but of things existing when it is to come, will be enumerated under another Proposition (comp. Props. 173 and 174).

We may in conclusion quote several writers who reject the prevailing interpretation. Rev. H. Dana Ward, in an interesting article, “The Inhabited Earth Shortly to Come” (Proph. Times, vol. 12, p. 37), resists the notion that the Church is the visible Kingdom of the Messiah, and among other texts examines Luke 17 : 21-26. He justly repudiates a Kingdom existing in the Pharisees, and also “among you” (i.e. in the person of the King then present), for the former would honor the Pharisees above His disciples, and the latter is opposed by the context following and the references to this Kingdom being still future. He makes the “observation” to be “outward watching,” and the “within you” to be an inward looking for it and preparation for it. This, however, is to lose the force of “within” pertaining—not to believers but—to the Jewish nation, viz., the Kingdom actually tendered to them in view of the elect position occupied. We thus preserve its depth of meaning, so pregnant with tremendous results. Craven (Lange’s Rev., p. 67) points out that the question and answer are both in the present tense, the Pharisees asking : “When cometh the Kingdom of God?” and adds : “The question and the answer are but illustrations of that law proper to all languages, but pre-eminently to the Greek, by which a certain future may be represented by a verb in the present ; illustrations may be found, Matt. 26 : 2 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 42-44 (see Jelf, Winer, Kühner, and grammarians generally). To the conclusion that the language of our Lord must be understood as having reference to the future, it may also be remarked, we are shut up by the following considerations : The supposition that He indicated an existing Kingdom (a) implies that it was set up in (or among) the Pharisees ; (b) disconnects His words from the immediately following address to the disciples, while the contrary supposition brings them into manifest and beautiful connection therewith, and with His other utterances.” In a foot-note on “observation” and “within,” he adds : “The Pharisees ask ‘when cometh the Kingdom of God?’ He answers, ‘It cometh not with the signs of a gradual approach ; neither shall they say, Lo here, or lo there, for the Kingdom of God is in the midst of you.’ Then turning to His disciples, He says : ‘The days will come when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and ye shall not see it. And they shall say to you, Lo here, or lo there : go not after nor follow. For as the lightning that lighteneth (flashing) from one part under heaven shineth to the other part under heaven (comes not with the signs of a gradual approach), so also shall the Son of man be in His day,' etc. Does not the very unity perceptible in the entire address—the vividness of the scene it presents—the manifest oneness of the doctrine with that elsewhere taught by our Lord, especially on the Mount of Olives—place the stamp of truth on the hypothesis? Does it not become manifest that this passage, so far from teaching the doctrine of a present establishment of the Kingdom, must be numbered among those that connect the establishment with the Sec. Advent."

PROPOSITION 111. The Kingdom being identified with the elect Jewish nation, it cannot be established without the restoration of that nation.

This has been proven in preceding Propositions, but as the proof is abundant and cumulative, additional ones may be assigned. For, if the Kingdom is the Theocratic-Davidic, then embracing the throne, Kingdom, and land of David, it must also include the nation to whom it was alone specially covenanted; that is, the Jewish people, one branch of Abraham's natural seed, viz., in the line of the Patriarchs and their descendants. Hence, the restoration of this nation naturally falls in with the Divine Purpose—is fully identified with it.

All those who deny the restoration of the Jewish nation confine themselves to isolated predictions which they endeavor either to spiritualize or make conditional, forgetting that the main foundation of our doctrine is left untouched by them, viz., the necessity imposed by oath-bound Covenant for such a restoration. The purpose of Redemption, as exhibited in the Theocratic Plan, makes such a restoration imperative. Hence, the Millenarian scheme makes the restoration of the Jews an integral part of its system. But the reader will observe that, aside from this basis of ours, many who are opposed to our doctrine as a whole still accept, being forced to it by Scripture testimony, of this restoration as something future to be realized. Thus e.g. Faber in Diss. on the Propht., and Sac. Calendar of Propht., ably presents the subject. Brookes (El. Propht. Interp., p. 63) mentions Cyprian, Jerome, Chrysostom, Theophilus, Alexandrinus, Augustine, Bede, Hugo, Lyra, Dean Prideaux, Hilary, Ambrose, Aquinas, Scotus, Cajetan, and others (for the list might be indefinitely swelled, including Origen, Locke, Clarke, Doddridge, Erasmus, Poole, Simeon, Primasius, Owen, Scott, McKnight, etc.), who hold to a national restoration of the Jews while being neutral or opposed to Millenarian tenets, and points out how Lorinus, the Jesuit, even rejected this restoration on the ground "because it leads to the heresy of Chiliasm, which Pope Damasus had condemned in Apollinaris." The Jesuit, at least, had the perception to see that this tenet was an important feature in our system of faith. Many evidently entertained this belief of whom we have no direct account, as of "the many" alluded to by Jerome, and so e.g. indirectly mentioned, as by Evelyn (Diary, vol. 1, p. 325), who states that the "renowned mathematician, Mr. Oughtred, entertained the belief that the Jews would be converted by the personal appearance of the Saviour."

Obs. 1. The only objection of force that can be urged against our view is, that these promises of restoration are conditional, but this has been met under Props. 18 and 46-52. If we can make the Covenant—confirmed by God's oath, and its ultimate fulfilment again and again affirmed by holy men—conditional, then everything else is conditional; then the foundations of Christian hope crumble away beneath us, and nothing stable remains. It is a fact of weight in this discussion to note, that a vast number of writers, opposed to our doctrine, and inclined to spiritualize the predictions as much as possible, are still forced by the singularly effective language of the prophets to admit a restoration of the Jews to their own land. The powerfully converging testimony is too strong even for them to refuse credence to it ; and they give us, urging with just and conclusive reasons, the scriptural ground for such a faith, although it badly fits into their system, owing to its being, more or less, in antagonism to their theory of exclusive spiritual blessings, of the abandonment of the wall of partition between nations, and of the remaining portions attached to the same predictions. Even such a writer as Whitby acknowledges, owing to the force of Luke 21 : 24 ; Jer. 31 : 27-40, etc., such a restoration and the rebuilding of Jerusalem. Indeed, some even see that its unconditionality is asserted in various places ; that they are restored not on account of their own holiness but to preserve the faithfulness of God ; and that Israel being carefully distinguished from the Gentiles (as e.g. Isa. 49, Marg. reading, etc.) must, in order to preserve the Divine arrangement, also be gathered. The application of passages relating to the earthly Jerusalem by Waggoner (Ref. of Age to Come) to the New Jerusalem, because the Old is cast out and the Son of the Free Woman is the heir, misapprehends the Barren Woman (see Prop. 118), does not distinguish between the heir and the subject, unites things which God has separated, violates the promises of God to His own ancient city and people, and, in brief, ignores the inheritance of Christ, as David's Son.

Obs. 2. This too is shown by the election of this Jewish nation (see Props. 24, 54, 55, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, etc., on Election). No nation on earth, saving the Jewish, has God chosen, over whom He condescends to act in the capacity of an earthly Ruler. No nation save it alone has been thus favored with a Theocratic rule. Owing to the sinfulness of the nation this Kingdom was indeed overthrown, and the nation itself, as a nation, driven from its land and placed in a scattered and subject condition among the nations of the earth. It has abundantly been shown that they are still the elect nation, not perpetually cut off. Indeed, if this election were to entirely cease, or if it were diverted to any other nation or nations, then it would be impossible to verify the Covenant promises made directly to it. This subject having been elucidated, it is only necessary to add : the election of the nation, evidenced even now by the necessity Gentiles are under to be grafted into it, continues on by virtue of its covenanted relationship to the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, and if such election is manifested in the establishment of the Kingdom, it involves, fully embraces, its restoration to Palestine.

It is essential to notice what has been proven under various Propositions, viz., that the Theocratic ordering, pertaining as it does to the Jewish nation as a nation (for how else can the Theocratic-Davidic throne and Kingdom related as it is to the nation and of which Jesus, as David's Son, is the heir—Props. 49, 116—be re-established), constitutes the Jewish nation an elect nation. The careful student will ponder the expressive language based on this Theocratic relationship connected with a restoration, such as “ the tribes of Thine inheritance,” “ the cities of Thy holiness,” “ Thy people,” “ Thy holy mountain,” etc. Men may make sport of this feature, and, with Froude (Short Studies, p. 239) may speak of “ the narrow littleness of ‘ the peculiar people,’ ” or with learning contend in order to exalt Gentileism, against its reception ; but against all such we simply oppose God's covenants, and the simple facts of history, and the fulfilment of prophecy, down to the present day, with the abundant assurances that this cast-away condition of the nation is only temporary and not perpetual. Otherwise—mark it well—the government of God over the Jewish nation would prove a failure, and thus God instituted a form of government in the world, which He is unable to have realized (comp. Prop. 201). But God will not fail in His purpose, and hence the strong assertions given, as e.g. Jer. 33 : 15, 26 (with which comp. Props. 47 and 52).

Obs. 3. It is important to keep in view, in the consideration of this subject, that the Jews, living at the time of the First Advent and afterward, believed that the prophets linked a complete restoration of the nation with the Kingdom of the Messiah. This is admitted by all; but if the admission is made, then the question arises, unless the doctrine is true, how comes it that the New Test. employs (as e.g. Rom. 11) language to confirm the Jews in their opinions? Ernesti's one-sided criticism making Rom. 11 to mean a mere possibility of being saved or restored without its being accomplished, is contradicted by the positive language of Paul, his eulogy of the nation, his confident expressions, and the accordance of the same with generally entertained expectations. The application of New Test. passages solely to a conversion of the Jews, and not to a future restoration, is met not only by the same, but also by the directness of passages which teach that the dispersion, desolation, and the treading down of Jerusalem shall continue for an appointed time (and then cease), as well as by the references to this election and covenanted relationship, and by the connection in which such a conversion stands to a restoration to the land.

Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 249, etc.) and others are very unjust and one-sided in their estimate of the New Test. argument in favor of the restoration. They proceed on the principle that whatever is not distinctively repeated, and in detail given, in the New Test. must be rejected, which is derogatory and destructive to the Old Test. (comp. Prop. 16). We dare not overlook the intimate connection existing between the Old and the New; and if we find that the New does not recall or cancel the Old as to promises, that in itself should be sufficient to excite faith in God fulfilling His Word. But we have more than this: we have, as will be shown, confirmatory and express evidence in the New sustaining our position. So clear and decisive is this fact that many of our opponents concede the same to us. Let the reader turn e.g. to Prop. 50, Obs. 24, note, and see the concessions of one of our chief opponents, Dr. Brown. When Williamson (Letters) refers to the silence of Jesus, or of the New Test., he simply ignores what is pointedly stated on the subject. The objections of Oswald (The Kingdom), Waggoner (Reful. of Age to Come), and others, will be fully met as we proceed in the argument, it being sufficient for the present to say that the Jewish view (e.g. Reuss, His. Chris. Theol. Apos. Age, p. 55) is most positively confirmed by the language of the New Test., so that the doctrine was indorsed and perpetuated, without dispute, in the Primitive Church. So clear is this, that even writers largely addicted to spiritualizing the prophecies frankly admit it.

Obs. 4. The Jews, influenced by the plain language of Covenant and prophecy, universally held that the Messianic Kingdom was to be accompanied by a complete restoration of the nation; both ideas were inseparably united, the one being regarded an impossibility without the other. So wedded were they to this view, that they objected to Jesus being the Messiah because it was not realized at the First Advent (the early Christians answered by locating the fulfilment at the Second Advent of this Jesus). Now observe, that with this prevailing Jewish doctrine, so dear to the Jewish heart, before them, Jesus and the Apostles use the very language pre-eminently calculated to cherish and confirm the Jews in their opinion of restoration, and the proof that it was thus adapted and intended is found in the simple historical fact, that both believing Jews and Gentiles in the early Church held to, and taught, the doctrine. A glance at various passages—keeping in mind the existing belief of the hearers—is amply sufficient to show this distinctly. Thus e.g. "the regeneration," Matt. 19:28, the removal of the desolation from "the house" Matt. 23:37-39, the Messianic reign over the house of Jacob on the throne of David, Luke 1:32, 33, the deliverance from enemies, Luke 1:74, the removal of Jerusalem's down-trodden condition when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled, Luke 21 : 24, the times of refreshing and restitution, Acts 3 : 19-21, the rebuilding again of the fallen-down Davidic tabernacle, Acts 15 : 16, the Jewish hope to be realized, Acts 26 : 6, 7, etc.—all is adapted to strengthen the hope of ultimate restoration, just as Covenant and prophecy promise. Hence we need not be surprised at the Apostolic and Primitive Church cleaving to such a future restoration at the Sec. Advent of the Messiah.

If no restoration was intended ; if all was to be understood typically, or spiritually, or conditionally, then surely the language was most eminently calculated to deceive the hearers, and simple justice demanded such an explanation as would have prevented the Ch. Church from following in the Jewish belief. But since there is no denial of the prevailing faith, but, on the contrary, a confirmation of it, we are forced to accept of it. The fact is, that it is so unmistakably taught that men addicted to spiritualizing freely admit it. Scott (Com.) even allows the restoration to be distinctly taught in Matt. 23 : 38, 39 (Luke 13 : 34, 35), Acts 3 : 21, etc., and so many others, as Tomlinson (Ser. on the Mill. and Appendix), Doddridge (Com.), etc. Nast (Com. Matt. 24 : 15-28) expresses the view of a large number, when he says, "We are taught in other passages of Holy Writ (that) the Millennial state of the Church of Christ shall not commence before the restoration of Israel." The Mormons also hold to the restoration of the Jews, but in accordance with their eclecticism, giving a Mormon bias to every incorporated doctrine, the Jews are to be gathered to their "Western Zion" (see Art. on "Mormons, M'Clin-tock & Strong's Cyclop.).

Obs. 5. As in the following Props. our proof, given in detail, shall be mainly drawn from the Old Test., it may be well to state why the New Test. does not enter into the subject of the restoration so extendedly as the Old. For, although pointedly mentioned and often implied, yet such magnificent portraitures of it as the Old Test. contains, are lacking. (1) It is taken for granted that the instruction of the New will be combined with the Old (both being one, etc., comp. Prop. 16), where a sufficiency is given to every one who will "search the Scriptures." (2) The union of the doctrine of the restoration with the events of the Second Advent make it easy for any believer to join the declarations of the Old with those of the New Test. (3) In the condition of the early Church and of the Jewish nation at, and after, the First Advent, a more detailed statement would unnecessarily (in view of the lengthy postponement) have prejudiced the Roman Power (already embittered) against the nation and Church.

That the reader may have a fair specimen of the quibbling of passages in the New Test. when arrayed against us, we direct attention to Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 361, etc.). Well knowing how essential to our system is the doctrine of the restoration of the Jews to their own land and of the Theocratic polity, he strives, under the specious plea of his typical application, to discard it. Thus e.g. after making "Zion" (Rom. 11 : 26) equivalent to "the Church of the New Testament," and that Jesus therefore "must come out of it at the same time He comes for it," saying : "It (the promise) holds out none, indeed, in respect to the cherished hope of a literal re-establishment of their ancient polity. It rather tends to discourage any such expectations ; for the Zion, in connection with which it tells us the Messiah is to come, is the one in which He at present dwells—the Zion of the New Test. Church ; to which He can no longer come, except at the same time coming out of it." It is surprising that so able a writer should shield his faith under an absurdity of his own creating, and which, if true, would forbid the personal Second Coming of Jesus to His Church for her deliverance. Jesus ascended to heaven (not Zion) where He now remains at the Father's right hand as Mediator and Intercessor, and is only spiritually present in His Church through the imparted Comforter. Now, when He comes again, He is predicted to come to Zion, and out of that Zion He is to exert His power as Deliverer ; and even to go personally out of it (see Prop. 113) to meet the tribes in the wilderness. Let the Word give its own testimony, and the plain grammatical sense will always be found to be the true one—in unity with all Scripture. But to allow Fairbairn to show his reasons for his typical application, we give them as specially stated in Appendix, pp. 395-399, in reply to the question, "Does the original relation of the seed of Abraham to the land of Canaan afford any ground for expecting their final return to it?" This he answers negatively: (1) The possession of the land of Canaan only a type, earnest, or pledge, of the possession of the renovated earth by the glorified saints—hence the nation excluded. (Answer: how could it be a type, earnest, or pledge to Abraham who never—as he affirms correctly in another place—possessed the land, and how could it be an earnest, etc., to the exiled ones?) (2) That things are spoken of in relation to this future inheritance which cannot be realized within the bounds of the earthly Canaan. (Answer: that depends entirely on the amount of faith we have in the plain grammatical promises of God, and in the One who is to inaugurate the changes.) (3) The inheritance is one that can only (p. 317) be enjoyed by the children of the resurrection, hence only designed for the redeemed and glorified saints; this excludes nations in the flesh, and therefore such a restoration. (Answer: Let the whole Record speak, and not merely one passage, and then the Scriptures clearly distinguish between "heirs" and subjects—between the glorified and the unglorified—between the Kings and those over whom they reign.) (4) That being a type, it cannot foreshadow another occupation, just as eating manna in the desert does not typify a future eating of the same. (Answer: He has not yet proven that the possession of the land was a type, for all prophecy forbids it, as we shall show in next Propositions, specifying a return to the identical land, etc. Besides: unbelief might turn this principle against his own theory, thus: he makes part of the earth to typify the whole earth renovated.) (5) That those who make it a type of a future occupation must include as also types the resuscitation of the Levitical priesthood, sacrifices, etc. (Answer: We do not make it a type but a real possession to which there is a return, and hence are not driven to the position indicated.) (6) That the Mosaic economy is abolished and a spiritual dispensation takes its place, and, therefore, no restoration can be expected. (Answer: We leave God to tell us the nature of the dispensations, and find that this one is to be succeeded by one more glorious that includes this very restoration.) (7) The natural seed are types of the spiritual seed, the national Israel of the spiritual Israel, and hence no restoration. (Answer: (1) Were none of the natural seed also of the believing, spiritual seed? and if so, were they types of themselves? (2) If this is so, why the process of engrafting? Why necessary?). (8) Abraham's seed are the heirs, i.e. the believing portion only inherit. (Answer: Granted; but they inherit a coming Kingdom and reign over others, including the restored Jewish nation.) (9) The type is lost in the antitype, as the Paschal Lamb in Christ. (Answer: Granted, where really a type exists.) We are sorry to say that, admirable as this and similar works are in some respects, their whole tendency and spirit is to lead the Church away from Covenant promises, and inducing to that unbelief so sadly predicted.

When the typical theory is deemed insufficient, recourse is had to other methods. An illustration may be in place. The Interior (quoted by The Luth. Observer, Dec. 27th, 1877) rejects the restoration of the Jews on mathematical grounds, thus presented: "The present population of Palestine is 300,000—all that it will support in the most starveling way. The area of Palestine is 12,000 square miles. The present number of Jews in the world is 6,000,000. If located in Palestine the population would be 500 to the square mile. But the population of China is only 303 to the square mile; of France, 173; of Hindoostan, 130. If a third of the Jews were to go back to Palestine they would starve to death. Now, we call the attention of the exegetes to the fact that this showing appeals directly to their bowels of compassion. Are they willing to starve a matter of 5,000,000 of Jews to death for the sake of vindicating their exegesis." This effort at witicism and sharpness, evincing no faith in the Word, exhibiting ignorance of its real teaching on the subject, and making natural impossibility the measurer of God's promise, evidently takes the position that such a restoration is advocated only as one of the results of national movements. It overlooks (1) that this is a supernatural restoration under the Messiah, who will provide for the maintenance of the nation; (2) that the dimensions of Palestine, to accord with the original grant, will be greatly extended, even from the Nile to the Euphrates; (3) that it will have its population largely in cities; (4) that special fruitfulness of the land, special commerce with nations, special prosperity, wealth, etc., are promised; (5) that if divinely promised that should suffice, God being abundantly able to perform whatever promises He makes. Surely, if the writer had lived before the Exodus from Egypt, his mathematical acumen would have demonstrated the absurdity of entering the wilderness with such a host; or had he lived before the First Advent, he would have demonstrated from scientific data, the utter impossibility of a virgin giving birth to a Son. This favorite cry of "impossible" from professed believers comes with a bad grace, when so many divine truths are denied on that ground by unbelievers. We are not surprised that The Princeton Review (Ap. 1850, p. 329) complacently speaks of a "modern and more spiritual view of the Millennium, which has gained general prevalence of late years in this country. It rejects the doctrine of the return of the Jews to their own land; of the personal appearance and reign of Christ for a thousand years, but retains the idea of a Millennium." Surely, in the light of Covenant and prophecy, an emasculated Millennium without a personal Christ, reign, and restoration. This the reader will more clearly see as he follows our argument step by step.

Obs. 6. In view of the elect position of the nation (Prop. 24) and its consequent Theocratic position, the restoration is so essential, such a prerequisite, that two remarkable forms of expression are employed to indicate it. (1) God restores the nation for His own sake, to vindicate His covenant-keeping mercy, and thus magnify His own name. For example, Ezek. 36 : 22 declares, in connection with a restoration which has never yet been realized, "Thus saith the Lord God : I do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for mine holy name's sake, which ye have profaned among the heathen, whither ye went," and v. 32, "Not for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord God, be it known unto you : be ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O house of Israel." The condition in which both Judah and Israel are at the time of the restoration, viz., that of unbelief, shows that God evidences mercy because the time has eventually arrived for the re-establishment of the Theocratic Kingdom, and hence to exalt His own truthfulness, "because" the nation has been overthrown and its uplifting is a necessity, "because" the heathen ridicule the Covenant and its promises, God will perform this work, and, by an astonishing process, bring this rebellious nation to heart-felt obedience and most fervent allegiance. (2) He will do it for the Father's sake, in behalf of that portion who have been believing and God-fearing. Paul appeals to this, Rom. 11 : 28, "beloved for the fathers' sakes," to whom the Covenant was given. Now turn to Lev. 26 : 42-45, which Paul evidently had in view, and it is asserted, that although the nation be dispersed, God "will remember" His "Covenant" and "the land," and it is affirmed that in their dispersion He will not "utterly cast them away, or abhor, or destroy" and thus (by an utter destruction) "break His covenant with them, for I am the Lord, their God. But I will for their sakes remember the Covenant of their ancestors, whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt in the sight of the heathen, that I might be their God : I am the Lord." The restoration, therefore, is impregnably fixed, upon God's honor as a covenant-keeping God, and upon His promises given to the Fathers, which will be realized.

The reader will observe that two things in the future history of the Jews show conclusively that after the saints, sufficient to form the predetermined number of kings and priests, have been gathered out, God then, for His own sake and for the Fathers' sakes, manifests His amazing mercy in restoring the nation, when still in unbelief against Him. For, as to one portion of the nation (the two tribes) it is converted and saved by the open Parousia of Jesus and His saints, as we shall explain, and as to the other portion (the ten tribes) they afterward shall be converted and saved. The unbelief at the Sec. Advent is proven by the hearty repentance and mourning of Judah, and the trial and selection of Israel in the wilderness before qualified to enter the land. Thus it is true that God does not restore the nation because of moral worthiness at the period when He comes for that purpose, but He does it because the time has arrived for the fulfilment of His own Covenant promises made to the Fathers; and it is likewise true, that morally unqualified as the nation then is for a restoration to Theocratic rule and privileges, He will so impress, teach, and guide the nation at His Coming, that it will acknowledge its guilt, and most earnestly and devotedly receive Jesus as the mighty Theocratic King promised to it. God's Word will be amply vindicated, and every declaration will find its realization. With the magnificent destiny before it, it is saddening to find a portion of the nation casting away its hope as founded in the prophecies. Thus, Reformed Judaism (see Art. on, by Felix Adler, in North Amer. Review, Sept., Oct., 1877), following its Rationalistic tendencies and rejecting the glorious prophecies "abandons the idea of a national restoration," and, of course, with it a future Advent of Messiah, in the Davidic line; the nation, according to its modernized conceptions, becoming its own Messiah. This, to say the least, is degrading Moses and their prophets into virtual impostors, making the past noble faith of the nation an idle dream, and casting mud upon the most exalted Records in existence. How can a Jew engage in such work?

PROPOSITION 112. The Kingdom, if established as predicted, demands the national restoration of the Jews in their own land.

This we have all along proven, viz., that such a connection is positively required by Covenant and election, promise and prophecy. Now it remains to prove in a more specific form a national re-establishment of the nation, which, of course, confirms our doctrinal position. Besides, the reign and Kingdom, as will be seen, is invariably associated with such a restoration (comp. preceding Prop.).

We are the more encouraged to insist upon a restoration to the land, because it is freely admitted by some of the most prominent opposers to Millenarianism. Thus e.g. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming, p. 434) frankly concedes "a territorial restoration," saying that "the people and the land of Israel" are "so connected in numerous prophecies of the Old Test. that whatever literality and perpetuity are ascribed to the one must, one would think, on all strict principles of interpretation, be attributed to the other also." The "Millerites" or "Adventists" (Art. on, M'Clintock & Strong's Cyclop.), and others (comp. next Prop.) make the restoration of the Jews to comprise only the resurrected and glorified Jews and adopted Gentile believers (Israelites), on the ground of "an everlasting possession of the land," because "mortal Jews cannot possess it forever—glorified and immortal ones can." But this is one-sided, ignoring the return of mortal men in the flesh, who repent and are converted, who perpetuate the nation in the flesh, etc.; overlooking that the saints are engrafted into the nation and that the everlasting possession of the land is promised to the nation in virtue of this incorporation of glorified ones who bear the rule; passing by a number of clearly related doctrines such as the nature of the Theocratic Kingdom, its relation to the Jewish nation, the reign of the saints over the nations, the perpetuity of the race after the Advent, the requirements of Redemption to give it completeness, etc. On the other hand, Swedenborgianism (comp. e.g. Works of Swedenborg and a recent—1878—Address to the Clergy) spiritualizes everything future relating to the Jews, and takes the predictions of Jewish restoration, the blessings particularly, and applies them to the Swedenborgian new Church. This is true of many others; but it is sufficient to say that it is done at the sacrifice of the plain grammatical sense, and the careful avoidance of appropriating the curses which logically and grammatically (if language has any meaning) belong to the same people that are restored. We say nothing of the unenviable position in which it places the Divine Word, making it to contain a sense which was pre-eminently calculated to deceive, and did—if this is true—deceive generation after generation of Jews, and the Primitive Church established under inspired guidance. The time is coming when the dreadful persecution of the Church—now arrogant—by claiming these Jewish blessings—shall sweep away all such false interpretations and applications of prophecy. We turn from such expositions with relief to those given by Bickersteth, the Bonars, Seiss, Brookes, Bonhomme, Wilson, Nicholson, Faber, Lord, Clarke, Herschell, McNeile, Wood, Tyso, Thomas, Pym, Arnold, Pirie, Noel, Molyneux, McCaul, Maton, Frey, Cunningham, Cox, besides many others, who hold with Rev. Rizer (Art. on Restoration, Proph. Times, July, 1877) "That the Jews will ultimately be restored to the land which was promised and given to Abraham and his posterity for an everlasting possession, cannot be successfully controverted by those who believe the inspired prophecies." Even works of fiction incorporate the idea as seen in Lord Beaconsfield's (D'Israeli) Lothair, and George Eliot's Deronda. One caution is requisite: as the subject itself is a vast one and complicated, requiring the close study and comparison of numerous predictions (some exceedingly concise, others abrupt, and still others obscure), it is reasonable to expect a diversity of view respecting the exact order and manner of fulfilment. We can only anticipate a unity in the grand outlines pertaining to the subject, viz., in its being associated with the Second Advent, Pre-Millennial in its accomplishment, repentant and converted under direct Messianic influence, exalted during the Mill. age, etc. Too many writers regard the restoration separate and distinct from the Covenant and Theocratic relationship of the nation, and thus materially weaken the force of their representations; casting away or overlooking the golden key which opens before us the nation's grand destiny.

Obs. 1. Before continuing our proof, several preliminaries must be considered which materially add to the force of the prophecies. (a) The perpetuity of the Jewish nation, owing to their election, is asserted, and with it their separation from all other nations. This is distinctly stated in Numb. 23 : 9, and from this arises the declarations of God not to make a full end of them as He may do with other nations, Lev. 26 : 44 ; Jer. 30 : 11 ; Jer. 46 : 28, etc. ; Deut. 32 : 26, 27 ; Amos 9 : 8 ; Ezek. 11 : 16. As explained in previous Props. this nation is chosen, out of all others, to be the peculiar instrumentality by which the Divine Purpose in Redemption and Government is to be carried out, and hence of them it is said, 1 Chron. 17 : 21, 22 ; Ps. 136 : 4 ; Jer. 31 : 35-37, etc. This, of course, is an indispensable feature in our argument which must by no means be overlooked. (b) This perpetuity of the nation thus promised, together with the reasons which impose it, and with the added predictions derived from it, involves the final restoration of the nation to its old state of special favor and nearness to God. Several writers, as McNeile, Noel, Bh. Newton, Kurtz, etc., employ this promised perpetuity as a powerful reason favoring the restoration. (c) This nation, owing to unfaithfulness, is driven from its land and scattered among the nations. History has made this so familiar, that a mere mention of it will suffice. (d) But such removal, as Moses and the prophets taught, being designed for correction and punishment is not perpetual. It is for a limited, appointed time, the knowledge of which God has reserved to Himself. That this period of tribulation, long as it may be, is a limited one, all the prophets testify and Christ Himself pointedly specifies. To deny this, is simply to reject some of the plainest statements in the Word of God and the entire current of prediction. The Scripture bearing on this point has already been partly given, and hence needs no repetition. (e) The Jews, therefore, owing to their nationally promised perpetuity and future position as a nation in the yet unfulfilled Purposes of God, are preserved down to the present day as a people, separate and distinct from all others, who, if such were the Divine Will, can at any moment be reorganized into a distinctive nationality among the nations. The preservation of the people is distinctly predicted, not in the possession of king, government, etc., characteristic of a nation properly organized but, in a dispersed and utterly disorganized condition, retaining national peculiarities, such as rites, practices, customs, doctrines, etc. The astonishing verification of these predictions in the history of the Jews has been noticed by numerous able writers, and has been aptly styled "a standing miracle"; and from it also has been derived an argument favoring the literal restoration.* Many writers of history, science, etc., have noticed, that while some individuals have been absorbed by other nations yet the vast body of them, in the midst of the nations, have preserved their Jewish individuality and national peculiarities, remaining a separate, and for ages an isolated, people.* The confident prediction of Celsus that the Jews as a race would become extinct is not verified. Dispersed among powerful nations, they continue to exist, while these nations disappear. Denied the privilege of living under their own magistrates, etc., debarred for centuries from all civil rights; suffering frequently the most terrible persecutions that ever afflicted a people; driven from country to country and made a "hissing," "by-word," etc., among nations not wise, but cruel; in brief, enduring, as history shows, what no other nation on earth has ever passed through, yet they still remain a peculiar, distinctive people, ready at almost any time, if the way were prepared, for a national reorganization. Their powerful enemies have perished or decayed, and they remain numerous and a significant power in the earth. But all this is necessary, preparatory to another phase in their remarkable history. If God intends to fulfil His promises concerning their national restoration, it certainly is essential to preserve them, while the preservation itself thus becomes—being predicted and fulfilled—evidence that the Divine Purpose in reference to them is in regular course of fulfilment, and leads on to the ultimate end intended. God has been, even when scattered, "a little sanctuary" (Ezek. 11 : 16) to them, thus saving them from extinction that His own Word may stand. (f) The plaintive representation of Isa. 63 : 18, "The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little while," contrasted with the promises and with the protracted tribulation, has pertinence. The comparative brief possession of the Holy Land when compared with the prophetic intimations, clearly evinces that something great and lasting in this direction must be held in abeyance for this same nation. (g) Certain promises of restoration are made to the Jewish nation, not to Gentile nations or even to Gentiles adopted into the nation (although the latter are included in the way hereafter shown, viz., as inheritors, etc.), but to the one distinctive Jewish nation. The Church is not composed of "the outcasts of Israel," of those cut off under the anger of God, possessing the sad traits and experiencing the forsaken condition attributed to this nation. The Church has not the throne and Kingdom of David in ruins, the city of God desolate and in the hands of enemies, etc., and hence the Church cannot be denoted. The same nation which experienced this heavy tribulation is also to realize the blessings of restoration. There is nothing so sad and absurd in the interpretation of the Bible as that, alas! so prevalent with many, to give all the threatenings, curses, and afflictions to the Jews, and appropriate the promises and blessings to the Gentiles or to the Church.<sup>4</sup> It is not only wrong but dishonoring to the Word, and opens a wide field of arbitrary exposition. The threatenings and reverses have been literally fulfilled, even to the minutest particular, so also must the predicted blessings, standing as they do in the same connection with this scattered, etc., people. History indorses a literal interpretation of these prophecies, and its testimony thus far forbids the seeking and applying a hidden, mystical, or spiritual meaning to the remainder. God Himself appeals to the justness of such a conclusion, Jer. 32 : 42, 44, "For thus saith the Lord: Like as I have brought this great evil upon this people, so I will bring upon them all the good that I have promised them." "For, I will cause their captivity to return, saith the Lord." Let the reader compare as unanswerable, Jer. 31 : 27, 28. (h) The dispersion and the restoration, the tribulation and the blessings cannot be contemporaneous. In the predictions, the latter invariably follows the former. To reverse this Divine Order is to violate all propriety of language; and yet this is done by multitudes of even learned and able divines, under the mistaken notion that the Jewish nation having forfeited the blessings, they are now bestowed upon the Gentiles. And what confirms them in the opinion is, that some Scriptures are quoted by the Apostles merely to prove that Gentiles are also called, shall also participate in the blessings, etc. (just as the Jews also at that day believed), and the conclusion is formed that this denotes that the Gentiles take the place assigned at one time to the Jews. But before such deductions, so destructive to the unity and symmetry of prophecy, are drawn, would it not be best to ask and decide, whether the nation, as such, has forever forfeited these blessings; and whether there is not a specific period appointed during which the nation is to experience the just anger of God; and whether the mention of the present era as "the times of the Gentiles" is not sufficiently suggestive of their ending, etc.; Important considerations, which we have passed over, are brought in view which forbid this wholesale appropriation of promises given only to the Jewish nation. The fact that the threatenings prophesied run down to the present day and continue on in the future (for they are not quite all fulfilled, as e.g. Zech. 14 : 1), is positive evidence, if we will only receive it, that the blessings are still future. Those blessings cannot be applied to the Church; for it is highly improper and a dissevering of prophecy, to say that the evils predicted of the nation and the blessings prophesied of the same nation can coexist. (i) The promise that this nation shall be restored to their own land cannot be understood of the Church. It is fashionable to make the land of Canaan a type of the Church or of heaven. Aside from the reasons already urged against such a perversion of the prophecies, it would appear sufficient to consider, that it is the same land out of which the nation has been driven; a land lying desolate for many generations until the restoration; a land that shall be tilled and sown, its ruined cities rebuilt and inhabited, man and beast multiplied upon it; a land specially covenanted to the Fathers who lived in it at one time, and which shall be settled again after "the old estates" and as at "the first;" a land for a long time in the possession of their enemies; a land formerly occupied by the Kingdom of David; a land whose geographical boundaries are fixed; in brief, a land which, by a great variety of allusions and specifications, can only be Palestine. To convert this land into something else is not only most arbitrary; impossible to reconcile with language, unity of prediction, etc., but it is a virtual impeachment of the veracity of the Word, and an expressed doubt of God's intention to fulfil His Word as written. If no reliability is found here in the plainest of all predictions; if to obtain the true meaning an astonishing and most awkward transposition of a spiritual nature must take place; then truly the Bible may denote almost anything that fancy can attribute to it. (j) In the investigation of this subject, other things are worthy of notice, which can only be briefly alluded to, such as (1) that certain prophecies have never, in any sense, been fulfilled, as Ezek. chs. 36, 39, etc.; Isa. 11 : 11, 12, etc.; (2) that the promises of Deut. and Lev. cannot be explained in any other way than referring to the Jewish nation; (3) that the prophecies referring to restoration distinguish between Judah and Israel; (4) that the division into "two kingdoms," formerly existing, is stated and the union into "one nation" in the same land predicted; (5) Jerusalem and the Jewish nation are in the restoration distinguished from the Gentiles; (6) the action, position, etc., assigned to the Jewish nation at and after the restoration; (7) the prosperity and the results of the restoration point to the future; (8) the astounding reception and acknowledgment of the crucified Saviour by the nation, which can only be predicted of the personal interview described by the prophets ; (9) the refining process, terrible but glorious.

<sup>1</sup> If we are to receive Dr. Draper's rule (His. Intel. Devel. of Europe) that nations, like individuals, die and are succeeded by others, we find an exception in this Jewish nation. This exception, as the Bible assures us, flows from an overruling, superintending Providence (e.g. Deut. 32 : 26, 27). The vitality of the nation is specially notable in the list of eminent names that it possesses as statesmen, senators, legislators, bankers, mayors, officials in places of great trust, artists, scholars, etc.

<sup>2</sup> Basnage (His. Jews) has well said : " The preservation of the Jews in the midst of the miseries which they have undergone during 1700 years is the greatest prodigy that can be imagined." An Art. in the Eclectic Mag. (taken from the Saturday Review), Ap., 1877, entitled The Jews in Europe, asserts : " The Jews really stand by themselves as the case of a whole nation dispersed in all parts of the world, yet remaining a nation, cherishing a national feeling, but having no local country of its own anywhere." Speaking of the purity of Jewish descent, the writer adds : " The gens remains a gens by birth, and not by legal fiction. The phenomenon is one of the strangest in all history ; the more it is thought of the more its thorough strangeness comes out."

<sup>3</sup> Milman's His. of the Jews, Jost's His., Gibbon, Edesiborn, Laurence on Physiology, p. 468, Smith, S. M. Smucker, C. and A. Rothschild's His., Bicheno, Rule, Neal, etc. Milman frequently refers to the fact that neither in the Eastern nor Western part of the world were they absorbed by other nations. Thus e.g. (p. 140) " However opposite the institutions, the usages, the manners of the people among whom they dwell, whether the government be mild or intolerant ; the Jews, equally inflexible and unsocial, maintain their seclusion from the rest of mankind. The same principles operate on the banks of the Yellow River, and on those of the Tiber, or the Seine ; the Jew, severed for ages from all intercourse with his brethren, amid the inaccessible regions of the Celestial Empire, in most respects remains as he would have been, if he had continued to inhabit the valley of Palestine." Clarke (Ten Religions, p. 421) says : " Dispersed as they are, they are still a distinct people, a nation within other nations. Like drops of oil floating on the water, but never mingling with it, so the Jews are found everywhere floating drops of national life in the midst of other nationalities." Such testimony from Anti-Millenarians, etc., could be multiplied. The Jewish nation is an exception to the general law of decay laid down by Draper (His. Intel. Dev. of Europe), and this arises that behind and underneath the natural law there is a controlling power, a higher law, which preserves the nation for a glorious purpose.

<sup>4</sup> Whether men will receive it or not, there is propriety in the reproach ascribed to David Levi (quoted by Bickersteth, Guide, p. 84), " Can anything be more absurd than to explain the prophecies which foretell the calamity which is to befall the Jews in a literal sense, and those which speak of their future felicity in a spiritual and mystical sense." We add : Equally absurd is the typical theory so prevalent, because the nation and land made typical still exists—the alleged type having suffered, and still suffers, its threatened downfall and punishment—and of them prediction has still much to say relating to the future. It is preposterous that a type should be the subject of such evils, so continuous, etc.

Obs. 2. It is requisite here to meet another objection urged against our view, on the ground that the predictions of restoration were met by the return from Babylon. Having noticed this before, some repetition is necessary to bring it before the reader in this connection. Leaving the reasons first announced in this and preceding Propositions which bear against such a theory it is sufficient to add, that the promises of restoration were never realized in the return from Babylon ; not in the King that was to reign over them, not in the magnitude of the return, not in the dwelling safely, removal of sorrow, imparting of prosperity, etc., not in the union of the two Kingdoms, or in the protection from enemies and perpetuity of the Kingdom, or in a manifestation of the Branch, or in repentance of the nation occurring as described, or in an engrafting of Gentiles, or in a gathering of nations against Jerusalem and a sudden deliverance, or in a fearful overthrow of nations and corresponding exaltation of the nation, or in a removal from nations so far off that they then did not know them (Zech. 7 : 14), etc. Such reasons can be multiplied by looking over the prophecies; and this notion is even more groundless and objectionable than that which makes the predictions conditional, seeing that they belittle the Word, making the Spirit give an exaggerated (after Oriental style) bombastic description of a restoration which, as history attests, falls far short of the description. No! The Divine Spirit deals in sober, actual, blessed truth and, as fulfilment down to the present day abundantly testifies, never deals in Oriental eulogies with their engrafted exaggerations. It is amazing that believers in Holy Writ can overlook the fact that not only prophets before, but prophets at and after, the return from Babylon predict the same glorious restoration. Let any one e.g. compare Zechariah, Haggai, Malachi, with previous prophets and a restoration very different from the one experienced is seen to be foretold. The one from Babylon was designed and carried out to provide the necessary preliminary conditions for the First Advent; the one in the future is identified with the Second Advent. To bring up the rule of the Maccabees as a fulfilment against our view, is to overlook the requirements of prophecy, which demand that not Asmoneans or Levites but those of the lineage of David are to bear rule; that not tributary princes should govern, but One independent of, and superior to, all others should have dominion. It is sad to reflect on the lack of faith existing in God's promises, and how, to accommodate such want of faith, human reason seeks after an apologetic fulfilment which diminishes the lustre of the Divine Record, bringing its prophetic portion down to the level of the uninspired productions of man. Well may it be asked, if the return from Babylon with its small colony, under Persian rule, struggling painfully on, etc. is all that is meant by those glowing portrayals of restoration, dominion, and exaltation, where, in the light of historical fact, is the boasted foreknowledge of the Spirit which these prophets professed to be guided by, and what becomes then of the credibility of their utterances in other respects? Such manipulation of Scripture is not only unwarranted but dangerous, leading as it does (as infidels have shown in seizing this Maccabean theory) to a direct impeachment of the truthfulness of the Divine Word.

Obs. 3. Unless the student keeps before him the actual condition of the Jewish nation at the time of this great deliverance and restoration, it is impossible for him to preserve the unity of the Divine statements on the subject, or to locate the period of the restoration at the time assigned to it by the Spirit. That condition has been briefly noticed, and shows us that when the restoration, and the Theocratic Kingdom united with it, is to be witnessed, it will find the Jews and Jerusalem in a fearful extremity. It was, as commentaries, etc., inform us, an opinion current among the Jews, derived from prophecy, that only in a time of sore trial would the Messiah come to deliver and establish His Kingdom.' This opinion is correct, and is fully indorsed by Christ Himself, who in Matt. 24, etc., identifies His Coming, the deliverance, etc., with the direful situation of an oppressed nation and down-trodden city. The tribulation described by Jesus is by no means confined to that inflicted by the Romans, it continues down, as expressly stated, through Gentile nations, until these "times of the Gentiles" are fulfilled. That they are not yet fulfilled, the condition of the city and nation painfully indicate. What the future has in store for the same, is also described by the sacred writers. Planting ourselves on the past literal fulfilment, unswerving faith accepts of what is recorded still relating to the future of city and nation, as that which shall become historical verity. Occupying this stand-point, there is no difficulty in ascertaining the exact position in which these will be placed when God will arise to be again merciful to His ancient people, and restore the Theocratic-Davidic rule. If the reader will turn to Zech. 12 : 1-14, he has (1) the multitude gathered against Jerusalem besieging it ; (2) the Lord interfering in behalf of the people ; (3) Jerusalem becomes " a cup of trembling," " a burdensome stone" to the nations ; (4) the complete overthrow of all enemies ; (5) the subsequent exaltation of " the house of David," etc. In Zech. 14 we have, taking the preceding context, (1) the smiting of the Shepherd, (2) the scattering of the sheep, (3) a period of tribulation, (4) the gathering of nations against Jerusalem, (4) the Lord interfering, " his feet standing upon the mount of Olives," (5) the saints coming with Him, (6) the destruction of the enemies, (7) the reign of Christ, (8) Jerusalem safely inhabited, exalted, etc. Dan. 12 has, (1) a time of trouble, resulting from a gathering of nations against Jerusalem, (2) special Divine interposition in behalf of the nation, (3) a gracious deliverance vouchsafed. Joel 3 has (1) the same gathering of nations, (2) deliverance by the Lord and His " mighty ones," (3) the complete removal of all enemies, (4) the Lord dwelling in the holy mountain, (5) the safety, happiness, etc., of Jerusalem. Without discussing the order of events, or how they are to be brought about, the simple fact of the Jews being in a state of extremity at this stage, just immediately before their national deliverance, is proven by these passages. It is impossible to apply them to the extremity under the Romans, for the events represented to follow, did not then take place ; there was no deliverance and triumph of the nation, no Divine interposition and destruction of enemies, no Millennial glory, etc. The same all-wise Spirit, as if to direct attention to the matter, repeats this testimony again and again. The leading predictions are those found in Ezek. chs. 38, 39, where (1) a confederation of nations is formed against Jerusalem, (2) the Lord will directly interfere for the land of Israel and His people, (3) a terrible overthrow of those nations, (4) the cessation of captivity and gathering of the Jews " out of their enemies' lands" " unto their own land," etc. References to this period are scattered here and there through the Word, which only become distinctive when viewed by the medium of the more enlarged, detailed prophecies. Thus, e.g. Jer. 30 : 4-11, where the same order comes in, (1) a time of dire trouble, (2) deliverance, (3) the nation " shall return from the land of their captivity," (4) and in that time " they shall serve the Lord their God and David their king." Comp. Zeph. 3 : 8-20, Ps. 124 (which would be even more expressive if it be allowable to take the rendering of some in the last verse : " Our help is in the name of the Word of the Lord" (Dr. Clarke Com. loci), taking that Word to be the one described by John), Isa. 51 : 17-23 ; Isa. 11 : 4 ; Isa. 1 : 27, 28, etc. The introduction of a number of Millennial descriptions accords with what we have stated, viz., the straitened condition of the people, the triumph of God's enemies cut short by His righteous judgments, etc. Hence, the conclusion must be formed that the nation has not yet experienced its full tribulation, and that until all is fulfilled respecting them the restoration bestowed directly by God (not by a nation, as may, and in all probability will, partially be done), cannot possibly be effected. It will also be noticed, how this still future extremity of the Jews helps us to estimate the theories of fulfilment at return from Babylon, in the Church, etc.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In addition to previous quotations : Milman (His. Jews, vol. 3, p. 98) remarks : " It was an opinion, deeply rooted in the hearts of all faithful Israelites, that in the darkest hour of the race of Abraham, when his children were at the extreme point of degradation and wretchedness, that even then the arm of the Lord would be revealed and the expected Messiah would make his sudden and glorious appearance." This view is evidently based on plain prophecies (as e.g. Zech. 14, etc.), and will hereafter be shown to be correctly founded. Their restoration immediately follows a fearful period of distress, so that deliverance from enemies that sorely distressed, and triumphant exultation over their downfall, is mingled with national rejoicings. Many of the Jewish Rabbins link the restoration of the Jews with the destruction of Rome (under the name of "Edom," see e.g. Mede's Works, B. 3 and 5). A singular and fanciful notion is mentioned by Mr. Calman (Mis. of Inquiry to Jews, p. 403) : Some Jews of Birlat told him that the Messiah " is to come when their nation is either very corrupt or very pure, even as the leper, Lev. 13 : 6, 13, was counted clean either when his whole body was white, or when there was so sign of leprosy at all."

<sup>2</sup> The critical student will observe that the feast of the Passover has reference, as Jesus teaches, to this final restoration of the Jews. Consider, what we have already abundantly proven, that Jesus foreseeing His rejection and death, the refusal of the nation to accept of the Kingdom on the condition of repentance, and the consequent postponement of the Kingdom, could not therefore proclaim the deliverance of the nation from the Roman yoke, but, in place of it, predicted a long-continued tribulation and captivity. Hence when Jesus eats the Passover, commemorating deliverance, not then experienced according to the intent and spirit of the feast (a feast designed for freemen and not for those in bondage to others), he says, Luke 22 : 16. "For I say unto you I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God." Now, the Passover belongs to the Jews, and it was enjoined as a national observance. The Lord's Supper instituted in its place belongs to the Christian Church in this dispensation. Christ is the Paschal Lamb in both these feasts. The Lord's Supper points us on to the Coming Saviour (for we "show forth His death until He come") for perfected deliverance ; so also the Passover directs the Jewish nation to a contemplated, covenanted, and predicted deliverance, and Jesus calls attention to this fulfilment which occurs when the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, or the Kingdom of God, is re-established. A scene similar in nature and fearfulness to that witnessed in Egypt at the Exodus will be (Isa. 26 : 20, 21, etc., comp. Props. 115, 147, 161, 162, 163, etc.) repeated on a grander scale. Dr. Ethridge (Introd. Targums) says that the Jews "contemplate the Passover as a prophetic signal of their future release and restoration to Canaan." He adduces abundant proof of this, and quotes from the Targums and Paschal ritual. In the ritual the Passover is "for a sign of protection and deliverance, escape and salvation."

Obs. 4. Finally we come to additional prophecies which, taken in their entire scope, leave no doubt of the national restoration of the Jews and of the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom. Isa. 11 : 10-16 is conceded by many commentators, as even by Scott, Nägelsbach, etc., to teach a literal restoration. The "second time," v. 11, cannot refer either to deliverance from Egypt or from Babylon because in neither case were the Jews recovered from the lands here enumerated ; and it cannot refer merely to a conversion (as some hold) of the people because it is linked with "a cutting off of the adversaries of Judah" (Obs. 9), with "a gathering of the outcasts of Israel and the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth," with a removal of the enmity between the two kingdoms, etc. It must relate to the future, and the miraculous events "like it was to Israel in the day that he came out of the land of Egypt," the special Divine interposition, the "spoil" that shall then accrue to them (comp. Zech. 14, etc.), the power that shall be given, its connection with Millennial era (context preceding and following) fully identify it with the period of time and manner of introduction held by us.' But even this prediction must be regarded in the light of plainer ones. Thus in Ezek. 36 : 8-38 there is a profusion of circumstances irreconcilable with any other view than the one adopted. In the enumeration of them there are (1) the gathering out of all countries and the bringing again into their own land; (2) they shall dwell in the land given to their fathers; (3) they shall be also converted; (4) the desolate land is to be tilled and sown; (5) man and beast are to be multiplied on it; (6) the cities shall again be inherited and the wastes builded; (7) they shall be settled after their "old estates"; (8) God "will do better unto you than at your beginnings"; (9) the land shall be for an inheritance; (10) the land shall no more be bereaved; (11) it shall not be burdened with the shame of the heathen; (12) the identical land defiled by Israel's sins is the one thus again obtained; (13) the removal from the land caused by sin; (14) the return to it caused by God's mercy and faithfulness; (15) the fruit of the trees and the increase of the field so sure as to prevent famine; (17) the land once desolate to become like the Garden of Eden; (18) the heathen that are left shall acknowledge the Lord's power when this is done; (19) the house of Israel shall be increased with flocks of men and the waste cities with the same. So circumstantial and minute are details given that no unprejudiced mind can resist their force.* But in the very next chapter (37th) the prophet reiterates and adds to them. After describing the resurrection which (as shown Prop. 126) is also related to this period, he tells us (1) that the children of Israel shall be gathered from among the heathen and be brought into their own land; (2) that they shall be "one nation" and not "two kingdoms" as of old; (3) that they shall have "one king," even "David my servant"; (4) that they shall no more be "defiled" being "cleansed"; (5) that "they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt"; (6) that they and their descendants "shall dwell in it forever" (for the ages, so some); (7) that during these ages, or forever, David shall be their Prince; (8) that they shall have peace and be multiplied; (9) that God's sanctuary shall be in the midst of them forever; (10) that their situation shall be as in Rev. 21 : 3; (11) that the Gentiles shall acknowledge the great power of God when this is accomplished. Comp. Jer. 32 : 37-44 (notice contrast with which comp. Jer. 31 : 28); Jer. 33 (noticing "the building as at first," the cities and even "streets of Jerusalem" filled with rejoicing, the reigning of the Branch a descendant of David's, the Covenant shall not be broken, etc.); Jer. 3 : 14-18 (observing that then Jerusalem shall be called "the throne of the Lord," that nations shall be gathered unto it, and that they come "to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers"); Ezek. 11 : 16-20 ("cast far off" shall still be brought into "the land of Israel," etc.); Jer. 23 : 5-8 (so complete is this restoration under the supervision of David's seed that it is compared with that from Egypt, etc.); Ezek. 34 : 11-31 (sheep delivered "in a dark and cloudy day," and the

* When Fairbairn (Ezekiel), Schröder (Ezekiel in Lange's Com.), and others, by a wholesale spiritualizing of the plain grammatical meaning (with great learning, etc.) make out that all this is fulfilled in the Christian Church or world, the Jewish nation and land (and all particulars) being only typical of something else, this is the result of deep-rooted prejudice, that overrides everything, bends everything, substitutes everything to make it correspond with its preconceived spiritual theory. We envy not the labors and results of such writers.

“servant David” shall be “the Prince,” delivering them from “the yoke” so that they shall no longer be “a prey”); Zeph. 3 : 8–20 ; Zech. 8 ; Jer. 31 ; Micah, chs. 4, 5, and 8 ; Hos. 2 : 14, etc ; Isa. 43 and 52, etc. Bp. Newton well remarked, “innumerable are the prophecies concerning the conversion and restoration of this people” ; for we find them on all sides, imbedded in nearly all prophetic utterances ; and, as the reader must observe, if the Covenant and its fulfilment, if the promises of God respecting Kingdom and perfected salvation are so directly and fundamentally identified with this people, then it is reasonable to anticipate that much should be said of it. If the reason be asked why, although not ignored but expressly mentioned and implied, comparatively so little is stated on the subject in the New Test. the answer is given by Jesus and the Apostles themselves, viz., that the prophets are to be fulfilled, and that it is taken for granted that we possess, read, study and believe in them. The Old Test. is not superseded by the New (Prop. 16), and we are urged to observe the intimate and enduring connection existing between them. Both form the Word of God, and therefore it is our duty on a subject like this to consult both, and ascertain what God has been pleased to reveal. If we take the particulars thus given ; notice of whom they are predicted ; how they are related to each other ; that they never have been fulfilled ; that they cannot without violence be applied to any other people ; how the most sacred of all pledges support them, etc., the only consistent conclusion that we can arrive at is that contained in the Proposition. If some will be like those spoken of in Ezek. 11 : 15, saying that the land shall not be given to this people in possession but pertains to others, the reply coming from God Himself immediately follows, for He will sanctify Himself (Ezek. 20 : 41–44) before the Gentiles, and manifest (Zech. 8 : 6) that the work is not difficult of accomplishment. Hence the Spirit of the New Test. as we show in various places, accords in upholding “the hope of Israel.”

<sup>1</sup> We refer to another point which Nägelsbach (Lange's Com. Isa., ch. 11 : 10–16) brings out prominently, viz., “The return of Israel takes place only when the Messiah has appeared, and the heathen have gathered to Him.” The order laid down is plain : (1) a previous gathering out of Gentiles ; (2) then a glorious restoration to follow ; (3) this is a universal, and not a partial, return ; (4) this, like the deliverance from Egypt, will be accompanied by an extraordinary manifestation of the supernatural.

<sup>2</sup> The student desirous to investigate this highly interesting subject will find abundant material in the prophets. Thus e.g. let him compare the concluding part of Isa. 42, where the judgments brought upon the nation are delineated, and contrast this with the promised restoration, which God appeals to as His special work that He may be glorified, as contained in the following chapter. The miraculous power exerted in that day is presented in Isa. 30 : 26, which even our opponents, as Barnes, Com. loci, apply “to the times of the Messiah” as something that cannot be doubted, and on the healing the wound, etc., remark : “Jehovah would heal it by restoring them to their own land and to their former privileges.” The context indisputably shows that it is allied with the same period of time (Rev. 19, etc.) that precedes and follows the Sec. Advent of the Messiah. Isa. 61 is connected with the restoration of the Jewish nation, seeing that it is allied with a “day of vengeance,” with a “building the old wastes,” a “raising up the former desolations,” a “repairing the waste cities, the desolations of many generations,” etc. If we were at liberty to receive the remarkable rendering (msa. Pachom and 1 D., 11 of the Sep.) of the phrase “in their land they shall possess double,” viz., “they shall possess their land a second time,” it would increase the force of it ; but this is not necessary. Various distinctive predictions will follow under the Propositions relating to Jewish conversion and supremacy, the period of violence, the inheritance of Jesus, etc.

Obs. 5. There is only one objection that at first thought appears plausible urged against this restoration, which we feel unable to answer as it probably deserves. It is this: "the whole house of Israel," both "Judah and Israel" are to be restored, but if so, where are the ten tribes? Thus far the question asked is legitimate, but when it is added: "if their present situation cannot be certainly and satisfactorily established it is impossible to accept of a restoration," then the objector goes beyond his commission. (1) Where are the ten tribes? Entire volumes have been written on this interesting point, one writer finding traces of them in the American Indians; another in various nations in Central Asia; one in Abyssinia and on the coast of Africa; another in South America, etc. Eminent linguists (as Jones, etc.), travellers (Wolf, etc.), and others, have found in some tribes and nations peculiarities of language, custom, rites, etc., resembling those of the Jews. But amid the diversity of view who can positively give us the proper information? No one, with any degree of assurance, although in some instances we may grant a high degree of probability. This may, however, be taken as an indication that their existence, owing to such existing peculiarities cannot on the other hand be positively denied. This would be both illogical and unscholarly. (2) Is it, however, necessary to know, or, according to the Word, can we ever know their location, etc.? This is doubtful, for it is proper to consider in such an investigation several particulars more or less, overlooked. 1. This restoration is not appointed for man to perform, or for the nation itself to undertake; it is constantly and invariably designated as God's designed work, specially delegated to His Son Jesus Christ. Hence, if God knows where they are, that is all-sufficient. If, on the other hand, the work were ours, then we ought to know. 2. In view of this being God's work He has specifically declared that His watchful eye is constantly fixed upon them, and that, however commingled among the nations and as individuals concealed in the mass of humanity, He takes cognizance of every one of them. Thus e.g. Amos 9 : 9; Ezek. 12 : 15; Jer. 46 : 28; Deut. 28 : 62, etc., in connection with the ascriptions of perfect knowledge, a knowledge and power that extendeth to all things, it is unworthy of faith and of reason to stumble over our lack of knowledge in the face of so many plain predictions. The resurrection, and other doctrines might on the same plea be discarded. It is sufficient to stay ourselves upon God, Isa. 64 : 4. 3. But when we come to scan the prophecies more narrowly it will be found that this very undecided information is predicted and forms an additional proof both of the inspiration of the prophets and of the necessity of faith in this return. For the ten tribes being more idolatrous than Judah and having first dishonored the Theocratic ordering, meet with special abhorrence, and, as the Word teaches, suffer proportionately. They are "the outcasts of Israel," distinguished from "the dispersed of Judah," Isa. 11 : 12, cut off long before Judah, and not restored at the return from Babylon;* and as Brookes (El. Proph. Interp., p. 198) has shown, their return is a matter of surprise, the question being asked: "then where had they been?" Isa. 49 : 21. Being more idolatrous than Judah they are more given up to it according to the threat of Deut. 4 : 27, 28; Deut. 28 : 36, 64; Jer. 16 : 13, and implied as realized in Ezek. 36 : 25, etc.; consequently a portion of the nation thus adopting * Brookes ably shows this in El. Proph. Interp.; Shimeall and others do the same. Admitting that some few may have returned does not embrace a general or tribal one, or meet the conditions of prediction on the subject.

---

the worship and usages of idolatrous nations, although kept more or less separate in the very forms used by them, would be difficult to distinguish.* And some even think that a hidden, concealed condition is implied in Isa. 16 : 3, 4, etc. Fully admitting the difficulties attached to this point, yet over and against them is the Word of God ; and the believer is at no loss in making his decision when God says : Jer. 31 : 35-37. What our eyes now behold in the perhaps now unconscious witnesses of God (Isa. 43 : 10-13 : Isa. 44 : 8, etc.) causes us firmly to hold to the testimony of the future that is yet to be added in the eyes of all nations. In the light of a thousand predictions like Ezek. 39 : 28 ; Deut. 30 : 3, 4 ; Isa. 43 : 5, 6, etc., who, that receives the Word as given by the Almighty, can reject such a restoration.

Satisfied from the particular fulfilment of prophecy in the past, and from the positive declarations of the Almighty on the subject, that He will perform this work, and, when the time comes, reveal the long lost ones, we do not, for the reasons assigned, consider the identification of the lost tribes essential. Yet in view of the interest pertaining to them, it may be well, if only to show the variety of conjectures, to point out, to some extent, the opinions entertained. Aside from Calmet's Dic. and the articles to be found in our religious cyclopa., the writings of missionaries, Wolf, Carey, Marshman, and others, the reader will find the following works on the subject. Grant's Nestorians, or the Lost Tribes ; Fletcher's Israel Redux (making them the Tartars) ; Moore's The Lost Tribes (making them the Saxons) ; Sailman's Researches in the East (endeavors to trace the tribes to the 17th century) ; Whiston's Memoirs, vol. 1 (advocates the Tartar theory) ; Thorowgood's Jews in America (old work—others more recent—comp. e.g. Wm. Penn in Jewish Expositor, under the title of The Sun in the West) ; Brookes, under the signature of "Abdiel," in Jewish Expositor, indicates the Welsh and some of the Irish ; Samuel's Israel's Hiding Discovered (makes them of Daghistan on the Caspian Sea) ; Hamilton, Bryant, Buchanan, Wolf, and others trace them to the Jews of Cochin on the coast of Malabar ; Wolf, in his Miss. Journal, speaks of finding some of the lost tribes in and around Bombay, and among the Afghans ; Sumnius, De Extremo Dei, Judicio (holds the North Amer. Indians to be the lost tribe) ; so also Boudinet's Star of the West, Crawford's Proph. of the Gospel, Elliott's Jews in America, Jones's His. of America, Simon's Hope of Israel, Worsley's Amer. Indians, Ingraham's Ten Tribes (in opposition, L. Estrange's Americans no Jews) ; Edrehi's His. Acct. of the Ten Tribes (finds them beyond the Sambotyran in the East) ; indeed, every confitent is placed under contribution to swell the list, Mexico, South America, the coast and the wilds of Africa, China, and other countries have swelled the number of conjectures. More recently a vigorous effort is made by Wilson (Our Israelitish Origin) and many others to identify the British nation with the lost ten tribes. A society called "Israel's Identification Society" is reported by the newspapers to be established to prove this Jewish origin. Other works also refer to the subject, such as Burns's "Travels in Bokhara, Bannage's His. of the Jews (so other histories), Jerome on Dan. 11, Josephus, B. 11, ch. 5, and various of the Pre-Mill. writers, especially those who devote considerable space to the restoration of the Jews. As we have no theory of our own to support, it is unnecessary to discriminate between these widely conflicting opinions.

We have no objection to finding the lost tribes in any country on the globe, and especially none to discovering them in England, Ireland, and Scotland, but we do most earnestly protest to the deductions, perversions, and absurdities that may be engrafted upon such views. It is proper to notice the manner in which the theory of "Anglo-Israelism" (i.e. of making the English nation identical with the lost ten tribes) is handled under the leadership of Edward Hine, of London, England. This view assumes that Judah and Benjamin alone compose the Jewish nation, and that the Ten Tribes alone constitute Israel. By this unscriptural distinction it denies that the Twelve Tribes constitute the nation. Such a theory is utterly repudiated by the Scriptures. The reader will find the reasons given by Robert Roberts in the Debate with Hine on the question, "Are Englishmen Israelites?" It is sufficient here to say, that the origin of both is the same; both have the name of their common father Jacob, changed to Israel; that when the separation took place (as a punishment) it did not affect the Israelitish status of Judah and Benjamin; that, in view of the separation and to distinguish between the two sections of the same nation, the smaller portion was called after Judah (the royal tribe), the larger retained the designation of Israel; that when the Ten Tribes were scattered and disappeared, Judah being still the visible representation of the nation, the name applied to the nation was derived from those recognized as existing; that all the tribes were also called Jews, as seen in Josephus, and in the New Test., Rom. 3 : 9, 29; 10 : 12; 9 : 23, 24, and 2 : 9, 10; that "Israel" was used as synonymous with "Jew," and applied both to the ten and to the two tribes, as e.g. Matt. 8 : 10; Luke 1 : 16, 54, 68; Acts 13 : 17; 21 : 28, and Acts 22 : 3, comp. with Rom. 11 : 1; that Jesus is both "the King of the Jews" and "the King of Israel," both phrases being identical; that the twelve tribes are distinctively mentioned as constituting the one nation, Acts 26 : 7; James 1 : 1; Acts 28 : 20; that the nation is an elect, covenanted nation to whom the promises belong, and although punished for disobedience, the election remains including the whole nation originally chosen; that the prophecies speaking of the nation as a whole, do not discriminate (as e.g. those in Deut.) between the tribes; that the prophecies particularizing the manner of restoration refer both to Judah and to Israel; that in the future Kingdom of the Messiah the twelve tribes are distinctly mentioned, as in Rev., chs. 7 and 21; that as a nation both the two and the ten tribes are suffering the withdrawal of God, and are under judgment as such, thus fulfilling the threats presented against "the children of Israel"; and that if such a preference is shown to the ten tribes, it would be manifestly unjust to the two tribes who continued more faithful and received more special promises, etc. The plea that the Ten Tribes were separated, etc., for blessing, is, as Roberts conclusively shows, completely met by the predictions of the prophets, which declare the exact reverse. The effort to make the exalted predictions relating to Israel in the future to be verified at the present time by an identification with England's greatness, without the Advent of the Messiah, is simply a degradation of the sublime prophecies, and leading to unbelief. It is more: it slides into "blasphemous nonsense," as illustrated by a writer in the Proph. News, Ang., 1879, who quotes one Oxley, a follower of Hines, writing in Hine's own periodical, on The Deliverer out of Zion, as follows: "The work of identity (of the British nation with the lost ten tribes of Israel), and that of the Deliverer out of Zion, according to our impression, is all one. It is the same work. It is effected at the same time. . . . If these things are so, then where is the Deliverer? He must already have come out of Zion; He must be doing His great work; He must be among us. It is our impression that by the glory of the work of the identity we have come to the time of Israel's national salvation by the Deliverer out of Zion; and that Edward Hine and that deliverer are identical." Alas! how sad, that things which belong exclusively to Jesus the Messiah should thus be prostituted under fanatical "impressions." But this is on a par with numerous other vagaries (such as making the English throne David's throne, etc.), which a mixture of spiritualizing, literalism, rashness, and dogmatism produces. There is no danger that one who has compared the Scriptures relating to the restoration of the Jews will, for a moment, entertain such views (whatever identification may exist as to Jewish origin); it is only those who are ignorant of the subject, or have a slight knowledge of it, that can be influenced by it. The fundamental error (upon which a mass of others is erected) is in not discerning "both the houses of Israel" (Isa. 8 : 14) are identical with "the house of Jacob." So Wild's work (The Lost Ten Tribes) takes a somewhat similar position, and lays great stress on the United States, making the Saxon race to be Israel. Having nothing to say respecting the alleged Jewish origin (saying that it is largely founded on conjecture and speculation) we do object, however, to the perversion of prophecy, covenants, promise, etc., as illustrated in making Queen Victoria's throne to be "David's throne," the stone to be England, etc. We give our reasons for dissent under various Propositions, while acknowledging the sincerity, etc., of the writer.

---

* Rev. McNeile, Prospects of the Jews, an able work, justly and at length shows that the prophecies relating to the separate condition of the Jews mainly apply to Judah. But this by no means excludes Israel, whom God will preserve in a sufficiently distinctive form to verify His promises. The greatness and majesty of God, as well as His faithfulness, are shown in this wonderful, covert preservation.

Obs. 6. Our argument on this point would be incomplete if a brief synopsis of Paul's reasoning in Romans, alluded to, were not appended, thus more completely binding the Old and New Testa. together in the same doc- trinal position. Leaving the filling up of minor details to the reader, the leading ideas of the Apostle are presented by us in the following order : In ch. 9 we have : (1) His sorrow for the Jews ; (2) the covenant relationship of the Jews ; (3) their election ; (4) " the children of promise are counted for the seed " ; (5) that Gentiles by faith can also become such a seed ; (6) that the nation being in unbelief, still a part, together with engrafted Gentiles shall be saved ; (7) to prove this calling of the Gentiles he quotes Hos. 2 : 23, but to observe the force and propriety of the quotation we turn to Hosea and find it connected with a restoration of the Jews which has never yet been realized ; hence it is presented (a) because it clearly indicates that the Gentiles can and will thus be called, and (b) that they being thus also grafted in shall, as taught in many places, participate in the glory, etc., of the restoration. He then produces Hos. 1 : 10, which applies in the same way, and next Isa. 10 : 22, 23 (Sep. Ver. Horne 1, p. 302) ; Isa. 28 : 22 ; Isa. 1 : 9, the immediate contexts of which confirm our statement ; for in them we have (a) the Jewish nation cast away on account of their sinfulness ; (b) this consumption decreed ; (c) but during this period a remnant shall be saved, a seed is to be raised up lest God's purposes and promises fail ; (d) this consumption shall be removed, for the nation after suffering for its sins shall be restored. Therefore, the Apostle only selects the points which show, (1) the foretold rejection of the nation, and (2) the raising up of a seed, even out of Gentiles, during this time, leaving the reader from his own knowledge of the prophets to fill up the remainder which was not needed just then in his train of thought. (8) Lastly, the great offence, which led to their complete overthrow, as predicted by the prophets, and to the engrafting of Gentiles, is shown to be their stumbling over "the stumbling stone" Jesus Christ. In ch. 10 is stated : (1) the desire of the Apostle that the Jews might be saved by faith in Christ ; (2) that both Jews and Gentiles that thus believe shall be saved ; (3) that comparatively few of the Jews would receive the truth preached in Christ ; (4) that as Moses and Isaiah predicted, others, even Gentiles would be called and be adopted. But as Paul assumes the undoubted fulfilment of these prophecies on the one point, it is just that we believe that the remainder is equally worthy of credit. Let us see then what stands in the context of the passages referred to by Paul. Isa. 51 : 1 describes (a) the sufferings and death of Christ ; (b) that many shall be justified through Him ; (c) that Jesus shall obtain a great portion ; (d) then follows "the Barren Woman" (see Prop. 118), and a glorious Millennial description, including the restoration of the very nation that rejected this stricken Saviour. Paul appropriately, as his argument here only required, uses it to show, (1) that the Jews nationally would not believe, (2) that others would. Deut. 32 : 21 has, (a) the Jews on account of sin are rejected by God ; (b) during this time of God's withdrawal, He will provoke them by gathering out another people ; (c) while this gathering is in process the Jewish nation shall be scattered and suffering ; (d) but lest others should exalt themselves, etc., God will relent toward His covenanted people, punish their enemies, and be merciful to them and to their land. Isa. 65 : 1 gives us (a) in preceding ch. God's anger toward, and punishment of, the nation ; (b) a people notwithstanding gathered, even, as Paul intimates by quoting, Gentiles ; (c) God will not utterly destroy the nation ; (d) this followed by a prediction of their final restoration. The unity of order, etc., preserved by the Spirit is something remarkable ; and Paul's quotations instead of reversing, or transposing, or spiritualizing the prophets, establishes their literal understanding. In ch. 11, the first question is suggested by the previous reasoning; for if the Jews are nationally rejected and others gathered in, the inquiry would naturally follow: "Hath God cast away His people,"—mark, "His people," i.e. a people sustaining peculiar covenant relationship to Him—and Paul proceeds to answer it negatively by two powerful reasons: (1) that a remnant, some Jews like himself, would believe and hence were accounted still "His people"; and (2) that the same nation that stumbled and fell would finally be restored and be acknowledged as "His people." Let us follow the Apostle and we find, (1) the question as stated; (2) the first reply, that God has reserved some, including himself, who were not cast away; (3) and even this is guarded and distinguished from the national election (see Prop. 24, etc.) by saying that this "is a remnant according to the election of grace," i.e. this favor is bestowed not on account of their relationship (which for the time God does not regard, having rejected during a determined time the nation as such,) but on the same basis by which Gentiles are received; (4) this election, made such, by faith, will obtain the promises; (5) the rest of the Jews are blinded, and, owing to unbelief, are cut off from the exalted position once occupied, viz., that of being the only people who nationally sustained a present special covenant relationship with God. Here is the order still existing down to the present day, viz., (a) the Jews, as a nation, suffering a rejection; (b) a remnant still saved, like the Gentiles, by faith, to continue the elect people, or the seed of Abraham; (c) the rest remaining in unbelief. 6. He reiterates that this was predicted, and quotes Isa. 29 : 10 as proof, and when reference is made to the passage, precisely (a) such blindness is prophesied of the nation; (b) that the anger of God shall fall upon them; (c) that at some future time this blindness shall be removed; (d) and that "the house of Jacob" shall no longer be ashamed. Ps. 69 : 22, 23, is also given, and in the context is found (1) the sufferings and death of Jesus; (2) the blindness of the Jews in this matter; (3) indignation poured upon them; (4) they, however, that seek the Lord shall live; (5) and then follows (v. 35, 36) the restoration of this people, the rebuilding of the cities of Judah, etc. 7. Now he asks of the nation, "Have they stumbled that they should fall," which is answered, "God forbid." The reasons for believing that the nation, as such, will ultimately be reinstated in its condition forfeited by unbelief follow. 8. They have fallen for the present that salvation—the promises to Abraham—may also be tendered to Gentiles, thus provoking them to jealousy. This direct allusion again to Deut. clearly indicates that this fall is merely temporary, and that the Apostle so regarded it in appealing to the very Scripture which necessarily, owing to the context in which it stands, implies and teaches it. 9. (a) "Now if the fall of them (b) be the riches of the world, and (a) the diminishing of them, (b) the riches of the Gentiles: (c) how much more their fulness." Observe of whom the Apostle predicates this "fall" and "diminishing," and it is of the same party (not another as the believing portion) that this "fulness" is stated. The only question is, what does Paul mean by the word "fulness." That the charge of forcing a meaning may not be preferred against us, we cordially accept of the definition of an opponent. Thus Barnes (Com. loci) "the word 'fulness' means that which fills up or completes anything." Thus it is applied to that which fills a vessel or cup; also to the piece of cloth which is put in to fill up the rent in a garment, Matt. 9 : 16. To the fragments which were left when Christ had fed the five thousand, Mark 8 : 20 ; Rom. 13 : 10. 'Love is the fulfilling of the law,' i.e. it is the filling up of the law, or that which renders the obedience complete. See Gal. 5 : 14. Here it stands opposed to their fall and their diminution, and evidently means their complete restoration to the favor of God ; their recovery from unbelief and apostasy." It does not refer to individuals as such, for those who thus shamefully treated Christ and were punished shall never have this said of them, but, as in many other places, of the nation as such. But if restored thus to the favor of God, what does this imply ? Precisely what the Apostle continues to present, the restoration of the nation into its once obtained but delayed Theocratic-Davidic position. In the word "fulness" the Apostle embraces that "filling up" in the Divine Plan, that sublime "filling up" or complement in the future history of the nation as given by the prophets just quoted by him. 10. This is more plainly stated : "For (1) if the casting away of them (2) be the reconciling of the world" (Gospel now tendered to all), (3) "what shall the receiving of them be (4) but life from the dead." The same nation "cast away" is the one "received," and, as above, when thus again restored to Divine favor as a nation it shall prove (so the prophets declare of this national restoration, and which we shall describe from them farther on) a greater blessing ("much more") to the Gentiles.<sup>1</sup> 11. Then follows an illustration of which Barnes (Com. loci) says : "By this illustration (of first-fruits) Paul doubtless means to say that the Jewish nation, as a people, were set apart to the service of God, and were so regarded by Him." Taking this admission and legitimately following it out, it indicates that when thus restored it occupies again the same position ; which is corroborated by the tenor of the prophets. 12. The natural branches are broken off (i.e. on account of unbelief, rejected as unworthy of the covenanted blessings), and Gentiles are grafted in and borne by the root, viz., by being adopted and incorporated as the seed of Abraham (to whom the Covenant was given), they with Abraham receive the promises. 13. This nation thus cut off, God is able to graft in again, i.e. restore them as formerly, especially if they yield up their unbelief as predicted. Will God graft them in again ? 14. That He will do it is positively asserted in the next verse, and made the stronger by declaring that if Gentiles could be adopted, etc., "how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive trees." But why "how much more" ? Simply because, as Covenant and prophecy unitedly affirm, the Divine Purpose pertaining to perfected salvation is inseparably connected with the Jewish nation as such, and absolutely requires its restoration. Hence the provision that is specially made when the time arrives for the removal of this national unbelief, etc. 15. The Apostle taking this restoration as an established fact in the Divine Plan, now asserts when it will be accomplished. (a) He speaks of it as "a mystery" because the Jews could not understand how the blessings exclusively promised to a covenanted people, the natural seed of Abraham, could be extended to others and themselves be rejected, which, however, is explained by the adoption by faith into the covenanted people of Abraham, and by the additional fact that this rejection of the nation is not perpetual but only for a limited period. (b) In describing how long this blindness or hardness or casting away is to continue, he emphatically limits it to "until the fulness of the Gentiles has come in." This may denote either until the filling up of the predetermined elect (Props. 118, 153, 154, etc.) out of the Gentiles is accomplished, or until, as in Christ's declaration, the filling up, the complement of "the times of the Gentiles" is finished. In either case the rejection of the nation is not final but bounded by a definite period known to God. 16. Then, i.e. after this order has been fulfilled, viz., the continued blindness of the nation until this fulness of the Gentiles has come in, then comes, "And so all Israel shall be saved." Then Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and all the pious, believing dead shall arise to inherit the promises; then the Gentiles grafted in by faith, the dead of centuries shall also arise and inherit with them; and then too the nation once blind, rejected and sorely punished shall return to their former station of special consecration to God, and "all Israel," not part (comp. Ezek. 39 : 28) but all, thus saved shall prove an inestimable blessing to the world. 17. But, as Paul well knew, this requires supernatural agency, direct Divine interposition, and therefore—mark well—he locates in the future, as our whole argument evinces that it must, after this continued blindness and after this gathering of Gentiles or the completion of their times, the Coming of the Lord Jesus, as "the Deliverer," which, in the very nature of the case, seeing that we yet live during the time of this blindness and gathering, or Gentile era, must refer to the Coming of this Deliverer "the second time unto salvation." 18. That "the Deliverer" comes at this time (and not at the First Advent) is evident by studying the connection in which the passage quoted is found in Isaiah. There it stands related to (1) a time when the sins of Israel have separated them from God; (2) when their calamities shall be great and they need deliverance; (3) when God will come with vengeance (not upon them but) upon their enemies; (4) the nation, as a nation, will repent; (5) when this vengeance shall cause a general fear to prevail; (6) when the Jews shall become a holy nation and ever retain the truth; (7) and when Millennial glory and blessedness shall prevail. 19. The Covenant promises demand this, as we see from the covenanted Theocratic arrangement which God has proposed to fulfil, which, as its basis, requires for its successful operation, "a holy people," and as a consequence a national repentance and acceptance of David's Son, Jesus "the Christ." 20. All this comes to pass, because, although now "enemies" of the Gospel, they are "as touching the election, beloved for the Father's sake," i.e. they are a covenanted people to whom nationally certain promises given to the Fathers belong, and, therefore, to verify these promises their restoration is a necessity. 21. For, God does not change or repent; His promises to this nation, notwithstanding its rebellion, etc., are sure. Otherwise with His foreknowledge, powers, etc., He would not have made and called them. 22. He concludes, in view of all this, to express his admiration of the mercy, wisdom, and knowledge of God, of the profound, deeply laid Divine arrangements for salvation, of the marvellous advancement of them as then witnessed, of His performing and perfecting them according to His own will, and of being the source and end for which all things exist. How can we resist such reasoning which falls directly within the anticipated expectations of pious Jews and Christian believers; which expressly warns Gentiles against falling into the blunder, alas! now so general, of denying to this nation its covenanted position in the Kingdom of God, and which preserves a united testimony of inspired men upon a doctrine momentous as to results in the future history of the world. Indeed so amazing is the developing order of events in the call of the Jewish nation, in its fall, in the gathering going on, in the continued blindness, in the assurance of the removal of the veil and the re-establishment, etc., that we may well say with James, when expressing his belief in the same (Acts 15 : 16-18), "known unto God are all His works from the beginning of the world." Surely the early Church more fully appreciated the Divine Purposes of God in Redemption by keeping close to the Record, than modern theology (with here and there an exception) with all its boasted enlightenment and deeper spirituality. Spirituality indeed belongs to it, as they also evinced, but it does not transpose or alter the Divine arrangements.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The author is not entirely satisfied with the explanation generally attached to the phrase "life from the dead." It certainly includes the idea of greater blessings as verse 12 does, but may it not actually describe one of the blessings, viz., the resurrection of the pious dead, which we have shown (Props. 125-129) is associated with this identical restoration and through which unspeakable blessings will be extended to others. Alford (Com. loci) thinks that it, at least, implies "the glories of the first resurrection, and deliverance from the bondage of corruption," without excluding the other idea of "some further blessed state." One of "the oldest ecclesiastical explanations" (so Lange, Com. loci) applied it to "the resurrection of the dead" (so e.g. Origen, Chrysostom, Rückert, Meyer, Tholuck, De Wette, etc.).

"Come out of Zion," Baines says may denote that Christ "should arise among that people, be descended from themselves, or should not be a foreigner." The Heb. is "shall come to Zion"; the Sep. "For the sake of Zion, the Deliverer will come," or as some render it "the Redeemer shall come on account of Zion," so also Cheldee and Latin Vulgate. Hengstenberg, with his Church-Kingdom theory, cannot see how this can apply to a literal Zion—to "come out of Zion"—but must be referred to the Church, for it is, in his estimation, only applicable to "the Saviour who is present in and with His Church." This is a mere quibble, unworthy of the distinguished writer, for even if his reasoning had force it would be inapplicable, seeing that it would represent Jesus as coming "out of" the Church. If He can do this, He certainly, when He comes "to Zion," as Isaiah says, can manifest Himself "out of Zion," for the latter phrase simply denotes the place of manifestation (comp. e.g. Props. 168 and 169). Hengstenberg on this point (and others, as Luke 21 : 24 ; Acts 1 : 6-8, and 3 : 19, 20, etc.) has been ably refuted by an anon. writer (Proph. Times, vol. 7, p. 65, etc.), who unmistakably shows its connection with Zech. 8 : 2-8, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I was jealous for Zion with great jealousy, and I was jealous for her with great fury. Thus saith the Lord, I am returned unto Zion and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem," etc. (see the context and compare with other Scriptures, as Deut. 32 : 21-23 ; Zeph. 1 : 12-18, etc.). The simple fact recognized by Paul is that Jesus exerts His Theocratic power in connection with, and as identified with, Zion, where the Theocratic-Davidic power was exerted. Vitringa (Bloomfield on Rom. 11 : 26) supposes also that Paul had Ps. 14 : 7 in view, and blended it with the other. This may be correct, and if so corroborates (as it does independently) our position, since the restoration is linked with "out of Zion," thus : "Oh, that the salvation of Israel were come "out of Zion!" Then the Lord bringeth back the captivity of His people, Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad." (The last expression reminds us of Augustine's rendering of Hos. 3 : 5—City of God, B. 18, S. 28—"And afterward shall the children of Israel return and seek the Lord their God and David their King, and shall be amazed at the Lord and at His goodness in the latter days.") to restoration), yet the orthodox firmly hold to the twelfth Art. of belief drawn up by the celebrated Maimonides : " I believe firmly and honestly the Advent of an anointed Redeemer, and notwithstanding His remaining away so long, I nevertheless yearn daily for His Coming." What Milman (His. Jews, vol. 3, p. 183) says of the Jewish belief at the time of the Crusades is the continued faith to-day : " Though they had been so long exiled from that holy soil, though the few Jews who dwell in Palestine were but as strangers in the land, Jewish tradition had still clung, as has been said, with undying fondness to their rightful ownership, to the hopes of returning to that blessed country. Their restoration to Judea, to Jerusalem, was to be the great work, the final triumph of the Messiah, whosoever or wheresoever He would appear." The numerous false Messiahs indicate this ardent belief, and how impostors availed themselves of it to the detriment of the nation. The Inquisition in Spain (Milman's His. Jews, vol. 3, p. 311) had certain tests by which to discover latent Judaism, and one was " the expectation of the Messiah" which Milman calls (p. 368) the "great and consolatory article of their creed," which inspired hope under persecution and distress. Even the Chinese Jews, separated from their brethren (p. 496, vol. 2) " entertain distinct though remote hopes of the Coming of the Messiah." The Jews, too, believe that this restoration will be effected by one in the Davidic line as all the prophets testify, hence e.g. the Jews in the time of Mohammed rejected his advances and " disclaimed a Messiah sprung from the loins of Hagar, the bondswoman" (Milman). The Prince of the Captivity (Milman, vol. 3, p. 16—so Gibbon, etc.) who professed to derive his ancestral line from David, at his inauguration prayed, in a low voice, for the restoration of the Kingdom of Israel. Who can number the prayers, the pathetic appeals, the longing supplications that have poured forth from Jewish hearts and lips, sustained by prophetic utterances and covenanted relationship? The Jews are, indeed, mistaken in their rejection of the Messiah, but not in the Messianic Kingdom and their connection with it. Rev. Randall (The Handwriting of God in Egypt, Sinai, and the Holy Land), referring to the Jews' place of wailing at Jerusalem and an interesting scene of mourning witnessed by himself, says : " But, however sincerely they may mourn over the ruins of their demolished temple, no rivers of grief can cleanse the sanctuary, no sacrifices of prayer rebuild its walls, for, in the purposes of God, it has been utterly and forever overthrown." He forgets that Jerusalem is only overthrown for a definite period—expressly so stated by Jesus—and that the prophets, with united voice, proclaim its restoration. High-minded Gentilism will not delay or alter God's purposes. From such a writer we turn to another, who, more in sympathy with the Jew and the Scriptures, says (Rev. Fuller in his Address to the Jews, appended to The Gospel its own Witness) : " You live in expectation of being restored to your own land. We expect the same thing, and rejoice in the belief of it. The Old and the New Test. agree in predicting it." Yes! those tearful prayers, those mournful supplications, that undying yearning, that persistent cleaving to—even amid a sinful unbelief respecting God's mode of procedure—God's promises and God's faithfulness, will at last be answered in triumph and glory. Isa. 30 : 18, 19, etc., will yet be verified in behalf of this afflicted people.

<sup>2</sup> While some of the rationalistic Jews take but little interest in a national restoration, while some are incredulous and reject it, others, and especially the orthodox portion of the nation, tenaciously hold to the ancient faith based on the prophecies. They still believe what Reuss (His. Ch. Theol., p. 55) ascribes to the Pharisees : "Everywhere and always they hold that the first condition of realizing the brilliant hopes based upon their religious faith was the securing and assuring of the national independence." This faith is a matter of history, attested to by their liturgical prayers, their constant and abiding interest in the Holy Land, their pilgrimages to Jerusalem, their earnest desire to be buried in its sacred soil, their expressed hopes of a return (a writer in the Jewish Chronicle recently calculated the restoration to take place about A.D. 1880), and their looking, longing, and praying for the coming Messiah. A Jew who honestly believes the Old Test. cannot but entertain such a faith. The ancient faith is shown in extracts from Jewish sources, Rabbinical, Apocryphal, etc., by Brookes, Mede, etc., and, in view of the quotations given in this work, need not be repeated. While the Radicals (Art. "the Jews," Galaxy, Jan., 1872) reject the belief in the coming of the Messiah (which is introductory

Obs. 7. The reader will consider how unnatural—even cruel—it would be, if the doctrine of a restoration is not to be received, to give so many predictions which in their plain grammatical sense teach a future glorious national restoration of the Jews to their once possessed land. Why thus excite the expectations and hopes of a multitude for many centuries of oppression and exile, if they are never to be realized? Would such a course of procedure be honorable even in man, knowing as he must the deception that would accrue from it? To trifle with the dearest, most heart-felt hopes of a nation by language pre-eminently calculated to excite the same, is not Divine, and we earnestly repudiate every theory which either directly or indirectly charges Holy Writ with such a mode of procedure. No! God's Word is the truth, and the grammatical sense—the sense which all men agree is the most legitimate in language—contains the plain truth, which God will fulfil at the appointed time.

It is a matter of amazement how our opponents, in order to rid themselves of these predictions which they cannot fairly spiritualize and appropriate to the Ch. Church, interpret the prophecies, applying part to the past, part to the present, and part to the future. It is a favorite theory with some that the promises relating to restoration to the land, supremacy, etc., were realized in the reigns of David and Solomon. But they fail to answer such questions: why then does David predict them as still future? And why do Jeremiah and other prophets, who lived long after Solomon, still locate the fulfilment in the future? And why do all associate their realization with a David's Son so exalted and sublime, that David and Solomon sink into comparative insignificance in comparison with Him? And why do the New Test. writers expressly refer these promises to Jesus, the Christ, and locate their fulfilment at the Sec. Advent? If this method does not answer every prediction, then refuge is taken in conditionality, just as if the oath-bound Covenant of God, the elect and Theocratic position of the nation, did not necessitate God—in order to evince His own faithfulness and vindicate His intended Theocratic Kingdom—to be faithful in a restoration. Where e.g. is the conditionality of Zech. 14, of Luke 1 : 32, 33, of Isa. 65 : 17-25, and a host of other predictions? The fact is, that the advocates of conditionality do not honestly and consistently believe in their own theory, and the conclusive evidence is found in their appropriating (by the process of spiritualizing) these very predictions, and applying them as fulfilled in the Ch. Church. Ten thousand instances of such misapplication could readily be produced, which leaves the promises of God to the nation and attested to by solemn oath, unfulfilled, and presents us a very imperfect Redemption, simply because, following a wrong premise, it does not perceive God's glorious Theocratic Plan, but deliberately—without observing the absurdity involved—makes God's Theocratic Purpose a failure.

Obs. 8. The reader will specially notice (what completely meets a class of objections contained e.g. in Letters to a Millenarian, etc.) that Moses after the delivery of the ceremonial law and after the establishment of the Theocratic ordering, predicts, Deut. 32, the restoration of the nation (e.g. vs. 36-43) after the call and gathering (v. 21 comp. with Rom. 10 : 19) of the Gentiles. This exactly corresponds with James's declaration (Acts 15 : 16) that after the Gentiles are gathered out then the Davidic house or Kingdom will be restored. Here we have conclusive evidence (fully sustained by the general analogy of prophecy) that all efforts to apply these predictions to the Ch. Church, in part or in whole, are seriously defective, and opposed to the most decisive (chronological) statements. Indeed, as our argument unmistakably shows, supported by abundant testimony of Scripture, the fulfilment is associated with the Second Advent of Jesus, David's Son (comp. next Prop.).

PROPOSITION 113. The connection of this Kingdom with Jewish restoration necessitates the realization of their predicted repentance and conversion.

The restored Theocratic Kingdom is a holy Kingdom. God Himself, in the Person of His Son, again condescends to act as earthly Ruler, but as He reveals Himself and His associated Rulers in a higher and more intimate personal relationship, and as the design is to make this a powerful and all-pervading Kingdom, those who stand nationally in a covenanted and elect relationship must become morally qualified for its establishment. Hence the predicted repentance and conversion of the nation.

Obs. 1. We have passed over Rom. 11, which combines the conversion and restoration. So self-evident is this, that our leading opponents concede this to us. Thus e.g. Dr. Brown (Com., Rom. 8, etc.) interprets the chapter as plainly teaching a national conversion and restoration of the Jews; he rejects its application to "individual Jews," and insists upon a "national recovery of Israel." We append a few statements of its spirit. "Until the fulness of the Gentiles be (have) come in, i.e. not the general conversion of the world to Christ, as many take it; for this would seem to contradict the latter part of this chapter, and throw the national recovery of Israel too far into the future; besides in v. 15, the Apostle seems to speak of the receiving of Israel, not as following, but as contributing largely to bring about the general conversion of the world—but, until the Gentiles have had their full time of the visible Church all to themselves, while the Jews are out, which the Jews had till the Gentiles were brought in."

We quote simply to indicate his convictions respecting a national conversion and restoration and not to indorse his explanation of "the fulness" (which we rather attribute, as the analogy of Scripture teaches, to the completion of the elect, chosen body who are to be associated with the Christ as Rulers, etc.). Many others of our opposers could thus be quoted. Even Whitby (Com. Rom. 11) asserts that the conversion and restoration of the Jews was "the constant doctrine of the Church of Christ, owned by all the Greek and Latin Fathers, and by all commentators he has met with on the place." The pitiful evasions of Barnes in his commentaries (e.g. Isa. 11 and Rom. 11) to avoid a restoration (based on Covenant relationship) are noticeable, while conceding (also e.g. 2 Cor. 3 : 16) "a conversion of the people at large; a conversion that shall be nearly simultaneous; a conversion en masse." Barnes's favorite "as if" looms up conspicuously in this subject—all is figurative or spiritual, and bringing the Jews "out of all nations" (e.g. Isa. 66 : 20) is simply converting them in these countries, and the great success attending such conversion is "as if" caravans of them proceeded to Jerusalem, etc. Such perversions are saddening, coming from good men. Fausset (Com. on Isa. 66 : 20), referring to Houbigant, advocating a restoration to the Holy Land, says, "It cannot mean the mere entrance of the Jews into the Christian Church; for such an entrance would be by faith, not upon 'horses, litters, and mules.'" But Dr. Fausset forgets how readily our opponents, if need be, can transform those "horses" into strong faith, the "litters or coaches" into a weak or easy faith, and the "mules" into a stubborn or persistent faith! Greater transformations than these constantly meet us, for as the land itself is mentioned in connection with this conversion in various predictions, the land is transmuted into the Ch. Church (and even into heaven). It is a little difficult to apply solely to conversion the predicted rebuilding of the cities, tilling and sowing the land, multiplying man and beast (e.g. Ezek. 36 : 11, 12, etc.) in "the inheritance" of "my people Israel," but then these are such figurative trifles, in the estimation of our opponents, that they may safely be passed by.

Obs. 2. The conversion and the restoration both result from a personal Coming of Jesus. Paul informs us (Rom. 11 : 25, 26) that when the fullness of the Gentiles is come in, then the blindness befallen Israel shall also be removed, because (as the Jews believed), "there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer," etc., owing, as our argument has shown, to the Covenant, "for this is my Covenant unto them," etc. The Apostle could not well use stronger language than this to indicate this Pre-Millennial Advent, and the resulting conversion and restoration; because he well knew that the Jews understood Zech. 14, etc., to present the same Advent and with the same results; that they held a portion, at least, of Zech. 12 to be connected with that period with which he identifies in a crucified Saviour held up as the Messiah Coming a second time unto salvation, the prediction: "they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him," etc., linked with the time when their sins shall be removed and the nation shall be exalted. This work is specifically assigned to Jesus, as e.g. in Isa. 49 : 5, 6; Isa. 63 : 17, 18, etc.; Deut. 18 : 18, 19 (for the prophet "like unto me" includes a deliverer of the people, but greater than Moses),<sup>1</sup> Deut. 32 : 36, etc.; Ezek. 34 : 11, 12, etc. Compared with passages which plainly designate this Shepherd of the lost sheep of the house of Israel, Isa. 56 : 8, etc.<sup>2</sup> Hence the Messiah, in view of this restoration, received from the Jews the significant title of "the Consolation of Israel" (Dr. Clarke's Com., Luke 2 : 25). This restoration is even foretold in the 80th Psalm, where after asking how long God would be angry with His people, making them a sport to their enemies, etc., this people is represented by a vine brought out of Egypt which God planted in the land, after removing the heathen from it, but which is plucked, wasted, devoured, burned, and cut down. God is urged to return, and visit, and restore the same vine, not another, and the confidence is expressed in verse 17 that this will be done by "the man of Thy right hand," "the Son of man whom Thou madest strong for thyself." The most explicit prophecies are given. Thus Amos 9 : 11, etc., and Acts 15 : 16, etc., after describing the dispersion of the Jewish nation, we have (1) The tabernacle of David fallen and in ruins; (2) the return of God in its behalf; (3) the rebuilding of the same tabernacle fallen and in ruins; and (4) to avoid mistake it is added: "I will build it as in the days of old," i.e. the same Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom will be restored under, as covenanted, David's Son; (5) it is "the Lord that doeth this"; (6) this is done when "I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them," etc.; (7) and when this takes place, and they are planted on their land, "they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God."<sup>3</sup> In Micah 5 : 1, 2, 3 (which in this connection will bear repeating), there is (1) the birthplace of the Messiah; (2) His Rulership; (3) that He should be smitten; (4) owing to this smiting He "gives them up," i.e. to captivity, etc., for an appointed time; (5) then the nation will be restored, Christ manifesting His rule in breaking down the confederation of wickedness. Compare Ps. 102 : 16 and context, Ps. 148 : 2 ; Isa. 60 : 1 ; Isa. 16 : 5, etc. In Hos. 3 : 4, 5 the same succession is presented : (1) the complete overthrow of the Kingdom, so that "the children of Israel shall remain many days without a king and without a prince"; (2) so entire is the dispersion that they are even without a sacrifice, etc.; (3) but "afterward (in the latter days) shall the children of Israel return," i.e. the same nation that endured this overthrow ; (4) and shall acknowledge "David their King." Indeed, the restoration of the people is indispensable, seeing that they form the Kingdom as seen in its inauguration (Ex. 19 : 6), and as evinced in the Covenant with David, so that the presence of David's Son, of the nation in the land where the Kingdom existed is requisite. The decided impression made by many predictions, as e.g. Ps. 89 : 132, etc., is that David's Son, shall at some future time sit on David's throne, reigning gloriously here on the earth ; the magnificence, extent, duration, etc., of which reign, as predicted, has not yet been witnessed. The explicit declarations of His obtaining the throne of His Father David (not that of another), Luke 1 : 32 ; Isa. 9 : 7 ; Acts 2 : 30, etc., is in accord with the Covenant promise. But all such predictions, in the nature of the case, imply, and in many places are actually connected with, the restoration of the nation. For, as David expresses it, Ps. 135, "the Lord hath chosen Jacob unto Himself, and Israel for his peculiar treasure"; and having power to perform all things, and being gracious He will relent, verify His memorial, establish them "in the land given for a heritage unto Israel His people," He, at the same time, "dwelling at Jerusalem." Unless we accept of the Divine Order laid down, it is impossible to explain the numerous prophecies which describe the Jewish nation, as a nation, to experience a blessedness unexampled here on earth. If we say, this has been fulfilled, then we belittle the Word of God, and challenge His foreknowledge ; if we divert these prophecies to a fulfilment in the Church, then we violate the plainest rules of language and make Scripture to utter and give hopes which were never intended to be realized.* No ! let us receive the Word as it promises, and believe in the fulfilment in the future where God locates it, and light and unity at once abound. Then the language of Jesus, e.g. Matt. 23 : 37 ; Luke 13 : 35, etc., receives a force unknown to any other explanation. Thus, in the passages just alluded to, we then have (1) the rejection of Jesus by the Jews ; (2) the Davidic house left desolate (for the city and temple were not desolate when He spoke); (3) Christ's removal from them ; (4) His return to them some time in the future ; (5) the removal of the desolation implied at His return ; (6) which implication is fully sustained by what the Jews shall then say, "Blessed is He that cometh." etc., as is seen by the universal Jewish application of this by Jews to the restoration of that house, and by reference to Ps. 118 : 26, which stands related with a special deliverance of "Israel." It is simply to be faithless if we deny this, because Christ is "the man ordained" to perform it ; and the assurance is given that, strange and astonishing as it may seem to the world, He will do it, Isa. 49 : 6 ; Isa. 62 : 1, 2 ; Ezek. 34 : 11-13, etc.* Hence Jesus, never in word or act, discountenanced in His followers His connection with David's throne and Kingdom, and the necessary restoration of the nation. He defended the acclamations of the people when He entered the city, foreshadowing His royal claim, although linked, as the prophets and Covenant, with the Davidic Kingdom. He left His own disciples down to the very last moment (Acts 1 : 6), in the belief that His Kingdom was truly one connected with the restored nation under the Theocratic-Davidic rule. The only error that He attempted to correct was that in relation to the time when it was to be performed, leaving it either indefinitely in the future or limiting it with a future (unknown as to time) personal Coming. The fact is, that the restoration is so blended with the personal reign of Christ, as David's Son, that they cannot, without gross violence, be separated, and therefore, on this very ground alone, some reject such a restoration, declaring that if the one is admitted, the other must follow, for the David, the Lord, then reigning over them is also with them in the land, etc.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Some of the Fathers have a remark worthy of notice : " Neither Moses, the representative of the law, nor Miriam, the representative of the prophets, nor Aaron, the representative of the priesthood and its sacrificial rites, could bring the Israelites into the possession of the promised land. This was reserved for Joshua, who was in name and conduct a lively type of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." How applicable this is, will be conclusively seen when the Mill. age is ushered in under the auspices of Jesus.

<sup>2</sup> Alexander and others endeavor to make " the outcasts of Israel " mean " the elect Gentiles." This is far-fetched. We admit that the elect Gentiles being engrafted belong to Israel, but those alluded to are not the Israel, but the outcasts of Israel, and hence to make it fit the Gentiles it must be shown that they were first of Israel, then cast out, and then regathered.

<sup>3</sup> Amos 9 : 11, with the connection is so decisive in the " building it as in the days of old," etc., that Calmet, Clarke, and others frankly confess that nothing has yet occurred to meet the demands of the prophecy. Clarke (Com. loci) admits that this refers to a literal restoration to their own land under the Messiah. Bh. Newcome, following some mss. of the Syriac, the Arabic, renders (as Acts 15 : 17) the phrase " that they may possess the remnant of Edom," by " that the residue of men may seek Jehovah, and all the heathen who are called by my name," substituting Adam, men, or mankind in place of Edom. This is not necessary, seeing that many critics, allowing the usage of the Jews (who e.g. applied Edom to Rome, etc.), which seems to be imitated in Acts 15 : 17, make Edom equivalent to Gentiles. The critical student will observe that the language forbids the notion of conditionality, for the promise is not only positive, but the result as actually experienced is given. The same is true of many other predictions.

<sup>4</sup> Brookes's El. Proph. Interp. gives a good explanation of the image Ephah and teraphim — so various commentators. In reference to the phrase " David their King," Fausset (Com. Jer. 30 : 9, which he also applies to a future restoration of the Jews to Palestine) says of it : " No king of David's seed has held the sceptre since the captivity ; for Zerubbabel, though of David's line, never claimed the title ' King.' The Son of David, Messiah, must therefore be meant : so the Targum (cf. Isa. 55 : 3, 4 ; Ezek. 34 : 23, 24 ; Hos. 3, 5 ; Rom. 11 : 25-32). He was appointed to the throne of David (Isa. 9 : 7 ; Luke 1 : 32)." To this we add, it has been customary to give successors the name of a progenitor, as the Cæsars, etc.

<sup>5</sup> It makes one sad to read how the plainest statements are discarded for a typical, spiritual, or mystical interpretation. This, too, is found in works exerting a powerful influence in shaping scriptural application. The strangest part is, that some works are flatly contradictory on this subject. Thus e.g. Lange's Com., having editors of diverse views, contradicts its teaching. Take Drs. Craven, Lillie, Van Oosterzee, Auberlen, etc., and compare their utterances, so favorable to the covenanted and predicted conversion and restoration, with those of Drs. Schmoller, Briggs, Fairbairn, Shedd, etc., that advocate the opposite, and a wide contrast is presented, which forms a blemish to the work. One party or the other certainly is in error, and teaches that which is misleading.

<sup>6</sup> Jesus is formed for this very purpose (Isa. 49 : 5) " to bring Jacob again to God," therefore we may rest assured that it will be performed. The reader will observe the marginal reading of our version which agrees with many commentators, as Clarke, Barnes, Lowth, etc., in view of the mss. Aquila, Chaldee, Arabic, etc., which read, " And that Israel unto Him might be gathered." Consistency with the tenor of the chapter requires this, or a similar, reading. God will perform this work (Isa. 44 : 7, 8).

<sup>7</sup> To make these predictions, thus connected with the personal Advent of the Messiah, conditional (as some Sec. Adventists, Seventh Day Baptists) would be to declare the Sec. Advent itself conditional. To make the conversion and restoration something to precede the Sec. Advent (as Hodge, Barnes, Luthardt, etc.) is to reverse the order given by the prophets. To leave out the Sec. Coming as the important and essential factor in the national restoration is simply to ignore an abundance of Scripture testimony bearing on the subject. This will be seen as we proceed in the argument. In reference to this subject the student will, in order to observe the completeness of our argument, refer to the additional testimony given under Props. 121, 122, 133, etc. There is much Scripture bearing on this point, some of which being more obscure must be interpreted in the light of the plain and decisive passages. Thus e.g. the interesting and deep representative ("figurative men," so Dr. Clarke, etc.—i.e. representative men, men who prefigure or represent), chapters 3 and 4 (comp. with ch. 6, etc.) of Zech. exhibit the personal agency of Jesus in this restoration, as "the Branch." Whatever diversity may exist in explaining the details, it is evident that the work of "My servant the Messiah" (so Chaldee) is delineated to be in the latter days. In Micah 2 : 13, in immediate connection with the restoration and the presence of the King, some even make "the Breaker" the one who gives deliverance (and among my notes is the following rendering): "He that forceth a passage is come up before them; they have forced a passage and have passed through the gate, and are gone forth by it. And their King passeth before them, even Jehovah at the head of them" (comp. Zech. 2 : 10-13 ; 14 : 3-5, etc.).

Obs. 3. This repentance, over against Ernesti and others, is positively covenanted to them, Isa. 44 : 22, 23 ; Rom. 11 : 26, 27 ; Isa. 59 : 19, 20, 21 ; Jer. 31 : 2, 3, etc. The inchoate fulfilment of Joel 2 : 28, etc., as described in Acts 2 : 17, etc., is no impediment but a confirmation of our view, because the application of Joel to certain events, miraculous and astounding in their nature, not only indicates them as typical or an earnest of a future realization (Prop. 170), but affords a positive assurance that the entire prophecy as it stands shall surely be fulfilled. In Joel it is connected (1) with the terrible day of the Lord, time of vengeance ; (2) with the bringing back again "the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem"; (3) with the recovery of my "heritage Israel" "scattered among the nations"; (4) with the Coming of the Lord, the harvest, the complete overthrow of God's enemies, the dwelling of God (as He once did as a ruler) in Zion, the blessedness of the nation, the then holiness of Jerusalem, the continued and everlasting prosperity of the people and of Jerusalem. We dare not separate what God has thus joined ; and as God has evidenced His faithfulness and power in a partial, inchoate fulfilment, we reverently trust in the same faithfulness and power for an ample verification of all the particulars enumerated by the prophet. The judgments on the Jewish nation, as we have repeatedly shown, exist down to the Sec. Advent (as e.g. Matt. 23 : 27 ; Matt. 24 ; Zech. 14, etc.), but these same judgments, Isa. 32 : 15, continue down "until the Spirit be poured upon us from on high"; and this Spirit we are assured is "then" bestowed, Ezek. 36 : 24-26, when "I will take you from among the heathen," etc., and restore "to their own land that I gave to your fathers"—fruitfulness, etc., being predicated of the land. See when the Lord will "turn to the people a pure language," etc., Zeph. 3 : 8, 9, and is it not when He will "rise up to the prey," "gather the nations and kingdoms," "to pour upon them His fierce anger," etc., thus describing the period at the Sec. Advent? Look at the promises, so numerous, that when this nation is converted, obtains this happy deliverance, it shall never more be afflicted, etc., and should there be any difficulty in locating their fulfilment, if we truly believe in their realization, when it is positively taught that down to the personal Advent of Jesus, tribulation shall, more or less, accompany the nation? This repentance, conversion, restoration, as prophet after prophet declares, if once experienced is effectual, needs no repetition, etc., Ezek. 16 : 63 ; Zeph. 3 : 9 ; Isa. 62 : 1-2 ; Jer. 31 : 31-34 ; Isa. 45 : 17, etc. Indeed, to produce proof on this point, nearly every prophet can be extensively quoted. And, a remarkable feature pervading all the predictions is this : that God, although men may disallow it, will so order all things that when the period of fulfilment arrives, when the time that the realization of the Covenant comes, this very nation so long stubborn and unrepentant, so long the rejecters of the Messiah, shall be repentant and believing ; that after protracted correction, it will again experience mercy, and always in the land from which it was driven. The miraculous events connected with this period cause many to stumble in their acceptance of it, but this is not strange, if we consider the design of all this, viz., that it is part of the Divine Plan, and an important factor, in promoting the salvation of the race. The events themselves are of a nature impossible for man or mortal or physical forces to accomplish, demanding, if performed at all, direct Divine aid. The taunt so long used by scientists and others, that if such a God as the Bible describes does exist, He should then manifest Himself by direct Divine interference, will then be effectually removed.<sup>1</sup> For, then God, so long withdrawn, will again, as He has promised, reveal Himself to man and exert His marvellous power in his behalf, but, mark it, only in the one direction always observed by Him, viz., in that of the only nation under heaven favored with a covenanted Theocratic relationship. This relationship, for a time held practically in abeyance, He cannot restore until the time comes of His return. The Divine Sovereignty now exercised in a way only susceptible to faith and to reason under the influence of grace, will again give place to that direct manifestation of power, etc., under the restored Theocratic rule. Hence it is important in regarding this repentance to notice (what, alas ! so many overlook) that it is controlled by the principles of the incoming dispensation. "The times of the Gentiles" having ended, Jewish times are again in the ascendancy, so that in reference to the manner of this repentance, the order laid down, the miraculous influences connected with it, the time in which the work is to be effected, etc., we are to be governed solely by what is predicted ; and no attempt should be made to prescribe how it must be done, or to force it within the limits assigned to present times. It is sufficient for us to know, that God's mode of procedure has always been at variance with that which man in his wisdom vainly proposes ; and that when a new era has arrived, it has been inaugurated strictly in accord with His own Word but never in accord with popular expectations. The views so universally prevalent on this subject, so opposite to the simple language of the Bible and the child-like faith of the early Church, are, on this ground alone, open to suspicion. It is enough for us to receive predictions, and, actuated by the past literal fulfilment, by faith in God, to believe in them as recorded without the addition of another and differing sense, and of apologies for ancient weakness and credulity.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In the very nature of the case these scientists demand an exhibition of powers, etc., which the Bible shows, owing to sinfulness, has been withdrawn until a certain period of time has expired and a certain number of believers are obtained, when it shall again be restored. Presuming the Bible to be true, the demand is presumptuous ; if it be false, how then are we to explain some facts, (1) that such power, just as the prophets have predicted, has been withdrawn ; (2) that God does not now, just as predicted, condescend to act as an earthly Ruler as He once did ; (3) that this nation, just as predicted, is preserved notwithstanding its dispersion, thus indicating the restoration of this rule, as also predicted ; (4) the gathering of believers going on, as predicted, during this period of withdrawal, etc. Now, if there are so many particulars verified, why may not the rest be? This line of argument is only briefly given—as suggestive of the true method of dealing with the prophets, etc., as fairness and honesty require. The Theocratic Rulership being withdrawn, it is not reasonable to expect God's direct intervention, until the time comes when it shall be restored ; then it comes again with great power.

The conversion of the Jews is a miraculous one, i.e. is one dependent upon seeing the One whom they have pierced (Zech. 12 : 10, which the Sep. "they shall look upon Me because they insulted Me"), upon being pleaded with face to face (Ezek. 20 : 35), is in brief, a conversion similar to that Paul experienced. A writer, initials I. I. (Proph. Times, Jan., 1870), presents an interesting comment (which, if not mistaken, Gillfillan also somewhere produces) on 1 Cor. 8 : 15, a passage of difficulty to some expositors, "And last of all He was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time." Taking the ground that this being "born out of due time" denotes "prematurely," i.e. before the time—the time fixed for the Appearing of Jesus—he refers it to the manner of Paul's conversion (miraculously) as representative of a similar, astounding, miraculous conversion of the Jews at the Sec. Advent when the latter shall also see Jesus and be overwhelmed with shame, sorrow, and contrition. This certainly gives a cogency to the phrase, which no other explanation excels. No one who compares the Scriptures on this point can fail to be arrested by the astounding display of special manifestation, and its resultant effect, then exhibited. This leads us briefly to say that the theories advanced by some that the nation shall be converted through the instrumentality of present means and agencies (however some may thus be converted) is certainly erroneous ; or that this will be done and then some Christian nation, <sup>as</sup> England, shall convey them back (however this may be done with an unconverted portion before the Advent, or, after the Advent to others) to Palestine and thus preserve itself from the desolating judgments of God (comp., however, Thorp's The Destinies of the British Empire, where this notion is opposed) is defective in that it ignores the means designated by the Word. Faber, in his writings, has some valuable remarks on this last point, but loses much of the force of Scripture by not noticing the foundation of all this in the contemplated Theocratic ordering and in not pressing the annexed personal Advent and Theocratic reign on David's restored throne and Kingdom.

Obs. 4. The mention of this repentance and restoration is designed to meet the objection of some (e.g. Dr. Oswald, The Kingdom, and The Saints' Inheritance by Hill) that only the spiritual Israel, dead and living, are brought to the land and inherit it, and that the nation now dispersed, etc., is never to be restored. The strong language employed in declaring that no such restoration as we present is taught by the prophets, is refuted by numerous converging statements. We may well ask, What then becomes of the election of that nation ; is it cast off forever? What becomes of the direct Covenant made only with that nation ; is it altered or spiritualized to exclude the nation as such? What becomes of the Davidic throne and Kingdom ; can it exist unless the nation with which it is identified (not a spiritualized nation) is restored? If all that are restored are only the spiritual seed, why this repentance necessary in their case? If the restored are only such, what are we to do with the multiplication of the race, the rebuilding, etc.—is this all conditional, or is it all to be spiritualized? If the nation as a nation is excluded, what becomes of Moses's declarations respecting that nation in Deut. etc. ; what of Solomon's prayer in 2 Chron. 6 ; what of David's expressed hopes pertaining to it, etc.? The reader, if he has carefully followed the Propositions, step by step, can multiply just such questions. The mistake mentioned arises from not observing the nature of this Kingdom and to whom covenanted ; the continued election of this people ; the wall of partition only broken down between believers and not between the Jewish nation and other nations ; the difference the Word makes between those who inherit the Kingdom and the subjects of it ; that Paul and prophets speak of the Israel cut off for a time and, with no discrimination as is supposed, have the same nation brought back again ; the design intended to be accomplished by this Kingdom, etc. The blunders that men may commit in endeavoring to present the order of events, is no reason why we should discard a doctrine so clearly announced, and so dearly held by the early Church. Indeed, if this doctrine were not found in the Bible, then an essential link in the Divine plan were lacking. That it is taught, is evidenced by the universally admitted fact that in the grammatical usage of the language it is undoubtedly contained therein ; our opponents rejecting it only on two grounds : either, that it is conditional, or, that another sense, unknown to the ancient worthies and first produced by Origen, is to be engrafted upon the prophecies. The very simplicity of the plan causes men to discard it for something, in their estimation, higher and better. The truth of the matter is this : if men were not influenced by a previously entertained theory, they would see at once that the experience alleged in the case of Israel's restoration is so distinctively that of a nation unconverted and in the flesh—a nation long under punishment for sin and coming under converting influences only when God comes to punish the nations of the earth ; a nation of whom, when thus newly converted and restored, an abundant increase of children, beasts, etc., is predicted, that in no consistent shape or sense can be applied to the saints of this and former dispensations without a resort to Origen's system of interpretation, and a consequent violation of the plainest rules of language. No ! No !! let brethren (whom we love) pardon our zeal if it seems too strong in this matter, for we feel this doctrine to be exceedingly precious and intimately connected with the Divine Honor and Purpose. Let men say what they will, it is self-evident that God never would convey an utterly erroneous doctrine in the face of language itself, and deceive an entire nation with the assurance of a special and continued Covenant and election that does not exist. The apology, that God meant to finally spiritualize this, avails not, since God nowhere asserts such a change ; since it is sheer inference drawn from previously formed ones ; since the Covenant itself and the promises derived from it stand to-day unchanged, uncancelled. It is best to add here, leaving the matter for future explanation and extension, that while it is true that the saints will be fully identified with the Jewish restoration—their resurrection and translation preceding it—being also of “the seed of Abraham,” yet as intimated, and as will be shown (Prop. 118, 154, 156, etc.) they are separate and distinct in honor, position, etc., from the Jewish and spared nations, forming with Christ an associated body of rulers having peculiar privileges, etc., not bestowed upon any others. A fruitful source of error on the restoration arises from not discriminating between the saints and others, between the exalted brethren and coheir's of Christ and the subjects over whom they reign with Christ, between the inheritors of the Kingdom and the Kingdom itself. Planting ourselves with unswerving faith on the Covenant, credulous as it may seem, it embraces God's promises as recorded, as e.g. Lev. 26 : 40–45, etc., that He will fulfil the same.

We give several specimens of opposite views. Dr. Oswald (The Kingdom, p. 235, etc.) objects to the national restoration of the Jews to their own land on the ground that as the restoration of Sodom, etc., is also promised in connection and as the Scriptures say it shall be “an utter and eternal desolation.” “Sodom, manifestly, is to have no restoration, and as Jerusalem's restoration is to be, if we may so speak, contemporaneous with Sodom's it will be never.” Hence he searches for another meaning, forgetting that in the very same connection he advocates a new recreated earth, which restitution evidently embraces Sodom and Gomorrah, thus limiting, as the Scriptures often do, the word "eternal," upon which his entire argument is based. The land he makes a type of the future renewed earth, and makes the believers—and not the nation—to inherit it. But that it is no type is self-evident from the express promises that its ruined cities, waste places, etc., should be restored in far greater prosperity, fruitfulness, etc. The renewal of the land does not destroy its identity or geographical position, just as the renewal (glorification) of man does not change his identity. As to making the resurrected and translated saints inherit it (for this they do in virtue of coheirship with Christ) only (comp. Fairbairn, Typology of Scripture, p. 267, etc.), this is utterly opposed by the special promise of the increase of children (for the saints, coheirs with Christ, neither marry nor are given in marriage), the multiplication of cattle, the supremacy of the nation over others, the remarriage of the nation, the covenanted relationship the nation sustains to the Davidic dynasty, the perpetuation of the race, the distinction between the New Jerusalem state and that of the earthly Jerusalem, the reign of the saints, etc. Oswald builds largely on the inadvertency of Dr. Cumming, who has the fire mentioned by Peter co-extensive with the earth and the saints in mid-air, and pertinently enough asks, how then can the Jews be restored? But the promises of God are not annulled by any blunders of interpretation that good men may fall into; and that fire (comp. Prop. 150 with those that immediately precede and follow it) does not affect the restoration. Oswald, to prove that "a spiritual Israel" alone is restored, quotes Ezek. 37 : 21 and Ezek. 37 : 12-14. For the latter, see Prop. 126; as to the former the reader can readily see by the context that it is only applicable to the Jewish nation as a nation, for the nation was divided into two Kingdoms, was defiled by transgression and idolatry, can only "multiply" and "dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, even they and their children and their children's children forever," etc. This last sentence alone effectually demolishes his and Fairbairn's typical theory. We are sorry that Oswald so far overlooks the covenanted relationship of the Jewish nation to the land, and God's promises that at some future time He will for His own name's sake and glory "remember His Covenant," that he could pen the following sentence: "What more right has the Jew to that land than the Gentile? The remotest South Sea Islander has a title as valid, to that portion of Syria of which Jerusalem was the metropolis, as the lineal descendant of Jacob." Alas! when will believers admit that this anger of God's resting on the nation has its limit; that Jerusalem is only trodden down until "the times of the Gentiles" are ended; that, as the Scriptures abundantly affirm, they are still "beloved for the Father's sake," and will find their election reconfirmed in power and glory. It is a matter of amazement, therefore, that he can, in the light of the abounding testimony assert: "the return as a future fact, of the Jews to Palestine, is never spoken of in the sacred Scriptures at all." Wilful blindness is the most difficult to remove.

Waggoner (Ref. Age to Come) reproduces the same; and he makes the return of Israel to their land a return of the saints, quoting passages that are readily spiritualized, and those that will not so readily bend he has conditional. He makes the unwarranted assertion that "no prophecy contemplates anything more than full permission and voluntary acceptance" (comp. Prop. 18), and under this unbelieving assumption easily rids himself of oath-bound promises. Whatever will not yield to such handling is covered by the return from the Babylonian Captivity, thus dwarfing some of the sublimest predictions in the Bible. The only point of real strength that he presents in his entire argument is that referring to the conditionality of Ezek., chs. 40-48, with which we fully agree (see Prop. 172). His theory of a thousand years' desolation of the earth after the Advent (the revival of a notion that a Jewish Rabbi long ago asserted) necessitates him to get rid of a national Jewish restoration, seeing that the latter would be fatal to the same. We sometimes feel sad to see how a preconceived theory will cause excellent men to overlook, or to rid themselves of some of, the plainest promises of God, founded, not in isolated predictions, not on this or that passage, but in the covenanted Theocratic ordering itself. Even the predictions themselves cannot be set aside, for if they describe one period of time here on the earth under the personal reign of Christ and the saints, then it is very easy to see that these descriptions include the Jewish nation and the spared Gentile nations—which is abundantly confirmed by a comparison of them. Any theory that cannot receive all of God's Word in its plain grammatical sense, but must resort to spiritualizing, accommodation, etc., to make them fit in, is certainly liable to grave suspicion.

Obs. 5. The restoration of the nation cannot, and will not, take place without a repentance; and therefore it becomes essential to notice some more particulars relating to it. It is no ordinary repentance, and not merely that of individuals, but extraordinary and national in its extent, Micah 7 : 15-20, etc. It is caused by the judgments of God, Mal. 3 : 2-4 ; Hos. 5 : 15 ; Isa. 30 : 18-19, and the personal presence of the King, Micah 2 : 12-13 ; Ezek. 20 : 33-44 ; Zeph. 3 : 15. It is done that God's faithfulness may appear, Ezek. 36 : 22 ; Isa. 43 : 25 ; Isa. 44 : 22-26. It is bestowed in the land given to their fathers into which they are brought, Ezek. 36 : 24-35 ; Jer. 33 : 7-16 ; Jer. 32 : 37-44 ; Jer. 31, etc. The reign of the Messiah is intimately connected with it, as e.g. in Jer. 23 : 3-8 ; Ezek. 34 : 23-31, etc. The absence of such national repentance for the last eighteen hundred years is no proof that it never will be accomplished. On the other hand, it is decisive that it will yet come to pass, if we but consider that this very absence of repentance—excepting in individual cases—this “veil” of unbelief covering them, is also predicted. Seeing the prophecy in the one case verified before our eyes, it is faithless to deny the other. Paul tells us (Rom. 11 ; 2 Cor. 3 : 16) that this “vail” shall finally be removed, corroborating the testimony of the prophets. There is a divine unity in all the writers on this point, worthy of a revelation from God ; and it becomes distinctive just in proportion as a comparison of their utterances is instituted. So striking is this, that men of all classes, even the most hostile to our belief, fully admit it, however some may be inclined to spiritualize certain portions of it, as the Coming and reign of the Messiah. The repentance and restoration is so much the burden of prophecy, runs through and enters into the Divine Plan so thoroughly, that its almost universal admission is presented by a witness so impartial (owing to his opposition to our doctrine) that all will acknowledge its force. Dr. Whitby on Rom. 11, speaking of this repentance and restoration of the Jews emphatically says : “ it hath been the constant doctrine of the Church of Christ, owned by the Greek and Latin Fathers, and by all commentators I have met on this place.” But right here is an inconsistency in many modern writers, to which allusion has been made, and which deserves repeated notice. They acknowledge that the prophecies describe a literal repentance and restoration but refuse credence to the time, and manner, and accompaniments of the same as also portrayed by the prophets. Why this change of time after, to one before the Advent ; of this supernatural interposition into one of ordinary means ;* of this personal presence of David's Son, and introducing a spiritual Coming in its place ; of this transposition of a visible Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom into an invisible reign, etc. ? What satisfactory reason can be assigned for introducing an entire new element of interpretation which emasculates some of the most precious of God's promises to man ? Where is the authority for this most arbitrary dealing with the Word ? Are the rules for such a proceeding given authoritatively by God or man ; and if so, where found ? Simple consistency, if nothing else, demands that if one portion of these prophecies is conceded to be literal (i.e. to mean what the laws of language present) then the other portion must be understood in like manner. For, having applied the literal interpretation, compatibility requires its continuance, unless God Himself,

---

* Some very recent writers, however, on that side, as e.g. Fairbairn, seeing that their theory is not commensurate with the prediction, begin to confess that extraordinary means “ Pentecostal,” etc., will be added. Such predictions as Ezek. 36 : 8-38 and 37 : 1-28 ; Zech. 12 : 1-14, etc., influence such concessions.

the only Being having authority to indicate a change, in express terms revokes it, or informs us that it is to be understood differently. Besides, it is this literal interpretation that becomes history, doctrine, evidence of inspiration, etc. Is it not time, in this matter, to discriminate between the Word and human opinions attached to it? Therefore, cleaving to the Word, as it reads, our argument holds that, having no authority to make any change, we must receive this repentance, restoration, and the reign and Kingdom identified with it, precisely on the same ground of interpretation. And, it will not answer for the believer in God's Word, in the face of the Incarnation, etc., to reject any portion of these promises because he cannot tell how, if accepted as the Word plainly indicates, they can be fulfilled; for God, the All-sufficient, is abundantly able to take care of their fulfilment.

Obs. 6. The attention of the reader is called, briefly, to the order of repentance as foretold by the Divine Spirit. The fulfilment being future, we must be entirely guided, in our own estimate of it, by the predictions of the Word. Now, first of all, the fact must be kept in view that a part of the Jewish nation (those of Judah and Benjamin) is restored to the land and occupy Jerusalem previous to the open Parousia of Jesus with His saints. This is distinctly foreshown in Zech. 14 : 2, where the forces of Antichrist are represented as victorious over a portion of the nation which has reoccupied Jerusalem, when the Lord Himself shall directly interfere in their behalf, and Judah is subsequently (v. 14) mentioned as especially related to the city. This is repeated, Zech. 12 : 2, where the hosts of Antichrist are declared to "be in the siege both against Judah and against Jerusalem." A part of the nation under political influences, and probably under the auspices of some government favorably disposed (various writers refer to England), is thus restored to Palestine in a state of unbelief, and thus drinks the last dregs of Jewish tribulation. This partial restoration must be carefully distinguished from the one under the Messiah, for this is a restoration which means suffering and terrible persecution by Antichrist, while the other is full of blessing.<sup>1</sup> This restoration will be, in all probability, between the two stages of the Sec. Advent, and, owing to the unbelief of the nation in Jesus as the Messiah, will result in the re-establishment of a temple, a splendid temple service, a return to the Mosaic ritual and former distinctive national usages. This persistent rejection of Jesus as the true Messiah will cause the fearful tribulation predicted to overwhelm them and plunge them in despair. But when their fond dreams of nationality and prosperity are cruelly crushed under the tyrannical reign of Antichrist (whom they first receive, and then in some way offend); when the day of the Lord Jesus has arrived and the nation, covenanted and elect, is at last to be qualified for the contemplated Theocratic ordering, then we find (Zech. 14 and 12) that the Lord and His saints shall come in behalf of the distressed portion of the nation, and bestow (through the sanguinary overthrow of Antichrist) to the distressed the prayed-for deliverance. The Lord shall save "Judah first" (Zech. 12 : 7) and He (v. 10) "will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications : and they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him, as one that is in bitterness for his first-born. In that day shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem," etc. (Some representatives of the ten tribes are also present, as in "house of Levi, family of Shimei," or Sep., "Simeon," but Judah is largely predominant and hence most prominently mentioned.) When these unbelieving Jews are thus brought through terrible chastening to find their fond hopes crushed and themselves in a direful extremity, the sudden, supernatural appearance of Jesus on the Mount of Olives with His associated army—the magnificence of the King and the splendor of His companions—the Divine exertion of power on their enemies—the astonishing and sublime accompaniments of the Advent evidencing the miraculous—the glory transcending all that mortal eye ever before witnessed—the Spirit of God impressing this upon hearts softened by fearful suffering—the words of authority, mercy, and love enforced by Divine power—all this will so affect these Jews that the most heart-felt repentance will ensue. God has predicted it, and it will, therefore, be verified.*

Judah is saved by the personal interference of Jesus, the Messiah, while Antichrist is crushed before them (the remainder of Judah being afterward gathered and added), but Israel (the ten tribes) is brought in at least forty years after the overthrow of Antichrist and after the restoration of Judah. The evidence of a separate conversion and restoration in time, is overwhelming, and has been noticed by numerous ancient and modern writers. If we turn to Ezek. 37 : 15-28 we are assured that the ten tribes shall be joined to Judah so that they form one nation and one kingdom in their own land, wherein their fathers dwelt, where God will cleanse them, multiply and abundantly bless them under the rule of the glorious David. But they must first pass through a purifying process, for in Ezek. 20 : 33-44, when God "will bring you out from the people and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm and with fury poured out," it is added, to indicate the process: "And I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you face to face. Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord God. And I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the Covenant; and I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me: I will bring them forth out of the country where they sojourn, and they shall not enter into the land of Israel; and ye shall know that I am the Lord." When thus purged they shall be brought "into the land of Israel, into the country for the which I lifted up mine hand to give it to your fathers," deeply penitent (for "ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight for all your evils that ye have committed"), and God shall be sanctified in them.*

Why this preference is shown to Judah is known to God; but past history suggests that it may be done because Judah is more directly in line attached to the Davidic house, manifested its adhesion to it more strongly, was less addicted to idolatry, and has the King Himself in tribal lineage. If it be objected (as some do), that if Jesus thus appears for the conversion of the nation, it is then "a special favor" and He thus becomes "a respecter of persons,"—this is a confounding of things that differ. The prophets speak of it as a special, distinguishing favor, for which the nation is indebted to God's mercy and love, and which grows out of the elect covenanted position of the nation, and must, of necessity, be manifested to realize the Theocratic Kingdom, which becomes an inestimable blessing to Jew and Gentile. Paul's argument in Rom. 11 culminates in the declaration that this very favor of reception and restoration results in increased riches and happiness to the Gentiles. This promised mercy precedes the call of the Gentiles, and belongs to the nation as covenanted and confirmed by oath. Now, in this dispensation, God, in view of the fall of the nation, is no respecter of persons, but receives both Jew and Gentile, but in the new dispensation and ordering, God, who has not limited Himself or His promises, can and will, owing to the then instituted Theocracy, fulfil His covenanted promises given to the nation, and which take fundamental precedence of all other things. We must not forget that "the times of the Gentiles" are to end, and a new period, the gracious day of the Lord Jesus, is to be inaugurated. We must not overlook the lesson taught e.g. in Rom. 9 : 18-21 ; 2 Tim. 2 : 20, etc., and sit in judgment over that which God has determined to perform. A believer's position is that of faith, and a "Thus saith the Lord," is the end of controversy.<sup>4</sup>

In this repentance of the nation, whether it be Judah and his companions in Palestine, or Judah and others notified by the escaped of the nations (Isa. 66 : 19-20), or the tribes in the wilderness, all of them, according to the prophets, must, and will, acknowledge two things : first, their iniquity, and second, their just punishment, followed by a hearty and reverent submission to the Messiah given to them. The conditionality of some promises pertaining to the dispersion (for God must necessarily, ever foreseeing the result, tender mercy in view of confession and submission—as He does to-day to those who will refuse to the end) must not outweigh in our estimation the absolute, unconditional declarations that such a repentance shall assuredly occur, which is confirmed by detailed statements of the blessedness and glory that shall follow. The Spirit employs a variety of expressions to indicate the time of national repentance, and one of the most remarkable is to be found in Hosea 5 : 14-15, and 6 : 1-3, where (comp. Prop. 137, Obs. 5), after declaring how God will tear Ephraim and tear Judah as a lion, and will go away to His place, then when none can rescue, it is said : "in their affliction they will seek me early," or, as many critics, "they will seek me in the morning," which is the evident meaning, corresponding (as general analogy proves) with "the morning" of "the day of the Lord Jesus, the Christ." This is confirmed additionally by ch. 6 : 3, where reference is made to the Lord's Coming in the morning, and by v. 2, where the time is specified by days (a thousand years as one day in the sight of the Lord) of their fearful dispersion, and in the third day God will raise them up. The work of conversion and restoration shall proceed, after the wicked one (2 Thess. 2 : 8) is slain, as seen e.g. in Isa. 11 : 4-16 ; Isa. 66 : 15-24 ; Zeph. 3 : 8-20, etc., until every one is gathered, and Gentiles shall assist in bringing them to the land.<sup>5</sup>

One feature of this subject must be briefly alluded to, viz., the mission of Elijah to the Jewish nation. The prediction is plainly recorded in Mal. 4 : 5, 6. The success of his efforts and the time of his coming are clearly mentioned, and this prediction cannot be regarded as fulfilled (excepting in spirit) in John the Baptist. The reasons for looking beyond John to the future for a realization of this prophecy are given in detail under Props. 38-41, 144, 174, etc., to which the reader is referred. Elijah is a forerunner of the Sec. Advent (the open Parousia) just as John was a forerunner of the First Advent (the public appearance of the Messiah). Now, owing to the exceeding brevity of the prophecy, where no details are given, we can only—judging from the general order and material given in other places—hazard an opinion as to the time and manner of Elijah's work. Down to the siege of Jerusalem by Antichrist (Zech. 14, etc.), he has not appeared, as is evidenced by the sad fate which has overtaken Judah and his companions, but when the city is taken, etc., then he comes to relieve the despair of "the residue of the people" who have not been driven from the city. The words of hope imparted by him are eagerly cherished; the descriptions of a speedy Coming Messiah, David's Son, as a Deliverer, are ardently contemplated; and we may reasonably believe that by an appeal to the prophets and the history of Jesus as well as to their own past history as a nation, Elijah will prove the Messiahship of Jesus, and thus prepare the way for the hearty reception of Jesus when He comes to Mount Olivet with His saints. The personal appearance of Jesus, etc., fully confirms the mission of the prophet. Then, again, he may be sent to the wilderness to meet the ten tribes as a forerunner, preparing them for Him who shall "plead with them face to face." Other missions, for aught we know, may be in store for him in behalf of the nation. However we may locate the exact period of his appearing and work, one thing is certain, that he will be an important agent in this grand work of leading the nation to repentance.<sup>6</sup>

We conclude with this declaration: Whatever agencies God may employ in this conversion, and whatever wonders of an astounding nature He may vouchsafe to manifest, He immeasurably exalts Himself and forever enshrines Himself in the love of a recovered people: for "Who is a God like unto Thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of His heritage? He retaineth not His anger forever, because He delighteth in mercy. He will turn again, He will have compassion upon us; He will subdue our iniquities; and Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea. Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham, which Thou hath sworn unto our Fathers from the days of old." Amen.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Hence we deprecate all movements, suggested by a pious but misguided zeal, to colonize Palestine with converted Jews. It can only result disastrously, for if such would be left at the first stage of the Advent (which introduces a resurrection and translation of living ones) they place themselves, voluntarily, in the country which, according to prediction, is to suffer the special vengeance of Antichrist (Zech. 14; Dan. 12, etc.). Let unbelieving Jews colonize if they desire, and thus pave the way for a future fulfilment, but let the believing refrain, well knowing that when the restoration once takes place under the Messiah, they too, wherever they may be, shall be called to see its greatness and glory. Those colonization movements are based on the mistaken idea that previous to the Sec. Advent a believing, converted portion of the nation shall be restored; while prophecy—if we properly discriminate the order—teaches the exact opposite. The conversion, the fitness, and fruitfulness of the land, etc., are all the result of supernatural power under a present, personal Messiah. It is, therefore, the wisest and best to wait for Him to do this work, and when He has inaugurated it, then also will the nations—awed by the manifestations of His power—willingly—as prophecy teaches us—assist in restoring the nation.

<sup>7</sup> Although prophecy so distinctly announces the means and manner of conversion, yet men fettered by their Church-Kingdom theory must give a different version of the matter. Thus e.g. Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 362), reasoning from the gradual conversion of the Gentiles, advocates a gradual conversion of the Jews—a slow and progressive work by the use of present instrumentalities. And yet in other places (as e.g. in his work On Prophecy) he speaks of extraordinary and supernatural manifestations, forced to such an admission by the language of prediction. Brown (Obm., Rom. 11), admitting the ultimate conversion of the Jews, ascribes this to the agency of the Church, and exhorts to missions to the Jews to realize it, and asserts that God had pledged Himself and "assigned the honor of that ingathering to the Gentile Church." A multitude of writers declare the same, and eloquently present imaginative pictures of the work thus accomplished. But where has God thus pledged Himself? The passage cannot be produced. God has pledged Himself that this shall be brought about through Him whom He has ordained for the purpose. We are not to neglect the Jews, but through missions, etc., we are to try to save them that believe; we are to gather out individual Jews, just as individual Gentiles are gathered, while the nation at large remains untouched until the Sec. Advent. This is unmistakably proven (1) by the condition of the Jewish nation at the Sec. Advent; (2) by the condition of the Ch. Church at the same period, for it is then under persecution; (3) and by the supernatural means employed, under the personal supervision of Jesus, for their conversion. The fact as represented in e.g. Rom. 11 (comp. Fausset's Thoughts on, Com., Isa. 66 : 19) indicates that the Jews instead of being converted nationally under the instrumentality of Gentile missions, will be, after their conversion and restoration, the grand instrumentality of the conversion of the Gentiles—the fulfilment of God's Word in them, in their exalted Theocratic relationship fully manifested, etc., materially aiding.

<sup>3</sup> This restoration and repentance is frequently referred to without discriminating the order of events; the simple fact being announced as the resultant of Messiah's Coming. Then again, a distinction (only noticeable when contrasted in the more detailed predictions) is intimated, as e.g. in Jer. 23 : 6, "In His days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely." The critical student will observe that in those general affirmations both are included, and that even in the restoration and repentance of Judah, some of the ten tribes are included. Brookes, Faber, and others, have pointed to Ezek. 37, where, in describing the two bodies that are to be united in one, by repentance and restoration, one stick represents "Judah and the children of Israel his companions" (i.e. Judah, and those of Israel, his companions, that were attached to him at the captivity and came up with him from Babylon), and the other stick represents "Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and all the house of Israel, his companions" (i.e. all the ten tribes, not a few). These two sticks thus clearly and unmistakably represent two separate bodies—one Judah and a small portion of the ten tribes attached to him, and the other, not Judah at all, but the whole ten tribes remaining, who are to be united under the coming Messiah. This feature answers with irresistible force the Babylonian return theory, for history testifies that no such a return of the twelve tribes was ever witnessed. Ezra (1 : 5) makes "Judah and Benjamin" most prominent, while, in accordance with Jacob's title common to all, and in view of these included companions, he speaks (6 : 17-21) of them altogether as "the children of Israel," and because of their common origin, common guilt, common destiny, etc., he includes in his sacrifices for the nation as such (8 : 35), "all Israel." The union and consequent greatness, etc., of these two bodies has never been verified in their own land and under one king, and a comparison of Scripture shows that it follows after the personal Sec. Advent, and after the overthrow of the last culminated Antichrist. We dare not degrade the majesty, and universality, and blessings of these predictions by applying them to anything in the past.

<sup>4</sup> Unbelief, however, suggests every kind of objection. It is asserted that this conversion borders too much on "the miraculous," and is inconsistent with God's dealings with man. Of course it is "miraculous," as the conversion of the multitude on the day of Pentecost was miraculous, and the prophets unite in describing it as produced by a supernatural power—a wonderful outpouring of the Holy Spirit, the exhibition of miraculous wonders, etc. Such objectors ought to refuse Paul's conversion, which was produced in a miraculous manner, just as these will be effected, so that many writers believe that 1 Cor. 15 : 8 (comp. 1 Tim. 1 : 16) has a direct reference to this future conversion of the nation, Paul being born out of due time, i.e. prematurely, before the time of this special predicted conversion of the nation through the appearing of the Messiah. In the discussion of this subject, so vast in its scope and so blended in its predictions, we must not overlook the fact that the divine and the human agency are united. God acts, the Spirit is given, the judgments are witnessed, the glory is manifested, but man himself must allow these things to produce an abiding repentance; those who refuse to allow all these things to effect an enduring turning to God are to be purged out and out off. Thus e.g. take Isa. 4 : 2-6, God will make the "escaped of Israel," those that are "left" and "remain," holy, but the process of washing and purging is done "by the spirit of judgment and by the spirit of burning." In the predictions, we find this repentance and conversion variously effected: some are converted in Palestine, some in the wilderness, some among the nations, and all of them must, by a due acknowledgment of sinfulness and of the rejection of the Messiah, evince a proper disposition of heart before they are accepted. God will mightily work in their behalf, and they will, by grace received, work with Him. As Saul, wonderfully met, humbly inquired what was the will of God concerning him, and earnestly prayed that it might be performed in him, so these, astoundingly arrested, will humble themselves before the Lord, and pray for His long-promised blessing to descend upon and abide with them.

<sup>5</sup> The combination of circumstances given by prophecy establish this conversion and restoration beyond a doubt. The election of the nation, the rejection for a time, the Theocratic relationship, the absolute promises, the gathering from all countries and bringing into their own land, the personal appearance of the Messiah and effect upon them, the time of this Advent, the distressed condition of the nation, the miraculous attending the conversion and restoration, the aid tendered by Gentiles, the formation into a State, the union of the two nations, the vast multiplication, and a hundred more particulars, are all of such a nature, and so connected, that they forbid any other view. The great spiritual blessings are promised to the identical people that suffered dispersion from their land, and are so repeatedly linked with a return to the same land from which they were driven, that it is folly to apply these to the Church as now constituted, and not to the time, place, and people for whom they are intended. We add two thoughts in reply to an objection and a theory. (1) It is objected that there are several types of Jews, and that they cannot be recognized. It is true, as the Bible predicts that, scattered among all nations, they by affiliation with their conquerors (in some instances by intermarriage) have become mixed, so that in some cases the preponderance of Jewish blood is difficult to decide. Two types are prominent—one with fair skin, light hair, straight nose, regular features; the other with Assyrian features, eagle nose, dark hair and eyes—and these may—for aught we know—have existed, at least, from the days of Solomon, when foreign wives introduced a variety of feature. In the main kept pure and easily recognizable, where difficulty exists, this will be decided by the Divine, Supernatural guidance controlling this restoration. If man cannot tell in some isolated cases, God will determine. (2) A theory is advanced by some that this repentance and conversion precedes the Sec. Advent, and is now progressing in the religious attitude of the nation. We have shown from the prophecies that down to the Sec. Advent the nation as such, both Judah and Israel, do not acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah. Now, whatever confessions of sin the nation may have in its liturgical services, or in their private prayers, there certainly can be no true repentance and conversion so long as they reject God's dear Son, the Messiah provided for them. At least, it is not the repentance and conversion predicted of them nationally, when they shall be restored to their own land. Hence it is misleading to lay so much stress on it, as many do, because it lacks the essentials which can make it well pleasing to God and bring His promised blessings upon them. We concede that this attitude of the nation, as far as it goes, must be painfully interesting to the believer; we believe even that God must hear with compassion the lamentations and beseechings of pilgrims at the wall of Jerusalem, that He must regard with pity the formularies of humiliation, the penitential confessions and supplications, continued so many weary and suffering centuries; and we trust, too, that this very disposition thus exhibited to acknowledge unworthiness and implore Divine favor will prepare them for a more acceptable confession in the future. Whosoever rejects the Son rejects the Father; whosoever rejects the Messiah is unrepentant and unconverted. At the First Advent, as we showed in detail, the Kingdom was conditioned on repentance which the nation, as such, declined; at the Sec. Advent repentance is again presented as the requisite moral preparation, and it is accepted. The Jews themselves have frequently asserted that repentance is essential at the Coming of the Messiah. Thus Meyer (Com., Matt. 3 : 2) quotes "Sanhdr. f. 92, 2, If the Israelites exercised penitence, then they are liberated by the Redeemer." And Herzog's Ency., Art. Messiah, quotes the Jewish opinion (which accords with predicted fact as to Judah's fate under Antichrist), taken from Hieros. Tannith, f. 63—Uyol. 684, how this repentance is brought about: "The Holy One brings over them a cruel king, like Haman, and forthwith will they repent and be delivered." As illustrative of the Jewish prayers, the following are presented, taken from the Galaxy, Jan., 1872, which, in Art. The Jews, gives them as taken from their prayer-books. "Oh! return with mercy to Jerusalem, Thy city, and reign therein as Thou has promised to do! Rebuild it soon, during our existence, to remain imperishable, and speedily re-establish in it the throne of David. Praised be Thou! O Eternal! who buildest up Jerusalem." "Fill us with rejoicing, O Eternal, through Elijah the Prophet, Thy servant, and through the royal house of David, Thy anointed; may He soon come and gladden our hearts. Upon His throne let no stranger sit, no others take unto themselves His glory; for by Thy holy name hast Thou sworn unto Him that His light shall never be extinguished in all eternity. Praised be Thou, O Eternal! the Shield of David!" Such prayers evince such faith in God's simple word as contained in the Old Test., that they put to shame the faith of many Gentiles, who have become "high-minded" through a spiritualizing and appropriating the promises of God to this nation. Pity that such faith is not extended to the reception of the provided Messiah! But, on the other hand, we must not forget that latterly, since the conversion of numerous Jews, the most sincere and ardent prayers are tendered by them (assisted by the prayers of believing Gentiles), in the all-prevailing name of Jesus, in behalf of the Jewish nation. These petitions, ascending to heaven from all parts of the earth, and made acceptable by coming through the Mediator, are not uttered in vain. God hears, and God will answer. It is an honor, a blessed privilege, to be among these praying ones, for God will remember their interest and faith and hope. A member of the Boston Bar, in his Art. The Present Shame and Future Glory of the House of Israel, after forcibly depicting both the shame and the glory, concludes: "Let us, then, hasten Israel's Millennium, even as we would speed our own. There will be but one Millennium. If we could stand by in indifference, or open opposition, or false construction of the sacred text, or by spiritualizing away its plain import, Israel's Millennium, we should retard in the same degree our own. Let us, then, as we would hasten the Millennium of all, bear the land of the Covenant, and the people of the Covenant, and the city of the Covenant, even on our hearts."

<sup>6</sup> The restoration of the entire Jewish nation will take at least forty years, for it is said, Mic. 7 : 15, "According to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt will I show unto him marvellous things." And from Isa. 8 : 14 it is inferred that Jesus must be "for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel," and as he was such to Judah at the First Advent, He will be the same at the Sec. Advent to Israel, working at first with them through the agency of this prophet, and at length coming personally and pleading "face to face." Some writers, in view of Judah's more speedy, and Israel's more lengthy, conversion make the mission of Elijah exclusively one to the ten tribes, but we are not forced to such a conclusion because the prophecy is general and seems to include the whole nation (and was so understood by the Jews), which appears to be confirmed by the language of Jesus concerning him. Thomas (Kingdom of God, p. 42) suggests a second passage of Israel through the Red Sea, and that "the nation will be baptized in the Red Sea into Jesus as it was before into Moses," giving as proof Pa. 68 : 22 (which, however, may be an expressive figure of deliverance from mighty enemies, as e.g. illustrated in Hab. 3) ; Isa. 11 : 15-16 (but this seems to be descriptive of the destruction of a portion of the sea, in order to realize the original grant of the land to the Nile) ; and Zech. 10 : 10, 11 (which is sufficiently illustrated by the usage of Scripture where rivers and seas are employed to denote great enemies, etc.). Besides, this overlooks that a prominent portion of the nation are not present (Judah and Benjamin, and their companions), and that there is, too, not only a gathering out of Egypt, but from Assyria, and all other countries. Even Dr. Rutter (Roman Catholic), in his Life of Jesus, p. 6, foot-note, makes the Jewish conversion to be completed under Elias at the end of the world. So others concede the prophecy to have a future fulfilment. In another place this point will be discussed.

<sup>7</sup> The reader may well ponder the great change of view, the mighty revulsion of feeling as then manifested in the Jewish nation! To acknowledge Jesus, the once despised and cursed, to be the Messiah will, indeed, demand the severest judgments, the special exhibitions of power, predicted. Once Jesus was contemptuously called "The Hung," "The Fool," "The Blasphemer," etc., and of Him it was said, "May His memory be destroyed and His name be blotted out," but then He will be called "The Blessed," "The Messiah," "The Redeemer," and of Him it will be said, "This is our God." While bitterness and hatred are perpetuated among the more illiterate and bigoted of the nation (largely attributable to the past dealings of professed Christians), yet every intelligent reader must have noticed that in many, the more intelligent, a change for the better is transpiring. While unwilling as yet to admit the Messianic claims of Jesus, many of their writers speak respectfully of Jesus as a great moral teacher, and seem to take a pride in His having been a Jew, and instrumental, through His teaching, in keeping the Jewish nation so prominently before the Gentile nations. Indeed, some of the finest eulogies (Renan-like) of Jesus as a man and moral teacher, now come from Jewish sources.

PROPOSITION 114. This Kingdom, being identified with the elect Jewish nation, its establishment at the restoration embraces the supremacy of that nation over the nations of the earth.

This follows legitimately in view of the mutual and inseparable relationship. The Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom committed to, and organized in, that nation, makes it the special depository of the trust of the Kingdom itself. It is covenanted to the nation, and only in and through the nation, by the power of David's Son, will it be re-established, and from this establishment extend its sway over the nations of the earth. The result is, that the nation, so highly favored and honored, must, in virtue of so distinguished a relationship, sustain a certain well-defined pre-eminence among and over the other nations. It is the natural outgrowth of Covenant and promise; the result of Theocratic ordering.

Obs. 1. This is abundantly confirmed by the direct teaching of the prophets. Thus Micah 4 : 8, "And Thou, O tower of the flock, the stronghold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion, the Kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem." The context shows that this is spoken of the same Zion and Jerusalem that was ploughed and in ruins, which are to be restored and made glorious. The same idea pervades even other expressions contained in the chapter: "But in the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains and it shall be exalted above the hills," etc. To "be established in the top of the mountains" and to be "exalted above the hills" denotes supremacy; for mountains and hills, being symbolic of kingdoms and nations, the meaning is, that the first position among the nations, an elevation above all others, is assigned to this "mountain of the house of the Lord." That "the house of the Lord" is the Davidic house has been frequently proven, He having incorporated it in His Theocratic rule, and claimed it in view of His Son and David's Son, in one person, being destined to rule therein. What "the mountain" of this house is can be readily seen by what the Spirit says, Zech. 8 : 3; and when God thus defined it, man can only accept of the definition.

Hence, as our entire line of argument effectually proves, the theory of Barbour and others, that this future Messianic Kingdom is entire "spiritual," is certainly erroneous. Admitting fully the high degree of spirituality in such a restored Theocratic Kingdom under the direct rulership of glorified ones, etc., yet the covenants, the prophecies, all forbid this transposition into a "spiritual Kingdom." The most weighty reasons have been assigned (and more will be given) for the rejection of such an opinion, which if consistent ought then to spiritualize all that pertains to covenant and prediction. The fundamental defect in the theory is this: it has not a correct apprehension of the Kingdom of God (actually and really God's) as it once existed, and that this identical Kingdom is to be restored under David's Son, with increased splendor and glory, but to favor its own views of spirituality, virtually has two Kingdoms, an inner and outer, a visible and invisible one. Covenant and prophecy present us only with one Kingdom, and that the restored Theocratic, which, in the nature of the case, is visible, etc.

Obs. 2. The same is taught by Dan. 7 : 27, etc., which, while particularly describing the ascendancy and rulership of "the people of the saints," a peculiar and distinguished class (Props. 118 and 156), yet in virtue of their being also "the seed of Abraham," grafted into the elected nation, it indicates, since this rulership is exercised at and during the restoration, that the dominion of power is to be attributed to connection with the King of the Jews, the fulfilment of the Abrahamic-Davidic Covenants, and the restoration of the nation. Hence "the greatness of the Kingdom under the whole heaven" given to them, only proves the exaltation of the Jews through the appointed Seed. The reigning of the twelve Apostles over the twelve tribes, the reign of the saints as coheirs with Christ, in the Davidic Kingdom, etc., enhances the pre-eminence and glory of the nation, through whom alone all covenanted blessings can be obtained. This rule of Christ and of the saints cannot be separated from Jewish supremacy; while some of the promises more particularly relate to the saints, the first-fruits (as shall be explained hereafter), yet in view of an elected relationship they are also indicative of the high position of the Jewish nation and Kingdom. This is easily corroborated by an abundance of predictions, such as the following: 1. By that class of passages in which "the horn" (symbol of power, etc.) of this nation shall be exalted, as e.g. Ps. 89 : 17-18; Ps. 148 : 14, etc. 2. All nations then shall regard Jerusalem the centre of worship, Micah 4 : 2-3; Isa. 2 : 3; and notice, this in the same Jerusalem formerly destroyed. Let the reader refer to Zech. 14, and see the connection and the yearly worship at Jerusalem (v. 16), and the punishment threatened against those who refuse, and no other conclusion can be consistently formed than the one given by us. And indeed, if such a Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom as predicted is established, it is eminently suitable that, aside from the spiritual worship extending everywhere, there should be a national acknowledgment of nations through their representatives of the Theocratic King and Kingdom. It is not conceivable how such "a world-dominion" having its centre at one point can exist without a fixed public acknowledgment of it, etc. 3. They also shall esteem Jerusalem the centre of power. Let once the idea of this covenanted Theocratic-Davidic rule be admitted, and the beauty and propriety of various prophecies appears, such as Mich. 4 : 2; Isa. 2 : 3, "the law shall go forth of Zion and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem"; Zech. 8 : 22, "Yea, many people and strong nations shall come to seek the Lord of hosts in Jerusalem, and to pray before the Lord" (comp. Amos 9 : 12; Zech. 12, etc.).<sup>1</sup> 4. The nations shall regard it as the centre of glory. This arises from its being the metropolis of the Kingdom (Prop. 168), being "the city of the great King," "the thrones of the Lord," etc. Millennial descriptions fully portray this feeling of reverence, etc., for the city, as universal (Isa. 62 : 2, etc.) over the earth. 5. The nations shall respect and honor the Jewish nation on account of its special relationship. Thus, e.g. Isa. 61 : 9, "And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people; all that see them shall acknowledge them that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed." Even the individual Jews in that day shall be highly esteemed; "Thus saith the Lord of hosts (Zech. 8 : 23), in those days it shall come to pass, that ten men shall take hold of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying: We will go with you; for we have heard that God is with you." 6. All nations shall contribute to their prosperity, wealth, riches, etc. Thus e.g. Isa. 60, 61, etc. 7. The Gentiles shall fear and reverence the Jewish nation. Thus e.g. Isa. 49:22, 23. 8. The nation shall be a praise among all nations, where it formerly was treated with derision. Thus Zeph. 3:19, 20, "I will get them praise and fame in every land where they have been put to shame. At that time will I bring you again, even in the time that I gather you, for I will make you a name and a praise among all people of the earth, when I turn back your captivity before your eyes, saith the Lord." 9. The Gentiles shall aid in glorifying this nation. Thus, e.g. Isa. 66:12. 10. Those nations that shall not acknowledge this supremacy shall perish. Thus e.g. Isa. 60:12; Zech. 14:12-19.*

* The only passage which at a cursory reading might be thought to conflict is Isa. 19:24, where Egypt and Assyria are also promised a special greatness. When Israel is mentioned as "the third," it does not mean the third in power or rank, for it is in the context particularly denominated God's "inheritance" (thus showing its supremacy), but that these three—once so hostile and at enmity—shall be united and friendly, having—owing to contiguity and relationship—familiar intercourse. It is a representation of that unity between the Jewish nation and other nations which results in preventing rivalry and contention, crushing war and its attendant evils.

* Archbishop Whately (Corruptions of Christianity, Diss. 3, Ap. Rees, Encyclop., vol. 1) is unfair in his statement of our doctrine, declaring that we teach that "superior privileges, as God's peculiar people, are then to be restored to the Jews; that is, to such Jews as shall have continued unbelievers." "The remnant of the Jews who shall have obstinately rejected the Gospel up to that time are then to be restored to their own land, and to have a superiority over men of Gentile race." In the preceding Propositions and in this we have shown that such supremacy is accorded only to them after a hearty, cordial repentance; that it is bestowed in view of God's Theocratic relationship with the nation and for the sake of the pious of the nation, the Fathers, their descendants, and the engrafted ones; that it is done in order to secure God's own glory, the re-establishment of the covenanted Kingdom and to make all this a blessing (e.g. Zech. 8:13, etc.) to the nations. Can we ignore the Scripture on this point, or the Divine Purpose which it is to subserve? No! This very supremacy, so positively asserted and repeated, so linked with the faithfulness and glory of God Himself, forbids us to make these predictions conditional. The details prevent such an interpretation. The same is true regarding the popular method of spiritualizing them, as if they simply indicated the exaltation of the Christian Church. For, the reader can readily see that this supremacy is promised to the identical nation and land which suffered so long and terribly under Gentile domination, and that a marked distinction is made between it and Gentile nations—the latter seeing, participating in, and enjoying the pre-eminence she receives—the same, instead of promoting selfishness, etc., proving a source (as Paul repeats in Rom. 11) of incalculable blessing. Besides this, Scripture indicates that in virtue of such blessing resulting, this supremacy shall excite no jealousy in those who come under and experience its sway.

Obs. 3. The simple fact that Jesus, David's Son, "the King of the Jews," is to be the Mighty King over them, evinces this pre-eminency. It is true that He is not only to be King over the Jews but also over the whole earth, for "the sovereignty or Kingdom of this world" is to become His, and "all dominions shall serve and obey Him," yet we must constantly keep in mind the covenanted fact, that this reign is manifested on David's throne and from David's Kingdom. Therefore it follows, that the nation identified with this throne or Kingdom is exalted proportionately with the extent and splendor of the reign of Him who sits on that throne thus associated with the nation. It is this that gives them that peculiar and honorable distinction, so lauded by the prophets. This is reasonable and just; for surely the people from whom the King is descended according to the flesh; who hold in covenanted possession the throne and Kingdom of His inheritance; who are restored by His power that the throne and Kingdom may be re-established in its integrity; who enjoy the privilege of having His throne and majesty in their midst; who are under the particular rule of appointed judges, coheirs with Him—must realize, from the nature and extent of their position and blessings, an eminence far above that of all others, viz., that stated in Ex: 19 : 5, 6.

Obs. 4. If the question is asked, why this supremacy is given to the Jewish nation in preference to all others, the answer is given Rom. 11 : 28, 29. It has always enjoyed a peculiar, near relationship to God; and it should not surprise us to see it restored to its high and distinguishing privilege of being the nation through whom the Theocratic rule will again be exhibited in a more glorious manner, being still "beloved for the Father's sake," an elect nation, now indeed suffering for unfaithfulness but destined to a recovery (Deut. 32 : 36), because God's calling and Covenant relationship to them, bound by oath, is unchangeable; His mercy and Divine attributes are glorified through it; His dear Son, also the seed of Abraham and David, is exalted thereby; and His rule as a gracious, condescending earthly Ruler, the veritable King, is through it extended over the whole earth. Men may, in estimated superior wisdom, deny such a Divine Theocratic manifestation through His ancient people, and speak of it as derogatory to the Saviour, etc. Let such, however, see to it that they be not found speaking against the most blessed and exalted position of David's Son, and of that nation which is His by "inheritance" and by "redemption." When the prophets say so much respecting this, and enlogize it in the highest terms, surely we ought to be guarded in saying anything that may be reproachful of it.

Many passages cannot be consistently explained without a reference to this supremacy. Thus e.g. Ps. 122 can only refer to this period (and not to the Maccabean age or to the church, as many make it), because it connects the prosperity, etc., with the setting up of "the thrones of the house of David." Even the promise, Gen. 22 : 17, etc., "Thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies," in view (so Bush loci, etc.) of gate being significant of authority and dominion, is expressive of this future exaltation. It will poorly suit the promise to limit it to the past, especially when the spirit of it is so often represented as to be only realized in the future (for even Zacharias, Luke 1 : 71-74, refers it to a time to come) in connection with the Sec. Advent. Even the promises, expressly covenanted, of being made "a great nation," etc., can only be reconciled with this supremacy, for, as unbelievers have too frequently remarked, the Jewish nation in point of greatness dwindles into comparative insignificance beside the mighty Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman Empires. But God, foreknowing the future and His own determined purpose, does not give such promises without fully intending to verify them in His own time. Buckle (His. Civ., vol. 1, p. 570) censures Bossuet for "making the Jews the chosen people of God," and "treating this obstinate and ignorant race as if they formed the pivot upon which the affairs of the universe had been made to turn," and for excluding other nations superior to them in intelligence and power, etc. However Bossuet, in a Universal History of the past, may prove to be one-sided, yet Buckle does not remedy the matter when ignoring the Theocratic relationship of the nation, the reasons assigned for its continuing so weak and finally losing even its special form of government, etc., when passing by its covenanted position, its predictions, its present disciplinary condition, its connection with Gentileism, its continued influence through its religious books, its future, etc.—and falling back upon its past insignificance as contrasted with other nations. This is far more one-sided than Bossuet's attitude. It overlooks also a principle stated by the Apostle, 1 Cor. 1 : 27, 28. Celsus may scornfully ridicule the Jews as not "masters of the whole world," but "left with not so much as a patch of ground or a hearth"—time will vindicate God's promises.

Obs. 5. A number of observations on this interesting point might be appropriately made, which can only be indicated to the reader. (1) This pre-eminency among the nations of the earth shows that the position assumed by us concerning the wall of partition being broken down only between believers in Christ and not between the Jewish and Gentile nations, is well taken. (2) This work is of God, and will be witnessed by the nations as a confirmation of His power, etc., Ezek. 17 : 22-24, Isa. 52 : 1-10, etc. (3) Jerusalem and Palestine (as the latter shall be extended according to promise) are most admirably situated (geographically) for the exercise of such supremacy. See Townsend's Arrangement, Introd. p. 68-9. (4) The promise to Abraham is only then literally verified, "I will make of thee a great nation." For David and Solomon's reign (aside from its Theocratic arrangement), plays but a small part at the side of the great empires of history. God's Promise unerringly points to the future ; and as His promises, long delayed, are sure, the greatness of the nation, as the prophets predict, will be more commensurate with the greatness of the Being who has promised. (5) The promise made to Abraham of being "heir of the world" is then realized, in the acknowledged pre-eminency of his seed. (6) How wonderful will then the history of this people appear, and how astonishing that the Divine Purpose so plainly revealed should have been, by lack of faith and with the notion of exalting the meaning of Scripture itself, so persistently overlooked by the multitude. (7) To occupy this position of supremacy, it is necessary that the division into two kingdoms, once existing, should be perpetually abolished. This is fully predicted, as e.g. Ezek. 37 : 21, 22, etc. (8) The folly of being indifferent to, or totally ignoring, the predictions on this subject, just as if they were not given. (9) That if, as many advocate, the phrase "Times of the Gentiles," is indicative of "Gentile domination," then the cessation of these times would of itself indicate that such dominion would come to a close.

The critical student is reminded that then also the full signification of Jacob's name will appear, after whom the faithful descendants and engrafted Gentiles are called, viz. that of "Israel"—"princely prevailer with God" (Bush, etc.), or as the Scriptures (Gen. 32 : 28) explain it, "for as a Prince" (hence Kurtz, "Prince of God") "hasi Thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed." This princely nearness to God, this prevailing power with God and with men is to be manifested. Even the singular remark of Philo-Judæus (vol. 4, p. 100) is to be realized : "When the name (Israel) is translated into the Greek language it is called 'the seeing nation,' which appellation appears to me the most honorable of all things in the world," etc. Then, also, such Psalms as the 128, etc., shall be realized, for "every one" of the nation shall be thus blessed ; and, in view of being brought back to forfeited blessings, such a state as described in Isa. 65 : 17-25 (comp. Sep. on v. 23), etc., shall be witnessed and experienced. When all this is accomplished, then Ps. 107 : 42 will be verified : "The righteous shall see it, and rejoice ; and all iniquity shall stop her mouth." For aught we know "the lamp ordained" for the Christ (Ps. 132 : 16) may refer (comp. 1 Kings 11 : 36, 2 Kings 8 : 19, and 15 : 4) to this period.

Obs. 6. This supremacy of the Jewish nation is a stumbling-block to many (who misapprehend its connection with the saints, etc.), and the most bitter and sarcastic remarks are levelled against it. We might content ourselves with the simple and positive statements of the Word of God, which have been presented, but, desirous to vindicate that blessed Word, we distinctly trace the fundamental reasons for the same, showing conclusively (1) that their covenanted, elect, Theocratic relationship to God, as their King (earthly Ruler), in their national capacity, imperatively demands just such a supremacy; (2) that this supremacy is fully required when the King and the saints are the rulers—the King being by inheritance the king of the nation and the saints being engrafted into the same Commonwealth, and regarded as part of Abraham's seed—over the nation, from whence "a world-dominion" is to be exerted"; (3) that in the estimate of this supremacy it is impossible to separate the glorified (the king and co-rulers) from the unglorified, for they are united, the one as authoritative head and the other as specially exalted in view of this union (hence numerous prophecies make no distinction between the two, but speak of the nation as it shall be when restored and associated with the glorified seed of Abraham—which gives the key to the magnificent language employed); (4) that the nation as it shall hereafter be composed, viz., with its Mighty King and with its resurrected and glorified patriarchs and descendants, and with its adopted Gentiles resurrected, translated, and glorified, and with its twelve tribes repentant and converted, forms collectively "the rod of strength" (Ps. 110 : 2) which shall be exerted in a sway over the nations of the earth; (5) that a Theocracy with a rule over the world, embracing a union of Church and State, has its foundation in the nation specially selected, in which its rudimentary form was set up but which was withdrawn on account of wickedness and rebellion, and yet which Covenant and prophecy declare shall again be restored under David's Son (hence unity, God's oath, Jesus's inheritance, etc., demand it); (6) the union of the Divine with Civil power over the nations, to accord with a pure Theocratic ordering, necessitates, in order to preserve unity, just such a supremacy as is predicted; (7) that to prepare this nation for its supremacy it is (Ex. 19 : 6) to be made "a Kingdom of priests and a holy nation," which is done (a) by the incorporated glorified "Kings and Priests," and (6) by the pre-eminent holiness of the nation, "all" being righteous, and brought into special nearness and service to the king; and (8) that the promise "in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed," indicates, as Hengstenberg remarked, "the re-establishment of the lost unity, and in the gathering again of the scattered human race around Abraham as their centre," which to be realized, according to Covenant and prophecy, demands a visible, outward exhibition of civil and religious power according with the Divine Purpose as contained in the grammatical sense of the Word and advocated by us. Hence Ebrard (Ch. Dog., vol. 2, p. 749) justly observes, both in view of the elect, covenanted relationship, the incorporation of the Divine, and this supremacy: "And then (in the Mill. age) shall the Old Test. prophecies of the re-creation of the kingdom of Israel attain their fulfillment, for, within the unglorified humanity upon earth, converted Israel shall form the middle point of the Kingdom of Christ." The nation, with its attached glorified rulers, forms the basis for that wide, extended, and ultimate universal dominion.

That the student may judge for himself respecting the statements made against this supremacy of the nation, we append a few illustrations. Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., p. 2, ch. 4) particularly scounts the idea of "an Israelitish supremacy—at once religious and civil—over all the nations of the earth," resulting naturally from his Church-Kingdom theory, which ruthlessly, and without regard to connection, appropriates the promises specifically given to the Jewish nation, and appropriates them in behalf of the Ch. Church as now established. But on p. 360 he says: "The most remarkable fact of all is that those who held the Pre-Millennial theory in the second and third centuries seem not to have believed in any territorial restoration of the Jews at all—much less in their Millennial supremacy over all nations, and the re-establishment of their religious peculiarities." But this is a clear misapprehension, as we have shown, step by step, in the history of the doctrine, and when any of the Apostolic or Primitive Fathers enter into a detailed statement of their views on Eschatology, they repeat the Jewish faith of a complete restoration of the Davidic throne and Kingdom, the rebuilding of Jerusalem, the reign of the Messiah and the saints from thence, not only over the Jewish nation, but over the whole earth, etc.; and, what is more to the point, they (as e.g. Irenæus, Justin, etc.) make this supremacy over the world contingent to a being of Abraham's seed and identified with the elect nation—Abraham being "the heir of the world." Dr. Neander (Genl. Hts. Ch., vol. 1, p. 50, etc.) takes the Jews to task for receiving "the letter" of covenant and prophecy, and anticipating a Messiah who should deliver them even from temporal enemies, saying: "The deluded Jews, incapable of a spiritual apprehension of divine things, expected a Messiah who should employ the miraculous power, with which He was to be divinely armed, in the service of their earthly lusts; who should free them from the yoke of bondage, execute fearful vengeance on the enemies of the Theocratic people, and make them the masters of the world in a universal empire, whose glory they delighted in depicting with the most sensual images that the wildest fancy could suggest." Admitting that many could not receive the Messianic idea in its purity, and expected to be saved in their sins and selfishness, and allied with it much of their own worldly conceptions and wishes (particularly avoiding the references to a required repentance and purity of the nation), yet the reader will observe that "the letter" contained these promises; the "letter," God-given, led the Jews into this belief (even evidenced by the pious Zacharias, Luke 1:74); the "letter" has never been recalled, and we are not authorized to substitute something else in its place under the claim of "a higher spiritual apprehension of divine things." But as Neander has been answered in detail under preceding Props., we only add: it is very strange that "the world-dominion," "the universal empire," which the Jews advocated under the leadership of a Messiah divinely endowed, and which we show from the Scriptures embraces the purest and noblest Theocracy under the guidance of God Himself, should be so distasteful, and that precisely such a world-dominion and empire, uniting Church and State, should be afterward advocated (impelled by the force of prediction) and yet committed to mortal, fallible man for establishment and control. Look e.g. at the marvellous things said of this Kingdom and performed by it, and which view—aside from Scripture evidence—is the most reasonable. Dr. Alzog (Roman Catholic, in his Univ. Ch. Hts., vol. 1, p. 194), referring to the destruction of Jerusalem, says: "The unfortunate Jews, having lost their national independence, were now forced to disperse among the nations of the earth, without the comfort of a promise that they should one day again return," etc. (Matt. 23:37-39; Luke 21:24, alone refutes this assumption). The Papacy (however some individuals may have expressed themselves favorably), owing to its claims of superiority and assumption of the promises of supremacy belonging to herself, has always had an evil eye for this doctrine. It certainly is unpalatable to all who strive to appropriate to themselves what lawfully belongs to others. Lest it be thought that we do not notice and meet all the objections that are urged against us, we will briefly present the extravagancies of Baldwin in "Armageddon," ch. 4. The chapter is headed "Israel restored identical with the United States" (which suggests that while Englishmen are engaged in making England to fulfil the predictions in "Anglo-Israelism," so Americans are striving to make the United States the great fulfiller—such are the perversions of God's Word in support of some favorite theory). This is done for the purpose of eulogizing and exalting republicanism, giving it a scriptural support. He says: "The Jews and speculative theologians have, for near eighteen hundred years, believed that Israel would be restored to nationality in Palestine, and that then it would become the head of the whole world, and be the great agent in its Christianization. We protest against this theory, because it is absurd, fanatical, and repugnant to Scripture, as well as to common-sense. We believe that the carnal Israel will be, to a certain extent, Christianized, and that it will resettle in Palestine, and form an integral portion of the Millennial republic, but that it will have no superiority at all over the other Christian states of the Millennial Confederacy; we think it will simply be a common beneficiary of good government, as all other Christian states will be. We further believe the United States to be the first-fruits of the promised restoration of Israel, and that the Millennial republic will be the salvation of 'all Israel,' politically speaking." Then to show "the absurdity" and "the fanaticism" of our view (which dares not appropriate the promises given to the same people dispersed, etc., and which cannot make republicanism the medium through which to look at the prophecies), he assigns the following reasons: (1) The geographical position of Palestine is not favorable to its being "the capital," but America is "the natural capital;" (2) Palestine is too small to be "the agricultural capital of the world"—the United States alone adapted; (3) Palestine cannot become "the commercial capital of the world"—the United States fitted for the honor; (4) Palestine cannot become "the manufacturing head of the world"—this designed for the United States; (5) "It cannot become the intellectual head of the world"—this glory designed for a country that produces such writers as himself; (6) "The Jews cannot become the political head of the world in Palestine"—this distinction reserved for those who introduced Republicanism. After contrasting the resources, etc., of the Jewish nation with other nations, he says: "It is most ridiculous to think of such a thing. Will Russia, Britain, Germany, France, and America become the vassals of the Jews? will they give their sceptre to a patch of country that could not supply the world with cabbage; and to a people that can never become their mental and political superiors? The very thought is full of absurdity and fanaticism." He then proceeds: (7) It is "chimerical" to make the Jews "the spiritual head of the world," because all Christians are on an equality; (8) It is "utterly impossible" to restore "the ten tribes"; (9) If the Jews were "Christianized then the Hebrew ceremonial law would cease to be a wall of separation between them and Gentile Christians." Hence, for these reasons, our view is "repugnant to common-sense," and "a theory really at variance with the laws of nature and good sense," because "the Hebrews were a typical people; typical of the Christians; and what purpose is to be subserved by the reconstruction of a typical people." (We might well ask, if merely a type, why have them restored at all, or even converted, seeing that a type is cast aside when the antitype arrives.) His scriptural argument (sec. 2) based on Christians being also the seed of Abraham to whom the promises are given, does not affect our position, but confirms it, seeing that we clearly hold to this, but in addition make the engrafting essential to a connection with the elect Jewish nation, and hence participating in the inheriting of the Theocratic promises. This we have already given in detail. The denunciatory spirit of Baldwin, making our view "altogether unscriptural and false," "false, fanatical, and full of evil," etc., adds but little strength to his effort to prove that "the United States is the Israel restored," quoting just as much of the prophets as he thinks will make out a parallel, and meeting deficiencies by heaping the most fulsome eulogies on our form of government, etc. A writer that can deliberately apply Isa. 60; Isa. 33: 20, 21; Micah 4: 1-4; Isa. 49; and Isa. 2: 1-5, etc., to the United States, is so clearly removed from the slightest tinge of fanaticism, that he is eminently qualified to judge the merits of another theory dispassionately, so that we are forced to the supposition that it was with enlightened mind and unprejudiced heart, he speaks of our doctrine as "positively arrogant and intolerable, and should be rejected as a fanatical delusion." But Baldwin is not alone in this; multitudes form this estimate, and when the time of restoration comes multitudes, embracing Antichrist and the kings of the earth, will retain it, and with the greatest bitterness and the fiercest hostility attempt to prevent it. Precisely such views, carried into open opposition, give us the clue to the terrible carnage and bloodshed of the last days. All that we need to say to Baldwin's objections (which are all answered under appropriate Props.) is this: they are based on the assumption of natural development, and ignore the Theocratic, the Divine, the Supernatural, which is inseparably united to this restoration and supremacy. "The laws of nature and of common-sense" must not cancel the declarations of the marvellous respecting the future, as they do not those concerning the past (as e.g. in the birth, etc., of Jesus). This summary method of deciding God's predictions by "the laws of nature and common-sense" is a dangerous weapon in the hands of a believer—entirely too unwieldy for his hands. Again: we have Barbour (Three Worlds) and others, who reject this national supremacy and give it exclusively to the saints, on the ground that the Kingdom is taken from the Jews and given to another people, and this last people inherit and possess the Kingdom forever, and the Jewish nation is outside of that Kingdom, having no part in it, and it "shall never again be incorporated with the Jerusalem of Palestine." This is a grave mistake, opposed alike to Covenant and prophecy. Having sufficiently met this objection in the previous Props., we only now say that the fundamental defect in this theory is, that it does not receive the oath-bound Davidic Covenant in its plain grammatical sense (and the prophecies), which makes a restoration of the same Kingdom (which, of course, includes the nation) overthrown imperative; it does not distinguish between the inheritors (rulers) and the Kingdom itself; it does not trace the continuation of the election and see that the engrafted ones are considered as part of the Hebrew Commonwealth—an integral but exalted portion ; it does not perceive that the relationship of the Jewish nation restored (mortal) to the glorified portion, is an inseparable union, and that the supremacy accorded to such a union necessitates the language of the prophets respecting the supremacy to the nation, as it shall be composed in the future, without discriminating ; and it ignores the connection of prophecy which makes this supremacy (owing to the Divine Theocratic ordering) pertain to a nation which is described in conditions restricted to a mortal condition, and yet exalted to it in view of the overruling Divine government instituted in its behalf under the rulership of the glorified Messiah and His coheirs. Looking only at one side of the subject is doing violence to the unity of Covenant and prophecy, which has two sides, a human and a divine.

We may properly sum up all objections by simply saying that they are all, without exception, based upon a misapprehension of the Kingdom actually covenanted to the Messiah. We give an illustration at length, for the purpose of showing that our representations of the Jewish faith are conceded by opponents (as has been shown by other quotations), and how unscriptural assumptions can be heaped together in a few sentences. Meyer (Com. on Matt. 3 : 2) says : "The common idea of the Jews in regard to the Messianic Kingdom was predominantly politico-national, with the fanatical stamp of an universal dominion, to last a thousand years ; the Messiah awakes the descendants of Abraham ; then follows the reign of a thousand years ; the resurrection and condemnation of the heathen ; the descent of the heavenly Jerusalem and the eternal life of the descendants of Abraham on the earth, which is to be transformed, along with the universe. With Christ and the Apostles the idea of the Messianic Kingdom is not national, but universal, i. e. so that the participation in it is not conceived as depending on a connection with Abraham, but on faith in Christ and the moral state conditioned thereby, without distinction of nations ; hence the religious and moral point of view—the idea of an actual Theocracy—comes into the foreground, without the idea of the universal dominion, the expectation of the renovation of the earth, the resurrection, the judgment and eternal glory, losing their positive significance, truth, and worth." While we might justly object to one or two features of this estimate of Jewish faith, we pass it by, saying that Meyer looks at the whole subject from a preconceived Church-Kingdom theory. We have shown, step by step, that "the common idea of the Jews" was not set aside or condemned by Jesus, but confirmed by Him in such a manner that it was perpetuated when the Ch. Church was established ; that "a politico-national Kingdom" (Davidic) was the one covenanted and overthrown, and the same, identical Kingdom, in ruins, is to be set up when Jesus comes again ; that if the Jews were "fanatical" in their belief of "an universal dominion" under the rule of the Messiah, it was a fanaticism inspired by the God-given, plain, grammatical sense of the Word ; that neither Jesus, nor the disciples, nor the Apostles afterward, changed the idea of the Kingdom (Meyer asserts that they did, but does not give a particle of proof to sustain the assertion—we declare that they did not, and append the proof, under Props. 16-113 inclusive), but locate the realization at the Sec. Advent ; that while faith in Christ and the moral state conditioned thereby is requisite to entrance into this future Kingdom, such faith brings us into direct "connection with Abraham," being adopted and accounted his children in order that we may inherit the covenanted promises with him and his seed ; that no theocracy (as Meyer claims) is now existing, for the simple reason that an "actual Theocracy" is an utter impossibility without the restoration of the Davidic throne and Kingdom, and God Himself, in the Person of His Son, again reigning as an earthly Ruler ; that the position of Meyer can only be sustained by appropriating to the Ch. Church, as at present constituted, promises which, if language has any definite meaning, appertain to a people and city, down-trodden for many centuries, and to a throne and Kingdom, cast down and remaining unrestored to this day. Alas ! where is faith in God's promises, just as they read, without the aid of type and spiritualizing !

Obs. 7. Milman (His. of the Jews), Wines (Com. on Laws), and others have shown that past history records the fact that science, art, philosophy, history, jurisprudence, politics, statesmanship, finance, education, etc., are adorned with splendid Jewish names—names suggestive of vigorous intellect, large attainments, great skill, profound wisdom, and vast knowledge. If the Hebrew race in its dispersion, under its disabilities and humiliation among nations, has exhibited such talent, genius, energy, learning, enterprise, and power, what will they not become when restored to their own land under the peculiar and elevating guidance of their long expected, and at length arrived, Messiah? What brilliant names will not the future develop, when specially ruled over by the glorified and powerful Apostles, when in close and intimate connection with glorified saints, when the Mighty King and the splendid New Jerusalem are in their midst? The position that they will then occupy geographically and theocratically, together with the elements of individual and national greatness bought together, fostered, and developed under the all-wise and all-powerful Messiah, will bring forth a list of greater names to adorn the annals of the reign of Jesus and His saints—the evidence of a reign rich in all that pertains to the elevation of individual or national greatness.

Wines (Com. on the Laws of the Anc. Hebrews, p. 339) makes a somewhat singular reflection (singular—for impelled by their remarkable preservation and the predictions of a future return, he holds to their ultimate restoration), and, overlooking their Theocratic position and full of his cherished republicanism, adopts the following view: "They retain, in their dispersion and after so many centuries of oppression, all the elements of greatness and of power, out of which to frame a model republic, and once again to become the light and glory of the world. Who knows whether Providence has not some such splendid destiny in reserve for them? Surely a preservation so signal cannot be without an ultimate object equally remarkable." Their destiny need not be guessed at, for it is freely delivered to us in the Scriptures by One who can accurately inform us; a destiny far superior to that of being "a model republic," under fallible men, including as it does a magnificent, actual and real, Theocracy under the benign sway of the immortal and exalted David's Son, thus making it the great centre of mighty influences radiating to all parts of the world, and felt and acknowledged even by an interested universe. Brookes (Maranatha, p. 444) quotes the biographer of the celebrated Hegel as saying that the philosopher "gave often and long thought to Hebrew history, and often changed his thoughts," so that "all his life long, it tormented him as a dark enigma." To which Brookes finely adds: "It is a dark enigma indeed unless studied in the light of God's prophetic Word, but all is clear when we follow with unquestioning faith the testimonies of the Holy Ghost concerning the future of this people." Even the Sibylline books are more scriptural than some Protestant writers, insisting, as they do, on a restoration of the Jewish nation and its supremacy. Pre-Millenarian writers, generally, give a correct idea of the same, but too much overlook the Theocratic idea as covenanted and predicted. We are not concerned in the calculations of those (as e.g. Dr. Springfellow, of Manchester, Va.—who has the restoration accomplished by 1884—and others) for reasons assigned under Props. 173 and 174.

PROPOSITION 115. The Kingdom is not established without a period of violence or war.

In the nature of the case, if at any time God intends to re-establish such a Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, which is designed to extend its sway over the world, all, or nearly all, earthly Kingdoms will oppose it. This is precisely what the prophets, one and all, uniformly predict.

Obs. 1. This is a terrible subject, and the writer was under strong temptation to suppress, in great part, this Proposition, lest to some it would prove "a dead fly in the ointment" (Eccles. 10:1), causing a rejection of the whole. But consideration urged that, as God proclaimed it, and frequently adverted to it, duty and faithfulness demanded its insertion as a testimony and warning to others.' Reflection also will show that, fearful as it is, yet owing to its temporary nature it is not near so dreadful as the perpetual destruction, the everlasting cutting off of the wicked from the happiness and glory of the Kingdom. If any one objects to the war, slaughter, plagues, etc., that, as predicted, shall be meted out to the enemies of God when this Kingdom is to be inaugurated, on the ground that it is derogatory to God's character and to Christ's mission of love, etc., such are invited to consider, in addition, the following particulars. (1) What are we then to do with these predictions? Are they given merely as threats, God never intending to fulfil them? Or, are they conditional? That God intends their ample fulfilment is evident from the connection which they sustain, (a) to the Divine Plan; (b) to the chain of predictions in course of fulfilment, the literal accomplishment of which thus far forbids the notion of a change in the future; (c) and to the Sec. Advent of Christ; (d) to the future condition of saints; (e) and to the restoration of the Jewish nation. (2) The identical reasons which would impeach God in allowing this war and awful destruction of life can be urged against Him for allowing past war, the Jewish tribulation, the destiny of the wicked in the future. Take e.g. the wars carried on under this same Theocratic, and Theocratic-Davidic arrangement, under the Rulership of God Himself and by His direct sanction. Ponder it well, and then dare to judge God. If the Jewish nation was than justifiable, if God was then right in the destruction of His enemies, is it not equally so in the future? (3) This war, etc., in the future as expressly asserted, is not carried on because God delights in it, but because it will be waged against Him, His people and His Purpose by wicked, ambitious men, and the Almighty condescends to meet them in the same way to give them, through appointed agencies, a signal and deserved punishment and overthrow. The rise, progress, aims, slaughter, etc., of the confederation of wickedness arrayed against Him (Props. 160, 161, 162, 163) will fully vindicate the propriety and consistency of the means used in its downfall; which, as prophecy declares, will be freely and universally acknowledged the world over after its occurrence. (4) It is also not inconsistent with Christ's mission of mercy and love for the following reasons. (a) During this very period of mercy, heavy judgments of God have been constantly poured out on the city and nation of the Jews; (b) if this were purely a dispensation of mercy, how account for the wars, sufferings, terrible Providences, etc., pertaining to nations, individuals, and the Church. There evidently is a limit to be fixed somewhere. Mercy is indeed extended, but it is not all mercy; judgment, justice, etc., are also to be regarded in forming our estimate, or it will prove to be one-sided, opposed to experience, fact, and Divine representation. The same Jesus, so desirous to save and bless, orders events according to His righteous will in blessing or in judgment as best suits the circumstances of the case. (c) This is a time of offered mercy, but even this will give place to a time of wrath and vengeance on the nations and persons that persistently reject Him. And we may well pause to ask that, if in a period so disposed to be gracious He allowed His just anger to burn toward a nation still "beloved for the Father's sake," what will He not do when His wrath is kindled against the nations of the earth who are not thus protected by Covenant relationship? (d) This is a heavy judgment on the wicked only, who are directly arrayed against Him at His Coming. (5) The simple record ought to suffice; for it is not becoming in us to sit in judgment on the propriety of God's dealings, either past or future. If God has revealed that thus it shall be, that He has ordered it, and will surely bring it to pass, that ought to satisfy the believer, especially since many of the adverse Providences of God can only now be received by faith. (6) If it is terrible, it is so to those who are properly warned. Let the nations, let the wicked open God's Word, and if they will receive His Record, not spiritualized away, but as it is written, there they find repeated solemn warnings against joining the confederation of evil-doers in the last days; against arraying themselves in hostility to Christ and His interests; against any treacherous connivance against Jerusalem or the Jewish nation. If Jerusalem becomes "a cup of trembling" and "a burdensome stone" to them; if the wrath of the Lamb burns with consuming fury against them; it is because they have rejected the most solemnly given warnings.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> We are reminded of Dean Alford's declaration: "Christianity never was, and never can be the gainer by any concealment, warping, or avoidance of the plain truth, wherever it is to be found." The reason is, that if God's truth, it will stand against all human efforts.

<sup>2</sup> The writer must add, in order to avoid a misapprehension of his position, that he has no sympathy with the theory and spirit of the Anabaptists, Romanists, some Protestants, etc., that saints or believers now, under the present ordering, are to take the sword to advance the truth for the Church, or the cause of Christ. This is positively forbidden; and, therefore, we must await the time and the ordering appointed by God Himself. The quotation (Mem. of Col. Hutchinson, p. 209) so common among the Puritans, "that the saints should have the praises of God in their mouths, and a two-edged sword in their hands," was in that day and time a misapplication of Scripture. So also the Huguenots (Smile's Hug. in France, p. 115) before entering battle sung the 68th Psalm. So ten thousand quotations found in history given by the Papacy, by men addicted to violence, etc., to palliate and defend the use of arms in advancing their own schemes, and which are drawn from the predictions wholly relating to the future, are wrongfully misappropriated. But this should not lead us, on the other hand, to forget that they also have an application, and to refer them to the period to which they belong. If Crusaders, Cromwellians, and others, under the mistaken idea of their fighting the Messianic battles, appropriated these passages relating to war—if John Brown encouraged himself in his Kansas and Virginia campaigns by "the Old Test. encouragement to valor and enterprise on the Lord's side"—if priests, ministers, popes, and kings misapplied them in their self-interest, that is no reason why we should reject them, and refuse them an ultimate realization.

Obs. 2. To appreciate this subject several things must be observed. (1) At the period of the Sec. Advent, as various prophecies show, Christ will find a mighty array of nations who will be hostile to believers, hostile to His ancient people and land. Rev. 19 : 2 ; Thess. 2 ; Isa. 63, etc. He is represented, not as converting, but as destroying them ; and the most terrific figures and representations are heaped one on the other to describe the catastrophe, "Making war, treading the wine-press, treading the wine-press of the wrath of God, smiting the nations, ruling with a rod of iron, treading the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God, treading the people in anger, trampling on them in fury, staining His garments with the blood of His enemies," etc., are a few of them, and under and in them is couched a dire reality against which it is worse than folly to close the eyes, viz., a most fearful period of vengeance on God's enemies. (2) That the ushering in of the Millennial era is immediately preceded by this period of vengeance. The context of numerous Millennial descriptions portray it as God then coming in anger, wrath, vengeance, etc., pouring out His indignation upon the nations of the earth, as e.g. Isa. 24, 25, 26, etc. (3) An antichristian confederation is represented as existing at that time which has slaughtered the saints, and is in open war with the Jewish nation, as e.g. 2 Thess. 2 ; Rev. 20 ; Zech. 14, etc. (4) The same is declared to exist just previous to the resurrection and deliverance of the saints, as e.g. Dan. 12 : 1, 2 ; Isa. 26 : 19. (5) The same is almost invariably linked with the restoration of the Jewish nation, as e.g. Joel 3 ; Dan. 12, etc. (6) The saints are also described as with Christ and participating in inflicting the judgments of God, ruling with a rod of iron, as e.g. Rev. 2 : 27-28, etc.<sup>1</sup> (7) The Jewish nation is likewise an agency in this last overthrow of enemies, as e.g. Zech. 14, etc. It is scarcely possible in every instance to show in what way Christ, or the saints, or the Jews participate in it. The testimony of prophecy is this : that Christ as the Mighty King directly interferes in behalf of His people, that His saints aid in this work, and that the Jews are supernaturally sustained in the same. Christ as the Master Spirit and Supporter of all this, is sometimes mentioned alone (as e.g. Isa. 63), the rest being implied ; again Christ and the saints in view of their associated capacity are spoken of as together (as e.g. Rev. 19), in the accomplishment of it ; then again, when details are given, the Jews are described (as e.g. Zech. 12) as largely participating. The fearful picture is only completely surveyed, when the several parts are brought together and viewed as one whole. Converging and irresistible proof is also established, because under several aspects the same tremendous scene is located at precisely the same period of time introductory to the Mill. age.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Lincoln (Lec. on Rev., vol. 2, p. 134) and others limit this pouring out of vengeance, bloodshed, treading, etc., to the Saviour, and exclude the saints, but this is to violate express promises, as e.g. Ps. 149 : 6-9 ; Rev. 2 : 26, 27, etc. Even the Jews are included in this last drama, as seen e.g. Zech. 12 : 3-8, and 14 : 14, etc. Such a view neutralizes a large class of passages, and makes the kings and Jews mere spectators, and not participants, etc. It is founded on a misapprehension of Isa. 63 : 3, "and of the people there was none with me," which Delitzsch and others properly render "nations" instead of "people," thus preserving a unity of teaching on the subject.

* Hence the student will observe that if ever a war was justifiable, this one will be so in view of its resisting a gigantic oppression, which aims to overthrow the highest interests of man and the obedience due to God and His Christ. The Theocratic Kingdom when first instituted was introduced by war and violence, vanquishing its enemies, and this only teaches us that when again set up, because of the opposition excited and the resistance audaciously exhibited, it will again fight its way over its enemies but under a leader immeasurably greater than Joshua. It is simply impossible—if believers in the Word and willing to receive its contents—to ignore the Scripture relating to the subject. But on this point the reader is cautioned to observe, that in this day will be largely repeated that exertion of supernatural power exhibited when (Ex. 14 : 14) "Jehovah shall fight for you"; for it is expressly predicted: "then shall Jehovah go forth and fight against those nations, as when He fought in the day of battle." Hence, in our interpretations, it must not be forgotten that the future will repeat on a more tremendous scale the Divine interposition in the overthrow of enemies typified to us by what took place in the day of Egypt, and afterward.

Obs. 3. Therefore, the Kingdom is introduced by violence and conflict. This is seen by referring to the Scriptures (which sustain the previous Observation), and to what was stated under former Propositions. Passing by for the present the numerous allusions to the objects designed by Christ's Coming, such as to destroy the power of His enemies (Ps. 2 : 1-9; Dan. 7 : 9-26, etc.), and bestow retribution (2 Thess. 1 : 8; Ps. 10 : 15-18, etc.), it is sufficient for our purpose to direct attention to one single feature of the last times, which, aside from others vindicates the Divine interference and frightful drama that will be enacted. Notwithstanding the tenders of Gospel mercy, the gracious call given to Gentiles, it is predicted that not only wickedness shall abound down to the Advent (Matt. 24 : 6-15, 37; Mark 13 : 6-13; Luke 17 : 26-31; 1 Thess. 5 : 2, 3; 2 Tim. 3 : 1-13; 2 Pet. 3 : 3, 4, 10; Jude 18, 19, etc.), that not only antichristian powers shall exist down to that period (2 Thess. 2; Dan. 7, etc.), but that at the time of the Advent and ushering in of the Mill. age, wickedness shall increase (Matt. 24 : 37-39; Luke 17 : 26-30; 1 Thess. 5 : 1-3; 2 Tim. 3 : 13, etc.) to a fearful extent until it culminates into a mighty confederation against the truth. Without entering into details respecting this antichristian power (Props. 160-168), its existence is most prominently set forth so that it is impossible to ignore it. Through seducing influences (2 Tim. 4 : 1-3, etc.) and corrupting passion of nations (Ps. 2; Joel 3, etc.), there will result an organized effort to crush Christianity by persecution, and even to destroy the Jewish nation. Leaving the names, character, blasphemy, claims, etc., of this Antichrist, we again narrow our discussion to a single point, viz., that of his efforts to crush the Jews at Jerusalem. In comparing prophecy it is distinctly announced that he shall unite nations and armies into an expedition into Palestine and a siege against Jerusalem, Dan. 11, last part and 12 : 1; Isa. 14 : 24-27; Joel 3; Zech. 14; Rev. 14 : 20; Rev. 16 : 16; Ezek. 38 : 8-19,<sup>1</sup> and that he is to be destroyed by a revelation of Christ in Palestine, Ezek. 38 : 21-23; 2 Thess. 2 : 8; Rev. 19 : 11-20, etc., compared with the positive order laid down in Zech. 14. So plain are these predictions that not only the entire early Church looked for such an invasion of Palestine and overthrow of the Antichrist, but many who are not friendly to Millenarian views have adopted and advocated them. The reader then will observe that such a confederation is predicted as in open hostility against Jerusalem, etc.*

<sup>1</sup> The reader will observe that it does not fall within our plan to discuss, at present, the order or the Scriptures. If it should be thought that some of our Scripture references

cannot apply to this period chronologically, we take the liberty of directing attention, e.g. to what Faber, a scholarly writer, says, respecting them in his work Diss. on Proph., Sacred Calendar of Proph., and work on the Jews. The 1600 furlongs of Rev. 14 : 20 serves to identify the locality, being as numerous writers, even back to Jerome, declare the width of Palestine, which is confirmed by more recent surveys ; and this again is corroborated by other passages describing the same event in Dan., Joel, and Rev.

<sup>1</sup> It is a curiosity to pass over the commentary of one who spiritualizes largely (as e.g. Scott, etc.), for in one place he will crowd everything into the past siege and destruction of Jerusalem, however ill-mated ; and on another passage he will admit that it seems to refer to a future restoration of the Jewish nation, when, through the help of the Almighty, they shall powerfully overcome their enemies, who, at the time, are endeavoring to crush them. Zech., chs. 14, 12, and 9, are tests which develop remarkable attempts at interpretation. Some, not knowing how to apply those things to the Church (however plastic the spiritualistic process), even refer them to Maccabean deliverance" (thus degrading the predictions), as e.g. Moore (The Prophets of the Restor.) on Zech. 9 : 11-17 ; while others fall back on conditionality, or ignore them, or account for them as oriental exaggerations heightened by Jewish race prejudices. It is astonishing to witness the comments that the Word must submit to in order to meet the demands of the Church-Kingdom theory or of unbelief, which have no place in their system for a future Theocracy, restoring David's throne and Kingdom against the opposition of the nations. The Jews, whom such despise as "wretched interpreters," with all their errors and Rabbinical additions, were immensely in advance of such when, relying on the grammatical sense and the plain connection, they firmly believed that the same identical nation, so long down-trodden under their enemies, should at some future time, under the leadership of the Messiah, gain a complete victory over all enemies. Their literature is full of this faith ; and the hope inspired by God-given sense has sustained them under sufferings and cruelties, oppression, and persecutions unparalleled in the history of nations. The Jews, in Pre- and Post-Christian literature, adhered to this view, and even Philo, so largely addicted to spiritualizing, says (De Præmiis et Pœnis, § 15-20 : "For a man will come forth, says the prophecy (LXX. on Numb. 24 : 7), who will go out and conduct a great war, and will overcome great and powerful nations, as God Himself will assist His saints."

Obs. 4. This, in the nature of the conflict described, and the results that follow, indicates a prior, partial restoration of Jews to Jerusalem, as many writers have observed. This is not the restoration under Christ, but one that will be effected under the auspices of some nation.<sup>1</sup> At least one thing is certain, that the nation, as such, is at this very time represented at Jerusalem in such numerical force that prophets predict a gathering of the nations against the Jews. With one voice nearly all of them allude to this gathering, and describe the condition of the Jews as one of great trouble and misery. This gathering, too, is purposely allowed by God. In some predictions the nations are said to do this ; in others that God, "He shall gather them." In Rev. 16 : 14, "the spirits of devils shall gather them ;" in another place (Rev. 13 : 5-18), the last head of the beast and the false prophet shall assemble them ; and then again God will do it, as in Zeph. 3 : 8, "Therefore wait ye upon me saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey, for my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms, to pour upon them my indignation, even all my fierce anger," etc. This is reconcilable with the permissive Providence of God, and with the fact that the results of the free agency of these nations falls in with the contemplated design of God to employ the very period of their gathering and anticipated triumph for their terrible punishment. By wilfully closing their eyes to "the counsel" of God, to His plain Word, they are led into the position of unbelief, etc., and God orders all things in such a manner that their purpose of gathering shall be fully carried out. Nothing shall intervene to frustrate the daring plans laid by them until the decisive moment arrives. They shall agree among themselves, and be prospered until God is ready to pour out His vengeance; and the gathering itself on a gigantic scale with the eyes of the world fixed on it, will make the punishment the more signal and overwhelming. God employs their design as a vehicle for the accomplishment of His own; and therefore, with the power to prevent it at any time, it is correctly, although the direct result of creature agencies, attributed to Him.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Writers have conjectured variously respecting this nation that will thus aid the Jews. England, France, Germany, Russia, and America have been mentioned. It is difficult to ascertain, owing to the exceeding brevity and purposely obscured allusions of the prophecy on this point. May the reader ponder another conjecture added to those given. It has occurred to the author that probably the clew is given in Isa. 30 (Alexander's version) and other places, where the nation is represented as trusting in Egypt for help, and the result will be (as in this case) that their help is vain, etc. May it not be that the power now strengthening itself (or that may hereafter) in Egypt shall, in order to increase its strength against the Sultan, enter into a treaty with the Jews and replace them in Jerusalem, etc. This would be the entering wedge of the complications that follow. England, however, is most favored by writers, and Isa. 17 is a passage often urged. This much, however, may be affirmed, that through the aid of some nation or nations, and especially under the favor (which will afterward be withdrawn) of Antichrist (who will make a covenant with them, and whom they will receive coming in his own name), the Jews will anticipate a glorious era of prosperity, a multitude will return to Palestine, a people in unwalled villages, having gold and silver, cattle and goods, Ezek. 38 : 11-13, etc. They will rebuild their temple and endeavor to equal, if not excel, Herod's effort. The interest taken in the Jews, the policy of statesmen, the loans of Hebrew bankers to the Sultan, the societies formed in behalf of Jerusalem and Palestine, the exploring expeditions of England and America, the rebuilding and settling of Jerusalem, the increased pilgrimage, the colonization schemes, etc.—all point to such a coming restoration, confirmed, as it is, by the weakness of Turkey.

<sup>2</sup> The many promises that the saints shall be eye-witnesses, shall see for themselves the vengeance of God poured out upon His and their enemies, are significant. A comparison of them will show that they point to this future period of the gathering of the enemies, and the fearful resulting conflicts.

Obs. 5. Jerusalem will be taken by this last enemy, and great cruelties will be perpetrated. The Jews will be driven to despair, such as we can well imagine their blasted hopes, after long centuries of tribulation then excited by fondly anticipated prosperity, would produce. In a partial restoration attempted by themselves in reliance upon others, instead of waiting for the one to be gained through the power of their King, they suffer the last outpouring of God's anger. This causes a cry of agony, which is mercifully heard, and in such a way that sorrow and despair are turned into joy and happiness. Zech. ch. 14, delineates the extremity and the deliverance, which is corroborated by Zech. 12; Dan. 13; Jer. 30 : 4-24. The Lord will fight for them; and among the agencies employed is this very Jewish nation, as specified. Zech. 14 : 14, "Judah also shall fight at Jerusalem," etc.

The reader will notice that in this matter Zech. 14 bears an important part, and hence a few words in support of our interpretation of the passage is in place. That this siege, etc., of Jerusalem is still future is evident from its entirely differing from past sieges in these points : (1) No such fighting against the nations followed; (2) No such Divine interposition was witnessed; (3) No such Coming to the Mt. of Olives, no such Coming of God and the saints was seen; (4) No such "destruction" was turned away and Jerusalem was again "safely inhabited"; (5) No such fighting at Jerusalem by Judah was experienced; (6) No such smiting of the nations, no such tumult, no such plagues, no such worship, etc., followed. All this is future. Dr. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming, p. 305, note) treats this view of bloodahed, etc., with the utmost contempt and scorn.

Thus: "But, judging from the prophecies to which Pre-Millenarians commonly refer, and the literal sense which they insist upon giving to them, they appear to expect one vast carnage—slaughter in a literal battle or battles—'the land soaked with blood,' and 'all the fowls filled with flesh.' And this is what they term the judgment of the quick, or, at least, a principal part of it—miserable view." It is very easy to denounce an opposite view, but to prove it to be erroneous is quite a different thing. If Dr. Brown can blot out of the record a literal gathering of the nations against Jerusalem, a literal siege, etc., as well as the numerous predictions of a terrible conflict resulting in the overthrow of the nations by supernatural and physical means, then he can rid himself of this "miserable view." We hold to it, because it is contained in Holy Writ.

Obs. 6. The active part taken by this Jewish nation in the punishment of the nations who opposed Jerusalem, etc., is given in Zech. 12:1-9; Zech. 10:3-12; Micah 4:11-13; Isa. 41:15-16; Micah 5:8-10; Jer. 51:19-20, etc., verifying Dan. 2 and 7 and 12; Ps. 2, etc. The nation, by virtue of Divine Support, is invincible, so that "they that strive with thee shall perish," and "they that war against thee shall be as nothing, and as a thing of naught," becoming like "chaff," etc. The nations will be confounded at their valor and might, Micah 7:16, 17; Zech. 9:13-16, etc. The slaughter will be terrific, represented under the most impressive figures that language can employ, as e.g. Ezek. 38 and 39 the awful supper "upon the mountains of Israel" to which the birds and beasts are invited, Rev. 19:17-20, same supper, Rev. 14:19, 20; Jer. 25:29-33, etc. It is impossible to explain away these passages; it is absurd to spiritualize them into something else, and we must receive them. That they relate to the future is so apparent that it needs no discussion; for such a Coming of the Lord and of His saints, such a display of valor, etc., by the Jews, such an overthrow of enemies after a siege of Jerusalem has never yet been witnessed. The hesitancy of many writers, who receive it, to dwell upon it arises not from disbelief or disregard, but from the fear that others not appreciating its relationship to the judgments of God preparatory to the establishment of His own Theocratic government, may become prejudiced against the truth in general. But let human opinion be what it may, one thing cannot be done, viz., to blot out these predictions, or to prevent their fulfilment.

The simple predicted facts that Jesus, the saints (the "mighty ones"), and the Jews participate in it is self-evident; the exact order of events, the explanation of details, is more difficult and demands a close study and comparison of the prophecies. Some things, however, are self-evident: (1) that the Antichristian confederation inaugurates this war; (2) that they are met in the first place by Christ and His saints; (3) that Judah then also engages in it; (4) followed by Israel. The conflict will be apparently waged for a number of years until both Judah and Israel are restored, and embraces not only the one pre-eminently against the confederation at Jerusalem, but all other enemies and resisting kingdoms. Some (as Faber, etc.) think that Judah's restoration will take thirty-five years and Israel's forty years, and that during these periods conflicts will, more or less, rage. However this may be as to time, the student will be impressed, by a comparison of prophecy and the hints given, not to limit this period to a short time. It may be added: writers of ability make Rev. 16:12, "the kings of the East," refer to the Jews (so Mede, etc.) or to the ten tribes (so Faber, etc.). This opinion is also given by authors without a chronological application (as e.g. Kurtz, His. Old Cov., vol. 1, p. 168, on the authority of Hengstenberg, etc., meaning "Trans-Euphratics," i.e. people from beyond the Euphrates—with which compare Faber's reason for the use of "kings"). It is certain that this subject explains Scripture that otherwise seems contradictory (as the imprecatory Psalms), or exceedingly obscure (as Jer. 31:22, etc.). Perhaps the last passage, "a woman shall compass a man" refers to this very conflict, for (1) it relates to this period of restoration and to some occurrence then to take place; (2) the Jewish nation is represented as a virgin or woman, v. 21 preceding—see Prop. 118; (3) the renderings that are given by others, as e.g. Dr. Clarke (Com. loci), "a weak woman shall compass or circumvent a strong man" (comp. the strong man of Ps. 10 : 15-18, etc.) ; Dr. Blaney : "a weak woman shall repulse a strong or mighty man."

Obs. 7. In the face of all this array of Scripture, it will not answer for the objecter to quote the language (John 18 : 36) of Jesus : "If my Kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered to the Jews. But now is my Kingdom not from hence." Will the Saviour contradict the predictions of the prophets? No, for He qualifies His language, guarding it, by the "but now," i.e. at the present time, my Kingdom is not of this world and my servants do not fight, leaving the plain inference that at some future time, just as prophesied, His servants would fight. The time of wrath on the nations and of the Kingdom will also come, Rev. 11 : 15-18. Now, during the gathering out of the elect, vengeance is God's ; we are forbidden to exercise it ; but God's forbearance with Gentiles will also end as it did with Jerusalem, as it now does with individuals, and then He employs what agencies He pleases to cause their destruction.

The critical student must, in the consideration of this subject, ever keep in mind that these terrific conflicts and judgments are part of God's mercy, as illustrated, e.g. in Ps. 136, "To Him that smote Egypt in their first-born ; for His mercy endureth forever : and slew famous kings, for His mercy endureth forever," etc. It is not only mercy to the Jews, but mercy to the nations, owing to the great benefits and blessings that result from this crushing defeat of wickedness and rebellion. God must be judged by the end accomplished ; and judged by this standard, as given by prediction, He is abundantly vindicated in His exertion of authority, even if it bring about the terrible prediction, Ps. 9 : 15-20 : "The heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made : in the net which they hid is their own foot taken. The Lord is known by the judgment which He executeth : the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands. The wicked shall be turned into hell (Sheol) and all the nations that forget God. For the needy shall not always be forgotten : the expectation of the poor shall not perish forever. Arise, O God ; let not man prevail : let the heathen be judged in Thy sight. Put them in fear, O Lord : that the nations may know themselves to be but men." Comp. Ps. 110 (Heb. 1 : 13) with Isa. 63 ; Rev. 19, etc., and mercy and judgment are mingled, severity and goodness are blended, and all this to insure the peace, happiness, etc., of a glorious Millennial period. Hence we cannot possibly receive the exceedingly one-sided comments forced on John 18 : 36, illustrated e.g. by Farrar (Life of Christ, vol. 2, p. 370) when he says : "Yes, He is a King ; but not of this world ; not from hence ; not one for whom His servants would fight," leaving the impression (1) that He never would act as earthly Ruler, and (2) that a time never would come when He Himself and His servants will fight and overcome the bloodthirsty persecutors and enemies of God. Such an implication is not warranted either by the text or by prophecy ; the clearest predictions, if language has any decided meaning, are opposed to all such inferences. It will be true that "the Lord is King forever and ever : the heathen are perished out of His land."

Obs. 8. This future overthrow of the nations is the key to the warlike spirit noticed in many of the Psalms, and which has been the fruitful subject of derision to unbelievers. Even many believers, not recognizing the period and the design God has in view, turn with unbelief from Ps. 58 : 10 ; 68 : 23, etc., as if it were inconsistent for the righteous to see and engage in the specific, appointed work of Jesus, the Divine Master. Look at the Sec. Advent of the august Jesus and see the bloodshed, slaughter, fearful supper, vintage, etc., connected with it, and if the blood of His enemies shall flow so abundantly, shall stain His garments, etc., in the day devoted to wrath, is it wrong or inconsistent for His people in that day to see and engage in the same work? If we dare not censure the blessed

Saviour, who will engage in this work, made necessary by the enmity of His enemies, made requisite by His determination to set up His delayed Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, which these nations will determinately oppose, can we blame the righteous if they do as stated in Ps. 149 : 6, 7, 8, 9? And can this be regarded as in opposition to the Christian spirit, when it is even added that the righteous shall rejoice when he beholds and participates in it? He certainly does not rejoice in the necessity that exists for such a manifestation of power and vengeance—the whole tenor of the Bible forbids it; but he rejoices in it because incorrigible enemies, enemies who long violated God's law and shed the blood of saints, are removed; that the righteous are at length rewarded; that Christ obtains His inheritance; that Covenant promises are realized, including even that the seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; that wickedness is utterly rooted out of the earth; and that now the whole world shall realize in Millennial blessedness and glory, that there is a God that judgeth in the earth, that God, His Son, and His people shall be sanctified, etc. A large number of reasons are given why this should cause exultation in the saints, arising from its being a removal of enemies and the introduction of promised blessings that could not possibly be realized on earth without such a previous and complete subjugation and expulsion of these enemies. The employment, too, of just such agencies may be part of that "snare" and "net" which God plants, in which to take those nations. The perversion of those predictions springs from not locating their fulfilment properly. One party, not observing that the Holy Christ is the Leader in these things, the Introducer of this day of vengeance and resultant year of the Redeemed, either persistently closes its eyes to the existence of such passages in the Scriptures, or declares them inconsistent with the Spirit, etc., of Jesus Christ. Another party takes a more dangerous position, for finding these prophecies and not noticing that they are identified with the Sec. Advent of Jesus, with His own appointed day of vengeance, presume rashly, without warrant, against even prohibition, to take up the sword and establish a Kingdom or maintain the truth. Both extremes are to be avoided, leaving God to take care of the ultimate fulfilment of His own Word, resting assured that such a terrible resource can only be taken under the directed auspices of Christ Himself, who as the designated "Lion of the tribe of Judah," etc., will make this "war in righteousness."

That the reader may see how these Psalms are treated, a few illustrations are appended. Rogers (Superh. Origin of the Bible, Ap., p. 428, foot-note) endeavors to remove the force of them by observing that "David was not a Christian," i.e. he did not live under a Christian dispensation, and hence due allowance must be made for the terrible expressions indicative of vengeance, wrung from his sufferings, and quotes Isaac Taylor as indorsing such a position. But what then becomes of David's inspiration, and how can Christ Himself perform such a work? Even Christlieb (Mod. Doubt, p. 239) says: "We must acknowledge the imperfection of the Old Test. stand-point occupied by the sacred poets" (viz., in view of the principles, etc., introduced by the present dispensation). But it is not the poet merely that speaks, for the Spirit speaks through him; and to attribute imperfection to them utterly unreconcilable with piety and holiness is simply to say that the Spirit of God is guilty of the same. Then to say that Jesus or the New Test. does not embrace these alleged imperfections is one-sided and unfair, as seen e.g. in the denunciations of Jesus against the Pharisees and unbelieving, and the fearful doom of the enemies of God as represented in the Apoc. The truth is this: the Spirit sees the end from the beginning, and showing us that the enemies of God will surely triumph over the Church, persecuting it unto a bloody death, He then, seeing the time has come for the setting up of the Theocratic Kingdom, in a Theocratic spirit exclusively predicts the fate of those dreadful enemies and the exultant triumph of the saints. Of course it is not strange that Coleridge (Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit) thinks that "the cursings of David" are to be rejected as merely of human origin, for a low estimate of inspiration rids itself easily of this and a large part of the Bible. But it is strange that Davidson (New Ed. of Horne's Introduction, p. 761) deprecates the language of Ps. 55, 69, 109, and 137, as improper and unchristian, "the ebullitions of natural and un sanctified feeling," the expression of "personal feelings inconsistent with their prevailing disposition and with the spirit of true religion." This is precisely what unbelief is alleging against the future "wrath of the Lamb," denunciations of the wicked, as recorded in the New Test., saying that it evinces a partisan spirit, etc. Even the noble song of Hannah (1 Sam. 2 : 1-10), and which, as Fairbairn (Typology, p. 93) has shown, is responded to in Mary's song of praise, is made expressive of the ebullition of human feeling, so that (as Jebb, Sac. Lit., p. 397) her "temper" was not "thoroughly subdued," for "she could not suppress the workings of a retaliative spirit." Its relationship to the Christ is thus overlooked. Perowne (The Book of Psalms), in a note on Ps. 35 : 22, attributes the imprecatory Psalms to the sterner nature of the older dispensation, and hence that the spirit of them is superseded by the present one. We are, therefore, to conclude, that such promises given to believers (as e.g. Ps. 149 : 6-9) were merely intended to present a delusive hope, God foreseeing that they would not be realized because of a determined repealment of them! The Ch. Union, Jan. 10, 1877, remarks : "David's imprecatory Psalms are the expression of an experience far below that which a disciple of Christ ought to have attained in the year of grace, 1877. It is simply misleading to teach them as divine ideals to our children." Hence these stern realities, designed for all, are only human productions, and only express the violence of David's own passions. Alas! for inspiration if true. But we need not be surprised at such utterances, when in the same article appeared the following : "It is not true that they (viz., the Old and the New Tests.) are of equal authority or to be interpreted alike" (comp. Prop. 16). "The Old Test. was made for the childhood of the world ; the New Test. for its manhood. One book is the primer ; the other book belongs to the graduating class." This is a specimen of the flippant, esteemed smart style so largely prevalent in a class of religious periodicals ; its absurdity being self-evident, seeing e.g. that the covenants, predictions, and promises contained in the Old Test. are yet to be fulfilled. Next : "The experiences and examples of the Old Test. saints are crude." "They are the experiences and examples of men living in a low moral state." "They are no more worthy to be cited as ideals of Christian character than a fall pippin is worth eating in June," etc. Alas! then Paul made a grievous mistake in holding up before us, as examples worthy of imitation, the Patriarchs and other ancient worthies. It is surprising, if this be true, that God has not yet favored the writer of such an article with a translation, seeing that he is so much superior to Enoch and Elijah! But seriously : the reader can see that the ancients must be depreciated in order to get rid of a class of passages and predictions, so full of terrible retribution and in which the saints rejoice, which these writers cannot fit into their spiritualistic and Whitbyan theories. They have no place for them, and hence denounce the authors of them. No wonder that such believers are forced to say that the only inspiration the Bible possesses is that common to all good men. In reference to the principle adopted by Rev. Keate (The 109th Ps., A Sermon, London, 1794, 4to) and Rev. Partridge (The 109th Ps., A Sermon, London, 1798, 8vo), that the imprecations are not those of David but of the enemies of David against him, it is utterly untenable and opposed to the general analogy of Scripture on the subject. We gain nothing by such arbitrary expositions, and but very few have thus far adopted it.

Obs. 9. This subject in one of its features, ought to serve as a warning to Jews, not to allow themselves to be persuaded by any nation or party to establish themselves in Jerusalem and Palestine. The prophets plainly predict their sad fate ; that they shall fall under the persecuting power of this last confederation and experience its fearful effects. The restoration that God predicts for them, and which they should await, is under the Messiah, Jesus Christ, David's Son. If they run before they are called, or if they accept of a restoration under the auspices of some nation relying upon their own efforts, etc., they shall certainly realize in their own unhappy experience what will befall Jerusalem and its inhabitants at this last great siege by the gathered nations.

This warning is the more necessary since repeated attempts have been made under the specious plan of a Divine calling, to induce converted Jews and believers to colonize Palestine, so as "to prepare the way" for the Coming of the Messiah. When the Adams Colony was raised for this purpose, the writer then earnestly protested against the scheme, showed that the Christ did not require any such preparation, and that they were running without being called. In Nathanael Indeed, where the scheme was favorably mentioned, the writer insisted that in view of the future condition of the returned Jews under Antichrist, and that the work of predicted glorious restoration, the restored fruitfulness of the land, etc., was the result alone of direct Messianic intervention, any colonization thus carried out would inevitably result in injury—placing believers in a situation where they would particularly be exposed to hardships and to ultimate persecution. The papers reported the complete failure of the colony, and that the government, through its foreign officials, aided in bringing many back. Warner (In the Levant, p. 7), after speaking of the disastrous outcome of the Adams Colony, refers to their successors—a colony of Germans from Würtemberg, who are "striving to redeem and reclaim the land, and make it fit for the expected day of Jubilee," or to prepare for the Advent. He says that they refer as authorizing their belief and mission to, especially, Isa. 32 : 1 and 49 : 12 et seq. and 52 : 1. A reference to these passages, taken in connection with the general analogy, shows that these persons are undertaking a work which is Messianic—i.e. it pertains to Jesus to perform and not to man. A society was established (general meeting in 1854) on the Salon, near Ludwigsburg, to gather a people of God in Palestine (about 10,000 families) in order to bring about a renewed Theocratic arrangement (Kurtz, Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 333). In the Proph. Times (July, 1875), in a letter from Stuckert, it was stated that a pastor of Bavaria, Cloeter, "who has a great party behind him," is proclaiming that the people of God are to fly into the wilderness (Apoc. 12 : 6, 14) and to remain there three and a half years, and this wilderness is in Russia, either the Crimea or the Caucasus. A party of Swiss made the wilderness the Cape of Good Hope, and emigrated, with bad results, to that place. Now, all such things are mere folly, and indicate that the persons holding them have but the crudest notions of Christ's appointed work, of the Theocratic Kingdom that is to be established, etc. Everything it seems must, through human infirmity, be caricatured. It is amazing how this doctrine of the future restoration and its results are perverted, and a following obtained. A noted instance of fanaticism is that of R. Brothers, who, with Sharp (1794), was to lead the Jews to re-occupy Jerusalem. The title of the first production is sufficient : "A Revealed Knowledge of the Prophecies and Times. Book the First. Wrote under the direction of the Lord God, and published by His express command ; it being the first sign of warning for the benefit of all nations. Containing, with other great and remarkable things, not revealed to any other person on earth, the restoration of the Hebrews to Jerusalem by the year 1798 ; under their revealed Prince and Prophet." This prince and prophet was Brothers himself, in whose favor as prince a Mr. Halated, or Halhed, made even a motion in the House of Commons. His lunacy (for he was declared a lunatic by a State commission) is self-evident from his titles, "Nephew of God," etc., and making a Miss Cot the daughter of David and future Queen of the Hebrews. The student can recall the sad prostitutions of these prophecies by Jewish impostors in the past, a long and dreary list, resulting at times in terrible bloodshed.

Obs. 10. This also should serve as a warning to the nations, not to allow themselves by any arguments or inducements to enter into a league against Jerusalem. It is predicted that this will be done, and that all such nations shall be severely punished (as e.g. Zech. 12 ; 2, 3, 9) and destroyed. Wisdom, prudence, ought to urge an acceptance of God's Word. It is true, that the establishment of such a Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom may not prove very palatable to the nations, the governments of the earth, for it is destined to interfere materially with governments as now organized and conducted, and will not tolerate in any of them that sinfulness, etc., which, more or less, attaches to rulers, people, manner of conducting government, etc. But considering the Divine Purpose and the blessed results that will flow from it to the world ; regarding the Almighty Power that will enforce the successful accomplishment of it although all nations resist it—surely true wisdom ought to indicate a persistent refusal to all sollicitations to engage against the ancient city and people of God, and to suggest a ready compliance with all the demands that in that day may be made by the Mighty One who is to rule as the Father's beloved Theocratic King. It is no idle caution or impertinent request which says, Ps. 2: "Be wise now therefore, O ye Kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth. Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling. Kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way when His wrath is kindled but a little." This period will be the crisis of nations.

Brookes (Maranatha, p. 444) quotes Frederick the Great as saying: "Meddle not with these Jews; no man ever touched them and prospered." How largely this has been fulfilled in the past, and how true it will be in the future. It is in view of England's treatment of the Jews in later times, giving them the highest civil privileges and protecting them in their rights, that some writers base the opinion that God will, in the future contest with nations, show special favor to her. The United States might well put in such a plea, because she has been uniformly kind and considerate to the Jews. Such pleas, however, will avail nothing, if such nations resist the restoration of the Theocratic Kingdom and its intended sway; all depends upon their future conduct.

Obs. 11. This again reminds us of the extreme position adopted by peace congresses, etc. A portion of the Scripture, isolated or torn from its connection, is alone presented in their pleas, while lengthy predictions, which show that war exists down and at this period, are ignored as if they did not exist. The general analogy of the Word tells us that it is only after (not before) this terrible conflict of, and with, the nations, that war shall be banished under the then peaceful and triumphant reign of David's Son. To locate this era at any other period previously, or to declare that it can be brought to pass without Divine interposition, is to indulge in dreams that will never be realized. To diminish war, suffering, etc., is a Christian duty, but this is very different from that of misinterpreting and misapplying the Word of God, and predicting "peace and safety," which God warns us against. It virtually closes the eyes of many to the predictions of the future, and prevents them from seeing that they should so live that they "may be accounted worthy to escape the things that are coming on the earth," for the principle recorded by Ezek. 14:16, 18, 20, will be fully carried out.

Men, forsaking the Scriptures, are divided as to the instrumentality by which war is to cease. Some make it Christianity; others the future religion of humanity: some, civilization; others commerce; some, education; others suffrage of woman: some, spiritualism; others, international arbitration. The last named is a great favorite with some, although it is admitted that an arbitration court, if the parties are dissatisfied with its division, has no civil force to enforce it. Lord Lytton (The Coming Race, p. 45) presents the idea—strongly reiterated recently, owing to remarkable inventions, increasing the efficiency of war material—that reason will so prosecute its discoveries until destructive agencies are so perfectly understood and under control, that for armies to engage would involve mutual annihilation, so that wars will cease, volens volens. In the Prize Essays on a Congress of Nations, it is generally argued that wars will eventually cease, and an appeal is made to, and the language quoted of, prophecies found in the Bible. But such language is torn from its connection, and instead of allowing the Scriptures to testify how and when it is to be realized, it is taken for granted that it will result exclusively through human agencies. Some of the ablest advocates, like Elihu Burritt, deny a future Second Advent. Jesus is "the Prince of Peace," but He brings it in His own way.

Obs. 12. When this war is concluded, then, and then only, will Ps. 76 be fulfilled in the manner we have presented. Then and then only shall the force of Ps. 110 be realized, as verified in the fate of the kings and heads over countries. Then, too, will men find that the confederation and its defeat are described in Pa. 83. Then Pa. 68 will stand forth with a significancy that will astonish, and Ps. 60 will present a clearness in the light of fulfilment that must surprise. The rejoicing then prevailing is well foretold in Ps. 47. The struggle and glorious result is eloquently portrayed in Pa. 46, and it then will be a matter of amazement that it could be applied to any other era. How impressive, viewed in this connection, becomes Ps. 48, delineating the judgment inflicted on the kings that were assembled, and the glory that results. Indeed, in that day, many a prediction now imperfectly understood, shall stand forth with a distinctness that will reproach the weakness of our faith in God's Word, when the last prayer of Moses, the benedictions of Jacob, the covenanted relationship of the people, etc., are vindicated by this tremendous overthrow of enemies—then truly prophecy itself, now the sport of scientific unbelief and the butt of unscholarly ridicule, will secure the profound esteem and praise of all nations.

E.g. such passages as Mal. 4 : 3 ; Zech. 1 : 20, and many others, either concise or obscure, are, perhaps, more fully explained in the light of this subject. It is certain that such passages as Ps. 45 : 6 are thus introduced by girding on the sword, performing terrible things, and making "thine arrows sharp in the heart of the king's enemies;" that 2 Sam. 22 : 35-47 comp. with Pa. 17, is descriptive of a real experience that shall be fully realized in the future; that, for aught we know, the 144,000 mighty men of war in 1 Chron. 27, may be typical of the saints in the Theocratic Kingdom, the 144,000 first-fruits, since of the Lord Himself it is said, when the Song of Moses shall be sung in the future triumph: "The Lord is a man of war, the Lord (Jehovah) is His name." "Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, among the gods? Who is like unto Thee glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders."

Obs. 13. This war, with the prominence, valor, success, etc., of the Jewish nation in it, corroborates the supremacy of that people presented in the preceding Proposition. Thus verifying 2 Saml. 7 : 23, 24 ; Deut. 33 : 29 ; Isa. 43 : 1-7 ; Isa. 60 ; Zech. 9 : 16 ; Jer. 3 : 17-19 ; Ps. 144 ; Jer. 33 : 9-16, the "war," Ps. 110, etc.

Obs. 14. The reader, who has closely followed our entire argument, will not fail to see that it is highly appropriate for the Jewish nation to be thus employed as instruments in the execution of the Divine Judgment of the King. The propriety springs from the fact that, as the Davidic throne and Kingdom embrace this nation, and as the judgments are to be poured out in consequence of the process of re-establishing this Kingdom in its Theocratic-Davidic form, the nation itself must, in the nature of the case, be used as an instrument in overwhelming His enemies. All pertaining to the Kingdom is thus engaged. Compare Jer. 51 : 19-20.

This undoubtedly results from the fact that then it will be clearly acknowledged and felt, that the throne and Kingdom of David, identified with the nation, are to be restored under the Messiah, "the King of the Jews." This attempted restoration will prove hateful to many kings and nations, and they will unite in a tremendous effort to crush it. The nation thus identified, must, as prophecy fully indicates, occupy a prominent position in the movements of the new ordering, introductory and established. Judging merely from Zechariah's predictions, the spirit of Jer. 48 : 10 will again be revived until the bloody enemies are effectually overcome.

Obs. 15. One peculiarity in this conflict is the statement that every Jew is specially under Divine protection, and endowed with supernatural strength, so that none of them are overcome by their enemies. The Spirit foreseeing this already foreshadows it in Deut. 32 : 30, and gives it plainly in Zech. 12 : 6, 8 ; thus also fulfilling Ps. 140 : 7. Being under the supervision of their King, and acting by His direct command, it will happen to them as in the battle with the Midianites (Num. 31 : 49), "there lacketh not one man of us." For, God says to them, Deut. 33 : 27 ; Lev. 26 : 7, 8.

An earnest of this war and its success is given to Abraham, when with his born servants, he overcame the army of Chedorlaomer, the head of a confederation. Comp. also Isa. 41, which will effectually be realized in the Messiah, His people, and the restored nation.

Obs. 16. Owing to the fearful slaughter and the multitude of dead, we have described by Ezekiel and others the cleansing of the land. This gives us a direct clew to "the cleansing of the sanctuary," for the land of Palestine is called the sanctuary (Ex. 15 : 17, etc.), and, it being defiled with the dead, is carefully purified by their removal.

Various writers, such as Bh. Newton, Andrews, Faber, etc., call attention to this cleansing. We prefer this vastly to the singular view entertained by the Seventh-Day Adventists, making the cleansing of the Sanctuary to be a cleansing of the Sanctuary in heaven. Much that is mystical, or purely inferential, is put on the phrase by various writers, which a simple comparison of Scripture avoids.

Obs. 17. The reader is reminded that these terrific scenes are connected with the closing period of Dan. 2 and 7, i.e. during the divided period of the last empire, the last beast ; while powers arising from it are still existing, this confederation, this tribulation, these results will also be witnessed. These kingdoms and beasts, with their outgrowths, describe, as Mede and others have well characterized it, "the Gentile domination," beginning with Jewish captivity and extending down during a long period of, more or less, oppressive Gentilism, until the mystery of God is finished. Even Jews have observed and commented on this peculiarity, Thus e.g. Mede quotes Rabbi Saadiah Gaon on Dan. 7 : 18 as saying : "Because Israel have rebelled against the Lord, their Kingdom shall be taken from them, and shall be given to these four Monarchies, which shall possess the Kingdom in this age, and shall lead captive and subdue Israel to themselves in this age until the age to come, until Messiah shall reign." History corroborates this Gentile dominion, and it will continue until God shall determine that "the Times of the Gentiles" have run their allotted, predetermined course, and then and then only under the restoration of this Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom will this domination come to a perpetual end (Prop. 164).

Obs. 18. Rejecting this prophetic war-spirit, commentators are greatly perplexed over the statement of Luke 22 : 36-38 and render corresponding singular interpretations. Jesus exhorts to the purchase of the sword, and when "they said, Lord, behold, here are two swords. And he said unto them, it is enough." And in v. 49 the question was asked, "Lord, shall we smite with the sword?" Jesus permitted, v. 50, so that "one of them smote the servant of the high priest and cut off his right ear. And Jesus answered and said, Suffer ye thus far." Even Olshausen makes the allusion to be that they should purchase or obtain the sword of the Spirit !

He spiritualizes the whole matter to get rid of the idea that Jesus ordered material swords, because they are regarded as inconsistent with Christ's character as "Prince of Peace." So Barnes, Bloomfield, and others, who try to make out a proverbial expression or prediction, indicative of future trials and a proper provision to be made for them. But against all such one-sided interpretations, they forget (1) that material swords were shown ; (2) the two material swords shown were esteemed sufficient ; (3) that one of the swords was actually used in inflicting a wound ; and (4) that this was done with the connivance of Jesus is self-evident, seeing that He ordered them foreseeing the intended use. To make "It is enough" to mean, "you do not understand me" is absurd, and, in view of what occurred in the use of the sword, would place Jesus in a false position. The expression in v. 51, "Suffer ye thus far," gives the clew to the whole transaction. It is simply indicative that He can and will resort to arms and violence when (as all analogy proves) the proper time has arrived, but not then at that crisis (the time of obedience and humiliation, and suffering to perfect Himself as Redeemer), for to carry out the Divine Will, the resistance then offered—a sign that the sword also belonged to Him—was amply sufficient.

To show how unbelief handles this entire subject, attention is called to an article in the Westm. Review, Jan., 1852, entitled The Ethics of Christendom, which, while disbelieving in the actual occurrence of these threats of war and violence (i.e. under the plea that they are interpolations, or of human origin), frankly concedes their existence as a spirit identified with the future estimated triumph of the Church. In controverting the non-resistance principle, the writer shows that the teaching of the New Test. is, that the saints were to await the Sec. Advent when "physical force," "retribution," etc., would be employed. He then adds : "The new reign was to come with force ; and on nothing else, in the last resort, was there any reliance : only that the army was to arrive from heaven before the earthly recruits were taken up. Nothing, indeed, can well be further from the sentiment of Scripture than the extreme horror of force, as a penal and disciplinary instrument, which is inculcated in modern times. 'My Kingdom is,' said Jesus, 'not of this world : else would my servants fight'—an expression which implies that no Kingdom of this world can dispense with arms, and that He Himself, were He the head of a human polity, would not forbid the sword ; but while 'legions of angels' stood ready for His word, and only waited till the Scripture was fulfilled and the hour of darkness was passed, to obey the signal of heavenly invasion, the weapon of earthly temper might remain within the sheath. The infant Church, subsisting in the heart of a military empire and expecting from on high a military rescue, was not itself to fight ; not, however, because force was in all cases 'brutal' and 'heathenish,' but because, in this case, it was to be angelic and celestial." We, however, are to disbelieve and reject the whole as of human origin ! Well may it be asked, if we cut out of the Word all that relates to this subject, how much will be left, and what confidence could be placed in the remainder ?

PROPOSITION 116. This Kingdom is a visible, external one, here on the earth, taking the place of earthly kingdoms (comp. Props. 122, 111, 123, etc.).

Covenant promises, prophecies, all produce the impression that as soon as it is set up, such will be the result. To deny this, is to pass over the plainest feature of this Kingdom; and, therefore, no one but admits either that now it thus exists, or that at some time in the future the Church will assume this (thus making a change), or else that it is fulfilled (against prophecy) in the third heaven. The admission is favorable to our argument, for precisely such a visible Kingdom is demanded.

Obs. 1. The Kingdom embraces not merely visibility but a divine-political dominion (Prop. 117) superseding all other Kingdoms, as e.g., Dan. 2 : 44 ; Rev. 11 : 15 ; Dan. 7 : 13, 14, 18-27 ; Zech. 14 : 9, etc. This, too, is, admitted by a host of our opponents; and we are assured by many of them that, by some additions or transpositions, this will in the course of time be effected. But if this is a characteristic of the Kingdom and at its setting up, as prophecy indicates, then, if the Church is such a Kingdom, the Church should have presented this very appearance. On the other hand, the Kingdom of God at one time was visible, then it was overthrown, but its restoration under David's Son foretold. Now, if ever restored, as covenant requires and as promise declares, then, as a matter of course, a divine political rule or dominion must be restored. Hence, the prophecies run in the current of the Divine Purpose in making these portrayals of the future Kingdom.

While it is correct to affirm—in view (the highest ground) of the non-restoration of the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, and its postponement until the times of the Gentiles are ended (Prop. 66, etc.)—that the Church and State are separate and distinct, yet it is pushing the matter to an untenable extreme (as e.g. done by the Scottish Church, see p. 158, etc., D'Aubigné's Germany, England, and Scotland) to assert that they never will be united (even as a church claiming to exert rights pertaining to the civil power). This assertion is based on the declaration, "My Kingdom is not of this world" (see Prop. 109, where this passage, so fruitful of misconception, is examined). But oath-bound Covenant, prophecy, the Theocratic ordering—all evidences that the position is a wrong one; what is true now, is no barrier to future fulfilment and realization. It is simply unreasonable and extravagant to believe in a world-wide dominion, to which all nations are subject, etc., lacking such a union. The student is reminded that the Church nearest to the Apostles was far more logical and consistent in its faith. That child-like belief based on the grammatical sense of the Word, now so scornfully rejected by many as childish, is pre-eminently the scriptural faith. The denial, on the one hand, of its truth, or the perversion, on the other, of the same to exalt the authority of the Church, does not cancel its ultimate fulfilment in the way God purposes.

Obs. 2. The concession, that such a Kingdom is still in the future, is all that at present our argument needs. The manner in which it is made may be referred to as a matter of curiosity and confirmation. Whatever mystical or spiritualistic interpretations Neander, Fairbairn and others, give, yet they are forced, against their theory, to find in an ultimate outward, visible manifestation in the Church, in a real political dominion, in a subjection of all Kingdoms under a Theocratic government, the conditions of prophecy. Having already quoted Neander largely, who contends for this feature, we pass to others. Pressense, who spiritualizes the prophecies in extenso, still unable to entirely rid himself of what he calls "the materialistic" tendencies of them, says (The Redeemer, p. 101): "Let us add that this spirituality of interpretation prevents us in no respect from admitting that the Kingdom of God will be triumphantly established in the outer world also; the new heavens and the new earth are a reality to our minds." Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 297), gives to the Church "the real universality and the absolute right of governing upon earth;" alluding (p. 447) to the language of Daniel respecting the Kingdom, he says, it is such as "to indicate an actual remodelling of the state of things among men, and a fresh organization of the social fabric such as would formally commit the administration of affairs into the hands of the Lord's people," etc.; and he admits (p. 465) that this includes "the formal elevation of the pious and God-fearing portion of mankind to the place of influence and authority." Lange (Bremen Lec. No. 8) advocates a future union of Church and State, asserting "that State and Church are to become one in the Kingdom of God," and in his Com. (Matt. 3, p. 73) he declares that "the Christian Church and the Christian State may be regarded as the twofold manifestation of the Kingdom of God." Even those who are the most non-committal admit even on Isa. 2 : 1-5 (as e.g. Alexander, Com. loci), that the description denotes something of authority, etc., "permanently visible." Dr. Arnold held that a development of the Church in its perfect form includes a blending or union of Church and State, thus constituting a properly developed Kingdom of God, saying (Hurst's His. Rational.), "there can be no perfect Church or State without their blending into one," etc.<sup>1</sup> Such references might be endlessly multiplied, but these are amply sufficient to show, (1) that the Word of God demands such an outward dominion; (2) that it will be supreme over the earth; (3) that the want is felt and acknowledged; (4) the hope is expressed that it will finally, in some way, be realized.

<sup>1</sup> Arnold (Life of, by Stanley, vol. 2, p. 103), in a letter to Bunsen, says: "Connected with this is Rothe's book, which I have read with great interest. His first position—that the State, and not the Church (in the common and corrupt sense of the term) is the perfect form under which Christianity is to be developed—entirely agrees with my notions." Rothe (Life, by Nippold, and Ethics) advocated the absorption of the Church by the State, the State and Church forming one, the latter being incorporated with the former, the State being the controlling power. The essential idea of such a visible, outward world Kingdom is strongly advocated by recent leading theologians, and the Chiliastic notion is doctrinally incorporated to suit their systems. Thus e.g. Martensen (Oh. Dog., s. 281), proclaims his faith that Christianity will not merely be a "struggling power in the world, but a world-conquering, a world-ruling power likewise." "The states and institutions of municipal life shall then be governed by Christian principle," etc. He only forgets to tell us how to reconcile all this with e.g. sec. 279, when down to the Sec. Advent he gives no place for such a Millennial theory. The fact is, many who refuse to be called Chiliasts entertain fully Chiliastic views—impelled to it by prophecy—but unfortunately do not follow the order laid down in the Word for its realization. Rev. Hall, in Christianity Consistent with a Love of Freedom, expresses his faith that in the predicted Mill. age, State and Church will be united, "for the professors of Christianity must then become politicians," etc.

Obs. 3. It is strange, however, that in such a delineation of prophetic language, fully admitting a divine political world-dominion, they forget the objections alleged against our view. In their case the very passages presented to teach an exclusively spiritual and invisible Kingdom as against us, are now no longer of force. But we may well pause, and ask the consistency of this; for, if they forbid an outward universal Kingdom such as the early Church advocated, why should they not also prevent them from entertaining a similar view? Again, in such admissions they also overlook what so many writers among themselves learnedly argue when writing in opposition to us, viz. that those predictions are typical of something else. Thus, e.g. Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 270) frankly admits that the prophetic language describes a literal Kingdom, but that this must be understood as typical, etc. Afterward he himself sets up a Kingdom corresponding with this literal description, and neglects applying to the plain grammatical sense his Origenistic derived typical one. If the predictions have been typical thus far in the history of the Church, and no change of nature is noted in the predictions themselves, how does it come that this typical application does not continue—that it suddenly changes, more or less, into literalness? Does not this prove that the principles of interpretation underlying the Church-Kingdom theory are not entirely satisfactory to their own advocates.

Obs. 4. The very concession of a visible "world-dominion" by the Church-Kingdom theorists is hampered by other difficulties, irreconcilable with the uniform tenor of prophecy. Thus, e.g. they concede that this Kingdom possesses an outward authoritative dominion, but, (1) they must, if they take the descriptions of wickedness, war, etc., preceding the Sec. Advent, have the saints or Church yield up such dominion against positive assertions by the prophets to the contrary; (2) with their theory of the ending of this dispensation, general judgment, winding up of the world, changes in the Church, they allow no such permanency, everlasting duration (see Prop. 159) ascribed to it by the prophets. The only effort made to obviate this difficulty is to say that the Church is everlasting, and hence will ever endure. This we admit, but that is not the point at issue between us; the point is, that a certain position or station is assigned to the Church, viz., that of exerting power, authority, dominion here on the earth, and the question is whether that will be retained as the prophets predict or not. Our doctrine gives this authority to the elect people—the seed of Abraham—but at a designated time, and retains it as a permanent possession; the prevailing view gives such dominion, but finally brings it to a close to make way for an alleged "Kingdom of Glory," somewhere in God's universe.

Obs. 5. If the popular definition of the Kingdom of God, viz., that it is "God's reign in the heart" (thus confounding God's Sovereignty with a special Kingdom of promise) is correct, how comes it that the prophets assign it specified time and place in the future? How comes it that it is spoken of as established at a certain period, and as pertaining to the humanity of Jesus Christ? Surely something very different from the absolute eternal Sovereignty of God is denoted; it may be, and is indeed attached to, and grows out of, that Sovereignty, but linked as it is with the elect Jewish nation, the Davidic throne and Kingdom, the human nature of Christ as David's Son, the outward visibility and dominion, the ending of the times of the Gentiles, the restoration of the Jewish nation, etc., it cannot be referred to any other Kingdom but the Theocratic-Davidic as believed in, and preached by the early churches. Admit this, and the significance and unity of covenant and prophecy are apparent; deny it, and diversity and antagonism follow.

Strange that men under the influence of a favorite theory will make the temporal blessings formerly connected with the Theocratic rule, and which are promised on its restoration to be greatly increased and enlarged, to be typical of spiritual blessings in order to make them suit the Church, even when they relate to the natural life, health, offspring, abundant harvests, increase of cattle, fruitfulness of land, etc., in brief, to the very things that are needed under a visible Kingdom. Stranger still, that a suffering, struggling church, without civil laws as the Theocracy possessed, without the distinctive features of the covenanted and predicted Kingdom, without the presence of its Theocratic (in the strict sense, God ruling as an earthly Ruler) Head (so that believers are now to render civil obedience to earthly kings and rulers), should be so persistently elevated to the position of that still future Kingdom, called (2 Pet. 1 : 11, etc.) Christ's. And strange, with all this, men cannot wholly divest themselves of the idea of visibility, outward exercise of power, etc. God has permitted men to work out their ideas of the Kingdom of God. The union of Church and State in the days of Constantine; the Papal Hierarchy with its presumptions; the State assuming to control the Church by its "divine right;" the Church declaring, by virtue of its superiority, its power over the State; the struggles century after century in many countries arising from a Church-Kingdom notion—these are matters of history and are written in letters of blood. Let the conflicts of Germany, France, England, Holland, etc., testify to the sad influence exerted by this theory. Let us illustrate by a single example: the practical result of this Church-Kingdom theory is seen in Calvin's rule in Geneva. Calvin, under the impression that the Kingdom of God was now to be realized in the lives of the people (so Fisher, His. Ref., p. 217, comp. D'Aubigné's His., Mosheim, etc.), so framed the State that the Church, through the Consistory, had the controlling influence, and the State was only co-operative in enforcing a code which was evidently based on the opinion that God's Kingdom was already established, and that a sort of Mosaic legislation under an existing (so-called) Theocratic organization was in place, by which all—even such as were not predestinated unto salvation—were forced upon their good behavior and obedience. History records the conflict, and infidelity, overlooking the conscientiousness (however mistaken) of "the Venerable Company," makes itself merry at the bloody stringency of its laws, without considering that men who honestly entertained such views of the Kingdom could not act otherwise. This mistaken doctrine affords an apology for a code which advocated coercion in matters of religion, and made the State—as in the Papacy—the executioner. This applies, alas! to a multitude of other cases.

Obs. 6. The Herald of the Morning (June 15, 1878, August 1, 1877, etc.) makes the future Kingdom "spiritual," and denounces us in our belief as "materialists." All that we need to say in reply is this: without discarding the spiritual aspects of the Kingdom (comp. Prop. 197), we are satisfied to receive the visible and materialistic view in connection with that which covenant and prophecy embraces. The reasons assigned for this purely spiritual Kingdom are too subtle and far-fetched for us, seeing that it is taken for granted that a glorification must necessarily result in an invisible and wholly spiritual state against the general analogy and specific teaching of the Scriptures. (Comp. next observation and Prop.)

Thus Patton (Aug. 1, 1877) says: "Many suppose the Kingdom to come is the restored Jewish Kingdom, earthly, visible; forgetting or ignoring the facts that the Kingdom is to be a 'heavenly Kingdom'; that 'except a man be born again he cannot see the Kingdom of God,' and neither shall they say, 'Lo here, or lo there,' all of which they could not say, if it was visible." (He might have added, that "flesh and blood" do not inherit this Kingdom.) But certainly this is a plain denial of Covenant and prophecy, which insists upon the same Kingdom removed being restored, with which all these alleged objections can be easily reconciled and shown to be adjuncts. Thus e.g. this Theocracy is "heavenly," as we have shown, for God rules in it; that a birth (res.) is requisite to "seeing" it, every concordance showing that "seeing" is used in the sense of participating in, or experiencing its blessings; that "lo here," etc., is indicative of the manner of its coming, as the context shows; that inheriting the Kingdom is the obtaining of a rule, a Kingship in this Kingdom, which is only confined to the glorified saints; that consistency in such applications would make everything, including even the regenerated earth, invisible and purely spiritual. The old Gnostic prejudice against matter is the basis of this objection, which is condemned in the most pointed manner by the plain grammatical sense of Scripture and the early faith of the Churches established by the Apostles. The objection has a few passages of Scripture which are pressed to an extreme, and this extreme is made the subject of numerous irrelevant matter, contradictory to both Covenant and prophecy. Another writer in his hostility to all earthly governments (Davis's Seven Thunders) asserts that in the Mill. Kingdom "there will be no family, no school, no ecclesiastical, no civil institution, but only a divine government," which he attenuates so that it has no external, outward form. But this is utterly opposed by direct prophecy and promise, which declare that the Kingdom is an organized government over the nations of the earth, so that e.g. the Apostles rule over the twelve tribes, the restored Jewish nation is extraordinarily blessed in its civil, social, and family relations (increase, etc.), there is a central place from whence issues the authority of government, the nations send representatives to Jerusalem, the Jewish nation enjoys a certain supremacy, etc. God has had in the past, as such admit, a "Kingdom of God" in a visible form, and He will not allow this visible Kingdom to prove a failure, but is making his preparations to reproduce it, at the appointed time, in greater power and glory.

Obs. 7. Barbour (Three Worlds) employs the same reasoning as given in the previous Observation, and insists that this Kingdom of "the Christ" is spiritual and invisible, being something separate and distinct from "the Kingdoms" given to Jesus in Rev. 11 : 15, laying special stress on the plural "Kingdoms." Now a reference to Rev. 11 : 15 shows, even in our version by the italics that in the latter clause the plural is assumed. The mss. S. & A. (Tischendorf's N. T.) have even "the Kingdom of this world is become the Kingdom of," etc., and hence many critics, making the correspondence with Dan. 7 the more striking, translate, "The Sovereignty of this world is become the Sovereignty of," etc. Now that this is the meaning, and that it is visible on the earth, including the nations, is abundantly evident from Dan. 2 and 7, as comp. e.g. with Isa. 2, Micah 4 etc. The prophecy not only takes it for granted that it takes the place of preceding Kingdoms, but expressly asserts that it is a Kingdom under heaven, here on earth, which embraces the rulership of the saints and the subjection of the nations. It requires the grossest perversion of language to make a purely spiritual and invisible Kingdom out of the one delineated, and thus corresponding with the covenanted one. The Kingdom promised to David's Son by oath, and which is His inheritance is not an invisible one—far from it. Barbour reaches his conclusions by pressing a few sentences of 1 Cor. 15, relating to the future glorified condition of the saints—a condition which only qualifies them for a visible and glorious reign—a condition, which, in Jesus and the saints, brings the Divine and Supernatural in visible relationship to humanity. It is by spiritualizing some predictions, making others conditional, applying the typical to some, and overlooking others, that this spiritual system, Gnostic in tendency, is produced.

This view, too, is most unjustly and offensively presented by Barbour, showing either his lack of knowledge of our system or a wilful design to lower our doctrine by engraffing upon it opinions that we do not hold. Thus (1) that we deny spirituality to the Kingdom, which no one does, although we reject his purely spiritual theory ; (2) that we make the "first-born," the heirs and inheritors, to dig, plant, etc., with the restored Jews (an "agricultural Kingdom"), which no one has ever done, because they carefully distinguish between the glorified saints and the nations (this is a revival of the old Popish falsehood, charged against Pre-Millenarians of the Primitive Church) ; (3) that we confine the Kingdom to Palestine, which no Pre-Millenarian, to my knowledge, does ; (4) that we do not unite with the restored Theocracy a higher development (leaving it to exist pretty much as formerly), even the union of the Divine with its resultant marvellous power and works (This work with its quotations, etc., gives all the answer that is needed). A theory, however plausible, that requires bolstering up by misrepresenting others, must have but feeble supports.

Russell (Our Lord's Return, p. 55), who was for a time in affiliation with Barbour, remarks in opposition to a visible Kingdom and Christ sitting on David's throne in Palestine, that "fleshly Israel is not, and never again will be 'the Kingdom of God.' They were once, but it will be taken from them, and given to another people, children of Abraham by faith, the Church. Under the sounding of the seventh trumpet all the Kingdoms of the world (now under the control of Satan) 'become the Kingdoms of our Lord.' They pass into the possession of Christ and under the rule of His Kingdom—the devil being bound, Rev. 20 : 2. Israel, with their capital at Jerusalem, will doubtless be the chief of these fleshly nations, but it will no more be the heavenly Kingdom than they." Hence it is spiritual, etc. The inconsistency of making the Kingdom spiritual because "heavenly," and admitting that as "the Kingdom of God" and as "heavenly" it once existed in a visible form, is certainly very striking, especially when in this future Kingdom God's will is to be done on earth as in heaven. The simple fact is this : Russell overlooks the elect condition of the nation, the necessity of our being engrafted into it, the express covenanted relationship of that Kingdom with the nation, the removal of God's wrath which restores them to their ancient position, etc., as we have presented, in detail, in previous Propositions. All prophecy makes the setting up of this Kingdom contingent with the restoration of that nation, for it is David's throne and Kingdom (not a type or symbol, but the same Kingdom overthrown) that is the inheritance of David's Son, the Messiah. As to taking the Kingdom from the nation and giving to others, the general tenor of the Scriptures, as we have shown at length, teaches that to the Jewish nation at the First Advent was tendered, on the condition of repentance, the honor of rulership, kingship, and priesthood in this Kingdom. This tender was refused, and now, lest the purpose of God fail, these rulers are gathered out of other repentant and believing ones that are engrafted. The nation as such, however high its position in the coming Kingdom, cannot, and does, not occupy the noble and exalted stations of honor and glory that these gathered ones—gathered because of their unbelief and rejection—will sustain. But we must refer the reader to our previous statements, given with the scriptural proof, and logically step by step. This we, however, add : these engrafted ones to whom the honor of rulership (inheriting the Kingdom) is given are united with previous ones selected from the nation previously, for they inherit the promises with the ancient worthies. These promises only include the Kingdom advocated by us, and embraced in "the sure mercies of David." The purely spiritual Kingdom of Barbour, Russell, and others has no existence either in Covenant or in prophecy, and was never heard of until mysticism and spiritualizing exerted their influence upon scriptural interpretation and application.

PROPOSITION 117. The Kingdom of God re-established will form a divinely appointed and visibly manifested Theocracy.

It is not a political body of human institution, for its divine origin is found in its covenanted relationship, and in its history. Its visibility we have seen in its ancient establishment; and when re-established, it must, as the case absolutely requires, again thus appear. It cannot exist without this external appearance in view of its direct connection with the Jewish nation, etc. Its Theocratic element is seen in God again condescending to act as an earthly Ruler in and through and by David's Son (comp. Prop. 110).

The reader is reminded that we have already abundantly shown (Props. 25, 31, 33, 35, 45, 46, etc.) the nature of a Theocracy, and from this we cannot deviate, seeing that God has promised—and His promises, confirmed by oath, are faithful and true—that the identical Theocratic Kingdom overthrown shall be restored. In this hope we humbly and reverently trust, because of the abundant provision in its behalf. Therefore, it may be appropriate to append a few more quotations from writers, who have no sympathy with us, illustrative of the meaning of a Theocracy. Thus in addition to those given—Archb. Whately, Diss. 3, vol. 1, Ency. Brit., p. 470, remarks: "The Lord (Jehovah) was not only the God, but also the King (Civil Governor) of this peculiar people. And hence the word 'Theocracy' is often applied to the system under which the Israelites lived." On p. 479, "It was a Theocracy; a system of direct, special, temporal government by God's extraordinary Providence." The same Ency., in Art. "Moses," says in reference to "the worship of God and the political government of the Jews," that "this was a Theocracy in the fullest extent of the word. God Himself governed them immediately by means of His servant Moses, whom He had chosen to be the interpreter of His will to the people; and He required all the honors belonging to their king to be paid to Himself." "God was not only considered as the Divinity who formed the object of their religious worship, but as the Sovereign to whom the honors of Supreme Majesty were paid." Rees's Cyclop., Art. "Theocracy," makes it "a state governed by the immediate direction of God alone," but falls into the error of making it to cease with Saul (which we have abundantly disproved, Props. 28, 31, 33). Other cyclopædias give the same definitions; all agree in the fundamental part, viz., that God condescended to act as the earthly Ruler over the nation, so that (Gov. of the Hebrews, Relig., Encyclop.) "God was, in fact, the Monarch of the people, and that the government was a Theocracy." The democratic element (brought out by Wines, Lowman, Michaelis, and others) was largely incorporated with an aristocratic one, working in unison with the Theocratic ordering, so that (as Martensen, Ch. Dog., p. 230) "The Theocracy was the Kingdom of God."

Obs. 1. This is a Theocracy in deed and in truth, for in this reorganized Kingdom we find the Theocratic idea—God's idea of a perfect government—fully consummated. The Rulership is safely and powerfully lodged in one Person, who in Himself unites the human and the Divine, who becomes, according to "the everlasting covenant" and "the sure mercies of David" (Isa. 55 : 3, 4, Alexander's version), "the Chief and Commander of nations." See Prop. on Humanity, etc.

Obs. 2. The restoration of the Jewish nation, the supremacy of the nation, the reign of the Messiah as David's Son in connection with it, in brief, all the details given by the prophets of this era, are only reconcilable and in harmony with a re-establishment of the Theocratic government. This insures divinity and visibility.

Obs. 3. As already intimated, the highest possible position that we can place the Kingdom of God in, is that of regarding it such a Theocratic State or Empire, universal over the earth, founded, governed and developed under Divine authority personally manifested. This, as admitted by nearly all, was foreshadowed by the ancient Jewish Theocracy. Something like it has been the desire of nations, as can be seen even in the Utopian theories of philanthropists, philosophers, statesmen, and more recently in the expressed wishes of spiritualists to attain to it through the medium of spirits, etc. But originally founded by Divine power, it can only be restored by the same power; it can never be realized through human instrumentality, requiring, as we have all along shown, a higher agency to introduce it.

The Theocracy itself includes the divine, but it embraces it in its purest form, viz., in direct union with and rulership over a Kingdom, i.e. God is the earthly Ruler. Hence we object to the use of the word as employed by various writers, applied to the Papacy, the Church, etc. Men have only produced base imitations of a professed Theocracy. Campanella's Monarchia Messiae, an Apology for Popery, is expressive; likewise De Cormenius's His. of the Popes, as well as the latest caricature of Mormonism. The same, too, is inapplicable to the Church, seeing that the distinctive Theocratic rule is lacking. Hence, too, we must reject the idea advocated by some that this Kingdom is purely spiritual. It cannot possibly be such if it is the Theocratic Kingdom, once withdrawn, again restored, for that unites the divine and human, the heavenly and the earthly, the spiritual and the temporal. If David's throne and Kingdom, now in ruins, is to be set up by the Messiah, as both Covenant and prophecy teach us, then the Theocracy, necessarily, must have this union; to substitute the Church or some spiritual existence or Kingdom, is to depart from the plain meaning of language. The perversions by fanatical sects, the appropriations by Popery and Protestantism, do not vitiate God's purpose as presented in Covenant and prophecy.

Obs. 4. The inconsistency of some able writers on the subject of a Theocracy is remarkable. Some who admit that the fundamental idea of a Theocracy is something very different from that of the Divine Sovereignty, embracing, as it does, God condescending to act in the capacity of an earthly Ruler, a union of Church and State under direct Divine rule, etc., yet apply this Theocratic idea, stripped of that which gives it its peculiar vital force, by the wholesale to the Church and world. Numerous excellent writers who do this will occur to the student. The most surprising part is that, in the application of this theory, they contradict themselves without apparently being conscious of the impropriety. Thus, e.g. to illustrate: Neander, Life of Christ, B. 4, ch. 1, S. 51, says: "The form of a State cannot be thought of in connection with this Kingdom; a State presupposes a relation to transgression; an outward law, the forms of judicature, the administration of justice, are essential to its organization. But all these can have no place in the perfect Kingdom of Christ; a community whose whole principle of life is love." The first sentence has force only as it applies to the Church (and it was Neander's church view that led to it), but is erroneous when thus applied to the Kingdom, for he himself in his theory of progressive development loses sight of the principle thus laid down and expressly anticipates a period when the Kingdom of God shall (in the same section) "exhibit an external stately fabric" and "regenerate all things and thus appropriate them to itself," while in other places, previously quoted, he advocates this future perfect union of Church and State as the highest development of Christ's Kingdom on earth. The fundamental error in this theory is, that it attributes to the Church, its development, etc., what the Bible only represents as performed under the direct auspices of David's Son, at and after a time of vengeance, etc. If God Himself in the establishment of a Theocracy did not regard the union of Church and State an inconsistency; if He through the Spirit sounds forth its praises and portrays vividly the blessings that can flow from it, it surely does not become us virtually to impeach His wisdom in such an organization. Besides, love, exceedingly precious and cementing, is not government, but is most admirably adapted to preserve and perpetuate it when established. The highest exhibition of love will be that which is manifested, not in individual life, but in associated life in its greatest of worldly relations, the civil.

Obs. 5. Surely no one should object to this consistent Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, so precious to the pious Jews and early Church, when many, who reject Millenarian views, still are forced by the peculiarity of predictions to concede that there will be a Theocratic reign, a union of Church and State, a universal, visible, external government. In addition to the illustrations given under previous Propositions, another may be presented. Ralston (On Apoc., p. 162, etc.) when describing the Millennium of Rev. 20, says: "we find a reference to thrones which represent the dominion of the saints in a Theocratic form of government," and adds, that prophecy teaches not only a destruction of earthly governments, but "also the erection of a government founded in righteousness and guarded by heavenly influences;" that a new form of government will be established when the Jews are reorganized as a nation, clearly Theocratic, having its seat in Judea, so that "Judea may be most distinguished in that day as the Redeemer's Kingdom on earth," and all other nations will render homage, etc. Why—when thus making out a Kingdom distinguished by political power, etc., exerting the same over the earth from the central seat in Judea—not admit all that the prophets declare, and accept of the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom fully restored in David's Son? Why leave out the Divine chain which binds the whole together? Why shrink from the divine throne and Kingdom of David, claimed by God as His own, specifically covenanted to Jesus, now in ruins but promised to be rebuilt, and, turning away from this divine, etc., still in some way attach Origenistic derived ideas to this Kingdom, constituting it a progressive development of the Church?

Obs. 6. If such a Theocratic Kingdom, as God Himself instituted, is not permanently and gloriously re-established here upon earth, then it follows that God's efforts at the establishment of government and the interest which He manifests in it are fruitless of abiding results. Or, in other words, His own Kingdom has proven a failure. If the rebellion, etc., of the Jews is urged as a reason why it was not carried out, the reply is plain: why then, with His foreknowledge institute it at first, and then when overthrown predict its restoration, etc.? Besides, why adopt it in the sacred covenant relationship? Such questions might be multiplied, showing that God's honor, majesty, etc., are immediately concerned in its restoration, or otherwise it will be said that the Almighty undertook a work which, owing to man, He could not accomplish. If the general opinion is to be received, as expressed by numerous theologians, that it would be foolishness to expect such a restoration; that it has given place to a much higher, refined, spiritual Theocratic order, etc., then it leaves God's direct attempt at exercising the functions of an earthly Ruler an inscrutable riddle. If the original Theocratic idea is lost, if God Himself is not at some period of the world's history to be its actual, earthly Sovereign, then certainly the earth will lack in its history the completion of a form of government indorsed and adopted as the most desirable by the Omniscient Himself. Recent writers, as Wines and others, insist that the Theocracy was entered into by God to teach man the true science of government. This is true, but not the whole truth, for we would add: to teach man that perfect government can only come directly through God. But take this half-truth, that God teaches man how true government cannot be justly separated from the relations that man sustains to God, etc., and does it not directly lead to the conclusion, that if God's own teachings are to be realized, then a government must at some time exist here on earth, in which He is the recognized Lawgiver and Sovereign, to whom all can apply? Shall these teachings be defeated by depraved human nature, or by the combinations of Gentile domination? Or, shall they be spiritualized away to mean something else? Shall the now "Prince of this World" gain the victory in the most dignified and exalted of man's relations, viz., in that of organized society in its national, governmental, and monarchical arrangements; or, shall the victory be given, as the Bible does, to the Son of Man, David's Son, in this very direction? The glory of God, in virtue of His beginning, is deeply concerned in the completion of His own system of government; and we may rest assured, from a multitude of concurrent predictions, that He will sanctify Himself in this particular, exalting in the eyes of all people the identical form, now the scoff of unbelievers and even so difficult of acceptance by many believers (comp. Prop. 201).

The establishment of such a Theocratic Kingdom is the most reasonable expectation, finding its basis (1) in the Covenant; (2) in the initiatory establishment of it; (3) in the withdrawal of it on account of sin, but with the promise of restoration; (4) in God's honor as Theocratic Ruler; (5) in the predictions relating to it; (6) in the postponement made of it; (7) in the provision already made for it; (8) in its adaptation to meet the wants and longings of humanity. It fully accords with our ideas of propriety, justice, and God's own glory, as well as the redemption of man. Take the popular, prevailing view, and then indeed God's effort at rule is a failure, and this world with civil government (for down to the Sec. Advent they are represented as more or less hostile to the truth) are given over as trophies to Satan. Our trust is in God, that the Kingdom of this world shall yet be His in the appointed, covenanted Theocratic order. Plato (and with him many others) will yet be verified: "In the end, lest the world should be plunged into an eternal abyss of confusion, God, the author of the primitive order, will appear again and resume the reins of empire; then He will change, embellish, and restore the frame of nature, and put an end to decay, sickness, and death." Unbelief sarcastically tells us, if the Bible is true, why does not God in our day appear, set up a Theocratic Kingdom, and make Himself felt as a Ruler indeed. The fact of a non-Theocratic government in actual force influences them to reject the entire Theocratic idea as of mere human invention. We point, however, to the most solid reasons for the withdrawal of the Theocracy (evidenced e.g. even in the past history of the Jewish nation), and its delay to the future Advent (shown e.g. in gathering out a people to sustain it in power and glory when restored).

Obs. 7. The delay in this Theocracy is no reason for refusing credence to it, seeing that God so plainly foretells the reason for its delay, viz., in punishment of the nation with which it is connected ; and seeing that He also reveals to us a long period of Gentile dominion during which it cannot exist. God, having, for the sake of man only, shown by the experiment of its previous establishment (designed also as a covenant basis, to secure the heir, etc.), that human nature as now constituted is utterly inadequate to bear and perpetuate such a Kingdom, during this season of delay is gathering out the material, i.e. the saints, who, as co-heirs, joint-rulers with "the man ordained," shall form such an illustrious, all powerful body identified and incorporated with this Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, that re-erected it will be sustained with purity, dignity and stability. God's ways are marvellous in preparing for His own government, overruling the freedom of man and his bias for sin, and constantly, slowly but surely, advancing toward His intended goal. Having repeatedly shown this gathering of elect destined to co-operate with David's Son when their number is completed, we may add : that the Jewish nation and the race itself will after so long a trial of Gentile domination and its historical results, especially as witnessed at the time of the end in its confederated wickedness, be the better prepared to acknowledge the incomparable superiority of God's form of government.

Therefore it is that the remarkable language of Jer. 22 : 30 is employed, calling special attention to the establishment of this Theocracy. When God determines, owing to the continued rebellion of the Jewish nation, to subvert for a time this Theocratic Kingdom, and not to allow the seed of Coniah upon David's throne, the fact is announced in terms expressive of the whole earth's interest in the matter : "O earth, earth, earth, hear the Word of the Lord," etc. Men may now pass it by as of little consequence, but it is of vast importance, and we, if believers, will do well if we take heed to this instruction.

Obs. 8. The eulogistic phraseology of the prophets which some critics ascribe to Oriental usage, respecting this Theocracy is well deserved. For, if we consider the King, David's immortal Son, with the Divine inseparable with Him ; the redeemed saints, also immortal, inheriting with Christ, and qualified by their trial, experience, etc., to act as rulers with Him ; the Jewish nation restored to favor, and its coveted position after an education that never will be lost ; the Gentile nations receiving the blessings accruing from a government which ever has been the need of the world ; the glorious results ever flowing in free and abundant streams from God's own fountain of order—all this ought to lead us to feel that language is too feeble to express what will be realized.

Obs. 9. This Theocracy will realize the idea of universal Empire, the darling wish of mighty monarchs. David's Son, King Jesus will, with His own power, His associated rulers, His restored and exalted nation, in the Davidic throne and Kingdom by its grandeur cause all nations to become tributary and joyful supporters of its authority. The throne of David will become the great, recognized throne of the world, all others being subordinate to it. The prophecies relating to this need not be repeated, for the reader in our argument must have observed that one design God has in re-establishing this Kingdom is, to advance through it, and perfect by it, His own universal rule, so that finally all people without reserve shall fully and freely acknowledge the supremacy of God as manifested in and through the Ruler of this Kingdom.

Obs. 10. This Theocracy, as frequently intimated and implied, is designed to create blessings. Fruitful as it may be at the beginning in vengeance to nations who interfere with God's purposes, yet its main object is to procure blessings. It is not to gratify the ambition of the Jewish nation that it enjoys such supremacy, but that, as Paul in Rom. 11; Zech. 8 : 13, etc., it may dispense richness to others; it is not to gratify pride that saints reign with Christ, but that they may be instrumental in promoting the welfare of others, etc. Of David's Son itself it is said that His reign shall bring showers of blessing upon all, so that all families of the earth shall be blessed in Him. The Millennial descriptions abound with things productive of happiness. It is only necessary, as our subject suggests it, to point to one, the fruitful parent of many others, viz., a perfectly safe, reliable, stable righteous government, with King, rulers and subjects bound together by the interests arising from manifested Redemption.

Obs. 11. This Theocracy embraces not only perfected salvation as in the Rulers, i.e. those who reign with Jesus Christ, who are crowned as the inheritors of the Kingdom, but it includes the contemplated salvation of others, and the redemption of the race as a race. Leaving the classes that are to be found in this Kingdom for separate consideration and proof, it may now be said that it will be fully proven, at the time this Kingdom is set up by the mighty confederation then existing which is to be overcome, and by the continued sinfulness of the world down to that era, that owing to the corrupt nature of man, notwithstanding the provision made for salvation, the appeals, truth, etc., the tendency of man, against light, is toward evil. Evil will in a most fearful aspect be in the ascendancy when the King comes, and it is positive folly for any professed believer in the Word to deny the record on this point. This conclusively establishes the proof, that to bring the world under subjection to God, to bring it even to accept of the blessings tendered to it, something more is needed than present instrumentalities. What will God introduce to break down, and keep down, this spirit of wickedness and rebellion? The prophets all declare that it will be the pouring out of His heavy judgments, and the setting up of this Kingdom. This Kingdom thus introduced is the bulwark erected by God against the enemies of God, by which they are either overthrown, destroyed or brought into subjection; by which all evil shall be rooted out, and the race itself be perpetuated in a state of purity and happiness just as predicted. It is the Divine means by which all are brought to feel and recognize the relations sustained to a Creator, Preserver, Redeemer, and Benefactor; removing all causes of war, national jealousies, civil disturbances, diversity of church government and worship, and bestowing peace, rejoicing and happiness.

Obs. 12. The reader's attention is briefly called to consider, what, in such a Theocratic arrangement, must be the honor and dignity of the Rulers associated with the Mighty Son of Man. The position of the twelve apostles ruling over the twelve tribes, and that of the saints in their various stations of kingship and priesthood, all linked with the glory of this Kingdom. (See Props. 154, 156.)

Obs. 13. How vain is the boast of statesman or king, that this or that nation and land will become the greatest that earth shall ever behold. If wise, they would see that this is reserved for the now despised people that stand in covenanted Theocratic relationship with Jesus.

Obs. 14. In every aspect that we view the subject, it seems suitable and necessary to have such a Theocracy as predicted. Besides the reasons adduced derived from covenant, the faithfulness of God, the redemption of the earth, etc., it does appear eminently proper that the theatre of King Jesus' humiliation, sufferings, and death should witness also His exaltation and glory. The Bible, in addition to the pleas presented by us, points to the time coming when Christ shall be openly and visibly recognized as the glorious One, who, as the Second Adam, having substituted Himself through love, is the efficacious Head of Humanity in its newly begun destiny; who, as Redeemer, having offered expiation to and honored the justice of God, now practically manifests the fruits of salvation; who, as Prophet, having taught restitution, now exhibits Himself as the Truth evidenced by the work performed before Him; who, as Priest, having made an acceptable sacrifice, now presents before the world the fruit resulting from it; who, as King, in virtue even of His Divine union and showing it by guidance, supporting, etc., now manifests it in the special ordained manner as Sovereign Ruler. In brief, this Theocracy is the restoration of a God again dwelling with man, accessible, and constituting in Jesus an infallible Head, just such as the world needs, just such as man for ages has longed for, and just such as will place David's Son in honor and glory in a world where He suffered and died. The past treatment and brief stay of the Son of God and David's Son insures a triumphant return, and a sojourn in power among men whom He will save, verifying the name Immanuel, God with us, in the Theocratical sense.

PROPOSITION 118. This view of the Kingdom is most forcibly sustained by the figure of the Barren Woman.

Turning to Isa. 54 : 1-17, the exact order of events advocated by us is distinctly announced as follows : (1) the elect condition of the Jewish nation and union with God in Theocratic relationship ; (2) the rebellion of this nation and temporary rejection of the nation ; (3) during this period of rejection another people is to be gathered out to which God will be specially united in the same relationship ; (4) that when this gathered people enter into this relationship God will again restore the Jewish nation to its original position in virtue of His former union with it ; (5) and the results of such a restoration to favor shall be of the highest importance, etc., to that nation.

Obs. 1. Because this passage is not regarded in the light of the solemnly covenanted relationship of the Jewish nation, which God's faithfulness and oath can never alter or break, however it may be held in abeyance on account of sinfulness, men have attached to it the most inconsistent and contradictory interpretations. Leaving the logical application given to this passage by the early Church, the majority of commentators, etc., involve themselves in absurdities, gross difficulties, and unnecessary perplexities. It is sad to find able and learned men who make "the barren woman" and "the married wife," although the one is contrasted with the other, the same ; or, who make both to be the Church in different aspects ; or, who make it simply a figure of Jewish prosperity exceeding that of other nations who then exist ; or, who even make it out to be a kind of proverbial expression indicative of increase ; or, who make "the barren" the Christian Church largely increased by Gentile nations which are supposed to be "the married wife," etc. Surely, if mere fancy or imagination has had full play in exegesis, it has been on this Scripture.<sup>1</sup> Instead, however, of dwelling on the looseness of exposition on this passage, let us, following step by step the teachings of the Word, endeavor to ascertain the meaning which accords with the general tenor of prophecy, and with historical fact.

<sup>1</sup> Popes, Mormons, Protestants, etc., appropriate these predictions as belonging to themselves in the present dispensation ; and many unhesitatingly use portions as texts for missionary services, and apply them to the Church in its supposed mission to convert the world by existing instrumentalities. The only view opposed to ours that is not extravagant, is that of Maurer, that "the married wife" refers to the previous married condition or state of this barren woman. But this does not bring out the contrast, as evidenced by—as we shall show—the facts, when this is to be fulfilled, viz., two parties, both Theocratically united to God, existing together in Theocratic union. Again : it would make the period of former Theocratic rule to bear but a small proportion of prosperity to the time of desolation, unless (as Fausset does) the fulfilment is referred to a future restoration of the Jews. The meaning to be attached to "the married wife" must be determined by the general analogy on the subject. If Maurer is correct, then the restoration of Theocratic order is announced, in which, as the grandeur and magnificence of the language evidence, the engrafted saints, Abraham's seed, participate.

Obs. 2. Who is this "barren woman" ? The definite answer is given by the entire scope and order of the prediction. For the present, we reply : It is the Jewish nation as the covenanted elect nation, or, if the reader chooses, Jerusalem as the type of the nation, its chief representative,<sup>1</sup> the nation itself being thus designated. For, (1) This nation is represented as married to God, being His wife. The marriage relation being thus used as a figure to denote the intimate, Theocratic relation that God sustained as earthly Head or Ruler over it. Many passages teach this, in which the nation, under the same figure, is declared to be treacherous as a wife, guilty of whoredoms, etc. In this same chapter she is therefore called "a wife of youth," a woman that was married when but young, etc. Compare Ezek. 16 ; Jer. 3 : 20, etc. (2) She is a "barren woman." Because, (a) she forsook the Lord and followed her own devices, so that God said, Hos. 2 : 4, "And I will not have mercy on her children, for they be the children of whoredoms," Hos. 4 : 6, (b) she persecuted and destroyed her children ; Ezek. 16 : 20, 21, "Moreover thou hast taken thy sons and daughters whom thou hast borne unto me, and these hast thou sacrificed unto them to be devoured. Is this of thy whoredoms a small matter, that thou hast slain my children," etc. ; (c) hence the increase that would have resulted had she proven faithful, was, owing to her wickedness, not realized, Hos. 9 : 14-17 ; (d) by her sinfulness she defeated the gracious purposes of God respecting her. This is apparent from numerous declarations in which God promises to her to perform such and such things if she only prove faithful. The lamentation of Jesus over her is sufficient evidence. The nation, persistent in its evil course, instead of blessings receives the curse which is productive of barrenness ; (e) she brings forth fruit unto herself and not of God, Hos. 10 : 1, "begotten strange children," Hos. 5 : 7. (3) She is not only a "barren" but "a desolate woman." In view of the wickedness of the nation God forsook her and in wrath hid His face from her (vs. 7, 8), so that in verse 6 she is called "a woman forsaken," and, owing to this forsaken condition, in verse 4 it is designated by way of reproach a "widowhood" (a condition, notwithstanding the assertions of some, that can never be applied to the Church). How amply this has been fulfilled is evident from Scripture (Ezek. 16 : 36, etc., Hos. 2, etc.), and from history. Down to the present day she is yet in her "widowhood," yet "a woman forsaken," yet "judged as a woman that breaketh wedlock." Right here the reader may pause and ask, if all this has been so minutely fulfilled that it is a matter of record in the languages of the earth, will not the remainder, also asserted of this very "forsaken woman," be verified ? Certainly !

<sup>1</sup> The Chaldee renders it : "Rejoice, O Jerusalem, who hast been as a sterile woman that did not bear." The Jewish Rabbis were accustomed to call the Jewish nation, in view of its unproductiveness, etc., "the Barren." Thus e.g. Rabbi Simeon (Book of Sohar) says : "Woe to those who shall live in the days of the Coming of the Messiah ; woe, and also hail to them ! For when He, the Holy One, blessed be His name, will appear to remember the barren," etc.

Obs. 3. Who is this "married wife" that is contrasted with the other ? For two women are spoken of, "the barren woman" and "the married" wife," and some things are asserted*of the one that do not pertain to the other. If our line of argument has been noticed, there will be no difficulty in recognizing this "married wife." After "the barren woman," i.e. Jewish nation, had forsaken her husband, and God had, owing to her sinfulness, forsaken her, God takes to Himself another wife, here called "the married wife" to distinguish her from "the desolate" one. If we open the Bible and read what follows the rejection of the Jewish nation and its miserable fall, we find that God during this period of abandonment proceeds to raise up a seed unto Abraham of those, out of all nations, who fear and obey God. (See Prop. on election and continued election.) It is this seed, this nation thus gathered to whom the Kingdom in a high, special sense is to be given—i.e. they also will be married, i.e., enter into this Theocratical relationship with God. This seed is said in the New Test. in its aggregate (not before) to form "the chaste virgin," "the Bride" that is to be married just previous to the ushering in of the Millennial age at the Sec. Advent of Christ, 2 Cor. 11 : 2 ; Eph. 5 : 27 ; Rev. 19 : 7, 9. This too, of course, as intimated in the text, and as necessarily included in our argument, occurs here on earth previous to the restoration of the Jews. It is a matter of profound admiration to see how harmoniously the spirit speaks, even in the most delicate of figures, through inspired men separated by intervening centuries. There is a marriage, i.e., such a Theocratic affinity, consummated at the coming of the Bridegroom, which gives the saints the inexpressible privilege and honor of reigning with Christ. In Gal. 4 the apostle contrasts these two women. Those gathered out of this dispensation are "the children of promise," i.e. inherit with Abraham, and they are the children of the New Jerusalem, she being "our mother," i.e. when the New Jerusalem comes down from God out of heaven, they are identified with her, etc. But, on the other hand, the earthly Jerusalem is the mother of those in bondage, i. e. of those who are now "forsaken." The earthly Jerusalem is the central figure of the power and glory of the Jewish nation, and this runs its allotted course now in bondage and in cruel subjection, now grievously "desolate," etc. (But will she remain thus?) The New Jerusalem is the central figure of the power and glory of this gathered seed, who in this married state inherit the promises that "the barren woman," owing to her unfaithfulness, has forfeited, viz., that of being speciallly associated with Christ as Rulers, etc., in this Theocratic Kingdom. The reader's indulgence for proof is asked until we come to the Propositions pertaining to the reign, etc., of these saints, showing that, although identified with it, yet they are a separate distinguished body in point of honor and privileges from the restored Jewish nation. The apostle's quotation from Isa. (Gal. 4 : 27), and immediate reference to inheriting, indicates that his eye of faith was directed to this "married wife." What follows in Isaiah's prediction is evidence of the correctness of our deductions, preserving a connected series in the order of events.

How the figure of marriage is used to denote the Theocratic union will be found under Prop. 169 ; and how God distinguishes between the body of associated Theocratic rulers and the restored Jewish nation will be presented under Props. 153, 154, 156, 166, 169, etc. We only now say to the critical student that, at present, our argument is concerned, not with "the married wife," but with "the barren woman." Whatever view we may ascribe to the former, one thing is certain that the latter cannot consistently (in view of what is stated in the chapter) be applied to the Ch. Church, for it alone, in every particular, fits the Jewish nation.

Obs. 4. For, this "barren," "forsaken," "desolate," and "widowed" one is again reconciled. In the fourth and fifth verses it is said, that she shall forget her shame and her widowhood because "thy Maker is thy Husband," and a mighty increase of children is to result from God thus again receiving her back. Therefore, most impressively it is stated: "For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment, but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer." This reception and subsequent union, under the figure of marriage, is delineated in many places. To keep within the shadow of the same, men may argue that God will utterly forget His marriage vows most solemnly given when He took to wife this nation, but, however unfaithful she has been, God, as the prophets testify, is faithful to His own. Hence the intense beauty and force of Hos. 2, where, after describing the desolation and sorrows of this "barren woman;" after declaring "she is not my wife, neither am I her husband," the prophet goes on to predict that the day is coming when God shall again "speak comfortably unto her" and "she shall sing as in the days of her youth," and she shall "call me Ishi," i.e. My Husband (marg. reading), for "I will betroth thee unto me forever," etc. So Isa. 49: 13-17 declares how the Lord will comfort this afflicted one, although she, "Zion said: The Lord hath forsaken me and my Lord hath forgotten me." The reply comes: "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? Yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee. Behold I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands; thy walls are continually before me. Thy children shall make haste; thy destroyers and they that made thee waste shall go forth of thee." God cannot, will not forsake this woman, but intends, such is His purpose, to restore her to favor. A thousand predictions proclaim it. As if purposely to meet the objection that some urge, viz., that this woman is put away forever (Isa. 50: 1), God asks of the Jews at Babylon: "Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement whom I have put away, or which of my creditors is it to whom I have sold you? Behold for your iniquities have ye sold yourselves, and for your transgressions is your mother put away." Keeping in view that the mother is Jerusalem (Gal. 4, etc.), we may ask to-day, where is that bill of perpetual divorcement? It has no existence; it never was given; the estrangement that God Himself asserts arose not from such a divorcement, but was owing to their transgressions. The bond is indissoluble, although a temporary separation intervenes. If man desires to see in this matter the most amazing condescension and unalterable love in God, let him ponder well Jer. 3: 1-22, and notice that "the bill of divorce" in the case of Israel is only a temporary one, and is the fruit of her own doings, verse 20, and that a blessed reconciliation will yet be effected.

Obs. 5. Notice the increase of this "barren woman." The most astounding assertion is made which those not conversant with Scripture will regard as contrary to fact, viz., that the children of "the barren woman" shall be more than the children of "the married wife." This is the Divine purpose. (1) In reference to "the married wife," i.e. the elect, royal, chosen body of kings and priests, gathered out and associated with Christ, no such increase as is attributed to "the barren woman" can be ascribed, seeing that they are glorified saints of whom Jesus Himself tells us that they "neither marry nor are given in marriage." They compose a definite, determined number to which none are to be added and from which none are to be taken. Their peculiar relationship to Jesus as co-heirs, their identity with Him in acts of judgeship, etc., is well represented under the figure of marriage, the most intimate and endearing of earthly relations. But of this marriage relation no increase of children can be predicated, seeing that its number is fixed. This wife is the inheritor of the Kingdom, i.e. exalted to actual possession of its governmental power, etc., with her Bridegroom Jesus Christ, and "flesh and blood" cannot inherit or attain to this power. (Prop. on Reign, etc.) Besides this, the idea of the original may be that "the married wife" with all the increase which such an elect body has attained to, although in the aggregate large, is comparatively small when contrasted with that which shall characterize the Jewish nation when restored. That is, "the married wife" are "the few" saved when compared with "the many" that shall experience God's favor in, and through, this "barren woman." (2) "The Barren Woman" being restored, as we have seen, shall have a wonderful increase of children, so that she is called on to enlarge her habitation to receive them. There is a remarkable contrast given by the Spirit for the wise, who compare Scripture, through David in Ps. 113. For, at the very time that God's poor and needy are remembered "to set them with princes even with the princes of His people" (which only occurs when this Kingdom and Mill. era is ushered in), it is added: "He making the barren woman (Jewish nation) to keep house (marg. reading: to dwell in a house, i.e. the Theocratic-Davidic house, as covenant calls it the 'house') and to be a joyful mother of children." The same idea of increase is conveyed under another form in Isa. 49. After describing the restoration of this nation, calling on heaven and earth to sing for the comfort and mercy extended to "the forsaken" one, the prophet predicts: "Thy waste and thy desolate places and the land of thy destruction shall even now be too narrow by reason of the inhabitants, and they that swallowed thee up shall be far away. The children which thou shalt have, after thou hast lost the other, shall say again in thine ears, The place is too strait for me; give place to me that I may dwell. Then shalt thou say in thine heart, Who hath begotten me these, seeing I have lost my children and am desolate, a captive and removing to and fro," etc.<sup>1</sup> Many and precious are the predictions relating to this increase, and if the reader will peruse such as are contained in Isa. chs. 60, 61, 62, etc., he may then form a faint idea how unexampled, vast, and glorious it will be. Notwithstanding those plain predictions, such is the unbelief of many, that it almost seems necessary to send again the angel to say, Zech. 2 : 3-5, "Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls for the multitude of men and cattle therein," and as if to check such lack of faith, "for I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her." Well may infidels smile and laugh, when professed believers, learned men, not seeing that the restoration always connected with it looks beyond the first one from Babylon, narrow such magnificent promises of the Almighty God down into a dwarfed, enfeebled fulfilment in the past. No! the early Church, the pious Jews, regarded by many as very "weak" and possessing only "the germ" of truth in "a materialistic husk," had at least nobler conceptions of God's promises and a higher estimate of His faithfulness than to emasculate the Word in this manner.

<sup>1</sup> We give Delitzsch's translation, wishing to direct the reader's attention to a delicate reference. "Lift up thine eyes round about and see: all these assemble themselves together and come to thee. As truly as I live, saith Jehovah, thou wilt put them all on like jewelry, and gird them round thee like a bride. For thy ruins and thy waste places and thy land full of ruin—yes, now thou wilt be too narrow for the inhabitants, and thy devoursers are far away. Thy children, that were formerly taken away from thee, shall say in thine ears, The space is too narrow for me; give way for me, that I may have room. And thou wilt say in thy heart, Who hath borne me these, seeing I was robbed of children, and barren, and banished, and thrust away; and these, who has brought them up? Behold, I was left alone; these, where were they?" Isa. 49: 18-21. Now, to realize the force of this divine portraiture of the surprise, and exultation, and glory of the Jewish nation at this period of restoration, we must keep in view that the ancient saints and the saints of this dispensation, and the restored nation, are brought together in Theocratic union; all belong to the same commonwealth, occupying relative positions but still all connected with the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom. This manifested union gives us the key to much of the exalted descriptions of the prophets.

Obs. 6. Let the foundation of the promise of this increase be especially noticed. After describing this increase, and that He shall again be her husband, we have the unalterable determination of God to bring it to pass: "For this is as the waters of Noah unto me; for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee." This fully accords with Ezek. 16, where, after being informed how God married Jerusalem (i.e. established His Theocratic relationship there), how she became barren, how she was forsaken and punished for her sins, it is finally added: "Nevertheless (i.e. notwithstanding the past) I will remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth, and I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant," i.e. He will make manifest that "the sure mercies of David" are, as David calls it, "an everlasting covenant"—i.e. one that cannot be broken or altered. Then the prophet continues, filled with the Spirit to meet objections: "And I will establish my covenant with thee, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord. That thou mayest remember and be confounded and never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame, when I am pacified toward thee for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord." Now, if we turn to the basis of this promise in the covenant made with Abraham, we read of an increase which has never yet been realized in the history of God's people. Thus, Gen. 22: 16, 17, "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing and hast not withheld thy Son, thine only Son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven and as the sand which is upon the sea shore, and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies." So Gen. 15: 5; 13: 16; 26: 4; 28: 14; 32: 12. These are not proverbial sayings, as some imagine, indicating simply a multitude, etc., for occurring in a covenant sworn to by God they become intensified. They have not been fulfilled in the Jewish nation thus far, for (1) this increase is to take place when the seed Christ inherits the land; (2) it is connected with a period after a certain restoration to their land; (3) after the Jewish nation had passed through its brief period of prosperity, etc., and it had begun to enter upon its desolate condition, the increase founded on this covenant is still predicted by the prophets as future. Thus, e.g. Hos. 1: 10, "Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea which cannot be measured nor numbered, and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God." (4) Isa. 49 : 17, 18 says that if the nation had hearkened to the commandments of God, "thy seed also had been as the sand and the offspring of thy bowels like the gravel thereof," showing that disobedience deferred its fulfilment.<sup>1</sup> (5) That it is future, notwithstanding the partial fulfilment under the Mosaic and present dispensations appears from what Jer. 33 : 22 mentions. For, giving a Millennial description, vividly portraying the glory of the coming Davidic Kingdom, and testifying that "the covenant" which God made cannot be broken, he appends : "As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the seas measured, so will I multiply the seed of David my servant and the Levites that minister unto me." (6) In the Mill. delineations we have repeated assurances that after the restoration of this "barren woman" this increase shall be so great that, Ezek. 36 : 10, 11, 37, 38, "I will multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel, even all of it ; and the cities shall be inhabited and the wastes shall be builded. And I will multiply upon you man and beast ; and they shall increase and bring fruit ; and I will settle you after your old estates and will do better unto you than at your beginnings ; and ye shall know that I am the Lord," etc. Jer. 31 : 27, "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will sow the house of Israel and the house of Judah with the seed of man and with the seed of beast. And it shall come to pass that like as I have watched over them to pluck up and to break down and to throw down and to destroy and to afflict, so will I watch over them to build and to plant, saith the Lord." Who can resist such evidence as this, when the folly of spiritualizing away such promises is properly, and perhaps designedly, checkmated by the direct allusions to the multiplication of beasts—creation itself participating in these times of restoration? Who can resist the declaration made by God in Isa. 49 : 3-8, or in Isa. 27 : 6, etc., unless he is regardless of what specially belongs to the nation as such, and appropriates to Gentile nations what is not promised to them.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Our argument includes the partial fulfilment (1) of the seed already secured to Abraham through the nation (2) of the Gentiles engrafted who are also accounted the seed of Abraham, as Paul shows (and embraces in the future (3) the Gentiles who are incorporated by faith into this Theocratic-Davidic government, and thus recognized as belonging to it). This in the aggregate forms a vast, mighty army, and many suppose that this amply covers the Covenant promise. That it very materially aids and in a certain sense fulfils it, is evident, but that it covers the same is not so apparent since the Covenant requires this in a manifested form here on earth, visibly exhibited, as prophets declare in the nation itself, i.e. in a multitudinous existing nation on earth. The Covenant certainly demands a continued seed to be raised up unto Abraham (and rather than fail in it, John says that God can raise up such a seed from stones), and this seed aids to swell, when once manifested, the fulfilment, but this even, evincing how true and intensive it is, fails to cover the whole ground, which is only done when the nation, as such, stands forth a mighty empire with a vast population, etc. Such is the natural interpretation that the promises require.

<sup>2</sup> Many writers take out of these predictions just so much as will suit their idea of the present dispensation, just so much as they can well appropriate to the Christian Church—without the least regard to the connection or its relationship to the Jewish nation. It is saddening to witness the quotations misapplied, totally ignoring the promise made to the Jewish nation. Illustrations so abound that they need not be given. We only say this : neither piety nor sincerity, neither zeal nor ignorance, afford a full, ample apology for such misapplications, seeing that simple faith in God's promises, with a comparison of Scripture, should prevent them.

Obs. 7. The stability of this promise to "the Barren Woman" of increase is worthy of attention. (1) Her Husband is no ordinary one ; He is

(v. 5) "the Lord of Hosts" and her "Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel, the God of the whole earth shall He be called." He will verify His own promises. (2) The assurance given (v. 8) that the long period of Jewish tribulation and desolation, embracing century after century of "widowhood," is only "for a moment," i.e. a brief space of time, when compared with "the everlasting kindness" that she shall experience when again reconciled to her Husband. Thus we have again indicated the abiding covenanted relationship of this nation. (3) His covenant, as firm and immovable as that contracted with Noah, v. 9, is thus made with this "barren woman." (4) His covenant with her more enduring than the mountains and hills, v. 10. (5) He is not merely bound to her by a promise, which in itself is sure, but by an oath, v. 9. This oath is found originally in the Abrahamic covenant, commencing (Gen. 22 : 16), "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord," etc. It is adverted to in Luke 1 : 73 ; Heb. 6 : 13, 14, etc. This marriage relation is confirmed by what Paul calls an "immutable thing." The same oath was made to David, Psls. 89, 132, etc. Therefore, we may well say with Micah 7 : 20, who, after stating the restoration of this "barren woman," remarks : "Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob and the mercy to Abraham, which Thou hast sworn unto our Fathers from the days of old." (6) All things are under the control of this husband, vs. 16 and 17, and no adverse events can prevent this reconciliation. His power is superior to the performance of the promise, and therefore this "barren woman" is exhorted, v. 4, "Fear not," etc. She has no cause for apprehension, "For the Lord of Hosts has purposed, and who shall disannul it? and His hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?" Therefore God says so emphatically by Jer. 31 : 35-37.

Obs. 8. The period when this reconciliation with "the barren," "desolate," and "forsaken woman" is effected. (1) It is after the nation is gathered, v. 7, restored nationally to Jerusalem and the Holy Land ; for the Theocratic relationship, the marriage is restored, and then, as shown, the increase will be witnessed. (2) It is after "the married wife" is elevated to the New Jerusalem state, after the New Jerusalem (the one Mother) has completed the elect number of her children, that "the barren woman" is reinstated and has her promised abundance of children. This most accurately corresponds—showing the Divine Spirit revealing these precious things—with the condition of things in Rev., when the nations that are saved, after the erection, etc., of the New Jerusalem state, walk in the light of it and kings of the earth bring their honor and glory to it. This "barren woman" is to rejoice in the blessings added by this New Jerusalem state as appears from vs. 11, 12, 13, etc., compared with Rev. 21 and 22, and Isa. 60, etc. (3) It is when the Mill. age is ushered in ; which is already confirmed by the passages quoted. (4) The extraordinary versatility of the Spirit in exhibiting this matter is seen in Hos. 3. A remarkable command is given to the prophet. He is ordered to take a woman, an adulteress, forsaken but still loved. This was a type of the Jewish nation, forsaken but still "beloved," "according to the love of the Lord toward the children of Israel;" and the action of the prophet is symbolic, indicating that God also is waiting to receive "an adulteress," forsaken woman. Then the direct application of the symbolic representation follows : viz., that Israel shall thus be forsaken "many days" having no Theocratic relationship with her God, but that "afterward" they shall again return and fully realize it in "the Lord their God and David their King." That is, the woman, i.e. nation, guilty of sin, and long punished for the same, shall be reinstated in the old relationship that she sustained to her Husband. And this, as parallel passages prove, is when the Jews are restored, and Mill. blessedness is introduced by the setting up of the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom. (5) This is done at the time, as we have previously shown, when a confederation is gathered against this "barren woman." For, in verse 15, it is said: "Behold they shall surely gather together, but not by me; whosoever shall gather together against thee shall fall for thy sake." Just such a confederation arises and endeavors to prevent the Jewish nation from reoccupying their city and land, and, as here intimated, meets with a complete overthrow. This sufficiently identifies the period of reinstation to Divine favor. Prov. 15 : 25 will yet be fulfilled (comp. Props. 161 and 163).

Obs. 9. Briefly, as it also serves to fill out the identification of this "barren woman," we may regard the altered condition of this woman when thus reconciled. She was forsaken, desolate, in reproachful widowhood, but now again in intimate relationship with her former husband clad as He will clothe her; fed as He will feed her; dwelling as He will place her; she is to sing and break forth into singing (so also Zeph. 3 : 14; Isa. 49 : 13; Isa. 12 : 6; Zech. 2 : 10, etc). She shall also inherit (v. 3) the Gentiles, thus indicating her national supremacy over all other nations. (Prop. 114.) She shall be "far from oppression," she "shall not fear," etc., as she once endured and suffered. "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment shall thou condemn." All her children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be their peace, etc.

Obs. 10. If we take all these particulars, and see how minutely they are given; how all the prophets, separated by ages, so accurately preserve the shading of the most delicate figures to teach who this woman is, what her present and then her future condition, how distinguished, etc., it seems almost incredible that the wisdom of man, so freely exercised over these things, should, as in multitudes of instances, cast them aside as "Jewish," etc., just as if God was not the Husband of a Jewish wife; just as if God was like unto man and could and would forever, against His protestations solemnly given to the contrary, break His marital relations.

Obs. 11. With the Spirit insisting upon the unalterable covenant relationship that this "barren woman" sustains to her Husband, what folly it is for churches, religious organizations, fanatical bodies, and Gentile nations to assume that they compose this Barren Woman, and are to exhibit this increase, etc. It would be, if not so fearful a perversion of Scripture, simply ridiculous. Need we wonder that the Spirit complains of the lack of faith that men shall manifest, when such unwarranted pretensions are seriously set forth, upheld, and defended?

This will enable us to estimate the mystical extravagances of multitudes in past centuries, who professed to enjoy a present (i.e. in this dispensation) marriage relation with Christ, often prostituting the same both by improper language and the claims of superior sanctity. The pictures found in some Romish books are sufficiently expressive. Even the early Moravians were charged (justly or unjustly—see Kurtz, Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 261) with such a prostitution. Ann Lee's extravagance is well known ; so also Joanna Southcote's professing to be the bride, and that of other Mystics, including those who claim to be "the New Jerusalem." It is sad to reflect that not merely fanatics, but men of intellect and ability make such a perversion of that which clearly and unmistakably relates to the future.

Obs. 12. The observant student will not fail to notice the Oneness that exists between the Father and the Son in this marriage relation (i.e. Theocratical) with this woman. What is said of God is directly asserted of His Son ; and when the Holy One of Israel occupies the Theocratic-Davidic throne, restoring the ancient relationship, it is positively asserted that God does this for the Divine Ruler, the God who formerly condescended to act as Israel's earthly Ruler is again favoring the nation in and through David's Son. This might easily be developed into a strong argument for the divinity of Jesus Christ.

Obs. 13. If the two women thus married, i.e. received in Theocratic connection, are thus properly distinguished the one from the other, and their mutual standing is observed and discriminated in the Coming Kingdom, new light is thrown on many of the more obscure allusions to the same in the Word. Thus, e.g. in Ps. 45, where the heart of the Psalmist (marg. reading) "boils or bubbles up a good matter," "things touching the King," he describes the beauty of this King's appearance, the dreadful overthrow of His enemies, the establishment of His throne, and then we have a distinction made between several women. For we have (1) "the Queen in gold of Ophir (Justin, in garments of gold, variegated,) standing upon thy right hand ;" (2) "King's daughters (i.e. other nations) were among thy honorable women ;" (3) "the King's daughter, her clothing of wrought gold ; (4) the virgins that accompany her ; (5) the daughter of Tyre. This corresponds with what has been said, viz., that one, "the married wife," sustains a peculiar relation to this King, and that the Jewish nation is also restored, glorified through her, and that other nations will acknowledge the same and minister to her, and this is after this King's hand has performed the "terrible things" upon His "enemies."

These two married women show clearly that both "the Church of the First-born" and the Jewish nation enter into the same Theocratic relationship (thus expressed under the figure of marriage), and hence are in union in the same Kingdom. This corroborates our position against those who make virtually two Kingdoms, one for the saints and one for the Jewish nation, or against those who deny that the Jewish nation has a kingdom, the saints only being entitled to the same. The simple fact that "the barren" is thus restored, gives the best answer to all such objections.

Obs. 14. When this marriage relation is renewed with "the barren" one, the King Himself will be present, and tender Himself, too, in a way that will prove irresistably attractive, as David and others represent. Comp. Zeph. 3 ; Isa. 12 : 6, etc. The happiness and glory of the once desolate woman are invariably connected with an abiding, accessible King dwelling with her.

Obs. 15. Will the reader pause and reflect to what special privileges and honor we are invited in this dispensation, viz., to an identification with and participation in the blessings of "the married wife." She, indeed, will number less than that of the other one when God's purposes are all carried out, but her lot is the more exalted and ennobling, as her "Mother" is the greater and nobler.

The reason why "the married wife" has a greater portion than "the barren woman" is this: She is "the first-born," and as such is entitled to a double portion. (Comp. Arts. on "First-born," in Bib. Dicts., etc., and observe their distinctive privileges.) The first-born is always regarded as the most excellent, most distinguished, and this principle, as all analogy teaches, must be applied to "the Church of the first-born." Some contend that others will be added to them, and participate in the same privileges, but this is opposed to their birth-right privilege, and to the representations of their being a select, separate, and distinct body. Others are born, but, distinguished as they shall be and abounding in blessing, they cannot be regarded as "the first-born." This evidently was the prize that Paul so earnestly sought to win. Such form Mal. 3 : 17, "My Jewels," "My peculiar or special treasure" (comp. Ex. 19 : 5 ; Deut. 7 : 6 ; 14 : 2, and 26 : 18 ; Ps. 135 : 4 ; Tit. 2 : 14 ; 1 Pet. 2 : 9). Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., ch. 4) opposes this specialty, as taught by Bonar and many others. His system, of course, has no place for it. But in the restored Theocratic Kingdom we see that, necessarily, there must be different degrees of glory. The highest degrees are by the Divine Sovereignty allotted to this married wife, and those who find fault with it must sit in judgment on the propriety of God's Will in the matter.

Obs. 16. If it is our happy lot to be identified with this "married wife," then we shall see with our own eyes the fulfilment of this prophecy respecting "the barren woman." Now we behold her forsaken ; then we shall see this same desolate woman restored to favor, re-entering her married state, bringing forth her increase, revelling in happiness and glory. But we shall not only see it, but even be employed with Christ as instruments in promoting and extending the "great mercies," "the everlasting kindness" showed unto her. May God indeed grant that our eyes may see her "fair colored stones," her "sapphire foundations," her "agate windows," her "gates of carbuncles," her "borders of pleasant stones," and the unspeakable "peace" of "her children." The student must never forget that the New Jerusalem state and that of this woman are inseparable at the period of her restoration ; the former adding to the glory of the latter, being virtually the outgrowth, the first-fruits, of her covenanted relationship.

PROPOSITION 119. The Kingdom of God in the Millennial descriptions is represented as restoring all the forfeited blessings.

Attention is only called to the fact, that, explain it as we may, when this Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom is represented in the portrayal of the Millennial era as existing, it embraces a restoration of blessings forfeited by sin. The prophets instead of separating that age from this restitution, making the latter, as many suppose, a result to follow afterward, distinctly unite them. Now, this, as the argument thus far demands, is requisite to preserve the Divine order in the re-establishment of the Kingdom, seeing that it involves a resurrected, immortal David's Son, resurrected and immortal Ruler, and the fulfilment of covenant promises designed when accomplished to remove evil, sorrow, suffering, etc.

Obs. 1. Three cautions are in place here : (1) Not to disconnect what the prophets have linked together as belonging to the same period of time here on earth. (2) Not to imagine that everything mentioned is to be instantaneously or quickly performed—time being required for the full realization of what may be commenced at the beginning of this age. The exceeding brevity and sometimes obscure allusions admonish us to be guarded in our deductions. (3) Not to force an interpretation which is directly opposed by other Scriptures, and then leave the same without the least attempt at reconciliation. Thus e.g. in Isa. 2 : 1-4, we read : "Neither shall they learn war any more," etc., upon which Alexander (so Barnes and others) comments : "War ceases, the very knowledge of the art is lost," etc. But as these commentators apply Isa. 2 : 1-4 to the Church before the Sec. Advent of Christ, they fail to inform us what to do with the passages which teach, positively, that wars exist, more or less, down to the very Advent itself, thus leaving no room for such a period of time as Isaiah describes. Such interpretation is not only misleading, but it darkens precious truth, and inspires hopes that misguide, and is the result of not regarding the general scope of prophecy.

The Millennial predictions are most loosely quoted, and applied in violence to the context, to the present period. An exhibition of the lavish mode of application is found e.g. in Eusebius's (Ecc. His., B. 10, ch. 4) "Panegyric on the Building of Churches, addressed to Paulinus, Bishop of Tyre." The Popes, even in bulls and official papers, apply them to their viceregency. Popish adherents heap them upon the Church, or their heads, in ample profusion—reminding us of the elegant ode (15, B. 3) of Sarbiewski, addressed to Urban VIII., freely rendered in Proude's Reliques (p. 537) :

"Myrtle groves are fast distilling
Honey : honeyed falls the dew,
Ancient prophecies fulfilling
A Millennium in you !"

Protestants of all denominations imitate this looseness in the effort to exalt the Church—the greatest wildness being observable in those classes that self-complacently appropriate the whole and style themselves "the Millennial Church," or some kindred significant title. Many schemes of prophecy are utterly worthless, simply because they ignore the plainest order that even a slight comparison of predictions presents. Thus e.g. to introduce the Millennial era before "the harvest," or "the last trumpet," or "the resurrection," or "the Sec. Advent," etc., cannot be sustained. It is identified with "the day of the Lord Jesus," "His appearing and Kingdom," etc., and, this admitted, brings concord between the Scriptures.

Obs. 2. As it is our purpose merely to show how the Spirit locates the performance of these things (preparatory to following Propositions), a brief summary of some of them must suffice. 1. Salvation is repeatedly predicated of this period. Indeed, the burden of prophecy concerning this era is Salvation, abundant and most glorious. God then is the Saviour—the Holy One of Israel is the Saviour, and Salvation comes to His people. And such is the significance of it, that it stands forth as the Salvation, the predicted, pre-eminent Salvation. Great is the number of passages bearing this impression, only a few of which we cite, sufficient to convey our idea, viz., such as Isa. 12 : 2 ; Isa. 49 : 26 ; Isa. 26 : 1 ; Isa. 35 : 4 ; Jer. 23 : 6 ; Jer. 30 : 7 ; Ezek. 37 : 23, etc. When this Mill. day comes, then, Isa. 25 : 9, "it shall be said in that day, Lo this is our God ; we have waited for Him and He will save us ; this is the Lord ; we have waited for Him, we will be glad and rejoice in His salvation." Salvation is likewise ascribed to the Sec. Advent, as e.g. Heb. 9 : 28, etc. 2. Then is verified the promise (Gen. 3 : 15) that "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head" (comp. Rom. 16 : 20 and Rev. 20 : 2, 3), Satan being bound, and the victory gained over him, all evil capable of injuring God's people is removed, and this freedom from Satanic power is an exultant portion of these Mill. descriptions. So complete, too, is the same that no sorrow, crying, etc., is to be experienced. 3. The world beholds a change of Princes. Compare e.g. John 14 : 30 with Rev. 11 : 15, when the sovereignty of this world is taken from "the Prince of this world" and given to Christ in open manifestation. 4. The original sovereign dominion over all given to Adam at Creation (Gen. 1 : 28) and forfeited by sin, is restored by the Second Adam (Ps. 8 : 6, comp. with Heb. 2 : 8 ; Dan. 7, etc.). 5. The judges and counsellors shall be restored as at first, Isa. 1 : 26 ; and they will be righteous, Isa. 32 : 1 ; Isa. 60 : 17 ; Jer. 30 : 21. 6. The righteous dead will be raised up, so that death is swallowed up in victory, Isa. 25, etc. 7. The saints shall participate in the dominion over the earth, Dan. 7 : 21, 22 ; Rev. 20 : 4 ; Isa. 32 : 1, etc. 8. This divine rule so entirely subjects the world that all enemies are destroyed, Zech. 14 ; Dan. 7, etc. 9. Christ is the King, Micah 4 : 1-7 ; Zech. 9 : 10, etc. 10. War will cease and universal peace be experienced, Isa. 2 ; Micah 4, etc. 11. There will be a general diffusion of revealed truth, Isa. 11 : 9 ; Isa. 25 : 7, etc. 12. Universal intelligence will characterize the people, Isa. 54 : 13 ; Jer. 31 : 34. 13. Holiness is remarkably exhibited in all, Isa. 60 : 21 ; Isa. 52 : 1 ; Zech. 14 : 21, 22. 14. The Jews are to be gathered from all places of their dispersion and enjoy their land of old, Isa. 11 ; Zech. 8, etc. 15. The Jews will be aided and joined by the Gentiles, Isa. 49 : 22 ; Ezek. 48 : 22, 23 ; Zech. 8 : 20-23, etc. 16. The Jewish nation sustains a pre-eminency, Micah 4 : 8 ; Zech. 12 : 6-9, etc. 17. The Jewish nation a great blessing to other nations, Zech. 8 : 13 ; Rom. 11 : 26, 27, etc. 18. Jerusalem shall be the metropolis, Zech. 14 : 17-21 ; Isa. 24 : 23, etc. 19. The Spirit is marvellously poured out, Ezek.

11 : 19 ; Joel 2 : 28-32, etc. 20. All things shall be used as consecrated to God, Zech. 14 : 20 ; Isa. 23 : 18, etc. 21. The Jewish nation no longer divided, Isa. 11 : 13, 14 ; Jer. 50 : 4, etc. 22. There will be an increase of revelation, Joel 2 : 28 ; Isa. 2 : 3, etc. 23. A mighty increase of population will be witnessed, Isa. 49 : 19, 20 ; Jer. 30 : 18-20, etc. 24. Great rejoicing and praise owing to restoration, Jer. 33 : 11 ; Isa. 51 : 3, etc. 25. Great prosperity evidencing increased progress in all that tends to promote the welfare and happiness of man, Zech. 8 : 12 ; Isa. 60, etc. 26. Jerusalem, rebuilt and the metropolis, shall never be destroyed, etc., Jer. 31 : 38-40 ; Joel 3 : 17, etc. 27. A renewal of earth will be experienced, Isa. 65 : 17 ; Isa. 66 : 22, etc. 28. Perfect union will exist, Isa. 52 : 8 ; Isa. 49 : 23, etc. 29. Riches will abound, Isa. 60 : 5, 9, 17, etc.<sup>1</sup> 30. There will be no famine, Ezek. 36 : 29-35, etc. 31. Sickness will be removed, Isa. 33 : 24, etc. 32. Happy old age, bride and bridegroom rejoicing, boys and girls playing, deaf, blind, lame, etc., restored, fear absent—in brief, all the blessings that mortal man can properly desire are embraced in these portrayals, Zech. 8 ; Isa. 35 ; Isa. 33, etc. All these things are directly, by the Prophets, assigned to this very period of time.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The reader will carefully notice how in view of such predictions the Jews were accustomed to call this period of the Messianic reign "the Salvation." This is an additional argument in our favor, seeing that the Apostles use the phrase just as the Jews did without explanation and refer it to the Sec. Advent. It would be interesting to see how this word "salvation" is employed by the prophets in connection with the restoration of the Davidic throne and Kingdom, or the Theocratic order, and then to point out how it was used in the Jewish sense before and after the death of Jesus, but our argument does not require it. So the word "Consolation," of which Farrar (Life of Christ, vol. 1, p. 22) says that "waiting for the Consolation of Israel" is equivalent to Mark 15 : 43, "waiting for the Kingdom of God," and that among the Jews a prayer for the Coming of the Messiah was, "May I see the Consolation of Israel."

<sup>2</sup> The nations, and especially the Jews, will enjoy the wealth accumulated and stored up by Gentile domination. Thus e.g. Prov. 13 : 22, "the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just," now rarely manifested, will be verified in the Jews (e.g. Zech. 14, etc.). All nations will honor the Theocracy with precious gifts as tokens of esteem and allegiance.

<sup>3</sup> Others might be specified, as (1) angelic communication restored, John 1 : 51 ; (2) long life characteristic even in the mortal state, Isa. 65 : 20-22 ; (3) removal of ignorance, Isa. 11 : 9 ; (4) a remarkable purity in God's service, Zeph. 3 : 9 ; (5) an astonishing comprehension of truth, both to convey instruction and receive it, Isa. 32 : 3, 4, 5 ; (6) the perpetuity of nature, as e.g. the enduring of the sun and moon, Ps. 72 : 5, 7, 17 ; Jer. 31 : 35, 36 ; (7) singing and music will be a prominent feature, as e.g. Isa. 35, 51, etc., and Rev. 15, etc. ; (8) astonishing changes in the light enjoyed, Isa. 30 : 26 and 60 : 19 ; (9) the removal of demoniacal possessions, of which the detailed statements of the New Test. present an earnest in the removal of hysteria, epilepsy, mania or raving madness (as to the present existence of the same, comp. e.g. Art. "Demonolatry, Devil Dancing, Demoniacal Possession," April, 1876, in the Eclectic Mag., taken from the Contemp. Review). Prop. 114 also gives a variety of Millennial results.

Obs. 3. But several particulars are, owing to their being so generally overlooked, worthy of more extended mention. 1. The fruitfulness of the land, Amos 9 : 13 ; Isa. 29 : 17 ; Ezek. 34 : 26, 27 ; Joel 3 : 18 ; Isa. 35 : 1-9 ; Hos. 2 : 21 ; Isa. 54 : 12, 13 ; Jer. 31 : 5, 6 ; Isa. 60 : 13-17 ; Zech. 8 : 12 ; Isa. 65 : 25 ; Ezek. 36 : 8, 29, 30, 35, etc. This has been the object of ridicule by some (and we might quote very unjust things ascribed to our view), just as if the earth in this respect was not now placed under a curse (Gen. 3 : 18, 19), as if such a deliverance from the curse were not desirable to man, and as if God had not by direct promises of renewal determined to bring back the land to the Eden-like state (Isa.

51 : 3) forfeited by sin. If this curse is not removed, then, as many theologians have well observed, one of the blessings forfeited is not restored, and Redemption in so far would be incomplete. The Bible, however, presents no such imperfect deliverance, and hence all reliable systems of theology have our feature, more or less prominently, in some way incorporated. The unfairness toward us is manifested by refusal in some to accept of the discrimination which we make, viz., that this fruitfulness, planting, etc., is designed for the nations in the flesh (which all Millenarians expressly teach), and persistently ascribing to our view, what we deny, viz., that all relating to this fruitfulness, culture of the earth, etc., is purposed for the glorified saints. 2. Great miracles will be performed at that time, Isa. 11 : 15, 16 ; Zech. 14 : 4 ; Isa. 27 : 12 ; Micah 7 : 15 ; Isa. 19 : 20 ; Micah 2 : 12, 13, etc. Indeed, the entire current of prediction impresses the idea that the most astounding, marvellous events shall be then witnessed—in the removal of enemies ; in the restoration of the Jews ; in the resurrection and glorification of saints ; in the uniting, as declared to Nathanael (John 1 : 51), of the heavenly with the earthly, so that the angels of God shall be seen ascending and descending ; in the fulfilment of the promise (John 14 : 12) that the believers of Christ shall perform the miraculous works of Jesus. Having shown that this Kingdom, in the nature of the case, demanded miraculous interference (Prop. 6), that the miracles of Christ are an earnest (Prop. 7) that these things are predicted, it can be readily seen that the persons engaged in this work, Jesus Christ and His associated glorified brethren, with the mighty angels, are abundantly able to verify all these predictions. Therefore, mighty and supernatural as the work is, our faith is constantly urged to steadfastness by the appeal that God will perform it, either directly or by imparting the ability. 3. The original grant of land to the Jews will then also be confirmed, Gen. 15 : 13–21 ; Ex. 23 : 31 ; Deut. 11 : 22, and extended. The boundaries given are the Mediterranean, the Nile and the Euphrates ; thus including places not before possessed. Some indeed (Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 12) think that in David's and Solomon's reign this was the extent, but others more accurately narrow their dominion in actual possession. Whatever may be the fact in reference to past fulfilment, three things are very evident, (a) that a portion was not held by the Jews, excepting by a precarious tributary arrangement ; (b) that it was only thus possessed for a short time, and hence is no ways commensurate with the promise ; (c) that the predictions relating to the future take it as a matter of course that at the future restoration this will be effected, seeing that all the covenant promises are then to be realized.<sup>1</sup> 4. In connection with the outward manifestation of the Kingdom, the Millennial predictions indicate the greatest outpouring and cultivation of the graces of the Spirit. Indeed, all spiritual blessings are included ; none that is desirable is excluded, for while not only an abundance of joy, peace, etc., in the Holy Ghost is given, others are added, by faith giving place to sight, hope to realization. All Millenarian writers of the early Church, as well as modern, have held to the spirituality connected with this Kingdom, and freely expressed their hopes of "communion and unity of spiritual things with the holy angels" (Irenæus), etc.* 5. The New Jerusalem blessings,

---

* Vide the well-merited rebuke that Dr. Seiss gives to Corrodi, Seyffarth, and others, in Appendix, Last Times, note E, p. 335.

the blessings of the restoration, etc., are inseparably connected in the Millennial descriptions. This is readily seen by comparing e.g. Isa., chs. 25, or 54, or 60, with Rev. 21 and 22. God has thus joined them together, and we cannot, without violence, separate them. But this will be explained hereafter. 6. The Kingdom itself will be a great blessing over the earth, being designed for this very purpose. There is a beautiful representation of this in Ps. 65, where, after declaring that God will answer the prayer of His people "by terrible things in righteousness," He will then enrich the earth "with the river of God which is full of water" (river being representative of Kingdom—thus used) so that "the year" (viz., "the year of the redeemed," Isa. 63 : 4, i.e. the Sabbatical year) is "crowned with goodness" and the earth with "fatness." 7. Language itself has been corrupted by sin, for the confusion of tongues and consequent dispersion of mankind followed (Gen. 11) an exhibition of pride and arrogance ; it is therefore reasonable to suppose that an era which is again to bind the nations together and to bring them, through representatives, etc., to a central point of union and worship, should restore the forfeited unity of language. This seems to be intimated in Zeph. 3 : 9 ; Isa. 32 : 4, etc. At least, we have a significant instance given (Acts 2 : 4) which shows, that as the Spirit is also marvellously poured out in this period, He can impart what power He pleases over the use of language. 8. Taking the language in its literal aspect, there appears to be described the intervention of miraculous power in behalf of diseases, as e.g. even so obscure an allusion as Isa. 53 : 4, 5, is quoted Matt. 8 : 17 as applicable to the removal of bodily infirmities. Having such a warrant, the plainer predictions can scarcely be applied in any other manner. 9. Christ "shall be a priest upon His throne," Zech. 6 : 13, being a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek (Ps. 110 : 4). This is essential to our faith in order to preserve the consistency of the design of this Kingdom over the nations of the earth. Hence all Millenarians accept of it as a cardinal point in their system over against the Popish view, which makes this priesthood to cease at the end of this age. 10. A materialistic element pervades the Millennial descriptions, chiefly confined to the Jewish and Gentile nations, and the earth. This is the rock upon which so many strike, regarding it inconsistent with the future state of the righteous, etc. Aside from what we have stated concerning the humanity of Jesus, how the Kingdom is promised to David's Son, evincing His continued humanity, although glorified—aside from the continued humanity of the saints (although also glorified), and their reign here on earth, it is sufficient for the present to say, that if the Millennial predictions lacked this materialistic feature, a very important and essential one would be missing in Redemption. Is it not true, that the materialistic Eden was forfeited by sin, that man, composed of soul, spirit, and body, is fallen under the curse, that a material creation groans under the same ; and is it not also true that if there is no deliverance of this material portion, Redemption in so far is incomplete ? Extremes are here to be avoided ; gross materialism on the one hand, and a general or universal spiritualism on the other. If God pronounced a material Eden very good ; if it is linked with the most glorious period of Christ's reign ; if it is united with the highest spiritual good ; if it has been assumed by God Himself to bring Himself condescendingly in contact with humanity, then surely we ought to be guarded, lest in ultra-spiritualism or in ultra-materialism we mar the truth of God, bring reproach upon His work, and diminish the perfection of Redemption.*

<sup>1</sup> Let the student compare the promises e.g. Gen. 15 : 18 ; Ex. 23 : 31 ; Deut. 11 : 24 ; Josh. 1 : 3, 4, with what was actually possessed, and then with those predictions relating to the future, and it is self-evident that in view of the sinfulness of the nation and the withdrawal of the Theocratic Kingdom this grant is held also in abeyance until the future restoration of the nation under One who is infinitely superior to Joshua, David, and Solomon. Even in such passages as Isa. 26 : 15, this enlargement of the land is predicated on the then increase of the nation. Our version (according to Barnes, Lowth, Noyes, Alexander, etc.) goes not give the force of the original, and hence they read : " Thou hast increased the nation, O Lord, Thou hast increased the nation ; Thou art glorified ; Thou hast extended far all the borders of the land." Barnes (Com. loci) remarks : " The parallelism requires this construction, and it is indeed the obvious one." So Delitzsch : " Thou hast added to the nation, O Jehovah, hast added to the nation ; glorified Thyself ; moved out all the borders of the land."

<sup>2</sup> Several additional features may be briefly mentioned (1) In Isa. 4 : 5 we find that there will be exhibited a visible manifestation of " the glory of the Lord" over the houses and the religious assemblies of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, somewhat similar to that which accompanied the Israelites in their journey from Egypt. " And the Lord will create (afford or furnish) upon every dwelling place of Mount Zion, and upon her assemblies, a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night : for upon all the glory shall be a defence ;" or Delitzsch rendering : " And Jehovah creates over every spot of Mount Zion, and over its festal assemblies, a cloud by day, and smoke and the shining of flaming fire by night : over all the glory comes a canopy." This is indicative of God's constant presence, abiding care and protection. Surely a people thus constantly honored by the visible tokens of God's favor and blessing must be joyful and happy. (2) The curse entailed (Gen. 3 : 16) in child-bearing will be removed. Fausset (Com., Isa. 65 : 23) says : " bring forth for trouble—literally, for terror, i.e. they shall not bring forth children for a sudden death (Lev. 26 : 16 ; Jer. 15 : 8)." Delitzsch : " nor bring forth for sudden disaster ;" or Alexander : " for distressing solicitude," etc. ; Sep. " for the curse." The writer is satisfied—from the general analogy of deliverance—that it includes more, viz., deliverance from the pains incident to child-birth. What a vast relief to the family relation, now, alas, so often and terribly anguished, even under the most skilful of attendance. The student will pardon a brief digression on this point. In 1 Tim. 2 : 15 we read, " she shall be saved in child-bearing." Those who reject the early Church view of " the restitution," including also that of the race, utterly fail to receive the significance of this passage. Not observing that Paul had just reminded Timothy of the fall of Adam and Eve, and of the curse entailed, and losing the connection and force of the " nevertheless," they, not knowing what to do with the passage (for their system contains no redemption or restitution of the race, as a race), refer it to the present period. But in this application they are undecided ; some referring it simply to " the maternal relation" or " the duties of a mother ;" others, to the " education" or " proper training of children ;" some, to " evincing a wifely disposition and subjection ;" others, that a child-bearing woman is consoled, that even in her suffering, if she bears her trial with a proper spirit, having faith and holiness, she will be saved ; and others, that the woman shall be saved through, or by means of, bearing a child, viz., the Messiah. But all this is evidently not the obvious meaning of " child-bearing," referring to child-bearing in general, from or in which the woman is to be, in some way, saved. Let us keep in view that there is a " restitution of all things" promised, and that this embraces a restoration to all forfeited blessings. If Eve had not fallen, the special curse entailed upon her sex would not have resulted ; maternity would not have been conditioned by the pain and suffering now, more or less, attached to it. In Gen. 3 : 16 it is stated, " Unto the woman He said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception ; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children." No piety, no faith, charity, or holiness exempts from this doom ; the most devoted and godly have fallen victims to the burden of love so tenderly awaited. To this curse the Apostle undoubtedly refers, but then, in view of the doctrine of the " restitution," which he so ably presents in Rom. 8, etc. (and with which Timothy was familiar), he, with one of his rapid transitions of thought, adds, " nevertheless," i.e. notwithstanding this curse resulting from transgression, she—the woman—shall be saved from it in child-bearing. If there is a restitution of the race to Edenic condition, the woman shall not only be saved from dying, but from the ills now pertaining to it. The event now so anxiously awaited, often with dread and pain, and, alas, too often resulting in agony, death, and intensest grief, will then be one anticipated with calm confidence, beaming hope and joy. Let no one feel that the condition annexed of " continuing in faith, and charity, and holiness, with sobriety," is opposed to such a view, for precisely such conditions are attached to some of the most splendid of Millennial predictions, as e.g. Isa. 65 : 20 ; Zech. 14 : 16-19, etc. For, such a deliverance, we are positively assured, shall only, when the time has arrived, be awarded to those women who are pious, having faith, charity, and holiness. To the early Christians, this language to Timothy was sufficiently explicit ; now the loss of faith in "the blessed hope," and the results of its realization, darken it. (3) The prophetic spirit, the guidance of visions and dreams (Joel 2 : 28) shall characterize the general diffusion of the Spirit, thus indicating how old and young, male and female, shall be under the highest spiritual influences, and how varied the gifts and experiences of the coming age. Men now may ridicule the dreams and visions recorded in the Bible, but to reflecting minds they are of deep interest, evincing to us by earnests vouchsafed, how even with the unglorified the chasm between the visible and invisible, the material and spiritual, can thus be bridged by a special provision. (4) The supernatural punishment of Gentile families, as recorded in Zech. 14 : 16-19, shows that a Theocratic ordering has superseded the Ch. dispensation. In the very nature of the case it implies that One is now at the head of rule, who has power over nature, and will direct and wield her in the interests of His government. (5) "Greybeard" (Graff), in his Lay Sermons, No. 38, "The Arts and Sciences in the Millennium," presents a pleasing picture of that age. Various writers refer to the increase of knowledge, etc. This may be said : (a) that under the rulership of Christ and the saints, the increased duration of mortal life, the removal of the curse, etc., the race can only advance, and that no limit can be assigned to the wonderful increase of knowledge ; and (b) that taking the exalted descriptions of the Millennial age, the whole, in view of abundance, happiness, etc., impresses one with the idea that the race is correspondingly elevated in progress in all directions. The knowledge, improvements, inventions, discoveries, etc., of former ages will be adapted to promote the glory of this coming one. The telegraph, steam, printing, telephone, a thousand other things, will be increased in efficiency ; other powers and appliances now lying dormant, or vainly sought after, will be brought into requisition, so that the people of all lands shall be in daily and friendly intercourse—that transportation shall be speedy and safe—that labor shall be reduced, man being more required to superintend the labor that knowledge affords through the use and agency of natural powers than to apply his own strength—that the whole world will be bound together, made instantly accessible, and realizing a community of interest. (6) The binding of Satan does not necessarily involve a total cessation of sin throughout the whole earth, for sin (Isa. 65 and Zech. 14, etc.) will exist to some extent, which by various writers is explained as the result of natural depravity. As this binding is allied with the deceiving of nations and not of individuals, it would perhaps be more in accordance with the spirit of prediction to confine this binding to a preventing of Satan obtaining sway over nations or organized bodies (for after his release this again is accomplished), or receiving the dominion of the earth as in the great Gentile monarchies—thus restraining the power once exercised, so that no injury can be inflicted upon the Theocratic State and Church. The binding, therefore, is to be considered in relation to the dominion formerly accorded in government of nations, and the removal of such power from him. How much more we dare to press this binding is not clear to the writer ; and more is not really required to fill out the Millennial portraiture of blessedness, and at the same time allow—as intimated in some predictions—a continued existence of sin, at first in the Jewish nation, and to some extent continued among individuals in Gentile nations. The grand feature developed by this binding is simply this : that no Satanic influence is capable of raising up a serious conflict, or extended organization against the Messianic Kingdom, or endanger to any extent the safety, worship, happiness, etc., of believers, until in God's good pleasure, to each man a final and enduring lesson of Divine judgment and power, liberty is again given to Satan to make the last trial. Satan himself cannot move in this matter until God permits.* (7) But we must not forget that of one people an exception will be made

---

* Brown (Ch. Sec. Coming, p. 2, ch. 7) strongly objects to "a total cessation of Satanic influence" during the Mill. era, on the ground that the binding of Satan—as various commentators have pointed out—only denote that he shall be utterly unable "to form a public party against Christ," etc. We do not object to this view, in its bearing on the mortal race, and as indicative that Satan will not then, as now, have states, kingdoms, large bodies, etc., under his influence. For aught we know the extent of this binding may extend farther. However this may be, one thing is clearly taught by the Scriptures, that Brown's view in connection is erroneous, viz., that this binding of Satan will be performed by the Church through existing instrumentalities. The simple fact that at the close of this dispensation the Church will be terribly persecuted, Antichrist vic-

(which, after the little season and crushing overthrow of the last confederation, will be ultimately true of all on earth), viz., of the Jewish nation. The expressions of universality, "all shall be righteous," all, from the least unto the greatest, shall know God, etc., refer to this nation. By a comparison of Scripture statement we find that it will require some time to consummate (Isa. 65), but when accomplished Judah and Israel, united in one, shall always be faithful. They are represented as loyal to the very last, when others waver in their allegiance (Zech. 14; Rev. 20, etc.). The nearness of this nation to the King, its high and noble Theocratic position, its great blessedness, its past remembrances and history as a nation—all will bind it with unswerving devotion to the Theocracy. The predictions, therefore, assert the perpetuity of the nation in favor, holiness, etc., and that the holiness shall eventually include all.* (8) Something may be said respecting death in the Mill. age. A comparison of Scripture seems to teach the following: (a) A perfect exhibition of "death being swallowed up in victory" (Isa. 25: 8) will be manifested in the resurrected and glorified saints; (b) some will die in the Mill. age (comp. Isa. 65: 20; Jer. 31: 29-30); (c) but these passages seem to make death a resultant of sinning—as also in case of Gentiles, Zech. 14: 18—for Jeremiah's statement is positive, and so likewise is Isaiah in one phrase (Fausset, Com., Isa. 65: 20, explains "the sinner that dieth at a hundred years shall be deemed accursed," i. e. "his death at so early an age, which in those days the hundredth year will be regarded, just as if it were mere childhood, shall be deemed the effect of God's special visitation in wrath"); (d) an exception seems to be made by Isaiah (65: 20) in the clause: "for the child shall die a hundred years old" (or "for the youth in it will die as one a hundred years old")—now if this clause is not to be united to the next one as explanatory of it, then we are assured that death is so limited in its power that there will be no dying in infancy, but life will be so protracted that whosoever dies at a hundred years of age will be regarded as a child or youth; (e) in view of weeping, sorrow, the veil of mourning being removed from the nations, death will be stripped of his terrors; (f) if we keep in view the fact, that the Millennial age is an advance—an immense one—in the direction of restoring the race to its former paradisiacal state, it is not unreasonable to anticipate, as numerous writers have asserted, that many, even multitudes, of the righteous will never experience death, being in old age, or at some period of life, suddenly translated; (g) the repeal of the curse in the practical working and efficiency of the Theocratic ordering, the accessibility to the tree of life and to the leaves destined for the healing of the nations, impresses the student with the idea that death itself may be removed to a vast extent; (h) but, however death may be limited in his power over man, the Scriptures decidedly affirm that death itself shall not be utterly destroyed until after the Mill. age, and after the little season has expired, Rev. 20: 14. It follows, therefore, that this work of entirely abolishing death from the earth is a gradual work; the glorious beginning being seen in the immortal saints, next in the wonderful deliverances of the Jewish nation, next in the astounding blessings bestowed upon the nations rendering allegiance, and lastly in the final outcome, when all wickedness (the entail of death) is forevermore crushed.

Obs. 4. Take all these particulars (others will hereafter be mentioned in detail), and see how they are identified with the Kingdom of God as it torious, and Satan successful in his endeavors, making a Divine intervention imperative, is amply sufficient to show that the Church instead of binding Satan is herself fearfully oppressed.

---

* Brown (Ch. Sec. Coming, p. 306), seeking objections to our doctrine, says, that the phrase in relation to the new heavens and new earth "in which dwelleth righteousness," means "an absolute, unmixed righteousness" over the whole earth, and consequently is inconsistent with our ideas concerning the Mill. era, which demand a more gradual work, and ultimately the rising up of Gog and Magog. But (1) in the "New Heavens and New Earth" denoting (see Props. on) the actual extent and sway of the Theocratic rule, we do show that righteousness dwells in the King, rulers, subjects, form of government, etc.; (2) that righteousness is visibly manifested as dwelling on the earth, and that ultimately in the final outcome is universal; (3) that the rising of Gog and Magog has, owing to sudden and perpetual overthrow, no perceptible influence on the polity instituted; (4) that God's account of the New Heavens, etc., is to be received (e.g. Isa. 65: 17-25) in preference to man's deductions; (5) that to build a theory on an isolated phrase, torn from its connection, leads to contradiction, as e.g. in the account of the Church, some passages teaching righteousness, others a mixed condition, etc.

shall exist in the future. Receiving the Divine utterances and placing them together, it is found that a glorious Redemption is to be experienced at that time. Before this era is entered into, these blessings cannot be realized ; and therefore we find in the predictions relating to this present age or dispensation no such forfeited blessings are restored. This is seen in numerous instances. Thus e.g. the parables of the tares and net indicate it ; the prophecy of Jesus in Matt. 24, which gives an epitome of Jewish history to the ending of the times of the Gentiles, and to the Advent, has no such Millennium introduced ; in the reply of Paul to the Thessalonians respecting the nearness of the Advent of Jesus he gives, as a distinctive intervening mark, the spirit and continued progress of the Apostasy and Antichrist, but no Millennial era ; the prophet Daniel delineates Gentile domination as existing down to the Coming of the Son of Man followed by Millennial dominion, etc., which was not verified at the First Advent, seeing that the same domination continued after that Advent and still continues. So carefully does the Spirit corroborate our position, that in no case, chronologically or in any other way, is the least encouragement given to anticipate the re-bestowal of forfeited blessings anterior to the ushering in of this Kingdom, and accompanying Millennial bliss, by the Advent of Jesus Christ.

Obs. 5. The folly of making the Millennial era one that is past. The theory of Grotius, Prideaux, Vint, Bush, etc., which dates the beginning of this age from the overthrow of Paganism under Constantine (A.D. 323) ; that of Hengstenberg and others, dating it from Charlemagne (A.D. 800), that of Popish doctors ascribing its rise to the preaching or death of Christ, to the destruction of Jerusalem, etc. ; in brief, all theories that locate this period in the past do so by a palpable violation of the order laid down in Scripture, and of facts in history, which cannot by any fair interpretation be made to accord with a fulfilment of prediction.* Therefore it happens, that the ablest writers in opposition to our views frankly concede that the Millennial era is still future. Thus e.g. Fairbairn (On Prophecy, p. 432) unhesitatingly places it in the future, and regards "as utterly futile all the attempts that have been made to accommodate the terms of the description to any period in the past." This is emphatically true, for during the past no such blessings as the Millennial descriptions portray have been realized ; persecution, trial, suffering, etc., have, more or less, characterized the Church's history. Even if we confine ourselves to the statement in Rev. 20 : 1-7 (which is only a very small portion of the whole), the world has never yet witnessed such a binding of Satan, such a restraint of his influences and power, such an exemption of nations from his deception, such a resurrection and reigning with Christ, such a resurrection of the rest of the dead, etc., as is therein described. Simple truth requires us to say, that any one who can ascribe to an era of time swarming with heresies, outrages against truth, superstitions the most vile, etc., the characteristics of predicted Millennial blessedness, whatever his ability and learning, must certainly be fettered and prejudiced by * Vide Shimeall's I Will Come Again, who examines in detail this theory of Grotius, etc., also Außerlen's rebuke of Hengstenberg, Fairbairn On Prop., Lange's Com., etc., also how R. Catholics understood it may be found, notably Mosheim's Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 130 and note (which some ignorantly or designedly have charged to our account).

---

some system which makes such a revolting transposition necessary. And the application of prophecy in this direction is sufficient evidence that the system of interpretation which fosters it is radically wrong.

Obs. 6. The same is true of the theory which ascribes this Millennial period to the present dispensation. For it only requires a survey of the blessings connected with this era, and two things follow: (1) that they cannot possibly be realized in this dispensation by the use of present instrumentalities, seeing that to produce them demands superadded power, etc.; (2) that such Millennial happiness is inconsistent with the predicted state of the Church and of the world during the existence of this period down to the ending of it. How can we reconcile e.g. the mixed condition, state of suffering, war, etc., expressly affirmed to be characteristics of this dispensation to its very close, with the purity, freedom from evil, peace, etc., of the promised Millennium?

Obs. 7. This also teaches the absurdity of totally ignoring the subject, as if it were a species of exaggerated human prediction. It is true, that such an era, "a golden age," has been desired by man in various ages. Writers quote Plato, Plutarch, Virgil, Seneca, Chinese ancient books, Persian Magi, Mexicans, etc., even including rude and uncultivated nations, Indians and barbarians, who either locate such an era in the past or in the future, and from this argue that it is a sentiment common to man, and that the Bible falls into the same general current of uninspired desire. But they forget the great and unmeasurable difference between these heathen utterances and that of the Word of God. The former are disconnected, incoherent, individual expressions, often obscure, etc., while the latter forms part of a regular system, maintains a consistent and regular connection in it, is necessary to the Divine Plan of Redemption, and is given in an unbroken prediction from the earliest to the latest prophets. The Bible would be incomplete without it. For, beginning with the fall of man and revealing the manner of man's recovery from the results of such a fall, it ends appropriately with a restoration of the forfeited blessings. Besides this, the truthfulness of its Millennial predictions is abundantly verified by ten thousand incidentals, which have been, and are, experienced in the unfolding of the Divine Purpose tending toward the ultimate fulfilment. Thus e.g. the history and present condition of the Jewish nation; the times of the Gentiles; the rise, progress, etc., of other nations, as Persian, Grecian, Roman, Turkish, etc.; the calling of the Gentiles; the Christian Church in its conflicts; the personal experience of believers, etc.—all these, and more, are so many corroborating evidences and testimonies that distinguish the Bible Millennium from all others, seeing that the same prophets also have predicted all these. God has not left Himself without witness; and it is only by persistently closing our eyes to existing facts, prophesied thousands of years ago, that we can escape God's manifested interest in sustaining our faith. To deny all this requires about as much assurance and love of singularity as it did in the philosophers who, against their senses and laws of being, denied the existence of an external world.

Obs. 8. Now let the reader consider: 1. What would this earth have become if Adam had not fallen? The answer, as given by Scripture and repeated in various theological systems, is this: it would have had no curse entailed, bringing in its train unfruitfulness, evils, sorrow, and death. It would have had the world under a Theocratic ordering, by which man would have been elevated and blessed, having direct nearness to his beneficent Ruler, etc. 2. Now look at the Millennial blessings enumerated, to be realized here on earth during the Messianic reign in the restored Theocratic Kingdom, and is there a single blessing that we can conceive of as intended for man unfallen, and which was forfeited by sin, that is not mentioned to be then realized? If the Millennium embraces "Redemption," "Salvation," and the Messiah is One that can perform His work perfectly, this is precisely the condition that we ought reasonably to anticipate. The very fact that the Millennium itself contains such inestimable blessings, honor, and glory, such a revelation of Divine majesty and goodness, such an ample deliverance from all evil and even death, such a restoration to God's favor and nearness in Theocratic ordering, is sufficient evidence that our doctrinal position is impregnable. The unity of the Word, running from the fall to the Sec. Advent, demands, prompted by covenants and promise, impelled by the plain grammatical and God-given sense, this belief, so dear to the hearts of the martyrs of the early Church.

PROPOSITION 120. This Kingdom with its Millennial blessings can only be introduced through the power of God in Christ Jesus.

This is evinced by the Propositions preceding ; for the blessings are of such a nature that to produce them requires supernatural aid. Hence the introduction of this Kingdom with its attendant felicity, etc., is directly ascribed by the sacred writers to God or to His Son, Jesus Christ.

The Millennial predictions are descriptive of the results flowing from the Messiah and His Kingdom. The two are united, and the disciples had therefore a pertinent question in Acts 1 : 6, for it evinces that Jesus must first restore the Kingdom before the realization of Covenant and prophecy. Jesus, as we have shown, by His wonderful miracles, His "works" and "signs," evidenced His ability to verify Covenant and prophecy. No one of our opponents has yet ventured to show how present instrumentalities can introduce e.g. the realization of Isa., chs. 65, 66, 60, etc.

Obs. 1. That Christ is the Introducer of the Millennial era is so abundantly asserted by the Prophets that a large number of writers, opposed to our view, still admit that Christ must come at this period spiritually in extraordinary power. Later writers finding the older spiritualistic opinions untenable, now (as e.g. Fairbairn, On Proph., pp. 469-471) frankly declare that the glory, etc., is so great and universal that extraordinary adjuncts and manifestations and gifts must be bestowed to affect it, thus confessing that the present means and instrumentalities are ineffective to produce it ; and acknowledging that, by such additions, a dispensation, to all intent and purpose, in some respects different from the present one will be inaugurated. This is done too after spiritualizing the resurrection and many other blessings ; how then must the matter be regarded if we allow a literal resurrection, reign, etc.—in brief, the blessings enumerated, to ensue at this time? It is utterly impossible to ascribe their reception to any other power than the direct intervention of King Jesus. It is a matter of surprise that one class of our opponents, such as Prof. Stuart, do not see that the confession that Rev. 20 : 1-7 teaches a literal resurrection, in the very nature of the case demands, in order to effect it, the personal Coming of Christ, or, at least, His direct intervention. Indeed, there is scarcely a blessing described but such is the amplitude of it, that we know from other Scripture that it cannot be realized until the Advent of Jesus. Thus to illustrate : take the order, peace, subjection of nations portrayed, and it is found that no such order, peace, etc., is to be found on earth until the Coming of Christ, for even preceding it, and at the Advent, nations shall be arrayed against the truth. In the "Prize Peace Essays and Congress of Nations," Micah 4 : 3, is quoted and the assertion made that "the Gospel of peace" will accomplish the removal of war, restore peace, etc. But that is opposed to the spirit of the same chapter, for in the verse quoted we find that instead of the Gospel affecting this result it is done in the following manner: "He shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off," and this when (v. 7) "the Lord shall reign in Mt. Zion"—when the Jews (v. 6) are restored—when the nations that are to be judged are gathered (v. 11) against Zion—and when "many people (v. 13) are to be beaten in pieces." Against such testimony in the context, which becomes overwhelming when compared with parallel passages, it is in vain to protest; it must be reverently received as of God's ordering. Hence, although materially differing in our view from Maurice, yet we can cordially accept of the title which he gives to one of his sermons: "Christ, not Christianity, the deliverance of mankind." How can the Covenant with David be possibly realized without David's Son personally comes to fulfil it? How can the Kingdom be manifested before the Coming of the King and the exertion of His power and will? How can the associated rulers with Him exercise the honorable prerogative of reigning with Him unless they are raised from the dead according to promise? In brief, all depends on that Second Advent and its resultant accompaniments.

The student will observe that one of the latest writers against our doctrine, Dr. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming), makes many concessions in our favor (as e.g. the importance of Sec. Advent, duty of looking for it, etc.) that he is forced by his own position (p. 27-29) to a kind of ignoring of the Millennium (saying: "I attach no importance to the precise period of a thousand years," etc.), constituting its beginning and ending obscure, uncertain, and unascertainable—"all being outwardly unchanged." It is a matter of astonishment that any one can be forced by the pressure of a theory into so untenable an attitude, seeing that—in the light of a thousand predictions (Isa. chs. 65, 66; Rev. 20:1-4, etc.) the introduction of specific blessings, marvellous changes, glorious Redemption, etc.—the Millennial era is presented to us as one that is so recognizable by the stupendous events connected with it (as e.g. the destruction of enemies, the exaltation of the saints, etc.) that all men shall be compelled to acknowledge the same to the praise and glory of God and His Christ. A doctrine that must be sustained by dwarfing and obscuring the Millennial predictions is certainly defective and unreliable. And then when thus lessened in preciousness, he seeks to have the Millennial predictions verified by existing means and agencies, introducing his favorite leaven and mustard-seed theory (without attempting to reconcile these with the parables of the tares and drag net, etc.) to prove that "not a new element is added." Dr. Schmucker (Pop. Theol., p. 343-361) thinks the Word of God, that is, the Gospel and its preaching, with prayer, revivals, and missions, will perform all this, but how purely moral agencies can accomplish a work introducing the Millennial blessings, he utterly fails to inform us. So Wild (The Lost Ten Tribes, p. 153) declares in reference to Acts 3:21 (comp. Prop. 144) that the restoration occurs first and then Jesus comes, thus violating the entire analogy of Scripture on the subject. He says: "If things are not now restored or reconciled, or in order, why, then, Christ cannot come. He will not come to put them in order; this He has left for and with the Church to do, and has promised to be with His Church to the end." Alas! if our hopes depend on the Church, that itself shall be terribly persecuted and depressed.

Obs. 2. The multitude of writers, who so persistently proclaim that the Kingdom and Millennial blessedness shall be introduced by present existing instrumentalities, are in direct opposition to Scripture. This theory will receive attention in another place (Prop. 175), and requires no special refutation here, seeing that our entire argument, as well as detached portions of it, refute its pretentious claims. It is simply amazing how pious, devoted, and able men have fallen under the influence of a theory, which causes even a very recent writer, Talmage (quoted by the Wittenberger of Nov., 1873), to say: "The way to the Millennium is through the fit and full education of woman. Social, political, and religious progress is conditioned upon her advancement," etc. This may be regarded as an extreme opinion, but the truth is, that any view that ascribes the realization of those precious predictions to any other power than that delineated so faithfully and minutely by the Prophets, is extreme and equally repulsive to the truth.

Vaticanism has its dream of universal sovereignty and its Millennial glory (although wherever its principles were tested, Millennial blessedness was never even initiated); education, non-sectarian or compulsory, has been advocated as the grand agent of the future Millennium (although the kingdoms in Europe, and the States here, which have experimented in that direction have ameliorated no evils); a hundred favorite schemes by their various enthusiastic advocates are presented as the unailing instrumentality by which Millennial happiness is to be secured (although not one has succeeded in lessening the sorrow-abiding hold of the curse one particle); even Christian philanthropy (as e.g. The Christian Philanthropist, or Harbinger of the Millennium, by Wm. Cogswell), noble in its efforts to lessen the griefs, etc., of suffering humanity, is urged as the all-powerful, efficient agent (although charity in its highest efforts has never yet succeeded in loosening a single bond that fetters poor humanity). Unbelief comes and tells us (so e.g. Fiske in Outlines of Cosmetic Philosophy) "that the ultimate salvation of mankind is to be wrought out solely by that obedience to the religious instinct which urges the individual, irrespective of utilitarian considerations, to live in conformity with nature's requirements" (although the curse, entailed by sin, is so firmly fixed by the laws of nature that the most pious as well as the most abandoned fall in consecutive generations under its power, and unbelief teaches that these laws are forever unchangeable). Glasgow (Com., Rev. p. 499) says, in advocacy of his spiritualistic view: "It is not possible by any rational mode of interpretation to evade the conclusion that the Millennial reign of Christ is the Gospel age." Now, if he, or any other man, can point out how present means and agencies are to introduce the Salvation, the blessings, of the Millennial age as predicted, then he has some foundation for his "rational mode of interpretation." If the Gospel in the past, if the most eminent piety and devotion, has not removed the ill incident to life, how will it do this in the future.

Obs. 3. It is saddening to find how far this denial of the necessity of Christ's Second Coming for purposes of Salvation is carried in our Theological literature. Men who would shrink from any impeachment of orthodoxy, or denial of truth, array themselves against Covenant promise under the misguiding influence of supposed developed truth. Thus to illustrate: In the excellent Quarterly Review for Jan., 1874, in a one-sided Art., which totally ignores the expressed views of the confessors, the following bold assertion is made: "Christ's power to bless and save His people and protect them against the devil and sin is not in His Coming again on earth, but in His session at the right hand of God and His power there in their behalf," etc. How such language can be employed in the face of scriptural authority, is a matter of surprise. The reader can readily test the trustworthiness of the declaration by referring to these facts: (1) that His Coming is for Salvation, to complete Redemption, Heb. 9:28; Luke 21:27, 28; Rom. 8:19-23; Eph. 4:30, etc.; (2) to raise the dead, 1 Thess. 4:14, 16, etc.; (3) to change the living, 1 Cor. 15:42-44, 51-54, etc.; (4) to invest with dominion (Prop. 154); (5) to remove the wicked, His enemies, 2 Thess. 2:8-11, etc.; (6) to deliver the Jewish nation (Prop. 111, etc.); (7) to relieve creation, Rom. 8:19-21, etc.; (8) in brief, to introduce the numerous blessings which our argument evolves. It is certainly sufficient, in order to prevent our accepting such contradictory utterances, to know that He comes for Salvation; and that that Coming is represented to be the most efficacious in removing sin and overcoming Satan.

It is sufficient to append an additional illustration : Dr. Schmucker (Pop. Theol., p. 348, etc.) indorses the popular view that the Millennium is to be introduced by the conversion of the world through present existing means (which he says "are amply sufficient"), and enters into a calculation how soon this can be accomplished. (This view is amply met and refuted under Prop. 175.) But in this discussion he overlooks two things : (1) that the Bible delineation of this dispensation down to the Sec. Advent, in continued wickedness, war, suffering, trial, persecution, etc., forbids such a calculation to be recognized ; and (2) that he only takes one feature of the Millennial era, viz., the worship of God and obedience rendered to Him, leaving out of the account other features embraced in the same period that mere moral agencies can never remove. This then is taking a one-sided view of the subject ; and yet this method is, unreflectingly, followed by a multitude of able men. The father of Dr. Schmucker (Rev. Dr. J. G. Schmucker), in his Exp. of Rev., is far more scriptural when he teaches, as preparatory to its introduction, the direct supernatural intervention of God in and through Jesus Christ. To take e.g. Isa., chs. 60-66, and apply them to the Church in its present agencies and use of means, is an effort that can only succeed by grossly spiritualizing (i.e. adding another sense to the one given in the text) the same, or else to regard the predictions as Oriental exuberance and exaggeration, which require considerable toning down to meet favor with modern ideas.

Obs. 4. On the other hand, it is refreshing to see even some of our most unrelenting opponents acknowledge the force of Scripture representation to the extent that they also make the Sec. Advent the most desirable object of hope, ascribing to it, as the Spirit does, divine purposes of Salvation. Thus e.g. Brown (Christ's Sec. Com., chs. 1 and 2) frankly admits that Christ's Sec. Coming is "the blessed hope" of the Church—that it is "the polar star" of faith—strenuously opposing the view so prevalent that Christ comes at death, by showing, (1) that the death of the believer is grievous ; (2) that the salvation without Sec. Advent is incomplete ; (3) and that we otherwise dislocate Scripture, etc. Thus also let the reader refer to Barnes (Com., Phil. 3 : 20), and he will find this Coming again eulogized as "a glorious truth," necessary unto salvation, "identified with all our hopes," exerting blessed influences as in the early Church, etc. And, what is even hostile to their own system, seeing that they put off this Advent to the distant future, to a period after the Millennium, they exhort believers to look for it, pray for it, etc. In looking over commentaries, many of them express, under passages relating to the Advent, the duty of regarding the amelioration of the world, etc., as dependent on Christ's Coming, and not on earthly systems, existing means, etc., and yet when turning to Scripture portraying the restitution of forfeited blessings not a word is said concerning Christ's Coming to perform the work, but much is stated respecting the Church's power to accomplish the same. If it were a pleasant task, hundreds of contradictions, some the most flagrant, could be produced. Surely a system of interpretation that so freely fosters the same must be unreliable.

Obs. 5. It is objected by unbelievers that the notion that some great Saviour is to come to restore all things, is found in other religions beside the Christian. Thus e.g. Clarke (Ten Religions, p. 204, Alger's Doc. of Fut. Life, Kurtz, Sac. His., p. 273, etc.) shows that in the system of Zoroaster mention is made of a future Restorer or Saviour, who is expected to come at the end of the age, restore the dead by a resurrection, and introduce a Kingdom of untroubled happiness, etc. It is of little consequence how this idea was suggested and introduced (some contending that it sprung from original communications made by God, others that it originated with man himself, etc.), for it evidences, what was observed previously, that man feels the utter inability of existing causes to produce such a restitution, and therefore, owing to the inadequacy of present means and instrumentalities, falls back upon the supernatural. This feeling, as we have seen, is general, and naturally arises from reflection, and a desire to secure deliverance.

The natural man feels the sad pressure of the curse and looks around for redemption, and as he cannot have hope in nature, he grasps after the supernatural. Figuer (The To-morrow of Death, p. 13) declares that "the physical conditions of earthly life are truly detestable," and pronounces "the moral conditions" the same, owing to the existence of disease, suffering, death, grief, guilt, etc., and seeks refuge in Gnostic ideas modernized. Harriet Martineau (Art. "Realism in Unbelief," Littell's Liv. Age, May 5th, 1877), who anticipated personal annihilation, and who believed that the Cause of the Universe was "wholly out of the sphere of human attributes," yet still predicted that "the special destination of my race is infinitely nobler than the highest proposed under a scheme of divine government—" but how this prophecy was to be realized under the alleged unchangeable laws of nature she fails to tell us; or, how it could possibly be superior to the biblical conception, with the Supernatural controlling natural law and making it beneficent, she leaves untold. (Indeed, she is often contradictory, for in her Autobiography (Littell, May 26th, 1877, p. 471) she confesses to being impelled by passing impulses to find consolation (see her Life in the Sick-room) in revealed religion, giving the following testimony, so utterly antagonistic to her many utterances: "Nothing but experience can convey a conception of the intense reality in which God appears as Supreme, Christ, and His Gospel divine, and holiness the one aim and chief good, when our frame is refusing its offices, and we can lay hold on no immediate outward solace and support.") The truth is, that there are times when all men feel the necessity of Divine interposition in behalf of the race. When Goethe died exclaiming "Light! more light!" he wanted the comfort and hope that the Divine Purpose relating to the destiny of the race alone imparts.

Obs. 6. The most intelligent and profound thinkers of every age declare, that the removal of the self-evident curse (explain its introduction as they may) entailed upon the earth and its inhabitants, demands higher power and greater manifestations of Deity than now are exhibited. It is admitted that physical science, however it may in some instances mitigate, cannot remove the evils; mental agencies cannot affect it, for knowledge itself may give new weapons into the hands of evil; moral agencies cannot do it, the Church cannot do it, since the most moral and pious fall beneath the curse, experiencing disease, sorrow, death, the grave, and corruption. This Kingdom—this Millennial prediction—embraces the removal of the curse. This is fully proven by the descriptions of the same. The question, by what agencies its removal is accomplished, is also satisfactorily answered. The scope of the Word asserts, that man is under the curse through his fallen condition, and that the evils arising therefrom are the work of Satan. The fact that the evils do exist is painfully evident on all sides; the manner of introduction, whatever may be said pro and con, is also sadly corroborated by the tendency to sin in man. We are only concerned with present facts, and to show how they will be changed for desired and glorious realities. The Bible points to One alone who is to produce this change, viz., to "the Christ" who is revealed expressly "to destroy the works of the devil." The power over evil which He exhibited in His life, death, resurrection, and ascension affords the assurance, if we will only receive it, that His ability is commensurate, yea, infinitely superior to this removal of Satan's work. Those "works of the devil" have not yet been destroyed; they exist in vast proportions over the whole earth; and so universal and far-reaching are they that not one escapes from feeling their fatal effects. Creation continues to groan and travail in pain; man, even the most devoted, continues to reap the bitter fruits of the fall, and thus we are told it will go on until the time appointed by God, when He shall send this Son of His, and through Him "destroy the works of the devil." When the King comes to whom all power is committed in virtue of His Theocratical relationship, sustained by His covenanted descent, divine nature, sacrificial death, etc., then primarily through Him, and subordinately through His associates (deriving their power from Him), this most blessed removal of the curse will at last be experienced. Supernatural intervention, divine outpourings of judgments, the introduction of an overwhelming mass of righteousness in glorified humanity, the erection of a magnificent Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom supported by this majestic David's Son with a corporate body of immortal, intelligent, holy rulers endued with angelic power, etc.—these things, and these alone, can bring about, as inspiration testifies, the long-hoped-for deliverance. If we were to bring together the absurd language used by many in reference to the curse and its removal, it would be deemed a caricature of the sacred promise. Indeed, so little regard is paid to the tenor of Scripture by some, that the old monkish notion is reiterated, that the removal of the curse is confined to the third heaven, thus overlooking the plain implication that the third heaven itself must then also have fallen under the curse, and thus making Redemption, so far as the earth, race, Kingdom, etc., is concerned, incomplete. The "no more curse," as all inspired men unitedly agree, refers to this earth, and to man upon it; and hence the singular beauty and consistency of the Bible beginning with the curse and forfeited blessings and ending with happy restitution.

Smith (Key to Rev., p. 374) gives the key-note of many objections, when, in opposing the personal reign of Jesus, he says: "His reign here must be only spiritual. The days of miracles are past; the Bible is filled; and they are not needed; and Christ can reign as effectually without miracles as with them," etc. But how then the Bible predictions are to be realized, which, as enumerated, demand the introduction of agencies far beyond any now exerted, is a question that he leaves untouched, only taking so much of prophecy to dispose of as he can conveniently crowd into a spiritual or providential reign. Take another class represented by Reclus (The Ocean) and he makes "the Paradise on earth which the mind's eye of the seeker already seems to contemplate in the distant future" to be "a glorified earth" produced by man's own researches, efforts, knowledge; but while jumping to so pleasing a conclusion he fails to tell us how these can stay the cyclone, repress the earthquake, or repeal any of the laws of nature now so oppressive. This is seen by some of our opponents, as e.g. Goldwin Smith (Atlantic Monthly, Feb., 1880) refers to Herbert Spencer looking for a Millennium in the "ideally moral man in whom the moving equilibrium is perfect," and then points out (Art. Pessimism) that nature, with its attendant evils, will necessarily prevent perfect happiness, etc. Take Victor Hugo's Les Misérables and see how man's doom under nature's laws is delineated, the hopes expressed of ultimate deliverance by the diffusion of "light," "elevation," "knowledge," just as if man can be his own deliverer, while the Deliverer provided by a merciful God is studiously ignored.

Obs. 7. The Bible attributes the curse, or introduction of evil, to the fall of the first Adam, and the removal of it to the second Adam, that is "the Christ." To this, as adverted to before, some object on cosmological and geological grounds, viz., that facts seem to establish the truth that death and natural evil existed, taking the biblical chronology, long before the fall of Adam. This would of course conflict with the view of Basil, Luther, and many of the Fathers, that the poison of the serpent, the thorn of the rose, the disease and death of man and animals, etc., were added to poisonless, thornless, diseaseless objects, as a direct result of the curse—in brief, that all evil resulted from thence, the calamitous effect of the fall. Dr. Bushnell (as in "Nature and the Supernatural," ch. 6, 7) and others advocate "anticipative consequences," i.e. that the introduction of evil anticipated the results which actually transpired. Others (Meth. Quart. Review., Ap., 1862, Art. 6, Dr. Clarke, Gen. 1 : 24) that it resulted from divine caprice, or a desire "merely to show what he could do," making it inexplicable. Others again, as Keerl (Origen at first), Boshmen, etc., that the evil originated not from the fall of Adam, but from the fall of Satan, which may have occurred long before. Other theories, modifications of the preceding, are advanced—all evincing, however, that it is a deep and mysterious subject? But is it requisite to adopt any theory, seeing that the objection is forcible only against theological theories which have really no basis in Scripture? For, if we come to the Bible unhampered by theories respecting the fall, we find that, being only a Book designed for fallen man, and to indicate his redemption, it commences with man and incidentally introduces a sufficiency to show what relation he sustained to creation in point of time, and what was his original condition. The record itself does not say that no evil previously existed in the earth, but positively asserts that evil did exist in Satan ; and it was by this evil already present, and which came in contact with man, that the Fall was induced. Death itself was in existence, seeing that it is implied by the bestowal of the tree of life in Eden by which immortality could be obtained. By the creation of Adam and Eve and the withdrawal of them in a separate, distinctive place (i.e. the Garden of Eden, thus indicative that the rest of the earth was as yet unprepared for their reception), God was designing a provision for the emancipation of the earth under the holy dominion of man, i.e. to subjugate the evil already existing and to triumph over Satan. But the unfilial conduct of our first parents made the gracious purpose of God, without preliminary training, a dangerous procedure, so that man was driven from the tree of life. Being mortal, he fell under the penalty of a law of death then in existence, and which he might have avoided by obedience ; and when the Bible says that death came by man and passed upon all men, it simply refers us to the plain fact that immortality, in the tree of life, was tendered to man, and he rendering himself unfit for its reception, fell under the power of death, and with him, of course, all his descendants. The Bible and science here accord, for Eden was not the whole earth, but only a limited space, specially fitted for man ; for evil was here present before man came ; the simple withdrawal of the tree of life exhibited the already existing laws of mortality ; the curse itself was (1) a removal from an Eden state, (2) the sad experience and confirmation of evil into which man was driven outside of Eden. Here is no conflict. Besides this, the Bible language is so guarded, that it is also correct to insist as it does, that through the fall of Adam the race was placed under the curse, inasmuch as Adam entailed his fallen condition upon all his offspring ; for, as intimated, immortality being withdrawn from fallen man, as too dangerous and exalted to be allowed, Adam and his descendants must obtain it now in some other way, viz., through the power of a Redeemer, while they all suffer the loss of Eden. The Word is consistent in its utterances, but just so soon as we press them, as Basil, etc., did, or seek for apologies, as

Clarke, Bushnell, and others do, we not only depreciate the Bible account, but call into question its accuracy. It needs no apology from us, dealing as it does with stubborn facts, patent to all, viz., that we are fallen into the embraces of evil, that we have no Eden state here, etc. If the Bible had asserted that all the earth was an Eden, and that no evil and death had any previous existence, then science might find some leverage for its objection, but depending on opinions of men engrafted on the Word, it becomes futile and very unscientific.

Comp. e.g. Delitzsch's Sys. of Bib. Psyc., sec. 1, etc. If the deductions of science in reference to the previous existence of death are to be received, there certainly is no conflict to be found with the biblical statement. The only inference to the contrary appears to some in the phrase, "God saw it was good," but this (Bush's Notes, Lange's Com., etc.) may have for its fundamental application the notion that God saw that it—the creation—answered fully the purpose designed—that in such and such a creation He made the provision intended.

Obs. 8. This leads us to consider that a restoration to an Eden state involves the reproduction of an Eden immensely greater than the original. That we find was limited—abundantly large for the trial through which man passed. But when we consider that this Eden restored must be of a sufficient capacity to hold not merely the first parents, but that numerous progeny who have laid hold on life through a divine faith, etc., it will be seen at once that the Millennial descriptions do not exceed what is required, when they represent the whole earth as finally embraced in such a state. And not only so, but in the new creative energy manifested at this period, there are intimations which seem to point to an enlargement of the earth itself. In this reproduction we have no specific detail, for these are wisely omitted, because (1) if given they would lead men to object to the Word on the ground of impossibilities, which is even now done with the general affirmations of renewal; (2) with our present knowledge and the state of science we could not comprehend the changes and altered conditions. The Word is not given to extravagances of expression, such as we find in the conjectures of men (astronomers, philosophers, etc.) concerning the sun, planets, and universe, which could be seized upon as purely hypothetical, but this restitution is based on a regular divine Plan of Redemption; is presented in guarded general terms, and ascribed to a Being in whom we know that the power to accomplish it is to be found. Therefore, we rest satisfied that the Eden will be fully commensurate to the number who shall be entitled to admission to it.

Obs. 9. This Kingdom designed to carry out and display the Redemptive process in its realization will exhibit in the highest degree the love of God through re-creative power and activity. No one doubts but that such love was strongly shown in creation, in the Incarnation, in Providential movements, etc., but all these, if we are to credit the Prophets, are only forerunners of a higher manifestation of His goodness when the consummation arrives. God revealed directly through humanity as the Theocratic God, acts of restoration and renewal, the complete union of Church and State, the subordination of the human to the divine Will, the rule of righteousness and righteous submission harmoniously blended, the abrogation of all divergence between religion and science, the world and heaven, the heart and God, life and holiness—all this calls forth exhibitions of love in Father, Son, and Spirit, to which all previously given ones are only earnest of the ultimate feast.

Obs. 10. May we not again remind the reader, how logically consistent the early Church was to attribute to Christ at His Sec. Advent this work of restoring all things through the power of His rule and Kingdom? In addition to the numerous allusions already made to their belief on the subject, the candid admission of Neander (His. Ch. Church, vol. 1, p. 182), that Paul looked for the Advent of Christ, and that it was to be regarded by believers as "fitted to be, not an object of dread, but of joyful, longing hope," because neither Paul nor the other Apostles believed in a conversion of the world, but rather in its growing worse until the personal Advent of Christ brought deliverance. This very posture and belief our argument demands, and hence these concessions of such historians form an important corroborating element in the chain of evidence which the student should not overlook.

PROPOSITION 121. This Kingdom, of necessity, requires a Pre-Millennial Personal Advent of Jesus Christ.

The covenant promises, the Millennial descriptions which predict the fulfilment of these promises, the entire tenor and analogy of Scripture demand such an Advent. To establish the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom as given by the prophets requires such a personal Coming; and as inspiration indicates the restoration of the Davidic throne in that period and David's seed occupying that throne and Kingdom of David's, it also invariably speaks of the return and presence of David's Son. The proof is cumulative and overwhelming, and in the aggregate establishes the remarkable unity of the Word, the consistency of Jewish expectation, apostolic preaching, and early Church doctrine.

The Covenant imperatively demands a personal coming, for it requires David's Son to come, the Seed in His proper person, to inherit the Theocratic throne and Kingdom and land. Hence it cannot be spiritualized; and therefore it is that the promises and predictions are so framed as to sustain this view of a personal coming. It is likewise noticeable that eminent writers, firmly advocating a personal Pre-Mill. Advent, weaken their reasoning by overlooking two things, (1) the oath-bound Covenant with David which, if fulfilled, makes such a coming a necessity; and (2) the nature of the Kingdom, viz. Theocratic-Davidic, which again, if realized, requires such a personal Advent. This subject must, in order to do it justice, be considered in its strictly historical, doctrinal, and logical connection, for a restored Theocracy without the personal presence of David's Son by whom it is restored is an impossibility.

Obs. 1. Before presenting our arguments in favor of a Pre-Millennial Advent, it is best to notice a few particulars. And first, seeing that the Covenant, promises and prophecies in their literal import do teach a literal personal Advent, why is it, if the same is only to be understood spiritually or providentially, that so many of our opponents (as Neander, Bush, Billroth, Jowett, etc.) admit that the Apostles—inspired men to be guided into all truth—themselves held to such a literal construction? How comes it, that instead of looking for a Millennium to precede the Advent as men now confidently teach, these inspired men, having the same prophets, and it being part of their mission to interpret and explain these prophets, taught the Advent without an intervening Millennium? Why do they employ the explicit language, the strongest possible expressions, confirmatory of a literal personal Coming, if something else is denoted? If we reject their teaching, and the results of the same as manifested in the Churches established by them, we degrade them to the position of un-inspired, and hence unreliable, guides; and infidelity in its inferences drawn from this point may well laugh with scorn at the foolish apologies offered by learned men in extenuation of such an unapostolic posture then so fruitful in error and deception. Secondly, if the Apostles were to lead their hearers to the truth as given by holy men of old, and if the varied interpretations long afterward bestowed upon the predictions of this Advent are correct, why is it that we do not find the language now so prevalent on the subject in the epistles? Why e.g. do we not find the interpretations of "a spiritual Coming," "a providential Coming," "a Coming with the Roman army," "a Coming in death," etc.? The fact is, that not one of the phrases now so current in theological literature on this point is to be found in the Bible. The absence of them, to say the least, indicates their human origin. Thirdly, the words themselves used by the apostles to designate the Second Advent (Parousia and Epiphaneia) are conceded by all critics to be, owing to their primary meaning and usage, eminently calculated to teach a literal, personal Advent. The very selection of such words ought to have weight with the student in such a discussion.* Fourthly, the hope as expressed by pious Jews, was in the personal Advent of the Messiah. After the rejection and death of Jesus by the nation, the Apostles transfer this hope to the Second Advent, and in doing this adopt the very phraseology employed by the pious Jews, thus unmistakably exhibiting faith in the ultimate realization of the hope in a personal Sec. Advent. "He that Cometh," or "the Coming One," "the One waited for," "the expected One" (taken e.g. from Ps. 118 : 26, so Olshausen ; or Ps. 40 : 8, 80, Lange ; or Mal. 3 : 1, so Hengstenberg, etc.), is transferred to the still future Advent with the idea attached that then will the Covenant promises be verified. The proof is found in the acknowledged fact that all their hearers, so far as we have any record, were impressed with this belief. It is also seen in constantly holding up the Sec. Coming as "the blessed hope," etc., in exhorting to patient waiting, earnest expectation, eager looking, ardent love for the appearing of "the Chief Shepherd", just as the godly Jews previously waited, longed, and looked for the "Shepherd" described by the Prophets.

These preliminary points are important to the careful student, and he will observe (1) how the Jews understood this phraseology ; (2) how Jesus employed it without explanation as something well understood ; (3) how the disciples comprehended it in its Jewish aspect ; (4) how the Apostles continue to employ it without substituting another meaning ; (5) how the churches established by the Apostles and their immediate successors perpetuate it ; (6) how our opponents concede that this meaning was originally entertained ; (7) how, in many places (as e.g. 2 Thess. 2 : 8, etc.), the concession is made that it still retains such a meaning. Our argument is fortified, step by step, by everything requisite to sustain a strictly historical and logical connection. Hence, it is only an unacquaintance with our doctrine that can cause some to assert that the Apoc. alone contains "the sole scriptural authority on which Millenarian doctrine rests."

Obs. 2. Attention is again called to the early Church doctrine, in view of the importance of this subject. If a fundamental mistake was made in the teaching of so significant and consequential a doctrine as that pertaining to the Pre-Millennial personal Advent of Jesus, then we may well pause and ask, whether similar errors were not committed in the reception of other doctrines. The denial of the early Church belief on so weighty a point involves their entire faith in obscurity and credulity. But our argument produces no such dilemma, but accepts of their faith in this matter as legitimate, consistent, and indispensable to the truth. Indeed, if it were missing in the early history of the Church, then a powerful objection would arise against our view, but existing as it does, it becomes, on the other hand, evidence in our favor. It is gratifying to us that so many passages relied on to prove a Pre-Mill. Advent were thus quoted by the immediate followers of the Apostles and their disciples. As previously shown, all the Apostolic Fathers, and all the earliest Christian Fathers, taught our doctrine (see Prop. 73-78). The very persons who had access to the Apostles; who received their instruction, public and private; who were deeply interested in the Advent, and made it a prominent feature in their system of faith; who were intimately acquainted with the language in which the doctrine was promulgated, etc.—these were the men who adopted and taught it. Even after a spiritualizing theory was broached, yet such was the force of the passages which speak of the personal Coming of Jesus, that even Origen, Jerome, and others, were unable to rid themselves entirely of them, but admitted—as their works evidence—however contradictory to their own system that a personal Coming was intended, as e.g. 2 Thess. 2, etc. And what is remarkable to the student, both Millenarians and their opposers located the personal Advent about the same time. For, as scholars have noticed, the ancients universally (or nearly so) understood the Advent to follow the closing of 6000 years. And following (Bush, etc.) the Septuagint Chronology, they supposed the Advent near, owing to its lengthening the world's duration beyond that of the Hebrew. Millenarians held the 1000 years, the Sabbatism, as future, and located the personal Advent at its commencement. The others identifying the 1000 years as in some way connected with this dispensation and included in the 6000 years, looked for the Personal Advent at its close, preparative to the eternal Sabbath. Hence in reference to many of the passages relating to the Advent there was but little difference of interpretation, saving in the one point of Pre-Millennial. It required many centuries before men could arise and destructively interpret away the plainest statements of Scripture. And it was after the comparative modern Whitbyan theory of a Millennium still future, to be introduced through the Gospel and Church, that the most unwarranted liberties were taken with the sacred text in order to accommodate it to such a theory. However painful this may be to contemplate, the student of prophecy is not surprised at its existence; for in that Word he finds that as the period arrives for the Advent, unbelief in it shall characterize the Church and world. Hence, he expects its Pre-Mill. nature to be opposed and rejected; the passages which teach it to be glossed over with other meanings; the objects intended by it to be denied; the early Church doctrine to be derided as suited for children, and a soporific, worldly-wise interpretation to become generally prevalent. Indeed, to place the Church and world in the posture assigned to it just previous to the Advent, requires a display of learning, theology, philosophy, spiritual improvement, etc., in order to beat down the warnings of the Word and of a long line of faithful witnesses to the truth. Therefore, the simple fact that so much hostility is manifested against what was once the orthodox faith of the Church, regarded in the light of the predicted faithlessness of the Church on this point, ought to excite suspicion that something is wrong in the popular view. The best of men, innocently and with the purest of motives, desirous even to promote what they regard as truth, are engaged in this work of changing and corrupting the divine testimony. Their piety, usefulness, ability, etc., enlarge the power to mislead in this direction, and materially aids in forming that "snare" and "net" in which both Church and world will be entangled at the Advent. Love for such brethren, and a desire to be faithful to the testimony of the Spirit in the Word, cause us to use such plainness of speech, even if it should result (God forbid) in giving offence to some.<sup>2</sup>

---

* See Parkhurst and lexicons generally. Brookes, Et. Proph. Interp., ch. 5, gives a list, etc. Comp. Olshausen, Com., vol. 2, p. 228-9, Newton's Lectures, p. 209, Taylor's Voice of the Church, Judge Jones's Notes, and the works of Bickersteth, Seiss, etc. Dr. Tyng (Pre-Mill. Essays, p. 22) has some good remarks on "the nouns substantive used to signify the Advent," "the pronouns and adverbs, which control and qualify the various promises of our Lord's appearing," and "the offices and actions which are connected with His Coming."

<sup>1</sup> History informs us that in the terrible outbreak of Bar-Cocheba (under the pretence of being the Messiah) against the Romans, no Christians were deluded by him. Why could he not beguile those early believers, although they suffered, in consequence, a fearful persecution under him? The student will, in answering this question, bear in mind how intensely Millenarian Jewish believers were at this very time. The reason is apparent, viz., that neither the manner nor accompaniments of Bar-Cocheba's Advent corresponded with the Scripture statements. Thus e.g. a Coming indicated by a resurrection and translation—a Coming with supernatural power—was lacking.

<sup>2</sup> The reasoning given by us drives some of our opponents to a singular position. Thus e.g. Dr. Alger (Crit. His. Doc. Fut. Life, p. 39) declares that he fully believes—as the evidence is abundant—that the Evangelists and early Christians understood Christ to teach a literal personal Advent, but he doubts whether Christ really meant this to be taught. The reasons assigned for this attitude (which virtually makes Jesus the author of error in those selected to proclaim the truth) are the following: (1) because nothing is said of the resurrection in connection. But this is a gross oversight, seeing that a resurrection and a Sec. Advent are inseparable. Sometimes one or the other is mentioned alone, because the one implied the other, for, as is well known, the hearers of Jesus invariably linked the one with the other. Simple justice requires a comparison of passages, when the connection fully appears. (2) The figures employed are such as the prophets used to designate "great and signal events on earth." But this is to ignore the express requirements of the Covenant which imperatively demand such a personal Advent for fulfilment; this overlooks that much of the language employed cannot be figurative, seeing that it affirms directly the Advent of David's Son as "Son of man;" this forgets that the Sec. Advent is not dependent upon the interpretation of this or that passage, but follows as a legitimate outgrowth of a Theocratic plan. (3) Because Christ "fixed the date of the events He referred to within that generation." But this is limiting the meaning of the word, and it is setting aside a vast array of scriptural testimony on the strength of a misconception of one passage. This is the slight foundation upon which a wonderful array of spiritualizing is then erected. Alas!

Obs. 3. A mere mention of some of the opinions entertained will be sufficient. Thus e.g. Westminster Review for Oct., 1873, in an Art. calls this Sec. Advent of Christ an "exploded superstition." Renan (Life of Jesus, p. 107) says: "The material conception of the divine Advent was only a cloud, a passing error which death consigned to oblivion." Such statements could be multiplied, together with those which urge such a doctrine, as taught by the Apostles, to be subversive of the inspiration of the Word. Besides these, the reader must have noticed that in leading reviews, etc., articles are constantly appearing which assert that everything of importance refers to the present time with which we alone are concerned; the whole tenor and spirit of which is hostile to faith and hope in a coming personal Redeemer. Now and then, these are accompanied by remarks designed to be witticisms, making sport of our hope, and endeavoring to cover it with ridicule, just as if a Pre-Mill. Advent were some fair target for scorn and burlesque. If this were always done by infidels, it would be something to be expected in view of their principles (although some of them have treated our faith more fairly and courteously than many believers), but it happens that believers, for the moment forgetting the preciousness of that Coming and the gracious designs connected with it, indulge in such witticisms, etc., thus placing themselves in the posture delineated, Matt. 24 : 48, which, Lange (Com. loci) aptly expresses, is indicative of “an internal mocking frivolity.” The claim that Noble, Barrett, and others make, viz., that through E. Swedenborg there has been “the revelation of the spiritual sense of the Word through the obscurity or cloud of the letter, which is the predicted and glorious appearing of the Son of Man upon the clouds of heaven”—is little short of blasphemous, because it applies to mortal man, or to the work that he performs, terms that belong pre-eminently and exclusively to Jesus Christ. And to take that “appearing” which belongs peculiarly and distinctively to the Saviour, and which pertains to His glory, and to apply this to erring man is the highest presumption.<sup>1</sup> The opposite extreme is found in Colani (quoted by Van Oosterzee), who is so hostile to the idea of Christ’s personal return that he would expunge all expressions relating to it as spurious. Between these extremes, a variety of arbitrary interpretations exist. Thus e.g. Fowle (Contemp. Review, May, 1872, p. 729) makes the Coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven and the gathering of the elect “metaphorical language, descriptive of the growth of the Church.” This is regarded as a decided improvement on that interpretation which makes the Advent of Christ “the Advent of the Roman army,” etc. To get rid of a Sec. personal Advent, Nisbett (Coming of the Messiah) confines the description of Christ’s Coming and the destruction of His enemies to His first Coming. The apostasy in 2 Thess. 2 is conveniently confined to the rebellions of the Jews. These specimens will suffice to show the variations caused by a departure from the grammatical sense ; but we turn to others advocated by earnest and able men equally untenable.* Prest. Edwards (His. of Redemp., p. 269) has four Comings or Advents, viz., His First extending to destruction of Jerusalem, and the proof alleged is Matt. 16 : 28 (which we will examine under Prop. 150, relating to the transfiguration) ; the Second, “in Constantine’s time, in the destruction of the heathen Roman Empire, and the proof is Rev. 6 : 13–17 ; the third is at the destruction of Antichrist, and the proof is Dan. 7 ; the fourth is at the last judgment. Other writers, not satisfied with such a perversion, have these Comings extended into many more by the aid of the phrases “providential,” “spiritual,” “figurative,” etc., so that there is scarcely a notable event in Church history, or in a man’s life, but what this “Coming” is enlisted as accessory, etc. The spiritual interpretation brings forth an abundant crop in this field of investigation. Turning away from those who are so fanciful in interpretation, let us briefly present those who are more sober and systematic in their efforts. Barnes, Fairbairn, Brown, and others take the passages which we refer to a Pre-Mill. Advent, and ascribe to them a spiritual or providential Coming. Admitting that God is always in Providence, that He is ever spiritually present with His people (comp. Lange, Com., p. 564), our answer to their mode of dealing with these predictions follows.

<sup>1</sup> Noble (An Appeal, etc.) admits that in the literal sense a personal Advent is denoted, and, therefore, that “the Apostles would naturally expect, as all other Christians did, that those prophetic announcements were to be literally fulfilled.” But this, the plain grammatical, sense is to be discarded for a symbolic engrafted one given by Swedenborg, which makes the Advent of a person (comp. Acts 1 : 10, 11, etc.) to be “the restoration of the true knowledge of divine subjects.” Well may we ask, aside from other considerations, would God give a sense, with which man is conversant, and which is connected with the common usage of language, knowing that for centuries it must inevitably lead Apostles and their successors into error? Can we believe that Apostles, inspired, and whose utterances were to be truth, knew less on this subject than Swedenborg? Is it possible to credit the claim of one who through an Origenistic interpretation utterly ignores or spiritualizes the grammatical sense of Covenant, prediction, and promise, and finds under each and every one a hidden mystical sense, which, if true, makes the ancient believers to have trusted in mere phantoms of their own raising? This Swedenborgian claim is readily tested, by simply asking whether the things connected by the Spirit to this Advent have been verified? Thus e.g. have the Jews been in dire extremity and has a deliverance in their behalf been vouchsafed, etc., etc.? To guard us against just such perversions, the Scriptures employ language (as e.g. "The Lord Himself shall descend" not something else; "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mt. of Olives"—not Swedenborg's spiritual sense) which cannot be spiritualized without the grossest absurdity. Swedenborg himself (The True Chr. Religion, ch. 14; Apoc., vol. 1, p. 24, etc.) says that "Coming of our Lord is effected by the instrumentality of a man" (i.e. himself) "before whom He has manifested Himself in person, and whom He has filled with His spirit to teach from Him the doctrine of the New Church by means of the Word." Even Matt. 26 : 64, and similar Scriptures (see An Address to the Clergy) are blasphemously applied to Swedenborg's revelations. Noble (Appeal) claims that a literal, personal Coming of the Lord in the clouds is an impossibility. This may be done by one who will deny a literal ascension in a cloud, but not by a believer in Acts, and books that they reject.

<sup>2</sup> To show how ample the field, we refer to a few others: a class of interpreters such as Lowth, Hall, etc., closely pressed by the passages relating to the Advent and yet unwilling to concede a personal one and unable to allegorize them totally away, make a sort of compromise by holding to a peculiar supernatural interposition, a lustrous appearance something like, if not, the Schekinah, in and through which Christ is to be manifested. Then we have a large class who hail almost everything, such as "deliverance from slavery," "increased intelligence," "enlarged virtue," "the spread of science," etc., as "the Coming of the Lord." We give a specimen of the latter: in Harper's Mag., Nov., 1865, p. 722, "For who associates in his thought those two words, Science and America, and does not see uprising from the heart of Time a national destiny so absolutely glorious as to bring him, if a patriot worthy of the name, humbly to his knees, convinced that he has seen in vision the Great Day of the 'Coming of the Lord.'" We doubt very much, patriot as the writer was, whether the vision brought him "humbly to his knees." Such painful evidences of a frittering away of a glorious truth could be multiplied, taken too from otherwise able and learned men. Taylor, in Old Theology, etc., rejects even a figurative application, and speaks of the utter folly of believing in a future personal Coming; Desprez, in "St. John," advises us to discard all the Scriptures relating to it as interpolations; Schenkel (Sketch of Char. of Christ) explains Christ's coming again "in the glory of the Father with the holy angels" (Mark 8 : 38, etc.) to be "figuratively of the Master's spiritual reappearance;" Evans (Art. Shaikers, Appleton's Cyclop.) says: "the Second appearing of the Christ 'without sin unto salvation' they believe to have taken place through Mother Lee, in 1770;" Pickett's Eclectic Church refuses to believe in a Sec. Advent; in brief, multitudes refer it (as Smith, in Key of Rev.) to a coming at death, at the destruction of Jerusalem, at the overthrow of Paganism, at the French Revolution, at, or in, anything that seems to suit a mystical coming; and even spiritualists claim it under an alleged "materialization," as by Lucie E. Lewis in her work called "The Second Advent of Christ, or His Recent Materialization."

<sup>3</sup> The same mode of reasoning which puts aside a Pre-Mill. Advent will, if consistently and logically applied, also invalidate the First Advent (seeing that in the Old Test. they, i.e. First and Second Advents, are spoken of in the same manner). At least, it will cause persons to deny and ignore a personal Sec. Advent. The proof of this last feature is found in the fact that entire bodies of professing Christians (as Swedenborgians, Unitarians, Universalists, Shakers, etc.) only claim a spiritual Advent. Many, also, who confess to a personal Sec. Advent but locate it after the Millennial era, forget that the identical phraseology and reasons which urge them to such a view are precisely those that we urge in favor of our own. This will be fully seen as we proceed.

Obs. 4. The attempt to make out a spiritual or providential Coming from the occurrences in the Old Test., such as the destruction of Sodom, the deliverance of Israel from the host of Pharaoh, etc., fails for the simple reason that this Coming is asserted in reference to the humanity of Christ, pertains to David's Son. He comes not as the invisible God, who may be present unseen and unknown, but as Man, the Son of Man, the Man ordained, and one too, as will be shown hereafter, to be seen and recognized.<sup>1</sup> While fully indorsing a divine sovereignty (Props. 79 and 80), a constant pervading superintending presence, which we might see if our eyes were opened like the servant's of Elisha, or like Stephen's or Saul's, yet this is very diverse from a Coming or presence of "the Son of Man." Our opponents, when not directly arguing against us, frankly concede this point to us in their explanations of the phrase "Son of Man." Thus e.g. Dr. Neander (Life of Christ, pp. 99, 100) says respecting this phrase: "We conclude that as Christ used the one (viz., Son of Man) to designate His human personality, so He employed the other to point out His divine." Now admit that it refers to "human personality," why should the meaning thus given be changed for the divine or spiritual, when the phrase is employed in reference to a Pre-Mill. Advent? Where, we ask, is the consistency of altering this explanation of the term, when all of them confess that in some passages (as e.g. Matt. 16 : 27) it undoubtedly refers to His personal future Advent? If such an arbitrary change is to be made, what uniformity and consonance is there in Scriptural exposition?"

<sup>1</sup> Kurtz (Sac. His., p. 277), after referring the phrase "Son of God" to the divine, adds: "On the other hand, the name 'Son of man' designates Him as the true and archetypal man," etc. So Knapp (Ch. Theol., sec. 93, 2) says: "it clearly denotes the true humanity of Christ." Hundreds of testimonials to the same effect could be readily accumulated, but are unnecessary (comp. Prop. 81). Dr. Nast's remark (Art. in West. Ch. Advocate, Aug. 6th, 1879) is eminently true; "We must hold fast to this, that the phrase 'the Son of man cometh' has the definite signification of a 'Coming in person' (Parousia), concerning which Bh. Merrill (an opponent) says, 'If Christ does not come in person as the Son of man, He does not come at all.' Twenty-nine times the Saviour applies His Davidic title, 'Son of man,' as 'coming,' 'come,' 'came,' to His personal visible appearing on earth, either at the First or Second Advent." Hoffman (Prophecy and Fulfilment of the Old and New Tests.) holds the singular view that "the Son of man" in Rev. 14 : 14 is not the Christ, basing his opinion solely on receiving an order from the angel and obeying it. But Hoffman forgets that in the reception of this Kingdom and in the ordering of the times and seasons, this Son of man, David's Son, is subordinate to the Father (comp. Props. 83 and 159); and that such a view introduces an irreconcilable antagonism with other passages, e.g. Matt. 13 : 41.

<sup>2</sup> It is to be regretted, therefore, that theologians of great ability, who cordially concede the personal Pre-Mill. Advent, weaken the argument in favor of the same by allowing a variety of comings of Christ. Thus e.g. Oosterzee (Ch. Dog., vol. 2, sec. 146, etc.) firmly presents the Pre-Mill personal Advent. He correctly informs us that "In the New Test. this prospect is distinctly presented on almost every page; and in Ch. Dogmatics it forms nothing less than the corner stone of the eschatological structure," but vitiates this statement by having quite a number of comings introducing the philosophical or mystical gloss "that every coming contains in itself, as it were, the germ of a new and yet more glorious coming." The excellent commentaries of Lange, Olshausen, etc., are disfigured by such statements, which are inconsistent with the fact that the spiritual supervision of Jesus over the Church, the acts of providence, the death of believers, etc., are nowhere called the Coming of the Lord Jesus, or of the Christ. This will be clearly shown. (Oosterzee, however, p. 581, remarks: "All the Apostolic exhortations and consolations are so closely connected with the prospect of the personal return of the Lord that whoever contradicts this last, thereby takes away the roof and cornice from the structure of the apostolic theology." "Of the life of watchfulness, patience, and heavenly mindedness, it is the soul and power—Luke 12 : 35-48—and history makes abundantly manifest, that when this prospect has temporarily receded from the Christian consciousness, the spiritual life also has declined," etc.) Such illustrations can be multiplied, and they do harm in that they lead opponents to shelter themselves behind this variety of comings conveniently arranged for them. Hence our opposers admit that there is a Pre-Mill. Coming of the Lord, but owing to the latitude which such an interpretation provides for them, they tell us that it denotes divine judgments, or providential movements, or the agency of the Spirit, or supernatural intervention, or the approach of death (in the revival of the martyr spirit), or the increased light, etc., that is vouchsafed to believers (for they themselves differ widely in exactly defining this Coming, thus indirectly evidencing the weakness of their theory). It is a sad fact, abundantly corroborated by acknowledgments of ministers (e.g. a painful evidence, Proph. Times, vol. 12, p. 19) that this idea of spiritual and providential comings has led men to deny any personal coming in the future, making coming "an every-day affair," and saying: "that such arguing and preaching" (viz., relating to a personal Advent) "will not take with the people."

Obs. 5. Our opposers (as Barnes, Fairbairn, Edwards, etc.) contend that the symbolical representation of the latter part of Rev. 20 denotes the personal, visible presence of Christ. But how can they make it such, when they deny the same to the Advent of Rev. 19? The principle on which the two visions is constructed is identical: agents represent agents, acts represent acts, conditions and events represent conditions and events. Now if in the one vision the agents represent personal agents, how comes it that in the other they do not? Is there not abundant ground for suspicion that such an interpretation is adapted to a preconceived theory? This very indication of weakness is seized by rationalistic writers and drawn out to its legitimate end, viz., taking the interpretation given by our opponents to Rev. 19, they apply the same to Rev. 20, and deny both the personal Coming and literal resurrection. And from this there is no appeal to the application of grammatical rules, seeing that the additional sense foisted on the symbols is something unknown to the rules of language. It is singular, taking the views arrayed against us, that in the descriptions of this Pre-Mill. Advent everything is conceded visible and literally present excepting Christ Himself. Thus in Rev. 19, alluded to, the beast, false prophet, etc., represent real personal agents—everything is visible and recognizable—but the Coming and agency of Christ seen by the inspired writer as real, personal, and visible, as that of the beast, prophet, nations, etc., is to be discarded as invisible, and is stripped of its recognizable personality. By what rule of interpretation is this done? If such a rule were penned down and consistently applied, would it not make all the agents, acts, etc., invisible also? Take e.g. Dan. 7; and the four beasts, horns, destruction, even the saints, Kingdom, dominion, all in fact, saving the Advent of "the Son of Man," is to be received as representing visible personal agents, etc., here on the earth. Why make this one exception, simply on the authority of uninspired man, and against the direct testimony of the whole early Church? If it be admitted that the Advent in Dan. 7 alludes to His personal First Advent, then it only confirms our argument under Prop. 104, where we conclusively show that it only occurs after the divided form of the Roman Empire, and the rise and progress of the little horn, etc. The truth is, that a denial of the Pre-Mill. Advent involves an arbitrary handling of prophecy. It is a matter of regret that distinguished theologians fall into this illogical and unfounded method of dealing with predictions relating to this Coming. Thus e.g. Kurtz (Sac. His., sec. 198) says: "Every interposition of the Omnipotent Ruler and Judge of the world who sits on the right hand of Omnipotence, every progressive movement of His Kingdom, every victory which He gains over His enemies, and every judgment which overtakes them, is a Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." The only proof assigned for so sweeping a declaration and such a wide departure from primitive doctrine is 1 Cor. 1 : 7 and 2 Pet. 1 : 16, which passages, as the reader can see for himself, refer to a literal, personal Coming; the one to His future revelation, the other to His First Advent and manifestation in the transfiguration.

It is simply a perversion of Scripture to say as Martensen (Ch. Dog., p. 323), that "the Sec. Advent includes His continual and progressive Coming to establish His Kingdom" (i.e. the Church) "in the world, and His Coming to the faithful for their salvation, and to the world for judgment." This makes the Sec. Advent a continuous coming and not a specific object of hope located in the future at a definite time, etc. The simple truth is this: all those who thus spiritualize those allusions to the Sec. Advent, do it in violence to the Divine Record, and contradict themselves in quoting Scripture on the subject. Thus e.g. Steele (Essay on Christ's Kingdom, Bib. Sacra., Nov., 1849) makes the Coming of the Son of man "fulfilled when Christ ascended in the clouds of heaven and sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high." But this the Scriptures—Jesus Himself—call a departure, a leaving, and not a Coming. Besides this, the events inseparably connected with the Sec. Advent did not follow such an ascension and exaltation, showing that a return, as predicted, is meant, and not a leaving. Again: Rev. Robison (Sermon at Springfield, O., Nov., 1878), in opposing Millenarianism, advocated spiritual and providential comings indefinitely; and then specified as prominent four Comings: (1) At destruction of Jerusalem, denoted by the "Kingdom at hand"—proof, Dan. 7 : 13; Heb. 12 : 25, etc.; (2) at death—proof, 1 Cor. 1 : 9, and Phil. 1 : 6, 10; (3) spiritually to destroy man of sin—proof, 2 Thess. 2 : 8, 10; (4) literal, 2 Thess. 1 : 7, 8, 9; 2 Pet. 3 : 10, 12. Now, compare these proof texts with any spiritualistic commentator of his own party, and see the antagonistic interpretation.

Obs. 6. If we were to adopt this principle of spiritualizing the Coming and the language employed in its usage, then, if consistently applied to the whole Bible, it would ignore the literal, personal First Advent. This is no caricature, but sober argument. Suppose our opponents are correct in their interpretation; let us then transplant ourselves to a period before the First Advent and apply their system to prophecies relating to that Advent and see the result. Let us, taking such an imaginative position, select e.g. Isa. 40 : 3, "the voice of him that crieth in the wilderness," etc., and according to the system just adopted, this would denote that divine truth would be heard in the earth even in the most abandoned parts of it, etc. Or, select e.g. Isa. 53, and we would have a representation of truth, its treatment, rejection, and final triumph. But what are the facts as evidenced by fulfilment? Have we not a literal voice, literal wilderness, literal address to Jews, a literal Coming, humiliation, sufferings, and death of Jesus Christ, etc.? According to the system of our opponents no such literal, personal fulfilment was intended, for if the predictions relating to the Sec. Advent, which are far clearer, distinctive, and decisive than those referring to the First, are to be understood as portraying a spiritual or providential Coming, then surely, if this measurer of prophecy is applied to the less distinct ones of the First Advent, they too only mean a spiritual or providential Coming. If the rule of interpretation holds good now, it ought to cover all time; for we know of no rules that were applicable to one age and not to another. If it be answered, that fulfilment shows that such and such language must be literally understood, then our reply is ready: the fulfilment is evidence that the spiritualistic interpretation on this point is utterly untrustworthy, while it gives decisive proof of the consistency of that adopted by the early Church.

Writers adopting, in view of a non-fulfilment at the First Advent of prediction, a typical or spiritual Messianic interpretation, thus endeavor to mould the Scriptures to their respective theories. Thus e.g. Browne, in The Book of Psalms, makes in this spirit the declaration: "nowhere in the Psalms are the redemption of the world and Israel's final glory bound up with the Coming of the Messiah." The numerous Psalms quoted in our argument, used by Jews and the Primitive Church, abundantly refute this position. Such Psalms as the 89th, 132d, and others, portraying the Coming and glorious reign of the Messiah, are amply sufficient to show that these predictions are not merely typical, and hence convertible into something else, seeing that the attributes ascribed to this Messiah, the immortality, ever-enduring reign, blessedness, etc., are too specific to be thus evaded. Those who are so fond of attributing this typical character to David will pardon us if we refuse our credence to the belief that David would be so inconsistent and incongruous as to elevate himself into a Messianic type.

Obs. 7. Having briefly glanced at the inconsistency of our opposers, in interpreting the Pre-Mill. Advent predictions, the reader may be confirmed in our statements, if his attention is more particularly directed to the glaring contradictions that it produces. A few examples will suffice by way of illustration: (1) Barnes (Com.) and others freely contend that the Coming in 2 Thess. 2 is a literal, personal one, and which results in the destruction of the Antichrist. They acknowledge that this antichristian power is in this dispensation, exists some time before the Advent, and that previous to his removal there can be no Millennial blessedness, etc. And yet when the same power is stated to be removed and destroyed by the Advent of the same Jesus previous to the ushering in of Mill. happiness, as e.g. Dan. 7 and Rev. 19, they refuse to accept of this identification of the period, and thus have in one place a personal, and then in other places a spiritual Advent to destroy the last great enemy of the truth.' (2) Again, many commentators on various passages declare that a personal Advent is prerequisite to the resurrection of the saints according to the promises given. They admit that Rev. 11: 18 teaches a literal resurrection under the last trumpet, but refuse to bring in the personal Coming of Jesus at that period as necessary to secure it, although laid down as something inseparably connected with a resurrection of the dead. (3) Many writers commenting on certain Scriptures relating to the watching, looking, longing, and waiting for the Advent, as e.g. Matt. 25: 13; 1 Thess. 5: 6, etc., inform us that it is (Barnes) "an event which is certainly to occur and which may occur at any moment," and, therefore, we should be prepared for it, etc.; and yet when they come to where the order is given and a Pre-Mill. Advent indicated (which alone meets their admissions of suddenness, unexpectedness, its occurrence at almost any time, etc.), then we are told that it cannot and will not take place until the Millennial era has first transpired. They feel themselves qualified to definitely locate the Advent to a period at least ten centuries in the future, thus making it a matter of mere folly, to look, etc., for the Sec. Coming before the expiration of the allotted time. (4) A large number of authors when interpreting passages relating to death, as 1 Cor. 15: 54, 55, etc., correctly represent death as an enemy that will finally be conquered, etc.; they have much to say about death being the result of sin, etc.; but they forget in their eagerness to interpret Scripture as against us what they said concerning death, and actually declare that Christ comes in and through death. The blessed Saviour is transformed into our enemy! We glory in the fact that we can be strengthened and supported by Jesus in meeting this enemy; we rejoice that our Saviour has the power finally to overcome and destroy this foe, but we utterly deny that Jesus comes to us in the shape of this enemy. What! Jesus coming in death, when death even came to Him and obtained a brief triumph! This remnant of Popish theology, originated by a perversion of plain Bible statements, is, alas! deeply rooted in the minds of many. It would seem that a little reflection over the existence of death from the expulsion from Eden and the fearful result, even corruption, following it, ought to lead men of judgment to discard so foolish and unscriptural a doctrine which serves with many to obscure a Pre-Mill. Advent. Even the naïve remark of Sir Thomas Browne (Relig. Medici,) is sufficient answer to its use: "I am not so much afraid of death as ashamed thereof; 'tis the very disgrace and ignominy of our natures, that in a moment can so disfigure us, that our nearest friends, wife and children, stand afraid, and start at us," etc. Christ does not come in this way; He is our deliverer from such a disgraceful state, and He will yet save us from this enemy, who holds in his prison house His brethren." (5) Again, many explain the parable of the tares and wheat to indicate a mixed condition of the Church, and that the harvest is at the end of the age, but in the delineations of Mill. descriptions this mixed condition insisted on in one place is forgotten and removed; and to avoid making a Pre-Mill. Advent, the personal Advent, admitted in connection with the harvest in the parable, is denied to the harvests of Revelation and Joel.* (6) Again, multitudes give us the most eulogistic and congratulatory expositions of the marriage announced in Rev. 19 : 7, 9, and on the phrase "the marriage of the Lamb is come" positively assert (the truth) that the marriage is then (at that period) consummated (so Barnes, etc.), and yet seeing that this involves a Pre-Mill. Advent of the bridegroom, they gravely inform us (as Fairbairn, etc.) that this very marriage of the Lamb is postponed until after the thousand years are expired, although announced previously, etc.† (7) Thus might be adduced admissions made respecting "restitution," "regeneration," "world to come," etc., and then can be shown how these again are contradicted when we come to the "restitution," etc., of the Mill. era, on the sole ground to avoid a Pre-Mill. Advent. The illustrations given are ample enough to indicate, that with all the boasted enlightenment above that of the early Church, the early Christians, alleged "babes" in knowledge, were incapable of perpetrating such opposite and contradictory expositions of Scripture. Their system of belief had, at least, unity of utterance and design.‡

* McKnight, in S. 4, prefixed to Exp. of 2 Thess., gives a one-sided and inferential representation of the passages relating to the Sec. Advent, which is completely set aside by the important concessions that 2 Thess. 2 : 8 calls for "a visible and extraordinary interposition of the power of Christ." His objections are fully met by us and, therefore, need no repeating. Dr. Hodge (Sys. Div., vol. 3, p. 794) admits the following passages to be predictions of a personal Advent, viz., Matt. 26 : 64 ; 24 : 30 ; Luke 21 : 27 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 7, and 2 : 1. This gives us all the leverage that is required to prove his own Post-Mill. Advent theory incorrect, seeing how these very passages are associated with a Pre-Mill. Advent, as will be fully shown. If Jesus confirmed the Abrahamic Covenant, not by a spiritual coming and a spiritual shedding of blood, but by a literal coming and shedding of blood, so to realize the promises of the same Covenant, He again comes, not spiritually, but literally, in order e.g. that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob may inherit (Prop. 49).

† As a multitude of writers make death a coming of Christ, as this view is extensively preached and held forth on funeral occasions, some additional remarks are in place. At present thousands employ language just as if death entered not "by sin" (i.e. was entailed, perpetuated), but was really one of the blessings designed for us by the Father through Christ. That which the Bible calls an "enemy," they designate a friend. They totally overlook the fact that "the triumph" over death, the Word unites with the resurrection; and that, however the believer is sustained to meet death, yet he is brought under subjection to death so that the prison house of the grave with its incident corruption, is his doom. Jesus died, and the enemy triumphed; Jesus rose from the dead, and He triumphed over His enemy; so believers die and like Jesus they can meet death with faith and hope that remove his terrors, but, like Jesus, they only triumph over death (so e.g. Paul, 1 Cor. 15) through the power of the resurrection. Some of our opponents on this point manifest an inconsistency that is remarkable. Thus e.g. Barnes's Notes on Heb. 5 : 7 (notice also his Remark 4 at close of ch.) at length shows that Jesus dreaded death as an enemy but was sustained, and infers from it that a believer also may dread death as an enemy, and be supported. And yet, Notes on Matt. 25 : 13, he makes this very enemy, thus dreaded, the Coming of the blessed Saviour! Many unthinkingly receive this Popish doctrine, which is illustrated: by the skeleton clook "in the hall or vestibule of the convent of La Trappe; a human skeleton is placed at the side of the dial, pointing to it with its fleshless finger and beneath is the inscription (in Latin) 'Watch! because ye know not the day nor the hour.'" It reminds us of the assumption of the Jesuits, in a document presented by the University of Paris to the Parliament in 1644, in which, among other pretensions, it is asserted by them that the Lord Jesus goes to meet every Jesuit who dies, to receive him, basing it on John 14, "I will come again," etc. Protestants give influence and weight to this view, and the result is that it leads into error. Thus e.g. the intermediate state is so exalted that a vast multitude consider death as a most happy occurrence. Thus, among the adherents of this opinion we select the Spiritualists: Owen (Deb. Land, p. 171) gives the common doctrine, when he says, "in all cases, in which life is well spent, the change which men are wont to call 'Death,' is God's last and best gift to his creatures here,"—"in strictness there is no death." Jesus, then, was guilty of great weakness when unable to appreciate this "best gift." The opinion entertained by believers is seized by others, even by sceptics, and employed by them as proof that death is no enemy, but is something eminently desirable; and the view of early Christians, Reformers, and eminent men in the Church that death is part of the curse—abundantly sustained by Scripture—is regarded as unreasonable and antiquated. Hence it is to be regretted that even excellent writers of a strong Millenarian cast (as e.g. Olshausen, Com., vol. 1, p. 226) make, in a few places, death equivalent to the Coming of the Lord Jesus. There is no foundation whatever for such a notion, it being a wrong inference. Let us contrast two of our opponents on this point. The author of The Kingdom of Grace (p. 10) confidently quotes "Come, Lord Jesus, even so, come quickly!" (Rev. 22 : 20) as a Coming in death, and insists that it is utterly wrong to pray it in any other sense! On the other hand, Dr. Brown, in his work specially designed against us (Sec. Coming, p. 22-24) argues that this substitution of death for Christ's Coming "is not fitted for taking that place in the view of the believer which Scripture assigns to the Sec. Advent," and assigns the following reasons: (1) "The death of believers, however changed in its character, in virtue of their union with Christ, is, intrinsically considered, not joyous, but grievous, not attractive but repulsive. It is the disruption of a tie which the Creator formed for perpetuity—the unnatural and abhorrent divorce of parties made for sweet and uninterrupted fellowship. And, as a substitute for the expectation of the Redeemer's appearing, this looking forward to one's own death will be found very deficient in practical effect." (2) "The bliss of the disembodied spirits of the just is not only incomplete, but in some sense, private and fragmentary, if I may so express myself. But at the Redeemer's appearing all His redeemed will be collected together, and perfectly and publicly glorified." (3) "To put the expectation of one's own death in place of the prospect of Christ's appearing, is to dislocate a beautiful jointing in divine truth, is to destroy one of its finest collocations," etc. Such concessions, so forcibly expressed, are amply sufficient to sustain our position. To preach death in the place of Christ's Coming is to contradict the Scriptures and substitute for "the blessed hope" (for which we are to hope, pray, and watch) an enemy that some are to escape (1 Cor. 15 : 51; 1 Thess. 4 : 15-17). The Coming of Jesus releases the dead from the power of death, and preserves the believing living from its sway. The disciples had no idea that such a coming involved death, for (John 21 : 22) on the strength of Christ's assertion that if it were His will John might be sustained until His coming again, the report was immediately spread that "he (John) shall not die." Here Jesus in the most pointed manner distinguishes between death and His own Coming: "if I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?"—which is explained that Jesus "said not unto him, he shall not die, but if I will that he tarry until I come." If death really is denoted by such a Coming, why is it not there distinctly stated, or explained, especially when the hearers did not and could not thus apply it? If death is the Coming of the Saviour, is it not strange that under the Mosaic law pollution was contracted by contact with a dead body, and that priests especially were charged against such defilement? If it is such an Advent why did not the Apostles, when encouraging the faith and imparting comfort to the bereaved, thus describe it? No! Let Universalists, Swedenborgians, besides many others, including a multitude of professed Orthodox, endeavor to make death a Friend, the Coming of Christ, "the Gate of Heaven," etc. On the other hand the unbiassed student will not forget that the Scriptures (as e.g. Rom. 5 : 12, 14, 17, 21, etc.) represent death as no Saviour but as the dire result of sin, a grievous portion of the curse. If death is the Coming of Jesus, or if it is the arrival of a Friend, then certainly the Thessalonian brethren had no reason for their fears, and Paul takes a strange method by which to comfort them by speaking of a still future Coming of Jesus for the express purpose of delivering from death, and of placing such a coming for deliverance after an apostacy and the rise of the man of sin. Dr. Rutter (Rom. Cath., in his Life of Jesus, p. 321) refers the Coming of Matt. 24 : 42-51 ; Luke 12 : 53, thus : "to each individual this return of Jesus is the moment of our departure out of this life, when we are immediately to be judged. Jesus knocks at our door when He strikes us with a mortal sickness," etc. And (p. 418) he quotes approvingly : "St. Austin, in his 80th letter, makes answer, that to each individual Christian, the day of his death is the day of Christ's Sec. Coming." This is a favorite with Romanists, and with many Protestants. They seem to revel in Young's saying : "Death is the crown of life—

"Death gives us more than was in Eden lost,
The King of Terrors is the Prince of Peace."

Whatever gain there is in death to the believer, whatever blessedness may await those who sleep in Jesus, etc., all this comes not because death bestows it, but in spite of him, through the grace of God in Christ Jesus, and, therefore, we earnestly protest to this transforming death into Christ, to this exalting death into a Prince of Peace, a Saviour, etc. (comp. Prop. 136). If the student desires a striking contrast of view, let him read the unscriptural opinion Beecher (Sermon on Mark 13 : 33-37, in the Ch. Union, Jan. 29, 1879) presents, totally ignoring a personal Advent, and applying the Coming to death, and then turn to the scriptural view Leask (Proph. Times, Dec. 12, 1863) gives, corresponding with Brown's just quoted. Dr. Winslow (The Sec. Com. of the Lord) and numerous writers have excellent remarks on this point.

<sup>2</sup> Thus to illustrate : Barnes, Com., makes "the harvest" of Matt. 13 to relate to the period of the personal Sec. Advent ; he also (thus differing from some other of our opponents) makes "the harvest" of Rev. 14 to be connected with the same period, thus virtually acknowledging a Pre-Mill. Advent, seeing that the scene of Rev. 14 (as well as what succeeds, as e.g. Rev. 19 and Rev. 20 : 1-7) takes place under the seventh or last trumpet, making the time preceding and introductory to Mill. era.

<sup>4</sup> Those who oppose us admit, that in a marriage the personal Advent of the Bridegroom is denoted (as e.g. in their comments on Matt. 25 : 1-13), because the figure, drawn from custom, demands it. Is it not passing strange, therefore, that in the marriage announced at the introduction of the Mill. era (Rev. 19 : 7-9), the idea of a present personal Bridegroom is rejected. Strange marriage! Some, however, to reconcile this awkward discrepancy, shelter themselves behind the far fetched opinion, that the marriage is simply announced before the Mill. period and is only consummated after the thousand years are ended. Remarkable announcement, indeed, when the Bride is ready and the express language is that "the marriage of the Lamb is come." Bh. Horsely (Ps., vol. 1, p. 15) and others notice that a number of the Psalms speak of the Advent of Christ as a Conqueror bearing a marked resemblance to the same Coming as presented in the Apoc., and that in both the Coming is connected with a marriage, an era of blessedness following.

<sup>3</sup> Desirous to present the reasoning of our opponents, we give those of one of the most recent. Thus in the Christian Union, Aug. 8th, 1877, is presented Christ's Coming Post-Millennial, by an Anti-Millenarian. To prove the Sec. Advent to be Post-Millennial, the following is urged. 1. Need not define the Millennium, because of "the silence of Scripture on that subject." If this is so, how then prove the Coming of Christ to follow such an era? 2. Then comes the often refuted assertion that our whole doctrine is based on "one passage," viz., Rev. 20 : 2-6. Now, this is derived from the assumption that our belief is founded on the idea of the duration of the reign of Christ and of His saints, and not, as our argument shows, on the Covenants and a multitude of glorious predictions. How does this subterfuge prove a Post-Millennial Coming? 3. He says of Rev. 20 : 2-6, "The only thing that the interpreters seem to be agreed in, as regards this thousand years, is that it is no Millennium at all." He thus makes a play on the word "thousand," making it appear as if all interpreters either made the thousand years symbolical (i.e. each day for a year), or else to stand "indefinitely," thus overlooking many who receive them as recorded. He also overlooks two points: (1) that the thousand years do not limit the reign of Christ and of His saints, and (2) that the word "Millennium" has (however derived from the time of the passage referred to) an extended meaning embracing the glorious era predicted by the prophets relating to Christ's Kingdom, the happiness and exaltation of the saints. Well may we ask, if there is no Millennium as the writer asserts, how can Christ's Coming be Post-Millennial? 4. The resurrection of Rev. 20:2-6 is "indefinite," i.e. it is "the reviving and royal supremacy of their spirit and life on earth." Our reply is given under Prop. 127, to this assertion without proof. The analogy of Scripture sustains our position. 5. Christ does not come before the Millennium because He comes at a literal resurrection, as seen in Matt. 25; John 5:28, 29; 2 Thess. 1:7-10. But this (1) takes for granted that Rev. 20:2-6 embraces a symbolical and not a literal resurrection; (2) makes no effort, the slightest, to remove or meet our reasons for its being a literal resurrection; (3) overlooks how other Scriptures verify our position, even including the passages quoted by him (comp. Props. 126 and 128). 6. Christ's Coming Post-Millennial for, as the writer asserts, it follows a universal preaching of the Gospel, Matt. 24:14; Mark 13:10, and the ingathering of the Jews, Rom., chs. 10 and 11. The reader will find this sufficiently answered under Prop. 113 and Prop. 175. After this weak and trifling appeal to Scripture to substantiate so important a point—an effort unworthy of its serious and commanding nature—then follow, making an appeal to prejudice, three false statements. 1. "The Millenarian view leads to the disparagement of the Gospel by representing it as unequal to its work and sure to fail in it." While, on the other hand, his view of evangelizing the world honors the Gospel. We say the Gospel performs its allotted work, its high mission, and is no failure (comp. Prop. 175). 2. "The Anti-Millenarian view is the only scriptural and spiritual one of Christ's Coming." To this assumption the writer is welcome, but we object to the reason assigned for the same as anti-scriptural, viz., because it holds that Christ may come at any time in death, which nearness to death Paul meant when writing to the Thessalonians. This transforms Jesus the Christ into the enemy death. 3. Millenarianism obscures and postpones the Coming of Christ, because it invites attention to events, "it makes us curious students of history rather than devout readers of the Bible," as e.g. illustrated in "the Cummings and Record school of interpreters." The main objection urged by the religious and secular press against Cummings, etc., is that the nearness of the Sec. Advent was so prominent and cardinal a feature of the system, and that references to events were given only to enforce it. This seeking after objections and such flings at the personal piety of Millenarians cannot and will not affect the student.

Obs. 8. Leaving the objections to be answered by the proof that shall be adduced, attention is invited to this feature, viz., that as the covenant promises and the Millennial descriptions demand a Pre-Millennial personal Advent, we find this very phase of doctrine presented to us in a variety of aspects, as if purposely to meet and answer the objections that are alleged against it. And the Spirit, to confirm our hopes excited by the Covenant, presents it in forms so as to leave no doubt of a real, personal Coming being intended. We give the evidence as briefly as is consistent with a clear understanding of the same, keeping in view the demands of various classes of our readers.

1. In the portraiture of the Mill. era, it is repeatedly promised that all suffering, sorrow, shedding of tears—in short, all evil shall be removed by a certain Coming. Now such a deliverance, we know from many positive declarations, will never be witnessed until the Second personal Advent; for down to that period, the Church itself—all saints—shall be subject to suffering, sorrow, tears, and trial. The freedom from evil united with the promises of the personal Advent, are precisely the same specified with the Pre-Mill. Coming and Mill. glory to be seen on the earth. And, therefore, as we dare not separate what God has joined together, these Comings must be the same and relate to the same period of time.<sup>1</sup>

2. The Millennial descriptions of the Prophets, it must be admitted, are not yet realized. They are preceded by and connected with a Coming of the Lord; and if that era is still future (as a comparison of them with history unmistakably proves), it follows that the Coming linked with it is also in the future. Now the personality of the Coming is admitted as it relates to some of the predictions, as e.g. Jer. 23 : 5; Jer. 30 : 9; Ezek. 37 : 22-25; Ezek. 34 : 23, etc., under the impression that they relate to the First Advent. But if it can be shown that the prophecies were not realized at that Coming, the admissions of the personality still remain and also refer to the future. To illustrate: Take Jer. 23 : 5, and if we allow the context to have its due force, then it follows that it is not yet fulfilled, because (1) the gathering of the Jews was not then witnessed; (2) the Jews were not delivered from fear, dismay, and want; (3) Judah and Israel did not dwell safely; (4) instead of dwelling in their own land they were driven out, etc. Or, select Jer. 30 : 9, and it was not verified, because (1) there was no return of the nation to the land of their fathers; (2) the yoke upon the nation was not broken; (3) Jacob was not saved out of his trouble; (4) the blessings enumerated as connected with the restoration were not experienced. Thus passage after passage might be taken, and the same deductions made from the context, all showing that the Advent referred to is yet to come.

3. The doctrine of a literal first resurrection (Props. 125-129) establishes a literal Pre-Mill. Advent, seeing that that resurrection precedes the Millennium. Lange (Com., p. 421; Matt. 24) tersely says: "It is baseless to regard the Coming of Christ to the first resurrection as altogether spiritual." Even our opponents unite the resurrection of the dead with a personal Coming, and argue, scripturally, that the former is a result of the latter. The admissions of Prof. Stuart and others, as to the literalness of the resurrection, involves this personal Coming.

4. "The Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints," 1 Thess. 3 : 13 (comp. ch. 4 : 14; Jude 14), is admitted to be a literal one. But the same thing is asserted to take place, viz., the Coming of the Lord and all the saints with Him, as Pre-Millennial in Zech. 14 : 5."

5. The Advent of Rev. 19 : 11-29, is a Pre-Mill. one, and is a personal Coming, being parallel with Rev. 14 : 14-20.<sup>3</sup> A large number of our opponents, overlooking consistency in their own system, yet forced by the scene described, frankly declare that the latter passage (Rev. 14 : 14) denotes the literal Advent of the Son of Man. Thus e.g. Barnes, Com. loci, informs us that it applies to the end, consummation, etc., at which time he locates the Sec. Advent. But in both places the design in Coming and the acts performed by "the Coming One" are the same, to save His people and overthrow His enemies. In both places the beast and abettors are destroyed, for they shall not exist in the Millennium; and both places are located under the last trumpet, indicating the precise time when we are to look for it, viz., before the Millennium commences.

6. In His Second Advent it is asserted that He shall "come in the clouds of heaven." Angels, Christ Himself, and the Apostles declare this to be a concomitant of the Advent. Daniel (7 : 13) expressly describes this, that "the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven," and on thus coming the Kingdom and dominion under the whole heaven is given to Him. In Rev. 14 : 14, commentators, etc, as Barnes, loci, admit "a designed reference to Daniel," but if, as they also admit that, Rev. 14 : 14, refers to the personal Advent, then Daniel must predict the same. We are not, however, left to human conjecture on the application of Daniel's prediction of the Advent. Jesus directly applies it to His future Advent. When before Caiphas, well knowing how the Jews regarded this prophecy, He boldly (Matt. 26 : 64) says : "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven," thus not only locating this Coming in the future, reaffirming its personality by the "shall ye see ;" but even, under the grave charge of blasphemy, establishing the Jewish view, that they made a correct application of the prophecy to a personally manifested Messiah."

7. To that class of interpreters who confess the personal Advent to be designated by Daniel, but refer it to His First Advent, we reply : Notice, that the reference made by Christ to it as delineating His Coming at some future time confirms the order given by us under Prop. 104. The Coming is witnessed, not as at the First Advent when the fourth Empire was undivided, long before the horns arose, etc., but in its divided state, and after the horns had arisen and progressed, etc. The unity of the prophecy demands the location of the Advent where Jesus places it."

8. The personal Advent, its uncertainty, suddenness, and stealthy approach is likened, by Matthew, Luke, Paul, and others to that of a thief. Commentators, etc., abundantly connect the idea of a personal Coming with the phrase. It has also been said that a thief does not come figuratively but personally ; and the likening of the one to the other embraces the notion of a personal Coming as well as that of the manner of His Coming. But mark, under the sixth vial, just before the fearful gathering of nations, the outpouring of awful judgments, and the Millennium, the Apostle John, giving the testimony of Jesus, Rev. 16 : 15, says : "Behold I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth," etc. Why does the Spirit thus employ expressions identical in spirit and design, if not to teach us that this Coming in a thief-like manner is a personal Pre-Millennial one?"

9. The Apocalypse begins with "Behold, He comes with clouds and every eye shall see Him," etc., and ends with "Surely, I come quickly." The concessions made by opponents on these phrases are numerous, and contradictory to their spiritual interpretations. But they are not needed, for the great vital topic of the Book, viz., the Coming of Jesus, is self-evident ; for all the predictions are given to testify to the same, and to events preceding, connected with, and following it. So apparent is this, that some reject the book solely on this ground as teaching a "Jewish" Coming and reign of a personal Messiah. We, however, joyfully accept of this feature as blessed evidence of its inspiration, making it confirmatory of covenanted promises. Now is it reasonable to suppose, that in a Revelation designed to give special information respecting this personal Advent announced in its opening and close as a source of faith, hope, and warning, that an Advent should be specified as preceding the Millennium which is to be understood differently from a personal one, when the language describing it is similar to that employed in other places to designate a personal one? The Spirit, we contend, purposely uses the same phraseology in order to prevent us, if wise, from perverting this doctrine of His Coming."

10. When Christ comes personally, the holy angels or messengers come with Him, 2 Thess. 1 : 7 ; Matt. 13 : 39, 41 ; 16 : 21 ; 24 : 31, etc. This is also said in reference to the Pre-Mill. Coming ; for in Rev. 14 : 10 (perhaps Eng. version of Joel 3 : 11) ; Rev. 19 : 17 ; Rev. 20 : 1, etc., we find angels participate in it, and perform the same things ascribed to them in the preceding passages.

11. When He comes personally we (2 Thess. 1 : 7, 8) read : “ The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels in flaming fire,” etc. Other passages teach that then “ the tares,” “ the chaff,” shall be “ cast into a furnace of fire,” shall be “ burned with fire unquenchable,” etc. Fire, as descriptive of God’s vengeance, etc., is an element intimately connected with it. The very same is frequently stated in relation to this Pre-Mill. Advent. Thus e.g. Isa. 66 : 15, 16, “ Behold the Lord will come with fire and with His chariots like a whirlwind, to render His anger with fury and His rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire and by His sword will the Lord plead with all flesh,” etc., which is almost the phraseology of Paul. Then follows the Millennial glory. Daniel, Joel, Malachi, Isaiah, and others speak of a fire that shall consume and destroy in connection with the Lord’s Coming, to be followed by a glorious Kingdom. This confirmatory fact may be added : in Matt. 25 : 31 ; Matt. 13 : 40-42, etc., it is declared that the wicked are cast into “ everlasting fire.” This is done at the personal Sec. Advent, as theologians, of all classes, proclaim. If we turn to the events immediately preceding the Millennium and related to the Coming then manifested, we read, Rev. 19 : 20, and Rev. 14 : 9, 10, that certain wicked are cast into a “ lake of fire” at this very period. The Spirit again identifies them.

12. In His Sec. Advent, He is represented as coming as (e.g. Matt. 25 : 34) a King. This is also the characteristic attributed to the Pre-Millennial Coming that He is revealed as “ the King” (Zech. 14), even “ King of Kings” (Rev. 19), etc. Our entire argument makes this a pre-requisite.<sup>8</sup>

13. In the Sec. Advent, Christ comes as Judge, engaged in judging. If there is one feature that specially appertains to the Pre-Mill. Advent it certainly is this, that in numerous places His Coming as Judge and judging is blended with it. See Props. 132, 133, 134.

14. At the Sec. Advent a Kingdom is said to be revealed, as 2 Tim. 4 : 1, “ at His appearing and His Kingdom.” This is frequently, as we have abundantly shown, described as following the Pre-Mill. Advent.<sup>9</sup>

15. At the personal Coming of Jesus, the Scriptures locate a gathering of saints from all quarters, 2 Thess. 2 : 1, etc. This is precisely what is said to be done at the Advent before the Millennium in numerous places, as has already been indicated. This gathering is described, more or less, by the Prophets, so that even Augustine (City of God, B. 20, c. 23) makes Ps. 50 : 3-5, denote the personal Coming of Christ.<sup>10</sup>

16. At the Sec. Advent Jesus shall “ sit upon the throne of His glory,” Matt. 25 : 31. This is also stated to follow the Pre-Mill. Coming. Both the throne and the glory, or “ the glorious throne” are mentioned, as will be seen in the Prop. on the reign. In comparing such passages as Col. 3 : 4, Ps. 102, etc., with the Mill. glory, the identity is established. Besides the specific mention of Christ’s throne—a throne even David’s (Acts 2 : 30, etc.) belonging specially to Him—upon which He personally sits, Rev. 3 : 21, we find the same throne particularly mentioned in the Pre-Mill. Coming, as in Ps. 89 ; Isa. 9 : 7 ; Jer. 33 ; Ezek. 37, etc.

17. Into this Kingdom of Christ’s, linked with His “ appearing,” believers enter, 1 Pet. 1 : 7, 13 ; Matt. 25 : 34 ; comp. 2 Pet. 1 : 11, etc.

The personal presence of Jesus, as all believe, is then enjoyed. But the Scriptures unite in locating this entrance, inheriting, reigning, etc., in the Kingdom with the Millennium itself; and hence it implies His personal presence. For, all the promises of future happiness and glory given to the saints to be hereafter enjoyed in Christ's Kingdom and presence, are also found recorded and fully designated in the Mill. descriptions.

18. The period of Christ's personal return is at the time of "regeneration," Matt. 19 : 28, that great glorious "new birth" (res.) of the sons of God and of Creation. But this "regeneration" is identified with the Mill. age (Prop. 145), and hence the Advent is personal.

19. So likewise the period of the "restitution of all things" is preceded by "sending Jesus Christ," "whom the heavens must receive until the times" are ushered in. Barnes, loci, even admits: "until: this word implies that He would then return to the earth." To effect this "restitution" Christ's personal presence is promised. But this "restitution" is the grand theme of the Millennial predictions, the scope of its prophecy, the alleged design of the establishment of the Millennium. See Prop. 144."

20. The personal Advent of Christ is united, by nearly all, with the deliverance of suffering creation from the bondage of corruption, Rom. 8 : 19-21. The Millennial predictions portray this very deliverance and hence it includes that presence. See Prop. 146.

21. Commentators, etc., inform us that Christ is evidently present in the New Heavens and New Earth of 2 Pet. 3 : 10-13, etc. But the New Heavens and New Earth of promise (so stated by Peter) are found in the Millennial descriptions, Isa. 65 : 17-25, Isa. 66 : 22, and, in the nature of the case, must include the same presence. See Props. 148 and 151.

22. The Spirit, as if purposely to meet the anticipated unbelief, even condescends to tell us, that "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mt. of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the East," Zech. 14 : 4. In this Pre-Mill. Advent the exact locality is pointed out (the same from whence He ascended to heaven), and His personality indisputably demonstrated by "His feet shall stand," etc. The language is alone applicable to a Pre-Mill. personal Coming, and distinctively refers us to the promise of the angels, Acts 1 : 11."

23. But, in addition, to indicate in the most striking manner the personality of this Pre-Mill. Coming, it is stated that He shall be seen at that time. Thus, in Micah 3 : 12, the mountain of the house is made desolate, but in Micah 4 : 1, etc., this same house is restored, and all agree that in the latter we have a Millennial description. Now, if we turn to Matt. 23 : 38, 39, and Luke 13 : 35, it is stated that Jesus at His First Advent did not restore this house which He found and left desolate, but will do so when He comes again: "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall NOT SEE ME HENCEFORTH, till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord. Behold, your house is left unto you desolate, and verily I say unto you, YE SHALL NOT SEE ME until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." This unequivocally teaches that the people saw Him there; that for a time He would be invisible to the nation, but that they should again see Him; and that seeing would be at the time when He would restore the house from its desolation. The Millennial prophecies show the removal of this desolation, and hence, that He shall be then seen. But we have more explicit passages: in Rev. 1 : 7, "Behold He cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see Him; and they also which pierced Him, and all Kindreds of the earth (some read: all tribes of the land) shall wail because of Him." This at once recalls the parallel prediction of Zech. 12 : 10, which binds the whole in unity; for at the very time "the house of David" is restored the Millennial predictions are to be verified in the bestowal upon the Jewish nation of the long-promised (but long-delayed) blessings, then "they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him," etc. This is corroborated by the general tenor of the prophecies which speak of the presence of the Redeemer, their King, David, etc., at the restoration of the Jewish nation, and of His pleading with the Jews "face to face," etc.<sup>13</sup>

24. This again is confirmed by James, Acts 15 : 16, 17, "after this I (Christ) will return," etc., i.e. after a people are gathered out, as predicted, Jesus will "return" to rebuild the tabernacle of David, etc. Those even who reject our views admit that this "return" is a personal Coming, but inconsistently and violently apply it to the First Advent. But the simple fact that it is a "return;" that it occurs after a certain event is accomplished (yet in course of fulfilment, viz., the gathering); that the tabernacle of David is yet in ruins; that it corresponds with the analogy of prophecy teaching a personal presence, then an absence, and finally a personal return, etc.—makes it alone applicable to the Pre-Mill. Advent.<sup>14</sup>

25. Paul significantly points to the Pre-Mill. personal Advent in Rom. 11, when he connects with it the removal of the blindness of the Jewish nation, and says: "There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer." For in thus representing Him as Coming in relation to this event, he accords with the portrayal of the Millennium, and, as we have previously intimated, with the Jewish doctrine that "the Coming One" is to perform a great work for the nation. He links his faith with that of the nation's, as expressed by John the Baptist ("art Thou the Coming One?"), by the people at the entry into Jerusalem ("the Coming One"), but transfers it, as Jesus did (see above 22, which some render "Blessed is the Coming One") to the still future Advent.<sup>15</sup>

26. Rev. 11 : 15-18, with its "time of the dead that they should be judged," its "reward unto Thy servants the prophets," its removal and destruction of the wicked, etc., cannot possibly be reconciled with a postponement of these events until after the Millennial period has expired. The simple announcement of them under the seventh trumpet is sufficient to sustain our position. These things demand for their fulfilment a personal Pre-Mill. Advent.

27. Phrases are employed, in connection with this Pre-Mill. Coming, which can only be consistently explained as denoting a personal Coming. Thus e.g. in Rev. 14 : 10, the image-worshippers, who are to be destroyed, Rev. 19, before the Mill. age, are to "be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb," i.e. they are to witness (Alford, "visible") their punishment—indeed, as we find in other places, inflict it. Again, in Isa. 26 : 21, "Behold the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity," etc., thus vacating the place that now holds Him in accordance with the promise of the angels, etc. This at once reminds the student of Hos. 5 : 15, Zech. 8 : 3, etc.<sup>16</sup>

28. When Christ comes, He shall "rule with a rod of iron," etc. In Rev. 2 : 27, the saints are to be associated with Him in ruling with the same rod. Now, some of our most persistent opposers frankly admit that this participation of the saints in such ruling will only be witnessed "when the Son of God will come to judge the world." In Rev. 19 : 15, before the Mill. era, Jesus comes, and it is announced that "He shall rule them with a rod of iron."

29. Again, we may insist upon the personality contained in the phrase, "Son of Man." It is employed, as all concede, to designate the Sec. Advent, a Coming not merely as a divine personage, but as Son of Man, glorified it is true, but one united with humanity, a true descendant of David's. He is designated the same, as we have shown, in Pre-Mill. predictions (Dan. 7 : 13 ; Rev. 14 : 14), thus showing, if we will but receive it, that a personal Advent is intended.

30. In correspondence with this, Paul tells us, Acts 17 : 31, that when Christ comes to judge, He comes as the "Man ordained." The sacred writers designate Him as "the Man," the descendant of David's, the promised seed who comes before the Millennial era ; therefore, we cannot mistake the Coming of this personage, who is appointed to be revealed as the appointed, ordained, and actual Son of David. In Zech. 6 : 8, "Behold the Man whose name is the Branch," etc., we have, as the Apostles corroborate, the work of salvation in its initial, execution, and completion carried on by the Lord Jesus not merely in His relation to God as His Son, but as "the Man" promised to David. Coming as "the Man," involves the personal Pre-Mill. Advent.

31. This personality and Pre-Mill. Coming can be derived, by comparing Scripture, in several ways from Phil. 2 : 10, 11, "that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things (beings) in heaven, and things in (beings on) earth, and things (beings) under the earth."

a. The time when this is to be fulfilled is seen from the parallel passage, Rom. 14 : 10, 11, "We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. For, it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God." Christ is personally present on this judgment-seat. But according to Isa. 45 : 23 ; Isa. 65 : 16, 23 ; Ps. 63 : 11, etc., this will occur at the period when Mill. blessedness is bestowed. See Props. 132, 133, and 134, on Judgment and Judgment Day.

b. It is admitted even by our opponents, that the "things under the earth" that shall "bow" the "knee" are "beings," viz., the dead, the resurrected dead that shall appear." The application of the passage by Paul indicates a personal presence ; the resurrection of the dead requires the same. This resurrection, we have shown, is, so far as the saints, Pre-Millennial, and the passage quoted by Paul standing related to the Millennium (as shown by many commentators, see e.g. Barnes, On Isa. 45 : 23), it follows that, if verified, Christ is personally present to whom this homage is rendered.

c. The personal name that is to be thus acknowledged is indicative of the personal presence. The Jesus, Joshua, or Saviour is designated "the Christ," "the Messiah." By the latter name He is known as the covenanted seed of promise ; the former is His personal name. The Apostle argues that not only the name Christ which both Jews and Gentiles acknowledge, but the personal name given by God to this one person, viz., that of Jesus as the Christ and consequently the Lord, the predicted and covenanted Ruler in the Davidic order, shall be openly acknowledged by all. Now, such an acknowledgment of the name, identifying the Lordship with the person called Jesus, seems to demand a personal presence, which, doubtless, led the angels to say so pointedly, Acts 1 : 11, "this same Jesus," etc. This contributes to the honor and glorification of the Father, that that which is now denied by so many should be openly manifested, especially before His covenanted nation. If we accept of the application and amplification of this Millennial description by Paul, then it follows that Christ is personally thus acknowledged at the Mill. era. The whole passage impresses us with distinctive personality.

32. In the description of His personal Advent, Matt. 25 : 31, informs us that "before Him shall be gathered all nations," etc. This is an adjunct of the Pre-Mill. Coming, for Isa., Jer., Ezek., Zeph., Joel, Zech., John, and others unite in declaring that a gathering of the nations shall take place immediately preceding and connected with such a Coming. Rev. 16 : 14-16, and Rev. 19 : 19, etc., are alone a complete confirmation of such a Pre-Mill. gathering linked with the Advent. The Spirit again identifies the Coming.

33. It is granted that, Matt. 13 : 30, 39, 41, Jesus personally comes at the harvest at the end of the age. Joel (3 : 13, etc.) informs us that the Lord will come when the harvest is ripe, before the Millennium. So Rev. 14 : 14, 15, tells us that "the Son of Man" shall come when "the harvest of the earth is ripe," and this also precedes the Millennial era. This connection of the Advents with the "harvest" by the Spirit is intentional so that we may identify them as one and the same.

34. The Coming of the Son of Man, Matt. 24 and Luke 21, is "after," "immediately after" a tribulation which runs down through the times of the Gentiles, and is accompanied by the gathering or harvest of the elect. With all the efforts made by our opponents to spiritualize this Coming into a Providential one, nearly all of them are forced to allow that it includes a future personal one. But if so (which we believe), then it follows that it must be one preceding the Mill. age, because it is to be witnessed at the closing period of this long-continued tribulation—a tribulation which, in the very nature of the case, cannot enter into or exist contemporaneously with the Millennium. This Advent then precedes it."

35. The Sec. Advent is designed for Salvation, Heb. 9 : 28, etc. This we have shown is a distinguishing characteristic of the Pre-Mill. Coming, and hence, as Barnes informs us (Com. loci), "Tholuck and the Germans generally" interpret Rom. 13 : 11 to apply "to the personal reign of Christ on earth." That such an application of the passage is correct is evident (1) from the contrast of night and day following (see Props. 138 and 139, on Day of Christ), and (2) in using the words "Salvation," "night," and "day," according to Jewish usage and expectations (comp. e.g. Isa. 25 : 9).

36. In the Sec. Advent four things are united, as e.g. in 2 Thess. 1 : 5-11, (1) the rest or Kingdom ; (2) the triumphant, irresistible Coming of Jesus ; (3) the overthrow of and vengeance upon the enemies ; (4) the deliverance and blessedness of God's people. These four things are also united with the Pre-Mill. Coming, as can be seen by reference to numerous Mill. predictions, already frequently quoted.

37. The binding and confinement of Satan is Pre-Millennial. This is Christ's work, and the entire train of prediction from Gen. 3 : 15 down leaves the decided impression that this is done by a personal manifestation ; for while provision was made at the First Advent to accomplish it, the victory itself is not seen until the time of the Second. Down to the Sec. Coming Satan is the avowed, loosened enemy, corrupting the Church and the world, exciting the nations to open hostility, to whose power the saints are exposed and the sleeping are held fast in his bonds. Such a deposing and binding of Satan, as the Millennium demands to secure a fulfilment of promise, the appointed Seed alone, in His own personal power, can perform.

38. We may urge even the eminent fitness of Christ, the Second Adam, manifesting Himself personally in the very place where Satan obtained his triumphs over the first Adam, at the very time that Satan is bound and his work of deception is stayed. Where man fell, there the triumph of man, the woman's seed, is also to be exhibited ; and if so, it involves a personal Coming at the period of the Millennium.

39. Hence, this is confirmed by the announcement, that this Pre-Mill. Coming is for the purpose of "Redemption." It is granted that He comes personally in "the day of Redemption," Matt. 19 : 27, 28 ; Rom. 8 : 23 ; Eph. 4 : 30, etc. The Mill. descriptions are full of this Redemption ; that Jesus then comes as "Redeemer," that He then "redeems" His people, and that they shall be called "the redeemed," "the redeemed of the Lord," etc. The accordance of phraseology, the identity of acts performed, etc., again teach us what Coming is intended.

40. The personal Coming shall occur when "the mystery of God is finished." That the finishing of the mystery includes the open revelation of Christ, the vindication of God's ways, the judgments of Christ, the overthrow of Satan and his deposition from being "the god of this world," and the exaltation of the saints, is admitted by our opponents.* In Rev. 10 : 7 it is asserted in the most express terms, that "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as He hath declared to His servants the Prophets." Under this seventh trumpet (and mark, too, at the beginning of the sounding and not at its close, or, as some even grossly have it, a thousand years after the sounding) then, which introduces the Millennium, this mystery relating to the Kingdom, the general theme of the Prophets, is finished. If the mystery is indeed finished, then the King has come and the Kingdom is established. If we notice the events occurring under this last trumpet, they are precisely such as include the Advent and Kingdom. Briefly, if the mystery of God as stated by the Prophets, the divine purpose of God in Christ, the consummation of covenanted promises, is then finished, completed, manifested, then it follows, of necessity, that the Pre-Mill. Coming of Jesus under this seventh trumpet is a personal one.**

41. The Spirit locates the marriage of the Lamb as Pre-Millennial, and against the statements of the multitude who would postpone it until the close of the Millennium, expressly says, Rev. 19 : 7, 8, 9, that this "marriage of the Lamb is come," etc. A marriage without the personal presence of the bridegroom is an incongruity. Such a presence is *demand*ed by the blessings bestowed by the marriage, and is insured by the Advent predicted in its connection, and by the allusions to it, as in Matt. 25 : 1-13, and in the Prophets.**

42. This is forcibly corroborated by the Scripture just referred to, viz., the parable (Matt. 25 : 1-13) of the ten virgins. For the preceding context and the word "then" indicate that a delineation of the Church is given as it will exist at the Sec. Advent. The Bridegroom comes, and those who are prepared "went in with Him to the marriage." The Coming of the Bridegroom is represented as personal, for the wise "go out to meet Him," and are "with Him." This Coming must be Pre-Millennial, for such a mixture of wise and foolish does not exist in the Millennium. The parable which follows that of the virgins also teaches a personal Coming.

43. At the Sec. Advent when, Matt. 16 : 27, "the Son of Man shall come in the glory of His Father, then He shall reward every man according to his works." The same thing of rewarding is stated in connection with this Pre-Mill. Coming. Thus e.g. Isa. 40 : 10 ; Rev. 11 : 18, etc., distinctly announce it.

44. Heb. 1 : 6, "And when He bringeth in (marg. read when He bringeth again) the first begotten into the world, He saith, And let all the angels of God worship Him." This verse which has perplexed many expositors is plain, if we but remember that Christ is called "the first begotten" with reference to His resurrection from the dead in Rev. 1 : 5. and Col. 1 : 18, and that the Apostle had just referred in preceding verse (comp. Acts 13 : 33 with verse 5) to the resurrection of Christ as a begetting. As taught distinctively in marg. reading, with which critics generally agree, this same resurrected, first begotten Jesus shall come "again." This must be applied to His Second Coming, seeing that it is after He is constituted "the First Begotten." If the personal Advent is intended, as expositors hold, it can be shown to be Pre-Millennial by the quotation appended by Paul, "let all the angels," etc. If the quotation is derived (Barnes) from the Septuagint rendering of Deut. 32 : 43, then it is identified with "avenging the blood of His servants, and rendering vengeance to His adversaries," thus agreeing with the acts assigned to Christ's Pre-Mill. Coming. If, on the other hand, it is taken from Ps. 97 : 7, then it stands in immediate relation to the reigning and "presence of the Lord of the whole earth," the destruction or "burning up," of His enemies, the overthrow of image-worshippers, the exaltation of Zion, all people seeing His glory, etc., thus again corresponding with events ascribed to Christ's Advent before and at the Millennium."

45. There is a day of the Lord, of Jesus Christ, of the Son of Man to be revealed in the future. In Luke 17 : 24 ; Phil. 1 : 6, etc., it is allowed that Christ will be personally present in that day. It is easy to show by a comparison of Scripture that "the day of the Lord" mentioned in Millennial predictions is the same spoken of by the Apostles. This we will do hereafter (Props. 138 and 139), and for the present it is amply sufficient to say that the use of the phrase by the Apostles confirmed the Jewish idea of "the day of the Lord," "the day of the Messiah," as the predicted Millennial day. If the Jewish expectation was erroneous, as moderns now say, then it was wrong for inspired men to employ such confirmatory phraseology without appending a suitable correction or definition, etc."

46. The reader, if a careful student of the Word, must have noticed the peculiarity, that not one of the Prophets speak of an Advent to follow the Millennial age. It is something—although now so prevalent—utterly unknown to them. The Coming of the Lord, the predicted Seed, etc., is always represented as occurring previously, and that age is described as the result of such an Advent. It is in vain to look for any other order given by the holy men of old ; and therefore, in the nature of the case, they denoted, as the Jews, disciples, and Apostles held, a personal Coming.<sup>25</sup>

47. In addition to this, in the epitome of events running down from the establishment of the Christian Church to the Sec. Advent, such as Matt., chs. 24 and 26 ; 2 Thess. 2 ; Mark 13 ; Luke 21, in direct reference to this personal Coming, no mention is made of an intervening Millennium of blessedness, such as the Prophets describe, but tribulation, oppression, apostasy, etc., are to be experienced and witnessed. Hence that Sec. Advent attached to these epitomes, allowed by commentators, etc., to be personal, must precede that age.<sup>26</sup>

48. Eminent writers on prophecy have well remarked, that the First and Second Advents are sometimes so linked together in prophecy that it requires discrimination to discern what belongs to the one or to the other. The same language is applied to both so far as Coming is concerned, only that the one (the First) refers more directly to humiliation, suffering, etc., the other (the Second) to the glory that shall be revealed. The Sec. Advent is an outgrowth or result of the First (Props. 34, 66, 75, etc.). The simple fact that they are thus spoken of together, without an effort at discrimination ; that the Second is far more definitely and minutely described than the First ; that they both (the First as preparative) stand related to the Millennium—this should influence us to believe that as one was literal, so the other will be the same.

49. This Pre-Mill. Coming is a personal one, on the ground that the objections alleged against its personality apply, if legitimately carried out, with equal force against the First Advent or a future personal Sec. Advent. If so many arguments, showing that it is personal, have no weight, if they can be so readily explained away as figurative, or spiritual, or providential, then it follows, if that principle of interpretation is logically applied, that there is no personal Coming of Christ in the future. Who that hath faith in the simple, sublime utterances of God will credit this? Alas ! multitudes are doing this to-day ; taking the weapons forged to their hand by reputed orthodox divines, influenced by the refining mystical process so generally adopted in these passages they spiritualize the Sec. Advent ; churches, counting their thousands upon thousands, utterly reject a personal Sec. Advent, and the leaven is penetrating far and wide. Such an Advent as we contend for is personal, thus making our system of interpretation a consistent and uniform one, leaving no room, and affording no refuge, for the denial of a Second personal Advent.<sup>27</sup>

50. But brevity demands a mere mention of other arguments, such as (1) the supernatural and miraculous events connected with the Kingdom (Props. 6 and 7). (2) The prophecies interpreted literally (Prop. 21) sustains it. (3) The preaching of John, Jesus, disciples, and Apostles indorses it (Prop. 16, etc.). (4) The re-establishment of the Theocracy in the Davidic line demands it (Props. 31, 32, 33, 48, 49, etc.). (5) The postponement of the Kingdom indicates it (Props. 56, 57, 58, 59, etc.). (6) The preaching of the Apostles after the death and ascension of Christ (Props. 71-74). (7) The removal of the Kingdom to the close of the tribulation and times of the Gentiles (Prop. 66). (8) The doctrine of the election corroborates it (Props. 62-65). (9) This Kingdom a Jewish one in its foundation, etc. (Prop. 68). (10) Arguments can be derived from what has been said respecting the Church (Props. 88-104, etc.). (11) The specific mention and promise of the Kingdom to David's Son (Prop. 84).

(12) Incidental arguments from the visibility, etc., of the Kingdom, the oneness of the Kingdom, the teaching of the parables, the inheriting of the land by David's Son and His brethren, the corroboration of passages supposed to teach the contrary, the restoration of the Jewish nation, etc. (see Props. on these). (13) Additional arguments will be found in following Propositions.<sup>33</sup>

51. Millenarian writers have always insisted that a personal Pre-Mill. Advent is to be witnessed under the seventh or last trumpet. Now, Bengel in his Gnomon has shown, that by the authority of the earliest mss. the phrases "and art to come" in Rev. 11 : 17, "and shalt be" in Rev. 16 : 5, are to be rejected. This criticism is fully sustained by the authoritative Sinaitic mss. discovered by Prof. Tischendorf. The student may well ponder this omission thus given by the Spirit. Why should the title of "Who is to come," or "the Coming One" given in Rev. 1 : 4, 8 and 4 : 8 be omitted in 11 : 17 and 16 : 5? The reason, so corroborative of our faith, was given long ago by Ansbert (as quoted by Bengel) : "They do not here subjoin, as they are accustomed, 'and Who art to come;' they speak of Him as already present." This omission, as the weightiest mss. (admitted by Anti-Millenarians, as Prof. Stuart, Com.) prove, is not accidental but intentional, showing that the Coming One is no longer expected to come, but has already come. It is a beautiful, incidental, and most powerful proof confirmatory of our position, indicative of a Pre-Mill. arrival and presence.<sup>34</sup>

52. The Jews (Prop. 160, Obs. 2, etc.) held that the Antichrist preceded the personal Coming of the Son of Man, which view was derived from Dan. 7, etc. Now (1) the Antichrist did not precede the first Advent; (2) Paul (2 Thess.), John (Apoc.), well knowing this Jewish doctrine, locate this Antichrist in the future; (3) they, employing language expressive of a personal Advent and without indicating the Jews to be in error, associate with this Antichrist (i.e. his destruction) the personal Coming of Jesus; (4) this Antichrist, the Coming of Christ, and the overthrow of the former, are witnessed before the ushering in of the Millennium. This is the plain order laid down by the Spirit.

53. It is admitted, as we have repeatedly shown (Prop. 75, etc.) from others, that the Apostles and those under their immediate instruction looked for a near Advent of the Saviour. The express language is so definite on this point that it is not susceptible of a different interpretation, so that commentators concede it, some with and others without any explanation. Having previously given (e.g. Prop. 74) the probable reasons for such a faith, we now refer to it as a decided proof of their belief in a personal Pre-Mill. Advent. For urging this nearness, an event that might at any time occur, after the rise and progress of an apostasy, indicates in the clearest manner that they at least did not entertain the modern Whitbyan "new hypothesis" of an intervening Millennium before the Advent. Taking it even for granted (which we do not) that they were "ignorant" or "mistaken" as to future events and the period of time to elapse before that Advent, it does not follow that they were also "ignorant," etc., as to the nature of the Advent or its connection with continued suffering, etc., down to its occurrence. If the Advent itself that they looked for is personal, then the knowledge they had received from Christ respecting the Kingdom and the plain predictions of Millennial blessedness to be realized at a Coming of Christ's, if they were to be experienced in this dispensation, would most certainly have prevented such utterances in men who were guided into truth by the same Spirit that gave the predictions. The unity is alone preserved by admitting that the Advent is Pre-Millennial. If in error on the one point, they were the same in making it Pre-Millennial. We are content to remain "ignorant" and "mistaken" in such company, for we recognize a propriety in such declarations utterly irreconcilable with current doctrines.

54. We hold to this Pre-Mill. Coming as personal, because we are plainly told that as the Millennial age draws nigh, the world, and even the professed Church, will be disinclined to believe in a personal Coming. The world shall reject the doctrine and ridicule it; the Church as a body shall slumber and sleep; professed servants shall say, "My Lord delayeth His Coming;" and many shall declare, "Where is the promise of His Coming?" "When the Son of Man cometh shall He find faith on the earth?" Surely He would find such, if the earth just emerged from Millennial glory, but in the darkness, etc., preceding that age, faith is almost extinct in His Coming. Nearly all prophetic writers agree that, owing to the limited nature of the chronological prophecies, the Mill. era cannot be far distant, and we find that the world and Church are rapidly drifting into this precise condition of unbelief. Such a position of unbelief in a personal Coming cannot exist in the Church in its present form after the Millennium; and, therefore, its extensive existence, advocated by all classes, is a strong presumptive proof, why we should insist on its being a literal Coming."

55. Christ will come personally to introduce Mill. glory just previous to a period—connected with this dispensation—of apostasy and unbelief, 2 Thess. 2 : 8 ; 2 Tim. 3 : 1-5 ; 2 Pet. 3 : 3, 4, etc., of great trouble and trial, Rev. 19 ; Ps. 2 ; Luke 21 : 25-28, etc., of scepticism and indifference, 1 Thess. 5 : 3 ; Jude 14, 15, 16, etc., so that it shall come "as a snare," Luke 21 : 35, etc. But while this is so, God, simply judging from the past, will never permit such an occurrence as this Pre-Mill. Advent, so tremendous in its effects both upon the world and the Church, to take place without suitable warning. It is reasonable to expect from the past dealings of God, that, in His providence, He will raise up men, who, amid sarcasm, ridicule, charges of error, heresy, folly, enthusiasm, fanaticism, etc., will, Noah-like, faithfully point to this personal Coming, and warn the Church and world of its approach by direct appeals. Amos 3 : 7, "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but He revealeth His secret unto His servants the prophets," compared with Ps. 25 : 14, "the secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him and He will show them His covenant" (marg. read. "and His covenant to make them know it"). Now, if this Coming is personal we ought to find (1) predictions that it would be recognized by some; and (2) that as the age is approaching, men will proclaim it. This we do, for (1) it is promised that some shall know it, and a cry of its nearness shall be raised, Luke 21 : 28 ; 1 Thess. 5 : 4 ; Matt. 25 : 6 ; Mal. 4 : 5, 6 ; Rev. 16 : 15 ; and (2) some men in nearly all denominations hold to and proclaim this warning, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh." Such a striking and predicted coincidence serves to confirm our faith in the Pre-Mill. personal Coming. It is also one of the evidences given by the Spirit, and as such we accept of it. Thus we have the Spirit, in the most various and accommodating forms, shaping His revelations to sustain our weakness and preserve us from forsaking "the old paths" of belief.

<sup>1</sup> Thus to illustrate : As long as the Jewish "house" is "desolate" there can be no Millennium. For this would contradict the prophets and Jesus, seeing that the restoration of that "house"—the removal of desolation—is inseparably linked with the return or Advent of Jesus the Christ. So also Isa. 25 : 8, pertaining to Millennial blessedness, can only be verified by the Coming of Him who alone has the power to remove suffering, bereavement, and death. The magnificence and glory of Isa. 60, and numerous other predictions, can only be realized through the wonder-working power of a present, a returned Restorer.

<sup>2</sup> An opponent, Henderson (Minor Prophets), reads Zech. 14 : 5, on the authority of numerous mss. ; "The Lord, my God, shall come and all the saints with Him," instead of "with Thee." So Lange's Com. loci, and others. That which is applied to the Messiah elsewhere is here referred to "Jehovah, my God," thus indicating the Divine lodged in the Christ.

<sup>3</sup> The critical reader, observant of the different stages of the one Advent, will notice that Christ is personally present before the Millennium is inaugurated (necessarily so), as seen e.g. Rev., 14 : 1, which represents a personal presence of Christ just as much as it does the personal presence of the saints symbolized by the 144,000 ; by Rev. 11 : 18, which includes things that pertain to the same ; by Rev. 14 : 14, etc. Comp. Lange's Com., Rev., with Dr. Craven's admirable additions, Alford's, Bengel's Roos's, Lord's, Elliott's, Auberlen's, Goodwin's, etc., comments on Rev. 19.

<sup>4</sup> The student will here observe a contradiction in Neander. In Life of Christ, s. 283, he makes Jesus's declaration before Caiaphas to be "a figurative expression," but (s. 253) allows Matt. 23 : 39 to be literal, saying : "He obviously in this last clause betokens his second and triumphant Advent, as Theocratic King." The "seeing" in the one passage is figurative and in the other literal, which is a mere arbitrary interpretation. The critical reader need not to be reminded that our position corresponds with the Jewish attitude. Dr. Gleig (His. Bible, vol. 2 p. 190) incidentally remarks : "There was a tradition current in Judea that the Messiah would come direct from the clouds of heaven." Hence, some writers say, the Messiah was named "the Son of Clouds." Such an expectation was evidently based on the prophecy of Daniel, and this indicates : (1) that Jesus in His address to Caiaphas indorses this view ; (2) that He places His Kingdom after that period as they understood it ; (3) that Daniel must have been inspired when he passes over this dispensation—the First Advent—and locates the Coming of the Kingdom in the future, at the Sec. Advent. How writers, who oppose us, flatly contradict themselves is illustrated e.g. by Barnes, on Acts 1 : 9, who says : "It is remarkable that when the return of the Saviour is mentioned, it is uniformly said that He will return in the clouds. Verse 11, Matt. 24 : 30, and 26 : 64 ; Mark 13 : 26 ; Rev. 1 : 7 ; Dan. 7 : 13." He thus gives as proof passages which in other places, when meeting our view, he explains away. It is singular that the "Haitites" (Art. Ency. Relig. Knowl.) to unite their faith with Christianity should expect the Sec. Coming of Jesus Christ as the Judge, quoting these words from the Koran : "O Mohammed, thou shalt see the Lord, who will come in the clouds" (Rycaut's Ottoman Empire).

<sup>5</sup> When Dr. Hodge (Sys. Div., vol. 3, p. 794) admits the following passages, Matt. 26 : 64 and 24 : 30 ; Luke 21 : 27 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 7 and 2 : 1, to refer to a literal personal Advent, he affords us all the proof desired to show that the Coming of Dan. 7 is still future, and that the Kingdom to be introduced by the Advent is also future. To indicate how the ancients applied this Coming, we refer to Justin Martyr (Dial. Trypho, ch. 32), who represents Trypho as objecting to the applicability of the Advent of Dan. 7 to Jesus the Christ, because His First Advent was in humiliation, and not at all commensurate with the greatness and results predicted (a fact which our opponents would do well to ponder). Justin, instead of denying the fact, or covering it over with spiritualistic glosses, as moderns do, frankly meets the objection by acknowledging that the First Advent did not meet the requirements of the prophecy, but claimed its ample realization at the Sec. Advent.

<sup>6</sup> The late Bh. McIlvaine (Standard of the Cross, quoted Proph. Times, Jan., 1871) employed at a clerical meeting the following reasons for a Pre-Mill. Advent : "1. The Sec. Advent is made a topic of consolation. 2. Nothing placed between the Church and Advent. 3. The revelation of a thousand years does not alter or modify this early expectancy. 4. This confirmed by general tenor of a sudden, unexpected Advent." To the critical reader we add ; the fact that in the New Test. so little is said of the Mill. age and so much of the Sec. Advent and its imminency, implies that the Mill. follows that Advent.

<sup>7</sup> The Pharisees, even, in their Messianic hopes entertained the belief that He would come "in a sudden and unexpected manner in the midst of the people, so that He might be recognized without any preliminary manifestations." The language employed by Jesus and the Apostles confirms this view, as is evidenced by the early Church faith. The student needs not the concessions of opponents (as e.g. Barnes, Rev. 1 : 7, etc.) as to the personality and visibility of this Coming, for the general analogy of the Word is sufficient. Yet he cannot help to reflect : that if the Apoc. begins with a direct reference to a visible, personal Coming, as conceded, all other references in the same book to a Coming must, unless specifically asserted to the contrary, accord with the introductory reference. Simple unity requires this position.

<sup>8</sup> To be revealed as a King, according to Covenant requires a personal Advent. Jesus was literally, personally a Prophet in teaching ; He was also a personal Priest, offering up a real sacrifice in His own person. Thus He will also personally manifest His Kingly office, for the same language is employed in relation to this Kingship that is used in reference to His Prophetical and Priestly offices. The Kingly was not revealed at His First Advent, for then He came in humiliation, suffering, and death. It will be accomplished ; for if two of His offices were personally, visibly exhibited, the third will also be, and here on earth as predicted. This accords with the prediction of the Sec. Advent that all acknowledge, and equally so with the Kingly manifestation in the Mill. age. A Kingly revelation, as given in Rev. 19, is necessarily a personal one.

<sup>9</sup> That is, instead of delivering up the Kingdom to the Father at the Sec. Advent, as multitudes hold, the Sec. Advent is followed by a Kingdom which is ruled over by Christ, and which is perpetual (see Prop. 159).

<sup>10</sup> Even such a writer as Dr. Chalmers (Posth. Works, vol. 3, p. 51) applies Ps. 50 : 1-6, to "the descent of the Son of man on the Mt. of Olives, with all the accompaniments of a Jewish conversion, and a first resurrection, and a destruction of the assembled hosts of Antichrist." Many able writers agree with him in thus considering it prophetic of the Sec. Advent.

<sup>11</sup> The "times of refreshing" or reanimation "from the presence of the Lord," conjoined (Acts 3) with the admitted Jewish usage, must also be considered (Prop. 144). Jesus now remains in heaven as to person until his return, which is also in person.

<sup>12</sup> Moore (Com. on Zech. 14), hampered by his preconceived Whittyan theory (as evidenced by his entire exposition), remarks : "It is impossible for us to take this whole passage literally, for God cannot literally place His feet on the Mt. of Olives ; but how far it must be taken figurative we cannot tell." It is sufficient for us, that He who is called "God" did place His feet literally on the Mt. of Olives, and that it is promised (Acts 1 : 11, 12) that He shall literally descend again. But Moore (Com. on Hag., Zech., and Matt.) is forced to the conclusion that "it is evident that no events have yet occurred in history to which these predictions are applicable without much forcing." This is far better than Henderson's (Com. Minor Prophets) absurd position, who, over against his spiritualizing system, is compelled by the tenor of prophecy to make it literal, but violates all connection and order by this arbitrary application ; he, against the facts of history and the occurrences here presented, makes the taking of the city to occur under Titus ; and then refers the Coming of the Messiah, immediately connected, to a future Millennium, of which he says, "I cannot entertain a doubt ;" but, with express language indicative of personality, he cannot find "a future personal and Pre-Mill. Advent of the Redeemer." Strange ! but then it is very easy not to find that which you do not desire to find. Barnes (Com., 1 Thess. p. 58), in his eagerness to combat our views, says : "Indeed, there is no evidence that He (Jesus) will return to the earth at all ;" how then are His feet to stand on the Mt. of Olives, and how then are Covenant and prophecy to be fulfilled ? None so blind as those who are wilfully blind.

<sup>13</sup> The physical objection is urged by many of our opponents that it is impossible for "every eye to see Him" (Rev. 1 : 7), that only those who live in the locality where He appears can see Him, etc. But observe (1) this is to deny the fulfilment altogether, for if pressed to an extreme, it is as great an objection to Post-Millenarianism as to Pre-Millenarianism ; (2) the passage must be interpreted according to the general analogy, and if so, it stands in unity with Zech. 12 : 10, etc., and this is corroborated (a) by the fact that "every" is not to be unduly pressed (as e.g. the Gospel has not been preached to "every creature," etc.) ; (b) that it is used to indicate a prominent, conspicuous appearance ; (c) that direct reference is made to "the tribes of the land ; (d) that the visibility of the King is extended to the Jews, to the nations arrayed against Him, and ultimately to all that come up to Jerusalem to worship, etc. This seeing is thus expressive of visibility and its extent to both friends and enemies. But no amount of reasoning can reach those who are prepared to explain this visibility—so generally manifested—of Rev. 6 : 16, of the Mighty One, into a visibility of barbarian hordes, the Goths and Vandals, or of Pagan powers. The student may observe how our opponents try to evade this visibility. We quote Dr. Brown (Com. Matt.) on Matt. 23 : 38 : " In what sense they (the Jews) shall then ' see Him ' may be gathered from Zech. 2 : 10-13 ; Ezek. 37 : 23-28, and 39 : 28, 29, etc." (comp. Meyer, Alford, and others ; Sepp (Life of Christ, 3 : 31) includes " a definite promise of the national restoration of Israel."

<sup>14</sup> The taking possession of His own inheritance as David's Son involves His personal Coming. This Davidic tabernacle is His special inheritance, and the restoration of this, now ruined, tabernacle is the grand theme of Millennial predictions. To separate the Inheritor from His inheritance is opposed to the entire spirit of express Covenant and prophecy. Compare next Prop., and see how utterly inconsistent it would be to have the Kingdom of David's Son given to Him here on earth, and the covenanted Son to be absent in person. Yet, alas ! multitudes take such a position, and have an inheritance without the personal presence of the Inheritor, a marriage with the bridegroom absent, a Kingdom without a visible King, a Millennium without the Restorer's presence and work.

<sup>15</sup> The student will observe that Paul adds, Rom. 11 : 26 : " And shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." Now the simple scriptural truth is this : this ungodliness shall not be turned away from Jacob (however individual Jews may believe and be saved) until the times of the Gentiles are ended, and until the period designated e.g. Zech. 12 : 10, and 14 : 8, etc. This removal of ungodliness from Jacob, so that " all shall be righteous," etc., is united with Millennial predictions. The conversion and restoration of the Jewish nation is inseparably united with the personal Advent of the Messiah (comp. Prop. 113).

<sup>16</sup> Indirect references, that can only be understood in the light of more extended portrayals, are purposely omitted. As e.g. Ps. 19 : 15. The LXX. has this, " At the appearing of thy glory ;" the Vulg., Arabic, and Ethiopic, " When thy glory shall appear ;" Geddes, " With the reappearance of thy countenance." The implication of a personal presence in Ps. 2, " Rule Thou in the midst of Thine enemies," etc., His presence implied in " Zion," as Alexander loci, interprets it " His earthly residence, the seat of the Theocracy." The place of manifested royalty implies the same. So also Matt. 26 : 20, drinking " this fruit of the wine," is indicative of personal presence. " The times and seasons," Acts 1 : 7, has evident reference to Daniel's (the Seventy, as Olshausen notices, applied the same Greek words to Dan. 2 : 21), and the manner in which used, with disciples' views, shows a future fulfilment, etc.

<sup>17</sup> E.g. Barnes's Com. Rev. loci. The admission is so fatal to his own expressed views of Ps. 2 and Rev. 19, that the reader will be pleased to notice his language : after stating that this promise denoted an invincible sway and the complete subjugation of all enemies, he adds : " the speaker does not intimate when this would be, but all that is said here would be applicable to that time when the Son of God will come to judge the world, and when His saints will be associated with Him in His triumphs."

<sup>18</sup> To indicate that we do not manufacture an interpretation to suit a theory, we give a few illustrations : Barnes, Com. loci, says the word " things" is improperly supplied by the translators, that it " denotes beings rather than things. Things do not bow the knee," etc., and adds : " ' And things under the earth.' Beings under the earth. The whole universe shall confess that He is Lord. This embraces, doubtless, those who have departed this life, and, perhaps, includes also fallen angels." Bloomfield, Com. loci, says the Eng. version adopted an error of Tyndal in giving the rendering " things" which ought to be " persons, i.e. beings as translated by Doddr. and Newc. And so the Pesch. Syr. translator evidently took it, as also Chrys., Theophl., and Theodoret." The phrase " beings under the earth," " is best explained by Theodoret and many eminent modern expositors, to denote the souls of the departed." Knapp, Ch. Theol., s. 92, " the inhabitants of heaven, earth, and the under world should bow the knee," etc.

<sup>19</sup> Even such a writer as Neander, so strongly inclined to make the Coming relate to the overthrow of the Jewish polity and nation, etc., concedes (Life of Christ, sec. 254) that it also refers to the Sec. Advent and the consummation of the Kingdom. So Barnes, Brown, and others, follow in the same track, but none of them seem to observe that if this dispensation is thus bounded, first by a Coming to destroy Jerusalem and second by a " Coming to judgment" " at the last day," then, seeing that the tribulation extends from one to the other, no place is found therein for a Millennial era, and if such a period is to be realized it must be after the last Advent. Hence Van Oosterzee (Lange's Com., Luke, p. 326), on Luke 21 : 25-36, pertinently remarks : " Whoever asserts that the expectation of a personal, visible, glorious return, which shall put a decisive end to the present condition of things, belongs only to Jewish dreamings, which one from a Christian spiritualistic position may look down upon with a certain lofty disparagement, is here contradicted by our Lord in the most decided manner" (comp. also Oosterzee's excellent remarks in Theol. of the New Test., where he makes Matt. 24 : 29 ; Matt. 25 : 19 ; Luke 12 : 45, and 21 : 24, containing "clear indications" that our position is correct). Hence Nast (Com. loci) says : "Such is the force of the chronological order pointed out in v. 29, that the most distinguished modern expositors, such as Steir, Lange, Ebrard, Auberlen, Alford, and others, find themselves compelled to adopt the interpretation of the Pre-Millennarians, according to which at the close of the long period of tribulation—during which Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles—Christ will appear in person on the earth to usher in the Millennium. Philologically, this interpretation is more natural than any other."

<sup>30</sup> Here we find the most astonishing perversion of the order laid down in the Word. We give an illustration : Rev. Dr. Cox, Introd. to Bower's His. Popes, has the finishing of the mystery after the Millennium—the last thing in his programme. Many writers state the same without seeing the palpable contradiction involved.

<sup>31</sup> No space need be given to prove the self-evident fact that the 7th trumpet precedes the Millennial age. The order laid down by the Spirit positively demands this, and any deviation from it does violence to the Word. We know only one writer (whose name has escaped memory) who brings one or two of the trumpets into the Mill. era, regarded as future. In behalf of our view, compare e.g. Dr. Craven's note to Lange's Com., Rev. 10 : 7, and the remarks of commentators generally on "the mystery finished." Lange (loci) explains : "the mystery of the last things, announced by the prophets ; in a wider sense the eschatological mystery of the world's history." Craven unites the mystery of 1 Cor. 15 : 51, 52, with this expression.

<sup>32</sup> It has been observed by able writers (e.g. Bh. Horsley, Ps., vol. 1, p. 15) that quite a number of the Psalms, which speak of the Advent of Christ as a Conqueror, bear a remarkable resemblance to His Coming as presented in the Apoc., and in both are connected with a marriage. Our opponents generally refer this to a personal Coming at the First Advent ; but to which does it best correspond—to an Advent in humiliation and death or to an Advent, such as the Second, in glory and power, connected with a predicted marriage? The one that portrays a triumph over enemies, a glorious reign, the exaltation and glory of God's people, etc., accurately corresponds with the Pre-Mill. Coming and results. Hence it is that, in view of such an agreement, a multitude of writers regard such Psalms as prophetic of the Sec. Advent.

<sup>33</sup> Thus e.g. Lange's Com., loci, has "when he shall a second time have introduced," etc., and in notes remarks : "The language refers to the second introduction—yet in the future—of the First-born into the world (Ltn.). The oikoumene (world) is the inhabited earth on which the Son has already previously lived and labored." "Even Greg. Nyss. (Contra Ennom. Orat. 111, p. 541) recognized the reference of the passage to the Sec. Coming" (comp. entire note, and Doc. 5). The Variorum gives "when he bringeth (lit. shall have brought) in again." Comp. Alford, Lünemann, DeWette, Moulton, Davidson, Delitzsch, etc.

<sup>34</sup> The student will see by Christ's language to the disciples, Luke 17 : 22, that a day of the Son of man necessarily includes His actual personal presence.

<sup>35</sup> The opinion of Steir, and others, that there are two Advents in the future, one Pre-Millennial and the other Post-Millennial (the latter based on Rev. 20 : 11) does not—if any are inclined to adopt the view—conflict with our estimate, seeing that Rev. 20 : 11 is a revelation added to all the preceding ones. But we reject the latter addition by Steir, as inconsistent with the nature and duration of the Kingdom, as will be explained under another Proposition. We only say this now : Rev. 20 : 11 describes no Advent, but is retrospective in order to identify the One on the throne.

<sup>36</sup> A number of impressions imply the same feature, viz., no intervening Millennium and a personal Coming, as e.g. 1 Thess. 4 : 15, "we which are alive and remain unto the Coming of the Lord ;" John 21 : 22, 23 ; Luke 18 : 8, and 13 : 35, etc.

<sup>37</sup> In Luther's Pope Confounded (quoted by Taylor, Voice of the Church) is the following applicable utterance : "It may be interpreted thus ; it may also be understood thus ; it may also be answered thus ; it may be literally interpreted thus ; it may be mystically interpreted thus ; away with all these may be's. These, my friend Catharinus, are all refuges of lies, mere loopholes of escape, and evidently go to confirm the truths I maintain. Speak thus, 'This is the meaning of the passage, and it cannot be understood otherwise.' You will thus keep to one simple and uniform sense of Scripture, as I always do, and always have done. This way of proceeding is to be a Divine ; the former is a Sophist. For you know that in every controverted subject we must abide by the literal sense, which is uniform throughout the Scripture." To make the Coming of Christ something good, or something evil, everything else but what the words plainly signify, at the pleasure of the interpreter, is, to say the least, a dangerous procedure.

<sup>38</sup> Other reasons incidentally appear corroborating those more clear, such as the following : (1) The allusion to false Christs is indicative of their personal coming ; now the speaking of His own Coming in connection with such, without any discrimination as to the manner of coming (i.e. as to personality), shows that a personal Coming is denoted. (2) In Acts 1 : 6 the Greek, rendered "times and seasons," has evidently a reference to the times and seasons of Daniel, for it is worthy of attention that the same Greek words (as Olshausen, Com. on Acts 1 : 6, noticed) are applied by the Seventy to Dan. 2 : 21. Now, the employment of the same words, with which the disciples were familiar, indicated the fulfilment as future, etc. (3) The Advent which introduces the Kingdom of the Messiah in all its glory is invariably associated with a time of war, suffering, etc. This is characteristic of the future Sec. Advent, as a host of passages declare, while the First Advent took place in a time of peace. Therefore, the Sec. Advent inaugurates the Millennial era. (4) Arguments of some force might be derived from The Antitypical Parallels, as given by others (e.g. Lieut.-Gen. Goodwyn), but as they cannot be abbreviated without losing strength, a mere reference must suffice. (5) Passages imply it as e.g. Ps. 2., "Rule Thou in the midst of Thine enemies," and the mention of "Zion," which Alexander, Com. loci, admits, in its literal meaning, to denote "His earthly residence, the seat of the Theocracy." (6) The extensive holding of a Pre-Mill. Advent as evidenced in the Apocryphal books, Oracles of the Sybils, etc. (7) The declaration of Jesus, Matt. 26 : 20, when referring to "this fruit of the vine" (i.e. "wine, the fruit or produce of the vine"—so Barnes), He declares that He would not drink of it "until the day when I drink it new with you in my Father's Kingdom." To make this material wine merely typical of something else, does violence to the passage. A comparison of this passage with Luke 22 : 29-30, with the renewal of nature, with the eating of Jesus after His resurrection, etc., shows that humanity (however glorified) is retained, and that a personal Coming is related to the Kingdom.

<sup>19</sup> See an article by the author on this omission in the Prop. Times, vol. 8, Nos. 6 and 7, 1870. Bengel refers to Haymo, Purvey's Com. in Pref. of Luther, and Zeltner as noticing the change, etc. This remarkable omission teaches us several important lessons : (1) that our English version by the addition made removes one of the proofs of a Pre-Mill. Advent ; (2) that such an addition is utterly unauthorized, being made, as Bengel suggests, under the supposition to bring the phraseology of the latter part of the Apoc. in unison with the first part ; (3) that the added phrase is not merely expressive of eternal duration, etc. (as some contend), but of personal Coming (comp. Heb. 10 : 37 ; Matt. 11 : 3 ; Luke 7 : 19) ; (4) that the adoption of the phrase is in accord with Jewish usage and expectation (comp. Matt. 21 : 9 ; Luke 13 : 35 ; Matt. 23 : 39), and thus points to a personal Coming—hence the omission is most significant of presence ; (5) that the selection of the phrase, "Who is to come," instead of "Who is to be" (i.e. the latter more expressive of self-existence, etc.), shows that the Coming One is denoted in His promised Advent—and hence the omission teaches us that the Advent has taken place ; (6) that the omission, being given without explanation or warning of any kind, is indicative of the thief-like stage of the first Advent—see Props. 166, 130, 167, 171, etc. ; (7) that Christ having come personally to inaugurate the Mill. blessedness, the former use of the title is dropped so far as it relates to coming, making it then in accordance with existing facts, and that the omission cannot be satisfactorily explained in any other way ; (8) that the omission of the phrase at the designated time, without explanation, etc., is only such as an inspired book can give ; (9) that such an omission cannot (in view of previous usage, Jewish usage, meaning, etc.) be reconciled with a spiritual or providential Coming ; (10) that the omission of the phrase at a certain designated period is evidence of a distinguishing crisis having arrived, in which its usage would be contradictory to a Saviour present, its retention still making Him a Saviour to come. The Cod. Vaticanus, as critics inform us, had the Apoc. supplied by an inferior uncial of little critical value.

<sup>20</sup> Under Obs. 3, and notes, we have referred to this lack of faith in a personal Sec. Advent. We are prepared for Strauss to boldly say, "The Advent did not happen as Jesus predicted, and all that can be said is, that He was not a Divine being" (for he ignores the testimony on the subject) ; or for Renan, with his stabbing apologetics to declare : "Pardon Jesus His expectation of an empty Apocalypse, a Coming in the clouds of heaven. Perhaps it was the *faul*t of others more than his own, the Millenaries sunk in the lowest depths of Christianity" (for this accords with his assumed friendliness), but we are not prepared for professed believers of the Word to deny this "blessed hope" as an absurdity, etc. We may not be surprised at Shenkel saying : "It may be doubted whether Jesus ever made such statements about His Coming" (for this agrees with his rationalizing spirit) ; or at Matthew Arnold calling it : "A grand, turbid, Oriental, phantasmagorical Advent" (for it had no place in his spiritualistic system), but we are surprised that multitudes of Christians can take this Sec. Advent and transmute it into other things, good or bad, spiritual or temporal, earthly or heavenly, past, present, or future, just as it happens to suit an intended application. It is not merely Rev. Taylor (Old Theol. Turned Upside Down, etc.), who describes as folly a belief in a literal, personal Sec. Advent and resultant resurrection, but thousands in the ministry and Church are doing the same. Take e.g. Elihu Burritt, in the Christian at Work (Oct. 31st, 1878), and he makes the Sec. Advent to be realized by the resurrection of Jesus and His promised presence with His people since, declaring that the religious experiences of the past "prove that the Sec. Coming of Christ has been an accomplished fact, from the Pentecost to the present hour." This total denial of the Sec. Advent as future (without the least regard to the accompaniments of the same) is supported by a series of objections which sufficiently indicate the learned writer's lack of knowledge respecting the foundations of our doctrine. For, instead of examining the Covenant and prophecies, he contents himself with the following: How the human and divine can appear at the same time; how the human can be confined to one place and the spiritual presence be everywhere; how can the whole race see Him; what central location will He select, Jerusalem, or Rome, or London; what kind of a government, or what Church and State system will be established? Suppose that we were unable to answer these questions, what do they decide respecting the Sec. Advent? They leave it untouched, and one single passage like 2 Thess. sweeps them all aside. But just such lack of faith, just such ignoring of Scripture testimony, just such misleading theories, are promulgated in numerous periodicals and works, sanctioned by eminent names. Even multitudes that admit a future personal Sec. Advent, solely however for purposes of judgment, and not to bless the world with salvation, bitterly oppose this Pre-Mill. Sec. Advent. The objections of Brown, Barnes, Waldegrave, Hodge, Sanborn, Ralston, Tomlinson, Berg, Rice, and others (all giving the same oft-repeated and as oft-answered ones) are met under the several Propositions. The tendency of it all, however, is as Dr. Nast (West. Ch. Advocate, July 23d, 1879) has asserted, to "evaporate into mere figure all that the Bible says on a visible, personal return of Christ." And if a Sec. Advent in one instance (viz., of judgment) is allowed, then (Barnes, etc.) it must be carefully avoided to place Him on the earth, just as if His Coming to earth would pollute Him. The central point of adherence among them all is to get rid of the Coming in Dan. 7. We leave the champion opponent express his opinion: Dr. Brown (Ch. Sec. Coming, p. 2, ch. 3), opposing a personal visible Advent (which others of his brethren allow, but carefully apply to the First Advent), says of the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven: "Who does not see that this has nothing to do with the Sec. personal Advent of Christ? The Coming of the Son of man here is not, be it observed, a coming to men at all, but a coming to God; nor is it any local coming even to Him. It is simply the advancement and the recognition of his claim to rule the world, clothed in state forms—in the symbolic drapery of an august installation or inauguration." If this is so, then Dr. Brown makes the Saviour misapply this prediction to Caiaphas (Matt. 26:64), where both the personality of the Coming and the seeing by men is affirmed. While this opponent overrides the humanity and consequent personality contained in the phrase, "Son of man," others, more guarded, refer the whole, no matter how it fits as to order of events, to the First Advent. We are satisfied to receive the Primitive Church application.

Obs. 9. (1) An argument might be erected on the chronological prophecies which approximately would indicate a Pre-Mill. Advent, but they are purposely passed by, because they would require extended notice. (2) So also the theory, so prevalent in the early Church, of the six thousand years before the Advent and Millennium, which is only susceptible of indirect corroboration. (3) Another class of arguments might, however, be advanced with advantage. Thus e.g. if the Millennium is experienced as predicted, then, owing to the state of universal righteousness and blessedness, much of the New Testament would be in a great degree inapplicable. To illustrate: how could "the friendship of the world" be "enmity against God" when all its Kingdoms do Him honor and service; how could those who "live godly in Christ Jesus suffer persecution" when all persecution had ceased; how could the way to life be "narrow" and the way to destruction "broad," etc., when to follow the multitude would be to follow the righteous, etc. ?* It appears necessary therefore, in consideration of the extraordinary changes that will then be wrought in the condition of God's people, in such a dispensation of affairs, that Christ should in some special manner manifest Himself and bestow, in such a revolution, a revelation of His will adapted to the actual circumstances of the saints, etc. (Prop. 167). That there will be a Coming and a special revelation suited to that state all believe, but, on reflection, what Coming is so suitable, so desirable, so applicable to the intended change as the personal? (4) Besides this, as we have shown, in the Millennium is to be secured an infallible, accessible head (of which Popery is a shabby imitation) to secure perfect government, union, etc. To secure such a needed visibly manifested source of knowledge and power, able to unite all nations, to give forth all law, to establish the true sense of Scripture beyond appeal, etc.—a want which the world sadly feels—the personal Advent alone gives satisfaction, meeting the demands. The current of prophecy teaches, that this want will be supplied, in the Coming of a Ruler, now absent, who shall be accessible to the nations—in the Advent of a King whose infallibility and divine attributes will secure the establishment of a government of indisputable authority, etc. (Props. 200–204). (5) Again, the Old Test. Scriptures hold up to the eye of faith as its chief prospect, and to the heart of hope as its great object, a glorious Millennial period in which Christ, the Messiah, the promised Seed, should manifest His glory and firmly establish the happiness and exaltation of His people. Now, if those who for many centuries read these descriptions and hoped that they themselves should experience this blessedness, are not raised up by a Pre-Mill. Coming and resurrection so that they can enter into the enjoyment of this predicted state of glory, then indeed the wisest and best (including, as our opponents admit, inspired men and their disciples) have indulged a faith that is vain, and a hope that is delusive. But God does not deal thus with His creatures, when His Word contains promises which in their simple grammatical construction involve His honor in performance. (6) Again, in order to fully exhibit a Pre-Mill. Advent, a number of adjuncts are indispensably necessary, such as a resurrection, a judgment, a Kingdom, an inheriting, a new creation, etc., seeing that all these are united with the Sec. Advent. How comes it then that all these are either directly mentioned in connection with the Pre-Mill. Coming or with the age itself? No one who rejects our view has been able to give an explanation of this remarkable coincidence. We, on the other hand, rejoice in it, as being a matter of design to lead inquirers into the truth. One single flaw (omission) here in reference to any important event united with the Advent, would indeed be a serious defect in our system and render it, in so far, worthy of grave suspicion. Thus e.g. if no judgment was connected with this Pre-Mill. Coming, if we could not consistently show from the Scriptures that the judgment (for instance, in Matt. 25) was just previous to the Millennium, then, we admit, a most serious and inseparable objection would be raised up against us. But since not only the judgment but all the other events are distinctly linked with the Pre-Mill. Advent, we insist that all these concurrent facts, which do not occur by chance, but were purposely engrafted upon it, contain the evidence of so many separate witnesses to the truth of our doctrine. We can justly claim, that such a union of events is a powerful reason why we should receive so cheering a belief. Especially so, when we again remind the reader how the Jews believed in such a Pro-Mill. Advent, how Jesus and the Apostles employed the language of the prophets pertaining to it, and, without any intimation of a change in the meaning, transfer it over and apply it to the Sec. Advent, thus directing Jews and Gentiles to a future, glorious Pre-Mill. Coming.

---

* See Woodward's Essays on Mill. in the Literalist, vol. 1, in which this thought is ably, and at length, presented.

Hence, we regard it as simply faithless to leave these plain Scriptures and stumble over e.g. Gal. 3 : 1, as if that forbade a visible appearing. Suppose we could not show that Jesus Christ was set before the eyes of the Galatians as crucified in the Lord's Supper ("Ye do show forth the Lord's death till He come"), or that it was descriptive of the reality and vividness of faith, or of Christ's sufferings continued in His followers, this passage cannot be in opposition to the general analogy on the subject. Indeed, in this direction, the Yezidis (Layard's Discoveries in the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon), with all their ignorance, have more faith (in that they believe that Christ will come to govern the world) than many cultured Christians.

Obs. 10. The fact is, that arguments in favor of a personal Pre-Mill. Advent abound on all sides. That this is no empty boast, we select some more, in addition to those given, for the reader's consideration. (1) If we are allowed to take the application of Isa. 63, the Coming from Edom, to Christ, as given by the early Church, by Origen, Jerome, Cyril, Eusebius, Procopius, etc., by Lowth, Cocceius, Calovius, Vitringa, etc., while rejecting the notion held by some of its denoting the First Advent as utterly inconsistent, yet, accepting of the notion of personality admitted, by a comparison of Scripture, it will be found to sustain a Pre-Mill. Coming. (2) The exceeding prominence given, and frequent allusions made, to the Sec. Advent, which is only reconcilable with our doctrine. (3) The general prophetic announcements of the Pre-Mill. Coming are sustained by the same given without symbol in a plain grammatical sense, as e.g. Zech. 14. This has indeed proven to be one of the most difficult passages for our opponents to spiritualize. Some have candidly confessed that they know not what to do with it; and if the order there laid down is observed, it is impossible for them to fit it into their system. (4) The design in giving the transfiguration (see Prop. 153 on Transfig.). (5) Even Isa. 49 : 2, embracing (Alex. versions) the sharp sword out of Christ's mouth, is admitted by numerous commentators to refer to His personal Advent; but the same thing is said of Him in Rev. 19. (6) "As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world," John 9 : 5, this taken in connection with the fourth verse, as Neander well states (S. 198, note, Life of Christ) has reference to "His personal, visible manifestation," being "the Sun of the world, visible upon the earth itself." Now, considering how Christ employed the figure, can we not justly and forcibly employ it, when interpreting "the Sun of righteousness" of Mal. 4, as denoting the same visible presence, especially when the context demands it? The early Church, and many writers, thus regarded it. (7) So if we were to take ancient comments on Mal. 3 : 1, 2, an argument could be formed by comparison of Scripture. For, Clement (First Epis., ch. 23) quotes Mal. 3 : 1, 2, to be fulfilled hereafter, and Augustine (City of God, b. 18, ch. 35) has: "in this place, he has foretold both the First and the Second Advent of Christ; the First, to wit of which he says, 'And He shall come suddenly in His temple,' etc. And of the Second Advent he says, 'Behold, He cometh, saith the Lord Almighty, and who shall abide,' etc.<sup>1</sup> (8) The entry into Jerusalem by which as many admit "the Saviour appears to have awakened and nourished those earthly Messianic hopes" (Olshausen, Com., vol. 2, p. 142) is only reconcilable with our view of this Coming and Kingdom. (9) Every dispensation in the historical development of Redemption is preceded by a personal manifestation of God, as the Adamic, Mosaic, the present; and as the Millennial differs from this one also, introducing a new era, and promises in glowing terms a special manifestation, we cannot see why it should form an exception. (10) If we do not divide or separate what the Mill. descriptions contain, but allow them to describe one period of time here on the earth as they evidently do, then our doctrine legitimately follows. Hence, against us, by spiritualizing, the most arbitrary measures are taken with these predictions, locating part here and another part in heaven, and making a part present and a part future, etc. (11) The dominion that Adam forfeited was to be exercised here on the earth personally, now if the Sec. Adam restores that dominion in his own person, it must also be exhibited personally. The Mill. predictions require this feature in their demands, so that the three aspects in which Paul represents Christ (as many writers have shown) meets this condition: (a) sub-angelic humiliation; (b) heavenly exaltation; (c) earthly dominion. (12) The last seal, Rev. 6:15-17, evidently describes a personal appearance of Christ, "hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne and the wrath of the Lamb," etc. This period is made by many writers, as Woodhouse, Lord, Cunninghame, etc., to synchronize with latter part of Rev. 19; and the same is asserted by others, even by some of those who have an inchoate fulfilment on the year-day interpretation. We are not now concerned in its application, excepting that it is Pre-Millennial; that it somehow includes the personal presence of Christ; and that the same idea is used by Jesus in reference to His personal Advent in Luke 23:30. (13) A prophet like unto Moses, Deut. 18:13-19, is supposed by many to include characteristics which Jesus will only fully reveal at the Sec. Advent, such as Judge, etc. The connection, etc., requires a personal presence.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Fausset (Com., Mal. 3) takes this view; and that an ultimate reference to the Sec. Advent is intended becomes self-evident, when it is seen that the refining, punishing, restoring to former power and prosperity, was not realized at the First Advent, but is precisely what pertains to the Second.

<sup>2</sup> Faber (Diss. on Proph., ch. 3) asserts that the original of "the last days" of Isa. 2:2; Micah 4:2, etc., literally and properly ought to be rendered "the end of days." In this he is sustained by many able critics. Undoubtedly this end of days refers to the ending of the days of Jewish tribulation, the ending of the prophetic periods of Daniel, the ending of the dispensation (compare e.g. Acts 2:16, 17; Heb. 1:12; 1 Pet. 1:20; 1 John 2:18), when the mystery of God shall be finished. "The appearing and the Kingdom" are linked by the prophets with the end of these days. Thus the prophets unite, with the New Test., in asserting that certain days—including those in which we live—must pass, and then this revelation of glory will follow. A visibly manifested Theocracy demands, as an essential, the presence of the Ruler.

Obs. 11. Again, we ask the reader to consider the peculiar and distinctive work that is to be accomplished in the Mill. age, and are we not abundantly justified in insisting upon a personal Coming which alone (Prop. 120) can adequately account for its performance? The resurrection from among the dead, the renovation of nature, the restoration of all things, the re-establishment of the Davidic throne and Kingdom, the complete subversion of anti-christian domination, the exaltation to power and authority of the pious, the entire reversal of the moral, social, and political condition of the world, the binding of Satan, the utter destruction of the enemies of God, the perfect vindication of truth and justice, etc.—all this, embracing the most radical and grand changes that the world has yet witnessed, demands the personal intervention of Him in whom all power is lodged. Therefore the general analogy of Scripture, as our line of argument clearly evinces, insists upon, and takes even for granted, this personal Pre-Mill Advent.

In thus presenting our reasons for the faith that is in us—a faith precious to the Jews, to the Primitive Church, and to a noble list of witnesses down to the present day—we can say (2 Pet. 1 : 16) with Peter : “ We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and Coming of our Lord Jesus.” The objections derived from inferences, the mistaking the general Divine Sovereignty for this special Theocratic Coming and Kingdom, etc., have been sufficiently noticed. All such objections are founded on isolated passages which are pressed beyond a legitimate meaning and the analogy of Scripture. On the other hand, our doctrine is part of a regularly divided Redemptive Plan, and finds support in a multitude of predictions and promises. It is singular that some persons (as Prof. Sanborn, etc.) instead of candidly weighing the Scripture evidence in our favor, merely present a tirade of abuse and misrepresentation making the Pre-Mill Advent “an impossibility,” “an error,” “an absurdity,” “another Gospel,” and “an evil” (comp. Lord’s scathing reply to Sanborn’s Essay on Millenarianism, in Lit. and Theol. Journal, Jan., 1856). We are slow to believe that this is done intentionally, but charitably ascribe it to ignorance respecting the real foundation upon which our doctrine rests. Such writers, seeing the mass of Scripture on our side (and which they confess in its grammatical sense teaches our view) should certainly, even if opposing us, be more guarded in their manifestations of respect for a doctrine so strongly fortified, lest, peradventure, they at last be found ridiculing and decrying God’s Plan and mode of procedure.

A caution is requisite : the doctrine of the Sec. Advent to be fully and practically beneficial is not simply to be confined to a belief in its mode (i.e. personal) or time of occurrence (i.e. Pre-Millennial), but must be extended to a just apprehension of its greatness, importance, and glory as a Theocratic ordering. The heart must not rest satisfied with a mere knowledge of the manner and time, but must receive both the grand fact as a realization of Covenant promise with its blessed redemptive results, and the application of the same to ourselves personally, i.e. our interest in it, etc. It is to be feared that this doctrine, like all others, may be held purely speculatively, theoretically, without exerting a practical influence upon the life. Unless it be, as James expresses it, an “engrafted word,” exerting a sanctifying influence, urging to duty, etc., it will be of little benefit.

Obs. 12. Considering the prominence and preciousness of this doctrine of a Pre-Mill. Advent, it is strange that men should so persistently reject and condemn it, notwithstanding the cautions and warnings given. The reason for its unpopularity and bitter opposition must be found in its condemnatory nature. It sets aside all human systems, all worldly schemes of regeneration, all man-devised plans to realize the Messiah’s Kingdom on earth, all confidence in the resources of nature, reason, etc., declaring that the personal intervention of Jesus, the Christ, is requisite to bring about the world’s restoration to Millennial blessedness. This is humbling to man’s pride, to his worldliness, to his schemes of reformation, all of which this Advent dooms to destruction. This exalting of the Christ and His work is condemnatory of man and his work, and hence man hates it, for it is a constant and jarring protest to his vain ideas of progress and reform, to his estimate of the Church’s and world’s actual mission and condition.

Hence, largely follow the resorts of opponents to rid themselves of the doctrine. To make the Coming to be Titus and his army at the destruction of Jerusalem is a palpable violation of the order laid down (e.g. Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21, and 2 Thesa. 2). To make the Advent to be providential movements, a constant exertion of the Divine sovereignty, is not only to ignore its special covenanted relationship, but, if logically carried out, leads to a denial of a future Second Advent of a personal nature (instances of which we have already quoted). To interpret it as manifested in the progress of the Church is to overlook that it is described as something separate and distinct from the Church, in e.g. the acts and results ascribed to it being different from those attributed to the Church; the Church also being exhorted to look and watch for it as something outside of it, etc. To apply it to the Coming of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost is to forget that the Holy Ghost is "another Comforter" (John 14: 16, and 16: 7, 26) distinguished from Jesus (Luke 1: 35; Matt. 3: 16), who does not supersede that which is specifically ascribed to Jesus at His Coming. But men, to carry out their theories will, in some way or other, apply this Coming, so as to avoid this future Pre-Mill. Advent. Thus e.g. Rev. Hequeubourg (Plan of Creation) denies it, and makes it either past (as in the destruction of Jerusalem), or past and present (as in "an advent of His Word and promises, or a regeneration of the world by the Gospel"). He coolly informs us "that the Coming of Christ was not intended to be literal." "The Saviour can never be expected, therefore, to come in a personal manner. His Second Coming has, at least, as regards the beginning or inauguration of the event, been accomplished, and no other is predicted in the Scriptures." He has even the assurance (against the overwhelming testimony to the contrary) to tell us that "by universal agreement everything points to the destruction of Jerusalem as the time when He came, if He came at all. And He actually came then according to the intention of his prediction, or else the reconciliation of the Scriptures with one another is impossible, and the words of the Redeemer of mankind must be classed with the idle tales of weak and deluded humanity." That is: admit a still future personal Sec. Advent, and it is an idle tale of deluded humanity, because men like Hequeubourg conceive it to be an impossibility! Lord, in a review of Hequeubourg's work, correctly shows his theory of the fall, etc., necessitates the removal of our doctrine, in order to save his system from contradictions, etc. The Spiritualists (New Test, as corrected by the Spirits) blasphemously declare in the name of Jesus: "I, Jesus, appeared in spirit in 1861, and do say and declare unto the world that the new era or dispensation has commenced, called the Coming of Christ. It commenced about the year 1847, and, as represented and spoken of by the prophet Daniel and others, by my coming as a cloud in the heavens, with tens of thousands of angels, to overshadow the earth with my glory" (quoted by McDonald, On Spiritualism, p. 27). Alas! what perversions men seek out. The Bible statements are, however, so strong that now and then they cause a retraction of previous denials. Thus e.g. Rev. Adams (Relig. World, vol. 3, p. 396, foot-note) says, that Dr. Priestly at one time denied the personal reign of Christ on earth, but at a later period advocated it; and for proof refers to his Sermon preached on the General Fast, Feb. 28th, 1794, and to his Farewell Sermon preached at Hackney before his removal to America.

Obs. 13. This Sec. Advent will be the greatest and grandest event that the world has ever yet witnessed. Great and glorious as was the First Advent—unspeakably precious and indispensably necessary unto Salvation—yet it was a Coming in humiliation and ending in death, with a glimpse at exaltation, but this is a Coming in overwhelming power, splendor, majesty, and glory—a Coming in triumph and like the mighty Theocratic King. To this Coming the Scriptures especially turns the eye of faith and speaks of it in the most lofty and exultant strain; and we may rest assured that what God thus describes, and to which He directs the hope of prophets, Apostles, and believers, must be inconceivably magnificent. It is an honor to aid in upholding and directing attention to it.

In the pages of history we read of the grand receptions of great men, of conquering heroes. The ringing of bells, the thundering of cannon, illuminations, fireworks, music, congratulatory addresses, joyful assemblages, shouts of welcome, all figure largely in these descriptions. This, of course, is the strongest evidence of the personal presence (as well as appreciation) of the one receiving such testimonials. Now, the Spirit foreseeing the hearty repentance and conversion of the Jews at this Advent of Jesus, portrays to us His public reception by the nation (e.g. Micah 2 : 13 ; Zeph. 3 : 15 ; Zech. 2 : 10-13, etc.). Jesus Himself predicted His future triumphal entry in Matt. 23 : 39, expressive of His recognized personality and the glory of that Coming. Jesus, when He wept over Jerusalem and lamented the sad fate of the nation, grasped with faith the glorious future, the joy set before Him, when the nation, recognizing Him as the Messiah, should say to Him personally (for they shall see Him whom they pierced), "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." What Jesus thus beheld, we would also joyfully believe ; yea, more, we desire, through God's abounding grace, as one of the magnificent retinue of the great King, to witness this glorious reception of a nation and its King, and to hear the glad hosannas bursting from a nation's heart, whose sin is pardoned and whose favor is now evermore insured.

Obs. 14. The early Christians, as numerous writers assert, had as their watchword the expressive "Maranatha," or "The Lord Cometh." This word "Maranatha" was used by the Jews (comp. Macknight, Ency. Relig. Knowl., etc.) expressive for "our Lord comes" (Lange, 1 Cor. loci), and is appropriately applied by Paul (1 Cor. 16 : 22) to the Sec. Advent of Jesus, thus according with the "Coming One" of Matt. 11 : 3 ; Luke 17 : 19, 20 ; John 6 : 14, and 11 : 27 ; Jude 14, and in Revelation. The usage (see Props. 74 and 75) and belief based thereupon forbid the notion of an intervening Millennium. Considering the Scriptural testimony for our faith already given (and much to be presented in following Propositions), and the exceeding preciousness of this Coming, well may we conclude this Prop. by urging the reader to have impressed upon mind and heart the pregnant word "Maranatha" (comp. Brookes's Maranatha, pp. 7-11).

PROPOSITION 122. As Son of Man, David's Son, Jesus inherits David's throne and Kingdom, and also the land of Palestine.

This has been already proven under the Propositions pertaining to the covenant (49, 50, 51, 52, etc.), and was so understood by the Jews and the early Christians.<sup>1</sup> Leaving the proof already assigned, directly derived from the covenant, attention is now called to the manner in which this inheritance is spoken of in the Scriptures. (With this comp. such Props. as 117, 131, 132, 137, etc.)

<sup>1</sup> The views of the Jews have been presented in previous Propositions, and are confirmed by the statements of able scholars, such as Lightfoot, Neander, Schaff, Knapp, Smith, and others, whom we have quoted. This was perpetuated in the early Christian Church, as we have already shown (Props. 70-76), and evidently led to the inquisition of Vespasian, as e.g. stated by Milman (His. Jews, vol. 3, p. 90): "The Christian Hegesippus relates that Vespasian commanded strict search to be made for all who claimed descent from the house of David, in order to cut off, if possible, all hopes of the restoration of the royal house, or of the Messiah, the confidence in whose speedy Coming still burned with feverish excitement in the hearts of all faithful Israelites. This barbarous inquisition was continued in the reign of Domitian." This only shows how the promises were associated in prevailing faith with a restoration of David's throne and Kingdom, so much so that Roman emperors had their attention and jealousy directed to it, but totally failed to apprehend its Theocratic nature and relationship to the crucified Jesus. To give an idea of the more modern Jewish view, several quotations from the prayer books (Art. Jews, in the Galaxy, Jan., 1872) will suffice: "Oh, return with mercy to Jerusalem, Thy city, and reign therein as Thou hast promised to do; rebuild it soon, during our existence, to remain imperishable, and speedily re-establish in it the throne of David. Praised be Thou, O Eternal! who buidest up Jerusalem!" "Fill us with rejoicing, O Eternal, through Elijah the prophet, Thy servant, and through the royal house of David, Thy anointed; may He soon come and gladden our heart. Upon His throne let no stranger sit; no others take unto themselves His glory; for by Thy holy name hast Thou sworn unto Him, that His light shall never be extinguished in all eternity. Praised be Thou, O Eternal! the shield of David."

Obs. 1. Writers by confining themselves to the Divine Sovereignty and overlooking the specific promises to David's Son, have Christ now in the enjoyment of the promised inheritance. To make this out, the language is spiritualized until David's throne and Kingdom is elevated to heaven and the land itself is converted into the Church or heaven or the universe. Besides this, it is rashly asserted that for Jesus to come again and obtain such a Theocratic rule here on earth would be derogatory to His dignity, etc. Having already replied to this and showed the impropriety and danger of our prejudging what is right and proper for Christ to perform, we rest content with the plain and repeated statements of the Word. And, moreover, it can be seen that the fulfilment of these promises will subserve noble purposes. The humanity of Christ, His contact with man in David's line, gives Him the leverage for Redemptive purposes; so also His contact through humanity with the throne and Kingdom of David gives Him the requisite leverage for a Theocratic rule, a divine government over the human race for the completion of Redemption. In looking closely at this wonderful arrangement, we find it most singularly adapted to secure the happiness of the creature man. In the infinity of matter, in the immensity of the universe, the man feels himself in almost the condition of an atom, and he finds only a consoling point of contact, of union, with the Infinite Architect in the Incarnation of Christ; so in the astounding, outgrowing laws of government, felt to be necessarily universal, acknowledged to be inseparable to order, happiness, etc., and yet in the history of the world running in selfishness and antagonisms through depravity, man can only find a point of union and needed support with the Divine in the reign of the glorified humanity of David's Son. It brings God to man and man to God in the highest of all relations, that of religious, social, and civil law and order.

It prevents us from indorsing views, which, presented under the honest supposition of honoring Christ, are antagonistic to His Theocratic position. Thus to illustrate: Farrar (Life of Christ, vol. 2, p. 138) says that "the Coming of God's Kingdom is as little geographical as it is chronological (Steir, 4, 287)." To this misconception it is only necessary to reply: if not geographical, what becomes of the express covenanted land, throne, and Kingdom; if not chronological, what becomes of the past history of the Theocracy, the overthrow and postponement, the prophetic periods, the times of the Gentiles, and the Sec. Advent? Farrar (p. 274) fully admits that the house remains desolate until Jesus comes again, saying in foot-note: "At the Sec. Advent, Zech. 12 : 10 ; Hos. 3 : 4, 5." This admission is sufficient. But this reference to Farrar must not be regarded as placing him among those who refuse to believe that there will be "the establishment of Christ's Kingdom at His Sec. Coming," see e.g. vol. 2, p. 269. A writer in the Christian Union asserts that the Kingdom of David was not of God's concurrence, and that He only permitted it as an accommodation to human weakness. Many authors proclaim the same. But that this is a misconception of the plain facts pertaining to incorporation and adoption, is seen e.g. under Props. 28, 31, etc. Dr. Gleig (His Bible, vol. 2, p. 204) makes, in answer to infidel objections, all references to an actual, real occupation of the Davidic throne and Kingdom, figurative, thus under a spiritualizing process of covenant and prophecy seeking to escape the grammatical sense. And led on by his zeal, he appends the utterly unfounded (as a brief examination will evince) assertion: "Besides, it is an error to assert that the Messiah is more frequently described" (i.e. in prophecy) "as a triumphant monarch than as a suffering man." These illustrations will suffice. We only add that excellent writers in their zeal for a spiritual Kingdom overstep all bounds in their rejection of geography and chronology, and yet these same authors when commenting e.g. on Dan. 2 and 7 ; Rev. 11 : 15, etc., have much to say of a Kingdom manifested geographically and chronologically, thus involving themselves in palpable contradictions. Our view is the only one that fully explains the selection of a nation, throne and Kingdom, for Theocratic rule.

Obs. 2. Having previously shown how Jesus as David's Son is entitled to David's throne and Kingdom; how the same throne and Kingdom overthrown and for a long time remaining overturned is finally restored (Ezek. 21 : 25-27 ; Hos. 3 : 4, 5 ; Amos 9 : 11 ; Acts 15 : 16, etc.), it is only necessary to indicate how the Scriptures in their general tenor preserve the idea that such is the inheritance of David's Son. This Kingdom is declared to be "His inheritance" the Lord's (1 Sam. 10 : 11) : "mine inheritance" (2 Kings 21 : 14), "Thine inheritance" (Ps. 28 : 9 etc.), and "the inheritance of the Lord" (1 Sam. 26 : 19 and 2 Sam. 21 : 3), in view of the Theocratic arrangement, for, as Solomon stated in his prayer (1 Kings 8 : 51, 53), this nation is "Thy people and Thine inheritance," "for Thou didst separate them from among all the people of the earth to be Thine inheritance, as Thou spakest unto Moses." Hence they are called "the tribes of Thine inheritance" (Isa. 63 : 17), "the mountain of Thine inheritance" (Ex. 15 : 17), "a people of inheritance" (Deut. 4 : 20), "Thy peo- ple and Thine inheritance" (Deut. 9 : 26, 29). Such language repeatedly employed must have a significant meaning, and this is only found in the special relationship that the Jewish nation sustains to God as their Ruler. But having shown that this Theocratic rule is absorbed and manifested in the Davidic line, and culminates in the Person of Jesus Christ, who is both the Son of David and the Son of God, the Scriptures speak of this inheritance belonging to Christ in this double relationship; but especially, because of the Covenant with Abraham and then with David, speak of it as pertaining to Him as David's Son, the Son of Man, seeing that the Kingdom is to be administered by Him because of His descent in the covenanted line, and only through this Humanity can the Ruler Himself be exhibited, etc. In addition to our previous argument showing that as David's Son He inherits David's throne and Kingdom, we add in this connection—that "heir of all things" (Heb 1 : 2) to whom the heathen also shall be given as an "inheritance" (Ps. 2 : 8); yea, even the kingdoms of this world (Dan. 7, and Rev. 11), yet He is also "out of Judah an inheritor of My mountains" (Isa. 65 : 9), who will "return for Thy servants' sake, the tribes of Thy inheritance" (Isa. 63 : 17), for "the Lord shall inherit Judah, His portion in the holy land and shall choose Jerusalem again" (Zech. 2 : 12), because "the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever" (Luke 1 : 32, 33). Men may think that this Heir of David's will not care for such an inheritance, but "the Lord will not cast off His people, neither will He forsake His inheritance" (Ps. 94 : 14), for the time will come when this Heir whom His own people killed shall return again and claim His right. The reasons having been given under the covenant, this will be confirmed by showing in the following Observation that not merely the throne and Kingdom but even the territory, the land itself, is claimed as part of this inheritance. If the latter is the case, then the former is the more readily acknowledged.

It is suggested that this subject may give a clew to the words "out of Egypt have I called my son," Matt. 2 : 15, which has been the matter of much dispute. One party alleges that the original passage could have in no sense a prophetic reference to Christ; another party asserts that it was used merely by way of accommodation; while still a third insists that in some way it had a reference to Christ, but exactly how it was to be explained they could not tell, because all the circumstances were not given, and the brevity necessarily obscured the interpretation. This subject, taking its connection with what preceded, suggests the following: Jesus was born in the promised inheritance, i. e. in the land, but it was proper as part of His humiliation that He should be driven out of it. This was done, and He was again recalled, thus being "made like unto His brethren," for His experience followed that of Israel. Hence He, with propriety, is included in the prophecy or in its application.

Obs. 3. Jesus, as David's Son and the Theocratic Ruler with whom the Father is united and identified, is the Heir of Palestine. If any one is disposed to object to what follows, on the ground that such an Heirship reduces Christ too much to the level of man, we remind him that this is of God's own ordering and for the purpose of accomplishing the most noble designs pertaining to Redemption. Precisely the same reason might be (and has been) adduced against the Incarnation itself, and, therefore, we should be guarded in bringing forward objections based on our own ideas of the fitness of things. It is natural to suppose that to a believer who accepts the Word as written by faith, the simple reason assigned in Ps. 132 would be sufficient to remove all objections; for David, after declaring God's fixed determination confirmed by oath, "of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne," adds: "for the Lord hath chosen Zion; He hath desired it for His habitation. This is my rest forever; here will I dwell; for I have desired it." The Theocratic-Davidic arrangement involves the actual, real possession of the land by the Ruler. The covenant, prophecy, and promise demand it. Let the reader notice that just so soon as this Theocratic arrangement is entered into, and God condescends to act in the capacity of earthly Ruler, then special claims are made in reference to the land occupied by His nation. The land is expressly called "His land," and cannot be sold in perpetuity (Lev. 25 : 23); "the land shall not be sold forever: for the land is Mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with Me." It is frequently called "the inheritance of the Lord," and by names indicative of its sustaining a peculiar affinity to God and His Son Jesus Christ. This nearness of the land, its possession, is even represented under the figure of marriage, that the Saviour is married or united to the land (Isa. 62 : 4). Having proven (Prop. 49) that the land is Christ's, it only is requisite to show that His inheritance is not vitiated by the sad condition in which the land has lain for many centuries. This is done abundantly by the prophets who predict its restoration to an Edenic fruitfulness, etc. It is amply sufficient, for the present, to say that God in Lev. 26 declares that in case of wickedness and rebellion He will make the land desolate and waste, even an astonishment, but that He will not "break His covenant;" for, after all the desolation, the time will come, when "I will remember My covenant with Jacob, and also My covenant with Isaac, and also My covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land." This is still more distinctly asserted in the remarkable predictions in Deut. 32, which is particularly commended to the reader's attention. After describing that "the Lord's portion is His people; Jacob is the lot of His inheritance," that this people would rebel and that fearful, prolonged disaster would occur to them and the land, he informs us that God will return again for purposes of vengeance and restitution, breaking forth: "Rejoice, O ye nations with His people, for He will avenge the blood of His servants and will render vengeance to His adversaries, and will be merciful unto His land and to His people." We need not be surprised at this, seeing that it is a solemnly covenanted land, "a land which the Lord thy God careth for (marg. read. "seeketh"); the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year." This land so near and dear to God; so intimately associated with His Son Jesus as His representative Ruler of that land; so united with the legal, royal, covenanted claims of David's Son, is yet destined in the Divine Purpose to play the most important and glorious part in the history of this world. And, if we are wise, those divine intimations of God's condescension and intentions, will be gratefully received. This land, which is called by way of pre-eminence and relationship "His Sanctuary" (Ex. 15 : 17; Ps. 78 : 54, etc.), will finally be cleansed and become as predicted "the Sanctuary" for the nations of the earth. This "rest" of the Lord's which He desires to dwell in, shall, in the age to come, gratify the desires and secure the blessedness of His co-heirs and co-dwellers, who will also delight in it with gladness and singing.

This line of argument might be extended by noticing the passages which speak of the time when (Joel 2 : 18) "the Lord will be jealous for His land;" when (Ezek. 36 : 34, 35, 36, etc.) the desolate land shall "become like the Garden of Eden;" and when (Joel 2 : 21) the land shall "be glad and rejoice; for the Lord will do great things"; by referring to the predicted dwelling again of God in the restored Jerusalem with the resultant joy and prosperity; by reference to the Davidic throne and Kingdom, as connected with the land restored (Prop. 49); by the statements respecting the place of manifested royalty (Prop. 168); by its relation to a restoration of the Jews (Props. 111-114), a visibly manifested Theocracy (Prop. 117), Pre-Mill. Advent (Prop. 123), the visible reign of Jesus (Prop. 131), etc. It is linked with a variety of things, which will be presented in detail hereafter. Bh. Lowth's version of Isa. 62 : 5 still more forcibly presents the idea of Christ's marrying the land, i.e. being permanently united with it as husband to wife, for instead of "thy sons" he reads "restorer" or "builder." The bishop also remarks: "In the prophets a desolate land is represented under the notion of a widow; an inhabited land, under that of a married woman, who has both husband and children." Oriental nations represent the accession of a prince to kingship, the occupancy of supreme power over a land, under the figure of a marriage; so the Bible delineates the establishment of this Theocratic rule (comp. Prop. 169). The reader will observe that our argument now only refers to the inheritance that specially is covenanted to David's Son—this is not the only inheritance (as we abundantly show) that belongs to Him, for this Theocratic-Davidic government established in this inheritance is to extend over all the earth until all nations and lands are embraced, as predicted, in its universal dominion. This view is opposed to those mystical and spiritualistic notions, found incorporated in the writings of eminent men, viz., that the future Kingdom has reference merely to state, condition, or character, and not to place or locality. Much that is finely portrayed in this direction, must be discarded as unscriptural. "Jehovah's Land" (Hos. 9 : 3), "the glorious Land" (Dent. 11 : 41), "the Holy Land" (Zech. 2 : 12), will see and rejoice in the Inheritor.

Obs. 4. The absence of the Lord as indicated by the parable of the nobleman; His concealment, as noticed by Isa. 49 : 2, during this period of removal, is only preparative to the final return and enforcement of His claims as the mighty and irresistible Heir. Take e.g. the chapter of Isa. just alluded to and we have (1) this hidden position of the one called from the womb; (2) an allusion to His rejection at the First Advent; (3) His ultimate success in the restoration of the Jews, the conversion and subjection of the Gentiles and the glorious reign; (4) to effect this He delivers the prisoners, He restores the earth, removes the desolations, in an especial manner blesses Zion, etc. The delay of fulfilment is no reason for believing that it never will be realized, because the fact of such postponement accords with the previously given predictions intimating it.

The reasons for this postponement of inheriting have been given (1) as a punishment to the Jewish nation for its sinfulness; (2) as a means of grace and mercy to Gentiles for engrafting; (3) as a measure by which to obtain the allotted number of the elect to sustain the Kingdom, etc. Hence, a present non-fulfilment should only confirm our hope in a future fulfilment. Advantage is taken of this absence by impostors, as e.g. in the imposition of David El-Roy of Amaria, as related by Benjamin of Tudela in his Travels (Bohn's Ed.), and by Major Rawlinson in Trans. of Geographical Society of London. Many impostors have thus arisen as can be seen in encyclopædias under Art. "Fulse Messiah." Another instance of claiming the throne of David can be seen in Robertson's His. of Charles V., p. 468. These are some of the most sad exhibitions of depravity. This also explains the extraordinary honors paid to the princes of the captivity, who professed to be descendants of David (Benjamin of Tudela's Travels, and Histories of the Jews). The student scarcely need be reminded of the Anabaptists of Munster, among whom John of Leyden (with twelve associated chiefs) was ordained to reign over the whole earth, professing—according to a prophet announcing it on the feast of St. John, 1534—"to occupy the throne of David" (Michelet's Life of Luther, p. 234). The perversions of the divine teaching, the misapplications of the doctrine, the spiritualistic and typical interpretations, will not retard the ultimate fulfilment. Jesus now sits on His Father's throne (distinguished from His future one. Rev. 3 : 21), and when He comes to sit on His own (Matt. 25 : 31), it is as the mighty covenanted Theocratic King. The angel's announcement (Luke 1 : 32), so confirmatory of Jewish faith in the grammatical sense of covenant and prophecy, will be faithfully fulfilled. The Davidic throne (Amos 9 : 11-15), allied with the restoration of the Jewish nation (being necessarily identified with it) to their own land, will be restored with the greatest splendor and glory in David's Son (and James, Acts 15 : 16, confirms it). David will yet say, in view of his resurrection and participation in this restoration (Pa. 30): "Lord, by Thy favor Thou hast made my mountain (i.e. Kingdom) to stand strong," and to be "girded with gladness," and to "give thanks forever" (for the ages).

Obs. 5. The student will see that the inheritance covenanted is not typical of something else. The mystical views that would make it a type of something spiritual are refuted by the literal tenor of the covenant, and that all the prophecies and promises reiterate that literality which is corroborated by the idea of inheriting. The Kingdom at the time of the covenant was literal; the promise of inheriting is literal, confined as it is by the express terms to the literal Theocracy; the Coming of the Heir is literal; the postponement is literal; all is literal. Whatever spiritual blessings and additional glory may be added, the inheritance cannot, without the greatest violence, be transmuted into something else. The same tabernacle fallen down (Acts 15 : 16) is Christ's inheritance, and to fulfil the covenant is to be rebuilt again when Jesus, David's Son, comes again. It is the same Kingdom that (Props. 69, 70, and 71) the preachers of the Kingdom under special Messianic instruction declared as seen e.g. in Acts 1 : 6. It is (Props. 32 and 33) the same Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom that was removed, that is finally, after (e.g. Hos. 3 : 4) a long interval, to be restored.

Those who (like Fairbairn, Typology) make Canaan a type of a heavenly inheritance, will also, of course, make everything relating to the inheritance (throne, Kingdom, and nation) typical, although positively forbidden by the specific covenant promises and by the predicted restitution. But our opponents differ widely among themselves in this typical application. Some apply it wholly to the Church as now existing; others to the Church and heaven united; others to heaven itself, where throne and inheritance are located. The simple fact, as the childlike faith of the early Church evidenced, is this: that the inheritance of David's Son forbids all those views, from the earliest down to the latest (e.g. Balfour, Barbour, etc.), of an exclusive spiritual Kingdom, seeing that it is linked with a visible, well-defined, outward Theocracy, once established but now, owing to sin, withdrawn, but which the Heir is to restore at the appointed time. The restoration of this inheritance to the rightful Heir will inaugurate one of the most terrible conflicts that this earth has ever witnessed. While distinctively brought out in covenant and promise, it is not so paraded e.g. in Daniel, Apocalypse, etc., as to excite the prejudice of Gentile kingdoms and become offensive to them. When the time comes for obtaining the inheritance, He will not fail in securing it. As to the high spirituality connected with it, compare e.g. Prop. 197. The student will observe that our line of argument leads us only to consider the inheritance due to Jesus as the Son of David in the covenanted line; added to this must also be regarded the inheritance (if it may be thus designated) belonging to His divine Sonship, i.e. those things specially belonging to Him and exerted by Him as God. For in the consideration of this subject, both the human and the divine aspects must be regarded in order to preserve a completeness.

We may again briefly refer to Acts 15 : 14-16, which our opponents attempt to wrest from us. (The Latin Vulgate, Dub. Transl., gives the following: "Simeon hath related how God first visited to take of the Gentiles a people to His name. And to this agree the words of the prophets, as it is written: After these things I will return, and I will rebuild the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down, and the ruins thereof I will rebuild, and I will set it up"). No matter what version we take, two things are self-evident: (1) that after the gathering out of this people, Jesus will return again; and (2) that David's Kingdom, which is purposely (as if to avoid the glosses not put upon it by human wisdom in its efforts at spiritualizing) identified as the one fallen, shall then be restored by this Jesus. And to this agree, as Simeon intimates, not merely a prophet but the prophets in general, as seen by our quotations from them. Hence we can well afford to pass by the far-fetched applications given to the passage. Thus e.g. the Compreh. Com., loci, says: "But God will return and build it (David's house, and family, and Kingdom) again, raise it out of its ruins ; and this was now lately fulfilled, when our Lord Jesus was raised out of that family, had the throne of his father, David, given him, with a promise that He should reign over the house of Jacob forever. And when the tabernacle of David was thus rebuilt in Christ, all the rest of it was, not many years after, wholly cut off, as was also the nation of the Jews itself, and all their genealogies lost." Can prejudice present a more one-sided and contradictory exegesis ! One-sided : because there is not a particle of proof that this throne was given to Him, or this tabernacle was rebuilt. Contradictory : because it implies that "the house of Jacob" is not what the term expresses, and that this nation (or "house of Jacob") is forever cut off ; and that the tabernacle is rebuilt with the nation left out. Again take this same Com. on Acts 1 : 6, and we have : "Their expectation of the thing itself, that Christ would restore (and perfect) the Kingdom to Israel, i.e. make the nation of the Jews as great and considerable as it was in the days of David, Solomon, Asa, and Jehoshaphat ; whereas Christ came to set up His own kingdom, and that a Kingdom of heaven, not to restore the kingdom to Israel, an earthly kingdom." Then referring to the disciples as mistaken, etc., he adds : "They thought God would have no Kingdom in the world unless it were restored to Israel, whereas the kingdoms of this world were to become His, in whom He would be glorified, whether Israel sink or swim. See also how apt we are to misunderstand Scripture, and to understand that literally which is spoken figuratively, and to expound Scripture by our schemes, whereas we ought to form our schemes by the Scriptures." The last sentence illustrates the commentator's own position. We would rather trust to the God-given literal sense than to his unproven statements ; and give our credence to the alleged "mistaken" disciples (authorized and instructed) than to his modernized comments. Had the disciples no right to expect (Props. 46 and 47) this predicted grandeur (Props. 52, 68, and 114) of the restored (Props. 111, 112, and 113) nation ? Is Christ's "own Kingdom" different from that covenanted (Prop. 49) to David's Son ? Is this Kingdom, according to prophecy and covenant, separated from the Jewish nation so that it makes no difference "whether Israel sink or swim ?" This writer evidences that he has not the slightest idea of the elect position of the nation or of the nature of the Kingdom ; and in this category must be placed many able and talented writers, who are blinded to the truth by the generally adopted spiritualizing system of interpretation. To such, even the significant title of Jesus, "King of the Jews," has no special meaning ; and the acclamations (Mark 11 : 10) of the people, "Blessed be the Kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord ; Hosanna in the Highest," was only an exhibition of ignorance and prejudice.

Obs. 6. The continued covenanted relationship of Jesus to the throne and Kingdom of David is asserted in the last revelation given, as in the Apoc. 3 : 7, "He hath the Key of David." This is indicative of the Messiahship, the Key (Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 466) being symbolical of "power or authority," or (so Barnes, Com. loci, with which compare Bush, Lowth, Alexander, etc., and the Chaldee Targum on Isa. 22 : 22) rather of "regal authority," "government." It is equivalent to saying that He is the Theocratic King to whom David's throne and Kingdom is given. It is not merely "supreme power" (Lange, etc.) that is meant, but such power and authority as pertains to the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, i.e. the dignity, etc., pertaining to David now relates to David's august Son. But while having this "Key of David," He does not now exert its power (just as He has also the keys of death and the grave), for He awaits the period of the Sec. Advent when this bestowed authority will be duly manifested.

The primitive Church, however "ignorant" moderns may deem it, was far more consistent in its belief than multitudes are to-day ; for it clung to the oath-bound promises of God given in language which—as our opponents are forced to admit, however afterward changed—conveys our doctrine. Our opposers base their view on sheer inference and assumption. Thus Storr (Oril. Diss. on Kingdom) concludes : "It follows, then, that the commencement of Messiah's Kingdom, although in a certain sense it may be traced from His birth, yet properly is to be reckoned from His ascension into heaven. Which proves that a far different appearance was then given to the Kingdom of David which Jesus possessed after His death and return to a new life ; and that the throne of David became a far more exalted seat of majesty, from the time it was occupied by Jesus." The postponement of the Kingdom (Props. 58, 66, 67, 87), aside from covenant and prophecy, is a sufficient reply. So also a writer in the Princeton Review, Ap., 1851, p. 192, undertakes to prove that Jesus is "now occupying the throne of David," and gives us the sermon of Peter in Acts, and the phrase "He that hath the key of David" in Rev. But Jesus being now "exalted," and "both Lord and the Christ" on the Father's throne (preparatory), does not convert the Father's throne into David's ; and having "the key of David" does not prove that the authority implied by it is exercised. Indeed, the ascension of Jesus to heaven did not, as we have repeatedly proven, influence the inspired apostles to think that Jesus now occupied David's throne, for e.g. James, Acts 15 : 16, after the ascension and exaltation, still speaks of the tabernacle as downfallen. The proof that such writers allege, only gives us the qualifications and assurances that in Him the covenant promises will be realized. The objection urged respecting a material throne is simply childish, as every one knows that "throne" is expressive of personal royal dominion. Waldegrave (New Test. Millenarianism) has a lecture entitled, "The Kingdom of Christ, as now existing, the true Kingdom of his father David," i.e. the Church. Multitudes indorse it. A Roman Catholic writer, indorsed by high authority, presents the same, as follows. Dr. Rutter (Life of Christ, p. 62) comments thus on Luke 1 : 32, 33. After making the reign over "the house of Jacob" to be "over the Church of God, composed of Jews and Gentiles," he then informs us that His Kingdom is "only of a spiritual nature : He reigns over the minds of men by faith, over their hearts by charity, and lastly, He will reign over all mankind forever hereafter, either in a state of happiness or misery, according to each one's respective merits. His throne is called 'the throne of David' because the throne of David prefigured that of the Messiah." Hence (p. 69) the phrase (Luke 1 : 69) "the house of His servant David" is made equivalent to "His holy Catholic Church." This theologically constructed throne of David is a great favorite, and, with claimed superiority, our view is ridiculed. Thus Elihu Burritt (Christian at Work, Oct. 31st, 1879), in a weak (its weakness demonstrated by making the Sec. Advent past) article against us, after referring to the Pre-Mill. reign of Christ at Jerusalem, endeavors to show off his (learned) wit (at the expense of the everlasting Davidic covenant) by ridiculing our doctrine as follows : "This would be like conferring a new dignity on the Queen of England and Empress of India by inviting her to descend from the throne and sit upon a milking-stool in the barnyard of an Illinois farmer !" Our answer to such intended sarcasm will be found under Prop. 203. It is evident that Burritt cannot discriminate between the Divine Sovereignty (Props. 79 and 80) and the special covenanted Kingdom (Prop. 49) given to David's Son (Props. 81 and 83). Thousands make a similar mistake. Perhaps one of the most extravagant theories is that of Wild (The Lost Ten Tribes) and several others, who make David's throne to be "the English throne"—so that "Queen Victoria is of David, and the English throne is David's ;" a view which is supported by a boldness of credence in alleged historical facts (lacking decisive proof, as e.g. as to descent) that is amazing ; by an ignoring of the facts that David's throne runs in the line of Judah, that its perpetuity follows after a long period of downfall and ruin, that the predictions relating to it are not met with in the history (notwithstanding the eulogies so liberally bestowed) of the English throne, that it cannot—according to prophecy—exist during these "times of the Gentiles," that it stands related in its restoration to a restored (not downtrodden) Jerusalem and restored (not scattered) nation, that its restitution has been postponed to the Sec. Advent, that its recovery is inseparably united to a future Coming Messiah, etc. Under various propositions we fully meet the objections that this theory presents—a view which finds its main support in applying Scripture promises to the present that consistently relate to the future.

We may, by way of illustration and contrast, present a few expressions of faith. We have already (as e.g. John Bunyan, Prop. 78) given a variety, but the reader may appreciate some more. Brookes's (Maranatha, p. 442), after stating that God will fulfil His promises made to the Patriarchs, and that "the blood of His own Son has been poured out to ratify the covenant," then adds : "No power, then, on earth or in hell can set it aside. That Son shall yet reign upon the throne of David, as announced to the Virgin Mary and elsewhere throughout the New Test., and if readers of the Bible would stop to think, instead of blindly following tradition, they would see that in no conceivable sense is the throne of David in our hearts, nor yet in heaven, but just where our Lord says it is," viz., in Jerusalem. Dr. Seis (Last Times, p. 135), after referring to this dispensation in which "the throne of David is yet less than a cipher," and during which His inheritance "is still trodden by the vile foot of the destroyer," remarks : "Oh, tell me not that this is the glorious reign of the Messiah ! Tell me not that these are the scenes to which the saints of old looked with so much joy! I will not so disgrace my Saviour or His Word, as to allow for a moment that this dispensation is the sublime Messianic Kingdom. No, no, no; Christ does not yet reign in the Kingdom which He has promised, and for which He has taught us to pray. Isaiah and Gabriel have said that He should occupy the throne of His Father, David, and reign over the house of Jacob, and establish His government in eternal peace and righteousness; but David's sceptre He has never held, over Jacob's house He has never ruled, and the whole world is yet full of iniquity and woe." (Comp. e.g. Luther on Ps. 2, quoted by Seiss, p. 254.) Hundreds of able and talented pens express the same faith and hope, for which we thank God. We hold (Milton, Par. Lost, xii. 369) that " He shall ascend

The throne hereditary, bound His reign
With earth's wide bounds, His glory with the heaven."

With Bh. Heber—in that sublime poem descriptive of the Sec. Advent, the enthronement of the saints, the restoration of the Jews, etc.—we hold that

" On David's throne shall David's offspring reign,
And the dry bones be warmed to life again."

Obs. 7. The time will come, when this covenanted and predicted truth, now so ignored and perverted, will be fully recognized by earthly Kingdoms. And this recognition will be the real cause for the formidable array of the nations against the Christ at His open revelation, for they will be unwilling to yield to this re-establishment of the Theocratic-Davidic throne and Kingdom (comp. Props. 160, 161, 162, and 163).

Obs. 8. It may be added: unless this Theocracy is restored in grandeur and glory, as covenanted and predicted, then God's earthly government in the union of the civil and religious (Church and State) has, amid the Kingdoms of the earth, proven a failure (comp. Prop. 201). God, as an earthly King, has had rule but a brief period. Will it ever be so? No! God's Word assures us that when He comes again, it is to a glorious reign. Once "He came to His own land and His own people received Him not" (Campbell's rendering of John 1:11; so Alford, "His own inheritance or possession and His own people," etc., comp. Matt. 8:20 and 21:33), but when He comes again to His own land or inheritance, His own people will receive Him with penitence and gladness, and then the Theocracy will be manifested in and through Him with an exaltation and splendor commensurate with the predictions given.

Some writers (as R. D. W. in Proph. Times, vol. 9, p. 21) insist upon it that "David the King" and "David the Prince" (Ezek. 37:24, 25; 34:23, 24; Hos. 3:5; Jer. 30:9) denotes not Jesus, the Christ, but David himself. The theory is that David is raised up and reigns over Israel; that Jesus Jehovah reigns over the world, including, in general, Israel. Jerusalem being the capitol, David under the Messiah rules over the Jewish nation, and the twelve apostles are rulers over the twelve tribes subordinate to David and Jesus. Now such a view might be entertained without materially affecting the Theocratic ordering as advocated by us; indeed, if requisite, it could be incorporated without detriment. (Some few declare that to make David mean Christ is "mystical," as e.g. Dunn's How to Study the Bible.) We, however, are not prepared to accept of the theory, whatever high station may be allotted to David in the Coming Kingdom. The reasons that influence us are the following: (1) The throne and Kingdom is specifically given to David's Son; (2) the same is spoken of as the Messiah's inheritance; (3) the covenant and prophecies particularize the reign of David's Son; (4) otherwise the promises are made contradictory and a unity destroyed; (5) the Jews understood this to refer to the Messiah, as e.g. the Targum reads Hos. 3:5: "They shall obey the Messiah, the Son of David, their King;" (6) Many of our opponents apply it to the Messiah; (7) Peter's argument in Acts expressly makes Jesus to sit on David's throne; (8) it has been customary to call a descendant by the name of his ancestor (as e.g. Cæsar), so e.g. the Messiah is designated "Israel" (Isa. 49:3).

PROPOSITION 123. The Pre-Millennial Advent and the accompanying Kingdom are united with the destruction of Antichrist.

This is a decided landmark in prophecy, and nearly every prophet dilates, more or less, on this feature, viz., that Antichrist is destroyed at the personal presence of the Christ. We, for the present, only direct attention to three: Paul in 2 Thess. 2, Daniel in ch. 7, and John in Rev. 19. The early Church and a long line of witnesses held that these synchronize; and we know of no legitimate argument adduced by our opponents to the contrary; while, on the other hand, a host of admissions, favorable to their identity in time and destruction of the Antichrist, could readily be gathered. If we can give decided proof that one of these predictions relates to a personal Coming to destroy the Antichrist, the others naturally—describing the same event and results—range themselves in the same order. 2 Thess. 2 is selected as a special subject for examination in this connection.

Obs. 1. It is admitted by all our recent prophetic writers that Antichrist shall exist previous to the Millennial age—this is so plain in the confederation of nations existing then, that it needs no additional proof—now if we can show that he is destroyed by the personal Coming of Jesus, we have a personal Pre-Mill. Coming. The predictions relating to the Millennium clearly portray the removal of the man of sin and of his adherents before that age; and they reveal the impossibility of reconciling their presence with the realization of that age of blessedness. The true sense of the Scripture is contained in 2 Thess. 2, “which” (as Taylor, Voice of the Church, p. 293, remarks) “all Pre-Millenarians with the Hon. B. Storer pronounce to be ‘the unanswerable argument’; and of which they may well declare in the decisive words of Bish. M’Ilvaine, ‘It is wholly unanswerable.’” And the reader is requested to notice, that in the following discussion we are not chargeable with endeavoring to make out, or force, a meaning; seeing that we are accepting of that which is given to it by many of our opponents and a host of men rejecting our Mill. views. This makes the testimony more valuable and correspondingly more conclusive.

<sup>1</sup> The late Dr. Marsh (quoted p. 159, vol. 5, Proph. Times) gives the view of a large number of writers: “As to the Coming of our Lord, I simplify it thus: There is no intervening period of a Millennium between Daniel’s Son of Man coming in glory and the destruction of the fourth empire. Nor, in our Lord’s prophecy of the fall of the civil and ecclesiastical sun, moon, and stars, and His return. Nor in the Apostle Paul’s revelation of the Man of sin (2 Thess. 2: 1-8), and the Lord’s return to destroy him. Ergo, the Millennial period succeeds, not precedes, the Lord’s return. The prophecies of the Old Test. proceed on this plan.” “I never knew an Anti-Millenarian give a satisfactory answer to 2 Thess. 2 : 8. If the Man of sin must be destroyed before that period, the Lord must come before that period ; for it is of His personal, not spiritual Coming, that the Apostle is speaking. Spiritual, indeed, that will be also, for there will be but little spirituality till then. Judah will vex Ephraim and Ephraim envy Judah."

Obs. 2. The passage to which special attention is called reads : " And then shall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His Coming," 2 Thess. 2 : 8.* Owing to its importance and the efforts made to give it an interpretation adapted to the modern Whittyan theory, it will be best to examine it in detail.

A. Those to whom Paul wrote were looking for the personal Advent of Christ. This appears from several considerations. 1. The Apostle distinctly and repeatedly mentions the personal Coming. Thus in 1 Thess. 1 : 10 ; 2 : 19 ; 3 : 13 ; 4 : 16 ; 5 : 23 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 7 ; 2 : 1 ; 3 : 5. Hence the minds of the Thessalonians were specifically directed to this subject. 2. This very Coming, we are told, 2 Thess. 2 : 2—the subject matter of Paul's discourse—was calculated to shake and trouble them, deeming it past and they not saved. If a "spiritual" or "providential Coming" was only intended, as some contend, it is singular that Paul does not explain it as such ; if it was to "convert" and not "to consume and destroy," it is astonishing that Paul does not declare the same ; and if it was a providential Coming at Jerusalem (as a few assert) in which the Thessalonians were not personally concerned, it is strange that the Apostle does not mention the fact to relieve their minds. The only satisfactory explanation which meets the condition of their trouble is, that they supposed the day of Christ had come, was inaugurated, and hence they expected that a personal Advent had taken place. They believed in such a personal Coming from Paul's previous teachings. They supposed it at least to be imminent, if it had not already transpired. The Apostle seeing that this supposition agitated their minds, etc., makes the imminency, the nearness of such a visible Coming as they believed in, the subject of his remarks. It would, in the nature of the case, be unreasonable for him to introduce any other Coming than the one under consideration, without a specific mention that they were mistaken in their ideas respecting such a personal Coming ; or, if another Coming was to be understood, growing out of the one stated, without pointing out, in some way, the distinction between them. 3. The reference to a personal Coming is established by the phraseology appended, "as that the day of Christ is at hand." The period when the Messiah is to be personally manifested as the Judge, the King, etc., is often called "His day," etc., and was so understood both by the Jews and early Christians. This phrase clearly proves that the Apostle was writing to those who not only held to a personal Advent, but united the day of Judgment, the distinctive day of Christ in which His power and majesty was to be revealed, with that Coming. Paul's endeavoring to show that such a day of Christ (see how he used the phrase in

---

* The Revision has : " And then shall be revealed the lawless one whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the breath of His mouth, and bring to naught by the manifestation of His Coming (or presence)." Lange's Com. loci : " And then shall that Wicked be revealed (shall be revealed that lawless one) whom the Lord (Lord Jesus) shall consume with the Spirit (breath) of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness (appearing) of His Coming."

Acts 17 : 31 ; Rom. 2 : 5 ; 1 Cor. 3 : 13 ; 2 Cor. 1 : 14 ; 1 Cor. 5 : 5 ; Eph. 4 : 30 ; Phil. 1 : 6, 10), of which he had told them in the First Epis. (1 Thess. 5 : 2), "the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night" was not so near as they apprehended, that certain great events would intervene, unmistakably corroborates his entire and exclusive reference in this verse to a personal Advent.*

B. The Apostle then designs to correct the mistake respecting the presence or nearness of that personal Coming in which they believed, and the manner in which he does this confirms the allusion to the personal Coming. Instead of denying such an Advent (which he could not do) he enters into the question concerning the time of the very Advent whose expected speedy approach or supposed occurrence caused their alarm. He enlightens them on time and confirms their ideas of personality. He introduces the subject by several distinct references to the personal Advent, and then asserts, that it shall not come until at least a certain event, viz., the appearing and power of the man of sin, was first witnessed ; then after this it would occur as stated in the passage under consideration and "the day of Christ" would be witnessed. His argument is not that they were mistaken in a personal Coming, or that it would not at some time or other take place, but is directed to the time when it will be manifested. To show the latter, that it is not "at hand" or "present," as they supposed, he introduces the predicted fact that before that visible Advent or day of Christ, the wicked one must arise and be exalted in power. It legitimately follows from the tenor of the proof given, that this personal Advent is not "at hand" or "present ;" that it will, after an intervening event has been fulfilled, then come to pass. Any other construction than that which makes the writer speak of the same day of Christ and Advent which the Thessalonians expected, which troubled them, and which he stated was only to be expected after the accomplishment of the revelation of the son of perdition, is a manifest violation of the Apostle's reasoning, and a gloss put on the passage.*

C. The Apostle's proof of the day of Christ and hence also the personal Advent not being "at hand" or "present," thus fully accords with the analogy of Scripture. Many are the predictions and pointed allusions that Christ's visible personal Advent only takes place at a time when Antichrist or a mighty confederation of wickedness is developed, and that He will at such a Coming take vengeance and utterly destroy the wicked arrayed against Him. All prophecy agrees in uniting the destruction of the Antichristian power with a personal Advent. The simple fact that acts of judgment and the destruction of the ungodly are united with, in passages admitted to relate to the Sec. Advent (as in this same Epistle, ch. 1 : 7-10), and that the same is expressed here in this Scripture when the purpose of the Apostle was to tell the Thessalonians why "the day of Christ" and its attendant Advent was not present or immediate, or near, firmly establishes the truth that no other but a real personal one is intended. The proof alleged by him thus accords with all his previous utterances on the subject, with the tenor of the Record, and was suited to convince those brethren that a delay in the Advent was inevitable, since it would require time, and probably a long time, for such an apostasy to develop itself into the giant form of wickedness predicted.*

D. The Apostle, in introducing the Coming of the Lord Jesus to destroy this Antichrist, was undoubtedly aware of the views of the Jews on this subject. The Jews, impelled by the prophecies, looked for a personal Coming of the Messiah to destroy the wicked one.<sup>4</sup> If their belief was an erroneous one, why is it that Paul employs the very language, calculated (see below) beyond any other, to express such a Jewish faith, and thus confirm them, should any see the Epistle, in it? The knowledge that such a belief was extensively current among them, if it were an unscriptural one, should have led him to use different words—not words which in their naked, primary meaning corroborate their opinion. This union of the destruction of the wicked one with words that literally import a personal Coming is the strongest possible indorsement of their faith.<sup>5</sup>

E. The import of the two words rendered “brightness of His Coming.” Epiphaneia, ἐπιφανεῖα, called here “brightness,” and Parousia, παρουσία, translated “Coming.”

1. Notice how these words are used in the New Test. (a) The word Epiphaneia occurs six times, 1 Tim. 6 : 14 ; 2 Tim. 1 : 10 ; 2 Tim. 4 : 1 and 8 ; Tit. 2 : 13, and in this place. In one place it refers to the personal First Advent, and in the four remaining, as our opponents concede, to the personal Sec. Advent. Now, why, unless the clearest proof can be given, should it in the only remaining place, with the light before us, attain another meaning? Whoever undertakes to foist a definition at variance to the New Test. usage, ought to be able to give conclusive reasons for such a departure.* (b) The word Parousia is used in the New Test. twenty-four times, Matt. 24 : 3, 27, 37, 39 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 23, and 16 : 17 ; 2 Cor. 7 : 6, 7, and 10 : 10 ; Phil. 1 : 26, and 2 : 3 ; 1 Thess. 2 : 19, and 3 : 13, and 4 : 15, and 5 : 23 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 1, 8, 9 ; James 5 : 7, 8 ; 2 Pet. 1 : 16, and 3 : 4, 12, and 1 John 2 : 18. In all places where applied to persons it denotes, as all admit, a personal presence or arrival, and hence we have no just reason to discard that meaning in this place, especially since the argument of the Apostle makes the retention of the meaning thus given necessary.<sup>7</sup>

2. But in addition, the fact that the Apostle unites together those two words, each one expressive of a personal Advent, adds weight to the interpretation we claim. As if aware of the future denial of such a personal Coming, and purposely to guard against it, he employs two words unitedly, each one of which is singly applied to the Sec. Advent. Why select two such, so expressive of a real, actual presence, if he did not intend to teach the same? One of these words would be sufficient to sustain our argument, both make it irresistible. Dr. Duffield (On Proph., p. 324) well says : “If neither, when separately used, can be metaphorically understood to denote a spiritual Advent, much less can both when united. If the words, ‘the shining forth or appearance of His presence,’ do not mean the visible personal revelation or manifestation of Himself, it is impossible to employ terms that can express it. Human language is utterly incapable of being interpreted on any fixed and definite principles whatever, if it be not a literal personal manifestation and Coming.” Dr. Seiss (Last Times, p. 48), after using very nearly the same language, adds : “Either of these words is held sufficient in other passages to prove a real and personal appearing and presence. And when both are united, as in the case before us, how is it possible that they should mean anything less than the literal, real, and personal arrival and presence of Jesus, with reference to whom they are used?” The same was noticed by earlier writers, and has been frequently repeated as worthy of attention.<sup>8</sup>

3. The testimony of lexicographers.* (1) Epiphaneia. Pasor, N. T. Lex., says it denotes "appearance. In one place it is applied to the nativity of our Lord Jesus Christ, 2 Tim. 1 : 10 ; in other places of the Scriptures for His glorious Coming to judgment, as 2 Thess. 2 : 8." Stockius, Clavis, vol. 2, remarks : "1st, It denotes, when applied to genus, any appearance whatever. 2d, when applied to a species, it properly denotes the appearance of some corporeal and shining matter which bursts forth with great splendor. In a metaphorical sense, it is applied to the appearance of Christ : First, His gracious appearance in the flesh, which is called His first Coming ; second, His glorious appearance to judge the world, which will be gracious to the righteous and faithful, but terrible to the sinner and infidel, and which is called His Second Coming, 2 Thess. 2 : 8," etc. Leigh, Critica Sacra, p. 161, writes : "This word signifieth a bright, clear, glorious appearing, from which word we take our Epiphany, specially Adventus Numinis (i.e. the Coming of the Divinity). It is taken for the First Coming of Christ, 2 Tim. 1 : 10 ; for His Sec. Coming, as 2 Thess. 2 : 8," etc. Suicer (Thess. Eccles., vol. 1, p. 1202), "after mentioning the use of the word, 1st, the heathen use of it in reference to the manifestation of one of their gods ; 2d, in reference to the First Advent, proceeds : 3d, 'This is frequently applied by the Apostle to the Second Coming of Christ, which will be to judgment, 2 Thess. 2 : 8.'" Scultetus, Exer. Evang., Lib. 2, ch. 1, after noticing that the pagan writers called any appearance of the gods by this word, adds : "The Apostle also applies ἐπιφάνεια—appearance—to the first and last Coming of Christ." Bretschneider, Lex., "ἐπιφάνεια is used in the New Test. in the writings of Paul concerning the splendid appearing and future Advent in which Christ, who is now concealed from our view in the heavens, shall appear coming in the clouds (literally, borne on the clouds or wafted by the clouds) to administer judgment, 2 Thess. 2 : 8 ; 1 Tim. 6 : 14 ; 2 Tim. 4 : 1, 8 ; Titus 2 : 13 ; and concerning His appearing in the world, which has already taken place, viz., when He was born, 2 Tim. 1 : 10 ; or, in other words, His first Advent." Wahl, Lex., defines the word to be an appearing, and quotes the same passages, and expressly applies 2 Thess. 2 : 8 to Christ's "future glorious return." Pickering, Lex., defines it to mean an appearance, and applies it to "an unexpected coming and to the Advent of Christ." Donnegan, Lex., gives the more classical use, "appearance or apparition, particularly that of a Deity, or of one who comes up suddenly to offer aid or for other purposes," etc. Liddell and Scott, Lex., "the appearance, manifestation, e.g. dawn of the day—specially of the appearance of deities to aid a worshipper." Greenfield, Lex., "brightness, splendor, 2 Thess. 2 : 8, an appearance, i.e. the act of appearing, manifestation." (2) Parousia. Bretschneider directly refers the word in 2 Thess. 2 : 8 to "the Advent of Christ from heaven to administer judgment." So Wahl, to "the future Advent of Jesus the Messiah, to enter gloriously upon His Kingdom." So also of the others quoted under Epiphaneia. Pickering, "presence, arrival, to be present ;" Donnegan, "to be present, to arrive ;" Greenfield, "a coming, arrival, advent ;" Liddell & Scott, "a being present, presence of a person or thing, especially present for the purpose of assisting, arrival," etc."

* See Voice of the Church, pp. 315-317, where a number of these are given. Others are added.

F. The opinions of commentators—of the class who have no sympathy with our views, but yet are candid enough to concede this vital point, and of others who express themselves independently of any theory or bias, etc. Barnes, Com. loci, on ch. 2 : 1, says, that the phrase “by His Coming,” etc., means “respecting His Coming,” and refers it to a personal one, the same specified in 1 Thessa. 4, and argues that the alarm, etc., of the Thessa. was produced by the expectation of the speedy Advent of Christ to judgment. He then consistently explains v. 8 to embrace a personal Coming in the following words: “this (with the brightness of His Coming) is evidently a Hebraism, meaning His splendid or glorious appearing. The Greek word, however, rendered ‘brightness’ means merely an appearing, or appearance. So it is used, 1 Tim. 6 : 4 ; 2 Tim. 1 : 10, and 4 : 1, 8 ; Tit. 2 : 13, in all of which places it is rendered appearing, and refers to the manifestation of the Saviour when He shall come to judge the world. There is no necessary idea of splendor in the word, and the idea is not, as our translators would seem to convey, that there would be such a dazzling light, or such unsufferable brightness that all would be consumed before it, but that this Antichristian power would be destroyed by His appearing ; that is, by Himself when He would return. The agency in doing it would not be His brightness, but Himself. It would seem to follow from this that, however this enormous power of wickedness might be weakened by truth, the final triumph over it would be reserved for the Son of God Himself on His second return to our world.” This honest but fatal concession destroys at one stroke all the reasoning abounding in his commentaries against our doctrine.<sup>11</sup> Dr. Adam Clarke, Com., after quoting Bh. Newton, who endorses our view, says : “the principal part of modern commentators follow his steps,” and notwithstanding his cautious and in some respects contradictory exposition indorses the same. For in his pref. to 2 Thessa. he informs us that Antichrist will be destroyed “by a visible and extraordinary interposition of the power of Christ in the government of the world,” and on Rev. 17 : 17 he more plainly declares : “This deplorable state of the world is not perpetual, it can only continue till every word of God is fulfilled upon His enemies, and when this time arrives, which will be that of Christ’s Sec. Advent, then shall the Son of God slay that Wicked with the spirit of His mouth, and destroy him with the brightness of His coming.” Dr. Scott, Com., is forced to acknowledge, notwithstanding his efforts to make out a figurative coming, that it will only receive its ultimate fulfilment at the coming of Christ to judgment, for he writes : “He will shortly destroy the whole Papal authority, and all obstinately attached to it, by the brightness of His Coming, to spread the Gospel through the nations, and He will finally condemn and punish with everlasting destruction all the actors in this delusion when He shall come to judge the world.” Bloomfield, Gr. Test. Notes, speaks of it as indicative of “His very presence,” “His glorious presence,” and adds : “Indeed the expression is often both in the Scriptures and classical writers used to denote Divine Majesty.”* Matthew Henry, Com., says : “The apostle assures the Thessa. that the Lord would consume and destroy him (viz., the Antichrist) ; the consuming of him precedes his final destruction, and that is by the spirit of His mouth, by His word of command ; the pure Word of God, accompanied by the Spirit of God, will discover this mystery of iniquity, and make the power of Antichrist to consume and waste away ; and in due time it shall be totally and finally destroyed, and this will be by the brightness of Christ's coming. Note : the Coming of Christ to destroy the Wicked will be with peculiar and eminent lustre and brightness." Ferguson, Com. on Epis., "He shall utterly destroy him, that is, utterly abolish, enervate, make void, and that with the brightness of His Sec. Coming, for the word rendered 'brightness' is usually joined with His coming to judgment." Salmasius, Com., after refuting Grotius, says : "It is not true that Paul in the limits of the same discourse was so wandering as to commence to speak concerning one coming of Christ and end in speaking of another," etc. "From whence ἐπιφάνεια, when applied to Christ, in my opinion, is always used to denote the last coming of Christ." Schoettgen, Heb. Com., "ἐπιφανής, that manner of coming which bursts brilliantly upon the eyes of all, the majesty and exceeding splendor of which no one can deny." Westminster Assemb. Annotators (Bonar's Com. and Kingdom, p. 360), "On 2 Thess. 2, 'destroy with the brightness of His Coming,' that is, at the day of judgment, for then shall He come in flaming fire, taking vengeance," etc. Jenks, Comp. Com., makes the total and final destruction at the Sec. Advent. So also Lange, Bengel, Alford, Roos, Gill, Olshausen, Steir, Jones, Ebrard, etc.

* In another place he observes : “It is especially suitable, as here, to His final advent to judgment.”

G. It is important to notice the opinions of the early Apostolic Fathers, who being acquainted with the language as a living spoken one, and who receiving their interpretation of a passage which would excite special attention from the hands of the apostles or their immediate disciples, may thus afford strong corroborative evidence. Knowing that they were all decidedly Millenarian, that they all believed that Antichrist would be destroyed by the personal Sec. Advent, we have sufficient testimony concerning their mode of interpreting 2 Thess. 2 : 8. Having previously given the authorities, it is only necessary to append a few examples of this belief. Thus, e.g., Barnabas (martyred about A. D. 75) says (Apost. Fath., p. 186) : "The day of the Lord is at hand, in which all things shall be destroyed together with the Wicked one." On the Creation week he adds : "And what is that He saith 'and He rested the seventh day ;' He meaneth this : that when His Son shall come and abolish the Wicked one and judge the ungodly, and shall change the sun, and moon, and stars, then He shall gloriously rest on the seventh day," alluding to the Millennial era. Irenæus (Adv. Hær., 8 v. c. 35) takes the same view, and declares that when "Antichrist" has reigned his allotted period "then the Lord shall come from heaven, in the clouds with the glory of His Father, casting him and that obey him into a lake of fire, but bringing to the just the times of the Kingdom, that is, the Rest or Sabbath, the seventh day sanctified, and fulfilling to Abraham the promise of the inheritance." Justin Martyr (Dial. with Trypho, referring to Micah 4 : 1, etc., see Bh. Kay's Justin) pointedly unites the Second Coming of Jesus in glory with the destruction of "the man of apostasy."<sup>12</sup>

H. Even after the allegorizing interpretation, introduced by the Alexandrian school, by which such passages as these are so readily transformed into various meanings, the Divines still insisted that this Scripture taught a personal coming to destroy Antichrist. In fact, so general was this opinion, that both Millenarians and their opposers held to it. The names of Cyprian, Lactantius, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Cyril, Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerome, Hilarian, Theodoret, and a host of others, embracing various classes, etc., clearly teach this, referring to the phrase itself, adducing it as a warning, etc. Thus to illustrate : Augustine, on 2 Thess. 2 : 8, wrote : " No one doubts that the apostle said these things of Antichrist, and that the day of judgment, which he here calls 'the day of the Lord,' will not come, unless he whom he calls an apostate, that is to say from the Lord God, shall first come." (City of God, B. 20, c. 19, B. 18, c. 53.) " Truly Jesus Himself shall extinguish by His presence that last persecution which is to be made by Antichrist," quoting as confirmatory Isa. 9 : 4 ; 1 Thess. 1 : 9. How the passage was regarded is proven, not only by the writings and commentaries handed down to us, but by the prevailing looking for of the Antichrist as stated by history ; and this continued until some suggested, in order to avoid making professedly Christian Rome the seat of the Antichrist (as alleged by many, although some confined it to Jerusalem), that Pagan Rome was said Antichrist and the coming a spiritual one, etc. But few even of those dared, in the face of the general testimony to the contrary, to tamper with 2 Thess. 2 : 8, and admitted that it also referred to the future day of judgment and a literal coming of Christ. So that of the great number who adopted anti-millenarian views, nearly all, so far as we have any record, indorsed our meaning of the phrase, " the brightness of His Coming." It was only when the modern Whitbyan theory came in vogue that men were found bold enough to interpret the verse in such a manner as to make it consistent with that theory, and then insist upon such an interpretation as the true one. But even many of the advocates of the Whitbyan theory (as we have shown under this and previous propositions), unable to oppose the express words with any degree of candor, have honestly confessed its legitimate meaning without any effort to reconcile it with their system of belief. Those also who have been Anti-Millenarian, opposed to a Millennium in the future (either locating it in the past, or denying that any shall be witnessed on earth), freely (saving perhaps<sup>14</sup> Grotius, Bossuet, Hammond, and a few others) admit the force of the passage, and locate it in the future. Dr. Greawell (Exp. of Parables), a Patristic student, says : " That Antichrist must come and must be destroyed by the Advent of Christ ; in this perfectly agree all, whether friends or foes of the doctrine of the Millennium. The only distinction was that the advocates of the Millennium expected their Kingdom to begin and proceed after the destruction of Antichrist ; the opponents of the doctrine expected the same of the Kingdom of heaven."

I. The Popish writers, however they may apply it, ascribe it to a personal Advent. The larger and more learned portion (See Calmet and Encyclops. art. " Antichrist," and Prop. 161) refer it to a personal coming of Jesus at the destruction of a future Antichrist. Another party, in retaliation for the application of the terms " man of sin," etc., to the Pope, apply the same phrase to Luther or the Reformation, but nearly all of these also apply it as an ultimate fulfilment to the day of judgment, when the Christ shall come to destroy the wicked.<sup>14</sup>

J. The opinions of the Reformers, although making the apostasy and the man of sin to be one and the same, are distinctly in our favor. Thus to give a few illustrations : Luther, as is well known, making the Pope or the Papacy Antichrist, frequently expresses his belief that the Papacy was not to be destroyed by human agency or by the power of the truth, but by the personal Advent of the Christ. Thus e.g. "Our Lord Jesus Christ yet liveth and reigneth, who, I firmly trust, will shortly come and slay with the spirit of His mouth, and destroy with the brightness of His Coming, that man of sin" (D'Aubigne's His. Ref., vol. 2, p. 166). "The apostle expresses this Pope's destruction thus: 'When the Lord shall consume,' etc. The laity, therefore, shall not destroy the Pope and his Kingdom. No, he and his wicked rabble are not deserving of so light a punishment. They shall be preserved until the coming of Christ, whose most bitter enemies they are and ever have been (Pope Confounded, p. 177)." In opposing the Anabaptists, one leading argument against them consisted in his constantly declaring that Christ's personal coming would overthrow His enemies, etc., appealing to Paul and Daniel as foretelling their destruction, not by the hand of man, but by the Advent of Christ. (Sleidan's Com. L. 5.) Melancthon held similar views. The sentiments of the other Reformers are given in Elliott's Horæ. Apoc., Voice of the Church, including Zwingle, Latimer, Calvin, Knox, Cranmer, etc., and require more space than is really necessary to show a continuous line of interpretation. They are, however, as pointed as the following: Beza, Notes on N. T., "Thus I have deemed it best to translate the name ἐπιφάνα, which Paul designedly used in order to represent to our eyes that most brilliant splendor of His last Coming." "At length by the word of the Lord that impiety will be exposed, and by the Advent of Christ wholly abolished." Bh. Jewell, Com. loci, says: "The Lord shall come and shall make His enemies His footstool; then shall the sun be black as sackcloth and the moon shall be like blood. Then shall Antichrist be quite overthrown," etc. "He will overthrow the whole power of Antichrist by His presence and by the glory of His Coming." "

K. The opinions of eminent Divines who indorsed the Whitbyan theory. Having already given a number, an illustration will suffice to indicate the spirit: Dr. Knapp, Ch. Theol., s. 155, 5, p. 543, says: "The Christian Church will hereafter be subjected to great temptation from heathen profaneeness, from false delusive doctrine, and extreme moral corruption, and will seem for a time to be ready to perish from these causes; but then Christ will appear, and, according to His promise, triumph over this opposition; and then, and not till then, will the end of the world come; Christ will visibly appear and hold the general judgment and conduct the pious into the Kingdom of the blessed. This is the distinct doctrine of Paul, 2 Thess. 2: 3-12, and is taught throughout the Apocalypse." The reader will notice the admission made in the last sentence; and we may well ask if 2 Thess. 2 synchronizes with Rev. 19, etc., how can it be fitted without violence into Knapp's system? Leaving quotations, which might be given from a host of able writers, either directly Millenarian or at least rejecting the idea of a conversion of the world previous to the Advent, who favor our interpretation, we turn, in conclusion, to the concessions made by two prominent opposers, viz., by Whitby himself, author of the prevailing Millennium theory, and by Dr. Brown, author of a work specially devoted to its defence. Whitby allows (Com.) that a literal coming is the most consistent interpretation of the coming in 2 Thess. 2: 1, but makes the coming (in violation of connection thus admitted) in verse 8 a providential coming to destroy Jerusalem, and then says, in view of the use of the word in the First Epistle: "It may be thought more reasonable to refer this passage to the same (i.e. the second personal) advent." Why give utterance to such a thought if it did not commend itself as "more reasonable"? Surely it is far "more reasonable" than the interpretation which he has foisted on the passage to aid him in his "new hypothesis"—an interpretation which even the mass of his followers reject as utterly untenable, being only held by a few Universalists and some others classed among the destructive critics. Dr. Brown (Ch. Sec. Com.) writes: "There can be no doubt that the whole passage admits of a consistent and good explanation on the view of it above given—i.e. the Pre-Millenarian view. Nor is this view (i.e. of a literal personal coming to destroy Antichrist) confined to Pre-Millennialists. Those of our elder divines who looked upon the Millennium as past already, and considered the destruction of Antichrist as the immediate precursor of the eternal state, understood this 'coming of the Lord' to destroy Antichrist, of His Sec. personal coming. There are other opponents of the Millennial theory, who explain this coming to destroy the man of sin, of Christ's Sec. Coming. They make 'the apostasy,' 'the man of sin,' 'the lawless one,' here spoken of, to embrace all the evil, apostasy, and opposition to Christ, which are to exist till the consummation of all things; in which case the destruction of it will, of course, not be till the Sec. Advent. In neither of these views, however, can I concur." Here we have the frank, manly admission that our interpretation is "a consistent and good explanation," and that many others, beside Millenarians, concur in making this coming a personal one. Dr. Brown, however, in viewing the ground upon which the Whitbyan theory rests, was too wise and prudent to admit our interpretation, well knowing that it would be fatal to his own theory (Whitbyan); for had he admitted that this coming, taught by Paul, was a personal one, then the necessary and inevitable conclusion would follow that no such a Millennium of holiness, happiness, security and blessedness as predicted, could possibly arise before it, seeing that that would make the apostasy and subsequent man of sin contemporaneous with it. Hence, while he rejects Whitby's theory of "the Coming" as inconsistent, he frames one to suit the case, viz., that Christ comes providentially to inflict judgments on the apostate Roman Empire, etc. But this theory of "the Coming" is also so unreasonable, even to many who adopt the Whitbyan Millennium, that they refuse to accept of it, and continue to hold (as Barnes, etc.) to the old view of a personal Advent."

We hold, therefore, that 2 Thess. 2 : 8 teaches a personal coming of Christ to destroy the Antichrist (whatever the latter may be), and in support of such an interpretation confidently appeal to the kind of Advent the Thess. were anticipating; the design the apostle had in view in writing the passage; the plain import of the words rendered "brightness" and "coming;" the N. T. usage of these words; the union of two such words; the testimony of lexicographers, critics, commentators, divines, reformers, friends and foes, the early Fathers, the concessions of opponents, etc. If we have established our position authoritatively, then, as intimated, such an Advent is necessarily Pre-Millennial. For, it is utterly impossible to reconcile the existence of Antichrist with the state delineated in the Millennium—a state in which all shall be subject to Christ, all shall be righteous, and all shall enjoy a condition of security and happiness. On the other hand, we have his complete destruction and consignment to the lake described in Rev. 19 (with which the Prophets coincide) as immediately preceding the Millennium, and what the Spirit has so plainly described and located we dare not deny and transfer. The same Spirit in both places, in accord with the tenor of prophecy, promises no intervening or contemporaneous Millennium, but predicts a developing and overshadowing power of an apostasy which must be destroyed by the personal Advent of the Son of Man, and then, only then, shall the promises of Millennial glory be fulfilled.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The student will not overlook the force of "The Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and by our gathering together unto Him," which, as commentators generally show, directly refers us to the Coming and gathering spoken of in 1 Thess. 4 : 15, etc. Hence those who admit that the latter refers to a personal Coming and literal gathering, are forced by simple consistency to allow the same to this introductory. The reader also will notice that we are strongly inclined to receive the expression "is present" instead of "is at hand," as more expressive of the original, of the usage of the word translated, of the tenor of the context, etc. Alford's Gr. Test. loci, Lange's Com. Amer. Ed. loci, Olshausen's Com., Bengel's Gnomon, etc., indicate this feature, so that e.g. Alford remarks, after showing how the word is employed in other places: "The teaching of the Apostles was, and of the Holy Spirit in all ages has been, that the day of the Lord is at hand. But these Thessalonians imagined it to be already come, and accordingly were deserting their pursuits in life and falling into other irregularities, as if the day of grace were closed." A multitude of able writers indorse this view, and it is found in various versions. We only as illustrative append Fausset's (Com. loci) comment: "is immediately imminent; literally, is present; is instantly coming. Christ and His apostles always taught that the day of the Lord's Coming is at hand; and it is not likely that Paul would imply anything contrary here; what he denies is that it is immediately imminent, instant, or present, as to justify the neglect of every-day worldly duties. Chrysostom, and after him Alford, translates, 'Is (already) present'—Cf. 2 Tim. 2 : 18, is a kindred error. But in 2 Tim. 3 : 1 the same Greek word is translated 'come.' Wahl supports this view. The Greek is usually used of actual presence; but is quite susceptible of the translation 'is all but present.'" Comp. Dr. Lillie's able comment in Amer. Ed. of Lange's Com., who insists that usage requires "has come, is present." So Ellicott renders it, "is now come." We only add: If we take the phrase "is at hand" in our version, then it really would be contradictory to other Scripture. For then the Coming of the Lord Jesus, which is always represented as a period of rejoicing, the blessed hope, and as at hand so that all are exhorted to look for it (and for which the Thessalonians are to wait and long for as an object of desire), is held up as not nigh at hand (with which compare e.g. Rom. 13 : 12; Phil. 4 : 5; Heb. 10 : 25; James 5 : 8; 1 Pet. 4 : 7, etc.), and an object of fear and dread. Now according to the best critics the Greek does not involve such a contradiction. Hence the most recent commentators adopt the idea of being present or is come, which is given by various versions, as the Syriac and Italian, which have "the day of the Lord is come."

<sup>2</sup> Brown Ch. Sec. Com., p. 456, ed. of 1879) fully admits: "I am constrained, by all the laws of exact interpretation, to apply the destruction here predicted to that specific enemy so minutely described, and 'the Coming of the Lord' here announced—whether personal or figurative—to a Pre-millennial Coming." But then he asserts that a figurative Coming is intended, a Coming through other agencies, viz., by that employed in, and by, the Church. The reader will place this figurative Coming in contrast with Paul's previous references to the Sec. Advent. If Brown is correct, it certainly was an exceedingly strange method that Paul adopted to soothe the Thessalonian brethren, by informing them in figurative language (which Brown supposes their acquaintance with the Old Test. allowed them fully to grasp) that an apostasy, etc., should intervene, and that certain acts of Providence in and through the Church should destroy it. He overlooks a vital point in this discussion, viz., what kind of a Coming, the Scriptures and the primitive Church allied with "the day of Christ." He forgets, too, that the primitive believers, the nearest to the apostles, had no idea that this language was to be taken figuratively.

<sup>3</sup> That the reader may see for himself how our opponents contradict themselves, and the general analogy, a few illustrations are in place. Scott (Com. loci) makes the Papacy to be the Antichrist here delineated, and then comments: "He (Jesus) will shortly destroy the whole Papal authority, and all obstinately attached to it 'by the brightness of His Coming to spread the Gospel through the nations.'" Now if we only turn to Rev. 17, we find that the Papacy (represented, according to Protestant interpretation and application, by "the whore") is not overcome by the Gospel, but by the beast and ten horns—is thus destroyed not by religious but by civil powers, the enemies likewise of the Christ. A bitter opponent, Ross (quoted by Dr. Craven in Evangelist, of Feb. 6th, 1879), says : " Antichrist shall not be destroyed till Christ's Sec. Coming to judgment (2 Thess. 2 : 8), that Christ shall destroy him with the brightness of His Coming. But Millenaries will have him destroyed before the beginning of these thousand years, which is flat against Scripture." Observe that over against Scott he acknowledges that the language demands a literal, personal Coming, but then, over against us, locates the Coming after the thousand years. By the latter process he has (over against a multitude of predictions and the plain chronological order of the Apoc. which places the Millennium after the destruction of Antichrist) the Antichrist existing continuously through that blessed age. Waldegrave (Lec. 7, New Test. Mill.) takes precisely the same position, and concedes the personality of the Coming. Macnight (Com. loci), while in his Pref. (Sec. 4) he gives a one-sided representation of the passages referring to the Sec. Coming and easily disproven by a comparison of Scripture and the Primitive Church belief (and which we answer under other headings), yet is forced by the strength of the language to compromise his steady leaning to spiritual and figurative comings by saying that the passage calls for " a visible and extraordinary interposition of Christ."

<sup>4</sup> In addition to illustrations previously given, Bh. Newton (On Propth., Diss. 22) says that this passage, 2 Thess. 2 : 8, "is partly taken from Isa. 11 : 4, 'and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked one'; where the Jews put an emphasis upon the words 'the wicked one,' as appears from the Chaldee, which renders it, 'He shall destroy the wicked Roman.'" Barnes Com., Isa. 11 : 4, quoting from Castell says : "The Chaldee Paraphrast translates it, 'And by the Word of His lips He shall slay the wicked Armillus.' By Armillus the Jews mean the last great enemy of their nation who should come after (or with) Gog and Magog and wage furious wars, and who should slay the Messiah Ben Ephraim, whom the Jews expect, but who would himself be slain by the rod of the Messiah Ben David or the Son of David." Here we see a mixture of Rabinnical conjecture with some truth. The ancient Jews, the Jews at the First Advent, and modern Jews of the orthodox (not rationalistic or progressive who are much divided) party, all unite in believing in the destruction of an Anti-Messiah or great enemy by the personal Coming of the Messiah. They say, and truthfully, that the texts they rely upon do not admit of any other interpretation. It is a sad reflection, that while they still, under such long-endured tribulation, hold fast to the literal Word of God respecting the Sec. Advent as presented in the Old Test., they so persistently close their eyes to the plain literal predictions referring to the First Advent of Christ; and that for the sake of consistency in interpretation, some of them introduce two future Messiahs as above. Alas! for such blindness.

<sup>5</sup> Hence some writers, destructive in tendency, reject this entire prophecy as merely an expression of Paul's private opinion, on the ground that it is of "Jewish origin," and that it favors too much "Jewish expectations." Such a procedure, of course, denies the Jewish basis in the Old Test., upon which the whole is founded. The prophets fare no better than Paul.

<sup>6</sup> Dr. Bonar (C. and Kingdom, p. 343) justly remarks : "Not one of these others is so explicit, yet no one thinks of explaining them away. Why, then, fasten on the strongest and insist on spiritualizing it? If the strongest can be explained away so as not to denote the Sec. Coming, much more may the others, and then we shall have no passages to prove the Advent at all! If the Anti-Millenarian be at liberty to spiritualize the most distinct, why may not the Straussian be allowed to rationalize and mythologize the less distinct?" Also see Taylor's Voice of the Church, p. 314, Brook's El. Propth. Inter., p. 129, etc.

<sup>7</sup> Able writers assert that in every instance, excepting perhaps one passage, it means a literal Coming. Even this supposed exception is also claimed; it is found in 2 Pet. 3 : 12 : "Looking for and hasting unto the Coming of the day of the Lord." But of this it may be said : (1) that it denotes, in view of the invariable usage of the word, the actual presence of the day or time spoken of; (2) that (so Brooks, El. Propth. Inter.) "it is evidently susceptible, agreeable to the rules of Greek Syntax of another reading, by understanding της ημερας to be in the genitive, as denoting time, by a preposition understood (see Parkhurst), and not as governed by παρουσιαν. It will then be : "Looking for and hasting to the presence (of Christ) in the day," etc. Dr. Duffield, On Propth., p. 323, says : "In every instance where it occurs, which is twenty-four times, it is used literally and not metaphorically or analogically." A multitude of quotations from writers of ability in various denominations, of like tenor, could be quoted, but these specimens are sufficient.

<sup>8</sup> Olshausen, Com., explains "the apparent tautology by referring epiphaneia to the subjective, parousia to the objective aspect, i.e. the latter expression to the actuality of Christ's appearing, the former one to the contemplation of it on the part of man, the consciousness of his presence," impressed by His splendor, etc. So Lange, Com., that it expresses "the visibleness—appearing—of His Coming." Compare Aiford and Ellicott.

<sup>9</sup> The student can readily add to these the same definitions given by many others. Cramer, in Bib. Theol. Lexicon, says: "In the New Test. of the appearing or manifestation of Jesus Christ on earth, 2 Tim. 1 : 10. In other New Test. texts of Christ's Sec. Advent, 2 Thess. 2 : 8 ; 1 Tim. 6 : 14 ; 2 Tim. 4 : 18 ; Tit. 2 : 13." Comp. Parkhurst, Taylor, Robison, etc.

<sup>10</sup> Taylor, to whose investigations in this direction we are indebted, Voice of the Church, p. 317, adds: "We might farther quote Scapula, Schlenauer, and in fact every Greek lexicographer under heaven in support of this signification." We have ourselves noticed many such definitions scattered in ancient and modern Mill. writers, commentaries, etc., and never yet found the slightest variation so far as the New Test. meaning is concerned.

<sup>11</sup> For it makes this personal Coming necessarily a Pre-Mill. one, seeing that (as he admits also in other places) Antichrist is destroyed before that age (in which Satan is bound, etc.) is ushered in. It is amazing that he did not see the fallacy and contradiction in his reasoning ; others, more shrewd and less candid, perceiving the inevitable conclusion that must follow if such a concession is made, seek out some other interpretation to avoid it. Others make the same concession, but fail to inform us how so fatal an admission is to be reconciled with their Whitbyan theory.

<sup>12</sup> The belief of a personal Advent of the Messiah to destroy a wicked confederation and inaugurate his Kingdom, was universally prevalent in the first centuries (see also how incorporated in Sibylline Books, quoted by Stuart Apoc. vol. 2, p. 438, etc.). Now the usage of language pre-eminently adapted to confirm an existing opinion, can only be explained by believing that the view is a correct, scriptural one.

<sup>13</sup> We say "perhaps," because not having their works at hand to consult, they may, as others have done adopting similar views, likewise locate the passage in the future, and admit the force of its language. For looking at the Voice of the Church, Taylor quotes Dr. Hammond as follows: "Dr. Hammond died 1660. An Anti-Millenarian. Though he wrests the text from its proper application, yet he renders 2 Thess. 2 : 8 'By the breath of His own mouth, and by the appearing of His own presence.'" The views of Hammond, Grotius, Wetstein, etc., in reference to the man of sin are shown to be erroneous, e.g. by Bh. Newton, Diss. on Prophecies, vol. 2, pp. 393-402, Olshausen, Com. Thess., and others, so that very few, if any, at the present day indorse them. The application of the passage to the Romans, or to Nero, or to the Jews, or to the early heretical tendencies of the church, in order to force out of it a providential or spiritual Coming, is so far-fetched that it needs no refutation.

<sup>14</sup> The student need only be reminded that some of the Popish writers also referred this passage to Rome and to a personal Coming of Christ (Prop. 161). It was extremely difficult to get rid of the decisive statements of the fathers, as e.g. Cyril, who said: "He (Antichrist) will be annihilated by the Second glorious Coming from heaven of the truly begotten Son of God, who is our Lord and Saviour, Jesus the true Messiah ; who, having destroyed Antichrist by the spirit of His mouth, will deliver him to the fire Gehenna." (Comp. The Annals of Roger De Hoveden, vol. 2, pp. 177-187. Von Döllinger's Fables, etc.) To indicate how opposers of the Pope applied it, we give a specimen. The Council of Gap, 1603, in Art. 31, expressly affirms that the Bishop of Rome is "the Antichrist—the Son of Perdition—predicted by the holy Scriptures," and applies the passage as follows: "And we hope and wait, that the Lord, according to His promise, and as He hath already begun, will confound him by the spirit of His mouth and destroy him by the brightness of His Coming."

<sup>15</sup> In reference to the once general opinion that 2 Thess. 2 : 8 denoted a literal Advent, Dr. Craven in his reply to Prof. Briggs (N. Y. Evangelist, Feb. 13th, 1879) corroborates by decided proof his statement that the men of the Westminster Assembly held "that the Antichrist and the beast of Rev. 19 are identical ; that the Parousia of 2 Thess. 2 and that of Rev. 19 : 11-21 are the same ; and that this one Parousia is for the last judgment." (Hence, no Mill. age for the Church on earth after the destruction of Antichrist, as Pre-Millenarians belonging to that body held.) He proves this conclusively, e.g. by quoting Baillie (Dissuasive, ch. 11) who wrote against Pre-Millenarians thus: "The Millenaries lay it for a ground that Antichrist shall be destroyed and fully abolished before their thousand years begin ; but Scripture makes Antichrist to continue to the Day of Judgment, 2 Thess. 2 : 8. The brightness of Christ's Coming is not before the last day as before is proved. See also Rev. 19 : 20, 'The Beast was taken and with him the false Prophet; these both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone.' Compare it with v. 7: 'Let us be glad and rejoice, for the marriage of the Lamb is come.' Antichrist is cast alive into the lake at the marriage of the Lamb." Such concessions abound.

<sup>16</sup> This extract contains in itself a complete refutation of his section on the Millennium. The antidote to his phrase "general judgment," by which he means "the last," is also found in this sec., thus: "Hence the eocl. name of this transaction, judicium extremum or novissimum, the last judgment because it will take place at the end of the world that now is. The term, the last judgment, is not used however in the New Test." etc. We add: neither is the phrase "general judgment," which is solely of human origin.

<sup>17</sup> It is unnecessary to attempt a refutation of Whitby's and Brown's providential Coming, as this is already done under the proposition. The student will see, from the strong reasons alleged against it drawn from the subject matter discussed by Paul, that this is an interpretation sought out to prop up a preconceived theory. No one but a follower of Whitby's "hypothesis," or a destructive critic, can deduce such a Coming from the passage. The fact is, if this Scripture does not refer to a personal Coming, then we have none in the Bible descriptive of the same, for there is none stronger than this one against a mere spiritual or providential Coming. Such perversions of interpretation, as those alluded to, are gladly seized by many who deny that we are to expect a future personal Advent, affirming that all such references are to be understood as spiritual or providential. The system is already bearing its logical fruit—not, however, as these writers intended, but through a consistent application of their mode of interpretation.

<sup>18</sup> Hereafter the order of this passage will be introduced and enforced by a comparison of Scripture. Now it may be said that this Antichrist destroyed by the personal Advent of Jesus is not, as many have held, the Papacy. The proof is distinctive and clear (however, as many Antichrists exist, the term may be applied to the Papacy), (1) the Papacy is e.g. delineated in Rev. 17 under the figure of "the great whore" supported by the kings of the earth, but in the same chapter this power is destroyed by other powers before this Parousia. (2) The powers that destroy this woman exist afterward at the Sec. Advent, and are arrayed against Christ. (3) While the apostasy of 2 Thess. 2 is applicable to the Papacy, yet the delineation of the culminated "Wicked" cannot be applied to the Papacy without violence. Thus e.g. the Antichrist denies that Jesus came in the flesh; the Papacy does not do this, etc. Taking all the Scriptures and comparing them together, we are forced by simple consistency to this conclusion, which will be explained in detail.

Obs. 3. Dr. Warren, in The Parousia, while endeavoring to invalidate our views (by making Parousia equivalent to age or dispensation), fully admits the literalness of the language expressing the same, as e.g. rendering 2 Thess. 2 : 1; James 5 : 7, 8; John 2 : 28, etc., by "the presence." He, indeed, from this very literalness, claims, wrongfully, that the term "Second Coming" is unscriptural. The concessions made by him, as we have already shown, are amply sufficient to overthrow his position. It is too late in the day (but exceedingly suggestive of the predicted denial of this truth by the Church) for a Divine to make the Parousia an entire dispensation—the Christian. And as to the scriptural basis of the term "Second Coming," this is seen (1) in Heb. 9 : 28; (2) in Jesus' own references to a future personal coming in His address to Jerusalem, Parable of the Nobleman, etc.; (3) in the constant teaching that this Parousia is something future; (4) in linking with it certain great events which are at the end of this dispensation; (5) in the reference of the angels, Acts 1 : 11; (6) in the uniform teaching of the Primitive Church, etc.

Let the student consider our argument on this point, and he will find it impregnable. So much is this the case that our most unrelenting opponents concede the force of it. Thus e.g. a man, Dr. Neander, who probably has done as much as any one to prejudice the Church against our doctrine and to lead it astray, concedes, with all his leaning to a mystical conception, the full force of the passage. Thus (Pl. and Tr. Ch. Church, vol. 1, p. 205) in speaking of its fulfilment he says: "Then would Christ appear, in order by His victorious divine power to destroy the Kingdom of evil, after it had attained its widest extension and to consummate the Kingdom of evil." The personal appearing of Jesus, he unites with the consummation, as e.g. vol. 1, p. 529, etc. (The critical student will notice how Neander's admission here that the Kingdom of evil has a wide extension previous to the consummation is utterly hostile and unreconcilable with his development theory based on the Parable of the Leaven, as against the removal of evil by Jesus' Advent.) Such are the statements found in numerous eminent writers. We may conclude by quoting Dr. Brookes (Maranatha, ch. 4) : "If there is a Greek word whose precise sense is established by competent authority beyond room for question, it is the word parousia, which is defined in the lexicons to mean 'presence, a coming, arrival, advent,' and nothing else. When, therefore, we read of the future parousia of our Lord, it is shameful trifling with the Word of God, for those who profess to be its expounders to tell us that it means nothing in particular, or something as unlike the presence, the Coming, the arrival, the Advent of Christ, as night is unlike day." "Twelve times reference is made to the Coming of Christ, and in eleven of these instances, all agree that the Coming is literal and personal. It is certainly a dangerous principle of interpretation which leads so many to say that, in the twelfth instance, the Coming is not to be taken in this sense; and especially when it has been proved that the word 'brightness,' as elsewhere used in the New Test., invariably means appearing, and the word 'coming,' as elsewhere used in the New Test., invariably refers to a personal presence." (Comp. Nast, Com. Matt. 24 : 3.)

Obs. 4. It is scarcely necessary to add anything additional to Dan. 7 : 13 to indicate a personal Advent. All the early Fathers, as well as those who followed them, even such a writer as Jerome (Bickersteth's Guide, p. 112, quotes from, and also shows how Jerome made the little horn of Daniel 7 synchronize with the man of sin 2 Thess. 2) made it refer to the personal Sec. Advent. The earliest apologies, as e.g. Justin's First Apol., ch. 51, apply this to the future, and not to his First Advent. There is, at least, consistency in such an interpretation, because the tenor of the prophecy describes a coming very different from the First, which, the latter, was in humiliation and unto death, while the former is a triumphant Advent resulting in the overthrow of all enemies. It is very different in that respect from the amazing and rash exposition, given by many writers, which affirms that the coming of the Son of Man is a going or ascension to heaven, into which even so excellent a writer as Flavel falls, who (Foun. of Life, p. 500) makes Dan. 7 : 13, 14, "accomplished in Christ's ascension." Even Waggoner (Ref. of Age to Come, p. 133) cannot see an Advent here unless it is assumed that the Ancient of Days is on the earth. The entire scene is one here on the earth and not in heaven; the acts that are performed, as the destruction of the beast, etc., are not in heaven but on the earth. What a definition such theories involve of the words "coming" and "came." What a shrinking from having God or His Son present here on earth, as if it embraced a desecration of person. Such views introduce an antagonism into the vision irreconcilable both with its simplicity and with its synchronism with Rev. 19; 2 Thess. 2 : 8; Rev. 14 : 14-20, etc. Over against all such theorizing is set the application of this passage of Daniel by Jesus Himself, when before the High Priest, to His future personal Advent—a fact which a host of our opponents, overlooking its connection with Daniel, frankly admit in their expositions of Matt. 26 : 64. (Thus, e.g. Barnes, Com. loci, makes it refer to the future personal Advent.) The reader is requested to notice how the personal Advent is sustained and proven by the judgment day which, as Mede has shown (Works, p. 762), the Jews derived from Daniel 7. (See Prop. 123, on the Judgment Day.) Those theories which lead to extravagance in belief are utterly opposed by the sober exegesis of the Church Fathers, and a multitude of able divines. We can safely adopt the interpretation given by the pious Jews to Daniel 7 : 13, sustained as it is by Christ Himself.*

<sup>1</sup> Waggoner's objection is derived from the parable in Luke 19. But this is far-fetched, for receiving a Kingdom does not imply by any means its immediate setting up but in His being the recognized, empowered King, etc., since even saints, true believers, are represented as receiving a Kingdom, and the surety of it is such, the title to it so valid that they are represented as having attained to what they shall in the future only inherit and possess. Besides, while parables may assist to illustrate a doctrine already given, a doctrine is itself derived from another class of Scripture (so many of our Intros. to the Bible, as Horne's, etc.). That the Ancient of Days "comes" and is also on the earth will appear under Prop. 166.

<sup>2</sup> The Jews understood this "coming in clouds" to refer to a personal Coming, and hence, as various writers have noticed, named as we have noticed, the Messiah, anticipatory, "the Son of Clouds." Jesus, appropriating such language to Himself, confirms the belief in a personal Coming. Renan (Life of Jesus, p. 61) gives the Jewish view thus: "He was a Son of Man, coming with the clouds of Heaven, a supernatural being, clothed in human appearance, commissioned to judge the world, and to preside over the golden age." Gradually, as stated, this idea was spiritualized and applied to the present. Ten thousand perversions are noticeable to the student. Thus e.g. when the Crusaders under Peter the Hermit and Walter the Penniless (Milman's His. Jews, vol. 3, p. 250) cruelly attacked and massacred the Jews of the city of Treves, those who fled for refuge to the citadel were received by the Bishop with reproaches for their disregard of Daniel's prophecy of the Lord's Coming. Such an interpretation is adopted by many at this day, only more grossly perverted. We are satisfied with the early Church application, which is reproduced by Sir I. Newton, in a letter to Locke (Brewster's Life of Newton, p. 246), saying: "The Son of Man, Dan. 7, I take to be the same with the Word of God upon the white horse in heaven, Apoc. 19, for both are to rule the nations with a rod of iron," etc. Rev. 19, and other Scriptures, will—to avoid repeating—be given under other Propositions.

Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., p. 358, note) makes the Coming of the Son of Man a going, saying: "If it means any local approach at all, it is His ascent rather than His descent—His solemn entry into heaven to receive the reward of His work;" but prefers to regard it "as a scenic representation of His investiture of the rights of universal dominion." He approvingly quotes Maclaurin and Scott, making this an "ascending to heaven, the throne of God, to receive the Kingdom covenanted to him," "from His former residence, the earth," viz., at His First Advent. So Cowles (Com. on Dan.) makes it refer to the ascension. Such theories will not stand the test of criticism, the logical order laid down in the predictions, and the general analogy of the Word, being based, as to origination, upon a misconception of the nature, etc., of the covenanted Messianic Kingdom. So Swarmstedt's (The End of the World Near, p. 168) arbitrary and eccentric separation of verses 13 and 14 from the context, and interposing a Millennial period previous to their fulfilment, cannot be received; and its inconsistency is shown by his subsequent admissions e.g. that verses 18, 22, and 27 are to be verified in the Mill. era.

PROPOSITION 124. This Kingdom is delayed several thousand years, to raise up a nation or people capable of sustaining it.

It has been shown how the Kingdom failed in its Theocratic and Theocratic-Davidic establishment through the depravity of man, and how its re-establishment at the First Advent was rendered hopeless by the wickedness of the nation. Then a new feature in the plan of God appears, viz. : to postpone the Kingdom during a period called "the times of the Gentiles ;" and during this season of delay gather out a chosen people to be associated in the re-establishment of the Kingdom on a firm and everlasting basis, beyond the reach, owing to the tested character, etc., of the rulers, of depravity (comp. Props. 59-65, 86, 87, 88, etc.).

Obs. 1. Just as there was a preparatory growth and development of Abraham's seed before the Theocratic government was instituted, so now there is designed and carried out by the Divine Will a preparatory gathering of Abraham's seed until a sufficient, predetermined number is obtained. These are called the Elect. Made like unto Christ, when they appear with Him, they are "joint heirs" with Him. The results following from such a body incorporated in the Theocratic government can well be imagined to be such as the most glowing prophetic delineations portray. This inheriting of the saints both of the Kingdom and of the land when Christ comes to His inheritance will be presented (Props. 142, 154, etc.), after passing over some preliminaries, the object now being to indicate that to secure such an inheriting a resurrection, pre-millennial, must be experienced.

Obs. 2. This view of the Kingdom sustains the doctrine of an intermediate state, in which, whatever the condition of the saints, they are waiting for the period of redemption, waiting for the crown and promised inheritance. (See Delitzsch, Sys. of Bib. Psyc., pp. 496, 498, 527-8.) This idea of the intermediate state is, however, not peculiar to our system, but belongs to various others. (Comp. Prop. 136.)

Obs. 3. The Kingdom itself is predetermined (Prop. 1) from the foundation of the world, so also (for all things fall under the Omniscient Will) is this preparatory gathering of saints. In Eph. 1 : " He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world," just as Christ Himself "was foreordained before the foundation of the world" (1 Pet. 1 : 20). In noticing the passages bearing on this point, we find (1) that God predetermined the reign of Christ ; (2) and that with Him a certain number should be united in this reign ; (3) and this predetermination only includes those who believe and are obedient ; (4) and this predetermination is openly manifested "in the dispensation of the fulness of times," when all things are gathered in one in Christ (Eph. 1: 10); (5) and includes the obtaining of the inheritance, because "being predestinated according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of His own Will" (Eph. 1: 11). It cannot, therefore, fail; and the constant gathering going on through the Gospel reminds us of the continued existence of the Divine Purpose and its ultimate certain result.

Obs. 4. Until a certain number are gathered out to form the basis of rulership, guidance, etc., in this Kingdom, it is vain, owing to natural proneness to evil and to this Divine Plan for its correction, to expect its establishment under existing circumstances, or in this dispensation.

Figuer tells us (The To-Morrow of Death, p. 94) that if man could be sustained without eating, then "the age of gold, dreamed of by poets, would be the certain consequence of this organic change." Scripture takes different and higher ground, and assures us that this is a mistaken notion that such a transformation alone can cause "hateful passions, wars, rivalries, jealousies to vanish from the face of the earth." It looks to the heart and not to the desire for sustenance, and bestows glorification only upon those whose hearts have become purified, etc., and to whom it can be safely intrusted. Without unchanged hearts, without supreme love to God, evil would only increase, as is seen, e.g. from the fact that men in power, wealth, etc., to whom the sustenance of life was the easiest, have been among the most cruel and vindictive of men, as e.g. Roman Emperors, Popes, etc. God now selects those who shall have a controlling influence and directory in the Kingdom out of the nations, but the selection is confined to those who believe and obey.

Obs. 5. We may well imagine the astonishment and joy of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, when this natural and engrafted seed is all gathered and occupy their allotted places in the Kingdom. The Prophets seem to make allusions to this, as e.g. Isa. 29: 22, 23 (Alexander's version); Isa. 49: 18; 60: 4, etc.

Obs. 6. Christ tells us that the Passover shall "be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God," Luke 22: 16. They who partake of the Paschal Lamb, slain for us, shall experience the deliverance afforded by this entrance into this Theocratic state. The Prophets have much to say concerning the deliverance of God's people and their exaltation at the time of the end. What was imperfectly realized in the removal from Egypt under Moses will be perfectly experienced under Jesus Christ, when He comes "the second time unto salvation," viz., complete, realized redemption. Then, too, the order of arrangements, etc., will be committed to a people who are better qualified by previous training and present advantages to receive and perpetuate them. The costly sacrifice required for them, the observance of God's dealings, the personal experience, etc., all, in connection with the wonderful bestowments of glorification and the presence of the Saviour, will combine to produce the very qualifications so indispensable to a pure, perpetual Theocratic government. It is in view of this future deliverance of God's people from a worse than Egyptian bondage, the bondage and darkness of the grave, the last terrible persecution of the Church, that Jesus Himself is represented as saying: "I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God," and "I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the Kingdom of God shall come," Luke 22: 16, 18. Here in these expressions is a wonderful commingling of certainty in the deliverance, its connection with the Kingdom, its delay for a season, its combination with Christ, and even the departure of David's Son and a certain waiting for the Kingdom. This gathering of all of those who eat Christ our Passover, must first be experienced, even down to the last one (Props. 65 and 86), before the Kingdom of God shall come, and David's Son will drink of the fruit of the vine.

Comp. Rev. 15 : 3, and observe the triumphant Passover song, that will be sung in that day. The interpretations that would spiritualize this eating and drinking are based on the notion of a purely spiritual Kingdom. The number of the chosen ones is known only to God. Some of the Fathers (Kurtz, Bible and Astron., Sec. 18, note) thought that the number of the redeemed would equal that of the fallen angels, basing this on the hypothesis that mankind was created to fill the gap made by the fall of angels. Such conjectures have no value, and God has not seen proper to give us information on the subject.

Obs. 7. Christ only introduces into His Kingdom those that He chooses, and, as Alexander's version of Isa. 65 : 9, they are "chosen ones." This has been sufficiently represented in our views of the election, and we refer to it here in order to disclaim all fellowship with that exclusive narrow spirit characteristic of some professing small bodies of believers, which condemn as unchristian and lost all who do not in all things conform to their doctrinal belief. Aside from Christ only being the Judge to decide in reference to the final status of professions, all, who cordially receive, believe and trust in Christ, exhibiting their faith by producing the enumerated graces of the Spirit, are to be recognized by us as Christians, no matter whether, on various points, they differ from us. (Props. 135, 130, 179, etc.)

PROPOSITION 125. The Kingdom to be inherited by these gathered saints requires their resurrection from among the dead.

We have conclusively shown that the covenant necessitates a resurrection ; that the description of David's Son, who is to reign, demands a descendant of David possessing, in some way, immortality, seeing that His rule is everlasting, thus implying a resurrection—that a resurrection is predicted of Him, etc.—and now the fair inference is that those selected to be His co-heirs, being gathered out during a long period of time, and having died “without receiving the promises,” must also experience the power of the resurrection before they can inherit the Kingdom of God.

Obs. 1. Leaving the proof of this union of resurrection and Kingdom for the following Propositions (as we only desire now to introduce the subject of the resurrection), every reader, keeping in view that Christ's appearing and Kingdom are united, 2 Tim. 4 : 1, that a resurrection follows His Second Advent, and that an inheriting of the Kingdom succeeds this appearing and resurrection, must concede that when the righteous “are recompensed at the resurrection of the just” (Luke 14 : 14), this also includes the inheriting of a Kingdom. So that, for the present, we are content with the general tenor of the Word, indicating first a resurrection and then the reception and enjoyment of a Kingdom. And, as food for reflection, it is suggested that if the appearing and Kingdom are synchronical, then, as Mede observed, “The appearing must precede the Millennium, for” (taking now the doctrine of our opponents for granted) “at the final resurrection the Kingdom does not commence, but is ‘delivered up,’ then cometh the ‘end,’” etc. Refuge indeed may be taken in a Kingdom in the third heaven, but this, as shown, is not the Kingdom of covenant or prophecy, which is a Kingdom here on earth.

Obs. 2. All along, the position has been taken that, owing to the postponement of the Kingdom, a preliminary dispensation of grace to us Gentiles has intervened, and that even the dead saints, whatever their position in this interval, are waiting until “the day of Redemption,” the time of the resurrection for their inheritance, etc. This is confirmed by the language of Paul in 1 Cor. 15 : 32, who lays the greatest stress on the resurrection as the necessary and appointed means by which the blessings that are covenanted can be obtained. The memorial, the Abrahamic covenant, the Davidic covenant, promise after promise, involve a resurrection from the dead, and the resultant reception of blessings ; and hence the emphatic language of Paul, because of this very relationship, “what advantageth me, if the dead rise not.” He well knew that inheritance, crown, and Kingdom belonged to the period of the resurrection. Auberlen (Div.

Rev., p. 208) justly argues that one of the doctrinal defects of the Reformation was, that the resurrection of Christ was not made sufficiently prominent as compared with His sacrificial death, while in the apostolic preaching the Crucified and the Risen held equal place. And this feature extended finally in an undue exaltation of the intermediate state, until the resurrection is almost practically ignored as of comparative little consequence to the honor, glory, etc., of the deceased saint. To appreciate the force and pertinency of the resurrection, there must be a return to the scriptural presentation of the matter.

The Liturgical services for the dead, commonly used among the various denominations, being mostly derived from ancient sources, and having a close relationship to Scriptural language, are in sympathy with our position. From many sources, also, do we receive statements confirming the importance of the resurrection on the ground stated by Dr. Nast (Lange's Com., p. 401), viz., that the intermediate state is "something imperfect, abnormal," etc. Something may be added respecting the doctrine that death is the result of the fall of man. The favorite argument employed by Free Thinkers is derived from the geological assertion that it is firmly proven that before man trod this earth death reigned under the rulership of the mastodon, the dinotherium, etc. Therefore it follows that "the root doctrine" that death follows from the fall of man is an error. But the Scriptural statements are not in antagonism with the alleged proofs of geology, and still consistently make death entailed by the fall. For (1) the Bible only refers to the fact that man was created mortal (hence what preceded him, being a lower creation, was also mortal), and had life offered to him in virtue of obedience; (2) that having disobeyed, the means of life—so that he should not see death—was withdrawn, his mortality—conditioned by faithfulness—was entailed. This is the Scripture teaching, and not the old theological opinion against which the argument is levelled. Hence death, in view of disobedience, is a penal entailment as the Bible represents, because the means of escape from it originally present are withdrawn, and now can only be obtained through the Saviour provided by God. Hence, being penal and a result of the fall, perfect redemption through a perfect Redeemer must recover us from the same. (Comp. Prop. 163.)

Obs. 3. This resurrection includes a resurrection of dead saints, or, in other words, is a corporeal, literal resurrection. The changes or modifications that the body may undergo in the process of glorification, or the question whether the whole body or a portion, etc., is raised up, we leave for other works (e.g. art. "Resurrection," McClintock and Strong's Cyclop.) to discuss, the point under consideration being merely that of an undoubted, veritable resurrection of the bodies of dead saints, sufficiently distinctive to preserve personal identity, and to make it recognizable to others as a real restoration from the dead. A line of argument can only (owing to lack of space) be indicated. 1. The resurrection necessitated by the covenant promises requires the personal resurrection and continued identity of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. 2. That applied to David's Son demands the same, and the distinctive preservation of His humanity, so as to sustain a continued relationship to David as His Son. 3. The belief in a literal resurrection of the body, according to numerous writers, was a common one among the Jews at the time of Christ (Matt. 22; Luke 20; Acts 23: 6-8; John 11: 24, etc.), and the language of Christ and the apostles is pre-eminently calculated to confirm them in their belief. 4. That the language of Christ and the apostles taught such a resurrection, is confirmed by the fact that all the early churches distinctively proclaimed it as their faith, thus corroborating the views entertained by the Jews. And this general belief was not confined to Jewish but was embraced in the Gentile churches. 5. Seeing what immediately preceded and followed the First Advent in attachment to this doctrine, if an error, it seems reasonable to anticipate either from Christ or His apostles a plain and unequivocal denial of it. 6. But the Scriptures themselves establish the doctrine. This they do, (1) in the usage of words which denote both in classical and scriptural writings a revivification of the dead. (2) In applying these words to deceased persons in their graves. (3) In representing those "asleep in the dust of the earth," those "whose flesh rests in hope" etc., as the ones who shall experience it. (4) In speaking of it as something well understood, as e.g. Acts 14 : 2 and 23 : 6, etc. (5) In declaring that the unjust (Acts 24 : 15), "all in their graves," John 5 : 28, 29, shall undergo its power, removing the idea of simple moral regeneration. (6) In appealing to us not to think it incredible that God should perform such a work, Acts 26 : 8 ; Heb. 11 : 19. (7) In the examples of dead persons being restored to life (e.g. Matt. 27 : 52, 53), which is a sign of what will be done at the Sec. Advent. (8) In the body being specifically mentioned, as e.g. Rom. 8 : 23 in "the redemption of the body," Phil. 3 : 10, 21. (9) In the contrast made between death and the resurrection from the dead (1 Cor. 15 : 21, 22), and in the effects of death and the consequences following the resurrection (1 Cor. 15 : 42-54). (10) In the rejection of those who spiritualized the resurrection, 2 Tim. 2 : 17, 18. (11) In the removal of it to a certain fixed period, Eph. 4 : 30 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 23 ; 1 Thess. 4 : 14, 17, etc. (12) In the fact that "the first begotten of the dead" underwent a literal, corporeal resurrection, as the various Gospels prove ; that even in the process of glorification following it He retains His personal identity sufficiently that when He comes again He comes emphatically as "the Son of Man," David's Son, and that His resurrection is represented as a pattern for that of His saints, Rom. 8 : 11 ; 1 Cor. 4 : 14 ; 2 Cor. 4 : 14 ; Rom. 6 : 5 ; Phil. 3 : 21 ; 1 John 3 : 2. (13) In the mortal, i.e. the part subject to death putting on immortality, 1 Cor. 15 : 52-3 ; Rom. 8 : 11. (14) In the effects of Paul's preaching the doctrine on Athenians, etc., Acts 17 : 32 ; 26 : 6, 8, etc. (15) In the fact that if the body is not also redeemed, restored to its forfeited condition, then the Redemptive process is in so far incomplete. Such considerations, with especially the deeper and more significant one that the Davidic-Theocratic arrangement necessarily by covenant insists upon it, are amply sufficient to cause us to retain the old form of doctrine.

The "changing of our vile bodies," the "quickenings of our mortal bodies,"—completed redemption (comp. remarks, Art. 1, Luth. Quart. Review, July, 1874) requiring the raising up of the body, etc., ought certainly to influence every one who receives the authority of the Word to believe in a corporeal resurrection. It is most reasonable to believe that the body which suffers by the fall, which has been honored by the Spirit, which has honored God by its labors and toils, will be saved as well as the soul, and will be honored by God in a glorious manner. No spiritualizing or prevarication can remove the force of numerous Scriptures, as e.g. "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live" (for the connection shows a direct reference to corporeal resurrection, so Barnes Com., etc.). Redemption of the body is something recovered or restored that was alienated in the power of evil ; if, therefore, the body itself is not in some way resurrected and restored, there is no redemption of it. Redemption cannot be predicated of a body wholly rejected (as some believe), or of an entire new body substituted (as others hold) in place of the old one. If the reader will but reflect over the Jewish phraseology of 1 Cor. 15 : 20, "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept," this naturally and forcibly recalls the first fruits of a coming harvest of the same kind of product. In view of the identity of the first representative of the harvest with that of the harvest itself, it seems impossible to refuse our assent to a similarity of resurrection. If the one is a resurrection of the body, the rest must be the same, or else the illustration loses its force. Such passages as Rom. 6 : 5, and 8 : 23 ; Phil. 3 : 21 ; 1 Cor. 6 : 14 ;

2 Cor. 2 : 14, etc., are decisive, and corroborate the statement of Jesus, John 6 : 39, 40, 44, that He will lose nothing, but raise it up again at the last day ; that He will raise up believers (not at death) at the last day. So decisive is this Scriptural proof that nearly all creeds and confessions affirm " the resurrection of the body ;" meaning by it an actual revivification of the sleeping or dead body, forming again a reunion of soul and body, and preserving the personal identity of the believer. In this way alone do they consistently hold forth the Scriptural promise, that every believer shall be " ransomed from the power of the grave," and that " God bringeth down to the grave, and He raiseth up" (1 Sam. 2 : 6).

The Church is rapidly drifting away from the idea of a corporeal resurrection. The old-fashioned faith—even evidenced by the Patriarchs—does not suit modern notions. Thus e.g. Dr. Nisbet (The Res. of the Body. Does the Bible teach it?) refers to Nelson, Hodge, Robinson, and others as declaring that the future body is not derived from the present body, or as Robinson (quoted) says : " Few, if any, intelligent persons can at this day, I think, suppose any part of the body laid in the grave is to rise with us at our resurrection." To this we only say that, admitting a change or transformation, it certainly then is strange to have a resurrection of the body announced at all, and stranger still to connect it at some future time with our decayed bodies, and strangest of all that the resurrection of Jesus (our pattern) should be really and truly identified with His deceased body. If it is true, as Nesbit quotes Dr. Hodge, that " not a particle of one need to be in the other," this is due, not to the resurrection of the body, but to the glorification of the body afterward. Many writers confound the resurrection and subsequent glorification, speaking of the future body as the resultant only of the resurrection, when it is one of the resurrection and the subsequent transforming (making the mortal immortal, etc.) power of God. If Nesbit, Robinson, and Hodge are right, then the body of Jesus might have remained in the sepulchre untouched, and its removal, under the idea of resurrecting power, was simply a deception. White (The Redeemer and Redeemed, p. 21, etc.) makes the resurrection of the dead a re-creation simply out of the dust of the earth without any reference to the body itself. His sole Scriptural proof is based on 1 Cor. 15 : 35-38, especially the phrase " thou sowest not that body that shall be." But he presses this beyond its connection—for the context proves that while (as we firmly believe) the resurrection body (glorified) is something very different from the body sown (owing to the powers that it receives), yet the resurrection body is in some way connected with the body that has died, as seen e.g. in the phrase, " Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die." No wheat, no grain of any kind, is produced unless it sustains an intimate connection with the previously sown grain ; so it is with the resurrection, otherwise the Apostle's illustration fails—and this is confirmed by the allusions to " the graves," coming up " out of the graves," etc. A friend (Prof. Breckenridge, with whom many agree) takes the position that the same body is raised only in form, for God preserves the idea of form and in the resurrection restores it and revitalizes it, so that not any of the particles are raised which composed the original form, but the form itself is restored by the rehabilitation of other particles. This is the resurrection of an idea, and when applied to the resurrection of Jesus, and to others, fails in applying the Scripture statements respecting the " flesh," " the dust," " this vile body," " this mortal," this " seed," etc. Lee, indeed, in his Eschatology, admits a literal, corporeal resurrection of Jesus—forced to it by the facts, but then contends (p. 198-9), that it was a resurrection only to a mortal life for a few days, and that afterward the resurrection to immortal life was accomplished by His Spirit leaving the body, (1) for " the animal body had answered its purposes, and the Spirit might now take its departure into the spiritual world to live forever a Spirit without a body." Hence, according to this theory, Jesus died a second death ! and as death is the consequence of sin, He endured the penalty of sin twice ! There is nothing in the Record to support such a view, and it never would have been entertained if it were not needed to bolster up a preconceived opinion (comp. next Obs. and note). Strange how far men will proceed with the Scriptures in order to establish a favorite theory, to which the former must bend. Thus e.g. Rev. Hequembourg (Plan of Creation) follows Swedenborg, Bush, Lee, etc., in making the resurrection to be an investiture of new bodies immediately or soon after death, and then asserts respecting the impression or doctrine of a corporeal resurrection : " But if the impression should prove correct, it would be fatal to the inspiration of the New Test." That is, if the Scriptures do not sustain his theory of a purely spiritual resurrection succeeding death, he denies the divine inspiration—when the Jews, the early Church, and multitudes have found a corporeal resurrection in them and held to their inspiration. When men thus affirm themselves, in the light of the teaching exhibited by us concerning this doctrine, as judges to decide whether it ought or ought not to be received, and inspiration with it, we instinctively feel that their views are unscriptural and dangerous. The resurrection of Jesus is a stumbling-block to all purely spiritual theories, and hence Clamagerau, Fontanes, and others, in some way, against the most positive of Records, make out even a spiritual resurrection of Jesus, defining it to be "the rising of the soul to a higher life," etc.

Obs. 4. The views of the Gnostics relating to matter, and the consequent rejection of this doctrine, has influenced many to imitate Hymenæus and Philetus. From Manes down to Eckermann, Henke, Ammon, Priestley, Des Cotes (Knapp's Ch. Theol., p. 532), Bush, Owen, etc., men have endeavored either to spiritualize the language, or to explain it away as an accommodation, or to refer it to the bestowment of something new immediately after death. Indeed, this leaven has so far worked through the mass, that concessions are made by our theologians which virtually vitiate the whole doctrine so far as its relationship to the future is concerned. An illustration may be in place. Dr. Dwight in expounding (Ser. 64, On. Res.) Matt. 22 : 31, 32, not seeing how the covenant promises give the key (Prop. 49) to its meaning, opens wide the gate of arbitrary exegesis; and of his exposition Prof. Bush, in his Anastasis (denying the resurrection of the body) gladly avails himself. Dwight asserts that the word here translated resurrection denotes throughout the New Test., "existence beyond the grave," or "a future state or existence." It is a matter of amazement that so able a writer, to make out a special case of interpretation, should commit himself so erroneously, and thus aid the efforts of those who deny a bodily resurrection. This assertion has no weight with himself afterward, as he advocates a literal resurrection, indicates that it is applied to the corporeal resurrection of Jesus, and admits that the Jews, etc., employed it (as e.g. John 11 : 24) to denote a revivification of the body.* Why, then, make so sweeping a declaration, which is abundantly disproved by even the simplest passage relating to the resurrection; for, if he is correct, and Bush is right in indorsing it, then his interpretation is synonymous with the word, anastasis or resurrection. Let it be tested as a synonym with John 11 : 25; 1 Cor. 15 : 42, etc., and its absurdity will appear. Hence, our ablest critics and most talented theologians, as a matter of simple consistency, accept of the word "anastasis" or "resurrection" as legitimately denoting a revivification of the dead, a restoration to life. The student need not be reminded that innumerable testimonies derived from ancient and modern writers can be adduced to support this meaning. To give but a recent illustration: Thompson (Theol. of Christ, ch. 14), following Knapp and others, declares that the word was used by the Greeks, by the Grecian-Jews, and by the Scriptures to denote a restoration to life of the dead. This leads us again to remind the reader that in the following discussion, such candid admissions from those who have no sympathy with our doctrine possess considerable weight, in view of the fact that the selection of such a word which Christ and the apostles well knew was thus employed, indicates, that if a spiritual resurrection or existence beyond the grave is meant by the resurrection, no word could have been selected better calculated to deceive hearers and readers.

---

* Dr. Russell's estimate (Bib. Sac., Oct., 1860, p. 775, given by Hudson, p. 25 Reviewers Reviewed) of Dr. Dwight's definition may be referred to; when e.g. speaking of those who "quote the loose and rickety statements of Dr. Dwight in full on the meaning of 'anastasis,' and then blink the whole question of the usus loquendi of the language itself."

It is not surprising that "Reformed Judaism" (Art. on, by Felix Adler, in North Amer. Review, Sep.-Oct., 1877), "inspired by the philosophic (Rationalistic) teachings of the day," should set aside the doctrine of the resurrection in the flesh, and with it all kindred doctrines, as e.g. the Advent of a personal Messiah. But it is surprising that those who accept the authority of the Word, should virtually deny the same. The Unseen Universe, relying simply on the expression that "there is a natural body and a spiritual body" (overlooking Paul's statement that the one is a result of the other, for the former must first die, etc.), teaches that we now have the frame or the rudiments of the frame of the spiritual body, which connects us with the invisible world. A writer in the Cin. Enquirer, a Spiritualist, affirms that, at death, mediums have seen it coming out of the person dying, thus leaving the body. The Shakers (Art. on, by Evans, Appletons' Cyclop.) make it spiritual, and by way of pre-eminence style themselves "the children of the resurrection," and hence do not marry, as marriage is inconsistent with their professed state. Swedenborgianism (Barrett's Lectures, etc.) has no resurrection of the body, for "continuation of life is what is understood by the resurrection." With these and others there is no resurrection out of the graves, unless figuratively. Over against all these mystical conceptions, aside from other considerations (see previous Obs.) it is amply sufficient and conclusive to say that as the natural body of Jesus was transformed into a "glorious body," so, says the Apostle, Phil. 3 : 20, 21, "shall He change our vile body, that is, the vile body, "may be fashioned like unto His glorious body." Philosophy, science, spiritualizing may speculate and tender objections, but faith accepts the asserted fact that the body itself—like Christ's—shall undergo this change or transformation, just as it is represented that the bodies of the living at the Second Advent, when translated, shall also undergo a wonderful transformation. Any other view forbids the cordial reception of the promises relating to the resurrection, in their plain grammatical sense. Greybeard, in Lay Sermons, No. 104, opposes the resurrection of the body on the ground that it is "folly" to assume that "the same identical particles of matter composing the body that is sown 'in corruption' are to form the body that is to be 'raised in incorruption,' " basing it on the declaration, "thou sowest not that body that shall be," etc. But how does he know—for has the modus operandi of the resurrection been revealed to any one?—that some, if not all, the particles will be utilized and form the basis upon which is exerted transforming power? Cannot God take, if such is His will, the very mortal body and clothe it with transcendent power and refined glory? If his theory is true, then, as no particles of the body of Jesus were needed in the resurrection, the empty sepulchre was merely a pious deception, and the proof given to Thomas of a resurrection was a mere pious fraud. No! the Record is too explicit. Besides, in reply to Greybeard's proof, it must be observed that Paul speaks of the body (natural) as the basis from which springs the incorruptible (just as in the body of Jesus), and holds up the resurrection body in its completeness with the positive declaration that the body is as its "seed." Hence, while the oak is not the acorn, the same particles, yet the oak proceeds from the acorn through the transforming power of nature. So also the natural body—whether entire or in part we cannot tell, it being also complex—must form the basis, the groundwork of the resurrection body, for it is on the dead bodies in their graves that the transforming power of resurrection will be exerted, so that the dead ones undergo a transmutation; there being a veritable coming out of the graves, and, therefore, a necessity for the graves, the earth, and the sea to give up its dead. When Beecher (The Future Life, sermon, Ch. Union, Sep. 5th, 1877) rejects the resurrection of the body because "flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom," he only confuses the wonderful transforming power which accompanies the resurrection with the resurrection itself; because the resultant of resurrecting power is the glorification of the body—a conversion by which flesh and blood is excluded—in order to qualify it for inheritance in the Kingdom.

The "germ theory, which assumes that the soul at death retains a certain ethereal investiture, and that this has by virtue of the vital force the power of accreting to itself a new body for the celestial life," is virtually the Swedenborgian view as advocated by Prof. Bush (Anastasis), Universalists (Works), Joseph Cook* (Lectures), Spiritualists, and others.

* Cook (Lectures on Biology) in his Lecture "Ulrici on the Spiritual Body" (which contains highly interesting matter relative to the latest German thought respecting the enswathement of the soul in an ethereal, non-atomic fluid, etc.), makes out a present spiritual body of which the soul is an occupant, and that immediately after death, or at death, the soul continues to exclusively occupy this body, and then jumps to the conclusion that this is "the spiritual body" denoted by "the inspired doctrine of the resurrection." But was this all that Jesus experienced? Is it a coming out of the graves, etc.?

But this makes the resurrection to be at death when the Scriptures make it still future; it is opposed to the contrast in 1 Cor. 15; it is not in accord with the figure of the grain (change), 1 Cor. 15; it makes the future body independent of and not the offshoot of this body; it does not really make the whole body to die, but retains a bodily (ethereal it may be) investiture, and is opposed by the plain record of Jesus' death and resurrection (as we have shown), for to be resurrected there must be a real death in order to be made alive: thus it was with Jesus, 1 Pet. 3:18, and thus it is with the saints, Rom. 8:11. (This germ theory probably is a refinement of an old view—see McClintock and Strong's Cyclop., Art. "Mohammedanism"—for the Jewish Haggadah had a certain bone ("Bone Luz"), and Mohammed the rump bone ("Bone Al-Ajb"), which would be uncorrupted until the last day, from which the whole body would spring forth anew). If the theory were true that the resurrection is thus only a continuation of life by virtue of this inherent constitution, then a resurrecting Saviour need not be provided, for it would not be true that "by man came also the resurrection of the dead," seeing that, according to this opinion, it would be a result already established by the law of creation, and required no special divine interposition to be secured. Williamson (Theol. and Moral Science, ch. 28) and others of the same class, to make out a purely spiritual resurrection immediately after death, with no relation to the body in the grave, lay special stress on 1 Cor. 15, "With what body do they come?" and in the discussion coolly assumes what remains unproven, the time of the resurrection, omitting all reference to the passages which relate to a resurrection still future. He informs us that the body must die or else there can be no rising of the soul from it (how about the translated ones?), and this constitutes the resurrection, which the Patriarchs and all others have already experienced, for it is foolishness to say that the dead come in the same bodies, etc. Now, as there is great mystery connected with the modus operandi of resurrecting and transforming power, we are, of course, utterly unable to answer the questions and objections that may be alleged against the Scriptural idea, but we, unhesitatingly, because declared by God, receive it as follows: Paul's reasoning includes the outcome or the result, and not the mode of operation; but this embraces so much, viz., that the future body sustains some relation to the dead body in the grave, although when raised and glorified it is very different from this mortal body, having other powers, qualities, attributes, etc., to fit it for its intended glorified use. The analogy of the grain clearly teaches such a relationship, and this is sustained by the references to a still future resurrection at the Second Advent. Take e.g. such a reference as 1 Thess. 4:15-17, and the resurrection is predicated, not of those just deceased (immediate), but of "them who are asleep" in their graves, who are actually to arise from their sleep in the dust of the earth, and which is united with the Second Coming and a connected translation of living bodies. The question, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" refers to the future, and the proof is found in the simple fact that all the churches established by the Apostles East and West universally held to such a reference. How account for so general a belief? Any representation, however plausibly put, which disconnects the resurrection from a future second personal Advent of Jesus, and which separates it from any relationship to the deceased body (although mouldered in the dust), is erroneous. For Paul's reasoning shows that the very body which dies is the one quickened (and not another that is quickened because the body dies), but the quickening process (as in grain) gives a body not like that which was sown, it having different properties, powers, etc. The contrast, expressive of relationship, is distinctly and impressively given as follows: "It (the body) is sown in corruption; it (the same body, with the changes introduced) is raised in incorruption," etc. The repeated references to "this corruptible, this mortal," and hence this body as the one undergoing a change is so clear that no one, unless prejudiced by preconceived opinions, can fail to see and appreciate the force; thus repelling the notion that our mortal bodies experience no real, literal resurrecting power, which is capable of making the mortal im-

---

Is it a resurrection limited, as the Scriptures do, to the Sec. Advent? Does it not virtually make the res. of Jesus a pious fraud, and deny the union of the resurrection with the Second Coming of Jesus? Russell (Our Lord's Return, p. 47), in behalf of his spiritual theory, remarks: "A spiritual body coming out of the grave will not make any more of a hole in the ground than Christ's spiritual body made in the door when 'He came and stood in their midst, the door being shut.'" This, however, is to make resurrection (i.e. revivification of the dead) and glorification identical, which they are not. If Russell is right, why such a parade over the grave of Jesus, the missing body, etc.? Why expressly assert that the graves themselves are opened as e.g. Matt. 27:52; Ezek. 37:12; John 11:41, 44, etc.?

mortal, the vile glorious, etc. A great deal of nonsense is written respecting "the spiritual body," and because the word "spiritual" is used, many jump to the conclusion that the body is "spirit." No one mistakes concerning "the natural body" as one under the influence and control of nature, and no one should misapprehend (after the usage of "spiritual") "the spiritual body" as one under the influence and control of the spirit.* But the latter still arises from the former as its basis, being shown by the evident contrast and relationship, thus: "It (the body) is sown a natural body; it (the same body but now changed) is raised a spiritual body." If death retains the body so that it will not be raised and changed, we fail to see how then "Death is swallowed up in victory." The critical student will observe the force of the Apostolic position in this respect. If (e.g. Killen's Anc. Church, with which comp. Neander's remarks) the Gnostics resisted the notion of a resurrection of the dead because of the principle that evil was inherent in matter, it is exceedingly strange that, if there is no resurrection of the mortal body, the Apostle should not, to this extent at least, have conciliated and incorporated the view, instead of directly affirming against them a resurrection, as e.g. Paul saying to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 15 : 12) : "How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" Why compare death to a sleep out of which the dead one should awake and directly refer to the bodies themselves? Why give such a decisive rebuke to deniers of a future resurrection (2 Tim. 2 : 18)? Enough has been said on this subject to sustain the Pre-Millen. view of the resurrection of dead ones, and the subject may be dismissed with two remarks. First, men are too eager to quote as authority for their views others who really differ from them. Thus e.g. the Universalist Quarterly, p. 150, Ap., 1877, on Luther as a Preacher, quotes him as saying concerning the res. of the body, to make it appear that he indorsed the Universalist view of the res. : "That the human body after death is not that body that shall be." But this we also receive, and Luther's view, as repeatedly taught, was that of a resurrection of the body, but that the resurrected body was one totally changed from the corruptible body buried, and that such a change was only to be realized at the future Second Advent. Second : the interpretation of a passage is made to fit a preconceived opinion. Thus, to take a favorite one. Augustine, and many who follow him, quote John 5 : 25, 26, "The hour is coming and now is when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live. For as the Father hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself." Because the expression is used, "The hour is coming and now is," they suppose that it refers only to a spiritual or moral resurrection. But this is opposed to the facts. This announcement on the face of it expresses something as unusual, whereas such a resurrection as these advocate has, according to their view, always existed. Again : "the hour is coming" alludes to a future time coming when a bodily resurrection shall be experienced, and the "now is" indicates that although the resurrection is promised in general as future (at the last day) to those living, yet even now, at that time, a bodily resurrection was experienced in those few who were raised from the dead by Jesus, and the many who were raised up at His own resurrection, including, as the next phrase shows, the resurrection of Jesus Himself. And then the expression "He hath given to the Son to have life in Himself," shows, as the parallel passages evince, that allusion is made to a resurrection of the literal dead, because we are expressly told that it was in view of this self-lodged power of life that death could not hold dominion over Him. That the Gentiles deemed the doctrine of the resurrection a thing "incredible" (as many now do, pronouncing our view "foolishness," etc.), did not influence the inspired men to soften it down in order to make it palatable and accommodating to modern notions and unbelief, as is now the fashion, following in the lead of Gnosticism, Friscillianism, etc.

Obs. 5. An important feature that ought to be noticed in this discussion, is this : Commentators and others quote largely from the writings of the Jews, showing that they derived from the Old Testament the belief

---

* Hodge, quoted by Nesbit in another place, has some good, sensible remarks on "the spiritual body" in his Com. on 1 Cor., in which he does (1) connect the resurrected with the dead body, and (2) insist upon a body under the influence of the spirit. Probably this influenced Whedon (Com., 1 Cor. 15 : 44) to coin a new word, making "spiritual" equivalent to "soulical," i.e. something combined with, directed and controlled by, the soul. Many able writers contend that by "natural body" is meant one that is influenced, etc., by nature, and that by "spiritual body" is denoted one which is the organ of the spirit and the instrument of its operations (thus e.g. comp. Lange's Com. loci).

that the pious dead would be raised up at the Coming of the Messiah, and that they would remain with Him here on earth in His Kingdom. A few specimens will suffice: Eisenmenger (Bush, Anast., p. 221) states that the Jews held that the souls of pious Israelites were in a state of detention until the resurrection, awaiting a deliverance which was to be wrought for them by the Messiah, the Son of David. Bush quotes (Anast., p. 225), as favoring such a resurrection, R. Joshua Ben Levi, who thus applies Hos. 13 : 14 and Isa. 35 : 10, and also the Bereshith Rabba ad Gen, thus interpreting Micah 2 : 13. Priest (View, p. 40) says that J. Ben Uziel when referring to the prophecies of Eldad and Medad concerning Gog and Magog "in the last days," adds: "All the dead of Israel shall rise again to life, and shall enjoy the delights prepared for them from the beginning, and shall receive the reward of their works." R. Eliezer speaks of a resurrection preceding the Millennial age or thousand years. In the Test. of Simeon (Twelve Patriarchs) when "the Lord God, the Mighty One of Israel, shall appear upon earth as man," it is added: "Then will I (Simeon) arise in joy and will bless the Most High for His marvellous works, because God hath taken a body, and eaten with men, and saved men." In the same work, in the Test. of Zebulun, he is represented as saying: "And now, my children, grieve not that I am dying, nor be troubled in that I am passing away from you. For I shall arise once more in the midst of you, as a ruler in the midst of his sons; and I will rejoice in the midst of my tribe," etc. Having given Jewish testimony in various places, and reserving others for following propositions, this, in connection with the collections given by Burnet (Theory), Lightfoot (Works), Mede (Works), Manasse Ben Israel (On Res.), Herzog's Cyclop., Smith's Bib. Dic., and found in our commentaries, is corroborative of the notion entertained by Jews themselves of a corporeal resurrection, and of its occurrence at the appearing of the Messiah. And, what is remarkable, this very expectation of a resurrection at the time of the reign of the Messiah, a Pre-Millennial resurrection, a resurrection deemed indispensable to fulfil the prophets and the covenant itself to Abraham, etc., is so fully incorporated in the phraseology of the New Test. that not the slightest disconnection is to be found existing, so that Paul himself, Acts 26 : 6, 7 (comp. Acts 23 : 6), links "the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers, unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come," with the resurrection itself; and John in the Apocalypse, as many writers have admitted, gives a representation of the resurrection in full accord with Jewish opinions. At least the language chosen in its natural, grammatical meaning confirms these hopes not only in Jewish but in Gentile converts. The latter circumstance is to be considered the stronger in our favor, since, as many authors have shown, the doctrine of a resurrection from the dead was particularly absurd and offensive to Greeks, Romans, etc. Surely this continued reception of "Jewish conceptions" by Gentile churches must have its significance. This doctrine was taught by the apostolic Fathers and their successors as indispensable to their system of faith; and it was regarded as cardinal and exceeding precious, owing to the covenanted Kingdom and blessings being identified with it. Justin Martyr (Dial. with Trypho, ch. 80) gives the general view held when he says: "But I and others, who are right-minded Christians on all points, are assured that there will be a resurrection of the dead (or as Newton, of the flesh), and a thousand years in Jerusalem, which will then be built, adorned, and enlarged, as the prophets Ezekiel and Isaiah and others declare," quoting Isa. 65 : 17-25 ; Ps. 90 : 4 ; 2 Pet. 3 : 8 and the Apoc. in confirmation.

While this doctrine was almost entirely confined to the Jews and the first Christians, yet traces of it are to be found in several directions. Thus e.g. a resurrection of the body was taught even by a sect of Magians several centuries B.C. A great prophet was to arise toward the expiration of this world, who would be "the Conqueror of death and the Judge of the world," and after this revival to life the once dead but now "become immortal with a fine ethereal body, would lead a life of bliss upon an earth forever freed from the corrupting influence of evil." (Quoted by Thompson, Theol. of Christ, p. 182.) The Sibylline Oracles, as many have noticed, teach a resurrection preceding a Millennial age and reign of a Mighty King. However we may account for the advocacy of the doctrine outside of the Jews and Christians, one thing is certain from the constant appeal made to Scripture, that both Jews and Christians derived their belief from the express declarations of God's Word, so that, e.g. Lactantius (Div. Insti.) when adverting to this Pre-Millennial resurrection connected with the personal Advent of the Messiah, only expresses a uniform sentiment when he says (ch. 26) : "this is the doctrine of the holy prophets which we Christians follow ; this is our wisdom."

For other references to the Jewish and Primitive belief, see Ante-Nicene Library, Coms. of Meyer, Gill, Clarke, etc. Arts. on Res. in Kitto, Calmet, writings of Russell, Dodwell, Greswell, etc. Observe the language of Clemens Romanus in his Epis. to the Corinthians. The Apocrypha, as e.g. Mac. 2 : 7, 14 ; 12 : 45, etc. The Karaites (the party opposed to the Rabbinical) hold to a resurrection of the dead, as seen in their articles of belief (Millman's His. of the Jews, p. 224). So also the Mohammedans, who (Upham's His. of Mahomet's Successors, Greenbank's Period. Library, p. 247; specially honored Palestine, "as, according to their traditions, it is the place whither all mankind will be summoned at the resurrection."

Obs. 6. But in view of the variety of theory concerning the resurrection, something more must be stated. Many writers refine the resurrection by using it as a figurative expression, so that it is constituted something coeval with the history of the Church ; or as an accommodation denoting the unfolding of greater capacities and newer powers ; or as indicative of an inner body or life continued after death, making death not penal, but necessary and friendly to the development of life ; or, as the reception of something exclusively spiritual, either the complete transformation of the material into spirit or the union of two spiritual natures into one. There is no end to the variety and scope of mystical language in this direction, and under the guidance of men of learning and genius, it becomes bewildering. But all such notions, however learnedly and eloquently expressed, are opposed to the simple idea of the resurrection as entertained by the Jews and early Christians, and as represented in the Scriptures. We frankly admit that the subject is one of faith, and thus accept of it ; but, at the same time, a solid foundation sustaining such faith is produced. Leaving the connection that it has with the body itself in the grave, with the corporeal resurrection of Jesus, with the meaning of the word anastasis as aptly given by Pearson on the Creed, with the corporeal resurrection of some after the crucifixion, etc., we plant ourselves on the "redemption of the body" (Rom. 8 : 23), which clearly teaches that not another body is given and glorified, but the same body, made subject by sin to death and corruption, is raised up again and given immortality and renewed (even spiritualized) powers and capacities. We still have faith to accept of the scriptural statements that death is penal in its nature, that it is an enemy and not a friendly messenger to introduce a spiritual resurrection, or to bestow the inheritance, crown, and Kingdom. We are old-fashioned enough in our belief to cling with hope to that day beyond the intermediate period or state, when the redemption of the body will also be effected. And this, because we rest on a perfect, complete Redemption. Our Saviour is a perfect Redeemer; and the early Christians evinced not only faith but logic when they claimed in and through Him "the Redemption of the body." Everything else that man and the race forfeited by sin is restored through Christ, and we can make no exception in favor of the body, given over to death and corruption, without making Redemption in so far incomplete, and giving in this particular the victory and triumph to Satan. We dare not limit the redemption of the believer, seeing that God designs and has promised, through Christ, a complete restoration to all forfeited blessings; and even superadds to the same, in virtue of relationship to the Redeemer, increased exaltation and glory. Hence, every theory, however plausible, and no matter by whom advocated, that proceeds to limit Redemption, the work of Christ, must be rejected as irreconcilable with the honor, power, etc. of God in Redemption.

An editor of a prominent religious periodical, in a recent article on the resurrection, complained that some gave it undue prominency in the pulpit, etc., and suggested that one sermon a year was amply sufficient to give it all the prominency that it needs. Some eminent commentators and theologians of his own denomination correctly take a different view from that of the editor, who makes so much of "the intermediate state" that he does not see much necessity for a resurrection. Over against such a loose method we commend the excellent remarks of one of the editors (either Dr. Brown or Dr. Valentine) of the Evang. Quarterly Review, Art. 1, July, 1874, p. 337, insisting upon its fundamental importance and necessity (corporeal) for completed redemption. Sir Thomas Browne (Relig. Medici, S. 47) quaintly says: "The life, therefore, and spirit of our actions is the resurrection, and a stable apprehension that our ashes shall enjoy the fruit of our pious endeavors; without this all religion is a fallacy, and those impieties of Lucian, Euripides and Julian are no blasphemies, but subtle verities; and atheists have been the only philosophers." The critical student will find that by "the adoption," Rom. 9 : 4, Paul refers to this resurrection (for proof, see the preceding chapter, v. 23), making it equivalent to "the redemption of the body" (comp. Judge Jones' Notes, p. 284, foot-note). But it is something distinguished from the general resurrection, being a peculiar and distinctive one, belonging to "the Sons of God;" for by the resurrection of saints is the adoption both perfected and manifested. Jesus is declared to be "the Son of God" by the resurrection from the dead, Rom. 1 : 4, and His Sonship being vindicated and manifested by that sublime manifestation of power, it is employed, Acts 13 : 33, as proof of the resurrection. But the identical principle involved in "the manifestation of the Sons of God," to become such fully and really, they also, like their Head, must be declared such by a resurrection from among the dead—one peculiar to themselves; and this the Apostle declares, Rom. 8, where the formal adoption is linked with the resurrection, for they are born again (as Jesus was born from the dead) as His children. (Query: Can we thus apply "the Sons of the living God" in Hos. 1 : 10?) Brown (Com. Matt. 12 : 25), in confirmation of what we previously said respecting the memorial (Prop. 49, Obs. 2, note) expressing a resurrection, forcibly says: "A beautiful clause is added by Luke, 'and are children of God'—not in respect of character, which is not here spoken of, but of nature—'being the children of the resurrection,' rising to an unending existence (Rom. 8 : 21, 23), being the children of their Father's immortality" (1 Tim. 6 : 16). (Compare Rom. 1 : 4, etc.) It will be profitable for us to ponder in our hearts what this means, viz., that if we are so happy as to be "the children of the resurrection" we thus are manifested as God's children, He calling us out of the dust of the earth by supernatural power and imparting to us God-like powers. The expression in its relationship is so indicative of a new birth with added capacities and powers, so full of contemplated glory entirely derived out of the ordinary course of nature, that it ought to stimulate our faith and hope to grasp such a distinguishing, peculiar resurrection of saints.

Attention is called to Ps. 16 : 10: "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither will Thou suffer Thy Holy One to see corruption." The mss. have the plural form "holy ones," and Rosenmuller, De Wette, Gesenius, Bruno, Stanga, Fischer, etc., decide that it must be retained. Our version and many commentators follow the Keri or marginal reading, and retain the singular. This has led to some discussion among critics. Some, as Fischer, etc., call it a plural of intention having reference only to Christ. Others, as Hengstenberg, conclude that "the plural here must have been extremely welcome to the Jews because it furnished them with the best means of refuting the Messianic interpretation of the Ps." Some, as Dr. Alexander, contend that even the singular reading in the margin "is collective and includes the whole class of God's chosen and favored ones, of whom Christ is the Head and Representative" (whereupon a writer in the Bib. Sacra., Oct., 1851, p. 808, asks the Dr., "Is it a fact that God does not suffer His 'holy ones' to see corruption?"). Now, so far as the plural form is concerned, if insisted on, we are willing (gladly, as authoritative) to adopt it, but need not necessarily indorse Hengstenberg's idea. For notice, (1) it is quoted in the New Test. as expressly applicable to a resurrection; (2) Christ being the Head of the brethren or "holy ones" is necessarily included, and therefore the application to Him; (3) that the suggested question whether His brethren, "holy ones," do not experience corruption, is not stated in the text if we allow due latitude of meaning to the word "see." For it has also the meaning of suffering or enduring, of continued experience or under the possession of, etc., as e.g., "It was not meet for us to see the King's dishonor," "If a man shall keep my saying he shall never see death," "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," etc. Hence it is not necessary even to contend that any saint, including Jesus Himself, has not experienced corruption, seeing that the text only asserts that they shall not be suffered to endure corruption, remain under its power, but shall obtain a resurrection. With either reading it is a proof of Christ's resurrection, and with the plural form it embraces that of His members, and thus makes the resurrection of all a bodily one.

In reference to the body itself it is sufficient to add, that, being something beyond present experience and reason, it is not particularly described, but in general it is asserted that being transformed, made like unto the body of Christ, glorified, it becomes "a spiritual body," i.e. a body perfectly controlled by Spirit and not dependent any longer on nature for its support (although like angels, because of future supping with Jesus, etc., food and drink may be partaken of—not as a matter of necessity, but rather of pleasure). It is a body freed from weakness, disease, and death, having immortality, perpetual youth, angelic and even Christ-like powers. It is a strange notion of Burnet's (Com. State of the Dead, and Res., ch. 7) that this glorified body will have no members or organs of sensation. Reason would imply the exact contrary, and even largely increase them as means of enlarged happiness (without e.g. interfering with the power of rapid transmission from one point to another, which Scripture supports in that it invariably links the unbounded happiness of the righteous with the period of their resurrection, and conveys the decided impression that the body itself will form an instrumentality through which increased pleasure will be afforded to the soul. We may well imagine, as Scripture intimates (Luke 20: 36, etc.), that the future body in its glorified form will vary from the present body in that it is specially fitted for a new and enlarged state or ordering. The description of Jesus glorified, the representations of the saints, all evidence the greatness of the transformation, yet in such a way as to preserve a continued personal identity linking it with that which had previously existed. The critical student will ponder in this connection that (already intimated) glorification (which qualifies for honor and station) follows the resurrection. It is supposed from 1 Cor. 15 that glorification and resurrection are one, but a little reflection and comparison will show that Paul in the general subject of the resurrection of the saints, which includes their glorification, unites both, giving the result, under the one general head. The production of the natural body is not instantaneous, and it does not follow that the production of the glorified and spiritual body is a sudden, instantaneous one. Let the reader consider that the resurrection of the saints leads to a speedy, determined incorruptibility, etc., because a resurrection, same word, is also predicted of the unjust, who certainly are not transformed because resurrected, thus showing that the act of resurrecting or vivifying the dead is one thing and that of glorifying quite another. Men are to be judged for the deeds done in the body, and it would be an incongruity to judge them when already, as evidence of previous judgment, in possession of their reward in a transformed body. The resurrection of Jesus is in point, for we have no evidence that He assumed the glorified form until at His ascension, thus showing a resurrected one can exist restored to life, for some time independent of glorification. The rewarding being at the res. of the just, and as the future position, station, etc., of the believer in the Theocratic Kingdom is then assigned to them, and as differences exist, etc., we have every reason to believe that while all glorified bodies are fashioned after Christ's, some are more like Christ's than others, or in other words, that a diversity will thus exist even in the glory of the body as in the glory of the soul.

Obs. 7. If charged with credulity in our belief, we answer, that it requires far more to spiritualize away the plainest of facts. Thus, e.g. if the resurrection consists merely in a continued spiritual or future life, why is so much said of the burial of Christ, of the grave, the sealing, the stone rolled away, the rising on the third day (and not after death), the visitation to indicate no absence of the body, etc.? How can these facts be reconciled with such a theory? Again: the precise idea is conveyed of a resurrection "from among or out of the dead," as all critics admit (as e.g. Phil. 3 : 11, etc.). Prof. Bush (Anast., p. 139), noticing this peculiarity in Luke 20 : 25, says : "This usage is very remarkable, and must be founded upon some sufficient reason." The reason he assigns is, that it denotes a moral or spiritual resurrection from among or out of the dead in sin, or a future state. But the facts in reference to this usage are decidedly against such a view, for the identical language is employed to denote Christ's resurrection from among or out of the dead as is seen in Acts 4 : 2, comp. Acts 17 : 31 ; and hence, if the pleading is valid, it denotes in Christ's case a moral or spiritual regeneration or a continued future life. How, too, reconcile this usage of language with precisely the same employed by the Jews to signify, as the words indicate, a separate and distinct resurrection of some of the dead ?

Compare Prop. 128. We are satisfied with the charge of credulity, so long as the same is supported by the plain statements of God. The difficulties alleged in the scattering of the dust, in the assimilation of the flesh of martyrs by beasts, etc., have no force to him who believes in the unlimited Omnipotence of God. The question simply is, has God declared that He will raise the dead? If He has, then He will perform it, no matter how incredible, how impossible it may be to man. We are not concerned in replying to objections at length, simply because not knowing how it is accomplished, how the transformation is performed, we might readily be led in our short-sightedness, into error. It is sufficient that a cause efficient enough to produce it is assigned, even Jesus, David's Son and Son of God, and that the efficiency was practically demonstrated in His own dead body. The illustrations generally employed, however favorites, to show forth the resurrection, apt as they may be in one respect, fail in others. Thus e.g. the change of the ugly caterpillar in its silken cocoon into the beautiful butterfly, lacks the analogy of death and the sudden exertion of power in its behalf ; it is simply the product of nature's laws, while the other is the glorious resultant of supernatural power. The silver cup dissolved by acid and mixed in a large quantity of liquid in an invisible state, so that even the microscope cannot perceive it, and then again by science reduced to visibility, to a compact mass, and formed into another silver cup of greater shapeliness and beauty, this may indeed teach us to have faith in the ability of the great Chemist and Scientist who established and organized the vast laboratory of nature, but its analogy utterly fails because it does not touch the problem of death and life. The only light and illustration that has the requisite force and beauty is that found in Him who is "the resurrection and the life." It is such that childlike faith can grasp, appreciate and apply with comfort and hope. It preserves, however accomplished and whatever modifications exist, the personal identity of the believer, even as respects his body, as implied by the dead ones being called forth from their graves, etc. Bh. Butler (Analogy) may go too far, as Tyndall (Pop. Science Monthly, Oct., 1874) accuses him, when he says, "Our organized bodies are no more a part of ourselves than any other matter around us" (urged to the statement by his eulogy of the soul and illustrating it by limbs removed, body diseased, and yet the mind active, etc.); but Tyndall goes to the opposite extreme when, retaliating with his Lucretian theory, he makes matter supreme (illustrated by the brain, vital organs, etc., being requisite to sustain a person), for the truth seems to be in a medium, both being essential to constitute the personal identity of a believer, and consequently, as we have shown, there is a redemption which includes soul and body. As to the philosophical and scientific questions that this may suggest, it is again sufficient to say, that this whole matter being beyond our experience and knowledge, we must be content with the general statements which include both, making it satisfactory and comforting (just what we need) at the mouth of the grave, when it receives the mortal remains of a loved one. Simple faith in God's Word imparts hope and joy, when supposed superior wisdom gives only despair and anguish, or, at least, painful doubt and perplexing suspense diminishing happiness. When we see Christ's body, the body itself, raised up so that it should not experience corruption; when we consider this requisite to prove His resurrecting power over death itself; when we contemplate the assurance that His resurrection is a pledge, the first fruits, of our own, then we are satisfied, and willing to remain in ignorance of its modus operandi, awaiting its glorious power.

Obs. 8. Candor requires the brief examination of the only passage which can, by careless concessions, be adduced as favorable to this notion of a purely spiritual resurrection immediately after death, viz., that of 2 Cor. 5 : 1-8. If we entertain the opinion, given by various writers, that this change of body is experienced at death, we are at once plunged into difficulties, for then, (1) we make Paul contradict himself in his teaching concerning the resurrection. For he not only in other places teaches a corporeal resurrection, but he precisely locates this resurrection and transformation at the future Coming of Christ (e.g. 1 Cor. 15, and 1 Thess. 4), when "the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven," etc. (2) In consoling those who lost friends and endured tribulations (1 Thess. 4 : 13 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 4-10, etc.), he refers them to an experience of the power of the resurrection at the same period, and professes the same respecting himself (Rom. 8 : 23). (3) That none of the churches established by him, or their immediate successors, believed, so far as we have any knowledge, that believers experienced such a change immediately after death, which omission of faith is corroborative evidence that the passage was apprehended without such an interpretation. If we concede that the change is after the death of the believer, then the concession is seized by Swedenborgians, Universalists, etc., as proof of the non-resurrection of the bodies of the saints. Is this concession necessary, or is it demanded by the passage? The reasons just assigned have already sufficient weight to urge us to avoid it for the sake of consistency; and the solution, if we allow the general analogy of Scripture to speak, is not difficult. It is only a forced comment to say, as some do (e.g. MacKnight, Hodge, etc.), that the resurrection body is not denoted, but only "the heavenly mansions" or places in the third heaven, for then the contrast is not preserved. It is contradictory to profess a belief in a bodily resurrection at the end of the age, and yet when we come to this passage, give the saints (as Barnes) in this intermediate state a body and even "a glorified body." To say that Paul desired to be with Christ in a disembodied state does violence to the desire as expressed, or to say that a temporary body is given until the day of resurrection is opposed to its being "eternal." The explanation of Locke that Paul expected the speedy coming of Christ, and desired a transformation, without dying, although plausible, as Barnes admits, is not necessary to reconcile the passage with other statements of Paul. The opinion of that class of commentators who advocate that the resurrection body is denoted, is the only one that accords with the tenor of the resurrection doctrine. Paul is accustomed, owing to the inheritance, etc., being linked with the Second Coming, to pass over the intermediate state, examples of which are found (e.g. Rom. 8 : 30 ; Heb. 12 : 22, 23, etc.) in several epistles. Before entering upon the words of the passage, he expresses his strong faith in the things not seen, in the things eternal, and among those things he had just enumerated (ch. 4 : 14), "knowing that He which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise us up also by Jesus, and shall present us with you." Hence, grasping by faith the blessings connected with the resurrection by Jesus, he, passing by the intermediate state as not worthy of comparison with what follows it, makes a general affirmation of the resurrection, his desire to experience it, and his safety and blessedness whether he presently, or not, experience it. That his mind was impressed by the desire for a bodily resurrection appears, (1) that this body is "eternal in the heavens" (see Prop. 107), which accords with the position and rank of the Rulers after the resurrection; (2) it occurs here on earth for "the house is from heaven," i.e. the change, etc., is made by God through His Son Jesus (for our "resurrection" even is in heaven); (3) this change is made "that mortality might be swallowed up of life," i.e., the body itself, the mortal part, is endued with immortality, otherwise it is not correct to say that the mortal receives or attains to life, but it should be (if spiritualized) that the mortal body gives place to another and different body never susceptible to mortality; (4) the "earnest of the Spirit," given as a pledge for the performance of this, indicates it, as a comparison with Rom. 8 : 23; Eph. 1 : 14; Eph. 4 : 30, etc., will show. Such considerations, to say the least, are ample enough, whatever view we may entertain respecting particular parts of the passage or concerning it as a whole, to prove that we need not indorse a spiritual endowment or resurrection immediately after death, making the resurrection of the body unnecessary and redundant; for, admitting the apostleship of Paul, the writer does not contradict himself, which he inevitably does if we force such an interpretation upon his words.

Rev. Wilson (Proph. Times, N. S., 1875, vol. 1, p. 223) and others simply make the body reserved in heaven to be the body of Christ, the pattern of ours, after whose body ours is to be fashioned, just as He is now in heaven our life. We shall be clothed with this body at His Coming, etc., and as Paul saw this very body, hence his intense longing for it, thus nervously expressed. Lange's Com. loci refers the reception of this body to the resurrection at the Parousia of Jesus, and Dr. Wing (foot-note) indorses and enforces (over against Hodge's view) the opinion expressed by Dr. Kling. The passage, too, as numerous writers observe, distinguishes between the soul and the body, so that the latter is not pure spirit, but an organized vehicle under perfect control of the spirit. Comp. the excellent remarks of Fausset (Com. loci), who heads his comments with "The Hope of Eternal Glory in the Resurrection Body."

Obs. 9. Attention is called to the circumstance that many of our opposers frankly acknowledge that a literal Pre-Millennial resurrection is taught in the Scriptures. Of these we have several classes, (1) such as receive the inspired Word, and profess themselves forced by philological and exegetical reasons to receive the doctrine, but very carefully have these resurrected saints removed to the third heaven. Such are Prof. M. Stuart, Priest, etc.; and the Com. of Stuart and his Excursus on Rev. 20 are commended to the special consideration of the reader, because his candid admissions are particularly valuable both on account of his known hostility to our doctrine, and by reason of this concession of a literal resurrection being antagonistic in spirit and principle to his own theological system.' (2) Then there are some hard to understand and contradictory; admitting in one place a literal Pre-Millennial resurrection, without the Advent of Christ, and in another place rejecting it. Thus, e.g. Kurtz (Sacred History) admits, s. 196, a literal resurrection to precede the Millennium, as his reference to Matt. 27 : 52, 53 indicates, and yet in sections 198 and 199 he speaks as if all the Scriptures pertaining to the dead of Christ were only fulfilled at the close of that age. He, too, is guarded in placing those resurrected ones preceding the Millennial age in an "invisible and celestial" reign, just as if the predicted Kingdom of the prophets was an invisible one. The concession, however feebly given, is worthy of notice, as in so far it coincides with "the ignorance and folly" of Jewish expectations.* (3) Another class are those who, imitating some ancient opponents of Chiliasm, reject the Apocalypse mainly on the ground that it teaches a two-fold resurrection, the first of the saints at the beginning of the Millennial age, the second at its close. So Lücke and others, see Prof. Stuart's Introd. to Apoc. (4) Some, as Prof. Bush (Mill. and Anast.), Neander (Works), admit that the language is well adapted to teach a Pre-Millennial corporeal resurrection, that such an opinion was entertained by the early Church, that it was well suited to sustain the martyrs, etc., but that its true spiritual conception was to be developed by the growth of the Church. (5) Rejectors of Revelation, as Gibbon (History, vol. 1, p. 534, etc.), admit it, and in various works and periodicals it is presented and derided as decidedly too "Jewish." A writer, e.g. in Westm. Review, Oct., 1861, p. 261, speaking of this doctrine, portrays it thus: "The subjects of this long-desired theocracy are primarily the decapitated martyrs, and then all the true adherents of the now triumphant Messiah. Their restoration to a happy and sinless corporeal existence constitutes the first resurrection," but pronounces it after all only a splendid idea derived from Jewish Messianic expectations, unworthy of credence. Very recent attacks on the Apoc. by talented men correspond with this in tone and spirit. (6) Still others fully admit the literalness of the Pre-Millennial resurrection, but injure its force, and materially affect the harmony of prophecy, by linking with it, and regarding as identical in time, events which are separated by the Millennial era. Thus, e.g. Keith in his Harmony of Prophecy. Thus from various sources, antagonistic, and some even hostile, to us, we have the important admission made, so requisite to our system of faith, that a literal Pre-Millennial resurrection is taught in the Scriptures.*

* Among these may be classed those who express themselves in a hesitating, undecided manner. As e.g. Henry's comment in the Compreh. Com. loci, which says: "They were raised from the dead and restored to life, either literally or figuratively," but then proceeds, owing to preconceived views of judgment, Kingdom, etc., to favor the figurative sense. Among such may also be reckoned those who occasionally give a most decided utterance in our favor, but are largely given to spiritualizing. Thus e.g. Dr. Tomlinson, in his Sermon on the Millennium, is forced to acknowledge a literal res. After mentioning the view of a res. of a mere spirit of the martyrs, he adds: "Others contend, and, in my opinion, with much more propriety, that it should be interpreted according to its obvious import; and that the martyrs will literally rise from the dead at the beginning of the Millennium, and continue on the earth throughout the whole of that period," and then approvingly quotes Bh. Newton. To these may be added such writers as Spurgeon, Talmage, and others, who in one place utter the most emphatic Pre-Millennial views (some we quote in this work), and then weaken the same in other places by indecisive, hesitating, or spiritualistic utterances, showing that a clear, uniform system of Eschatology is lacking.

* To this class Dr. Chalmers may be added (having occasion to quote him occasionally), who at times is hard to understand, unless we allow him a Millenarian bias (comp. his letter to Dr. Bonar, Memoirs, vol. 5). Thus e.g. on Ps. 50: 1-6 (Posth. Works, vol. 3, p. 51) he remarks upon its being in "the domain of unfulfilled prophecy," and adds: "And I am far more inclined to the literal interpretation of this Psalm than to that which would restrict it to the mere preaching of the Gospel in the days of the apostles. It looks far more like the descent of the Son of Man on the Mount of Olives, with all the accompaniments of a Jewish conversion, and a first resurrection, and a destruction of the assembled hosts of Antichrist." Even Origen could not entirely rid himself of the Primitive view, and occasionally utters sentiments in accord with Chiliasm, as e.g. in his 13th Homily on Jeremiah, he says: "If any man shall preserve the washing of the Holy Spirit, etc., he shall have part in the First Resurrection; but if any man be saved in the Sec. Resurrection only, it is the sinner that needeth the baptism by fire. Wherefore, seeing these things are so, let us lay the Scriptures to heart, and make them the rule of our lives; that so being cleansed from the defilement of sin before we depart, we may be raised up with the saints and have our lot with Christ Jesus." (The student will observe that Barbour's system is Origen's revived, viz., future salvation of sinners.)

<sup>3</sup> Dr. Keith, in many respects an instructive and valuable writer, connects passages (Har. of Proph.) as descriptive of the same period of time which the Spirit applies to different eras of time. Thus e.g., overlooking the plain fact that the judgments of God fall upon living nations and not upon the dead at the Sec. Advent (comp. Prop. 134), and the additional fact that the dead in Christ only experience a resurrection at the beginning of the Mill. age and the rest of the dead are not raised until its close (comp. next Prop.), he unites with Rev. 20:5, 6, etc., such passages as Rev. 20:12, 13, 14, 15. His objection that we nowhere find "a second" resurrection spoken of, is irrelevant, for two reasons, (1) the term "first," as shown in next Prop., has not so much reference to time as to privilege; and (2) the resurrection of all is asserted, but a certain precedence given to the righteous, which necessarily involves precedence in time, etc.

Obs. 10. An objection, urged by Barnes and others, may as well be noticed here. It is to the effect that in more detailed descriptions of the Resurrection, as in 1 Thess. 4, and 1 Cor. 15, Paul does not connect the personal reign and Kingdom of Christ as following here on earth. But if this proves anything, it proves too much, for it would exclude other things also mentioned as occurring, such as the creation of new heavens, etc., the resurrection of the unjust, the last judgment, etc. The omission is decidedly in our favor, for (while Paul in other places unites "the appearing and Kingdom"), he here takes it for granted, from the universally entertained views that the Kingdom is joined to the appearing of this Son of Man, that the parties addressed will supply the order of events omitted, and discusses only that part of it, viz., the resurrection of the dead, which to Gentiles, like the Thessalonians and Corinthians, was the most incredible, etc. If the objection is appropriate, then we might frame another in the same spirit, and ask, Why then, seeing that these Thessalonians are charged by Neander and others as holding to "Jewish forms" of the Kingdom, did not the apostle, when on the subject of the resurrection, refute their Jewish notions of the Kingdom? The one objection is as pertinent as the other.

PROPOSITION 126. In confirmation of our position, the Old Test. clearly teaches a Pre-Millennial resurrection of the saints.

Our entire argument, step by step, leads to this as a necessity, otherwise the Kingdom as covenanted and predicted cannot appear, and cannot be inherited. Leaving the reasons already assigned (under the discussion of the covenant and memorial, see. Prop. 49), we now appeal to others which show that before the Messianic Kingdom can be realized the righteous dead must first be raised up from among the dead.

Obs. 1. No one doubts that Isa. 25 : 6-8 is descriptive of the Messiah's Kingdom. If we regard it, as it ought to be, representative of a state here on earth to be witnessed during an appointed time, and if we do not take the unwarranted liberty of dividing and subdividing it, allotting portions of it to one time and other portions to another time, or, ascribing parts of it to earth and others to the third heaven, then it will be very easy to locate the period of its verification or realization on the authority of the Apostle Paul. In turning to 1 Cor. 15 : 54, after a description only of the resurrection of the righteous, the apostle emphatically adds, "then" (i.e. at this very time of this resurrection) "shall be brought to pass the saying that is written 'Death is swallowed up in victory.'" Isaiah's Millennial description, which all agree is a delineation of Christ's Kingdom, is, according to this testimony, to be fulfilled or brought to pass when a resurrection is experienced by the saints. This is corroborated by the statements given in Isaiah, corresponding with such, that we know are only to be realized after death is abolished. But Paul adds another saying which is also "then," at that time to be brought to pass, viz., the one given by Hos. 13 : 14 (gives the spirit of it), "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" The question that arises here is this: Paul well knew that Hosea 13 : 14 (as well as Isa. 25 : 8) was a favorite passage of the Jews to support a resurrection of righteous Jews at the inauguration of the Kingdom by the coming of the Messiah—how, then, could he locate its fulfilment at a resurrection of saints, conjointly with the Kingdom description of Isaiah, unless he fully and freely indorsed such a Jewish view? This testimony is plain and convincing, unless we charge Paul with prevarication. As an inspired man, as a follower of Gamaliel, as a preacher of the Kingdom, knowing the Jewish views, he could not give them such an indorsement unless it was true.

If Paul had not in 1 Cor. 15 explained the phrase, "He has swallowed up death in victory," then spiritualizers would undoubtedly have explained it away as denoting, probably, comfort or hope in death, etc. Indeed, some not satisfied with Paul's reference think that "death" in Isaiah denotes the woes or calamities of the Jewish nation, and this is done by Vitringa, Rosenmuller, Bush, etc., in order to make the Millennial predictions to correspond with the present state of the church. Against the express inter- pretation and application of Paul, they assert that "death" here is only "another term for all manner of grievous afflictions, persecutions, wars, pestilences, sicknesses, everything, in fact, of a deadly or desolating nature, everything which causes grief, mourning, and tribulation. A specimen worthy of Origen! But the multitude of our opposers do justice to Paul's quotation, and insist that a bodily resurrection is denoted. Barnes (Com. loci) only expresses the sentiments of these when he makes it refer to "death in its proper signification," to the fact "that He will abolish death," and that Paul's quoting it "is sufficient proof that it refers to the resurrection," etc. The context of Isa. 25 : 6-9, as will be shown hereafter, forbids its application to the present existing dispensation, because the events connected therewith can only be realized at the Sec. Advent. We certainly cannot be censured for our application of Hos. when even our bitter opponent Jerome (Art. "Jerome," Ency. Brit.) employs it (Hos. 6 : 2, 3) as referring to the res. of Jesus, and then to the regeneration of the human race through the same. Now the plural form "us" cannot refer to Jesus as an individual (unless we conceive Him as one of the brethren), but to the saints. He also applies Hos. 13 : 14 to the death and res. of Jesus.

Obs. 2. In Daniel 12, we have, according to the early Church and many eminent writers, a literal, twofold, and Pre-Millennial resurrection foretold. The English version gives, v. 2, "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." That the language indicates a literal resurrection is fully admitted even by those who spiritualize it, or who apply it to the time of the Maccabees; that it is expressive of or drawn from the doctrine of a literal resurrection all critics confess. "Sleep" used for death; "sleeping in the dust of the earth;" "awake" employed to denote restoration to life; this awaking of such sleepers to "everlasting life," all in the phraseology and contrast enforce such a meaning. To avoid the charge of forcing an interpretation, we shall rely on the renderings given by our opponents. Prof. Bush, a critical scholar, gives the following: "And many of the sleepers of the dust of the ground shall awake—these to everlasting life, and those to shame and everlasting contempt." He contends that the words in their precise meaning demand a twofold resurrection, one class being raised up to life while another are not then awakened. As to the latter part of the verse and the controversy originated by it, we may in this discussion pass it by, only saying, (1) if it has the meaning given by Bush, then it forms an additional argument in our favor; (2) but if the contrary, as Barnes and others, is to be received, viz., that the just and unjust are both raised at the same time, then it may be referred, as many do, to the resurrection of professed believers good and bad. The first part of the verse is sufficient to sustain our position, viz., that of a partial resurrection of the dead—a resurrection of some out of or from among all the sleepers in the dust of the earth. The awaking is predicated alone of the "many of" and not of all men. Those who resort to making "the many" consist of "all" are restricted by the peculiar, significant, and conclusive "many of." Hence we find the candid confession of Dr. Hody (Res. of the Body, p. 230): "I fully acknowledge that the word 'many' makes this text extremely difficult. I know what expositors say, but I am not satisfied with anything I have hitherto met with. Some tell us that 'many' is sometimes used in the Scriptures to signify 'all,' but this does not clear the difficulty; for there is a great difference between 'many' and 'many of.' All that sleep in the dust are many; but many of them that sleep in the dust cannot be said to be all they that sleep in the dust. 'Many of' does plainly except some." In the examination of various writers, all, without exception, acknowledge this restricted import, declaring that its removal does violence to the passage. The language then expresses a literal, partial resurrection. Now in its connection it describes a Pre-Millennial one, briefly, for the following reasons: (1) It is placed at the end of certain prophetic periods, which, as nearly all commentators agree, precede, or run down to, the commencement of the Millennial period; (2) it is connected with a deliverance of the people of God, pre-eminently characteristic of the beginning of the Millennial era; (3) it is identified with a period of great trouble, distress, etc., which, as many prophecies declare, precedes the ushering in of that age; (4) it is related to the period when the wicked shall be rooted out, etc., which is descriptive of the commencement of this age; (5) and the identifying of the promise annexed by Jesus Himself to the time immediately after the harvest, "then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun," for, as Joel and John show, the harvest immediately precedes the Millennial glory.*

<sup>1</sup> Surely we are correct when such men as Prof. Bush, who make a literal resurrection adumbrate "a moral quickening" and "future life," apply this to the "resuscitation of the dead mentioned in the Gospels," and especially to "that remarkable display of resurrection power put forth upon the many bodies of the saints that slept, which arose, and came out of their graves after his resurrection." Or, when Grotius, Amner, etc., following the interpretation of the heathen Porphyry, yet admit that the language is such as "to hint at the mystery of the resurrection." Besides this, the student well knows that a leading objection against the Book of Daniel by destructive critics is, that a literal resurrection is taught.

<sup>2</sup> Prof. Bush on "these" and "those" says: "The awaking is evidently predicted of the many and not of the whole; consequently the 'these' in the one case must be understood of the class that awake, and the 'those' in the other of that which remains asleep." Many others coincide in this opinion. Barnes (Com. loci) forcibly says: "The natural and obvious meaning of the word 'many' here is, that a large portion of the persons referred to would thus awake, but not all. So we should understand it, if applied to other things, as in such expressions as these: 'many of the people,' 'many of the houses in a city,' etc. Gesenius states that the word 'designates a part taken out of the whole.'" Hence we strongly object to some renderings which do not thus distinguish, as e.g. Knapp's (Ch. Theol., p. 529), who concedes a literal resurrection, but renders: "Those who lie asleep under the earth will awake; some to eternal life, others to everlasting shame and contempt." Such a version is evidently shaped by the opinion of a simultaneous resurrection of all the dead at the same time, and does manifest violence to the original, as urged by the best and most reliable of critics, and conceded (as shown) by the candid concessions of opponents. Prof. Whiting has: "And many from the sleepers of the dust of the ground shall awake, these to everlasting life, and those to reproaches and everlasting abhorrence." Winthrop, and others, "And many from out of the sleepers of the dust," etc. Brookes (Essays, p. 12, note), "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; these (the many raised ones) are destined to everlasting life—those (who remain in the graves) to shame and everlasting contempt;" so also Carlton and others. Many renderings give the same sense, the only change being in substituting "some" and "others" for "these" and "those," excepting Augustine's (City of God, b. 20, c. 23), who translates: "And many of them that sleep in the mound of the earth shall arise, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting confusion." In the Israelite Indeed, vol. 11, p. 210, Chaplin gives the following: "Many apart from those sleeping in the dust of the earth shall be awakened; these (the many awakened) shall have eternal life; and those (the remainder left sleeping) shall have the reproaches of eternity;" and Lederer (the editor) suggests: "And many from those who sleep in the earth-dust—or dust of the ground—shall be awakened; some to lives everlasting and some to shame and everlasting abhorrence." The reader can readily verify such renderings in various leading commentaries given by others, and therefore we only append, as an illustration, another given by Tregelles (On Dan., p. 156): "Many from among the sleepers of the dust of the earth shall awake; these shall be unto everlasting life; but these (the rest of the sleepers) shall be unto shame and everlasting contempt" (comp. Smith's Thoughts on Dan.), and observes: "I have given, I believe, the most literal rendering of the verse; it speaks of a resurrection, not the general when all shall be called forth, but of an eclectic character, 'many from among the sleepers.'" "This passage has been understood by the Jewish commentators in the sense that I have stated." Faussset (Com. loci) indorses Tregelles, saying, "the Jewish commentators support Tregelles," and remarks: "Not the general resurrection, but that of these who share in the first resurrection; the rest of the dead being not to rise till the end of the thousand years (Rev. 20 : 3, 5, 6, cf. 1 Cor. 15 : 23; 1 Thess. 4 : 16). Israel's national resurrection and the first resurrection of the elect Church, are similarly connected with the Lord's Coming forth out of His place to punish the earth in Isa. 26 : 19, 21, and 27 : 6; cf. Isa. 25 : 6-9" (Tregelles, p. 162, adds: "This translation is given as undoubtedly correct in Gerard Kerkherdere's Prodromus Danielicus," for "it is clearly not a general resurrection; it is 'many from among';" and it is only by taking the words in this sense that we gain any information as to what becomes of those who continue to sleep in the dust of the earth," and quotes in confirmation of such a twofold resurrection Jewish authorities, R. Saadiah Haggaoon and Aben Ezra.)

We are only concerned in insisting that a resurrection, and a twofold one, is clearly taught. That a resurrection is asserted is so plain that many (comp. Art. on "Resurrection" in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.) emphatically declare that it presents us "a clear and unequivocal declaration," and even such commentators as Scott (loci), ready to spiritualize predictions and promises, unhesitatingly teach that a resurrection of the dead is most obviously taught, but over against the impregnable "many of" refers it to "the general resurrection." The student will see for himself that any rendering approaching faithfulness to the original necessarily makes the resurrection of an eclectic nature. Dr. Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., p. 200) indeed makes "many of" to be "the multitude of," and insists that two classes are included in these "many," viz., "the good and the bad," which is then transformed into "all," and a simultaneous resurrection. Some writers take the position that this resurrection relates either to the Jewish nation or to the professing Church, or to both, and has the righteous and the mere professor raised at the same time, excluding the rest of the dead; others again think that a small moiety of the wicked are then raised up, as e.g. these who crucified Jesus, etc., while the vast body of the wicked dead remain until the close of the 1000 years; others again, the large majority, hold, as intimated, that only the saints are raised and the rest, who shall be awakened at some future time, remain in the dust of the earth. Still others, over against the implied awakening of both classes, make out that the last class never rise from the dead. Now the concise, abrupt language makes it requisite to interpret the passage according to the general analogy on the subject, which decidedly favors a partial, eclectic resurrection; the first clause referring exclusively to the righteous and their awakening as something separate and distinct from that of the wicked, while the last clause asserts the same fact given in Rev. 20 : 5. Should, however, the last part include mere professors, or some noted wicked (as some think), yet the eclectic character of the resurrection is unmistakably indicated, and a distinctive precedence of the righteous. The special attention of the student is called to the Jewish view (Bickersteth's Guide, p. 185, Brookes's Essays, p. 12, etc.) which restricts the resurrection. Thus Aben Ezra in his Com., as quoted by various writers, says: "Those who awake shall be (appointed) to everlasting life, and those who awake not shall be (doomed) to shame and everlasting contempt." Gaon says, "This is the resuscitation of the dead of Israel, whose lot is to eternal life, and those who shall not awake are the forsaken of Jehovah." So also the Sohar, Midrash Mishle, 4 Esdras 2, Torath Adam, etc. Pococke, Lightfoot, Mede, and others, have produced Rabbinical statements showing the Jewish belief in a limited corporeal resurrection when the Kingdom of the Messiah shall be instituted, and Lightfoot and others (under the misapprehension that the Christian Church was this Kingdom, and overlooking the Jewish restoration, etc., linked with this resurrection) have actually pointed to the cases of resurrection recorded in the Gospels as "parallel to the expectations of the Jews," and therefore a proof that Jesus was the Messiah. Bertholdt, Kranichfeld, Fuller, Köstlin (Lange's Com. Dan. loci) and others refer these raised ones solely to the Jewish nation. While there is force in this exclusive notion (because Daniel's predictions relate to the destiny of the Jewish nation), yet in it we must also (as hitherto shown in detail) include the engrafted, adopted sons and daughters of Abraham, accounted worthy of so high an honor.

Obs. 3. But we have stronger evidence than this even in the chapter, for the resurrection of the righteous being mentioned; God graciously assures Daniel himself that he shall be among those many thus favored. In verse 12, we read: "But go thou thy way till the end be; for thou shalt rest and stand in thy lot, at the end of the days." It being foreign to our design to discuss prophetic periods, it is only necessary to say that, taking the admissions of a host of Anti-Millenarians and others, these prophetic days being, in accord with prophetic usage, years, no matter what period is assigned to their commencement, they require many centuries before their close. And hence the promise to Daniel at "the end of the days" is to be witnessed, after a long series of years has passed, even, as many contend, extending down to the Millennial age. At least, if we limit these periods to literal days, there is not a particle of proof that the promise was realized in Daniel's case.' Down to the present day Daniel has not yet stood up in his lot, and, if we leave due weight to one pregnant expression, we can plainly see the reason why it is not yet fulfilled—"when He shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." Then the end of these days has come, and then God's promise is verified; not sooner and not later. But look at history and the facts as they exist to-day. Are not the Jewish people still dispersed and their power scattered among the nations of the earth? Is not Jerusalem itself still trodden down by Gentiles? How, then, can it be said that God's purpose in reference to this people has been accomplished in this respect, when we see it going on before our eyes? No! the end has not yet come, but as God's promises are sure, and now Yea and Amen in Christ, when the end of Jewish tribulation and dispersion comes a glorious resurrection also comes in which Daniel will participate. In noticing the promise, it is legitimate to avail ourselves of the admissions of those who oppose our Millenarian views, and it ought to be accepted as impartial evidence. Barnes (Com. Dan. loci), after showing that Daniel could not possibly have lived during the entire period of the events previously enumerated without experiencing death, advocates the standing up at the end of the days to mean a literal resurrection, saying: "This is admitted by Lengerke, by Maurer, and even by Bertholdt, to be the meaning, although he applies it to the reign of the Messiah. No other interpretation, therefore, can be affixed to this, than that it implies the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and that the mind of Daniel was directed onward to that. With this great and glorious doctrine the book appropriately closes." The death of Daniel, before the events predicted come to pass, is announced in the "for thou shalt rest." This is appropriate language in view of the previous "sleep in the dust." But we again leave Barnes explain: "During that long interval Daniel would 'rest.' He would quietly and calmly 'sleep in the dust of the earth,' in the grave." "I do not see that it is possible to explain the language on any other supposition than this. The word rendered 'shalt rest' would be well applied to the rest in the grave. So it is used in Job 3 : 13 'then had I been at rest,' Job 3 : 17, 'there the weary be at rest.'" The language of the promise, too, implies the personal presence of Daniel at the time the end shall be. More than this, it is requisite, for then he is to obtain his "lot." Now, whatever meaning is attached to "the lot," whether of station, rank, degree, etc., it is certain from numerous promises that Christians are represented as receiving their "lot" after the resurrection is experienced. Daniel receives his portion or reward allotted to him by God. But when? Turning to Rev. 11 : 15-18, under the last trumpet, preceding the Millennial era, we find "the time of the dead that they should be judged and that Thou shouldest give reward unto

Thy servants, the prophets." Such is the striking harmony of the utterances of the divine Spirit, indicating a Pre-Millennial resurrection.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This is attempted by a class of interpreters who may be justly styled Antiochus Epiphinites, since they find nothing in these predictions (concluding part of 11th ch. and the 12th) but what relates to Antiochus. They sustain about the same relation to us that Porphyry did to many in the third century. But they utterly fail to show such a fulfilment as the prophecy demands, both as to time and matter. It is to be regretted that some able writers have, more or less, received of their leaven. Even Auberlen (On Dan.) thinks that the mention in verse 2 of the resurrection was merely to incite to faithful perseverance in the persecutions of Antiochus, because the phrase "at that time" is omitted, and hence that there is no chronological connection. But this certainly can only be adduced in support of the Antiochan theory, seeing that the emphasis being twice given in verse 1, it would have been mere redundancy to repeat; that Daniel's resurrection stands related to the same period; that the resurrection is associated in Scripture with the time of deliverance of the nation; that the general complexion of the prediction, as well as the unity of Scripture, demands a fulfilment in chronological connection. Some take the dates given as referring to days, but link them with the same periods in Rev. pertaining to Antichrist's career (with good reasons), but there is one serious antagonism, viz., Daniel's resurrection follows the end of these in Daniel, but (Apoc. 11 : 18) precedes those of Rev.

<sup>2</sup> Even Augustine (City of God, b. 20, c. 23) interprets Dan. 12 : 13 as referring to Daniel's literal resurrection. Daniel is among "the prophets" who are rewarded when the Millennial period commences. The happiness of the one class is mentioned, giving them a certain precedence, and is linked with the restoration of the Jews. The original division of the holy land by lot, led to all portions, appointments being called lots, and this has been introduced into the New Test., as many critics have noticed. Daniel's lot which he receives may be seen, e.g. in Acts 26 : 18; Eph. 1 : 15, 16, etc., where the Greek word is either "lot" or "allotted portion," as noticed by commentators. The resurrection of Daniel, it may be added, utterly disproves the theory of Universalists, Swedenborgians, and others, and recently advocated, as the teaching of Jesus, by Reuss (His. Ch. Theol., p. 221), "that there can be no interval between the present life and the future, between death and the resurrection," for Daniel was to be raised up, not at or immediately after his death, but at the end of the days, i.e. after the interval of a certain, well-defined period of time. The same is confirmed by the resurrection of Jesus, the resurrection of saints at the resurrection of Jesus, the saints under the altar, which also had an interval. Faber (Diss. on Prop., p. 97, foot-note), when he comes to this passage, is forced to admit that "it gives some warrant to Mr. Mede's opinion, that the first resurrection, which precedes the Millennium, . . . will be a literal resurrection of the saints and martyrs." Fausset (Com. loci) comments on the "rest" in the grave. He, like his people Israel, was to wait patiently and confidently for the blessing till God's time. He "received not the promise," but had to wait until the Christian elect saints should be brought in, at the first resurrection, that he and the other Old Test. saints "without us should not be made perfect" (Heb. 11 : 46). Barbour (Three Worlds) endeavors to make the resurrection of Dan. 12, because the expression "thy people" is used, to refer exclusively to Jewish people according to the flesh and not to the Gospel Church (the book being "the writing of the house of Israel," Ezek. 13 : 9). It is true that the resurrection refers to "the house of Israel," Daniel's people, but it is equally true (as our line of argument has proven step by step) that true members of the Christian Church are connected by virtue of engrafting and adoption with this house, being regarded as "the children of Abraham," and hence participate in all the blessings of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. We dare not narrow down, as some do, "the first-born" to Christian believers and exclude the worthies of the Hebrews, when the covenant foundation, inheritance, etc., are the same. The prophets describe the house of Israel as amazed when through the power of the resurrection these "children of Abraham" are revealed and exalted. Zöchler (Lange's Com. Dan. loci.) explains this passage relating to Daniel: "Thou shalt rest in the grave, in the quiet sleep of death (cf. Isa. 57 : 2, and supra v. 2)," "that thou mayest receive thy portion of the inheritance at the judgment of eternal recompense; cf. ch. 7 : 18, 27; Rev. 20 : 6." He remarks respecting "the lot" that it refers to "the inheritance of the saints in light (Col. 1 : 12), which shall be possessed by the righteous after the resurrection of the dead in the heavenly Jerusalem." He says that with this view agree "a majority of interpreters."

Obs. 4. However ultra it may seem to some, we are willing to, and readily do, accept of Ezek. 37 : 1-14 as teaching a Pre-Millennial resurrection. This view was held by the Jews (e.g. 2 Esdras 2 : 16, 23, 31), by the early Church (being quoted by Irenæus, Fifth B. Ag. Heresies, Justin, in 1st Apol., Tertullian in chs. 29, 30, On the Res. of the Flesh, and Greg. Nazianzen, Funer. Oration, e.g. by others), and by different writers from that period to the present. Some authors, not entirely satisfied with a figurative application, give a twofold fulfilment, one a spiritual or civil, and the other literal, as e.g. Dr. Clarke, Com. loci, who also admits that it has an ultimate reference to "the resurrection of the body." Others, as Rationalists, etc., receive it as teaching a literal resurrection, but reject it as a "Jewish figment." While still others, as Delitzsch (Sys. of Bib. Psyc., p. 485, in response to Hofman, who advocated that Isa. 26 : 19 and Ezek. 37 : 1-14 contained figures of restoration), and many Millenarians, hold that such a literal resurrection is taught as covenant promises require. The reasons which influence us to such a belief are the following : (1) The explanation given by God Himself of the vision indicates a literal resurrection. The vision of the dry bones extends from v. 1 to 10, and if this were all, then, indeed, we might be at a loss to determine its exact meaning, but God appends to it an explanation ; and, like in all explanatory clauses, we have no right to spiritualize them away. It is weakness to place the vision and the explanation in the same category, and treat the one like the other. We dare not, without disrespect to the Divine explanation, make it denote something quite different from what the words truly and actually represent. Keeping in view the distinction, overlooked by the multitude, between the vision and its interpretation by the Spirit, how else can we receive the words, unless teaching the doctrine we claim, when it says : "I will open your graves and cause you to come up out of your graves," etc. (2) It is scarcely consistent for the resurrection of the body (whatever may be true of the simple word resurrection) to be taken as a figure or symbol of the renovation of the soul, seeing that in the Scriptures a moral change of the soul is uniformly held to be a prelude to a blessed resurrection of the body unto life. This would be reversing the order of events, and involving a certain incongruity. It is nowhere done unless this and Rev. 20 form exceptions to a general rule. (3) The language, "Behold they say, 'our bones are dried and our hope is lost,'" shows that a corporeal resurrection is meant. For, if we turn to Ps. 141 : 7, this is the expressive complaint of the house of Israel, "our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood on the earth," and God here gives the assurance that these very "bones scattered at the grave's mouth," shall be again raised up. In the 89th Ps., where this lost hope is plaintively presented, we have the covenant, and the assurance that David's Son shall gloriously reign on David's throne ; then follows, however, the prediction of the casting down of David's crown and throne to the ground, of the cast-off condition of the nation and the non-fulfilment of the covenant, and the question is asked, "How long ?" Then follows : "Remember how short my time is ; wherefore hast Thou made all men in vain ? What man is he that liveth and shall not see death ? Shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave ? Lord, where are Thy former lovingkindnesses which Thou swarest unto David in Thy truth ?" How is this hope so lost, even absorbed by the all-devouring grave, to be realized ? The plain, God-given answer comes to us in this passage of Ezekial, if we will only receive it. Here the question asked in Ps. 35 : 10 is replied to ; and prophet after prophet assures us that when this shall occur "those bones shall flourish as an herb." It is in accord with this that David in Ps. 31 affirms that although his "bones are consumed" and in his "haste" he said, "I am cut off from before Thine eyes," he will trust in God for deliverance, because the wicked alone shall "be ashamed" and "be silent in the grave." This confidence is again and again declared, so that the bones given over into "the hand of the grave" shall "come up out of the grave." God says that the house of Israel declares "our hope is lost and we are cut off." In Lam. 3 : 18, we read, "And I said, my strength and my hope is perished from the Lord," but farther on the prophet again professes hope "for the Lord will not cast off forever . . . to crush under His feet all the prisoners of the earth." No ! some of those "prisoners of the earth," which (as we shall hereafter show) are the dead that the earth holds in confinement, which are now "dwelling in the dust" (Isa. 26 : 19), "the earth shall cast out." The "prisoners of hope," Zech. 9 : 12, shall be delivered according to the "hope toward God," expressed by Paul, Acts 24 : 15. The analogy of faith, the appeal of God to words connected with corporeal death, and the stubborn fact itself that the covenant given by God to Abraham and David cannot possibly be realized until the enemy death, which holds its chosen ones, is overcome, these things prove, what so many pious have joyfully accepted, a literal resurrection, by which the grave is made to surrender those to whom precious covenant promises were made. Now, indeed, the enemy triumphs ; they are cut off "from the land of the living ;" faith and hope almost falters at the gloomy prospect ; wise men here and there declare it is folly to expect its realization ; scientists insist upon its impossibility ; even good men think it too much to anticipate, and explain it away ; but God, the Almighty, points to this very faltering faith and hope, produced by literal death, and in His gracious majesty speaks : "Then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it and performed it." How can we change God's words or challenge His work ? (4) The emphatic language here is corroborated by other examples. Thus e.g. when we keep in view how the Jews understood this vision and explanation, then the language of Jesus addressed to Jews is a confirmation of a literal resurrection. For in John 5 : 28, 29 the expression of Ezekiel is almost repeated "all that are in their graves" shall "come forth," and this, too, in connection with what He said, that this raising up shall be (e.g. John 6 : 39, 40, 44) "at the last day" as the Jews held (comp. John 11 : 24).<sup>2</sup> Again, Hos. 13 : 14, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave," etc., contains the same ideas, and Paul applies it directly to the resurrection of the righteous. Hence, in view of the application of similar language by Jesus and Paul, corroborating Jewish views of Ezekiel, we cordially accept of it in the same spirit. (5) The expression "bring you into the land of Israel," which has led so many to apply this figuratively to a "national restoration," under the supposition that mortal men in this life are only alluded to, is, instead of a stumbling-block, indispensable in such a resurrection. The covenant, if Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are to personally inherit the land, the covenant promises, if the meek are to inherit the land, etc., absolutely *demand*s just such bringing of the dead ones into the land of Israel, the promised inheritance. Ezekiel only establishes what the Millennial descriptions present, viz., a return of the ransomed of the Lord to this identical land, as the most sacred of God's assurances declare. (6) This description of the prophet is too sublime and wide-reaching in its sweep to be regarded as fulfilled in the weak and partial restoration of the Jews under the Persian kings and afterward. The facts are not equal to the representation; and the Jews themselves, who experienced this restoration, had no such idea of its performance. It is a belittling of the prophecy to confine it to such an event; it is a dwindling away of God's appeal in reference to the knowledge obtained of His Omnipotence when this should occur; it is a frittering away of the promised gathering of "the whole house of Israel," of the implied continued prosperity, of the union, strength, etc., then granted to them. No! greater, inestimable greater blessings than God's people have ever yet realized are embraced in this precious promise, even those connected with a literal, Pre-Millennial resurrection.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Because so many commentators, while admitting that the language is derived from the doctrine of the resurrection, yet, interpret it either as a moral or spiritual renovation, or an ecclesiastical or civil or national restoration. Jerome was one among the first who applied this vision to the restoration of the Jews, and yet he is forced to admit that it is "a similitude drawn from the resurrection." But as these writers also profess to find but little of a resurrection in the Old Test., how could a similitude drawn from such a source, if unknown, be of any force if the doctrine of the resurrection were not one already familiar?

<sup>2</sup> Even in verse 25, while we need not discard the idea of a moral renovation yet it is not necessary for a consistent interpretation with existing facts, seeing that the "now is" may be referred to the literal resurrection of the actual dead raised to life by Jesus, and the dead raised by Him at His own resurrection, which occurred at this period. It may be added: Surely the partial quotation of Ezekiel and the application made of it by Jesus, should cause us to receive with caution the idea (Calvin, etc.) that it is a mere image or similitude drawn from the resurrection. In reference to the use of the word "graves," while we hold this to be literal and for good reasons, we are satisfied with the concession and argument of one of our opponents, who by his reasoning on Christ's language entirely demolishes his own interpretation given to Ezekiel. Thus Barnes, Com. John 5 : 29, says: "He speaks of those who are in their graves, evidently referring to the dead. Sinners are sometimes said to be dead in sin, but sinners are not said to be in a grave. This is applied in the Scriptures only to those who are deceased." If this is true, what becomes of his own spiritualizing of Ezekiel's vision? Augustine and others suppose that in John 5 : 25, 26, because of the phrase "now is," there is a reference to a spiritual or moral resurrection. But this is opposed to the facts as they took place. "The hour is coming" alludes to the great predicted time coming of a bodily resurrection; "and now is" indicates that even now, at that time, a bodily resurrection was to be experienced in the few raised by Jesus, in the resurrection of Himself and of the many at His resurrection. The entire connection and parallel passages show a reference to a bodily resurrection, for if it is to be limited, as Augustine, etc., it proves too much for their own theory, viz., it would confine moral renovation, etc., to the time after the First Advent and exclude that experienced previously.

<sup>3</sup> To give the reader an idea how this passage is interpreted we append two illustrations. Romaine (Crit. Review, vol. 2) has a sermon on Ezek. 37 : 4, etc., "The Parable of the Dry Bones." He frankly tells us that every word applicable to a sensible object conveys an idea of some corresponding spiritual object, or teaches heavenly things under the garb of earthly (i.e. at the option of the interpreter). But after all it has two meanings: (1) That the Jewish Church, led away captive to Babylon, was restored to its civil and ecclesiastical life or polity; (2) that the dry bones indicate deadness in sin, and the resurrection a revival to newness of life—dryness is equivalent to exceeding deadness of the sinful soul, shaking is a perturbation in the soul of the sinner, coming together denotes merely externals and no life until the Spirit comes and converts. Waldegrave in his Lectures gives this as the signification: "They (the imagery) signify that the Israelitish people, which had long lain politically and ecclesiastically dead, should be, by the mighty hand of their God, recovered from that state, and become once more a flourishing church and state." Strange that men can fritter away this magnificent prophecy in an application to the feeble condition and oppressed state of the Jewish nation after the Babylonian captivity. Take the spiritualizing method and apply it to any Scripture, and see the result. The plainest passages dwindle away before its transforming power.

Thus e.g. apply it to Matt. 27 : 52, 53, and it may be said "the graves were opened" means delivered from bondage; "and many bodies of the saints which slept, arose," denotes that "sleeping" they were ignorant, blind, deluded, but "arising" they were morally quickened; "and came out of their graves," that is, out of their bondage, etc. This is, to say the least, a deceptive way of dealing with Scripture (comp. Prop. 4). The utter inconsistency of our opponents' position is thus made manifest. Coming to Rev. 20 : 4-6, they tell us that if a literal resurrection is meant, it should be stated that the saints come "out of the graves," receive their "bodies," etc. But that this, even if given, would make no material difference, and that it would be explained away like the rest, is made apparent from the treatment which Ezekiel's vision meets with at their hands—for here, where the fact of coming "out of the graves," etc., is mentioned, the resurrection is still denied. Many concessions, however, might easily be gathered from our opponents which vitiate their own system. Even Barrow (Works, vol. 2, p. 565), on the resurrection of the body, quotes Ezek. 37 as sustaining the notion of a literal resurrection. Parallel passages are admitted to refer to a resurrection, as e.g. Augustine (City of God, b. 20, ch. 21) explains Isa. 66 : 12-16, to be realized after the Sec. Advent, and that "your bones shall rise up as an herb" alludes "to the resurrection," "a bodily resurrection." The Jews (comp. e.g. Westminster Review, Oct., 1861, p. 246) held that Ezek. 37 taught a literal resurrection, and Paul in Acts 26 : 6, 7, evidently alludes to this belief when (as Clarke Com. loci) he speaks of "the hope of the resurrection of the dead," to which hope realized "the tribes" expect "to come" (and to which Paul, as Bh. Pearce shows, using the same word, also hopes, Phil. 3 : 11, "to come" or "attain to"). Incidental proof abounds showing that this resurrection is linked with the Kingdom. Thus e.g. Luke 14 : 15 affords one. For after Christ had indicated to the Pharisees how to make a feast that he might "be recompensed at the resurrection of the just," one who sat at meat, associating, as the Jews were accustomed to do, this allusion to the resurrection with the Kingdom, said : "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the Kingdom of God." Christ in His reply confirms this association of ideas, for instead of correcting it as erroneous, He virtually indorses it by stating that all are invited to such blessedness, but that many reject it, etc. Jerome, Scott, Lowth, literally hundreds, while spiritualizing or misapplying the prediction, declare that "it was also a clear intimation of the resurrection of the dead," being "a similitude drawn from the resurrection." But is it a similitude? And if such where then was the doctrine of a resurrection taught?

To indicate how the earliest Fathers of the Church interpreted this and other passages, we quote Irenæus (Ag. Her., ch. 37) as follows : "Isaiah plainly declares (ch. 26 : 19) similar happiness at the resurrection of the just : thus saying, 'Thy dead men shall arise, and those in the tombs shall rise, and they shall rejoice who are in the earth. For thy dew is salvation to them. Ezekiel says (ch. 37 : 12, 14) the same, 'Behold, I will open your graves, and lead you forth from your tombs, in order that I may lead forth from their sepulchres my people, and I will put the Spirit in you, and ye shall know that I am the Lord.'" This he applies to the Pre-Millennial resurrection of the just, in order that covenant promises may be verified. Many learned men, under the lofty self-exalting influence of spiritualizing, smile at the alleged simplicity and ignorance of such Fathers, when the latter evidence a far greater logical consistency than the former. Perhaps the most flippant of all objections is that urged by Schröder (Lange's Com. Ezek., p. 354) in declaring : "They are, however, not the bones of deceased men, but of slain men, as expressly stated in v. 9." A mere tyro need only refer to a concordance under the words "slay," "slain," etc., and he will find that all that fall under the enemy death are also thus represented. Besides he does not, in his attenuated interpretation, show how such slain ones are restored. In reference to "the whole house of Israel," we only now say that it includes the dead of Judah and Israel, together with all the engrafted "children of Abraham."

Obs. 5. Numerous passages plainly teach a Pre-Millennial resurrection. Thus, e.g. Jer. 31 : 15-17, "a voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children refused to be comforted for her children, because they were not. Thus saith the Lord: Refrain thy voice from weeping and thine eyes from tears; for thy work shall be rewarded, saith the Lord; and they shall come again from the land of the enemy. And there is hope in thine end, saith the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border." This is applied (Matt. 2 : 17, 18) to a literal slaughter, and the resurrection promised is also literal. But this does not fulfil the entire promise; for it includes not only a raising up from the dead, a return from the land of the enemy death, but a return, a "coming again to their own border," to the very land where the enemy triumphed over them. The time when this is to take place is specified in the context, v. 10-14, when Jacob is "redeemed and ransomed from the hand of him that was stronger than he."<sup>1</sup> The same spirit characterizes Hannah's prayer (1 Sam. 2), which the Chaldee version (Dr. Clarke) says, "And Hannah prayed in the spirit of prophecy," in which the resurrection is pointedly predicted, "the Lord killeth and maketh alive; He bringeth down to the grave and bringeth up." The Jews (see Targums, quoted by Dr. Clarke, Com. loci) so understood it. But this is connected even with a period when vengeance comes, the righteous are exalted, and the "wicked are silent in darkness;" and if reference is made to the parallel passage in Deut. 32 : 39, it is also connected with a time of vengeance, deliverance of God's people, and God's land." The faith that David expressed in Ps. 142, 116, 27, etc., of finally walking before, or in the presence of, the Lord "in the land of the living," is one in such a resurrection. This is seen by noticing the context, and by comparing of Scripture. Thus in Ps. 142 he describes his trouble by which he is brought "very low," even into "prison" (which a comparison shows is the grave), for his enemy is stronger than he. But he expresses the hope that God will be his "portion in the land of the living," and that God will "bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise Thy name; the righteous shall compass me about; for Thou shalt deal bountifully with me." In Ps. 116, he is plainer, telling us that "the sorrows of death compassed me and the pains of hell got hold upon me." He then prays that God would "deliver my soul," adding his trust: "Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with me. For Thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears and my feet from falling. I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living." This faith, in an ultimate happy deliverance from the power of death, causes him to say: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints;" and, exulting in the hope set before him, declares, "Thou hast loosed my bonds," and that he, David, shall praise "in the Lord's house, in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem." Here, then, death is an enemy; David fell under this enemy and is bound by him in a prison; but he shall yet triumph over this enemy through the power of God; he shall return again to the promised rest, praise God, associate with all the righteous, and enjoy the blessings of Jerusalem." The detention in the grave is figuratively represented by "a prison," "prisoner," "captive," "captivity," etc. In Isa. 42 : 7; 61 : 1; 49 : 9, etc., where it is promised that Christ shall "bring out the prisoners from the prison and them that sit in the darkness out of the prison house," that He shall bestow "liberty to the captives and the opening of the prison to them that are bound," these things primarily describe the resurrection, for the simple reason that "the year of the Lord" and the restoration and blessings promised in immediate connection cannot be inaugurated, according to the tenor of prophecy, without such a resurrection.<sup>4</sup> The people now are given up as a prey to the enemy death, and are forcibly represented as "hid in prison houses," Isa. 42 : 22, as "prisoners resting together" Job 3 : 18, as "prisoners of the earth," Sam. 3 : 34, as "the lawful captives," or (marg. reading) "the captivity of the just," Isa. 49 : 24, etc. This idea accords with Ps. 79, where, after describing the desolations of Jerusalem, the fact that "the blood" of the saints has been shed and their "dead bodies" have been exposed, the Psalmist significantly asks: "How long, O Lord?" Then praying for God's help, he says: "Let the sighing of the prisoner come before Thee; according to the greatness of Thy power preserve Thou those that are appointed to die." What the Prophet means by this is apparent from Ps. 102, where, after complaining that "days are consumed," that he is "cast down" and "withered like grass," he relies on the blessed truths that God "endures forever," that He shall "arise and have mercy on Zion," adding "when the Lord shall build up Zion, He shall appear in His glory" (not humiliation), "He will regard the prayer of the destitute and not despise their prayer. This shall be written for the generation to come; and the people which shall be created shall praise the Lord. For, He hath looked down from the height of His sanctuary; from heaven did the Lord behold the earth; to hear the groaning of the prisoner; to loose those that are appointed to death (Heb. the children of death); to declare the name of the Lord in Zion and His praise in Jerusalem; when the people are gathered together, and the Kingdoms, to serve the Lord." What else, if the prayer of these prisoners is ever answered, but a Pre-Millennial resurrection is to be anticipated? For, taking such passages together, what have we here but a reference by the prophet to his own death and to dead saints, to the ability of God to raise them up or deliver them, to "the set time to favor Zion," which is to come when the Lord shall appear the second time unto salvation, and this prayer to be released from death shall be answered, to a joyful gathering of the people to praise the Lord in Jerusalem, when "the children of death" shall be loosened? If we were only prepared to receive it, we would find the Bible full of this Divine Purpose, and that the unity of the Spirit teaches it again and again, sometimes briefly, or concisely, or even obscurely, and sometimes openly and more fully. Even in such a Ps. as the 69th, faith grasps the resurrection, in the words: "The Lord heareth the poor and despiseth not His prisoners," for death is brought before us in the preceding verses, when suddenly the strain is changed into exultation, and we are told that the prisoner shall be released, and they shall return with praise to the holy land.

<sup>1</sup> The application made by Matthew of the passage in Jeremiah forbids our receiving the common interpretation that the prophecy refers to the captivity of the Jews, etc. The phraseology is indicative of death, and deliverance from the same; a reunion with Rachel is implied, and in their own land, thus corresponding with covenant promise. Fausset (Com. loci) correctly declares that this is "to be fulfilled ultimately, when Rachel shall meet her murdered children at the resurrection, at the same time that literal Israel is to be restored." This is in agreement with Moses, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and others. This passage is intensely interesting, because it answers the question whether little children (comp. with Matthew) will participate in this resurrection. The answer is given by God Himself in the affirmative. Those who apply it to the past restoration from captivity belittle the promise.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Etheridge's Targums gives the following: The Targum of Palestine, "When the Word of the Lord shall reveal Himself to redeem His people, He will say to all nations: Behold now, that I am He who Am and Was, and Will Be, and there is no other God beside Me; I, in my Word, kill and make alive; I smite the people of the Beth Israel and I will heal them at the end of the days; and there will be none who can deliver them from my hand, Gog and his armies whom I have permitted to make war against them." The Jerusalem Targum, "See now that I in my Word am He and there is no other God beside Me. I kill the living in this world and make alive the dead in the world that cometh; I am He who smiteth and I am He who healeth, and there is none who can deliver from my hand." See the context.

<sup>3</sup> The reader will notice how this was interpreted as relating to the resurrection by the early Church and retained as late as A. D. 476, as seen in the extract we have given, Prop. 75, taken from Gelasius of Cysicus. If the Psalms, etc., are examined from this covenanted standpoint many allusions are based on this doctrine of a resurrection assumed. Thus e.g., in Ps. 52, we have the wicked "rooted out of the land of the living" and the righteous in safety and exalted, corresponding with the tenor of the Word. In Ps. 56, after asserting that God would "deliver my soul from death," it is "that I may walk before God in the light of the living." Ps. 41 : 8, 10, which even Augustine (City of God, b. 17, ch. 18) refers to a resurrection, implies it by "the raising up" and "by this I know that Thou favorest me because mine enemy doth not triumph over me." In the Analysis of Ps. 118 Dr. Clarke, Com. loci., refers the day of verse 24 to the day of resurrection, but we would rather refer it to the Millennial day, the blessed day of Christ, preceded by a reference to the resurrection in the words: "I shall not die," i.e. shall not always be under the dominion of death (comp. John 6 : 54, 58), "but live and declare the words of the Lord. The Lord hath chastened me sore; but He hath not given me over to death." The "prisoners of hope," Zech. 9 : 11-12, are released out of "the pit" in virtue of "the blood" of the "covenant." This we have shown, and therefore Christ has power over death to deliver His own. The context shows when these prisoners are released, viz., at a period of restoration.

<sup>4</sup> If we take the English version of Isa. 53 : 8, Jesus Himself was "a prisoner," i.e. as many explain it, experienced "a detention by death." Bush (Anas.) argues at length that the passage refers to the resurrection of Jesus. Admit this, and the reader can see how much Scripture receives new light and direction from Christ's death and resurrection thus represented. It may be added that Calmet and others think that the phrase "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints" means that "the saints are too precious in the Lord's sight, lightly to give them over to death," for "death shall be swallowed up in victory," etc.

Obs. 6. So interesting is this subject and abundant the material (showing how the Spirit regards it), that the reader will pardon us, if additional illustrations are given. Thus the word "hell" is used to denote the grave.<sup>1</sup> If we turn to Ps. 86, the hope is expressed, "Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell" (marg. reading is "grave"), and while praise is tendered for such deliverance, the wicked shall be "ashamed." Other passages could be adduced, but let us take a clearer one, the representation of the grave by "the land of darkness," "the shadow of death," "darkness," etc. (Job 10 : 21, 22; Ps. 88 : 18; Eccl. 6 : 4; Pa. 143 : 3, etc.). In various predictions the saints are to be delivered from this darkness, just as the Millennial era is to be ushered in, and this prepares us the better to appreciate the force of Col. 1 : 12, 13, "Giving thanks unto the Father which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light; who" (at the time the inheritance is given) "hath delivered us from the power of darkness" (the grave or place of the dead), "and hath translated us into the Kingdom of His dear Son." That this "power of darkness" refers to the enemy death or grave is proven by the use made of the expression by Jesus, Luke 22 : 53, who, when the Jews came with stones and swords to take Him, knowing the predetermined result death and the grave, said: "This is your hour and the power of darkness" (comp. John 12 : 27; Micah 7 : 8, etc.). So the reverse of darkness, viz., "light," is employed to denote the removal of the darkness of the grave at the resurrection morn, and forms a remarkable feature in the opening, etc., of Millennial descriptions. The manner in which the Spirit introduces the words "enemy," "sleep," "prey," "pit," "awake," "dust," "quick-en," etc., shows how prominently the notion of a Pre-Millennial resurrection is incorporated in the Scriptures. Let us e.g. take "quicken," which Paul forcibly employs in Rom. 8 to prove that God will fulfil His promise to Abraham to be "heir of the world," and that "the promise might be made sure to all the seed," by saying: "God who quickeneth the dead." (Comp. Rom. 8 : 11 ; 4 : 17 ; John 5 : 21 ; Ps. 3 : 18.) Now, allow this New Test. confirmatory usage to be adopted as an interpreting guide, and we have Ps. 71 pointedly expressing this resurrection: "Thou shalt quicken me again and shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth;" and then speaks of his "greatness" being increased here on the earth. Comp. Ps. 80 : 17, 18 ; Ps. 143 : 11, etc., keeping in view the key note given by 1 Pet. 3 : 18, where Christ Himself is raised from the dead, being "quickeneth." This becomes decisive when the fact is observed that the resurrection from the dead is represented as "a birth," "a begetting," "a regeneration." Notice that Christ's resurrection is (Heb. 1 : 5, 6, comp. with Acts 13 : 33 ; Rom. 8 : 29, etc.) a begetting or being born again, so that He is, in virtue of this second birth, called, Col. 1 : 18, "the first-born from the dead," and in Rev. 1 : 5, "the first begotten of the dead."* What a flood of light this phraseology throws on the Pre-Millennial resurrection; for surely, if the appropriate figure of a birth is thus applied to the resurrection of the Head, designedly too, we are not perverting the Word if we accept of the same in reference to the members. Let us see what the Spirit says, e.g. in Isa. 66 : 7, 8, 9, "Before she travailed, she brought forth; before her pain came, she was delivered of a manchild. Who hath heard such a thing? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? Or, shall a nation be born at once? For, as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children. Shall I bring to the birth and not cause to bring forth? saith the Lord; shall I cause to bring forth and shut the womb? said the Lord," etc. Here we have the earth (not church) bringing forth at the appearing of the Lord (v. 5), at a time of vengeance (v. 6), at the ushering in of Millennial glory (v. 10-14), at a time when the wicked are to be ashamed and utterly removed (v. 5, 15, etc.), at the time new heavens and new earth are created (v. 22), at a gathering and overthrow of nations, etc. And, moreover, those thus born are to enjoy this very Millennial blessedness, while the wicked are so cut off as to become "an abhorring to all flesh." This corresponds precisely with the statements of events preceding the Millennium; while the suddenness of the event, the brevity of time in which it is accomplished, the astounding and unexampled nature of the occurrence, all confirms its denoting the resurrection. Then Micah 5 : 3, 4 has a remarkable disclosure on this point; for after describing the smiting of the Judge of Israel, the very Ruler of Israel that came to them, the result of that smiting, as witnessed by us in the rejection of the Jewish nation during the times of the Gentiles, is alluded to: "Therefore will He give them up until the time that she which travaileth hath brought forth." This birth is delayed during the dispersion of the Jews; it is not to be experienced until the time when their restoration comes; it is connected with a revelation of the strength and majesty of Christ's rule. Hence this being born again, this regeneration is referred by Jesus to the future in Matt. 19 : 28, to the period when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory," and the apostles shall "sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." For the word translated "regeneration" means "born again," and was anciently employed to denote the resurrection. Now, the reader is prepared for an additional reason for believing Ezekiel's resurrection to be a literal one, viz., the clause, which above all others is supposed to teach a spiritual one, "And shall put My Spirit in you, and ye shall live." This Spirit is put in these dead ones that are in their graves, and this corresponds with Rom. 8 : 11. Therefore, this Spirit is called in 1 Cor. 15, "a quickening Spirit" (Barnes, loci, "a vivifying Spirit, giving or imparting life"). This quickening or birth is performed by Christ (John 5 : 21, 26, etc.), and Paul in 2 Cor. 3, in his argument to show that the covenant is to be fulfilled by the Spirit giving life, says : "Now the Lord is that Spirit," and when this is done we find announced in Phil. 3 : 20, 21, "from whence (heaven) we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is able to subdue all things unto Himself." It is this resurrection Spirit that God promises in Ezekiel to give, that the dead may live, for they, too, are (Eph. 1 : 13) "sealed with the Holy Spirit, of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession." This again is confirmed by the use of "redeemed," "ransomed," etc., and the phraseology of Hos. 13 : 14, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave ; I will redeem them from death," and of Paul, Rom. 8 : 23, "the redemption of the body," is amply sufficient to illustrate the meaning of the prophet. Thus to apply it to Isa. 51 : 11, "the redeemed of the Lord shall return and come with singing unto Zion ; and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads ; they shall obtain gladness and joy ; and sorrow and mourning shall flee away." Preceding this we have this people consumed by the worm (v. 8), and following it this is said to be done that the captive exile "should not die in the pit," and when they return they enjoy what only is to be realized in the Millennial period. The parallel in Isa. 35 : 10, "the ransomed of the Lord shall return," etc., also teaches that this is performed when "God cometh with vengeance," to "save you," and forms thus what Paul calls "the day of Redemption" for fulfilling the covenant, for as Ps. 111 : 9 forcibly puts it, "He sent redemption unto His people ; He hath commanded His covenant forever."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Christ was delivered from it, Ps. 16 : 10, comp. Acts 2 : 27, 31 ; the saints are delivered from it, 1 Cor. 15 : 55, marg. reading (German Version, etc.). Any commentary or concordance will give examples. Our argument has nothing to do with the question of other meanings, but with the simple fact that the words Sheol and Hades are used to denote the grave or the place of the dead. Many writers correctly infer that Matt. 16 : 18, "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it," includes a direct reference to the resurrection, viz. that the power of death, decimating the Church, shall be destroyed—their prisoners being released. Lange presents the view of such in the following : "The leading thought in these words, is the triumph of life over death, of the Kingdom of the resurrection over the usurped reign of the Kingdom of Hades."

<sup>2</sup> Thus e.g. in reference to sleeping and awaking, Knapp (Ch. Theol., 151, 1) remarks : "Death was compared with sleep and the dead body with a sleeping person. Hence the terms which literally signify to awake, to rise up, to rise out of sleep, are also used to denote the resurrection of the lifeless body." This was well understood by the early Fathers, so that Justin Martyr (First Apol. c. 38) and Augustine (City of God, b. 17, c. 18, b. 16, s. 41) thus interpret Ps. 3 : 5 (to death of Christ), and the latter also, in the expression "who shall awake him." The same is true of Dan. 12 : 2, etc. As to "quicken" compare e.g. Barnes Com. on 1 Pet. 3 : 18. Our opponents, themselves, give us the proper interpretation and application, although they cannot logically fit it into their system.

<sup>3</sup> The reader will of course notice the reason that such a title is given to Jesus ; because, as some think, while others were raised from death before Him they were again subjected to death. He is the first one raised who was never again under the dominion of death ; or if, as others think, they were not subjected to death, then it is given because He pertains pre-eminently to the firstborn and is the cause of their being included among them.

<sup>4</sup> For the student of prophecy we append two considerations: (1) This pre-eminent resurrection takes place before the last tribulation. (2) Has not the "male child" a reference to the priority of the resurrection and the special honor of these resurrection saints, because it seems to be foreshadowed by "the male being the Lord's" of the first-born (Ex. 13 : 12, etc.) and had to be redeemed. Tertullian (On Res., ch. 31) and many others refer this passage to a resurrection over against Baldwin's (Armageddon, p. 87) absurdity, who makes the United States to be "a nation born at once" on July 4th, 1776. Fausset (Com. loci) and others apply this to the sudden restoration of the Jewish nation, but far more is intended. For, in connection with such a restoration (as in Isa. 26, Dan. 12, Ezek. 37, etc.) a glorious resurrection is related, and there is no reason why the same should be ignored here, for Augustine even (City of God, b. 20, ch. 21) quotes "and your bones shall rise up as an herb," as "alluding to the resurrection" and "a bodily one."

<sup>5</sup> The Jews represented a resurrection under the figure of a birth, and Knapp (Ch. Theol., s. 151, 1) says (referring to Michaelis's Com. on Heb. 1 : 5): "The Jews were also accustomed to speak of the resurrection of the dead under the image of a new or second birth, to which they were led by the passage Isa. 26 : 19, 'the earth will again bring forth her dead.'" The critical student will not fail to see that such a usage leads us to believe that much more than a mere moral regeneration is meant in Christ's conversation with Nicodemus, for appeal is made to Nicodemus's knowledge of the Scriptures respecting the mode of Israel's regeneration, what it included (comp. Art. on "The New Birth," vol. 12, p. 116, Nathaniel). Reference to this birth is also made in Isa. 54 : 1, and "the times of restitution" imply it. "Regeneration" (Matt. 19 : 28) embraces it so clearly that it is used by writers as the equivalent of resurrection, as e.g. Eusebius's Hist., b. 5, ch. 1., Lactantius, vol. 2, p. 181, in the letter of the churches of Vienna and Lyons.

<sup>6</sup> Job 19 : 25, owing to the division of critics respecting its reference to a resurrection is passed by; * so also Augustine's rendering (b. 18, c. 33) of Zeph. 3 : 8, "Wait ye upon me, saith the Lord, in the day of my resurrection in the future," etc.; Theodoret's citing Ps. 104 : 29, 30, as a proof text in favor of a resurrection, but which is, perhaps, as Knapp observes, too obscure to be thus used; Dahler and others, referring to Jer. 31 : 26 (comp. v. 11) as expressive of the prophet's allusion to his own death and resurrection; the Targum's explanation of Isa. 57 : 16 as expressive of a restoration, "I will restore the souls of the dead;" Clement in his first epistle (ch. 27) quoting Ps. 3 : 6 and Job 19 : 25, 26, as applying to a literal resurrection. The student will observe that as the Pre-Millennial resurrection is associated in the Divine Purpose with the introduction of the Kingdom, with this key before us many passages are seen to be framed in such a manner that a reference to the resurrection is implied or indirectly intimated, as e.g. in Mal. 3 : 18; Ps. 102 : 18-21; Ps. 30; Jer. 31 : 11. Thus e.g. "the adoption" being connected (Rom. 8 : 23) with "the redemption of the body" implies a previous resurrection in order to be fitted for the chosen kingship with Christ (comp. Prop. 154). So that even in the preceding (v. 21) phrase "the glorious liberty of the Sons of God," there seems to be an allusion to deliverance from "the prison house"—the grave. Even Fuller (Strict. on Robinson, Lec. 3) says: "Probably the apostle alluded especially to the redemption of the bodies of believers at the resurrection," thus making it accord with the usage of the prophets and of the Jews. Such declarations as are contained in John 8 : 36 are not merely to be confined to freedom from sin because of the previously announced fact that the heir, the Son (and with Him, of course, the co-heirs, i.e. those made free), abideth in the house (understanding the covenanted one) forever. We sometimes overlook the depth of meaning conveyed in such expressions, by neglecting to take that broad, comprehensive view of Redemption as given by the Spirit—forgetting that the freedom imparted by the Son embraces, as a multitude of passages show, also a deliverance from the bondage of the grave. Lange (Com. Matt. 24 : 31) correctly instances this far-reaching implication, when e.g. he finds the same expressed in the phrase "And they shall gather together His elect," saying "Here the resurrection of the elect (the first resurrection primarily) is declared." Some writers (Fausset, Com. etc.) draw the same inference from Phil. 2 : 11, "things (i.e. beings, persons) under the earth." New force and beauty is given by this doctrine to various passages. Thus, e.g. in Isa. 40 : 6, 7, 8, the prophet,

---

* While we hold with the early Church that it refers to a resurrection, yet after the declarations of Barnes (Com. loci), Knapp's Theol., p. 528, M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop., Art. "Resurrection," etc., who explain the passage to Job's confident conviction that his distressed body would be restored to soundness, etc., it would be better, perhaps, to omit it, although much could be said in favor of a resurrection.

after delineating first briefly the realization of covenant promise, suddenly surveys the intermediate universality of death and impressively announces the sad fact that all must die. How then can the covenant be fulfilled? The answer, which implies a resurrection, is: "But the word of our God shall stand forever," i.e. death, now triumphant, cannot defeat the Divine Purpose—these dead ones shall arise, etc. (comp. 1 Pet. 1:24, 25; Ps. 103:15, etc.). In Ps. 9:13, 14, David says that he shall be "lifted up from the gates of death, that I may shew forth all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion: I will rejoice in thy salvation," expressing his hope of a resurrection and future glory. It is interesting to notice that this psalm is entitled by the Vulgate, Sep. Æthiopic, over a hundred mss. and printed editions (and indorsed by Houbigant and many critics), "A Psalm of David for the end; concerning the secrets of the Son;" the Syriac, "A Psalm of David, concerning Christ's receiving the throne and the Kingdom, and defeating His enemies;" Arabic, "concerning the mysteries of the Son, as to the glory of Christ," etc., thus referring it, as the destruction of the enemies of God and the reign of Christ indicate, to the period of the Millennial age.

The student, carefully observing this feature in the Divine Purpose, will observe allusions to this resurrection in various other passages. Thus e.g. the Psalmist evidently expresses a well-grounded hope in a resurrection (Pre-Millennial, as the context indicates) in Ps. 90. After showing the universality of death, the shortness of life, the certainty of its approach, etc., the Psalmist suddenly changes the theme and encourages himself by the covenant hope expressed in the words: "Return, O God, how long? and let it repent thee concerning thy servants. Oh, satisfy us early with thy mercy; that we may rejoice and be glad all our days," etc. Now in view of what preceded and the covenant promises, there can be no doubt whatever but that the Spirit implies a deliverance from the power of death, from the result of God's wrath, through a resurrection. In Ps. 102 the lament is made that "I am withered like grass," which is afterward explained as being "appointed to death," but deliverance is anticipated from this sad condition, and this is based (1) on the unchangeableness and mercy of God; (2) His faithfulness to hear prayer; (3) His fulfilment of covenant promises, evidenced, (a) in His appearing in glory to build up Zion, (b) in the time having arrived when His promises shall be realized, (c) in the gathering of His people and the submission of all Kingdoms. In Ps. 30 we have the positive assertion that the Psalmist (speaking for believers) was "brought up from the grave;" and he exults and rejoices in the greatness of his deliverance, attributing the same (marg. reading) "to the memorial" (comp. Prop. 49), which necessitates a resurrection in order that God may be faithful in His promises. To apply this simply to deliverance from grievous sickness is to weaken its sublime power, and to make it untruthful, seeing that David died, entered the pit, and became dust. But let it be studied in the light of a glorious Pre-Millennial resurrection, and it receives a beauty and force that nothing else can present—teaching us how then he will indeed be "girded with gladness," praise God in His glory and realize in God's favor that His "mountain" is made "to stand strong." We think, therefore, that that class of commentators (Fausset, Gill, Alford, Berlinb. Bible, Bengel, Nast, Olshausen, Stier, Bonar, Ryle, Jones, Lillie, Lange, and others), who allow such references to a Pre-Millennial resurrection, are far more Scriptural and logical than the class that ignore or deny them. Even conservative writers allow such decisive applications, as e.g. Dr. Nægelsbach, Lange's Com. Isa., who interprets Isa. 26:5-19 to refer to a literal first resurrection, for (p. 289) he justly claims that with the aid of the Apoc. we can distinguish between "a first and a second resurrection."

Obs. 7. This doctrine of a literal Pre-Millennial resurrection we admit, is "Jewish." This term of reproach (given in this sense by man) we cheerfully accept, for it is a distinguishing feature of our faith, seeing that we find it in the covenant given to Jews, in Jewish Prophets, in the teaching of a Jewish Saviour and Jewish apostles, and in agreement with Jewish statements of doctrine; and that only such who are engrafted into the Abrahamic stock and become members of the Jewish commonwealth, shall participate in it. It belongs pre-eminently to the introduction of that Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom promised to the Jewish select nation. Even Rabbinical lore is full of intimations respecting it. That, therefore, which forms such an objectionable feature to many, is only an additional reason for retaining it. (Comp. e.g. Prop. 68.)

Comp. Props. 69, 116, 123, 126, 127, etc., for the Jewish aspect, but especially Prop. 49 relating to the covenant. In the first part of this Proposition references have been made to the Jewish faith and instances given of expressed belief in a Pre-Millennial resurrection—one introductory to the Messianic Kingdom. In the Talmud (quoted by Lederer, in Israelite Indeed) the resurrection is found in Moses, for it is said: "Every one of Israel receives a portion of the world to come; for it is written: 'Thy people also shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever, the branch of my planting; the work of mine hands, that I may be glorified,' Isa. 60:21. But the following have no part in the world to come: those who say the resurrection from the dead cannot be proved from the book of the law (the Pentateuch)." In the German: "He who denies that the resurrection from the dead can be proved from the book of the law (though he may admit the fact that a resurrection shall take place), shall have no part in the resurrection, because God rewards and punishes measure for measure," etc. (Comp. references under Prop. 49.) Milman (His. Jews, vol. 1, p. 232) refers to the Rabbins (Tract Sanhedrin, 2) as quoting such passages as Deut. 31:16, and 1:8 in favor of a resurrection. In his His. Christ (vol. 1, p. 75, etc.) he speaks of this Jewish belief, and states a well-known fact, viz., that such a faith was more clearly and distinctively held after the return from Captivity. Buckle (Mis., vol. 3, p. 136) endeavors to take advantage of this fact as an indication of derivation from an acquaintance with "eastern philosophy"—but how it is derived, when all who hold it constantly appeal to the Jewish Scriptures, he (and others who press this matter) have not informed us. Let us only add: One reason, apparently, why the resurrection is more prominently given by Daniel, Ezekiel, and others is the following: The resurrection is allied with a restored Theocracy; now as long as the Theocratic Kingdom in the Davidic line existed, that prominence was not given to it which, as a great source of comfort and encouragement, appertained to it when the Kingdom was overthrown and faith and hope were directed to its restoration. Augustine (City of God, b. 15, s. 18) finds the first intimation of a resurrection even in the name of "Seth" signifying "resurrection," and if one of our opponents can find it so remotely, no one can censure us for our findings. For the Jewish faith in a resurrection of the dead, compare Prayer 2, in the Nineteen Prayers (Shemoneh Esreh), Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 107. Also articles on the resurrection in Bib. Cyclops., and in Commentaries, especially comments on Matt. 22:23 and 31, in Lange, Meyer, etc.

Obs. 8. We see what estimate to place on Reuss's assertion (His. Ch. Theol., p. 57): "It is a fact admitted in our day by all unprejudiced exegetes, and which should never have been denied, that the doctrine (of the res.) was never taught by the prophets previous to the exile, especially in any close association with the idea of a future reward." This is abundantly refuted by what we have produced from the Pentateuch, the historical books, the Psalms, Isaiah and Ezekiel. Even if this language is to be spiritualized (which these men do, and, therefore, cannot find a resurrection), critics fully admit that the language is based on, or the figure is derived from, a doctrine of the resurrection, which must then have been well known. But over against Reuss, Jesus Himself told the Sadducees that it was taught even by Moses; so Peter, in proving the resurrection of Jesus, affirms the same respecting David; and so Paul, Heb. 11:35, concerning the ancients generally. It was taught both directly or inferentially, but, of course, if the most direct passages are to receive Origenistic interpretation and manipulation, then it cannot be found—the doctrine is prejudged. The Jews themselves appealed to passages in the writings before the exile for their belief, and found it even, where all Scripture places it as necessarily implied, viz., in the Covenant itself. Even Stanley (His. of Jew. Ch., 2 Ser., p. 170) speaks of "the defects" of the Psalms in this particular, and adds: "Hardly in the silence of the Pentateuch or the gloomy despair of Ecclesiastes, is the faintness of immortality more chilling than in the 30th, 49th, and 88th Psalms." The "defect" in this case is in the interpreter, and not in the Psalms. For what can be more significant and cheering than the plain statement in the 30th that he will praise God, "for Thou hast lifted me up and hast not made my foes (death and the grave as he afterward explains) to rejoice over me"—"O Lord, Thou hast brought up my soul from the grave; Thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit," i.e., remain there as the wicked. And this comes to pass owing (marg. reading) "to the memorial," which we have shown (Prop. 49) pledges God to a resurrection to insure the fulfilment of the Covenant promises. This, too, takes place in "the morning," see Prop. 139. Then again he refers to death, to his happy deliverance from it, to the establishment of his "mountain" or Kingdom, to the fact that he would "not be silent" as the wicked then will be. Whether others can see it or not, the Psalm is radiant with hope of blessed immortality. The 88th is, as has already been shown, jubilant with the same hope, while the 40th, not so distinctive, gives, as parallel passages will indicate, evidences of the same.

The efforts made by Amner (On Dan.) to make out—which many now follow—the passages referring to a resurrection to denote mere temporal deliverance, have been fully exposed by others, as e.g. Brit. Critic, O. Ser. vol. 13. Fiske (The Unseen World, p. 105) very confidently asserts that the doctrine of a resurrection was devised after the Babylonish Captivity to meet doctrinal contingencies, and that it was not original with the Jews but was "borrowed from the Zaratheustian theology of Persia." Clarke (Ten Religions) and many others repeat this, as if repetition was proof. It is reasonable to expect such statements from unbelievers, but when they come from professed believers they are unreasonable. Thus e.g. Beecher (Ser. "The Future Life," in Ch. Union, Sept. 5th, 1877), speaking of the hope of a future life as expressed in the Old Test., says: "It (the Old Test.) is dumb, and utters not a word on the subject. There is no teaching of a future existence in the Old Test., not from the beginning to the end." He qualifies this afterward by saying that there might have been "glimpses," "speculations," or "hopes." Again: in the Art. "Resurrection," in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop., it is said: "It is admitted that there are no traces of such a belief in the earlier Hebrew Scriptures. It is not to be found in the Pentateuch, in the historical books, or in the Psalms; for Ps. 99: 15 does not relate to the subject; neither does Ps. 104: 29, 30, although so cited by Theodoret and others." Now over against all these is the simple but positive statement of Jesus, and Paul, and Peter, whose declarations are amply supported by the facts adduced.

Obs. 9. From what preceded, it is evident that the unbelief of those is inexcusable, who, in a measure, removed from gross Rationalism, still, like Lücke in his Introd. to the Apoc., and Bleek in his works on Daniel, make these prophecies a kind of poetical fiction; or, like Reuss in his Analysis of the Apoc., speak of them as a résumé of exploded Jewish expectations. So rooted are they in the Divine Plan, so entirely embedded in the Plan of the Redemption, that to deny their validity is to sacrifice Divine Unity, to deal a blow at one of the most vital parts of Salvation. We see, too, in the union between Paul, the other writers, and the Apocalypse, how fanciful is the opinion of the Bauer school that they are in opposition to each other, when, in fact, they mutually sustain each other in "the one hope."

Many theologians, simply on account of their spiritualizing system, can see no faith of a resurrection in the Patriarchs and others (although expressed, e.g. in the case of Isaac, in faith in covenant promises, in hope when dying, etc.), and such, of course, can find no Pre-Millennial resurrection, or if, peradventure, found and admitted, dismiss it as Jewish superstition. When not immediately concerned in opposing our views, we often find the most remarkable concessions, as e.g. Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 290) positively asserts that the Antediluvians looked for no other domain than this earth, renewed, etc., for an inheritance, and this to be obtained "through a resurrection of the dead," which hope was afterward confirmed. When opposing us, then the plainest references to the resurrection are all figurative, as e.g. Brown (Christ's Sec. Com., p. 251) makes Ezek. 37 : 12-14 ; Hos. 6 : 2—Isa. 26 : 19, 14, figurative in order to show that Rev. 20 : 4-6 is the same. We may well ask then, if such declarations are figurative, where is the resurrection taught? We need not wonder that many writers (e.g. Fowle in "Science and Immortality," Pop. Science Monthly, May, 1872) can find not "a shadow of a trace" in the books of Moses concerning a future life, and base it upon the fact that Moses lets his aspirations concerning the future relate, not to the third heaven, but to this earth. Precisely so, for then Moses in his reference to this earth as the future glorious inheritance is in full accord with the truth (comp. Props. 49, 131, 137, 141, 144, 146, 151, 154, etc.). His teaching regarding that future life we have already fully expressed.

Obs. 10. This Pre-Millennial restoration aids in solving a difficulty (unnecessarily such) felt by theologians, viz., that the first books of the Bible are only confined to temporal, earthly blessings, or rather, as it should be worded to be correct, blessings here on earth. The question deduced is : Why is the hope constantly held up to the Jews of living in their promised land and none presented of rewards in the third heaven? The substance of the answer given by those who reject the key afforded by the Covenant and this resurrection, is this : that the Jews were not then prepared for other promises, and that the real hope and destiny was to be gradually revealed as they could bear it, etc. Learned dissertations are filled with just such nonsense, or "worldly wisdom." Such reasoning places both man and God in a false position. The former, as if he were then so intellectually and morally weak as to be disqualified to appreciate his own destination, and now, even in the case of heathen or all men, so strong as to be able to bear such knowledge ; the latter, as if He would conceal the true destination of those who trusted in Him and excite their hopes, etc., by either false or temporary motives. No ! never does God thus deal with man. The true reason, and the one underlying the Covenant and all these promises, is, that the land, the earth, is truly—as always affirmed—their inheritance, and that God will raise them up out of their graves and fulfil the promises given by bringing them into the land ; and, moreover, God never changes from this divine purpose, for the promise (Prop. 142) exists to-day, as it ever did, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit" (not the third heaven but), "the earth." The language of Moses and others is the best that could be used, for it is the truth—the truth of God which in His own time He will see is realized. We are not to come to God's Word and gauge it by a monkish third heaven theory, which makes the third heaven the saint's inheritance instead of the one that God uniformly through every prophet has promised, and then by it judge of the propriety and truthfulness of the Divine utterances. Would that Abrahamic faith were more characteristic of believers ! (comp. Props. 144, 151, etc.).

PROPOSITION 127. In support of our view, the Apocalypse unmistakably teaches a Pre-Millennial resurrection of the saints.

It is most reasonable to suppose that "the testimony of Jesus," the last words, given expressly to impart information on eschatology, should coincide with the Old Test. teaching, and bestow upon us additional information. This it does as follows :

Obs. 1. The reader is directed to Rev. 11 : 18, and under the last trumpet, preceding (as all must admit) the Millennium, we have "the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward," etc. Here is a distinctive Pre-Millennial resurrection asserted in connection with a time of wrath and rewarding, which the general analogy asserts as belonging to the Second Advent of Jesus. To acknowledge a resurrection of dead ones to be here announced, and then to postpone the same until after the 1000 years, is a mere subterfuge, seeing that the connection demands its fulfilment, under the seventh trumpet, or at the period of time thus designated.

The weak and unsatisfactory manner in which this passage is handled by our opponents is well illustrated by Barnes, Com. loci. Not knowing what to do with such a resurrection in his system of Eschatology, and unwilling to deny its plain reference to a literal one, he, unable to spiritualize it away (or introduce his favorite "as if"), represents this occurrence at a specific time as one that is embraced by the events introductory to, contained in, and concluding the 1000 years, quoting Rev. 20 : 4, 5, 6, 12-15 ; Matt. 25 : 34-40 ; Rev. 21 and 22. How hard pressed and defective a theory must be which is forced to such a wholesale application of a chronological prediction. The time of rewarding the Prophets e.g. is Pre-Millennial as seen e.g. in the case of Daniel (Prop. 126) : so the time of wrath, the time of judgment, the time of rewarding the righteous, the time of destroying the enemies of God, the time when the Christ assumes His reign—all, as we show in detail under various Propositions, is Pre-Millennial.

Obs. 2. We now come to Rev. 20 : 1-6 which was so universally held by the early Church to teach a literal resurrection, and to be so thoroughly consonant with Jewish views, that the Apocalypse narrowly escaped proscription by the enemies of Chiliasm (comp. e.g. Lardner's Works, vol. 2, p. 643 ; Stuart's Introd. to Apoc., Barnes's Introd. respecting Caius and Dionysius). The application of the Origenistic system of interpretation, as many have noticed, saved and gave it canonical authority.* If we reject the early Church belief in this particular, the veracity of Apostolic Fathers, who assert that they received their interpretation of it from the Apostles and their associates (see Prop. 75) is impeached, and the teaching of the

---

* It is a source of gratification that this book is so well fortified by authority, that the ablest critics, even of the destructionist school, allow its antiquity and canonical place. The Intros., etc., almost invariably ascribe to it the best given historical proof of any of the New Test. writings.

Apostles themselves which directly led to such a faith in all the churches established by them is open to grave suspicion. It is not necessary to trace the varied spiritualistic opinions engrafted on this Scripture, denoting either a spiritual, moral, or ecclesiastic resurrection, or to note in detail the varied dating of the thousand years based on such interpretation* from the ministry of Christ, conversion of Constantine, etc. Popery indeed (Prop. 77) almost crushed the early interpretation of the passage; but others held fast to it, as e.g. Paulikians, Waldenses, and Albigenses. Various writers, some men of acknowledged ability and talent, have continued from the Reformation (Prop. 78) down to the present, to entertain the same, and to-day some of the most able men in nearly all, if not all, denominations, accept of this ancient faith.† The prevailing view taken, is that of Daniel Whitby (who died 1727), who was the first writer‡ who advocated what he himself calls "a new hypothesis," viz., a spiritual resurrection and Millennium still future before the Advent of Christ.§ Men of the highest ability have adopted this "hypothesis," and through their influence it is almost generally received. While this is so, it is also true that some of our most bitter opponents unhesitatingly yield this passage to us as teaching a literal first resurrection. Thus Prof. Stuart (Com.), before alluded to, who appeals to Phil. 3 : 8-11; Luke 14 : 14 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 23, 24, etc., as favoring the idea, and even makes this admission, "Even the Old Test. contains some passages which may very naturally be applied to the Messianic or first resurrection." Prof. Bush, and many others, who spiritualize it, frankly acknowledge that the language itself, literally understood, unmistakably presents the notion of such a resurrection, but regard it as a presentation of truth in the shape of "milk," such as "the babes" in that early period required; forgetting, however, that this "milk" happens to be just like that which the Jews previously received, and hence, if the former is deleterious the latter must be the same.¶ With these preliminary remarks, let us proceed to give the reasons for holding that this Scripture presents the doctrine of a literal Pre-Millennium resurrection, aside from the one which might be urged at length, viz., that the language and spirit of it accord with the Old Test. delineations and confirm the interpretations of the Jews (which latter, even

---

* The terror, etc., at the closing of A.D. 1000, and one or two other periods, are falsely charged (even by scholars) to our account, when the fact is, that we hold the 1000 years to be entirely in the future, while the other view located it in the past.

† See e.g. the lists given by Brookes, Bickersteth, Seiss, Taylor, etc., and compare Props. 75, 76, 77, and 78.

‡ So Bh. Henshaw, Brookes, Dr. Seiss, Bickersteth, and others. The reader must here be guarded. This has been denied by some, but thus far they have failed to produce a writer preceding Whitby. Some have sought refuge in Augustine, Jerome, and others, as teaching a spiritual resurrection and Millennium, but this we do not deny, but only that they taught it as something still future and linked with this passage, as Whitby. This we emphatically deny, as their writings testify. Compare, however, what is said under Props. 175, 158, and 76-78.

§ We present Whitby's testimony under Props. 175 and 78.

¶ So e.g. Barnes, Com. loci, where the reader will find numerous "as ifs" drawn from the thus acknowledged plain sense of a literal resurrection. Again and again he admits that this resurrection will be "as if the martyrs were raised up from the dead;" "as if the most eminent saints were raised up from the dead;" "as if they were raised up from the dead, or which might be represented as a resurrection from the dead," etc. The language itself of the passage is admitted to teach a resurrection from the dead, but is to be spiritualized to mean moral or spiritual revival, etc.

as Reuss, His. Ch. Theol., p. 57, the Pharisees made "one of the principal points of their teaching").

Obs. 3. 1. This describes a resurrection of persons. The word "soul" is used to denote the person (as e.g. Numb. 31 : 8 ; Prov. 6 : 30 ; Isa. 29 : 8 ; Lev. 22 : 11 ; Jos. 11 : 11 ; Jer. 2 : 34 ; Acts 3 : 33 ; 2 : 41 ; 27 : 37 ; 1 Pet. 3 : 20, etc.). The "souls" are persons because (1) they were "beheaded," which can only apply to such ; (2) the language "foreheads," "hands," etc., indicates such ; (3) the resurrection of the members is appropriately described in terms similar to that of the Head. Thus, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell (Hades, grave), neither wilt Thou suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption," is applied by commentators, following Peter, to a literal resurrection ; (4) the word designedly chosen is in accord with Jewish usage, so that, e.g. the Targum renders "The souls which I have made" in Isa. 57 : 16, "I will restore the souls of the dead" (Dr. Clarke, Com. loci) ; (5) the early Christians familiar with the phrase in a living language had no difficulty unanimously in making such an application ; (6) David foreseeing his resurrection from the power of death calls it a deliverance of "my soul," Ps. 6 : 4, etc. ; (7) a change of condition is predicated of these "souls" that had died, implying a previous living, which can only be asserted of persons. May we not, therefore, ask (Ps. 89 : 48), "Shall he (man) deliver his soul from the hand of the grave?" and answer, No ! for his soul can only be delivered through the power of Christ. 2. These souls previous to this resurrection were "beheaded," suffered death because they witnessed for Jesus, remained faithful to the truth. It seems absurd to press this passage into a spiritual or moral conversion in the face of the beheading which was endured for the Word, since it is virtually affirming that the sinner, previous to his conversion, suffers death because of his witnessing for Jesus ; that the unregenerated man endures a beheading for his unswerving devotion to the truth ; and then, after such an exhibition of love, he is resurrected, i.e. converted, etc. 3. The beheading itself indicates a literal death. For (1) it cannot be asserted, taking our opponents' views of spirit, that the spirit or soul can be beheaded. (2) The state of a wicked man cannot be called a headless stone, for in the case of these souls it would prove too much, viz., being beheaded, implies that previously they had them in possession. (3) The beheading results from their previous moral action. (4) The word translated "beheading" denotes "decapitation by the axe," a violent death. This literal death is shown in Rev. 13 and Rev. 14. 4. The persons who have part in this resurrection are such as were converted to the truth before this death. This is proven by (1) the witnessing they gave which caused others to put them to death. (2) The "holy" only have part in it. (3) A distinguishing resurrection is promised to the saints. Hence, this is a promise of a resurrection given because they are "holy," and not one to make the wicked "holy." 5. This resurrection is bestowed as a reward of well-doing. This agrees with Luke 14 : 14, "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just" (also Rom. 8 : 11, 23 ; Heb. 11 : 35, etc.). The entire spirit of the prophecy claims this as a great, unspeakable blessing. 6. The "thrones" that were placed, is only met by a similar Millennial description of Dan. 7 : 9, 22, 27, the promise to the Apostles, Matt. 19 : 28, the enthronement of the saints. 7. The same is true of the "judgment" mentioned, and as will, farther on, be shown in the judgment committed to saints. 8. The reign with Christ corresponds with the dominion mentioned by David, with the promises of Kingship and Priesthood to risen and glorified saints. The passages bearing on the enthronement, judgment, and reign will be given under separate Propositions. 9. The meaning of the word "lived," and the use made of the same, fairly teaches a literal resurrection. Barnes, loci, tells us that Robinson (Lex.) gives the primary meaning to be, "to live, to have life, spoken of physical life and existence," and adds: "It may be applied to those who were before dead, Matt. 9 : 18 ; Mark 16 : 11 ; Luke 24 : 23 ; John 5 : 25 ; Acts 1 : 3 ; 9 : 41," etc." Prof. Stuart (Com. Rev. loci) says that the word means "revived," came to life, i.e. returned to a life like the former one, viz., a union of soul and body. So does the word signify in Rev. 2 : 8 ; 13 : 14, and in many other passages cited in the remarks on Rev. 2 : 8. In addition to the texts given by Barnes, he adduces Acts 25 : 19 ; Rom. 6 : 10, 13 ; 2 Cor. 13 : 4. Nothing stronger can be given in our favor than the argument of Prof. Stuart : "If, then, as it would seem, we must reject all these meanings" (viz., those opposed to the early Church view), "how can we well avoid coming to the conclusion that ezean here must mean a reviving or rising from the dead? The use of zað elsewhere in the Apocalypse shows very plainly that it may mean revived, lived again in reference to the body which had been dead. Thus the Saviour speaks of Himself in Rev. 2 : 8, as being He who had been dead, kai ezean, and had revived, lived again, after the death of the body. Thus, too, it is said of the beast (Rev. 13 : 14), which had the deadly wound of the sword, that ezean, it revived." Surely, if the Spirit employs the word to signify the literal resurrection of Jesus, and that, too, in the same book, we are justified in applying it in the same way to the resurrection of His brethren, contrasted as it is with a previous death. 10. Those who thus "lived" enjoyed the Millennial period, and those who "lived not," i.e. the rest of the dead, did not realize it.<sup>4</sup> Now, if the word "lived" means (as our opponents declare) conversion, increased Christian zeal, etc., it proves too much, viz., that not a single soul of "the rest of the dead" will be converted, etc., until the thousand years are finished. Then we have a moral resurrection at the beginning of the age, and the other at the end. For, the same word "lived" is used of both parties, and consistency demands the same meaning in both places. 11. But if this meaning is preserved, then it follows that after an interval of one thousand years "the rest of the dead" are all converted, etc., which is forbidden by numerous explicit passages." 12. Those who have part in the first resurrection are never subjected to "the second death," but the implication is that "the rest of the dead" will experience it, and this is confirmed by the resurrection following after this Millennial period (same chapter), in which the second death largely figures. Now, if the living of these two classes is the same, it legitimately follows that the one portion will be given over to the power of the second death, for having no lot in the first, it falls under the second resurrection. The reason why they did not have part in the first is not removed before the second takes place, for they remain "dead" until the second occurs after the thousand years. 13. What is asserted, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection ; on such the second death shall have no power," is a bestowal of eternal life by the power of the resurrection, as is seen at length in 1 Cor. 15, etc. It is the bestowal of immortality to that which was mortal, so that as in Luke

20 : 36, "neither can they die any more," or, they become like the Head, Rom. 6 : 9, "that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him."<sup>4</sup> 14. This again is confirmed by the natural conclusion which the passage impresses, that each one thus raised up lives and reigns during, at least, a thousand years, which cannot be applied to mortal man. Moral or spiritual advancement does not bestow such longevity.<sup>5</sup> 15. These resurrected ones "reigned with Christ." Jesus then sits on His own throne, and the saints reign with Him (Matt. 19 : 28 ; Luke 22 : 29, 30, etc.). This involves a consideration of the period of Christ's reign, etc., but it is sufficient to point out what even our opponents admit, that such a reign of Christ will be witnessed at His Coming, and that it is the happy portion of saints to reign with Him. Hence, this prediction is in sympathy with such a reign. 16. Martyrs (one class) obtain this resurrection, not that the resurrection produces martyrs, as some affirm, or revives the martyr spirit, as others say, or causes, as others declare, a eulogy of martyrs. And, we may well ask, Does the Millennial period here described with Satan bound, Christ and the saints reigning, with, as the prophets write, all righteous, with peace, safety, prosperity, knowledge, and glory covering the earth, does this require martyrs or the spirit of martyrdom? Is the binding of Satan and this reign so ineffective that murderers of saints, that dangerous enemies, still exist? What, then, becomes of God's promises, if persecution, sore trial, threatened death and violent death itself is the characteristic of the Millennium?<sup>6</sup> 17. The persecuting beast and prophet are removed before this Millennial period begins, as is seen in preceding chapter. The persons resurrected are those who had previously refused His worship, mark, etc., and as we read (Rev. 13 : 15, etc.) were killed. In this Mill. age they have no such power, for the reason given, Rev. 19 : 20. All persecuting power (v. 2, 3) shall be confined. This exactly corresponds with the prophetic delineations of the Millennium (as e.g. Isa. 25, 26, etc.). The very persons (not others) killed by the beast are the ones who live and reign during the thousand years. 18. This resurrection is accompanied by God's heavy judgment upon His enemies, resulting in their overthrow and destruction, which agrees with what is said of this literal resurrection elsewhere.<sup>7</sup> 19. Taking the explanation given by our opponents to the word "first," it cannot denote what they claim. Thus e.g. Barnes, loci, "It is called the first resurrection in contradistinction from the second and last, the general resurrection." Now, if it means conversion, revival of martyr spirit, distinguished piety, etc., how can it properly bear such a contrast to the second, seeing the difference in kind?<sup>8</sup> The fact that it is called "the first" or "better" or pre-eminent resurrection implies a second of the same kind, but of a lower grade, i.e. not so distinguished, etc. If we make the one moral, etc., the other must be the same. 20. The rest of the dead only live after the one thousand years are finished, and as this resurrection is not included in the first or better one, it must be the second. In the same chapter after the thousand years we do read of a second one that transpires in which "death and the grave delivered up the dead which were in them." If the second is literal (as nearly all admit) the first must be also the same. 21. the juxtaposition of these two resurrections, the one at the beginning and the other at the close of this age, indicates a peculiarity and significance in the use of the word "first." This does not mean priority of time, as is almost universally supposed, for this would not be true either of the theory of our opponents or of our own." The word "first" has reference to the privileges of the first-born, which were, Deut., 21 : 17, (1) a double portion, i.e. distinguished position, comp. Gen. 25 : 31-34 ; (2) a right to the priesthood, Numb. 3 : 13 ; (3) government and dominion, Gen. 27 : 29. God already so early in history develops the idea purposed in the Divine Will of a selected number of the first-born, first begotten of the dead, of whom Christ is the Head. Hence the peculiarity of the language here, "first resurrection" is, that these also, the ones subject to this great tribulation during the period of Rev. 14 : 9-13, shall come forth also having the privileges of the first-born, i.e. they are not of the second or future ones, but belong to the first as well as those who may have preceded them. (The reader will clearly see the force of this when we come to the reign of saints, etc.) The word "first" is, as Parkhurst (Lex.) and others assert, employed to denote "dignity of persons" in the sense of "chief," "principal," etc., as in Matt. 20 : 27 ; Acts 13 : 50 ; 1 Tim. 1 : 15 ; Acts 17 : 4 ; 25 : 2 ; 28 : 7, 17, etc. This resurrection is, therefore, the chief, principal, pre-eminent one, because it pertains to that of the first-born, constitutes the persons embraced in and experiencing its power the first-born that belong exclusively—in a peculiar sense typified by the Jewish first-born—to God Himself. Hence not time but distinction is denoted. Now, this forms a unison with the general tenor of the word respecting this very resurrection pertaining to the saints, and the harmony is remarkable, being never broken by the slightest discord. 22. The resurrection at the close of this chapter is almost generally acknowledged as a literal one. Now, the same rules of interpretation that make this one literal, will, if applied to the first, make it the same. For both represent a visionary spectacle embracing persons, acts, events, and conditions still future, which prefigure or symbolize persons, etc. They both stand or fall together. Sound criticism must acknowledge this feature." 23. "This is the first resurrection," is an explanatory clause, and, like all explanatory language, must be received in the sense that usage, etc., affords. 24. These resurrected saints are "blessed," which is the condition promised to believers raised up at the last day, Luke 14 : 14, etc. 25. In this Millennial period Satan is bound so that he shall not "deceive the nations" during its continuance. But this cannot be realized down to the personal Advent of Christ, for a multitude of passages authoritatively teach that wars, wickedness, even so great that it is contrasted with that of the days of Noah, nations hostile to Christ, the Church itself a commingling of tares and wheat, shall exist down to the Advent, which is connected with the resurrection of the saints. 26. The "harvest" (Matt. 13 : 30, 39), which is identified with the resurrection period, is one that precedes this Millennial era, as is seen by reference to Rev. 14 and 19, when "the harvest of the earth is ripe," and it is gathered, following, too, closely on a terrible persecution." 27. If the Advent recorded in Rev. 19 can be proven to be a personal Pre-Millennial one, then this resurrection as a literal one follows. Leaving this for a separate Proposition (Prop. 121), we only now say, that the fact of such a special Advent being designated as immediately preceding this resurrection, and the acts that He performs being similar to those ascribed to Him when He comes to raise the dead, is in direct accord with the doctrine of a resurrection. It is a resurrection linked directly with a Coming of Jesus for purposes of vengeance and salvation. 28. The thousand years specifically mentioned were identified by the Jews with a literal resurrection, and the Messianic reign. Now, the adoption of the same phraseology, united with a resurrection, which—primarily understood—refers to a restoration of life to dead ones, is virtually an indorsement of the Jewish idea of a literal resurrection, or else it is a most cruel deception, confirming men in error.<sup>1</sup> 29. 'This resurrection is sustained by the "lake of fire burning with brimstone," Rev. 19 : 20. Almost every one acknowledges that a resurrection of the saints either precedes or is connected with Matt. 25 : 31-46. Now, in this latter passage, we have the personal Advent, the holy messengers with Him, the sitting on His throne, the gathering of the nations (as Joel, John, etc., describe), the saints inheriting the Kingdom, and then, notice, the wicked cast into the fire preceding the Millennial age; for "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." These wicked are cast into the fire which is only prepared for the devil, etc.; for, as the Spirit carefully (Rev. 20) shows, after the thousand years, the devil is cast into the lake of fire where the others have been during the thousand years (see Prop. 134). 30. The "marriage of the Lamb," and "the marriage supper," Rev. 19 : 7, 9, sufficiently identify the nature of this resurrection with that connected with "the manifestation of the Son of God," in Rom. 8 : 19-23, with the one related to the feast of Isa. 25 : 6-8, etc. 31. A comparison of the expression "but the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished," with other Scriptures sustains a literal resurrection.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For the usage that we contend for, let the student compare Dr. Etheridge's Transl. of the Targums of Onkelos, etc., vol. 2, p. 687, who remarks that the word "soul" is used "both in the Bible and Targums for 'a dead body,' and in the Jerusalem Talmud for 'a stone or monument which marks the place of the dead.'" He also notices the following places as indicative of its meaning "the person," Gen. 17; Ex. 1 : 5; Lev. 4 : 2, 27; 7 : 20; 22 : 11; Deut. 24 : 7; 2 Sam. 14 : 14; Ezek. 27 : 13; Acts 2 : 43; 2 Pet. 2 : 14; Rev. 18 : 13; to which may be added Acts 7 : 14; Gen. 19 : 20; Ps. 55 : 18, and 119 : 175; Isa. 38 : 17; Jos. 11 : 11, etc. Indeed, so seldom is the word "soul" employed to designate the disembodied spirit, that some eminent writers (as e.g. Bh. Law in Cons. on Theory of Religion, and others) have called into question the fact whether it is employed in such a sense, especially in connection with the intermediate state. This only indicates how freely the term is employed in the manner advocated by us. Even Barnes palpably contradicts himself on this point. Thus on Rev. 20 he remarks: "By no possible construction can it mean the bodies of the saints," but on Acts 2 : 27 he refutes himself when he applies the term soul to Christ, to His person, saying: "There is no clear instance in which it is applied to the soul in its separate state or disjoined from the body." In reply to Fairbairn and others it is only necessary to say that Rev. 20 is in accordance with Scriptural usage, and that there is exquisite propriety in speaking of the resurrection of the saints just as Christ's (Acts 2 : 27) is spoken of, and as that of the believer is predicted, e.g. Ps. 99 : 15, "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave." Our interpretation is vindicated by previous usage and by the express promises of God. (Comp. also Sep. Version on Lev. 19 : 28; Num. 6 : 11; Lev. 21 : 1; Ezek. 44 : 25, where "soul" designates the dead.)

<sup>2</sup> He adds: "but it does not necessarily imply this, nor does the mere use of the word suggest it." But the primary meaning, the use of the word, the context, etc., all is calculated to suggest it, as it did to the early Church, to Prof. Stuart, etc. Fairbairn (On Prop., p. 461) is fairly driven from the old position that only a moral change is denoted, when he informs us that it is used as a figure derived from the literal resurrection, because the state here delineated partakes more of the final resurrection state than any that had preceded. His interpretation is, however, vague. We rest satisfied with his concession that there is reference in the language to a literal resurrection.

<sup>3</sup> Prof. Stuart having been unfriendly to the Millenarian view, his testimony, so candid, is the more weighly and valuable. We give his conclusion: "Putting now all these considerations together, I do not see how we can, on the ground of exegesis, fairly avoid the conclusion that John has taught, in the passage before us, that there will be a resurrection of the martyr saints at the commencement of the period after Satan shall have been shut up in the dungeon of the great abyss." "I cannot admit any serious doubt, either on the ground of general philology, or of the usus loquendi of the Apocalypse." The critical student will do well to observe how our opponents explain this same world "lived" in Rev. 2 : 8 ; Rom. 14 : 9, etc., and then contrast the concessions made with their comments on Rev. 20. It greatly confirms our position by exposing their contradictions.

<sup>4</sup> If to avoid this issue the resurrection of the rest of the dead is literal, as some contend, this ends the discussion, for if literal in the one clause it is literal in the other also, the same word being employed. It is a mere shiftless gloss, opposed to the word "dead," etc., to make "the rest of the dead" "weak Christians," "sickly portion of the flock," etc., afterward devoted in piety.

<sup>5</sup> Barnes loci, against the express declaration of the prophecy, has the rest of the dead living through the thousand years, but in a lower grade of piety! On the other hand, Augustine (City of God, b. 20, c. 9) gives them no piety, and, by implication, has no conversion during this period, for he says : " ' In these the second death hath no power.' Therefore it has power in the rest of whom he said above, ' The rest of them did not live until the thousand years were finished ; ' for in this whole intervening time, called a thousand years, however lustily they lived in the body, they were not quickened to life out of that death in which their wickedness held them, so that by this revived life they should become partakers of the first resurrection and so the second death should have no power over them."

<sup>6</sup> This meets the quibble of Barnes, loci, that " we do not need the assurance that ' on such the second death hath no power,' that is, that they would not perish forever. That would be a matter of course and there was no necessity for such a statement." But the necessity exists even in Barnes' case, for with it appended he still refused credence. Beside, such an objection is an impeachment of the language we have just quoted. Beside this, the student will observe that this phraseology is intensely Jewish. Thus e.g. in Etheridge's Transl. Targums, we have in Targum of Onkelos : " Let Reuben live in life eternal and not die the second death ;" the Targum of Palestine and the Jerusalem Targums : " Let Reuben live in this world, nor die the second death which the wicked die in the world to come."

<sup>7</sup> It is to be observed that the thousand years does not limit the reign (Prop. 159), and hence the objection (so Gipps, etc.), that " forever" ought to have been added, is futile, seeing that the thousand years embrace the incarceration of Satan and the non-resurrection of the rest of the dead. It is sufficient to say that the scope of the prediction requires this reign during the thousand years (whatever may be the result afterward) to be given as a reward to those who have been faithful, and in the promised reign of the saints we find that this very reign is identified with a previously experienced glorification (Props. 118, 153, and 154), because "flesh and blood do not inherit the Kingdom of God." Any theory, therefore, that limits this reign to one in mortal bodies or to a succession in mortality, is opposed to the promises of God and, hence, defective. The reason why Satan is bound the one thousand years, and the saints are said to reign the specific thousand years, is found in the Sabbatism comp. Prop. 143).

<sup>8</sup> Reference has already been made to the theory of Gipps (Treat. on First Res.) of a succession of martyrs, making the blessed Millennium a season of blood and death ; of Bush (The Millennium), who transposes it into the same, and is forced to say : " This may strike the reader as a very revolting conclusion. To represent the Apocalyptic Millennium, which he has always conceived as but another name for the golden age of the Church, as actually synchronizing with the most calamitous period of her annals will no doubt do violence to his most cherished sentiments respecting that distinguished era." Well may he thus describe it. A more recent writer, Waldegrave (New Test. Millenarianism), anxious to wrest this passage from us, follows in the same strain, making the Millennium a period for the retention and propagation of religious imposture—only not new imposture—for actual suffering even unto death while at the same time reigning, so that " the thousand years will prove to be a period in which Christ's witnesses are witnesses even unto death—a period, in short, of martyrdom and not of triumph—a period in which Satan (being precluded, indeed, from the invention of fresh delusions) is able, notwithstanding, to wield those already in existence with such effect as to make the Church of God to prophesy in sackcloth and ashes." A theory that can thus deliberately violate the text and context, the general analogy of Scripture on the subject, the ten thousand express declarations to the contrary, and give up all hope of ever realizing the precious, glorious predictions of Millennial peace, blessedness, and glory, is not only dark, gloomy, and disheartening, but dishonoring to God's Word and faithfulness. Thousands of our opponents justly recoil from such saddening interpretation.

<sup>9</sup> Dr. Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., p. 209, note) remarks that the Duke of Manchester holds that the judgment of Rev. 20 : 11-15 is a counterpart of Daniel's (ch. 7) vision of the Ancient of Days, and is for the destruction of the four monarchies, and hence is Pre-Millennial. But this is to violate the chronological order of Dan. 7 and of Rev. 19 and 20, as well as the general analogy of prediction. The theory is utterly untenable. (Comp. e.g. Props. 123, 132, 133, 134, etc.)

<sup>10</sup> Prof. Stuart, Com. loci, says : " Any great change from a degraded and wretched condition, temporal or spiritual, may indeed be figuratively called a resurrection unto life, i. e. to happiness, but it would be out of the question to name it a first resurrection. This implies of necessity a comparison with a second in kind, but must precede it in the order of time." If the meaning of the word " first," as given by Barnes, etc., is to be observed, then the reader will notice the inconsistency (1) in making the last literal and not the first, and (2) of calling that " first" which, according to their own showing, is only a continuation (moral, spiritual) of past experienced conversion, piety, etc.

<sup>11</sup> Thus e.g. if this denotes conversion, piety, etc., it would not be true that this was the first, seeing that in all ages this has been experienced. So also in reference to martyrs or martyr spirit, which was frequently previously manifested. Again : if it denotes a literal resurrection, then it is not correct to call it the first, in relation to time, for instead of being in this sense the first it was preceded by the resurrection of Christ, the resurrection of Lazarus and others, the resurrection of the many saints who arose out of their graves after Christ's crucifixion, and the resurrection of those who precede the last great tribulation, the 144,000, the resurrection under the seventh trumpet, Rev. 11, when the prophets are mentioned. In regard to the latter we are convinced by careful comparison that the resurrection here only includes those who pass through that last tribulation, martyrs and others, while a silent, unperceived, but happy resurrection of preceding saints, those who come with Jesus, Rev. 19, Zech. 14, and who sit on the thrones, etc., has taken place previous to this period. These last having also endured and passed through tribulation faithfully are accounted worthy of the same position, rank, etc., with the others ; and hence " This is the first resurrection," i. e. this too or also is included, etc.

<sup>12</sup> Hence the warning of Bh. Newton to those who make the first figurative, lest the same principles be applied to the last, and the resurrection be entirely ignored ; which is fulfilled in many instances. A very recent writer, Rev. Burdick, in the New York Evangelist (Feb. 3d, 1876), says : " In the second resurrection, implied from the first, the fact described is an uprising of the spiritual forces in the kingdom of Satan." Strange " uprising" indeed, when the whole tenor of the prediction is to describe a crushing out of evil. But we must say that here at least is consistency of interpretation ; for if the first resurrection is spiritualized, it is only a fair and legitimate procedure to spiritualize the second.

<sup>13</sup> Our opponents, when not directly attacking us, themselves acknowledge that " the resurrection" is connected with " the harvest." Thus e.g. Barnes (Com.) on the Parable of the Tares and Wheat. But as it can be readily shown that the harvest precedes the Millennial era, it follows that a resurrection also precedes.

<sup>14</sup> Dr. Meyer (Com. on Matt. 3 : 2) gives the following summary of the Jewish view : " The common idea of the Jews in regard to the Messianic Kingdom was predominantly politico-national, with the fanatical stamp of an universal dominion, to last a thousand years ; the Messiah awakes the descendants of Abraham ; then follow the reign of a thousand years ; the resurrection and condemnation of the heathen ; the descent of the heavenly Jerusalem, and the eternal life of the descendants of Abraham on the earth, which is to be transformed, along with the universe" (quoted Bib. Sacra, Jan., 1851). Comp. Wetstein on Rev. 20, and commentators generally. Prof. Bush (Mil.) quotes a number of Jewish authorities that directly refer to the thousand years. See also Prop. 143.

<sup>15</sup> Our opponents are hard pressed with this last phrase respecting the rest of the dead. Some, as Bush and others, endeavor to correct our version by late mss. and render it so that it shall mean that they never lived again, but as this is antagonistic to the leading authoritative mss., our opponents are forced to yield us the passage as it stands, and seek out some interpretation to suit their theory. Simple consistency drives them, of course, to give them the same kind of a spiritual life (seeing that the same word expressive of living is given to both), that those entitled to the first resurrection received. Thus e.g. Fairbairn (On Prop., p. 463) makes this a resurrection of " mongrel characters," of classes of characters lukewarm, polluted, etc., to a renewed Christian life ; Waldegrave (Lectures) informs us that it denotes that " the great body of truly living souls should be brought to God ;" but Barnes (Com. loci), forgetting his own distinction of " spiritually dead in sins," etc., actually makes the pious spiritually dead, for he says : " The rest of the dead"—the pious dead—would indeed be raised up and rewarded, but they would occupy comparatively humble places," etc., i. e. at the end of these thousand years these "pious dead" (spiritually dead) would also receive a quickening, etc., and thus distinguishes the living of the one class to be higher than that of the other. Thus with all of them; not one of them can give a consistent interpretation of this clause bearing the test of the slightest examination. Hence Bh. Newton (On Proph.) well observes that the allegorizing of this text "cannot be admitted without the greatest torture and violence. For with what propriety can it be said that some of the dead, who were beheaded, 'lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years; but the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished;' unless the dying and living again be the same in both places, a proper death and resurrection?"

Obs. 4. The last reason assigned is so much overlooked that it is worthy of more extended notice. Remark (1) the same word "lived" is applied to both, the saints favored with the first resurrection, and to the rest of the dead, and must mean in both cases the same kind of a resurrection; i. e. a corporeal one; (2) that "the rest of the dead" not being raised up from the dead, do not live or exist during this Millennial period, remaining in their graves. Is this view that John gives sustained by the analogy of faith? The answer from numerous passages and different writers is affirmative. But first let us observe that "the rest of the dead" are the wicked or unbelieving, seeing that the reason why they did not obtain the resurrection is because they were unholy, did not witness for Jesus, and did not reject the worship and mark of the beast. They were regarded as unworthy of it, and the reign, etc., is only promised to the righteous. Now let us compare what the Spirit, alone capable of indicating the line of God's purpose, says the fate of the wicked dead is during these thousand years, and if the general tenor of the Word represents their condition similar to the one here portrayed, then we have an ample vindication of our position. 1. Even the wise man in Prov. 21 : 16 intimates their fate: "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Now, both righteous and wicked are still "in the congregation of the dead," but this shall not always be so, for the "set time" is coming when the man void of understanding "shall remain," among "the dead," while the man of understanding shall be removed "out of or from among the dead ones." 2. Hannah in the prayer already alluded to, 1 Sam. 2 : 9, after expressing her faith in a resurrection, in God's bringing up again from the grave, and then in the exaltation of saints to be princes, significantly shows her faith in its priority: "He will keep the feet of His saints, and the wicked shall be silent in darkness, for by strength shall no man prevail." How often is this repeated, that God will deliver the feet of His saints from the pit or grave, that by strength no man can deliver himself from death, that the wicked shall remain in darkness, that "they shall be blotted out of the book of the living and not be written with the righteous," etc. 3. Then a large class of passages teach that a time is coming when (as Ps. 52 : 5, etc.) the wicked shall be utterly "rooted out of the land of the living." The righteous shall live and rejoice, while the wicked are removed from the face of the earth. To what period can this refer but to this one, seeing that down to the very Advent itself a multitude of the wicked do exist. This is the more conclusive when we come to examine the passages more closely. Thus, e. g. Mal., chs. 3 and 4, gives (a) a day or time when God will "make up," bring together, His "jewels"; (b) "Then shall ye return;" (c) For there shall be "a discerning between the righteous and the wicked;" (d) the wicked shall be utterly rooted out; (e) the righteous shall in that day find the wicked "ashes under the soles of their feet;" (f) it is a time for "healing" the breach of His people and is performed by Christ.<sup>1</sup> In the 37th Ps. it is united with the time when "the meek shall inherit the earth," for "evil-doers shall be cut off; but those that wait upon the Lord they shall inherit the earth. For yet a little while and the wicked shall not be; yea thou shalt diligently consider his place and it shall not be," etc. (see vs. 20, 22, 28, 34). This inheriting of the earth Christ promises to all the meek (Matt. 5 : 5), but to do this they must, of necessity, arise from the dead, and when they inherit the wicked are "cut off," "perish," "are not," etc., thus corresponding with the period under consideration. 4. In the 140th Ps. is typically presented the last confederation of wickedness, under the title of "the violent man," who is not "to be established in the earth," but is to be "overthrown," for it is said "Let burning coals fall upon them: let them be cast into the fire: into deep pits, that they rise not up again," while the poor are delivered and "the upright shall dwell in Thy presence." In Ps. 146 there is (a) the dead, even princes, perish; (b) but he is happy who has God for his help in such an extremity; (c) because "the Lord looseth the prisoners, and (d) reigns." Then is verified Ps. 147, "The Lord lifteth up the meek, He casteth the wicked down to the ground;" Prov. 12 : 7, "The wicked are overthrown and are not, but the house of the righteous shall stand." 5. The concealment of the wicked in their graves during a certain time is to be verified in the case of "every one," and is appealed to as God's prerogative to perform. In Job 40 : 13, the Lord Himself is represented as saying: "Look on every one that is proud and bring him low, and tread down the wicked in his place. Hide them in the dust together and bind their faces (persons, Barnes, loci) in secret" ("in prison," so Barnes, "darkness," others). The meaning of this may be found in another part of the same book, ch. 27 : 19, where they are represented as not among "the gathered." For opening with v. 13, "This is the portion of a wicked man with God and the heritage of oppressors, which they shall receive of the Almighty" he announces, "The rich man (wicked) shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered; he openeth his eyes and is not." 6. A most circumstantial statement indicating the Pre-Millennial resurrection and that the rest of the dead do not participate in it, is found in Isa. chs. 24, 25, and 26. (A) In Isa. 24, after delineating the fearful "day" when the Lord shall punish the high ones and kings of the earth (as in Rev. 19, etc.) just preceding the Millennial glory, the prophet, referring to the wicked, adds: "And they shall be gathered together as prisoners are gathered in the pit (Heb.—with the gathering of prisoners), and shall be shut up in the prison, and after many days they shall be visited." When this is done, "then the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mt. Zion and in Jerusalem and before His ancients gloriously." Here we have (a) a complete overthrow of God's enemies; (b) their confinement to prison or the grave at the very time Christ reigns at Jerusalem; (c) that after "many days," corresponding with the thousand years, "they shall be visited," i.e. made manifest, released, "live again." (B) In the Mill. prediction of Isa. 25 : 6-8, we find it preceded and followed by a representation that the wicked are destroyed, removed from the face of the earth, a work directly attributed to God. In the Millennium death is swallowed up in victory alone in the case of the righteous, as we have already shown, while the enemies of God are removed and the impression is made, nothing being said of them but what indicates death and the grave, that they remain under the power of the grave, while the people of God are released. If both the righteous and the wicked are to be resurrected at the same period, how do we then account for the resurrection of the saints being mentioned in connection with this period, while the wicked are represented as non-resurrected? (C) This is clearly established in the next ch., 26, in "the Song," which is to be "sung in the land of Judah," "in that day," viz., at the time the Millennial age is ushered in. The peace, happiness, prosperity, deliverance from enemies in that day is alluded to, and of the enemies it is emphatically said: "They are dead; they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore hast Thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." And in order that we need not misapprehend the meaning, the condition of these wicked is contrasted with that of the righteous, as follows: "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." Do we need stronger confirmatory evidence, when it is added that, as in Rev., etc., "the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain," i.e. those martyred for the truth, etc.?" 7. In Ps. 31, when death is represented as befalling the Psalmist, he expresses his hope in redemption from the grave, and says of God, Thou "hast not shut me up in the hand of the enemy (i.e. death); thou hast set my feet in a large room" (i.e. equivalent to rich deliverance), and repeating his trust, he contrasts his hoped-for experience with that of the wicked: "let me not be ashamed, O Lord; for I have called upon Thee; let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent in the grave (marg. read., let them be cut off for the grave.)" But this is more definitely given in Ps. 49, where all men are said to "see corruption," being unable to redeem themselves from death, so that "like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them," and marg. reads, "the grave being a habitation to every one of them," but a hope is expressed in favor of the righteous; "but God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave," etc., while the others remain in their graves, for farther on it is said of this class that "they shall never see light," comp. Ps. 56 : 13, as those who are brought again into the land of the living under the Mill. light of the glorious Sun of righteousness. 8. Indeed, on all sides we find Scripture which imply or take for granted this detention of the wicked dead in their graves and the priority of the res. of the righteous. Even in such passages as Luke 20 : 34-36, in addition to the argument already based on the preposition "out of or from among," the use of the phrase "they that shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead," implies that some shall not be accounted worthy, and hence shall not then be raised up. So also the language of Ps. 115 : 17, 18, comp. with Ps. 88 : 10, 11, 12, 13, receives increased pertinency if this idea is noticed. To illustrate our meaning, Isa. 42 is selected as an example. Here is (1) the promise of the Messiah; (2) the work He shall perform, including the delivering of "the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house;" (3) the Mill. blessedness; (4) for the Lord cometh as "a man of war" (comp. Rev. 19); (5) to the utter overthrow of His enemies; (6) the release of His own people; (7) but while He asserts this release and the blessings that follow, He declares of the wicked and of those addicted to image-worship (comp.

Rev. 19 and 20) : " But this is a people robbed and spoiled ; they are all of them snares in holes, and they are hid in prison houses ; they are for a prey, and none delivereth ; for a spoil, and none saith, Restore." But in the redemption promised, as parallel passages show, only the pious portion of Israel is restored, which implies that the image-worshippers and other wicked remain in their "prisons." For the more obscure passages must be interpreted by those decisive, as Isa. 26, etc. The connection of this doctrine can even be seen in Isa. 43 : 17, for of the Babylonians (we need not consider whether typical name or not) it is said, " They shall lie down together ; they shall not rise ; they are extinct, they are quenched as tow," and the prophet passing rapidly to "the new thing" which God will perform in the Millennial period, speaks of those first-born of the dead who shall arise : "This people have I formed for myself ; they shall show forth my praise" (comp. Ps. 102 : 18, etc. ; Eph. 1 : 10-12, etc.). 9. But there is still another class of passages which confirm the rising of the rest of the dead at the end of the thousand years, as in Isa. 24 : 22, when after "many days" those detained by death shall be released. Thus in Ps. 6 : 10, there is an evident allusion to the return of the wicked dead after an interval of time. Observe that the Psalm describes (1) the death of the "saint ; (2) prays for a release from death and the grave ; (3) asks "how long," as the martyrs do, before the release comes ; (4) expresses the fact that God has heard and granted his supplication and prayer, which implies, of course, his resurrection ; (5) but while this prayer is answered in his own experience, the enemies, the wicked, are to "be ashamed and sore vexed ; let them return and be ashamed suddenly ;" (6) he declares that the Lord will "return" (implying, as the facts in the history of Christ prove, that He is removed for a while), that "the workers of iniquity" shall be removed, but finally "return" and realize a sudden shame, such as a second res. will produce ; (7) and the earnest praying, longing, and even weeping, for such a res. shows it to be a significant one, very different in order and allotments from that of the wicked. In Ps. 109 we have the wicked, v. 15, "cut off from the earth," but the poor and needy shall be delivered, and then follows again, in reference to the adversaries, "when they arise, let them be ashamed." Ps. 59, so difficult of explanation by commentators, receives new light and consistency when viewed from this standpoint. For (1) "the mighty," the wicked are described as arrayed against God, just as predicted (Rev. 19, etc.) before the Millennial period ; (2) the God of Israel is to consume them with His wrath, just as then happens ; (3) they are removed, "that they may not be," i.e. cease to exist on earth ; (4) but they shall return again ; for, as we shall abundantly show hereafter, the Millennial day has its morning and its evening, they return in the evening of the day, "they return at evening," i.e. the same enemies destroyed shall come back again at the close of the Millennial day ; (5) when they return then shall "they make a noise like a dog and go round about the city," which encompassing the city is precisely what follows the ending of the thousand years, Rev. 20 : 9 ; (6) for "a city" pre-eminent for dignity and glory shall characterize the Millennial era ; (7) and this is done when "God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth," i.e. when the predicted Theocratic Kingdom is firmly and universally established.

Now, taking all these considerations together, and how they so accurately correspond with the general tenor of the Word, with the Covenant and the promises based on the Covenant, it seems that the early Church faith was eminently logical, scriptural, and necessary, and that we have a literal Pre-Millennial resurrection of saints unmistakably presented.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Tertullian (On the Res. of the Flesh, ch. 31) renders Mal. 4 : 2, 3, "Ye shall go forth from your sepulchres as young calves let loose from their bonds, and ye shall tread down your enemies."

<sup>2</sup> To indicate how this was understood anciently, we refer to the version given by the Chaldee Paraphrase to the phrase "that they rise not up again," which (Clarke's Com. loci) is as follows: "From which they shall not have a resurrection to eternal life."

<sup>3</sup> The interpretation usually given to the latter clause, that it denotes sudden destruction (Barnes, loci) may be correct, but that given to the gathering, meaning that he shall not meet an honorable burial, is evidently a gloss, for "the portion" of multitudes of wicked rich men is an honorable burial, while many a believer has had a dishonorable one. Other Scriptures do teach a gathering from which the wicked are excluded. The death being once admitted, the not being gathered is naturally to be referred to his being left when a gathering of the dead takes place. For of the wicked it may be truly said, Prov. 20 : 20, "his lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness." To this may be added (although some render it differently, as if it referred solely to this life or to the funeral pomp) Job 21 : 30, "Do ye not know their tokens, that the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction? they shall be brought forth to the day of wrath."

<sup>4</sup> As a specimen of early free rendering we give that of Gildas (A.D. 546, Works, s. 45) : "And it shall be that our Lord in the same day shall look . . . on the kings of the earth, who are upon the earth, and they shall be gathered together in the bundle of one burden into the lake and shall be shut up in prison, and after many days shall they be visited."

<sup>5</sup> Delitzsch's rendering is : "And it cometh to pass in that day, Jehovah will visit the army of the high place, in the high place, and the kings of the earth on the earth. And they are imprisoned, as one imprisons captives in the pit, and shut up in prison, and in the course of many days they are visited." The exact parallel to this is found in Rev. 19 : 20, although Nägelsbach justly includes the binding of Satan and his loosening out of prison after many days (one thousand years after), Rev. 20 : 3, 7. Nägelsbach's rendering is : "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall punish (visit upon) the host of the high ones that are on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth. And they shall be gathered together, as prisoners are gathered in the pit (with the gathering of prisoners), and shall be shut in the prison, and after many days shall they be visited."

<sup>6</sup> The passage, "Thy dead men shall live," etc., is interesting in view of Luther's reading it to his dying daughter Margaret, sustaining his own heart by the hope of a resurrection. Calvin (Instit., c. 25, s. 4) also quotes it as proving a resurrection. Thus a multitude of writers. The Jews also held to the same, for e.g. Kimchi remarks on it "then many of the saints shall rise from the dead," and for confirmation quotes Dan. 12 : 2. Even Rosenmüller and Hitzig (Alexander's Isa. loci) understand the last clause of Isa. 26 : 21 as a prediction that the dead should actually come out of the graves; while such writers as Barnes (Com. loci), following the rationalistic lead, make all figurative of a restoration to their own land, thus frittering away a magnificent promise as if it had been fulfilled in that weak and still oppressed condition after the return from Babylon. Strange, when some men can see no resurrection in the plainest passages, others find it even in Isa. 26 : 20, as e.g. Clement (First Epis., ch. 50, A.D. 97) renders it : "Enter into thy secret chambers for a little time, until my wrath and fury pass away; and I will remember a propitious day and will raise you up out of your graves" (comp. Tertullian, On the Res. of the Flesh, ch. 27). We append a few renderings of v. 19 : Tertullian (On the Res., ch. 31) gives : "The dead shall arise and come forth from their graves; for the dew which cometh from Thee is medicine to their bones." Augustine (City of God, b. 20, c. 21), "The dead shall rise again, and all who were in the graves shall rise again; and all who are in the earth shall rejoice; for the dew which is of Thee is their health, and the earth of the wicked shall fall." Dr. Tregelles (On Dan., p. 156) : "Thy dead men shall live; they shall arise, my dead body," and adds : "such are the words literally. Identified with Christ, as being His members." Nägelsbach (Lange's Isa.) heads this portion of prophecy : "The resurrection of the dead and the concluding acts of the judgment of the world." He gives : "Thy dead men shall live; together with my dead shall they arise (or, my dead body shall arise). Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs (lights), and the earth shall cast out the dead." Delitzsch : "Thy dead will live, my corpses rise again. Awake and rejoice, ye that lie in the dust! for thy dew is dew of the lights, and the earth will bring shades to the day." Prof. Bush renders v. 14: "They are dead men, they shall not live; they are deceased tyrants, they shall not rise, therefore," etc., and he adopts Bh. Lowth's of v. 19: "Thy dead shall live, my deceased, they shall arise; awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust! For thy dew is as the dew of the dawn; but the earth shall cast forth, as an abortion, the deceased tyrants." (He undoubtedly mistakes in the last member, in his reference to "the deceased tyrants.") Compare Fausset and commentators generally.

<sup>1</sup> This subject might be extended. The allusion in Hab. 1:12 seems to refer to this period of resurrection, for in the second chapter those just who live by faith are represented, when the vision shall be realized in its "appointed time," as finally triumphing over the culminated Antichrist, the "proud man" "who enlargeth his desire as hell and as death (persecutes to the grave) and cannot be satisfied, but gathereth unto him all nations (Rev. 19, etc.) and heapeth unto him all people." But how is this triumph brought about, just as John here describes: "Shall they not rise up suddenly that shall bite thee and awake that shall vex thee?" etc. So Ps. 118: this gathering of nations foretold their overthrow and destruction, a deliverance of the righteous from death, while the others are not thus delivered. Some (Kimchi) render Ps. 1:5, "The wicked shall not rise in judgment, nor sinners in the assembly of the just," which, with the Scriptural idea of the saints' judgship, would be in harmony with our view. But these instances are amply sufficient, and refute the opinion of Curry (Bible Examiner, vol. 14, p. 519, etc.) that "the doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked is not contained in the Old Testament." To sustain this position only two passages of the Old Test. (Job 21:30 and Dan. 12:2) are brought forward and disposed of—all others being ignored. Job is removed by another rendering, which may or may not be correct. Daniel is corrected as follows: "And many of the sleepers in the dust of the earth shall awake, these to everlasting life, but those to shame, to everlasting abhorrence," and the inference is made that "those who do not awake" are given to shame. But is the inference a just one? To decide this question it is requisite to let the general analogy of Scripture speak, and this leads us to another inference, viz., that "those" who also ultimately "awake," but not in the order of "these" (i.e. the former ones), are given to shame. For no clearer truth is taught in God's Word than this: that there are two resurrections (as e.g. in John 5:28, 29—the parabolic objection has no force, seeing that actual real resurrections were "now" (i.e. then) witnessed—Acts 24:15, etc.), one for the righteous unto life, and the other for the wicked unto condemnation. We see no necessity for this modern departure from the primitive church view, especially when antagonistic to so much Scripture that can only be bent to its purpose by special pleading.

Dr. Thomas, as in his Works, rejects an ultimate resurrection of the wicked, and in Eureka advocates that "the rest of the dead" refers to those who die during the Millennial period, thus foisting on the passage a meaning which is not contained in it. Other Christadelphians, more logically, endeavor to get rid of the passage by questioning its Scriptural authority. So also Russell and Barbour endeavor to get rid of the phrase in order to make out their peculiar (Bellyite) restoration of "the rest of the dead" during the Millennial age. As the passage stands, it is utterly and positively antagonistic to their view. Hence as the Sinaitic mss. has it omitted, they conclude (in behalf of their theory) that it is an interpolation. They forget (1) that Tischendorf (The New Test.) pronounces this, in view of the ancient evidence, "a mere error;" (2) that the Alexandrian, Vatican, and numerous other authoritative mss. contain it; (3) that so decided is this that it is found in the ancient and modern versions recognized by the ablest critics, retained in the Variorum, New Revision, etc.; (4) it is quoted or alluded to by men who lived even before these mss. as an authoritative reading; (5) that the opponents of Pre-Millenarianism, who would gladly rid themselves of it (as not in harmony with their views) if they could, concede it as Scriptural; (6) the retention of the passage is, as we have shown, in full accord with the general teaching on the subject. So noted, in the estimation of opposers, is this Scripture, that e.g. Lindsay (Art. "Mill." in Ency. Brit.) by this living or "resurrection is intended the temporary restoration of the reign of evil after the Mill."

Obs. 5. Some might regard our work imperfect if we did not notice the objections alleged against our interpretation of Rev. 20. For this passage is wrongfully supposed to be the citadel (when merely an outpost) of our doctrine, and hence is the chief object of attack. Let us therefore briefly pass them in review.<sup>1</sup> 1. That it is presumptive evidence against us that a literal Pre-Millennial res., if taught at all, is only found in this place, so Barnes, etc. Reply: We leave the student to judge for himself, in view of the Jewish belief and that of the early Church based on Old Test. passages.* 2. It ought, if teaching such a res., to be less ambiguous, so Barnes, etc. Reply: It is sufficient, distinctive for the wise and prudent, even for Prof. Stuart, etc., for God's expressed purpose is that it shall come as "a snare" upon the wicked.* 3. The objection grounded on the use of the word "souls," urged by Witsius, Brown, Barnes, Fairbairn, etc., has been sufficiently met.* 4. That nothing is mentioned of "books being opened," so Barnes and others. Reply: This is done by the Spirit in Dan. 7: 11 and 12: 1, both Pre-Millennial. 5. That Millenarians differ in the details, so Waldegrave and others. Reply: This is a double-edged weapon that can be turned with damaging force against themselves, for while we are a unit in the grand outlines of our doctrine, our opponents have fundamental diversities and antagonistic theories based on the passage.* Besides, diversity of opinion among themselves is not urged by us as proof of the falsity of a doctrine, our appeal is to the Word itself. 6. Nothing is said of their employments, so Barnes. Reply: It is said that they shall reign. 7. No "reason" is assigned "why they are raised," Barnes. Reply: It is given in their reigning. 8. Nothing is stated "of the new circumstances of their being," Barnes. Reply: It is given in their immortality and reigning. 9. Nothing is said "of their condition when the thousand years shall have ended," Barnes. Reply: That is done in other places, for the thousand years do not limit their reign (Prop. 159). 10. But various writers urge that reigning during these thousand years limits it only to that period, so Barnes, etc. Reply: This is a mere quibble, for the thousand years are expressly referred to as intended to denote the period of the binding of Satan, and that also during this period of binding the reign of the saints is established. The duration of the reign must be sought for in passages which describe it. 11. No mention is made of "bodies," so Ralston, Barnes. Reply: Not necessary, as we have shown, according to usage of language. Besides, this is spoken of dead ones who have been beheaded, etc. See Barnes, Com. Acts 2: 27, and compare with his Com. Rev. 20: 4 for a complete answer. 12. It is alleged that if this is a lit. res., then all the righteous must be included, but only two classes are referred to, viz., the martyrs and those who did not worship the beast, so Barnes and many others. Reply: If it were necessary, the concessions of numerous critics, Stuart, etc., might be used to embrace others also, but we, with the meaning of "first resurrection" before us, cordially accept of these two classes alone, believing as we do that the resurrection of the others preceded this one. The line of argument adopted by our opponents proves too much, for it would exclude the res. of the saints after Christ's crucifixion (Matt. 27: 51-53), etc.* 13. No res. of the unjust is mentioned, so Brown, Barnes. Reply: This is a mistake, it is to take place after the thousand years. This objection is based on the supposition (Popish) of a general universal resurrection, simply because both resurrections, without specifying order or time, are mentioned together. This has been sufficiently answered. 14. That such a reign of Christ as we hold, with "a splendid capital at Jerusalem," etc., is not mentioned in the passage, so Barnes. Reply: If we are to adopt such a criterion to test the truth of any portion of Scripture, then we must yield up many a valuable proof of our Christianity. Our answer is, a comparison of Scripture must indicate what belongs to the period. The Spirit to test faith, etc., gives us truths in a disconnected form, often isolated, which we are to bring together. 15. That if this is a lit. res., saints do not need the assurance "on such the second death hath no power," so Barnes. Reply: This has been already answered. We add: It is not for us to prescribe what is needed. Besides, a res. of dead ones being mentioned, it appears exceedingly appropriate, since so many desire to doubt it, to declare it to be a res. unto immortality. 16. That there are two classes only, one who are resurrected, and another who are under the power of the second death; "into which of these classes are we to put the myriads of men having flesh and blood who are to people the world during the Millennium?" so Barnes. Reply: Into neither of them, for this passage only describes the dead, and not the living. Who the rest are can easily be ascertained. 17. If a lit. res., then the rest of the dead must also literally arise "immediately after the thousand years are finished, but that is not stated," so Barnes and Brown. Reply: The concession is made that if the first is literal the other must be the same; this at least indicates our consistency. But the rest does not follow, for the phrase "immediately after" is not in the text. If we can show, as we have done, that "after" the thousand years, even if some time after (for the text only alludes to their non-resurrection during the thousand years), a second res., also literal (as Barnes himself admits), takes place, that is amply sufficient to sustain our position. 18. It is a symbolic representation, so Barnes, etc. Reply: Precisely so, and real, actual occurrences are symbolized, not figurative ones. Besides, the symmetry of symbolism must be observed, for e.g. it would be incongruous to make a violent death received, and dead ones, made so for the truth's sake symbolize sin, evil, etc.' 19. All the dead, vs. 1-15, will be raised up at Christ's Coming, so Brown, Barnes, etc. Reply: This proves too much, for some of the dead have been previously raised. Besides, concise passages which state in general terms and in juxtaposition the res. of both just and unjust must be interpreted by those in which the order is laid down; while in Rev. 20: 11-15 the dead then mentioned are those found in that condition at that period, for in no shape or form is it intimated that it is the only res.* 20. There is no Advent of Christ connected with this res., so Barnes. Reply: There is; see preceding chapter. 21. "All the righteous and wicked will be judged together, and both at the Coming of Christ," so Barnes, Brown, etc. Reply: Notwithstanding the assertion that "it is utterly impossible to explain these passages," etc., given as proof, we unhesitatingly pronounce this doctrine pure assumption, a virtual adoption of old monkish views, irreconcilable with the facts stated in those very Scriptures, and antagonistic to the statements of the Divine Spirit. For full proof we refer the reader to the Propositions on Judgment (Props. 132 and 133), to the analysis (Prop. 134) of Matt. 25: 31-46 (the main proof text relied on), and to the order of Judgment which follows that of the resurrection (as e.g. Props 161-164). Many of the proofs alleged simply refer to judgment of all men, which we receive; or to the judgment of the righteous and of the wicked at Christ's Advent, which we also believe, and not one of them asserts that at the Coming of Christ both the righteous and the wicked dead shall be raised up, and a general judgment of these two classes will then be held. This is simply inferred, as we shall conclusively show hereafter. If the modern notion is correct, then the pious Jews and early Church groped in worse than Egyptian darkness.*

22. The rise of Gog and Magog is against the idea of a literal resurrection, so Brown and others. Reply: We fail to see it; for if God intends to raise up certain of the dead previously to Gog and Magog (whatever these names may denote), it will be performed. 23. That if the res. be literal, then some of the Apostles and other good Christians would be excluded, so Fairbairn. Reply: This has been answered, but we may add: This objection overlooks the fact that not all martyrs, but only those at a particular period of time (during the time of the beast and prophet) are specified, viz., those under the last persecution. Again, it reads this res. isolated, whereas to obtain the whole doctrine all the passages (as e.g. in ch. 11; 1 Cor. 15; Isa. 25, etc.) bearing on the subject are to be recognized in their proper order, which, of course, includes the Prophets, Apostles, all saints. 24. "The rest of the dead neither awake nor live during the thousand years, nor at any other time," so Bush and Paræus. Reply: This is directly opposed by the text, as admitted by many—nearly all—of our opponents. The effort to sustain this objection by altering the text from "lived not again" to "lived not," on the authority of a few mss., is a failure, since all the mss. more ancient are opposed to it, fully sustaining our version. Even if the change were allowed, it would still favor our doctrine. These are the leading objections urged against our interpretation, and the student can readily see that many of them are merely captious, i.e. seeking for difficulties and manufacturing them; others, nearly all, are inferential; while not one of them is based on a direct, positive, scriptural statement, unless obj. 21 forms an exception. The value of the latter will appear as we proceed. Recent writers (as Hodge, Sys. Div., in part relating to Eschatology) have presented no new objections, but simply reiterate what have been repeatedly answered, without observing and replying to our line of argument founded in the covenant itself.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> These objections have been met by Rev. Carleton's articles in the Theol. and Lit. Journal for 1853-4 on "The Rev. Al. Barnes's Notes on Rev. 20: 4-6," by Dr. Lord's criticism of Dr. Brown's work in same journal, and by numerous Millenarian writers, such as Noel, Brookes, Seiss, etc. An excellent Treatise is Rev. Sirr's First Res. In these the objections are answered at length.

<sup>2</sup> It certainly is unjust to ignore the Jewish and early Church belief, that the covenant would be fulfilled in the restored Davidic throne and Kingdom, which was to be accomplished by a resurrection of saints, and the numerous passages alleged to sustain this view as found in the Old Test. Rev. 20 was adduced by the Primitive Christians in confirmation of this doctrine. The foundation of the Millenarian system is the covenant, and Rev. 20 only illustrates how a certain feature pertaining to it is to be realized. Hence any attack upon us which leaves untouched the covenant and covenant promises is one-sided and unavailing. For the Jewish belief, we may e.g. refer to the works of Lightfoot, Mede, Bush, etc., as well as to the articles in the Bib. Cyclops.; and for the Primitive Church view we may alone cite the Ante-Nicene Library.

<sup>3</sup> The plea of ambiguity does not exist when a moral, or spiritual, or ecclesiastical interpretation is urged. Yet our opponents frankly admit that the language is expressive of a literal resurrection, for (1) they inform us that the figure is derived from the doctrine of the resurrection, and (2) they confess (as Dr. Hodge, Sys. Div., vol. 3, p. 841) "it must be admitted that that passage (viz., Rev. 20: 4-6), taken by itself, does seem to teach the doctrine (i.e. literal resurrection) founded upon it" (but still shields himself behind its obscurity, overlooking the previous usage of its language both in the Scriptures and among the Jews). On this point the reader will be pleased to observe the emphatic testimony of Dean Alford (Gr. Test., on Rev. 20: 4-6). Comp. Obs. 11.

<sup>4</sup> How Barnes (Conn. loci) can say, "By no possible construction can it (souls) mean the bodies of the saints," how Lindsay (Art. "Mill." in Ency. Brit.) can remark that our interpretation "would outrage all propriety of language," how a multitude reiterate such statements in the face of Scriptural and Jewish usage, must undoubtedly be attributed to prejudice. The vision simply represents by "the souls" certain persons, which includes, as usage demonstrates, the bodies who experienced this resurrection. A theory that must sustain itself by such extravagant assertions is palpably defective. The answering feature is that these same critics when they come to the "beheading" (for these souls were beheaded), suddenly forget their own objections, and then speak of them as persons, including the bodies which were decapitated.

<sup>5</sup> Some in spiritualizing make it past, others present, and others still future; some interpret it as a continued representation of martyrdom and suffering, others of triumph and peace, and still others a kind of combination of the two, etc. Bush (Mill.), Gipps (First Res.), make martyrdom its prominent feature; Barnes (Com. loci), Whately (Essays) gives us the revival of martyr spirit and energy; Ralston (The Rev. of John) and others constitute it an era of missions; Hazard (Rev. Revealed) and others make it a restoration of the Church to civil and religious power; many Augustineans constitute it a representation of this dispensation; others again unite several of these features.

<sup>6</sup> The confinement of the resurrection to particular classes at a specified time does not invalidate its literalness or exclude previous ones, just as Christ's assertions did not that of "the many who arose." Winthrop (Lec. 132) advocates two cases as mentioned in this passage, viz., the martyrs and those who did not worship the beast, saying that such "is the general opinion of critical commentators." The author of The Kingdom of Grace calls this into question and (overlooking Barnes, Stuart, etc.) stigmatizes these critical commentators to be "of course" Millenarian, asserting "that there is not a single rule of grammar in the world which will justify the use of this ellipsis." This writer thus exhibits his lack of knowledge of what frequently occurs in Greek, and which is frankly acknowledged by the ablest of our opponents. Thus e.g. Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 456) translates: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them; and (I saw) the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness (testimony) of Jesus and for the Word of God; and such as had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." Compare Roe's Analyt. Arrange. of Apoc., who also makes (a) of "the souls," those who had been beheaded, "and (b) whoever had not worshipped the beast," etc. So Witsius (Exer. Sacra, p. 516), and many after him explain it. Our view of the passage confines it exclusively to the persons who suffer and die under the last terrible persecution of the Antichrist, and that they also pertain to the rights and privileges of "the first-born" as already explained. The first resurrection, for aught we know, may embrace Matt. 26 : 52, 53; 1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17; Rev. 7 : 9-17, and chs. 12 and 14—this, at least, is the opinion of many (see e.g. an editorial, Proph. Times, vol. 8, p. 31, etc.); for as Selnecker (quoted by Seiss) remarks: "To this resurrection belongs everything that is raised to immortality before the last day." One thing is self-evident, however we may consider the different stages (as Baxter and others), less or more, this resurrection does not prevent preceding, but identifies it as belonging to that of the righteous by the emphasis placed on the word "first."

<sup>7</sup> Lord (Theol. and Lit. Journal, vol. 6, p. 453) concisely states this as follows: "As the apostasy of the soul to sin is the antecedent and cause of the death of the body, so the renovation of the soul is a necessary antecedent and prerequisite of the resurrection of the body to a glorious life. A resurrection of the body cannot therefore be used as a symbol of the renovation of the soul. It were to reverse the order of nature and of grace, and make a consequent the representative of an antecedent, an effect the symbols of an indispensable condition of its own existence, which were absurd." Besides this, the objection is futile, for the simple reason that these same objectors interpret the concluding portion of the chapter, also largely symbolic, as denoting a literal resurrection. Lord falls into an inadvertency when in the context he asserts that no other symbol could be found to indicate the saints, for he overlooks the fact that he in another place makes "the stone" of Dan. 2 to symbolize the same (which latter statement we cannot receive, for the reasons assigned under another Prop.).

<sup>8</sup> Professor Sanborn (Essay on Millenarianism) makes even the extravagant assertion that "the Church has believed in all ages that there would be a simultaneous resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust." A scholar acquainted with the history of the doctrine could not make such a declaration, so utterly opposed by the Jewish faith, the early Church belief for several centuries, and the expressed views of many eminent men in the Church. The passages alluded to by Prof. Sanborn merely assert the fact that both shall be raised, but says nothing of the order or of a simultaneous resurrection, leaving the order to be evolved by other passages relating to the subject, just as the Jews and primitive believers did in their teaching. It will not answer (as Dr. Hodge) to confine ourselves to one class of passages which, as all admit, can be referred to a resurrection of dead ones, both just and unjust, and ignore another class which teach a particular resurrection out of or from among dead ones, or which speak of the resurrection of the righteous as something separate and distinct from that of the wicked. If the resurrection is simultaneous, as our opponents claim, then we certainly see no propriety or force in Paul's wish as expressed Phil. 3 : 11, viz., expressing andue anxiety about that which is inevitable. Perhaps the greatest inadvertency to be met with in a serious controversial article is that found in the Presby. Quarterly Review for 1853, where the writer in one place makes even Rev. 20 : 12-14 "a resurrection or reappearance on earth of the old spirit of persecution," and then in another place, a literal resurrection of the dead, arguing as if we did not also hold that the resurrection and judgment of Rev. 20 : 12-14 was post-millennial. Some of our opponents, in charity, we trust, misapprehend our doctrinal position and ascribe views and interpretations to us that we do not hold.

The critical reader will observe that this resurrection is already based on a previous judgment. To insure a first resurrection there must be a corresponding fitness, and the resurrection itself is evidence of the divine acceptance of the person experiencing its power. In the nature of the case there must be an antecedent estimate and judgment of character, worthiness, etc. The Popish notion of judgment, so largely entertained by Protestants, is one that is simply inferred from a few passages considered isolated from the general analogy of Scripture on the subject (comp. Props. 132, 133, 134, 135, etc.). Sometimes we are unjustly charged (as by Prof. Sanborn and others) as if we did not associate a final judgment of the quick and the dead with the Sec. Advent of Christ. But our entire argument shows that we thus connect them, observing an order in the judgment as well as in the resurrection. Indeed, in one sense, it might even be designated "simultaneous," seeing that the non-resurrection of the rest of the dead until the thousand years are ended, implies already a judgment passed upon them by which they are accounted unworthy of the position and blessings entailed by the first resurrection.

We have presented and replied to the objections urged by Brown in Christ's Sec. Coming, and in addition show how utterly erroneous is the declaration made by him, that if a first resurrection is taught at all, it can only be found in Rev. 20. The general analogy of Scripture on the subject speaks for itself. The plea that if taught it ought to be "a clear and unambiguous revelation," is decidedly ambiguous after the clear statements of the Old Test., which we have shown, God Himself condescending to explain. The concessions coming from such a source are worthy of notice. Thus he concedes that the word "souls" does not forbid in connection the idea of "a bodily resurrection," for "they lived," not their souls, but themselves." Again he fully admits that while there is no specific mention of "the earth," yet that it is sufficiently "clear" "that the earth is the theatre of the Millennial reign," thus rejecting the notion of Ash, Piscator, Moore, etc., of locating this reign in heaven above. He confidently remarks (p. 226) in reference to the second resurrection of Rev. 20 : 12-15, that it is "a clear and unambiguous prophecy of the resurrection of all the righteous and wicked at once, and in proof of this I appeal to the all but universal voice of the Church. Has there ever been any testimony approaching to this, either in amount or harmony, in favor of the literal sense of the Millennial prophecy? No! there has not." We refer the reader to the history of the doctrine (Props. 74, 75, 76, 77, and 78), which indisputably shows that in the first period of the Church Dr. Brown's "all but universal voice" did not exist, but was brought into existence through the Alexandrian and Popish influence. Smith (Key to Rev.) spiritualizes the resurrection of the martyrs so that it "means the revival of the cause in which they lived and died," but the weight to be attached to such an opinion is self-evident from the annexed assertion that none of the saints resurrected are "to be raised to dwell again on the earth," so Gnostic is his feeling and so hostile to covenant promises. The spiritualizing and objections of Scott, Doddridge, etc., are sufficiently answered in our brief review of Barnes. Ralston (Apoc., p. 163) explains, "This is the first resurrection, or resuscitation of characters, resembling the ancient worthies; for John saw, not the bodies, but the souls of those martyrs, which must imply a resuscitation of spiritual powers." And this is the only reason given for spiritualizing the resurrection, based on the passage itself. According to his system (to show how arbitrary) Rev. 11 : 15-19; Rev. 14 : 14-20; and Rev. 20 : 11-15 are synchronous, and descriptive of "the general resurrection and final judgment." We asserted the danger of making the second resurrection of Rev. 20 to be also spiritual, and thus to find no real resurrection in the Apoc. whatever. This is done by many writers. Thus, e.g. Rev. Burdick in the N. Y. Evang., Feb. 3, 1876, says: "In the second resurrection, implied from the first, the fact described is an uprising of the spiritual forces in the Kingdom of Satan." Strange and unscriptural as this view is, it at least is consistent with the interpretation of the first resurrection, for it makes the second one in kind to the first. To indicate how little the whole subject is understood, and yet how rashly and confidently some write concerning it, Lord (Theol. and Lit. Jour., Oct., 1853, p. 270) points out how a writer in the Presby Quart. Review against Millenarianism positively asserts that the resurrection of Rev. 20 : 12-14 denotes "a resurrection or reappearance on earth of the old spirit of persecution, which had slumbered or been kept in abeyance during the long and prosperous period of the Millennium;" and then on a succeeding page, forgetting his own interpretation thus given, the same author, to make out a general, universal resurrection, as positively makes it a real resurrection, saying that it means the following: "The dead observe, not the living, but the race whose probation is ended, and on whom death has already set his seal, are judged." Some, as Butler (Lec. Apoc.), endeavor to patch up a kind of compromise, declaring this resurrection to be a raising up of disembodied saints to positions of honor and glory, without receiving a body—which is opposed to the covenant promises, the proper conception of a resurrection, the relation that the saints sustain to the Christ in the coming Kingdom, etc. Such views with but unimportant variations might be extensively quoted, but this is amply sufficient for illustration. And yet that the reader may have before him all that the most respectable and able writers opposed to us can produce, we select two of the most noted. Martensen (Ch. Dog., s. 281), in giving his "spiritual" conception of the meaning of Rev. 20, refers to the first resurrection as follows: "A general historical resurrection will take place in the Church; the graves of Church History will be opened, and all the past will rise again in an all-embracing, living, and spiritual remembrance; and under the influence of this great consciousness the Church will display a universal activity, a universal development of her various gifts." His entire exegesis is based on the preconceived idea, expressed by himself, that the Kingdom of God is to be established by and under "the conditions of historical development," i. e. by existing agencies extending themselves in the way of progress. On the other hand, we hold, with Scripture and Early Church tradition, that it is to be established by Christ Himself at His personal Coming, not by man or through the present agency of man. When reading Martensen, one wonders how he would have spiritualized the promises relating to the First Advent, had he lived before its realization. Pressense (The Early Days of Christianity, p. 439) mixes concessions and inconsistencies as follows: "The triumph of the Church is connected in the Apoc. as in the first Gospel, with the return of Christ. To proclaim that triumphant return and to describe its glorious results is the great object of the Book of Revelation, as to wait for it is the highest consolation left by the Master to His disciples. In the Apoc. two distinct periods are marked in this final triumph of Christianity over Antichrist. The first victory is brought about by the direct and visible intervention of the Saviour, taking up the cause of His people, and gloriously establishing the reign of His Church upon earth." In reading this one would be led to suppose that Pressense was a pronounced Pre-Millenarian, being so directly opposed to Brown, Barnes, Hodge, etc., and so in unison with a cardinal doctrine of ours bitterly resisted by the great majority of our opposers. But in a foot-note he vitiate his concession by the following: "The idea of a Millennium preceded by a first resurrection is suggested by Rev. 20; but we must not forget the symbolical character of the book. The glorious triumph of the Church is in itself a judgment of the world. The world is judged by the saints whom it had made its victims; their victory is its condemnation. The writer of the Rev., when he shows us the saints raised from the dead and sitting upon thrones, employs an image analogous to that used by him to describe the triumph of the two faithful witnesses in the Church, Rev. 11 : 11. We may observe that at the close of ch. 20 : 12-15 mention is made of a general resurrection of the dead in which all are to be judged according to their works. The judgment had then yet to take place, and the Christians appointed to salvation were not yet raised." The preconceived ideas of judgment, resurrection, the nature of the Kingdom, etc., are self-evident. It is strange that "the symbolical character" of the prediction does not forbid him to accept of the greater doctrine (viz., a personal Pre-Mill. Advent), while it urges him to reject the lesser (viz., a literal Pre-Mill. resurrection). It is also strange that he did not observe the fact that the general analogy of Scripture associates the resurrection of the saints with the future personal Advent of Jesus, His Second Advent, so that when He comes—whenever that is—those that sleep in Jesus shall experience His resurrecting power. Having carefully met all the objections urged, it is unnecessary to repeat.

Obs. 6. The subject of the res. is frequently referred to and implied in the Apoc., but it would be foreign to our design to enter into a detailed statement respecting each allusion. A few remarks respecting the more prominent will answer, and we can only specify, leaving the student to investigate. The res. of Rev. 11 : 18, occurring under the last trumpet, and thus Pre-Millennial, has been sufficiently noticed (Obs. 1, with which compare the concessions of many of our opponents, e.g. Barnes, etc.). Rev. 14 : 1-5, embracing the first-fruits preceding the harvest, includes necessarily a res., and will be treated under the subject of the translation. The "man-child" of Rev. 12 : 5 is by many able prophetic writers interpreted as symbolic or representative of the resurrected saints. Those who (like Dr. Seiss and others) hold to a literal day fulfilment, still future, of the Apoc., find the res. implied in the 4th and 5th chaps. of Rev. and in ch. 7, etc. The passages which obscurely refer to it or imply it are to be interpreted by the plain and decided teaching on the subject (comp. Prop. 130).

Obs. 7. Two things connected with Rev. 20 : 4-6 may be noticed—the persons raised and the time when raised. 1. The persons raised are martyrs, and only martyrs. Mede was so strongly in favor to apply this to the martyrs and "confessors equipollent to martyrs" as "a prerogative to their sufferings above the rest of the dead," that he inclined to the opinion "that all the righteous will rise during the course of the Millennial Kingdom." Burgh, and many others, insist that martyrs only are designated. Brown and others make two classes, viz., martyrs and those who did not worship (although others, in our estimation, more correctly apply the latter as a characteristic of the martyrs and the reason assigned why they were martyred). Pre-Millenarians and Post-Millenarians make two classes or bodies, the former to include all saints in the first res., and the latter as a mere exegetical addition, having more (so Barnes) than the martyrs intended. Even Witsius (Exer. Sac., p. 516) has a class beside the martyrs. Kliefoth (Offenbarung Johannes, p. 260) advocates a literal res., and has, like Bengel, two bodies announced (not of the dead, but) one of the dead (martyrs) who are raised up, and another of the living (confessors), who are translated. But this evidently is designed to make it fit with 1 Thess. 4 : 17 and 1 Cor. 15 : 51-53; comp. also Sirr on The First Res., and works advocating the same view, and it will be found that under the impression that all the righteous are raised simultaneously, and in order to make Rev. 20 to correspond with other passages supposed to teach the same, two classes are introduced into the passage, and into the last body (confessors) the remaining righteous are crowded. We are not forced to this procedure, which is an evident violation of the passage, because it refers exclusively to "the dead," as the phrase "the rest of the dead" plainly shows, and to a body of men who suffered martyrdom in view of their confession of faith and rejection of the still future Antichrist. Even if it were admitted, on exegetical grounds, that two bodies are included, these bodies could not possibly, by any legitimate reasoning, be made to include all the saints of this, and past centuries, seeing that it is entirely descriptive of those who pass through the yet future tribulation under the culminated Antichrist. A misconception of the meaning of "first" (comp. Obs. 2) has a weighty influence in its application. The res. and translation of a select portion occurs previous to the fulfilment of this prediction, as seen e.g. in Rev. 14, as the first-fruits are similar in nature to the succeeding harvest, and precedes the rise and persecution of the culminated Antichrist. All these resurrections occur under the Second Advent in its secret or thief-like stage. But this will appear plainer by looking at the second subject. 2. The time when these martyrs are raised up is of course associated by all Pre-Millenarians with the Second Advent, but many, by not distinguishing between the stages, and by being exclusively wedded to some favorite year-day interpretation of the Apocalypse, apply its fulfilment to the period immediately after the open Parousia of ch. 19. Now while, as against our opponents who deny a literal personal Sec. Advent, we can properly use (as we have done) this passage as one associated with the res. of the saints (for without a personal Sec. Advent there is no res.), yet when we come to consider the exact time in the period of the Sec. Advent when this res. of the martyrs is experienced, we find the most conclusive evidence that it also takes place during the secret stage, and previous to the open Parousia of ch. 19. Let the reader consider, as introductory, two facts proven in detail in other places (Prop. 130 and Prop. 166, etc.), the two stages in the Sec. Advent, and the still future Advent of the last Antichrist (Props. 161-164), who causes the death of these martyrs and is overthrown at the open manifestation of King Jesus and His saints. Now turn to Rev. 15, and we find that before the seven last plagues, which fill up the wrath of God, are poured out, the identical persons described in Rev. 20 : 4, who resisted the beast and his image and mark, are already exultant in acquired salvation, and this follows the gathering of the first-fruits as the enforced worship of the beast, image, and mark (Rev. 14 : 9) also follows it. It precedes the open Parousia, as these victorious ones witness (Rev. 16 : 2) the vials poured out upon "the men which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image." It precedes the open Parousia, because they, with all saints, shall be connected with the announced "marriage of the Lamb," and they belong (as a portion due to them "to execute the judgment written") to the armies that accompany the King of kings. In view, therefore, of the deliverance of these martyrs before the vials are poured out and their coming with Jesus at His open Advent, Rev. 20 : 4-6 is retrospective. If the student carefully ponders the construction of the passage he will find (1) the binding of Satan and its duration announced ; (2) then follows the reign of the saints in place of Satan's previous dominion, and this is portrayed (a) by the "thrones" and "judgment," a general announcement ; (b) by a particular specification (as an encouragement, and to lead us not to limit these reigning ones) of the martyrs ; (c) by expressions indicative of the nature of the reign, and that all who participate in it have the privileges and honors of the first-born.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Hence we cannot fully receive Dr. Schmucker's (Exp. of Rev.) interpretation of Rev. 20 : 4-6. He correctly makes it teach a literal resurrection, and one pertaining to martyrs, who "in their immortal bodies shall live again and reign with Christ as His associates in His universal Monarchy on earth," but, overlooking that these martyrs designated are those only who fall under a still future tribulation, he includes among them all martyrs, of every age, ancient and modern. Martyrs before this period have already risen, and these follow them—both having part in the preëminent resurrection pertaining to the first-born.

<sup>2</sup> These martyrs have part in "the first resurrection," and this implies that others also have part in it. Indeed, "this is the first resurrection" includes not merely the martyrs, but all to whom are given thrones and judgment or rulership. This may reconcile a historical difficulty in relation to the doctrine. The Primitive Church always associated the resurrection with the Sec. Advent, and held that (as we do) all saints, together with those martyrs, had a part in the first resurrection. Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., p. 224) objects to Burgh's statement of a limited resurrection of believers being "generally held in the early ages of Christianity," and says : "I have not been able to verify this statement by reference to the early Chiliaistic Fathers. Probably Mr. Burgh gives as their actual belief the impression merely which their language conveys as a whole. But this is hardly fair, in opposition to pretty plain statements extending the first resurrection to believers generally, which may be adduced, for example, from Justin Martyr, Irenæus, and Tertullian, high authority certainly on this point." Dr. Brown is correct as to the historical fact that all believers have part in a first resurrection at the Sec. Advent, and Burgh as to the special reference to the martyrs, which, however, must, as the context and other passages show, be associated with that of other believers who preceded them. The evident distinction as to exact time, the decided reference to martyrs, and yet the associated nature and honor of the same kind of a resurrection, and the inability to explain and apply the same, has led to a confusion of ideas and contradictory statements, which our position avoids.

The critical student will observe that if we are to receive the renderings (e.g. Fairbairn's and others) and interpretations (e.g. Brown's and others) which emphasize two classes, viz., the martyrs "and such as had not worshipped the beast" (so Fairbairn), or martyrs "and of them who worshipped not the beast" (so Wordsworth), etc. (and we do not by any means discard them, for such a meaning may be intended), still our position as to exact time and the persons denoted remains the same. For then we have—not the saints of past ages, but—the martyrs and those associated with them under the last great tribulation of the culminated Antichrist. All that we contend for is, that the persons designated are persons who at a time still future experience this persecution and martyrdom, and that the rest of the saints are included in the "thrones," "judgment," and general affirmation respecting the first resurrection and the reign.

It may be well to notice, briefly, an effort to bend this passage against us by Prof. Bush (Anastasis, p. 309, with which comp. Gipp's First Res., p. 133), who proposes to change the verbs into the present tense, in order to make out—according to his theory—a succession of persons who suffered and reigned, and to prevent the beheading and not worshipping to be antecedent to the reign. But such a change would not help their cause, for the reasons that the vision is described as passing before the seer, that the future is frequently spoken of as present, that each one having part in the resurrection is represented as reigning the thousand years, and that the passage itself must be interpreted by the general analogy on the subject.

Obs. 8. If Mede's argument is once admitted, viz., that Rev. 20 : 4-6 and Dan. 7 are synchronous, then it is impossible, without direct violation of the order laid down, to avoid a Pre-Mill. resurrection. Bush, in his Anastasis, admits Mede's position, owing to the parallelism of the two prophecies, but endeavors to avoid our conclusion by making both to describe the Gospel dispensation. But in doing this, he not only makes a fearful Millennium of suffering and martyrdom (against all prophecy), but he reverses the facts of history. For, instead of such a removal of antagonistic powers—a sealing, binding, and detention of Satan so as not to deceive—the history of the Church and of the kingdoms clearly proclaim, in the persecutions endured, the tyranny exercised, the murders committed, the crimes and wars indulged, etc., that neither Dan. nor John have yet been fulfilled. It matters not whether we make the dragon a symbol of tyrannical dominion or of a personal devil ; in either case the predictions of the Prophets have not been realized ; and what is more to the point, in the order laid down by themselves, if followed in the evolution of history, it was impracticable, for the simple reason that before this exaltation, etc., of the saints, certain events, running down to the present and still extending in the future, must first be fulfilled. Any other position makes the Bible contradictory both to itself and to history.

Obs. 9. Those who deny a literal res. in Rev. 20 generally have much to say concerning the indefiniteness and obscurity of figurative and symbolic prophecy—the difficulty of understanding it until the fulfilment shows its intended meaning, being upheld by some—but when they come to explain it themselves, then all difficulties vanish, and no other interpretation can possibly be allowed. This, to say the least, is indicative that they have no confidence in their assumptions against us, and that, when necessity requires it, they esteem themselves fully competent to elucidate, with the utmost charming confidence, even "obscure" predictions. The reader may draw his own conclusions.

The careful reader must have noticed with what assurance this has been carried out in Ch. Theologies, Bib. Dictionaries, Relig. Cyclopedias, etc. The subject of the resurrection is at length introduced, and notwithstanding our scriptural argument, the early Church belief, the Jewish view, the concessions of opponents, the subject of a literal first resurrection is either entirely ignored or merely hinted at, just as if the popular interpretation of Rev. 20 was beyond all contradiction the correct one. Some who slightly advert to it claim the indefiniteness of prophecy, which disappears in favor of their own view. The truth is, that any work or intended complete article, on the resurrection which refuses to recognize our doctrine, and in some measure discuss it, is certainly un-scholarly and defective, seeing that it passes over that which the ablest men in the Church profess to be solidly based in Scripture and antiquity.

Another peculiarity may here be noticed. Brown (Ch. Sec. Com.) and others endeavor to make the impression that our opponents are in perfect accord in the interpretation and application of Rev. 20 : 1-6, while Pre-Millenarians differ. And they carefully point out our differences, but with greater carefulness conceal their own differences. Now the fact, as the slightest comparison shows, is that far less unity exists among them than among us. While Pre-Millenarians differ as to the exact order, the persons resurrected, the duration and nature of the reign, and a few minor details, they are a unit on the grand outlines, respecting its being a literal resurrection, its eclectic nature, its realization at the Sec. Advent, its connection with a glorious following Millennium, etc., whereas our opponents differ on all these points. Some make the resurrection spiritual, others make it literal ; some make it civil, others civil and religious ; some make it illustrative of persecution, others a poetical effusion, and others a Jewish superstition ; some make it past, others past and present, and others future. Surely our opponents ought to be the last to speak of differences of opinion.

Obs. 10. There is a res. of the wicked dead, Obs. 4. It will not answer, as many do, to assert a res. of just and unjust at the beginning of this age and none after ; or to affirm, as others do, that there is no res. of the wicked whatever. Without discussing the destiny of the wicked, the passages that we have presented distinctly show that after the thousand years are ended the rest of the dead "lived again," i.e. were raised up from the dead ; that they, "after many days shall be visited ;" that they shall "return," and return at evening time ; that they shall be made subject to the endurance of "the second death ;" that those dead whose names are not found in the book of life are also raised up and judged ; that there is a res. of some unto shame and contempt, which those that return in the evening experience ; that the res. of the dead is affirmed in their order of all men, both just and unjust ; that a prior, pre-eminent res., etc., involves another of a lower class, which must include the wicked ; and that the res. of the dead and a judgment to follow is held up as a motive of repentance to men. These considerations are sufficient to sustain the position of John in Rev. 20. To quote the passages which speak of the wicked as "silent in the grave" as "not being," "remaining in the congregation of the dead," etc., to prove a non-resurrection, is only bringing forth part of the truth, viz., that there is a non-resurrection of the wicked for a certain period of time, and this is thus strongly, by way of contrast to the blessed condition of the righteous, presented. But the whole truth as given by the Spirit demands their "return," their also "living again." Any other interpretation flatly contradicts divine statements.<sup>1</sup> Let us receive all that is written, observing the same order laid down by the Spirit. If it be asked, Of what practical use or benefit can such a res. unto condemnation and shame be? the answers are various; such as, to vindicate the justice of God; to prove the truthfulness and reality of His representations and mercy; to apportion "the few or many stripes" that the guilty merit; to fulfil His declaration that all the wicked shall see and acknowledge the Divine power; to show that death itself, as many fondly hope, is no refuge for the sinner; that a res. unto eternal life is the special gift of God through Jesus Christ; to contrast the condition of the res. saints with their own; to root out in the most effectual manner every remnant of evil; to give to the creatures of God, the universe itself, a sublime and abiding idea of the nature and consequences of sin. If it be asked, Why does God give the righteous so long a priority and cause the wicked only to "return" after so long an interval? the reason, as we gather it from intimations, here and there, seems to be this: This Millennial era is designed to fulfil covenanted promises; these require the resurrection of the saints and their triumphant establishment in the earth. To do this demands, as almost every Millennial description portrays, the removal of God's enemies to clear "the inheritance" of its oppressors. Being thus removed, the triumph of the saints, their victory over death, the bestowal of dominion—in brief, the ample and continued fulfilment of God's promises in real, actual experience is fully exhibited and tested during these thousand years, clearly and fully vindicating the truthfulness and faithfulness of God, and the honor, dignity, and power of David's Son. Now, it is declared that this faithfulness, etc., is to be manifested not only to angels, to the glorified, to the restored Jewish nation, to spared Gentiles, but also to the wicked. The time selected is at the close of the Sabbath of the world's week, in the very height of completed fulfilment of promise, and sway of saintly reign, and the accumulated glory of the rule of David's Son; then the wicked arise and are filled with "sudden shame" and "confusion" when they behold the justly forfeited blessings in the possession of those whom they despised, rejected, and even persecuted. This res. is therefore delayed, not merely to give the saints an honorable precedence by way of reward, and as a punishment to the wicked for refusing Christ and His proffered mercy, but to place the saints, the inheritance, the world, yea, even Christ Himself in the covenanted position by which the majesty and glory of God is the more fully seen, felt, and appreciated in the then proven, tested immortality and reign of the saints, renewal of the earth or removal of the curse, etc. At the end of the thousand years, so faithfully is it proven that all the promises of God are "yea and amen" in Christ, that none can gainsay it, for the covenant is more than fulfilled, and to forfeited blessings additional and greater have been added. This is the time, gloriously, yea, sadly suitable, which God has appointed for "the rest of the dead to live again," and behold with their own eyes the glory they have lost by not obeying God—a glory shining forth in the land, in the Theocratic government, in the subjects, in the immortal kings and priests, and in the exalted, enthroned Son of Man. Imagine just such a "return," under such circumstances, and then tell us, are "holy men of old" wrong when they depict the shame, degradation, and unhappiness of the wicked at this period? Imagine Voltaire, Paine, Strauss, and a multitude like them to thus "return" and see what they ridiculed, and what must then memory and conscience say? *

<sup>1</sup> By pressing Scripture ("shall not be," etc.) beyond all analogy, we could easily adduce proof that the believer, as represented by the Psalmist, will not rise again, when it is said, Ps. 39 : 13, "before I go hence and be no more," etc.

<sup>2</sup> How terrible the contrast of situation and doom! The haters and persecutors of believers, the scoffers of pious ones, then stand amazed and confounded at the shining glory of the once detested followers of Jesus. It is but reasonable that a Voltaire should be raised up to account for his blasphemy; a Strauss, to tell why he was so indignant at the Christ's assumption of Judgeship; a Renan, to explain his detraction and disgusting allusion to "the Galilean girls;" ten thousand, thousand others, to meet the hypocrisy, malice, brutality, etc., exhibited—and then there will be (Luke 13 : 28) "weeping and gnashing of teeth, when they shall see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the Kingdom of God, and themselves thrust out." It is but just that men should thus arise and witness to the utter falsehood and maliciousness of their detractions of Jesus and His Messianic claims. Eminent and talented men have written works specially designed to degrade Jesus; multitudes have jubilantly urged their defamatory statements; sarcasm, ridicule, blasphemy, etc. are devised and circulated by hosts of enemies, and it is but just that they should be raised up to meet an ample and shame-confounding manifestation of their wilful and deliberate hostility to Jesus. How inquisitors, executioners, defamers, etc. will face their victims, then exalted and glorified, and especially the magnificent King of kings, is clearly and pointedly represented in the Word.

A few words of caution may be added. Rev. 20 : 12-15 is not necessarily to be restricted (as by Dallas and others) to "the rest of the dead;" for it includes (so Lord and others) those who may have died during the thousand years. Lord (Exp. Apoc.) makes it to embrace "all the wicked dead of all ages;" but we would not dogmatically restrict it even solely to such, because it may, for aught we can tell, include far more. For, while translations, glorifications, etc. may result during the Millennial age as a reward for holiness, yet the mention of the book of life and the reference to all the dead then existing may imply that others, not accounted worthy of special honor and exaltation—although ultimately to be saved—are included in those dead. Again: in reference to a resurrection of the wicked, we add this: it is true (see e.g. Art. "Resurrection" in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.) that while the Jews held to a Pre-Mill. resurrection of the pious, some discarded the ultimate res. of the ungodly, but others ("the prevailing opinion") held that the unjust would also finally be raised. Now observe how the language of Jesus and Paul accords with the latter prevailing view, as e.g. in "all that are in their graves," etc. (John 5 : 28, 29), "a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust" (Acts 24 : 15). Such language is, of course, powerfully confirmatory of the then existing opinion; so corroborative that it can only be avoided by special pleading. Again: this resurrection of the rest of the dead is after the thousand years. We, therefore, have no account whatever of any other resurrection preceding the Mill. age. It has been pointed out (Obs. 4, note) how some endeavor to discard this verse as unauthorized, in order to make out (so Russell and Barbour, Three Worlds, etc.) a distinct and separate resurrection of the heathen at the beginning of the Mill. age, so as to give them another probation, etc. This view of a future probation for heathen, etc., is not new, for such men as Tholuck, Stilling, etc., adopted it, but inform us that the Bible keeps it in the background, teaches it only inferentially and not in a dogmatic form. Barbour, etc. make it very prominent, a corner-stone (as Relyites) in their system, and largely build upon it. We are only concerned (passing by the stress laid upon "all men" and "all," etc.) with this theory as it relates to a Pre-Mill. resurrection, and his main proof text in support of the same. To make out a Pre-Mill. resurrection they frequently quote the restoration of the Sodomites, Ezek. 16 : 55, arguing that the passage of necessity implies their resurrection, having been destroyed. But they overlook (1) how the word Sodom is used, viz., to designate others (of like character) besides the literal Sodomites as e.g. Rev. 11 : 8; Zeph. 2 : 9. Even "the prophets of Jerusalem" "are all of them unto me as Sodom, and the inhabitants thereof as Gomorrah" (Jer. 23 : 14; comp. Isa. 3 : 9, and especially Isa. 1 : 9, 10). This usage enables us to appreciate Ezek. 16 : 55, for we have the warrant of Isa. 1 : 10 that "rulers of Sodom" and "people of Gomorrah" exist independently of the literal Sodom and Gomorrah. If we observe Ezek. 16 with care, we observe (2) that Jerusalem is the subject of prophecy—the earthly, as evidenced by v. 3—and God's care and protection, as well as her perverseness, etc., are specified. The city, with its privileges, blessings, conduct, and punishment, is represented. Her supporters are designated: first, Samaria, i.e. that portion pertaining to the ten tribes (Samaria being the capital city); and second, Sodom, i.e. Judah ("the lesser than thou," so marg. reading). Both return from captivity, Judah first, then the ten tribes; and they are given to Jerusalem as daughters (with which we need only compare, e.g. Mic. 4 : 8 ; Zeph. 3 : 10, 14 ; Zech. 9 : 9, etc.) Hence whatever truth there may be in Tholuck's and Stilling's theory, it is evident that it can only be realized after the thousand years, if realized at all. The same is true of Barbour and Russell's view, for the student will notice that their entire argument is purely inferential, being utterly unable to give a direct passage favoring it. The fact that spared nations (Isa. 66) are mentioned refers to living (not dead) nations, and "the ruling with a rod of iron" is not over the resurrected heathen, but, as a comparison of passages clearly show, over the anti-Christian hosts and living nations at and after the Sec. Advent.

Obs. 11. Out of the abundant testimony favoring a twofold resurrection, and the literal, eclectic res. of Rev. 20, we select a few as illustrative. Dean Alford (Com. loci) remarks : " I cannot consent to distort the words from their plain sense and chronological place in the prophecy, on account of any considerations of difficulty, or of any risk of abuses which the doctrine of the Millennium may bring with it. Those who lived next to the Apostles, and the whole Church for three hundred years, understood them in the plain literal sense ; and it is a strange sight in these days to see expositors who are among the first in reverence for antiquity, complacently casting aside the most cogent instance of consensus which primitive antiquity presents. As regards the text itself, no legitimate treatment of it will extort what is known as the spiritual interpretation now in fashion. If, in a passage where two resurrections are mentioned, where certain persons lived at the first, and the rest of the dead only at the end of a specified period after that first—if, in such a passage, the first res. may be understood to mean spiritual rising with Christ, while the second means literal rising from the grave ; then there is an end of all significance in language, and Scripture is wiped out as a definite testimony to anything. If the first res. is spiritual, then so is the second, which I suppose none will be hardy enough to maintain ; but if the second is literal, so is the first, which, in common with the whole Primitive Church and many of the best modern expositors, I do maintain, and receive as an article of faith and hope." Van Oosterzee (Ch. Dog., vol. 2, p. 786) advocates " more than one resurrection ; first a partial one and then an absolutely universal one. Of the former, not only does the Apoc. seem to speak, ch. 20 : 4-6, but also the Lord, Luke 14 : 14, and Paul, 1 Thess. 4 : 16, as also 1 Cor. 15 : 23, as compared with verse 26," etc., and then, referring to the latter (the universal one), speaks of a poetic-prophetic grouping together of that which in reality will be seen realized, not side by side, but in succession." Ebrard (The Rev. of John) advocates a literal Sec. Advent, a literal first res., a literal reign here on earth over the spared nations, etc., and in his Gospel His. (p. 576, foot-note Clark's ed.), thus refers to Rev. 20 : " Chaps. 18 and 19 (Apoc.) depict the victory achieved over this Kingdom by Christ at His Coming. Then follows the first awakening, namely, of those who have died in the Lord, and now in glorified bodies live upon the earth, and maintain a spiritual rule over so much of humanity as is not yet glorified (just as Christ after His res. lived for forty days upon the earth in a glorified body). Then, after this last offer of salvation, follows the second resurrection to judgment." Hagenbach (His. of Doc., vol. 1, s. 139) pertinently says respecting the spiritual interpretation : " The first res. (Rev. 20 : 5) is explained by Augustine as the deliverance of the soul from the dominion of sin in this life ; as, in general, an orthodoxy which maintains the authority of the Apoc., and yet will not allow Millenarianism, can only escape from its difficulties by an arbitrary exegesis, like that of Augustine on this passage."

For the student wishing to see how others express themselves decidedly in favor of a literal resurrection, we append the following references. Aside from the Commentaries of Alford, Olshausen, Bengel, Gill, Steir, Lange, Fausset, Meyer, and others, many works indorse our position. Compare e.g. Dr. Kling's Arts. "Eschatology" and "Resurrection of the Dead," in Herzog's Encyclop.; Dr. Fr. Volkmar Reinhard's Dogmatic, sec. 189; Dr. Hofmann in Prophecy and Fulfilment; Starke's Synopsis New Test., vol. 10, p. 179, etc.; Lange's Bremen Lectures, p. 244, etc.; Selnecker on Dan. 12 : 2; Sirm on The First Res.; Seiss, Last Times (who gives various references of value); Brookes's Maranatha (who gives John Bunyan's and Toplady's testimony); Gordon on The First Res. (paper before the N. Y. Proph. Conference); Luthardt's Lehre von der Letzten Dingen; Koch's Das Tausend-jährige Reich; Auberlen's Prophecies of Daniel and the Rev. of St. John; Delitzsch on Genesis; Elliott's Horæ Apoc.; Mag. Fred. Roos on Dan. and Rev.; Christlieb, Mod. Doubt and Ch. Belief, p. 452; Pfeiderer, Der Paulinismus, p. 264-5; Danhauer's Hodosophia, p. 1445; and, in brief, Pre-Millenarian writers in general (who are specified in the His. of the Doctrine). To give the testimony of a large portion of these would itself require an extended work, even if presented in brief extracts. In such references we must not overlook the remarks of Dr. Craven in Lange's Com. (Amer. Ed.), or the writers (e.g. p. 440) quoted favoring our view. The old Berlenburger Bibel (t. 6, pp. 397-399) has a fair argument in favor of a literal first pre-eminent, Pre-Mill. resurrection, appealing e.g. to 1 Cor. 15 : 23, 51-52; Luke 20 : 35, and 14 : 14; Heb. 11 : 35, etc. Indeed we are largely indebted to old writers (like Mede in Clavis Apoc., Brightman in A Revelation of the Apoc., Goodwin in Exp. of Rev., and others) for keeping this doctrine before the Church. Even such testimonies as are given in The Crit. and Exp. Com. possess weight; while incidentally the concessions of a Chalmers (on Ps. 50), Wesley (Tyerman, Life of), and many others are to be regarded. We append the testimony of two persons, who cannot be accused of extreme partiality to our views. Spurgeon (quoted by Dr. Brookes, p. 50, Proph. Times, vol. 10) in his sermon on The First Res., says: "I do look forward to this with joy, that though I may sleep in Christ before my Master come, and I know not whether that shall be or no, yet I shall rise at the day of His appearing, and shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just, if I have truly and faithfully served Him; and that recompense shall be to be made like Him; and to partake of His glories before the eyes of men, and to reign with Him during the thousand years." "Meyer (so Lange's Com. Rev., p. 441) remarks on 1 Cor. 15 : 24, that Paul, following the example of Christ Himself, has bound up the doctrine of a twofold resurrection with the Christian faith" (comp. next Prop.).

Obs. 12. We have already referred to the astounding opinion entertained by Prof. Bush, Gipps, Waldegrave, and others, that this res. and Millennium is a portraiture of suffering and martyrdom in behalf of the truth. To indicate the amazing perversions of the passage, Rev. 20 : 1-6, by our opponents in their efforts to wrest it from us, attention is called e.g. to Waldegrave's statements (New Test. Millenarianism), and we select him purposely, because he has been eulogized (The Bib. Rep.) as a model of an interpreter and as a triumphant opponent. The binding and restraintment of Satan as well as the little season, both "set before us the working of Satan, for it is his working especially which is here exhibited to view during two distinct periods in the history of Christendom. The first—the longer period—said to last a thousand years, is one in which Satan, forbidden to launch forth into the world any fresh impostures, does, notwithstanding, prevail, with the aid of the civil power, to persecute even unto death those faithful souls who, being risen with Christ, are made kings and priests unto God and His Father. The second—the shorter period—said to last but a little season, is one in which, the number of God's living saints being marvellously increased, and martyrdom being no longer the rule, Satan attempts by other means, even by the multiplication of religious delusions, to compass the destruction of the Church." The res. of the martyrs, therefore, is simply a revival of the martyr spirit, made necessary by Satan's reigning, and this too while the saints are reigning: "They are also sufferers at the hands of men—sufferers even to the extent of laying down their lives for Christ's sake—sufferers, I say, even unto death, and that at one and the same time with their reigning." "The thousand years will prove to be a period in which Christ's witnesses are witnesses even unto death—a period, in short, of martyrdom, not of triumph—a period in which Satan (being precluded, indeed, from the invention of fresh delusions), is able, notwithstanding, to wield those already in existence with such effect as to make the Church of God to prophesy in sackcloth and ashes." This caricature of the Millennium and the reign of the saints is presented by one largely eulogized as the champion against Chiliasm. No Chiliast ever produced anything so flatly contradictory to all testimony of Scripture, to all analogy on the subject; so plainly antagonistic to numerous predictions, that the large majority of our opponents recoil from it as unworthy of credence, because it actually reverses the blessed teaching of prophecy. It is utterly unworthy of serious refutation, and affords a sad illustration how good men, in their eagerness to wrest the passage from us, can fall into the most absurd interpretation.

Prof. Bush (Mill.) in accord with his theory of a past Mill. age, in which persecution, more or less, predominated, says: "We strenuously maintain that it is the same persons who live, and reign, and judge, and are beheaded, and all too at precisely the same time." What a blessed reward! What a glorious Sabbatical period! He approvingly quotes the Jewish Midrash Tillin, fol. 42 : 1, where it is said that "upon the Coming of the Messiah the world shall be desolated for a thousand years" (which theory the Seventh-Day Adventists have recently revived), and adds: "This accords with the view we are now advocating, that this Mill. period is not intrinsically a prosperous era, but the reverse."

Obs. 13. Sufficient has been said to vindicate our usage of the word "souls" to denote the person (Obs. 3), and yet in view of certain statements, it will be in place to add a few remarks. Fairbairn says that "it is quite frivolous to insist upon the term souls being often used to denote persons; no one doubts that it is; but the question is, can it be so taken here?" Now, the frivolity arises from the fact that a large class on his side—in fact nearly every work against us—gravely insist that because "souls" are mentioned it cannot mean persons. Of course, to meet such an objection, "frivolous" as it may be, we are forced in self-defence to show that the term is used to denote persons. Thus e.g. Barnes (Com. loci) lays great stress on the word "souls," as if it alone denoted the spiritual nature, and carefully conceals from the reader this meaning, but when not controverting us, he in another place (Com., Acts 3 : 20, on the phrase "every soul") admits this usage, thus: "Every person or individual soul is often put for the whole man by the Hebrews, Acts 7 : 14; Josh. 10 : 28" (with which compare his remarks on Acts 2 : 27, where he makes the term "soul" equivalent to "me," and applies it to the corporeal res. of Jesus, thus flatly contradicting his comment on Rev. 20 : 4-6). Indeed, our opponents contradict themselves in the same comment on this point, when e.g. they admit that "he" (v. 6) and "they," and "the rest of the dead" are declarative of persons and not simply of disembodied spirits, and speak of them as such. We insist that the reason why the Spirit, through human agency, gives us the term "souls" in preference to any other, is this: it is most in accord with scriptural usage, for not only is the resurrection of Jesus thus predicted and declared to be the res. of a "soul," but it is predicted of, and promised to, individual believers, as e.g. Ps. 99 : 15, "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave." Now then, when the res. is actually described, it is reasonable, it is strengthening, to find the same term employed, thus making prediction and fulfilment, promise and realization to correspond (comp. Obs. 3, note).

PROPOSITION 128. The language of the Gospels and Epistles is in strict accord with the requirements of a Pre-Millennial resurrection.

A doctrine to be consistent must preserve its unity in all the inspired writings. Having seen how the Old Test. and the conclusion of the New Test. coincide, it will be important to notice how the Gospels and Epistles corroborate the Jewish views of the resurrection based on covenant promises.

Obs. 1. The resurrection of 1 Cor. 15 : 52 declares that "at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound (1 Thess. 4 : 16), and the dead (i.e. those deceased) shall be raised incorruptible," etc. Now, the fair inference (for the Jews, as commentaries inform us, used this very language) is, that this denotes a resurrection identified with the bodies of dead saints. This is almost the universal opinion among critics. This same res. of the dead is mentioned in Apoc. 11 : 18, also under a last trumpet, and immediately in connection with "the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ." Our opponents generally concede both of these to be literal, and the exact correspondence that they sustain to Jewish expectations has been noticed by able writers (and that these, with this language added, was perpetuated generally in the early Church). But attention is called to the fact that just as the Jews believed, when "the Kingdom (sovereignty) of this world is become the Kingdom of our Lord and His Christ" (so mss., S. and A. Tischendorf's N. T., and comp. Titman, Hahn, etc.) at that very time a resurrection takes place. When the sovereignty of the world is seized, when a Kingdom commences which is never to end, when events occur which commentators connect only with the Sec. Advent, then at that very period, "at the last trump" ("for the trumpet shall sound," Rev. 11 : 15), the pious dead are raised to receive their reward. Surely this is amply sufficient to identify a Pre-Millennial resurrection, seeing that 1 Cor. 15 : 52 ; Rev. 11 : 18 ; and Rev. 20 : 3-6, are all under the same last Pre-Millennial trumpet. If one is literal, all then are literal, because taking place at the same time and for the same purpose.

According to Dr. Oswald (The Kingdom, ch. 9) it was a comparison of these three passages that influenced Rev. Dr. Schmucker to advocate a Pre-Millennial resurrection of the saints. The same is reported of Charlotte Elizabeth, and others.

Obs. 2. Attention is directed to 1 Cor. 15 : 22-24. "For, as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order ; Christ first, afterward they that are Christ's, at His Coming. Then cometh the end," etc. We are not concerned in adopting any particular rendering (as e.g. making "order" to mean "band," and "the end" equivalent to "the last band," etc.), for whatever version is adopted, two things are self-evident in the passage enforcing the general analogy on the subject. After the universality of death is announced, then follows the positive declaration that the recovery from death—being made alive—is not a simultaneous occurrence, “but every man in his own order.” We leave an opponent give the meaning of this phrase. Barnes (Com. loci) says : “But every man—every one, including Christ as well as others. In his own order—in his proper order, rank, place, time. The word tagma usually relates to military order or array ; to the arrangement of a cohort or band of troops, to their being properly marshalled with the officers at the head, and every man in his proper place in the ranks. Here it means that there was a proper order to be observed in the res. of the dead.” This declaration of an eclectic res. is confirmatory of the Jewish view, and could not possibly have been thus used, if the design were not to corroborate its truthfulness. The dead are to be marshalled in separate, distinctive divisions, according to their character or works. Next follows a statement of such a division : “Christ the first-fruits,” the first in time, the beginning, the first in order, “who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead, that in all things He might have the pre-eminence” (and with him ought, perhaps, to be associated the “many” that arose at His resurrection) ; then, “afterward they that are Christ’s at His coming,” which evidently describes another division portrayed e.g. in 1 Thess. 4 and 1 Cor. 15, exclusively of the righteous ; “then cometh the end.” Now, here we have (1) separate bands of resurrected ones asserted, and (2) these bands or orders separated by an extent of time (nearly two thousand years). This is all that our line of argument requires in order to support our position.

The student observes that we do not discuss the word translated “the end,” and the sequence indicated by “afterward” and “then.” (Comp. Gordon, Sirr, and others on the “First Resurrection,” as well as Brooks, Seiss, Ryle, and others, in their advocacy of a Pre-Mill. resurrection.) The commentaries of Alford, Meyer, Olshausen, Fausset, Lange, etc., may be consulted on these points. Although a strong argument favorable to our position can be adduced, it really is not needed, seeing that the two points clearly designated and conceded by our opponents are all-sufficient. We only refer to Hodge’s admission respecting tagma (the student keeping in view how to telos was used to denote the rear legion, troop, or band, and how, therefore, the whole must be rendered, if the idea of different bands or companies is to be retained), when he says : “The word tagma is properly a concreta term, meaning a band, as of soldiers. If this be insisted upon here, then Paul considers the hosts of those that rise as divided into different cohorts or companies : first Christ, then His people, then the rest of mankind. First, the resurrection of Christ, then that of His people, then that of the wicked.” But, warped by his judgment and resurrection theories, he forsakes the plain meaning. Especially do we commend attention to Prof. Stuart, who, although a bitter opponent of Millenarianism, concedes that our view of the different bands, making the wicked the last one, is the only “satisfactory exegesis.”

Some writers (as Dr. Berg, Chris. Intelligencer, Feb. 27th, 1868, comp. C. S. B., Prop. Times, vol. 7, p. 87-8) lay great stress on the phrase “in Christ shall all be made alive,” saying that “in Christ” is a technical term denoting “the state of a believer,” and hence refers the resurrection exclusively to the members of His body, the righteous, and that no reference to the resurrection of the wicked is to be found in the passage. Admit the full force of it, and that the resurrection of the righteous, of those in Christ, is alone specified, then the order is still preserved of an eclectic resurrection, (1) in pertaining exclusively to the saints, and (2) that at Christ’s Sec. Advent we have the first-fruits of saints (144,000) resurrected before the harvest in the first stage of the Advent and the martyrs (as we explained under the previous Prop.) are raised up just previous to the open Parousia. If such an interpretation is adopted—and there is force in it—then simply the order or companies of the saints are designated. The reader must determine for himself which view to adopt ; either one or the other sustains our position fully.

The early Church (e.g. Tertullian Adv. Marcionem) adduced 1 Cor. 15 as favoring a Pre-Mill. resurrection, and the application is a just one. As a matter of interest to the reader, we append the authorized English Translation, Dublin, of the Latin Vulgate: "But every one in his own order: the first-fruits Christ, then they that are of Christ, who have believed in His Coming. Afterward the end, when," etc. We only add that Dr. Berg and others make "the end" to refer to "the end of the world," including the resurrection of the wicked, the closing of the dispensations of grace, the burning of the world," etc., but we assert (1) that the ordering must be interpreted of the subject-matter discussed, and (2) the end must be determined from the specific teaching of Scripture on its meaning. Hence Dr. Kling (Lange's Com. 1 Cor. loci) says: "Those who are raised at successive periods of time are conceived of as coming forth in troops or bands, in some one of which every one will be found." "The end in this connection means the termination of the process of the resurrection, and stands correlatively to 'the first-fruits'; it marks the period of the resurrection of the rest of mankind, who do not belong to Christ," etc. (See the comment.) The Amer. Ed. (Dr. Poor) says: "If we adopt the meaning of band or cohort for tagma, then the implication is that those in Christ will come forth by themselves and the wicked by themselves—those of a kind keeping together. And this will be the natural order since 'those who sleep in Jesus, God will bring with Him.'" Even such a writer as Macknight (On the Epistles) gives the following translation and paraphrase: "But every one in his proper band: the first-fruits Christ; afterward they who are Christ's at His Coming. Then the end shall be," etc. "Not, however, together; but every one in his proper band; the first-fruit Christ is raised already; afterward they who are Christ's shall be raised immediately at His Coming; consequently before the other dead are raised," etc. (This concession refutes much of his spiritualizing).

Obs. 3. In 1 Thess. 4: 13-17, we have distinctive marks that "the dead in Christ shall rise first." Our opponents, to avoid the force of this expression, inform us that it is used relatively to those that are translated, meaning that the dead arise before the living are translated. Allowing such an interpretation, yet the eclectic nature of the res. and its time is clearly manifested (1) by its exclusive reference to the righteous, and (2) by its precedence of the translation. The res. of the wicked is not mentioned, and the reason must be found in other Scriptures. The simple fact that we have extended passages devoted only to the res. of the righteous is in perfect agreement with our doctrine and utterly opposed to the theory of a simultaneous res. of all the dead. The association of this res. of the righteous with the personal Sec. Advent of Jesus is an additional reason sustaining our view.

We are not prepared to concede that the application of "first" by our opponents is conclusive, since a large number of able critics and writers interpret it according to the analogy of a first resurrection from among the dead. It appears strange that Paul, knowing the Jewish idea of an eclectic resurrection, should employ such a phrase unless he indorsed it. Barnes (Com. loci) says: "A doctrine similar to this was held by the Jews. 'Bech Lachish said, Those who die in the Land of Israel shall rise first in the days of the Messiah.'" We have shown, however, in other places, that the Jews held to a pre-eminent, distinguishing resurrection pertaining to their nation.

Obs. 4. Luke 20: 34-36 (see its connection with covenant promise, Props. 49 and 137) is remarkable for its distinctness: "The children of this world (or age) marry, and are given in marriage; but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world (or age) and the resurrection from the dead (or the res. that out of dead ones—see the emphasis in the original) neither marry, nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Here we have the following particulars specified: (1) Some shall gain the future age by a res. from among the dead ; (2) it is implied that others not worthy shall not gain it by such a resurrection ; (3) this resurrection of the saints is distinctively referred to as the pre-eminent res., and one out of dead ones ; (4) such, as indicative of its eclectic nature, are designated as "the children of the resurrection ;" (5) and being thus born from the dead, through God's power, they "are the children of God."

The reader is again reminded how this passage was employed (Prop. 49) in elucidating the Memorial, being the legitimate outgrowth of the covenant, which necessitates, in order to its realization, a Pre-Mill. resurrection of the Patriarchs. Hence Paul (e.g. Acts 26 : 6, 7) links "the hope" derived from covenant promises with "the resurrection of the dead." The personal identity of the Fathers is preserved, through the resurrection thus promised. Hence we find writers, who have no Chiliastic bias, affirm precisely the position assumed by us respecting the meaning of the passage. Thus e.g. Thompson (Theol. of Christ, p. 186) takes the ground that the Sadducees denied a literal resurrection ; Jesus in His reply holds fast to the Jewish view of such a resurrection, and confirms the Jews in their faith, and adds : "He went on to assert the resurrection as set forth by Moses, in the fact that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob would ever have a recognized identity in the Kingdom of God." Horne (Introd., vol. 1, p. 423) says that the phrase "I am the God of Abraham," etc., proves "the resurrection of the dead inferentially or by legitimate consequence." But why is this inferential proof a legitimate consequence ? The answer—the only Scriptural answer—is, that the Patriarchs may realize the promises made to them personally respecting the land, etc. On the passage itself compare the comments of Alford, Lange, Bengel, Olshausen, etc. The Mormons, as a resultant of their system of sealed marriages, flatly contradict the Saviour's declaration respecting the non-marriage of the resurrected and glorified saints, for they positively affirm that after the resurrection "men both marry and are given in marriage." (See the proof adduced in Art. "Mormons," M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.)

Obs. 5. Phil. 3 : 11, "If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead," certainly does not give the force of the original, and it places Paul in the attitude of striving for something which is inevitable. But taking the emendation demanded by the preposition ek, and given by numerous critics and commentators (and admitted by some of our opponents, as Prof. Stuart), we have a reading which vindicates Paul's effort to obtain a prize, viz., a distinguishing eclectic resurrection. For many read it : "If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection from among (or out of) the dead (or dead ones.)" The force of this rendering is sustained by the res. of Jesus which was (e.g. 1 Pet. 1 : 3) one from among the dead, and by the usage of the preposition.

Sirr on the First Res., in Let. 5, gives a lengthy vindication of its usage, presenting various examples, showing conclusively that it is, single or in composition, intensive and expressive of an extraordinary, eclectic resurrection. The editor of The Proph. Times, vol. 3, p. 142, etc., presents the same, and declares respecting the force of ek : "Greek writers, lexicons, critics, and the Greek Test. everywhere and continually assign to it the office of expressing out of, from, from among, and invariably use it before a genitive signifying a whole from which a part is taken" (adducing as examples Acts 3 : 23 ; 1 Cor. 5 : 13 ; Acts 19 : 33 ; Heb. 5 : 1, etc.). Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., p. 195), as against us, rejects "from among the dead" (substituting "from the dead"), and endeavors to escape the idea of time or priority by referring the resurrection to "its nature, its accompaniments, and its issues," which make it "a resurrection peculiar to believers," but adds : "Although, therefore, we cannot affirm that the translation 'from amongst the dead' is critically inadmissible, no more can it be shown that it is critically admissible." We leave the student to judge for himself, heartily endorsing his declaration, that its meaning is dependent on the doctrine of the resurrection as taught in the Scriptures, i.e. these passages must follow the general analogy on the subject. Brookes (Maranatha, p. 464) renders it : "If by any means I might attain unto the out resurrection" (or, as we might say, the elect resurrection) "the one, or that one, from among the dead." Many versions are given which affirm an eclectic resurrection. The Latin Vulgate, in the authorized Dublin

Translation, reads : " If by any means I may attain to the resurrection, which is from the dead." Fausset (Com. loci) comments : " The oldest mss. read ' the resurrection from (out of) the dead, viz. the first resurrection ; that of believers at Christ's Coming (1 Cor. 15 : 23 ; 1 Thess. 4 : 15 ; Rev. 20 : 5, 6). The Greek word occurs nowhere else in the New Test. ' The power of Christ's resurrection ' (Rom. 1 : 4) insures the believer's attainment of the ' resurrection from the (rest of the) dead ' (cf. v. 20, 21). Cf. ' Accounted worthy to obtain the resurrection from the dead ' (Luke 20 : 35). ' The resurrection of the just ' ' (Luke 14 : 14). Similar statements are made by various expositors. Surely the simple fact that in the original this resurrection is made emphatic and eclectic by the variations attached, ought to arrest the attention of the reader. To convey to the English reader, unacquainted with Greek, this variation, we append the phrases with a literal rendering as given by critics. We have the simple phrase anastasis nekron or resurrection of dead ones (Acts 17 : 32 ; Rom. 1 : 4 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 12, 21 ; Heb. 6 : 2), and he anastasis ton nekron or the resurrection of the dead ones (Matt. 22 : 31 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 42). Then we have a more particular resurrection as follows : anastasis ek ton nekron or resurrection out of or from among dead ones (1 Pet. 1 : 3), and he anastasis he ek nekron or the resurrection that out of dead ones, or the resurrection, that one out of or from among dead ones (Luke 20 : 35—see Obs. 4—Acts 4 : 2), he exanastasis ton nekron, or the resurrection out of or from among dead ones, or the out-from-among resurrection of dead ones, or the rising again out of dead ones. Luke 20 : 35 especially is very emphatic, having he anastasis he, viz. the resurrection, that one," thus implying necessarily some other resurrection distinctive from this one. Every student must see the propriety—keeping in view the covenanted, Prop. 49, Jewish resurrection, of which Paul, Acts 26 : 6, 7, to which the tribes hope to come—of Bh. Pearce's assertion that Paul expected this very resurrection, and hence uses the same word here translated attain to.

Obs. 6. This discrimination of resurrection is delicately referred to, and implied in passages. Thus 1 Cor. 6 : 14, " And God hath both raised up (egeire) the Lord, and will also raise up us (exegerai, out-raise or pre-eminently raise you)." The change of the verb by the addition of a word, significant of something peculiar and distinguishing, is worthy of notice (comp. Rom. 9 : 27, Greek). So take Mark 9 : 9, 10, and we have it asserted that the Son of Man should rise (ek nekron) out of or from among dead ones (as in fact transpired), and then the disciples (who had no difficulty with the already received—e.g. John 11 : 24—doctrine of a res. of the dead) questioned, one with another, what this rising from among or out of dead ones should mean relating to Jesus. As His res. being an eclectic one is designated a res. ek nekron, so do we find that of his believers designated.

" Quickening" and " quickening of the dead" was used by the Rabbis (so Bush, etc.) to denote a corporeal resurrection, and " consolation" (Syriac, e.g. John 11 : 24, 25, " I know that he shall rise again in the consolation at the last day. Jesus said to her, I am the consolation and the life"), " day of consolation" (so Talmud and Targum on Hos. 6 : 2), as well as other terms which we have noticed under the Old Test. teaching, were also thus employed. Now thus used in the New Test. without a change of meaning, such as the Jews attached to them as to the time and relation, we can scarcely avoid the conclusion that they are thus to be understood as connected with a coming of the Messiah and a resurrection pertaining to Abraham's children. " The gates of hell," Matt. 16 : 18, is connected with the continued perpetuity of the Church. It is customary to interpret it as relating to evil spirits, and we allow one of these to explain its meaning. Nast (Com. loci, comp. " Petros," p. 34, footnote by Dr. Seiss), after making " hall" equivalent to " the abode of the dead," and " gate" to stand for " power," adds : " Thus the gates of hell mean strictly the dominion of death, and by implication the infernal powers held in the abode of death and darkness." Whatever propriety there may be in his " implication" (which are always unnecessary and dangerous when the plain meaning will suffice), the history of the Church shows, and especially will manifest it under the last culminated Antichrist, that it shall terribly suffer by persecution, and here we have the assurance that death shall not triumph (comp. Lange, loci) over the Church and its multitude of slain saints, but they shall be raised up, and see her glory as she perpetuates herself in the age to come. Many writers find the first resurrection even in Matt. 24 : 31 (others the Jewish nation, etc.), as e.g. Lange (Com., p. 429) on the phrase "And they shall gather together his elect," says, "Here the resurrection of the elect (the first resurrection primarily) is declared," Phil. 2 : 11 has "things under the earth," which Barnes (Com. loci) explains as "beings under the earth," "those that have departed this life," and yet this very worship and honoring of Jesus—thus associated with the idea of a resurrection—is one identified with a Mill. prophecy (Isa. 45 : 23), and is to be witnessed before the Millennium is ushered in (Rev. 11 : 17 ; 15 : 3, 4, and 5 : 9-14). The resurrection is indirectly linked with the Kingdom, as in Luke 14 : 15. After Jesus had showed the Pharisee how to make a feast so that he might "be recompensed at the resurrection of the just" (its separate mention showing a distinctive resurrection), one of those who sat at meat with Him, evidently associating (as the Jews were accustomed to do) the resurrection just mentioned, with the Kingdom, said : "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the Kingdom of God." Jesus in His reply virtually indorses this association of ideas, for instead of intimating a misapprehension, He says all are invited to such blessedness, but that many reject it.

Obs. 7. Our argument is abundantly sustained by other Scriptures, which, to avoid repetition, we can but briefly refer to, as Acts 3 : 19-21, for not only "the times of restitution" (described in Mill. predictions) necessitate an included res. (so understood by the Jews), but "the times of refreshing" are "the times of reanimation" (see the proof given in detail under Prop. 144, and the reader will notice that "the times of reanimation" confirm the order of the resurrection as advocated by us). Then Matt. 19 : 28, "the regeneration" (see the details given under Prop. 145), with the Jewish views of the res. being a birth (which was adopted by the early Christians, and used even by Eusebius as expressive of a res.), corroborates the doctrine of an eclectic res., both as to character and time. The views given in a previous Prop. respecting the res. being a birth, and allied to a birth preceding the Millennium, is strengthened by its usage in the New Test., where believers are designated "the children of God being the children of the res.;" where "the adoption" is connected with "the redemption of the body;" when the begetting of Jesus (Acts 13 : 33) is tendered as proof of the res. of Jesus, and He is represented as "the first-born" from the dead, etc.

In addition to what was said concerning the birth denoting a resurrection in Prop. 126, many writers take the view that Jesus in His conversation with Nicodemus by the expression "born of the Spirit" denotes the resurrection of the body, or at least includes it (the Spirit being the agency by which the resurrection is produced, as Christ's, and "the born of water" being expressive of baptism and the spiritual moral work attached to it). Thus e.g. Dr. Brookes in the Truth, vol. 3, No. 6, who refers to one verse as being thus rendered by the Latin Vulgate, Augustine, Ambrose, and others : "The Spirit breatheth where He willeth ; and thou hearest His voice, but thou knowest not whence He cometh, and whither He goeth ; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." Brookes adds : "That it is consistent with the context will not be disputed, and that it is grammatically and logically correct will be admitted when it is remembered that the word rendered 'wind' in King James' Version is translated Spirit in the same verse, and that out of three hundred and seventy-four times it is found in the New Test., it is invariably rendered Spirit or Ghost, except in John 3 : 8, where it is translated wind, and Rev. 13 : 15, where it is translated life." A multitude of able writers, following the Biblical analogy and the Jewish faith (see e.g. Michaelis Com. Heb. 1 : 5, Knapp's Ch. Theol., p. 528) designate the resurrection "a birth;" and hymns (as e.g. the one commencing "The whole creation groaneth" in "Hymns and Songs of Praise," by Hitchcock, Eddy, and Schaff, and Watts, "My flesh shall feel a sacred birth," etc.) speak of it as a "second birth" or "sacred birth," etc.

Obs. 8. The res. of the saints being a distinctive one, belonging exclusively to them and no others, this feature of separation as to character and time is always preserved. Thus (1) where a res. of the just and of the unjust is mentioned together, that of the just has precedence ; (2) expressions such as " the Son quickeneth whom He will," " they that hear shall live," etc., imply that not all shall be made alive ; (3) the promise of raising up His own at the last day specifically given to believers, implies that unbelievers shall not be raised at the same time ; (4) the res. of the righteous described alone, without any reference whatever to the wicked (as John 6 : 39, 40, 44, 54 ; 1 Cor. 15, and 1 Thess. 4), implies a separate and distinctive one ; (5) the titles given to the res. of the righteous imply the same, as " the better resurrection," " the res. of the just," " the res. unto life."

The careful student, of course, will consider all such declarations in the light of the age when uttered. That is, he will place himself in the position of the hearers addressed. Thus e.g. the Jews spoke of a resurrection both of the just and the unjust, but when particularizing the order of resurrection they discriminated both as to character and time. Again, a resurrection of righteous ones was always associated with the Messiah's reign, and hence the promises of the Messiah of a special resurrection to believers in Him, was in the line of the Jewish views, derived from Messianic prophecy, on the subject. Again, " the last day" in Jewish theology was not the modern Romish idea of " the last day," but was the last day of the dispensation, to be followed by another and glorious one under the Messiah, in which the promises were to be realized. Hence to raise one up at " the last day" was by them understood as equivalent to a Pre-Mill. resurrection, i.e. a resurrection to be followed by Messiah's reign on David's throne. (Comp. e.g. Props. 138, 139 and 140.)

Attention simply is called to the various readings first presented by Jerome (Horne's Introd., vol. 1, p. 211) of 1 Cor. 15 : 51. If the reading of two of the most authoritative mss., viz., that of the Sinaitic and Alexandrine (comp. Tischendorf's N. T.) is to be received, we have an additional argument in our favor. These mss. read : " We shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed ;" whilst the later reading of the Alexandrian is, " We shall not all sleep, but we shall not all be changed." The critical student will be reminded that just as it is in the translation, some will be taken and others left, so also is it with the preceding resurrection, some will be taken and others will remain.

Obs. 9. Our opponents, as Dr. Brown (Ch. Sec. Coming), Barnes (Com. Apoc.), and others adduce the following proof texts to substantiate their view of a universal and simultaneous res. of all the dead, both just and unjust, viz., Dan. 12 : 2 ; John 5 : 28, 29 ; Rev. 20 : 11-15 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 20-23 ; John 6 : 39, 40, and 17 : 9, 24 ; 2 Tim. 4 : 1. The reader may compare these with our references to the same, and then observe that no interpretation and application of these passages can possibly be valid, which introduces an antagonism—most direct—between Scripture statements. Indeed, he will find more, viz., that several of the texts assigned as proof (e.g. Dan. 12 : 2 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 20-23 ; Rev. 20 : 11-15) fully sustain our position, being sufficiently decisive of an eclectic res. The others are equally so, for observe that John 5 : 28 describes two resurrections, one " the res. of life," and the other " the res. of damnation," while the order must be decided by passages descriptive of the same. The word " hour," upon which our opposers lay so much uncritical stress, simply means, as able critics inform us " a time," so that a time is coming when all shall be raised, but as other Scriptures tell us, " every man in his own order" (even Augustine, Epis. 197, 2 ; Ambrose, Epis. 199 : 17, and many others make " hour" simply equivalent to " time," and thus used e.g. 1 John 2 : 18 ; Matt. 9 : 22 ; John 4 : 23 ; Mark 13 : 11 ; Luke 10 : 21, etc.). The remaining passages need no explanation, following, as they do, the general analogy.

The reader is reminded that many of our opponents do not make a simultaneous resurrection in their comments on 1 Thess. 4 and 1 Cor. 15, and that they agree with us that events are contained in the same sentence (e.g. 1 Cor. 15 : 22, 23) which are separated by a long interval of time ; and that general expressions indicative of totality (e.g. respecting all men dying and yet some are translated) are sometimes modified by more particular mention of order or details. But sufficient has been said to enable the reader to form a just estimate of the two interpretations. Prof. Sanborn, in his Essay on Millenarianism, makes the utterly unauthorized statement that "the Church has believed in all ages that there would be a simultaneous resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust." This can only deceive the ignorant, for every intelligent reader of Church history knows that the Jewish belief on the subject was carefully inculcated and held by the early Church (as shown in detail in our Props. on the history of Chiliaam), and the opposite view arose and prevailed through the Alexandrian and Popish influences.

Obs. 10. In a subject so varied as that of the resurrection it becomes us to heed the caution given in the investigation of any doctrine, viz., to collate the passages referring to it, and explain the more concise by those which give the order, time, and manner of occurrence. In such a comparison it is impossible to find a specific account of the resurrection of the wicked taking place at the same time with that of the righteous. Their standing together, under the general affirmation of a resurrection of both, would be an argument against us if it were not that in other places the Spirit, when circumstantially describing the res., separates them by an interval of time. It is wisdom to accept of the Spirit's explanations. The intelligent reader will appreciate this rule of careful comparison before deciding.

If some one should object to indistinctness in any of our references, it may be observed that none of them are so obscure as the proof given Acts 13 : 33, 34. But if viewed in the light of the resurrection, necessitated by the Covenant, etc., this proof is clearly deducible, flowing naturally and legitimately out of a well-defined Divine Purpose. It is to be regretted that the Babylonian captivity and return has blinded the eyes of so many expositors, so that they cannot survey scarcely any of the predictions without bringing the same in as a kind of general explanatory support, suited to evaporate most precious promises that cannot be satisfactorily incorporated into a spiritual Millennial theory.

Obs. 11. It is impossible to comprehend the order of events bearing on this subject as presented by our opponents, owing to the contradictions involved. To illustrate : take that large class of commentators and others who correctly unite the res. with the personal Advent, and consistently declare that before the Millennial age is introduced Antichrist will be destroyed. Now turn to 2 Thess. 2, and (as Barnes, etc.) they advocate the destruction of the man of sin by the personal Coming of Christ, and, according to their own admissions, this, in the very nature of their concessions, must be a Pre-Millennial Advent ; and, of course, with their identifying the literal res. with precisely such a Coming, there should be no difficulty in receiving a Pre-Millennial res. Simple consistency demands it. Again, here and there in various authors, we find unexplained contradictions that, at least, show that order in these events is sadly neglected. Take an excellent and highly esteemed writer for an example : Van Oosterzee (Theol. of N. T., s. 42), speaking of the res. of the righteous truthfully says : "This is the first resurrection," and in a footnote appends 1 Cor. 15 : 23 ; 1 Thess. 4 : 16 ; Luke 14 : 14 : Rev. 20 : 25, declaring that this will take place at the end of the age. He thus adopts the Millenarian view, and if this were all it would be eminently satisfactory, but the admission is marred by afterward placing at the same time, as the teaching of Paul, "the general res. of the just and the unjust."

Whether the author designed it or not, it flatly contradicts his previous statement. Passing to a lower grade of writers, it would only be a thankless office and a caricature of the Word of God to point out the strange utterances based on "the second death," etc.

In justice, however, to Oosterzee, he advocates (Ch. Dog., vol. 2, p. 786): "More than one resurrection; first a partial one, and then an absolutely universal one. Of the former not only does the Apoc. seem to speak, ch. 20 : 4-6, but also the Lord, Luke 14 : 14, and Paul, 1 Thess. 4 : 16, as also 1 Cor. 15 : 23 as compared with verse 26," etc., and, referring to the connection of the latter, he tells us of a "poetic-prophetic grouping of that which in reality will be seen realized, not side by side, but in succession." Compare Reinhard's Dogmatics, s. 189, Semisch's Art. Chiliasm in Herzog's Encyclop., and authorities already presented.

Obs. 12. The notion advanced by Priest (View of Mill., p. 254), placing the last trump after the thousand years, and the "remaining" of 2 Thess. 4 : 16 to mean a remaining until the thousand years are ended, scarcely deserves refutation. It is alluded to here because some parties are trying to revive it, and because of its connection with the doctrine of the res. This view arises from a neglect to compare Scripture with Scripture, seeing that there are only seven trumpets (marking epochs of time), and the last is expressly asserted (Rev. 11) to be in immediate connection with the res., rewarding of the righteous, and the Millennial Kingdom. Besides, as all critics write, "the remaining" refers simply to the precedence of the res., and the very ones that "remain" are also changed and associated with those favored with the res.

One writer (Butler, Lect. Apoc.), contrary to the uniform teaching of Millenarians, suggests that the resurrection is separated from the Sec. Advent by a long interval of time, perhaps that of the Mill. age itself. But this is opposed by the general teaching of the Scriptures, which links (when declaring the manner of procedure or order) the resurrection with the personal Advent, as we repeatedly show. This Advent and associated resurrection are, as we prove step by step, Pre-Millennial, and was so held by the first Christian churches. Such a view, as well as that of others who place these resurrected saints in the third heaven (as Stuart, etc.), totally misapprehends the covenant promises, the nature of the Theocracy, etc.

Obs. 13. These first begotten of the dead sustain a peculiar and distinctive relationship to Christ, belonging, as the first-born anciently, in an especial manner to the Lord. This will be noticed hereafter (Props. 118 and 154). Now it may be said that as Christ comes to reign as David's immortal Son, prepared to fulfil the covenant promises by virtue of the power of the resurrection and the Divine united with Him, so it is suitable, yea, necessary, that those who are accounted worthy to be associated with Him in His reign (which is asserted to take place at the Millennial period) should also experience the power of the resurrection and become like unto their Head. Hence the propriety of representing the res. taking place at this very time. Without it, the saints would not be qualified; with it, the promises of God can be abundantly realized.

Figuer (The To-Morrow of Death, p. 114) makes his "superhuman" being still mortal, passing at death from one stage to another, and finally landing into the Divine, the Absolute. The Word of God presents no such Oriental derived nonsense, but a destiny immeasurably superior. Indeed, the careful reader of the Scriptures and of history will see a deep reason underlying this eclectic resurrection. It is an outcome of the Plan of Redemption, being essential to it, and extending its efficiency and glory. God purposes to save the race (as a race) of man, but to save and exalt it in its associated capacity there must first be something introduced analogous to what takes place in the individual believer. Man is saved by receiving the truth, being under its guidance and influence, and thus becomes renewed and sanctified by it. The evil tendencies within him are thus arrested and rooted out. So with society, the race itself. The sad history of the world teaches us the fact that there is not sufficient moral and religious element in it to elevate it to a position in which it could safely receive and enjoy Mill. blessings and glory. Nations, most mighty and wise, in their rise, progress, and deterioration, evidence this; the Theocracy even, with its additional higher motives and influences, established for a while in the Jewish nation, but withdrawn on account of sin, is decisive proof of it. Society, national life, cannot, owing to depravity, elevate itself to that perfect state contemplated by the Word of God. It needs and must have an element conjoined and blended with it, to act as a corrector and influencer. This is found in this first resurrection and its results. The world is saved through the power of the resurrection as exhibited in Jesus and in those at His Coming. Humanity in those resurrected ones is at once lifted to a higher plane, which insures—through their reign—an elevation for the race that nothing else is so well adapted to produce. In the Kingdom established under the associated resurrected ones, is thus exhibited the marvellous wisdom, patience, love, and work of God in thus counteracting by one Godlike stroke the inherent evil in human organizations. It is indeed “a strange work,” but most admirably adapted to secure that glorious “regeneration” of the race as a race, and restore to it its forfeited blessings. It destroys the old and brings in the renewed; it subverts the selfish worldly polity and introduces the heavenly; it removes the depravity of the world by introducing and incorporating a new-born, most powerful, convincing, and authoritative life and rulership in the resurrected and glorified persons of the kings and priests. (Comp. such Props. as 152, 154, 156, 167, 196, etc.)

Obs. 14. How frequently our attention is directed to this Pre-Millennial res., and owing to its peculiarity and rank this is reasonable. Christ appeals to this frequency when (John 6 : 45) He says: “No man can come to me except the Father draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day.” Then it is added: “It is written in the Prophets,” etc., Christ knowing the Jewish opinions based on these prophets, confirms the res. as something well known and contained in the Prophets. Now, where do the Prophets teach this res., if not in the passages adduced? How comes it that so many critics deny Christ’s assertion, and can find no such res. in them? The answer to the last may, perhaps, be found in the fact that if a literal res. is admitted, then it must also be acknowledged as Pre-Millennial, and rather than accept the detested Jewish, Chiliastic notions “of folly and ignorance,” these predictions of David, Isaiah, Ezekiel, etc., must denote national deliverance or anything else but a literal res., and this is “wisdom and true enlightenment.” So far too does this proceed that while no such res., excepting perhaps the faintest of allusions, can be found in the Old Test., acknowledgments freely come from all sides that the very language of the Prophets indicates that the doctrine of a res. must have been “a common belief,” or else the figures drawn from it could not exist. But why was it so much believed in that Prophets freely employed language derived from it? Let the Jews tell us, let the Prophets inform us themselves. Surely their testimony is worth far more than that of modern critics, who learnedly speak of outside influences. Now, the first Millenarian has yet to be produced who professes to receive his faith outside of the Divine Record, or from any other source than that derived from God. More than this: it does not require critical acumen or special learning to see that the very Covenant itself, the foundation of following revelation, necessitates such a belief, and that from this basis arises the numerous allusions and predictions bearing on the subject. The reader is referred to the Covenant, and, as we have shown (Prop. 49), its fulfilment is utterly impossible without a resurrection. This then forms the shaping of God's promises, and the longings, faith, hope of believers, if we allow language its usual, customary meaning.

The critical student will observe that Christ's allusion to a resurrection "at the last day, as it is written in the prophets," fully sustains our position (Prop. 140, etc.) concerning the Jewish usage of this phrase, seeing that the prophets do not link the resurrection with an ending of the world (as modern wisdom does), but with a continuation and renovation of the world in a new ordering or dispensation. Those who may think that the resurrection is not referred to, but only the teaching of God mentioned as predicted by the prophets, only receive part of the scope and intent of Christ's words. This is easily shown, first by the subject-matter of the resurrection dependent upon and allied to previous fitness, and then quoting Isa. 54 : 13, which we show at length (Prop. 118) is associated with a resurrection (hence the aptness and beauty of the quotation enforcing both points), and so also Micah 4 : 1-4 and Jer. 31 : 34 (as we show in the Mill. descriptions and restoration of the Jews). In view of this resurrection introducing the Kingdom (as the Jews believed), it was eminently proper for Jesus both to state the fact of the resurrection and to indicate the power lodged in Him to raise the dead. This exhibition only increased the condemnation of the Jews, seeing that they thus found their own Scriptures fully corroborated. As a Pre-Millennial resurrection was believed in by those whom He addressed, His very language, embracing no denial, but making the condition of such resurrection dependent on the reception of Himself, is corroborative of the Jewish view. Such a Pre-Millennial resurrection is necessitated by the covenant, for in no other possible way can the inheriting of the land and the promised blessedness be realized. Hence there is deep significance in Paul (Acts 26 : 6, 7) linking "the hope" derived from the covenant promises with the resurrection, as He does "of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." This was an appeal to a well-known doctrinal position, so fundamental, without which the covenant itself must ever remain a dead letter.

Obs. 15. The reader may have noticed that this Pre-Millennial res. in several places is directly identified with a restoration (Props. 111-114) of the Jewish nation to Palestine. This, additionally, serves as proof of the correctness of our position. For, our argument drawn from the Davidic Covenant, makes such a restoration a necessity in order that the throne and Kingdom of David may be re-established. If Christ and His saints are to reign as predicted over this restored people, etc., then, as a matter of course, this res. must take precedence, just as the Prophets locate it. Hence, it is eminently proper that the resurrection of "the whole house of Israel," including the Gentiles grafted in by faith, previous to their entrance into the promised inheritance, should be delineated as Ezekiel gives it in connection with a national restoration of the Jews under the reign of David's Son. The res. and the throne and Kingdom of David are inseparable, and the former must, to meet the Divine Plan as revealed, precede the latter; and in this the Prophets agree (Prop. 126).

Obs. 16. The doctrine of such a first res. presents motives such as no other can, explanatory of Paul's desire to attain unto it. The reign with Christ, and distinguishing honor and blessedness are connected with it. It gives us an explanation of the martyr spirit of the early Church, and the earnest desires expressed to experience its power. Besides, it indicates how untrue and uncharitable are the deductions of infidels, and even others, that they were sustained and strengthened by a false belief.

Notice Fletcher's prayer, Baxter's, and others, given in Taylor's Voice of the Church. Tertullian tells us that in his day it was customary for Christians to pray "that they might have part in the first resurrection;" to-day, if the truth is to be stated, multitudes, including ministers, know nothing about it. How few e.g. now utter the pious wish of Fletcher, "O that the thought, the hope of Millennial blessedness, may animate me to perfect holiness in the fear of God, that I may be accounted worthy to escape the terrible judgments which will make way for that happy state of things ; and that I may have part in the first resurrection, if I am numbered among the dead before that happy period begins." In reference to the martyrs, see Gibbon and others. Let the reader e.g. comp. what the learned Dodwell, Dis. Cyprian, 12, s. 20, 21, says "The primitive Christians believed that the first resurrection of their bodies would take place in the Kingdom of the Mill. And as they considered that resurrection to be peculiar to the just, so they conceived the martyrs would enjoy the principal share of its glory. Since these opinions were entertained it is impossible to say how many were inflamed with the desire of martyrdom," etc. (Comp. Props. 182 and 183.)

Obs. 17. This res. is so linked in with other subjects that additional proof is advanced confirmatory under various Propositions ; and these, to do us ample justice, the reader must also take into consideration in forming a decisive opinion. Thus e.g. if we are correct in establishing a personal Pre-Millennial Advent, or the inheriting of the earth, or the Millenarian view of the judgment day, the judgship of Christ and of the saints, or the period of regeneration, day of Christ, the morning of that day, etc., this adds materially to our argument in locating this res.

Obs. 18. The believer can meet death without fear. While death is an enemy, while feeling and acknowledging his penal power, yet with the assurance thus given of a speedy, complete victory over him, they can receive him as one over whom they are destined to triumph. He can well use the language of Micah 7 : 7, 8, "Therefore I will look unto the Lord ; I will wait (comp. Isa. 25 : 9) for the God of my salvation ; my God will hear me. Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy (death) ; when I fall, I shall arise ; when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me. I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against Him, until He plead my cause and execute judgment for me ; He will bring me forth to the light (like David, Ps. 17 : 15), and I shall behold His righteousness." The believer has "hope in his death," and "his flesh shall rest in hope."

Our doctrine forbids the mystical view, so largely prevailing, of a resurrection immediately after death, which completely spiritualizes away the Second Advent itself. This makes the believer to gain at death a victory over death, while the Scriptural idea is that death gains the victory and will retain it until the Coming of the resurrecting Jesus, the victory being evidenced by the body consigned to the grave. The believer anticipates, in death, victory, and the sting of death being removed, can die in hope and triumphant faith of ultimate redemption. All such mystical theories make death, not penal, but a friend—a kind of Saviour. (Comp. Prop. 125.) At this resurrection will be verified in the highest and most glorious manner such promises as those contained in Prov. 3 : 2 ; Ps. 91 : 16, etc.

Obs. 19. This first resurrection being an eclectic one, separate and pertaining to those accounted worthy of attaining to the privileges of "the first-born," it indicates a previous judgment. To insure a first res. (or a translation) there must be a corresponding fitness, and therefore this res. itself is evidence of the Divine acceptance of the person experiencing its power. An antecedent estimate of character and worthiness must, of necessity, exist. This is based on justifying faith which releases from condemnation and insures eternal life through Jesus ; while the position and honor of the saint after resurrection is graduated by the works done in his life of faith.

In view of this first resurrection being introductory to the Kingdom, it was requisite for the Messiah to indicate that the power to raise the dead was fully lodged in Him. This He did (e.g. John, chs. 5 and 6, etc.), and the result must have been to establish His hearers (the Jews) in their Jewish views respecting the resurrection, and which was continued unimpaired in the Primitive Church. We have the assurance that all who come unto Him and are His, He will raise at the last day, losing nothing, being a perfect Redeemer and imparting a perfect redemption. In reference to the previous judgment, see Prop. 135, where it is presented in detail.

Obs. 20. Out of the multitude of testimonies we select a few, illustrative of the men (most eminent for ability) who hold to our view. Rothe (Dogmatic, 2 P., p. 70) advocates a bodily resurrection, etc., as follows: "The Redeemer asserts distinctly the future res. of the body. And still His utterances so sound as to separate that of the righteous from that of the wicked, both as to fact and time. So in Luke 20 : 35, where the discourse is not of the res. in general, but distinctly of a res. to the earthly Kingdom of the Redeemer, the so-called First Resurrection. So it sounds (es klingt) when He calls Himself the 'Resurrection and the Life,' when He says, 'All that the Father gives Him shall come to Him, and He will raise them up at the last day,' 'all who believe in Him,' 'all who eat His flesh and blood,' where the clear implication is that the rest of the dead awake not at the same time. Such a distinction He makes in Luke 14 : 14, a resurrection for the pious, a res. for the wicked. So the Apostle Paul, 1 Cor. 15 : 23, comp. with Rom. 8 : 10, contemplates, not a general resurrection, but that of believers, 'they who are Christ's,' 'the sons of God.' The Apoc. distinguishes a first and second res. The first res., which ensues at the same time with the Advent, Rev. 19 : 11-21, is expressly described as the 'First,' Rev. 20 : 4-6. In it only the martyrs and they who have remained pure from the contamination of the world-power, have a share. These and only these reign with Christ 1000 years, while the 'rest of the dead' awake not to life. After the expiration of these years, and victory over Satan let loose, then the rest of the dead arise for judgment, Rev. 20 : 11-15." Such indorsements come from men who are fully persuaded that the Plan of Redemption, as covenanted and confirmed in Jesus the Christ, positively demands such a res. in order to insure a complete realization of promise. So Dorner (Person of Christ, vol. 1, p. 412) says: "Complete victor Christianity never can be until nature has become an organ in its service, a willing instrument of the perfect man, that is, of the righteous who are raised from the dead."

Out of a multitude of similar testimonies, we select one, quoted by Dr. Craven (Lange's Com. Rev., p. 354) from Creation and Redemption: "It is incumbent on us here to say a few words on the subject of the First Resurrection, for there is a general impression that the belief in it rests solely upon this passage (Rev. 20 : 6). But this is a great mistake. The truth of a resurrection of some at a different time from that of the general resurrection, is evident from Scripture, independent of this passage in the Apoc. Omitting the passages from the Old Test. Scriptures, sustained by the promises of which the Old Test. worthies, as St. Paul says, suffered and served God in the hope of obtaining 'a better resurrection' (Heb. 11 : 35), we will state as briefly as may be the conclusion to which we are led by the words of the Lord and His Apostles. Our Lord makes a distinction between the resurrection which some shall be counted worthy to attain to, and some not, Luke 20 : 3, 5. St. Paul says there is a resurrection 'out from among the dead' (exanastasis), to attain which he strove with all his might as the prize to be gained, Phil. 3 : 11. He also expressly tells us, that while in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive; yet it shall not be all at once, but 'every man in his own order'; Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at His Coming.' It is particularly to be remarked that wherever the resurrection of Christ or of His people is spoken of in Scripture, it is a 'resurrection from the dead;' and wherever the general resurrection is spoken of, it is the 'resurrection of the dead.' This distinction, though preserved in many instances in the English translation, is too frequently omitted; but in the Greek the one is always coupled with the preposition ek, out of, and the other is without it; and in the Vulgate it is rendered by a mortuis or ex mortuis, as distinct from resurrectio mortuorum. In Rom. 8 : 11, 'The Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead,' it is ek nekron, a mortuis. So in Rom. 10 : 7; Eph. 1 : 20; Heb. 13 : 20; 1 Pet. 1 : 3, 21. So Lazarus was raised ek nekron, John 12 : 1, 9. Our Lord in His reply to the Sadducees, made the distinction between the general resurrection of the dead, and the resurrection which some should be accounted worthy to attain to. The children of this age (ainis) marry, but they who shall be accounted worthy to attain that aion, and the resurrection from the dead (anastaseis tes ek nekron) shall not marry (Luke 20 : 34, 35). St. Paul, when he spoke of a resurrection to which he strove to attain (Phil. 3 : 8, 11), and to which he was with all his might pressing forward, as the high prize to gain which he was agonizing, and for which he counted all else loss, as if one preposition was not enough to indicate his meaning, uses it doubled, eis ten ezanastasin ten nekron. 'Si quomodo occurram ad resurrectionem, qua est ex mortuis.' If St. Paul had been looking only to the general resurrection, he need not have given himself any trouble, or made any sacrifice to attain to that; for to it all, even Judas and Nero, must come; but to attain to the First Resurrection he had need to press forward for the prize of that calling. And thus in his argument for the resurrection in 1 Cor. 15 (vers. 12, 21), when he speaks of the resurrection generally, he speaks of the resurrection of the dead (anastasis nekron); but when he speaks of our Lord's resurrection, it is ek nekron, from the dead. And he marks the time when Christ's people shall be raised from the dead, namely, 'at Christ's Coming, every man in his order;' 1st, Christ; 2d, Christ's people; 3d, all the remainder, at some other period, which he terms 'the end,' when the last enemy, death, is to be destroyed, put an end to (vs. 23-26). And it follows as a matter of course, that if those who are Christ's are to be raised from the dead at His Coming, and if He comes previous to the destruction of the Antichrist, and to the Millennium, this first resurrection must be at least a thousand years before the general resurrection."

Obs. 21. The reader is requested to observe that in our line of argument in behalf of a literal Pre-Millennial resurrection we are amply supported by the general analogy of Scripture on the subject. Whatever may be thought of the interpretation and application of particular passages, yet the following connected chain of divine teaching is apparent. First, we have the Covenant and its promises, which make such a resurrection a necessity in order to their verification. Second, the realization of such Covenant promises is based directly upon a resurrection from the dead, and such a distinguishing res. pertaining to the righteous is taught in numerous places in the Old Test. Third, this teaching of a peculiar, eclectic res. (so clearly taught that the Jews had received it) is repeated in varied expressions and declared hope in the Gospels and Epistles. Fourth, it is specially treated of in the Apocalypse, a work particularly devoted to eschatology. So decisive is this chain of evidence that the early Church, planted by the Apostles and the elders appointed by them, was universally under its influence and guidance. We gladly and hopefully remain under the same. But in addition to all this, we have a series of connected doctrines taught, which are essential to a Pre-Mill. resurrection, such e.g. as the Pre-Mill. Advent, the judgment day, the day of the Lord Jesus, the morning of the day, the reign of Christ and the saints, and various others. Nothing requisite to sustain our view of the res. is lacking, and, therefore, this union and harmony of doctrine greatly confirms our faith and hope.

In view of this Scriptural argument, the immense array of proof texts, the Jewish view, the early Church belief, the concessions of opponents, and the expressed faith of many able expositors and divines, is it not singular that in many works and articles, devoted to Eschatology, our doctrine is either barely hinted at or entirely ignored? This contemptuous treatment can scarcely be attributed to its being unworthy of notice (for its historical aspect and its honorable advocates would redeem it from such silence), and we are forced to the conviction that such an avoidance is caused by persons being afraid of its authority, both Scriptural and traditional, and feel their weakness to undertake its refutation.

Obs. 22. Freely admitting that no doctrine is to be simply received on human authority, yet we confess to a gratification that our faith is that of the Primitive Church on this point. It is a satisfaction to know that we understand God's Word on this subject just as the immediate disciples and followers of the Apostles comprehended it. For, such a union of view does not make us liable to the suspicion which might justly arise if it was a doctrine that only originated in the fourth century, or in the tenth, or even later. Besides this, it is a doctrine which, if true, it would be reasonable to expect men to teach, who were so nearly related to the Apostles in time, and who had, more or less, the benefit of their previous instruction.

Compare, for early view, Props. 71 to 75, inclusive. The reader will not censure us when we also congratulate ourselves upon the important concessions, made even by our opponents (as e.g. Prof. Stuart, Brown, Barnes, etc.). So fixed was this precious doctrine of the first resurrection in the faith of the early Church, that even Origen, the father of the present prevailing spiritualizing interpretation, could not entirely free himself from its teaching. Thus he expresses himself (quoted by Brookes, and taken from his Thirteenth Homily on Jeremiah) in accord with us and irreconcilable with his own system, as follows: "If any man shall preserve the washing of the Holy Spirit, etc., he shall have part in the first resurrection; but if any man be saved in the second resurrection only, it is the sinner that needeth the baptism by fire. Wherefore, seeing these things are so, let us lay the Scriptures to heart, and make them the rule of our lives; that so, being cleansed from the defilement of sin before we depart, we may be raised up with the saints, and have our lot with Christ Jesus." Here the distinction of separate resurrections is preserved, and the first is acceded to be pre-eminent, and specially belonging to the saints.

Obs. 23. Lastly, we may be allowed to congratulate ourselves on the fact that our system of interpretation opens no door of entrance to the many conflicting and dangerous errors respecting the resurrection. Many, taking the weapons ready forged to hand by a spiritualizing interpretation of Isaiah, Ezekiel, and John, turn them against a literal resurrection of the dead. Work after work could be mentioned which has done this, jubilantly quoting from the orthodox the arguments for a figurative, moral, or ecclesiastical resurrection. This is only the legitimate developing of the Origenistic system of interpretation, an almost impregnable refuge for all forms of error. Now, in all those systems, which reduce the res. to an incompleted redemption of the body, or which refine it away into a mystical conception, etc., not one of them can, or does, appeal to us for deductions or aid, since in no shape or form do we give them the slightest countenance. Hence probably arises the extreme hostility manifested toward our system by various authors, because it is a standing rebuke to their own efforts at spiritualizing.

It is unaccountable to us, why professed believers in the Word should, as some do, detest the doctrine of the First Resurrection as advocated by the Primitive Church. What can possibly influence the bitterness and hatred against it in some quarters, when we show forth its pre-eminence, its exceeding desirableness, and its leading to unspeakable honor and glory? We confess our inability—after the abundant Scriptural basis presented upon which it is founded—to assign a justifiable reason for the same. Let us ask such to reflect, that such conduct is not argumentation, and that, peradventure, the ridicule heaped upon it may eventually recoil upon themselves, inasmuch as they may be found speaking and writing slightingly and sneeringly of one of the most precious of God's own appointments. Surely, aside from the Scripture, the host of able men who have held to it and derived comfort from it (even at the stake) should influence reflecting men to treat it—although opposed to it—with respect. Under several Props. we give specimens of the language used respecting—what we must consider—God's own appointments and precious promises.

PROPOSITION 129. The Jewish view of a Pre-Mill. resurrection requisite for the introduction of the Messianic Kingdom is fully sustained by the grammatical sense of the New Test.

Attention is thus prominently called to the fact, that the agreement existing between Jewish belief and the language of the New Test. most effectually supports our doctrinal position.

Obs. 1. To avoid repeating, the reader is requested to notice how under the preceding Props. relating to the res. taught in the Old Test., the Apoc., and the Gospels and Epistles, the constant reference was made to the Jewish belief prevailing, and quotations were given fully sustaining the same from critics, historians, commentators, etc. Now, we ask the reader to consider how it was possible for Jesus and the inspired writers to employ language, in view of such an existing belief, fully corroborating it, unless the belief was a correct one, in strict accord with the Divine Purpose. Writers of all shades of opinion, opposers to Chiliasm included, tell us that the Jews did not expect a fulfilment of the Messianic predictions, of the Abrahamic Covenant and the promises based upon it, without a resurrection, eclectic in its nature, accessory and initiatory to their realization. The student, if honest and sincere, must, before rejecting our doctrine, give a satisfactory reason why the statements of the New Test. in their plain grammatical sense (for this sense is admitted, but a spiritual one is substituted) teach the same kind of an eclectic res., associated with a future reign of the Messiah. He must also, if considerate, show why this Jewish belief, thus corroborated by a sense of the New Test., was universally held by the Churches established under Apostolic guidance, if an error. This no one can do, without impeaching the Divine instruction of the New Test. and the Divine guidance manifested in the establishment of the Ch. Church. The conclusion, inevitable, to which we are forced is this: that the doctrine is truth, founded on Divine utterances and assurances, and committed to the Church to stimulate faith and hope.

As to the Jewish belief, we only need to quote one authority hostile to Pre-Millenarianism, viz., Prof. Stuart, who (Com. Apoc., vol. 1, p. 177) says: "That the great mass of Jewish Rabbins have believed and taught the doctrine of the resurrection of the just, in the days of the Messiah's development, there can be no doubt on the part of him who has made any considerable investigation of this matter."

Obs. 2. Again, there is no question concerning the grammatical sense, for that is admitted even by our opponents, many of whom we have quoted. But we are assured that that sense is not the one intended; that a typical or spiritual meaning is the one to be received. Hence the doctrine of a literal Pre-Mill. res. is derided as "antiquated," "Jewish," etc., and utterly unfitted for the advanced thought of the age. A question, however, arises, which we will do well to ponder, viz., which is the safest to accept of, a God-given sense, or of one which is at the option of the interpreter? If a Pre-Mill. res. is an error, then it is one contained in the letter of the Word, and given by inspired men under the guidance of God Himself, and we are justifiable in entertaining it; but, on the other hand, if it be a truth, thus plainly declared, we are inexcusable in its rejection.

Obs. 3. Infidels object to the New Test. on the ground that it unmistakably teaches this previous existing Jewish view (so Strauss, Bauer, Renan, etc.), and reject the whole as evidence of superstition and ignorance. Apologists lamely strive, by the application of spiritualistic interpretation, to avoid such a conclusion, while admitting (1) the Jewish view as existing at the First Advent, and (2) the grammatical sense expressing it, but which is, they say, merely an accommodation to existing prejudice, and must be understood in a higher and nobler sense. No wonder that many apologies only confirm the unbeliever in his state of unbelief, seeing that they are utterly unfair to the Record and derogatory to the divine teaching of the Master and the Apostles. We, on the other hand, fully admit the infidel's objection grounded on Jewish belief and corroborative New Test. teaching, and, instead of apologizing for the same and explaining it away, we account for it as a matter grounded in God's Redemptive Plan, contained in the covenants and predictions, and which simple consistency and unity requires to be taught in the New Test.

Obs. 4. Judge Jones (Notes, p. 284) remarks of the Jewish opinion: "They understood that the promises (in covenants) which God made to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob were absolute; and they believed that He would surely perform them, even to those of former generations, who had part in them; and on this ground, mainly, they taught the resurrection of the dead, Acts 24 : 15." "Three opinions touching the res. prevailed to a greater or less extent among the Jews. (1) Some maintained that only the just or righteous of their nation would be raised; (2) others maintained that the whole of their race (all Israelites) would be raised; (3) and some maintained that all Israelites and some Gentiles would be raised. It is evident from Acts 24 : 14, 15, that the Jews of Paul's day did not adopt the first of these opinions, but they appear to have limited the res. to their nation. In Rom. 9 : 2-5, Paul teaches that the adoption, by which he meant the resurrection, Rom. 8 : 23, pertained to Israelites; and hence it would seem that the res., as a term of the original covenant, was limited to Israel. Rabbi Bechai says, God granted four special honors to Israel, viz., (1) the land of Canaan; (2) the law; (3) prophecy; (4) the resurrection of the dead. Josephus, though obscure, evidently did not believe the res. would be universal."

Aside from the authorities quoted under previous Props., the student may refer to Lardner's Works, Harmer's Mis. Works, etc., and it will be found that in the various opinions expressed there still remained the idea of a limited, eclectic resurrection over against that of a universal one. In the resurrection pertaining to the Messianic Kingdom and Millennial blessedness, the prevailing view, based on covenant promises given to the nation, was that Israelites (and Gentiles incorporated by adoption) alone participated in it. Now this conception of the Pre-Millennial resurrection is retained in the New Test., because, as we have shown in detail, the Gentiles called also experience its power and blessedness in view of their being received and acknowledged as the children of Abraham (see Props. 61-65). In numerous works we find references to this Jewish belief in a limited resurrection, as e.g. Pressense (The Early Days, etc., p. 74, quoting from Grimm's Die Samariter) refers to the Talmud, declaring respecting the Samaritans, "this accursed people shall have no part in the resurrection of the dead." The Book of Enoch (regarded by able critics as pre-Christian—see art. on M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.) expressly (61 : 5 ; 91 : 10 ; 92 : 3 ; 100 : 5) teaches that the righteous shall be raised up and share in the blessedness of the Messiah's Kingdom. Later works of a mixed character, as the Test. of Judah in the Twelve Patriarchs, allude to the resurrection and exaltation of the Patriarchs in the time of the Messiah, and express the faith : "They who have died in grief shall arise in joy, and they who have lived in poverty for the Lord's sake shall be made rich, and they who have been in want shall be filled, and they who have been weak shall be made strong, and they who have been put to death for the Lord's sake shall awake in life." Jewish-Christian writings have varied references. The ancient Jews (Cudworth's Intel. System, p. 797) called the resurrection of the body "the angelic clothing of the soul," which reminds one of the saying of Jesus, "made equal unto the angels."

PROPOSITION 130. This Kingdom is preceded by a translation of the living saints.

This is a prerequisite, in order that those accounted worthy to inherit the Kingdom, and rule the nations with Christ, may be gathered. In reference to the dead saints, a Pre-Mill. resurrection (Props. 125-129) is promised by which to attain this object; and with such a resurrection (i.e. at that time) a translation of the living saints is also connected in 1 Thess. 4 : 17, "the dead in Christ shall rise first (or away);<sup>1</sup> then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds (or, in clouds)<sup>2</sup> to meet the Lord in the air," etc. The same is repeated in 1 Cor. 15 : 51, 52, in union only with the resurrection of believers : "Behold, I shew you a mystery : We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed," etc.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Comp. Acts 8 : 39 ; Matt. 13 : 19, etc.

<sup>2</sup> Barnes, Com. loci, says : "Greek : 'in clouds'—without the article. This may mean 'in clouds ;' that is, in such numbers and in such grouping as to resemble clouds. So it is rendered by Macknight, Koppe, Rosenmüller, Bush, and others. The absence of the article here would rather seem to demand this interpretation." Compare Lange, Alford, etc.

<sup>3</sup> Many critics have "into the air" connected with the verb "caught away." Compare Lange, Alford, Ellicott, Vaughan, etc. The phrase, with the suggested amendments supported by critical authority, would be as follows : "Then we which are alive and remain (who are living, who are left over) shall together with them be caught away (or snatched away) into the air in clouds to meet the Lord ; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

<sup>4</sup> Some writers (as Rev. Wilson in Proph. Times, vol. 12, p. 131) make the language (John 11 : 25, 26) of Jesus to Martha applicable to this period : "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live" (i.e. by the power of the resurrection) ; "and whoever liveth and believeth on me" (i.e. at the time of resurrection) "shall never die" (i.e. he shall experience a translation).

Obs. 1. While all writers on prophecy insist upon the translation of living saints at the Advent of Jesus, and the Millenarian authors direct especial attention to it ; while it was a special object of hope and desire to the early believers and to succeeding ones, it is only more recently, since eschatology has received remarkable study and investigation, that important additions (resulting from comparing Scripture with Scripture) have been made to our knowledge respecting it. Our work would be incomplete without noticing this feature, and adding something to a subject imperfectly comprehended by many.<sup>1</sup> A few preliminary remarks are necessary in order to appreciate some things pertaining to it. Thus e.g. the common view that the resurrection will be a public affair, to be witnessed by the world, is now discarded as untenable in the light of Christ's (also pertaining to "the first-fruits") resurrection, which was strictly private. It is now held, and properly, that the members will be raised like the Head was

