(for if a public resurrection, humanly speaking, is desirable, then surely it ought to have been that of Christ's), in order that the preparatory events for the coming judgment of the world may be introduced in such a manner (privately) as to establish "the snare" and "the net" intended for the unbelieving and wicked. Leading prophetic writers justly have no hesitancy in asserting that no mortal eye of unbelief shall behold the resurrection. This at once places the translation of the saints in a new aspect, and indicates, as it accompanies the resurrection, that it also is unseen (like Enoch's and Elijah's) by the world. Again, careful students of the Word felt satisfied that the resurrection of the saints in Rev. 20 : 4-6 was specifically that of those who passed through the great tribulation under the culminated Antichrist, and was preceded by that of others, as implied in Rev. 14 : 1-5, etc. This is corroborated by the fact already presented (Prop. 127), that the word "first" applied to the resurrection has reference not to its being first in time (which would be incorrect, seeing that Christ's res. and that of saints, Matt. 27 : 52, 53, preceded), but of its being a resurrection which also brings those who participated in it within the privileges of "the first-born," viz., a double portion, Deut. 21 : 17 ; priesthood, Num. 3 : 13 ; and government or dominion, Gen. 27 : 29.* The subject of the resurrection, for a long time, was not clear to the writer until he observed the real scriptural application of the word "first," as just given. The first resurrection, viz., that resurrection pertaining to "the first-born," "the first-fruits," commenced with the resurrection of Jesus, and it receives its accessions as stated e.g. in 1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17, and in Rev. 20 : 4-6. This also serves to illustrate the translation, preparing us, in view of several resurrections (belonging to that of the just), to appreciate references, allusions, and implications which indicate more than one translation. Again, prophetic writers are also agreed that what is called the Sec. Advent (the Advent itself as distinguished from the reign and Kingdom that follows) is not to be regarded as simply one act, but embracing a series of acts connected with the one Coming (for when Jesus comes again He remains upon earth). That is, the Sec. Advent is to be considered more in the light of the First Advent (which latter embraced not less than thirty-three years, and numerous acts predicted as related to His Coming), as something which, owing to a variety of things prophesied concerning it, cannot possibly be limited to a few years. Comparing all the events that are included in the Sec. Advent, it is simply impossible, without great violation of order, etc., to crowd them all together as the instantaneous resultants of such a Coming. • This, then, impresses caution in not compressing what is intimated concerning the translation or removal of saints necessarily to one transaction or day. Again, admitting the requirement of not confining the Advent to a single act, or day, or brief period, previous to the establishment of the Kingdom in all its glory, writers now generally attribute to this introductory manifestation a period of seven years, of forty years, and of (thirty and forty conjoined) seventy years. (Considering the events to follow the Advent before the overthrow of Antichrist, such as the development of the confederation, the return of a portion of the Jews to Palestine, the doom of the harlot, etc., the longer periods are preferable.) This at once enables us to see how such resurrections and translations harmonize with the specific introductory period, in which God's power and love is manifested at the time when the power of His enemies shall be also formidably exhibited and broken. Again, analogy favors the removal of the righteous in a time of severe and terrible judgment intended for the wicked, as in the case of Noah, Lot, the early believers at Jerusalem, etc., while previous translations are not lacking, as in the case of Enoch and Elijah. The Second Advent inaugurates a series of most tremendous judgments, both upon the Church and the world—so terrific that they are constantly pointed out as the culmination of God's wrath—and it is reasonable to suppose, judging from God's past dealings, that He again will grant special deliverance to those who are devoted to Him. At this time also, the removal being designed not only to save out of tribulation, but to prepare the saints, deemed worthy of it, for promised rulership then to be instituted, and for joint participation in the administration of judgments upon the nations, a translation accompanied by the same transforming change, glorification, which the resurrected saints experience, is precisely that which we ought to anticipate. Again, it is universally admitted by Millenarians that "the day of the Lord Jesus" is preceded not only by "a morning," but that it virtually begins in "the night;" Christ representing His Coming to be when it is yet "night," He being "the morning star," which ushers in "the morning" of the glorious day. This refers the resurrection and translation of a chosen body to "the night," i. e. to the close of this dispensation, as preparatory to the introduction of an incoming one.* Or, in other words, it warns us that, as the past shows, dispensations may overlap each other to some extent, in that certain initiatory movements of the incoming one commence and are in progress before the other entirely closes. This prepares us then to accept of the wonderful things which are predicted to occur at the winding up of this dispensation, and to regard them in their relationship to the One to come. Again, critical writers in investigating 2 Thess. 2 : 2 have shown that the word translated "is at hand" (in the phrase "the day of Christ (or Lord) is at hand") means, correctly rendered, "is come," or "has come," i. e. is something already present, and not something still future.<sup>4</sup> This correctly explains the trouble and alarm of the Thessalonian brethren, who were certainly not afraid of "the blessed hope," which Paul says they waited for (1 Thess. 1 : 10), and for which they were prepared (1 Thess. 2 : 19 and 3 : 13, and 5 : 4, 5), but apprehending that "the day of Christ" had already come, and they not having experienced the promised translation, and their pious dead being still with them without an experienced resurrection, they were trouled and distressed at the thought. Those brethren with hearts full of love for the Saviour were not so fearful that they would desire and pray (as multitudes now) that the blessed Lord should delay His Coming, but, in some way misapprehending the real state of affairs, they believed that the initiatory proceedings belonging to the day of Christ had already commenced, and that they and their pious dead were left without realizing the exceeding precious promises given to them. This simple change in a single word, supported too by the strongest of evidence, explains not only the cause of the Thessalonians' trouble (which Paul proceeds to remove by showing that an apostasy must first come to develop into the predicted Antichrist, implying that such an apostasy with its result necessarily required time, still in the future, before "the day of Christ" came), but throws much light, corroborative, on the subject of the resurrection and the translation of the saints. For, to cause such trouble they must have believed that "the day of Christ" would be inaugurated by preliminaries unseen by the world, and that the resurrection and translation would both be invisible, and they, not participating were doomed to terrible tribulation, or that the predictions were false. We say nothing respecting the source from whence they derived such thoughts, but one thing is impressive, viz., that the Apostle does not correct such impressions, but rather by his silence confirms them in them. Yea, more, in beseeching them "by our gathering together unto Him," he virtually indorses the views entertained by them respecting this gathering.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A writer in the N. Y. Evangelist, under the title of "Pre-Mill. Incongruities," not observing how we distinguish between the concealed and the open, visible Coming, finds fault with Dr. Brookes and "the Proph. Conference," for saying in one place that the Advent may be immediate, and then in another place substituting events as preceding the visible Advent. The "incongruity" is in the critic, simply because he is ignorant of the doctrine that we hold. Again, in Lange's Com. 1 Thess. 4, doc. 7, the two stages, resulting in a translation previous to the tribulation, is stigmatized as an "Irvingite interpretation" (because taught by E. L. Geering of the "Catholic Apostolic Church," in his work Mahnung und Trost der Schrift in Betreff der Wiederkunft Christi). Not having seen Geering's work, we still express a doubt whether he, as alleged, sets this up as a dogma having "salvation connected with the acceptance of it," because our acquaintance with writers of this class indicates that not "salvation," but great privilege and honor and deliverance is connected with its acceptance. The question, after all, is this: What is the teaching of the Word on the subject? Brookes (Maranatha, p. 493) aptly remarks of this opposition: "The objection to the truth advocated in this chapter is urged with a bad grace by those who insist that Christ has come thousands and millions of times since His ascension from the Mt. of Olives in every startling providence, in every revival, in every death during the last eighteen hundred years."

<sup>2</sup> This fact of several resurrections, all relating to the one specially promised to the brethren of Christ, has even led some writers to advocate a kind of continuous one. Thus e.g. Dr. Seiss, without, however, subscribing to it as a truth, says: "Selnecker, one of Germany's greatest divines, of the age next succeeding the Reformation, quotes Ambrose as teaching that every year some saints are raised from their graves, and ascribes the same opinion to Luther, as well as accepts the same as his own." Selnecker, however, most appropriately remarks: "To this resurrection belongs everything that is raised to immortality before the last day."

<sup>3</sup> The "morning star" comes before "the day" dawns; the "sun" shines during "the day"; Jesus is both. As the morning star, He is seen by few; as the sun, He is seen by all. Those who watch not merely for the sun, but for the morning star, properly heed the cautions and injunctions relating to the posture of watching.

<sup>4</sup> In Props. 121 and 123 this feature was only incidentally alluded to as our line of reasoning, referred mainly to the one verse showing a visible personal Coming as a distinctive event also connected with "the day of Christ." Here, however, we bring out prominently this characteristic. The verb translated "is at hand," in the sense of impending or near, is elsewhere translated "present," its proper meaning. McKnight (who certainly has no sympathy for our views) translates it "hath come." Alford (see Alford's remarks) and Lange, "is present," and so Bengel and Olshausen, "what is present." Ellicott and Lutemann explain it as something already begun, i.e. present or "is now come." Syriac version has it "is come," so the Swiss version, Luther's "vorhanden sei," which may be taken either as "to be present" or as impending, at hand. Dr. Lillie says the word, as far as he can trace it, "invariably denotes actual presence." The Revision has it "is now present."

<sup>5</sup> One of the editors of the Proph. Times, vol. 5, p. 43, has so appropriately written upon this point that we reproduce it. "This passage also shows the very different manner in which the early Christians must have conceived of the Day of the Lord and the Coming of Christ, from that which now obtains, in order to have been liable to such an erroneous impression on the subject. With the present popular conceptions of the sudden grandeur, conspicuity, and universal publicity of the Coming of Christ, it would be utterly impossible to obtain currency for the idea that it was already present or accomplished. People now are looking for the world to come to an end—for an utter break-up of the whole system of nature—for a complete wreck of the universe. When we talk to them of the last day and the return of Christ, they begin to think of the burning up of all sublunary things, and of the complete extinction of human life, and even of the whole dwelling-place of man and all created things. But if the early Christians had thought of this subject after this style, how is it possible that they could have believed the last day had come, when the world still stood and the stars remained in their places, and the whole course of nature was still going on as before?" etc.

Obs. 2. But some other things, also introductory to the subject, must be attentively considered before we come to a decisive conclusion. Thus, as has been pointed out by many writers, the Scriptures describe a Coming of Jesus for or in behalf of His saints (as e.g. 1 Thess. 3 : 14-17 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 51, 52), and then again another with all His saints (as e.g. Zech. 14 : 5 ; Rev. 19 : 14 ; 1 Thess. 3 : 13 ; Jude 14, 15), and these two, differing thus in an important particular, indicate separate stages or manifestations pertaining to the same Second Advent. Without allowing something of this kind, several acts pertaining to the one great Coming to this earth, it is impossible to reconcile such passages. For they are sustained in their difference not only by the simple act of coming for and with the saints, but in the design of such a Coming, viz., as to the former, for the purpose of salvation and glorification, and as to the latter, for the direct overthrow of the enemies of God, the restoration of the Jewish nation, and the glory (thereby promoted) of the saints. This is still more confirmed by the conclusive statements which the Spirit gives of this one Second Advent, when it is represented to us under two aspects, viz., one, a coming when men are at peace, buying, selling, marrying, etc., and anticipating no evil, but only "peace and safety," all things apparently promising continued prosperity and happiness (so e.g. Luke 17 : 26-30 ; Matt. 24 : 36-39 ; 1 Thess. 5 : 3, etc.) ; the other, a coming in a time of war, of great distress and suffering (as e.g. Zech. 14, Rev. 19, Joel 3, Luke 21 : 27, etc.) ; the one, a coming in a concealed, thief-like manner, i.e. unobserved, unnoticed, unheralded (1 Thess. 5 : 2 ; Matt. 24 : 43, 44 ; Luke 12 : 37-40 ; Rev. 3 : 3, etc.) ; the other, a coming so open, conspicuous, that all shall witness it (as e.g. Matt. 24 : 30 ; Rev. 19 ; Matt. 25 : 31, etc.). The more students come to weigh and compare Scripture referring to this period, the more are they convinced that it would be presumptuous for us to limit all these varied utterances to one single act, and that we must allow a series of events to be comprehended under this Coming ; the Spirit directing us now to one and then to another of them ; the order of which is only to be attained by a careful comparison. It also is a fact that these "first-born," to whom the honor of aiding in the execution of God's judgments (and the translated belong to them) are given (e.g. Ps. 149 : 9, comp. Prop. 154), must be both resurrected (and remember that the translation is connected with the resurrection) and translated before they can participate in inflicting "the judgment written" upon the nations (as Dan. 7 : 22 ; Rev. 2 : 26, 27, etc.). Besides this, the significancy of "the first-fruits" (which embrace not merely resurrected saints, but, as we have seen, translated ones, as both are cojoined by the Spirit) would be entirely lost, i.e. as something preceding a general harvest which is to follow, if we did not allow that the one necessarily goes before the other, leaving an interval between them, although "the first-fruits" and "the harvest" are both included under the same general Advent,<sup>1</sup> thus again showing that just as at the First Advent Jesus was only manifested to a few favored ones, and an interval of years elapsed before His final public manifestation, so at His Sec. Advent He will only be exhibited to those accounted worthy, and after a set interval ultimately to the world. It is by observing this characteristic of the Sec. Advent that the true force of the injunction to constantly look and watch for the Coming of Jesus can be appreciated. Not distinguishing that several aspects of this Coming, including separate acts, etc., are given, has led eminent writers to lay down certain things (such as a partial restoration of the Jews, a covenant with the Jews, etc.) as prerequisites to such an Advent, and they are correct, but only in reference to one aspect of it, viz., the visible Coming or manifestation of the Son of Man with His saints, as e.g. Zech. 14. On the other hand, we have assurances given to us not to interpose any event whatever between us and such an Advent, but to regard it as an event that may occur at any moment without any notification of its approach (excepting only such as are given by approximative signs), and these two representations of the same Advent are only reconcilable by noticing what a comparison of Scripture inculcates, that the first aspect of this Coming refers to a concealed, hidden Coming for specific purposes (viz., to raise, translate, and glorify His saints, to inaugurate the preliminaries of his Kingdom, etc.), which takes place before the events predicted as pertaining to His visible manifestation.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> That we are to distinguish between "the first-fruits" and "the harvest" is self-evident, for they are separated and treated distinctively in Holy Writ, as e.g. Rev. 14 : 1-5, where a specific number is designated "the first fruits unto God and to the Lamb" (to which James 1 : 18 evidently refers), and then afterward comes (v. 14, 15) "the harvest." Rev. Dr. Newton (Proph. Times, vol. 3, p. 18) correctly thinks that this language and result is based on a typical Levitical ordinance, viz., the gathering of the wave sheaf and presenting it, as specially holy and relating to the sanctuary, to God as "the first-fruits of the harvest," before the harvest itself was gathered. Perhaps we will find in those Levitical ordinances much that is typical of the future, to which we are now blind or short-sighted. Thus e.g. it is found that two leavened wheaten loaves were also waved, and called "the first-fruits unto the Lord," which may adumbrate— for aught we know to the contrary—the resurrected and translated saints, who, "being many are one loaf" in their twofold, Jewish and Gentile character and dispensation. This field is an interesting one, but liable to abuse and perversion, as the past has taught us.

<sup>2</sup> The student can well obtain a hint of this unseen (to the world) stage of the Advent, from the manner in which angels have come unseen and yet influenced kings, as e.g. Dan. 10 (comp. remarks of Barnes, Com. loc.). From this last passage, which contains things beyond human knowledge, it may be conjectured that one reason why no greater details are given, why no minute unsymbolical exhibition of the coming order of events is presented, arises from the fact that in some way beyond our comprehension spiritual powers (as e.g. this same Michael, Dan. 12 : 1) shall be enlisted in advancing the Divine Purpose in the coming Theocracy. In reference to the First Advent, the reader will observe that it is predicted that the Messiah comes as the Babe of Bethlehem, as entering the temple, as riding on an ass, as coming to Jerusalem, as appearing in Galilee, etc., and the history of Jesus embraces their respective fulfilment in separated stages of the same Advent. So careful comparison evidences a similar succession of acts in the Second Advent—two of which are held up—owing to their significance and results—with great prominence, viz., the thief-like Coming or presence, and the open, visible Coming or presence.

Obs. 3. We now come to a passage which directly teaches a translation, viz., Luke 17 : 34-37, "I tell you, in that night there shall be two men in one bed ; the one shall be taken and the other left. Two women shall be grinding together ; the one shall be taken and the other left. And they answered and said unto Him, Where, Lord ? And He said unto them : Whosoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together" (see Matt. 24 : 28). The context shows (1) that this relates to the personal Sec. Advent, and (2) occurs in a time of peace and apparent prosperity, precisely similar to that of the Antediluvian era just before the flood, and to that of Sodom before Lot's removal. The passage itself teaches (1) that this translation is to be expected "in that night," as if purposely to conceal it from the eye of unbelief; (2) that this is no gathering of nations, but of individuals, one here and one there; (3) that it is a separation of parties, one being taken and another being left; (4) this taking of one party and leaving of another indicates a previous judgment (just as the sudden taking and changing "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," 1 Cor. 15 : 52, also evidences), and not such an one as is recorded e.g. in Matt. 25 : 31-46; (5) that the removal of the one party is designed as a particular blessing in averting incoming evil, and the leaving of the other must be in order that they may experience it. Next follows the much disputed verse respecting the eagles, and before discussing its meaning it is necessary to decide its location in point of time. It is very easy, as some do, to refer it to the Romans in Matt. 24, but it is rather difficult to apply this verse in Luke the same way, because in the context there is no allusion, even the most distant, to the Romans. On the other hand, Jesus pointedly links it with His own personal Advent (comp. Prop. 114), as the context plainly (vs. 22-30) proclaims. This effectually disposes of the Roman theory, but still leaves the verse subject to a variety of conflicting opinions.' Without assuming that the explanation following is infallibly the correct one; yet we give it as commending itself as reasonably the one containing the sense intended. And first: "the eagles" mentioned we must make, with numerous writers,' to denote the saints. Saints are represented by "eagles" in Isa. 40 : 31; Deut. 32 : 11, 12; Ps. 103 : 5, even as God Himself is likened to an eagle (Ex. 19 : 4; Deut. 32 : 11) and Christ to a hen (Matt. 23 : 37). Such comparisons are not to be rejected because of any supposed incongruity (as e.g. being birds of prey), seeing that it is applied to messengers of the Divine procedure in Rev. 4 : 7; in Rev. 8 : 13 (the leading mss. and critics reading "eagle" instead of "angel"), and that similar comparisons are applied to Christ, as Rev. 5 : 5. Scripture usage sustains such an interpretation, and even if the idea is made prominent that eagles prey, this itself would only confirm the application, because the saints accounted worthy of resurrection and glorification are to assist Christ in His judgments upon the nations (when Zeph. 3 : 8, the Lord "riseth up to the prey"). It may be that Jesus had in mind Isa. 40 : 31 (Delitzsch's transl.), "They who wait for Jehovah gain fresh strength, lift up their wings as eagles, run and are not weary, go forward and do not faint," as applicable to the saints at this period. In the next place, what are we to understand by "the carcass" of Matthew and "the body" of Luke? One thing is self-evident, that they refer to the same thing—the passages being parallel—and hence all interpretations, no matter how plausibly presented, which makes "the carcass" one thing and "the body" quite another, must be avoided. The passage in Matthew is related to the Coming of the Son of Man; that in Luke to the Coming and a predicted translation or removal, and both make out a gathering of the saints to a certain place. Now, if we leave Scripture describe this gathering at the time of the end, we find that the saints or eagles are gathered (Zech. 14, Rev. 19, Joel 3, etc.) to execute vengeance upon the confederation of wickedness. That this great confederation of the mighty of the earth is intended by "the carcass" and "the body" is apparent from two things: (1) such a manifestation of the saints really answers the question in Luke, for after the announcement of the removal of some the question was asked, "Where, Lord?" (i.e. when shall this be witnessed or be made known?) and the answer comes that as this is done "in the night," not visible, the evidence of such a removal will be openly shown when these very ones shall be gathered together at the overthrow of Antichrist. (2) This is confirmed by the meaning of the word rendered "carcass" (although even the word "carcass" might be retained as indicative of both contempt and doom); the primary significations denoting "a fall, or fallen thing, or failure," and thus directly referring to the fearful fall and overthrow of Antichrist which the saints are not only gathered to witness, but exultantly to participate in. The "body" of Luke refers to the same confederation, because, as Scripture informs us, "the body" of it, its congregated armies under the leadership of Antichrist, the vast bulk of it will be assembled together in Palestine or the East, where the Word assures us Christ and these eagles will come, Zech. 14 : 5. It only remains to say that, considering the promise to these translated or removed ones to participate in the gathering of the saints at the overthrow or fall of Antichrist (and his "body," Dan. 7 : 11, is "destroyed"), it follows that such a removal must necessarily precede, by some interval of time, the formation of this confederacy, viz., in a time of peace, etc. The reader may, for himself, consider what power and ministrations may be included under this comparison of "eagles," and whether, during the interval, it may not become an exceeding precious promise to suffering believers.*

<sup>1</sup> For, aside from the Roman application (viz., that the eagles are the Roman legions, and the carcass or body the Jewish nation or Jerusalem, so Lightfoot, etc.), other interpretations are given, as e.g. a writer ("C. C." Proph. Times, vol. 4, p. 22), owing to the first meaning of the word rendered "carcass" (viz., "a fall" or "thing fallen," then "failure," "fault," and last, "carcass or corpse") makes "carcass" in Matt. 24 : "Where the fall (or failure, or fallen thing) is, there shall the eagles (saints) be convoked," and applies this "fall" to that of Satan at the end, which the saints are to witness. The "body" in Luke he refers to the body of Christ. Reineke (Proph. Times, vol. 3, p. 129) makes "the carcass" in Matt. "the corrupt ecclesiastical systems established by the harlot and her daughters," and the eagles are the saints, etc., while "the body" in Luke is "the Church," and the eagles the saints gathered to it, etc. Another writer (Proph. Times, vol. 4, p. 26) interprets the eagles as representing the angels and the body Christ's elect. Fritzsche (Olshausen, Com., vol. 2, p. 245) interprets the eagles of believers and the body or carcass of Christ. Olshausen makes the eagles Christ and the angels, and the body corrupt Israel; Fleck makes the body corruption, and the eagles false Christs. Augustine makes the body Christ ("because He died for us"), and the eagles saints (who "hereafter, as eagles, will be caught up to Him in the clouds"). Several writers (in Proph. Times) make the eagles saints, and both "the carcass" and "the body" to be Christ. This last interpretation, while consistently preserving both passages as parallel, certainly gives a harshness to it by making "the carcass," i. e. the slain body, refer to Christ, because it is against fact, the saints not being gathered to a slain body, but to a living Christ. Comp. Rev. 1 : 18, etc., or as Dr. Schaff (note, p. 227, Lange's Com.), rejecting Wordsworth's view, says: "A reference of carcass to the sacred body of the Saviour, which never saw corruption, violates every principle of good taste and propriety." Dr. West, in his Lect. "A Voice from Olivet," makes the "carcass" to be "Gentile Christendom." Rev. Brown, the Evangelist, presents this view: the prediction is future; the body or carcass being the Jewish nation, and the eagles that future anti-Christian power which shall assault the nation just before the open parousia of Jesus and His saints. Such an interpretation and application is not in conflict with the time and the order of events. Nast (Com. loci) makes the carcass to be "the condition of nominal Christianity—not of the true believers—when the times of the Gentiles are coming to a close;" and the eagles represent the judicial visitation of Christ. Dr. Rutter (Roman Catholic) in Life of Jesus, p. 415, interprets "the body" to be Christ, and "the eagles" to be elect, and in a note says that others, as Manduit, make "the body" to be "the soul of a reprobate," and "the eagles" to be "devils." He refers the gathering to the time specified in 1 Thess. 4 : 16. Lange's Com., Luke 17 : 37, touches it delicately, making it a proverbial expression, and simply indicative (Steir) of "where the corruption of death is, there must the eagles come," but on Matt. 24 : 28, "the figure of the eagles will express the necessity and inevitableness of the Advent," and "the carcass must represent the moral corruption and decay of the world itself, and the eagles the judgment, not only in its personal but also in its physical elements and forces." Alford (Com. loci) makes the carcass the whole world, the eagles the angels of vengeance, and the time at the Sec. Advent. Few now entertain the view of Grotius, that "the carcass means those who die to themselves; the eagles the gifts of the Holy Spirit." Meyer (Com. loci) says, "the carcass is a figure of the spiritually dead," and the eagles "represent the same as is described in ch. 13 : 41, that is, the angels sent out by Christ." We have laid no stress (leaving that to the discretion of the reader) on the symbolical or figurative import of the eagle as presented in dictionaries and typologies, but this certainly adds materially to our view.

<sup>2</sup> Vide quotations from Chrysostom, Origen, Jerome, Augustine, Hilary, Luther (as e.g. "as the eagles are gathered where the carcass is, so shall Christ's people be gathered where He is"), in Proph. Times, vol. 9, p. 106 and 107, and references to others who teach the same, as Ambrose, Theophylact, Euthemius, Calvin, Brentius, Bullinger, Bucer, Gaultier, Beza, Pellican, Flacius, Musculus, Pardæus, Piscator, Cocceius, Jansenius, Quesnel, Du Veil, Calovius, Suicer, Ravanell, Poole, Trapp, Cartwright, Pearce, Leigh, Andrews, Wordsworth. This list could readily be swelled to a vast extent, and we only refer to a few writers who have specially treated of it, as Seiss, Reineke, Bell, Chester, Brookes, Baxter, Ross, Purdon, Birks, Hunter, Phillips, Kelly, and others.

<sup>3</sup> The Saviour, no doubt, referred to this very translation and deliverance from incoming evil, when, after delineating the evils culminating in the vengeance of His open Coming, He said : "When these things begin to come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads," etc. Before the end itself, then already glorious deliverance comes. Before e.g. Ps. 149 : 6-9 can be verified, there must be a previous resurrection and translation of those accounted worthy to participate in the promise. The Coming "as a thief in the night" is certainly not the Coming with His angels and saints in great glory and power—so that all shall, "every eye," see Him—for vengeance, for the former is a secret, and the latter an open Coming. The Coming e.g. of Rev. 16 : 15, which brings a blessing to them that watch, is certainly different from the Coming of Rev. 19, which is to take vengeance upon His enemies. Some hold to one stage alone of the Advent, referring us to Rev. 19 as the Advent which will result in the translation promised. But, aside from the Coming with His saints, the entire representation is one of Coming to judgment (in which His saints participate). The object of the Coming is specifically stated to be, not to resurrect and translate the saints, but, to "judge and make war," "to smite the nations," etc., and therefore simple consistency requires a proper discrimination of the stages of the Second Advent and of the events respectively related to one or the other.

Obs. 4. Other passages either directly teach such a translation or removal, or else strongly imply it as a resultant or prerequisite. Take Rev. 14, and the order of events is in the highest degree corroborative of our position. Without discussing the relation that this chapter sustains to previous predictions, it is sufficient for our present purpose to notice that a time arrives before the final end when a certain specified number of saints, viz., the 144,000 (a symbolic number?) mentioned, are separated from among men, forming a chosen body called "the first-fruits unto God and to the Lamb." These "first-fruits" go before the incoming harvest, an interval of time (which includes (1) the proclamation of the particular message that God's judgments are to be poured out, and insisting upon the worship of God in view of the Antichristian worship that will be required; (2) the downfall of Babylon, and (3) the fearful persecution and martyrdom of believers) being placed between the two, at the close of which the harvest comes, and the dreadful vintage follows. This teaches us then to expect that a gathering of saints before the harvest is indeed one of the Divine procedures pertaining to the last things of this dispensation.<sup>1</sup> The Parable of the Ten Virgins (Prop. 181) confirms this, for it instructs (aside from other particulars) us to anticipate at the Coming of Jesus that a certain class of persons (called the Wise Virgins in contradistinction to another class pronounced the Foolish), living at the time of the Sec. Advent, shall be so fortunate, owing to preparedness, as to be received by Jesus Christ at His Coming, while others shall be left. The adverb of time, "then," binds this parable to the preceding context, and forces us to interpret it as a representation of the condition of the Church at some distinctive point of the Sec. Advent. Without insisting upon the explanation given by Olshausen, Alford, Stier, Seiss, etc., that the foolish virgins are even persons of some piety, who, neglecting to look for the Bridegroom, are left to endure the incoming tribulation, it is amply sufficient to say that the persons left are, at least, professing members of the Church, and that, as the announcement of the marriage (Rev. 19) precedes the overthrow of the Antichristian powers, those left behind must necessarily endure the trials incident to the arrogance, etc., of those powers. Those going in to the marriage—living saints taken away, translated, for this purpose—precede the time of sore tribulation.<sup>1</sup> Passages which imply it relate to the promised participation of the saints in acts of judgment upon the living nations, to the married wife as distinguished from the barren woman, to the coming with the saints for purposes of salvation, etc. But others of a still stronger tenor are embraced in the promises that when the last great tribulation is to burst upon the Gentile nations, then certain believing ones shall escape. Thus e.g. Luke 21 : 36, "Watch ye therefore and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass and to stand before the Son of Man;" the escaping and being favored with nearness to Christ are united. In Rev. 3 : 10, of a class it is said : "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation (or trial) which shall come upon the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." The 144,000 described above are taken from this "the hour of trial," comp. Rev. 14 : 7. It is a joyful fact that when the most fearful time of trial, the flood of great waters, comes, then God interposes in behalf of His own people and saves them out of it (to which even such passages as Ps. 32 : 6, 7 ; Prov. 3 : 25, 26 ; Ps. 37 : 38-40, etc., may refer), while another class are left to endure its terrific force and come up out of it as blood-stained martyrs, Rev. 14 : 9-13 ; Rev. 20 : 4, 5, etc. It is significant also that in Rev. 7 we have first a distinct, separate number of chosen ones forming the same number, 144,000 (called Jews, because engrafted by faith and thus incorporated with the commonwealth), and then afterward a great multitude who come "out of the great tribulation," thus again pointing out a distinction existing between certain of God's people. Such are not given without adequate causes, and it is well to heed them.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> It is a matter of amazement how coolly and deliberately men can appropriate Scripture to themselves which relates to the future. Sects, at various times, have professed to be those sealed ones of Rev. 14, as e.g. Joanna Southcote, who had her followers sealed, etc. Error constantly repeats itself; and to-day we have some of the Seventh Day Adventists (as e.g. seen in the writings of a Mrs. White) claiming that the Adventists of their party constitute this number. Others adopt the same view in respect to their own particular sect or organization. This is simply a perversion of the Scripture promise, which confines it to no special sect or denomination now existing, but to a gathering out of God's favored ones wherever they may be in faith and love at the time of resurrection and translation. The translation itself is perverted by some, as e.g. evidenced in John Asgill (A.D. 1700), who published a work entitled "Argument, proving that men may be translated to heaven without dying," etc., but applying it to the then present time (and not where the Scriptures locate it). Its absurdity was sufficiently manifested by his own death. In reference to the application by the Seventh Day Adventists of the 144,000 to themselves, this is based on a misconception of the time of the ten horns, of the Antichrist, of the two-horned beast, etc. Aside from the lack of propriety in appropriating such a magnificent portraiture to their present condition, these "first-fruits," that precede the harvest, are not left here, as they pretend to do, to deliver the angel messages. It is simply amazing what self-confidence and credulity can do in the way of Scripture application to sect in order to bring forth claims of professed purity and pre-eminence. On the other hand, the Plymouth Brethren hold these 144,000 to be literally Jews. Thus e.g. Lincoln (Lects. on Rev.) correctly makes the enumeration of chs. 7 and 14 identical, but overlooking the continuation of the election and the engrafting into the elect nation, he has these not the Church, but a portion of the Jewish race; not the first-fruits of believers in the Church, but the first-fruits of the Jewish nation. Aside from the difficulty of reconciling this with the Scriptural idea of the election, the engrafting by which Gentiles become the seed of Abraham, the order of fulfilment, etc., it is sufficient now to say that two considerations alone forbid its reception: (1) He thus has a portion of the Jewish nation literally upon Mt. Zion, etc., before the Antichristian persecution, which is amply rebutted by the prediction of Zech. 14; (2) on his hypothesis it is impossible to reconcile the omission of the tribe of Dan, for Dan, according to the original promises, will likewise be restored, but in this process of engrafting which is thus expressed, a sufficiency and distinctiveness is presented to indicate the intimate and enduring relationship. We may add: the identity of number, the sealing and withdrawal just previous to the tribulation, etc., fully shows that the two descriptions relate to the same body.

<sup>3</sup> For a class of advanced students, it will be well to say in this connection, that many deductions respecting the Bride and the time of marriage are set aside by our remarks under Prop. 169, obviating also objections alleged against the view which distinguishes too largely between "the first-fruits" and "the harvest," etc. This "bride" here assumed is not the Church, the saints only being guests—guests who occupy different seats of honor, etc., in view of preparedness. The marriage is only consummated after Antichrist is overthrown; the preliminaries antecedent are of such a nature as to constitute, in view of the preparation and the gathering of guests, the time of marriage, etc. See Prop. 169.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. Craven (Lange's Com. loci) points out that "It is also to be observed that the promise is not of preservation in trial (or testing), as was the promise to Peter, Luke 22 : 32; but of preservation from (ek) the hour or period of trial" (comp. 2 Pet. 2 : 9).

<sup>4</sup> The doctrine of a translation of believing ones previous to the great tribulation is also taught by "The Cath. Apostolic Church." This is regarded by some (Lange's Com., 1 Thess. 4 : 13-18, doc. 7) as distinctively belonging to them, having been plainly taught by Irving (as in The Apoc., vol. 2, p. 1024), but the history of Millenarianism shows that it was held and taught by others before and after the rise of that body—it being contained in the doctrine of the Pre-Mill. resurrection and removal of the saints, in their participating in judging the nations, etc. It is only since Mede's, Bengel's, and Irving's time that the doctrine has been specially examined in all its details and bearings, having received the approval, because Scriptural, of the most able European and American writers, holding various denominational relationships. We have shown how e.g. it was evidently held by the Thessalonians, causing their consternation (Obs. 1). Bengel (Gnomon, 1 Cor. 15) remarks that "we shall not all sleep," v. 51, "And we shall be changed," v. 52, "And this mortal shall put on immortality," v. 53, "And this mortal shall have put on immortality," v. 54, all refer to the translation, and that the two antitheses require it; so that those whom corruption has seized through death, and likewise those who are still mortal (i.e. subject to death) are included as escaping the power of death. Some writers (as Brookes in Maranatha, p. 510) make 2 Thess. 2 : 2, 3 illustrative of the coming and gathering of the saints antecedent to the ushering in of "the day of the Lord." It certainly is in perfect harmony, and enforces this view. Some are misled by the expression "day of the Lord," as if it was equivalent to "the Coming of the Lord," and hence conclude that the last Antichrist will first be revealed, and that only a visible Coming is denoted, but a little reflection and comparison will show that they are not synonymous, seeing that the former is the result of the latter. Rev. Brown, the evangelist, makes those accounted worthy to escape to be in "rest" when Jesus comes in open Parousia, by reference to 2 Thess. 1 : 7, "rest with us when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed," etc. There may be a reference to this very deliverance in 1 Thess. 1 : 10, "delivereth us from the wrath which cometh" (Variorum), or "our deliverer from the coming vengeance" (Conybeare and Howson). "Greybeard," in his Lay Sermons, properly distinguishes those stages into "the Lord's Coming to meet His saints in the air, and His subsequent appearing with them in glory." Dr. Seiss has added a good note on the subject in his Appendix to the edition of The Last Times, 1878, commencing p. 341 (and see his "Apoc.," p. 229, etc.). Various articles on the stages and translation are to be found in the Old and New Series of the Proph. Times, and the different Pre-Millennial periodicals. Dr. Brookes has some excellent remarks on the same in his Moranatha, and numerous recent works refer to both, and distinguish.

Obs. 5. This distinction in point of favor is marked by still another set of passages which describe the hiding of the saints when this time of trouble, this storm of persecution and fury bursts upon the Church and world. Keeping in view that these outpourings of judgments at the time of the end are always represented as special manifestations of God's wrath, we can appreciate the principle given in the language of Zeph. 2 : 2, 3, in which it is promised to the meek that when "the day of the Lord's anger" comes, by the seeking of righteousness and meekness, "it may be ye shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger." That this will be realized is apparent from various predictions, such as Ps. 31 : 19, 20, "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man ; Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues" (or, Sep., "Thou wilt screen them in a tabernacle from the contradiction of tongues" (comp. also Ps. 27 : 5 ; Mal. 3 : 16-18). How this removal and hiding, which the Spirit states as a mark of "great goodness," is to be accomplished may be seen under the Props. following ; for at this period it will be especially true (2 Pet. 2 : 9) that "the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation." Isaiah (ch. 26 : 20, 21) prophesies that at the very time of a resurrection of saints, and when "the Lord cometh" to "punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity," and to cause the earth to uncover her "slain," then God's people are to be protected "until the indignation be overpast." David (Ps. 45) portrays the exultant language that such translated or removed saints can well employ in view of their entire safety when the vast flood of evil shall shake the kingdoms of the earth. Indeed, there are peculiar predictions which alone stand out with clearness in the light of such a translation of the saints, as e.g. in Ps. 111 : 1, where it is said (so Clarke, Com. loci) that God shall be praised both "in the secret assembly of the upright" (or, as others, Lange, etc., "select assembly," i.e. special), and also in the congregation, i.e. the general or public, which is thus verified. In Ps. 94, at the time when God shall show Himself for "vengeance" against the wicked, of some it is said, vs. 12, 13, that they are so guided and instructed "that Thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity, until the pit be digged for the wicked"—i.e. they shall not experience the days of adversity which the same Ps. informs us culminates into a "gathering themselves together against the soul of the righteous and to condemn the innocent blood" (comp. Rev. 14, 16, and 19, etc.). From the removal of these righteous to the final overthrow of the wicked, the interval with the efforts of unbelief is expressively called the digging of a pit for the wicked, i.e. preparing the way for the fearful manifestation of vengeance upon them. All such predictions, supported by the analogy taken from Enoch, Noah, Lot, etc., however inconclusive they might be when taken isolated, obtain significancy as they stand related to other Scripture.

Compare Olshausen, Com., vol. 2, p. 253, on the escape of the righteous. The Apoc. Expounded (vol. 1, p. 207, given by Seiss in The Apoc., p. 230) makes Daniel "a type of those kept out of the hour of temptation. When all nations, kindreds, and people are required to worship the image of the plain of Dura, he is not there." See an impressive article in Proph. Times, vol. 6, p. 79, etc., "On the Responsibility of Christian Teachers" (urging fidelity to revelation on these and kindred points, lest others are misled by us into that fearful tribulation and accuse us of having deceived them by erroneous predictions of peace, etc.). That the saints would be protected in the day of tribulation is an old doctrine, as the reader can verify, e.g. by reference to 2 Esdras 2 : 27, 28, and in Rabin. interpretations (e.g. see "Jewish Expos. of Malachi" in Princeton Review, Ap. 1855, p. 324 ; remarks on ch. 3 : 17). Lincoln (Lects. Rev., vol. 2, p. 55) says that "escape" imports salvation by passing through the trial, and instances 1 Cor. 10 : 13, where the ability to bear trial is "escaping trial." But this idea is set aside by the express declarations respecting a removal previous to the great tribulation in the order of events laid down. Even in Mal. 3 and 4 a certain order is preserved : (1) the making up of His jewels or possession previous to the day that burns as an oven ; (2) the sparing of certain ones declared ; the fearful day of vengeance in which the spared ones participate in a state of exultation. An additional strong argument might be based on the meaning of the word Parousia, denoting not merely a coming or approach, but an actual personal presence (as given e.g. often in Lange's Com., Alford's Com., New Revision of New Test., Diaglott, etc.), so that He is present (in the first stage) and the world refuses to recognize His presence, although certain events (the resurrection and translation) are indicative of it. (Comp. e.g. Russell's remarks in Object and Manner of Our Lord's Return, p. 51.) We may add : There may be an indirect reference to this very translation in passages, which are now usually applied only to watching, as e.g. when Jesus says that we shall watch so that we may know His coming. Now as the day and the hour is unknown, this is interpreted as meaning that we should be in a posture of looking and preparedness so that we are not taken unawares. While this is true, may not a deeper significance attach to it, that we should be in this posture, so that we may become personally, by a happy change, aware of His presence?

Obs. 6. Intimations also are given that such a translation or removal of the class of righteous, while unwitnessed, will be known to the nations. This can well be imagined, for the sudden disappearance of men and women, one here and another there, will excite general inquiry and be the subject of varied comment. It will inevitably lead to what the Spirit describes in Ps. 83 : 3, for let these resurrected and translated ones be taken by the Lord and conveyed to a place of safety (comp. Prop. 166) ; let it be partially comprehended for what purpose even this removal is effected, then will be fulfilled what is written, that the enemies of God not only confederate together, but that "they take crafty counsel against Thy people, and consult against Thy hidden ones," and this consultation is "with one consent or heart." The same "hidden ones" are, probably, presented to us in Isa. 16 : 3, 4, 5 (comp. Prop. 166), in view of its connection with the establishment of the Davidic throne and Kingdom, unless it be applied to a portion of the Church during the tribulation who shall fly or be brought to the wilderness for safety (and if the latter, may not this be a hint to the Church when under the last extended persecution, where safety only will be found, viz., in the wilderness near Mt. Sinai, where, as Prop. 166, the Lord Christ and His saints will be assembled? We cannot, as yet, fully determine ; time must show its meaning).* The fact that the wicked shall know something concerning those hid ones, and shall take what they deem prudent measures (viz., to form a general confederation, etc.), is hinted at in passages like Ps. 17 : 7-9 ; Ps. 64 : 2, etc., and still more plainly revealed in Ps. 143 : 7-9. The saints are "hid in the time of trouble," and "in the secret (place) of Thy Presence" (verifying the Spirit of Ps. 91), until the period arrives for their open manifestation in supernatural power.

* Some writers make the wilderness the United States, others Great Britain, others even (as Claas Epp) Russia, etc. Some make it simply equivalent to concealment, or protection, or world-renunciation, or a place of refuge, or expatriation, etc.

It is likely, however, from the consultation of the wicked against them, that while the removal is allowed it will be attributed to natural causes, or to a concerted movement, and that all reference to its supernatural occurrence will be stoutly denied. In all probability, "the sign of the Son of Man" (Matt. 24 : 30) will be something connected with this translation (for events belonging to one period of time are grouped together without giving in every particular the exact order, as e.g. Isa. 25 : 6-9, etc.). The sign is one thing and the open visible Coming is another, and yet being a sign directly pertaining to the Son of Man, it relates to Him as in something connected with the Theocratic (see Prop. 81) ordering. Now, let this removal of the saints take place as described by Paul, John, etc., in the night, accompanied by a shout and trump (i.e. events may be denoted—see Obs. below); let the Son of Man be "in the air" to receive His risen and translated ones, and as the night advances around the earth, so let Him proceed around this globe in the process of gathering—such will be the accompaniments and the appearance in the sky, that, however explained by the world as electrical, meteorical, etc., it will constitute a sign, and a most impressive one, of the Son of Man. Invisible Himself, sheltered behind the curtains of the bright enveloping clouds, yet His Presence in the air may be exhibited by tokens never before witnessed.

See Prop. 174, where this sign is noticed more at length. It may be added here that if the sign does not refer to a peculiar and striking manifestation in the sky itself, then it may relate to the resurrection, translation, and withdrawal of the saints themselves, such being an indication or sign of "the Son of Man," i.e. of His presence. Or it may (as we can only at best conjecture) denote that the assembling at Mt. Sinai (Prop. 166; is such a sign—indicative of a previous resurrection and translation by "the Son of Man."

Obs. 7. The effect that this translation will have upon the Church is remarkably corroborative of our position. If we turn to Rev. 14 it is stated that immediately after the removal of "the first-fruits" there will be a most powerful renewed preaching of the Word of God, deriving its force from a proclamation of the now certain coming judgments of God and tribulation under the Antichrist. What causes such a change in the style of the preaching, which will result in the conversion, as parallel passages show, of very many, preparing them to pass through the great tribulation, and to suffer death rather than to worship the Beast and his image? Nothing less than this astonishing removal of certain chosen ones, accounted worthy, owing to their distinctive faith in God's promises, to escape. Let this event occur just as it is described; let here one and there one of the believing and watching be taken, and surely those who believe in God's Word and are left behind will be most wonderfully affected by the event. By one sudden and startling event, coming home to the heart and directly appealing to the warmest affections, the prevailing spiritualizing systems and theories of progressive advancement and perfection will be overthrown, and the Millenarian doctrine, once derided and sneered at as "carnal," etc., will be most eagerly embraced and proclaimed. (The writer has often, often felt that it is especially for this period that he is laboring, when his work will be appreciated, etc.) The Church, then starting up with Abrahamic faith will recognize its chronological position, will see what is before it, and, energetically infused by fear and hope, prepare itself for the fearful ordeal through which it must pass. And we are assured that the Church in this contest, overpowered as she will be, will sustain the persecution with triumphant faith, feeling convinced from the events occurring and the time elapsed, that the Son of Man is even already present, waiting for the moment of direct interference.

Dr. Tyng, in his work He will Come, correctly represents the stages and translation. The latter he forcibly represents as causing for a little while a consternation in, and confounding of, the world, but he overlooks the practical effect that it will have in causing others to receive and proclaim the truth, and even die for it. This doctrine also teaches us what estimate to put on the emigration theories (Proph. Times, N. S., 1875, p. 145), seeing that we are specially charged to await this Coming and translation wherever we may be, and not to listen to any appeals to go forth (as e.g. to Palestine) and await His Coming. It also throws light on that special "scoffing," etc., so characteristic of the time of the end.

Obs. 8. It has been aptly remarked that the removal of righteous persons has been followed (as e.g. Enoch, Noah, Lot, at Jerusalem, etc.) by the outpourings of God's judgments, and the principle is taught e.g. in the sealing of the 144,000 (Rev. 7). A comparison of Scripture teaches that when this translation is experienced, then will rapidly arise that culminated head of Antichrist which will overwhelm the Church with terrific persecution. Before this event some restraining power prevents such a dreadful confederation. Attention is called to this in order to correct two prevailing mistakes in the interpretation of 2 Thess. 2 : 7. One theory makes that which hinders the revelation of the Wicked One, the Man of Sin, to denote the Roman power (Pagan, i.e. the civil power; but this is erroneous, because this Antichrist will arise out of and really be the last head of this same Roman power (Prop. 160), fallen back to its former unchristian (e.g. given to idol worship), paganized condition. Another theory is, that the Hinderer mentioned is the Holy Spirit, and that this Spirit will be withdrawn, resulting in widespread wickedness, etc.; but this again is opposed to fact, viz., that after "the first-fruits" are taken away the Spirit remains, as is evidenced by the proclamation of the message, by the sustaining of the martyrs, and the multitude coming through the tribulation. The obscurity of the prediction and its conciseness is based upon something that was at the time well known, for in the preceding verse the Apostle says positively, "And now ye know what withholdeth" (same word precisely, excepting being in the neuter form, and thus referring to something) "that he might be revealed in his time." That is, the Thessalonian brethren knew what this restraining influence was which then existed and would continue to exist down to a certain time, when this Antichrist, the fruit of long-continued defection, would arise during the period allotted to him. Rather than accept the modern views given by prophetic writers on this point, we would fall back to Theodoret's opinion (Bloomfield, G. Test. loci), that that which hindered, restrained, prevented the culmination of this Antichrist is "the decree of God's Providence," and this would, at least, be consistent with the grammatical construction, which, as critics inform us, may refer either to a thing or person in verse 7, but only to a thing in verse 6. The solution probably has not yet been found, and in place of a better (which close study and comparison may yet present) we suggest the following: Regarding the fact that the Thessalonians knew what hindered, we turn to the First Epistle, and we find in the first chapter (v. 4) a declaration which covers the ground, viz., in the doctrine of election, that too of which they had knowledge, "Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God." Let the reader consider our Props. concerning the election, that God in this dispensation is calling out a definite number (incorporated as the seed of Abraham), who are to be associated in the Kingdom as rulers, etc., and then he will see that until this gathering out process has progressed up to a certain point (embracing these "first-fruits") this Divine purpose of obtaining these chosen ones allows "the times of the Gentiles," but restrains that fearful predicted outbreak until a determined number of God's people are secured. When this is done, however, then, even while God's Spirit is still willing to strive with and aid the faith of men (as seen in the martyrs), human nature will be allowed to riot in its unbelief, and to work out its vain theory of the destiny of the race. Then, during a brief period, human nature will be permitted to exhibit its highest departure from the truth, its most bitter scorn and detestation of believers, its most unrelenting hostility and cruelty to the followers of Christ (comp. Props. 160, 161, 162, 163, 164).

This point is the more worthy of notice, seeing that able and intelligent writers fall into error in this matter. Thus e.g. "Greybeard," in Lay Sermons, No. 108, totally misapprehends, when during the last tribulation, he has: "The Holy Ghost will have left the earth; the only restraining power to evil will have been taken away, 2 Thess. 2:7." So Brookes (Marantha, p. 511) makes the same deduction, and bases on it the opinion that the translation of the saints will produce no profound and lasting impression. Thus also other writers, whom we notice elsewhere, and several of the "Believers" assert in view of it that there is no "Church" during this interval (viz., between the first and second stages of the Advent), and that this is indicated by no mention of the word "church" in that period. But all this is vitiated e.g. by the order laid down in Rev. 14, (1) the first-fruits; (2) the renewed proclamation of judgment truth; (3) the fall of Babylon; (4) the Antichristian persecution; (5) the martyrs clinging to the truth; (6) the harvest of believers after the tribulation; (7) the vintage of wrath on the persecutors. Now without the sustaining power of the Spirit, the Gospel, and the means of grace during this interval, the number of faithful ones that come out of the tribulation could not be produced.

Obs. 9. While embracing the doctrine of a Pre-Mill. translation, and of more than one translation, even (as e.g. in that pertaining to "the first-fruits," and that relating to the harvest), yet, with our present light and understanding of the Scriptures, we cannot accept of so many as given e.g. by Baxter (Louis Napoleon III., ch. 4) and others, simply on the ground that a more careful comparison will synchronize and thus identify the sameness of some of them. Whatever may be the truth in this matter, it can only be presented in a discussion of the order of events as embraced in the entire Apocalypse (a labor which is foreign to our present work, and performed by other writers), and therefore we have only availed ourselves of the references to such a translation, without in every instance determining the relative order, confining ourselves, as sufficient for our purpose, to a twofold translation, one to precede and the other to follow (as the resurrections) the great tribulation—one pertaining to "the first-fruits" and the other to "the harvest."

Obs. 10. Let us briefly consider the objections that can be alleged, not against a translation itself (for that is too plainly taught), but a Pre-Mill. one as presented. Some writers have incautiously made out that these "first-fruits," by being thus favored, etc., are not only a chosen body (which is true, and within another), but infer from it that it only composes "the married wife," i.e. only embraces the rulers with Christ, etc., thus excluding the harvest or those coming out of the tribulation. This has caused serious objections, and justly too, to be urged against the view as thus presented, for it is a fact, whatever distinctions may exist within the orderings and stations of the Kingship and priesthood, that the very last saints of this dispensation, even those who pass through the tribulation and fall under Antichrist's power, are distinctively promised (Rev. 20 : 4, 6) to also reign with Jesus Christ ; so that the "first-fruits," and the "harvest" combined form that triumphant body of rulers who reign. Any interpretation, however plausible, which would debar the martyred saints, etc., under the last persecution from a direct co-heirship with the other saints in the Kingdom, is most certainly defective. The Scripture too usually presented as favoring it, viz., Ps. 45, does not apply to such a distinction between saints gathered during this and former dispensations (i.e. in the various women mentioned as related to the King), but rather between such saints thus gathered and the Jewish and Gentile nations, etc., as they shall exist (as e.g. the Jewish nation being likened to "a barren woman," also again united to God, and other nations may well be thus represented as virgins, etc., acknowledging His reign, etc.) in the Millennial age. While distinctions are to be found in the body of saints, and while it is true that the first saints gathered down to the re-establishment of the Kingdom in its glory enjoy a distinction beyond all others that follow, it seems unscriptural to discriminate so far as to debar those to whom is specially promised a participation in reigning gloriously with Christ. A degree of caution is here required in order to avoid prejudice. Some good thing, that we may well leave undefined, will be given to these "first-fruits," but the unbelieving, unguarded Church will so atone by its faithful witnessing, even unto death, for its past delinquency and unwatchfulness that it too "inherits the Kingdom" with the others. Another objection is brought from 2 Thess. 2, viz., that the coming of Jesus and the destruction of Antichrist are united together, and hence forbids any such a previous translation. The objector, however, forgets two things : (1) that the Apostle only argues logically that "the day of Christ" cannot come without the visible appearing and destruction of Antichrist (just as our argument demands), without specifying all the particulars antecedent, either to this visible Advent of Christ, or this Antichrist, and (2) that the saints participate both in the Coming of Jesus and destruction of the Wicked One, neither of which are mentioned. The Apostle does not contradict himself, as is apparent, if due notice is taken that the Thessalonians believed "the day of Christ" to be already present, and his reasoning proceeds to show, not that saints are not to be raised and translated before that day (which is implied), but that before the day itself is ushered in as predicted, a visible Coming and the destruction of Antichrist must precede. Again, it is objected that the gathering of the elect by the messengers described Matt. 24 : 31, is a gathering of all saints after the tribulation. But this, while after the tribulation, does not affirm that all the saints that ever lived are thus included, but simply refers to the elect then living at the period designated, and may denote, as some believe, believers in general scattered over the earth ; or rather, as others hold, the members of the still elect Jewish nation, which, as many prophecies predict, shall at this very time be again gathered to Palestine. Besides this, all the passages relating to the gatherings of this intently interesting period must be collated and compared, when several, without contradicting each other, will appear pertaining to "the first-fruits" and to "the harvest," to the Church and to the Jewish nation. Again, it is alleged that the multitude of Rev. 7 all came out of the great tribulation, and that this evidences that the entire Church of this dispensation living at the time must enter and pass through it. Aside from other reasons in reply, it is sufficient to direct attention to the 144,000 mentioned in the same chapter, a body separate from all others, who were sealed in order to their complete safety before the incoming storm. Some object on the ground that "the shout and trump" accompanying the resurrection and translation show it to be a visible occurrence, seen by the world. But such forget that while there will be a sufficiency of manifestation to excite attention and startle the world, yet the shout, etc., may be like Daniel's "man clothed in linen" (10 : 5-7), whose voice was "like the voice of a multitude," and yet the men with him, strangely affected even to quaking, "saw not the vision;" or like the voice from heaven (John 12 : 28-29), which distinctly spoke, but the people that "stood by and heard it, said, that it thundered;" or like the voice speaking to Saul, which his fearful companions heard not. The voice, the shout, the trump (indicative of events ushering in) is for a chosen class of persons, and if it is God's good pleasure, the same may only be heard by them, even if others stood by, just as Stephen in the crowd only saw the glorious vision, or Elisha's eyes were only opened to behold the horses and chariots of fire. Other objections have been so fully met in previous remarks, that it is unnecessary to reproduce them, unless we except one, owing to its practical importance. It is said that such an order of events, privately accomplished, is opposed to the publicity, not only of the Sec. Advent, but of intervening events, viz., that before such a Coming, resurrection, and translation transpires the partial restoration of the Jews, the culminated Antichrist, the gathering of the nations, etc., must be first witnessed. But as Cunningshame, Cox, and many others have shown, this is not to distinguish His visible Coming with the saints, at which time all these things are manifested, from that of His Coming for them, preparatory to the former. Several stages of the same Advent, leaving a sufficient interval for the development of those things between them, is, as the ablest prophetic writers have asserted and proven, the only possible way in which to reconcile the condition attached to the Sec. Advent (as e.g. coming in a time of peace and coming in a time of war, etc.), and places it at the same time in the position given to it by the Spirit, viz., as something that may occur at any moment, and for which we are constantly to watch without looking first for the fulfilment of intervening things.

Fausset (Chris. Herald, Aug. 14th, 1879) makes the time of the translation, chronologically considered, under Rev. 16 : 15. But this cannot be so, because then the saints would—as the preceding vials testify—have experienced the tribulation under Antichrist, from which, as we have shown, a large party is to escape. The explanation of Rev. 16 : 15, in order to harmonize it with the order of Rev. 14, is as follows, being fully sustained by a comparison of Scripture : Having just referred to the gathering of the hosts of Antichrist, the Spirit in v. 16 turns to another gathering which is to meet and confound the one first mentioned, viz., the gathering of the saints to Mt. Sinai, where the preliminaries of the Theocratic Kingdom are inaugurated (Prop. 166). This gathering is, as abundant Scripture testifies, under the thief-like Coming of Christ, and hence as standing related to the other gathering (that of enemies) it is also announced as a warning. It is not chronologically located in the order of events, but is placed there for the reason assigned, and properly too, because both gatherings are in opposition to each other and will come into terrible conflict. (Comp., for details, Prop. 163.)

Obs. 11. The question may be asked, Why such a distinction? The reply is, because such is God's pleasure in the matter. It is not for us to assert with any degree of positiveness who shall thus be favored with a translation, and escape the great tribulation. We can only point out the general affirmation (as e.g. "them that honor me, I will honor," etc.) upon the subject, and leave each one draw his own conclusions. There is a difference between mere salvation and the special honor, station, dignity, etc., that God in addition may be pleased to bestow upon certain ones. There were other pious ones when Enoch and Elijah were translated, and yet they only were favored; and we doubt not that many who ultimately will be saved with great glory (because of their faithful witnessing during the last severe trial) will be left at this translation. While we cannot confine, as some do, this preference to mere belief in and watching for the Advent (for in connection with this stands the purity and proper development of Christian character, which, alas, some who thus believe and watch do not manifest to the extent required, or even to the degree that some honest and sincere disbelievers in our doctrine exhibit), yet such faith and watching is eminently set forth as a characteristic of those translated ones. Because they thus believe, showing due respect unto God's Word, and permit such faith to have its practical effect in heart and life, we are assured that they shall thus be favored, as e.g. the general announcement in Mal. 2 : 17, which the New Test. more fully explains in some of its particular aspects, as in Luke 21 : 36 ; Matt. 24 : 36-51, etc. At the same time we deeply feel that without a special preparedness, devoted piety (as exemplified in the translated Enoch and Elijah), which evinces itself in opposing the torrent of worldliness and wickedness encroaching upon the Church, Millenarianism, however upheld and ably defended, is unable of itself to secure such a distinguishing benefit and honor. A personal, individual acceptance of the truth combined with a happy experience of its sanctifying influence, together with testifying in its behalf before others, is imperatively needed. It is not simply those who "watch" that shall "escape," but those, Luke 21 : 36, who "watch and pray always," avoiding the corrupting influences around them. The number of translated ones may not be very large (for the number of translated ones given as (so Baumgarten, etc.) types in comparison with the number of those not translated, and with that of the resurrected saints is small), so that Dr. Seiss, with whom many concur, is undoubtedly correct in saying : "I have no idea that a very large portion of mankind, or even of the professing Church, will be thus taken. The first translation, if I may so speak, will embrace only the select few who watch and pray always," etc. The fact that Enoch was the seventh from Adam may, for aught we know, be suggestive (as Bengel, owing to seven being a sacred number, also comp. Prop. 143) of the occurrence of this translation when the seventh milliad arrives, and Enoch's specific prediction (Jude) of the Lord's Coming by those accounted worthy of translation; while Elijah's pertains simply to exalted, eminent piety, without any special reference to such testimony. Yet, let it be said, whatever the doctrinal position of the persons translated, and whatever may be the personal attitude respecting the nearness of the Advent, etc., that one distinguishing characteristic will be exhibited by all, viz., that they "love the appearing" of Christ (2 Tim. 4 : 8), that they earnestly desire it, and regard it as the highest possible blessing, "the blessed hope" (Tit. 2 : 13). There may be also a deeper meaning than is generally assigned to the phrase "them that look for Him" in Heb. 9 : 28—a meaning derived from an existing fact at the time of the Advent. Still another reason applies why this resurrection and translation of saints should take place at this particular crisis; this will be noticed in the following Props., viz., that as Christ comes to make the preliminary arrangements for the setting up of the Theocratic Davidic Kingdom, it is eminently suitable, that all the saints down to that period should be gathered in order to receive their instructions, to have their positions, etc., assigned, so that they can act with Him as executors in the Divine administrations that follow. This (Prop. 166) measured by the creatures capacity requires time, and such time will be given to this particular purpose in the place predicted. Hence this distinction grows out of the Divine purpose; which such saints are designed to aid in executing and establishing.

All who are watchful servants, and whom the truth leads to purity of heart and life, out of all denominations, shall be thus translated, but they who despise prophecy (Jer. 23 : 33-36) shall bear their burden. We have no sympathy with that intolerable bigotry characteristic of Christadelphianism, which maintains that none can be saved (although having antagonistic parties among themselves) but themselves, thus evincing the lack of the greatest of all Christian graces; or with Seventh-Day Adventism, which declares that unless we leave our respective denominations (called by way of emphasis "Babylon," etc.) and connect ourselves with their sect, adopting their views of the seventh day, etc., we cannot be saved; or with other sects (as the Believers, the followers of Barbour, etc.) who, with far greater charity, still deem it necessary to increase and multiply sectarianism and divisions in order to hold forth with prominence certain distinctive features which entitle them to realize with exclusiveness this translation. While it is sadly true that the existing churches lack much and come far short of their profession (which we give in detail e.g. Props. 174 and 177), yet it is far better to let our light shine wherever we happen to belong, and where it is needed, than to withdraw and increase the evils of separation and exclusiveness. The truth, the Church of our Lord, has suffered immensely from such mistaken zeal and bigotry, and, as we have ourselves noticed, in the indiscriminate condemnation engendered by it, persons are upbraided and reprobated, by those under its influence, who possess to a far greater degree the mind of Christ and the graces of the Spirit than their opposers (as e.g. evidenced in controversy, language, spirit). We apprehend, and venture the assertion, that many will be saved eventually who will not be crowned—saved as by fire—occupying a subordinate position (comp. Prop. 135). Among those who will suffer loss and even miss a translation, there may be believers in the Sec. Advent and advocates of its nearness, but overlooking that with a watching posture there must be connected an appropriating faith and practical obedience resulting in a proper development of Christian character; they vitiate their position by degenerating into some sectarian peculiarities which are urged, and pressed, and promulgated with a fiery spirit of partisanship (unchurching and anathematizing all others); or by merely being excited through a carnal interest taken in the forecasting of future events prophetically expressed (making them to seem "wise," "learned," and "profound"); or by being influenced by a morbid curiosity, a love for the marvellous and sensational, a relish for mere speculation relating to the future without a practical reception of sanctifying truth, causing the theoretic and historical to overshadow and crush out the practical. So long as a man loves the Lord Jesus, loves His appearing, we dare not, in view of what Paul says of love in 1 Cor. 13, condemn him, for it is specifically said: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maranatha," 1 Cor. 16 : 22.

Obs. 12. The reader may, for himself, estimate the greatness and value of such a translation, embracing (1) exemption from death, (2) deliverance from a terrible incoming tribulation, (3) a special exaltation to the Presence of Christ, (4) the bestowal of glorification, joint rulership with the mighty King, etc. Richard Baxter (Works, vol. 16, p. 555) may express these blessings in his ardent prayer and longings that Christ may speedily come in order that death might not be experienced, etc., saying: "The thoughts of the Coming of the Lord are most sweet and joyful to me, so that if I were but sure I should live to see it, and that the trumpet should sound and the dead should rise, and the Lord appear, before the period of my age, it would be the joyfulest tidings to me in the world," etc. A multitude of writers, italicizing the promises of God in Christ Jesus, delineate these blessings, and hold them up as worthy of consideration and contemplation. Happy, blessed beyond description, the man or the woman thus honored!

If it be asked why do we not have a concise statement of the facts of those stages, translation, and events following? the answer is found in God's way of presenting the facts of the First Advent, so as not to interfere with man's agency, so as to urge us to a comparison and study of His Word, etc. God is exercising our faith and hope, and even honor—for long ago (Prov. 25 : 2) it was said : " It is the glory of God to conceal a thing : but the honor of kings is to search out a matter." We fully indorse this declaration of Dr. Wordsworth (Ch. Herald, March 27th, 1879) when, in urging attention to " The Coming Persecution," he incidentally presents the idea (which will be largely realized in this translation, the signs and events following) : " It is probable that some of the most illustrious evidence of the truth and inspiration of prophecy, and of its practical value for the guidance of the faithful, is reserved for the last days—especially for the coming conflict between truth and error, between the Church and the world, between Christ and Antichrist, and the great and glorious consummation which will follow that conflict."

Obs. 13. The reader, too, will for himself imagine the influence that such a translation must have, whenever it occurs, upon families, communities, churches, etc. The sudden disappearance of husband or wife, parent or child, sister or brother, pastor or member, etc., will be startling in the extreme. Such a separation " in that night," when in the bed, or the social gathering, or on the journey, will result in an outburst of grief, in a wonderful heart searching, and in a renewed, most diligent study of God's Word. But only (excepting the first, e.g. grief) in those who fear God and desire to be obedient unto Him. We thus return to this thought, only to direct attention to the fact that for a number of years various prophetic writers, and quite a number of periodicals, have warned the Church and the world that such was the Divine procedure, and have given proper prominence to this order of events. This answers a twofold purpose, viz., it vindicates God's mode of working, which is (in case of great events involving tremendous issues) to make His procedure previously known (Amos 3 : 7, etc.), and when it thus comes to pass it not only establishes His truth, but serves to guide those who are willing to receive His Word into a proper apprehension of the same. If such an event is to occur it is most reasonable to anticipate that believers in the Word, just previous to its occurrence, will proclaim it, so that when it has taken place others may recognize it at once as a part of God's own divine and gracious ordering. This, then, will alleviate the grief of believers when a beloved one is thus suddenly taken away, because they will rejoice in their having been thus favored, and will strive to prepare themselves and others for the coming struggle, that they too may be accounted worthy of a glorious reunion with resurrected and translated ones.

The thief-like Coming and presence of Jesus will at once be made evident by this gathering of " the first-fruits." Hence we cannot possibly receive Russell's view (Our Lord's Return, p. 62, etc.), which indorses Barbour's (Three Worlds) position : (1) that Jesus has already come, is now present and is (mentally) inspecting the guests of the marriage ; (2) that we are already in the time of the harvest, which is now progressing, the separation between (mental) wheat and tares going on, which will finally culminate in a bodily separation, the wise going into the marriage and the door is shut. The theory evidences a confusion of ideas, and does not properly discriminate between "the first-fruits", and the harvest. It is based upon an erroneous application of the Antichrist and Kingdom; upon an untenable interpretation of the events taking place between "the first-fruits" and the harvest; and upon the deductions of an inconclusive, but confidently urged, chronology. We show, on the other hand, that "the first-fruits" necessarily precedes the harvest, that certain events which have not yet taken place intervene, that the extensive proclamation, martyr faith, etc., evidences that the withdrawal is recognized by the Church, etc. So also we cannot receive, in view of the order laid down in the 14th ch. of Rev., the statement contained in the Proph. Times, March, 1878, that after the translation there will be no more tribulation of the Church (because all the pious will be taken) but only of the wicked, which is opposed to the proclamation and martyrdom after the 144,000 are taken. In the same connection (p. 72) another mistake is made when the translation is placed after the ending of the Jewish tribulation. It precedes its close, and (Zech. 14) after the Jews have drunk the last bitter dregs of their cup does Jesus come with His saints, previously gathered to take vengeance on the Gentiles.

Obs. 14. It is reasonable to expect that this doctrine of a translation will be ridiculed both before and after the occurrence of it. Indeed, the parallel existing in the days of Noah, just before the deluge, and that just before the Advent would fail in an important particular if ridicule and scorn were not added to the objections urged against belief in a speedy Advent and its inevitable results. Among these results that of the special honoring of some living saints by a translation without seeing death is already made the subject of derision and sport. The abuse of the doctrine by some evidently sincere but misguided persons (who confidently, against most express Scripture, fix the day and hour of its occurrence, and who, against the testimony of the Spirit, that it is not to be anticipated by a gathering of saints and most foolish provision of ascension robes, meet at the designated time to experience it) greatly tends to such levity; just as if the vagaries and foolishness of men in perverting a doctrine necessarily led to its entire rejection—a principle so palpably erroneous that if applied to truth in general would leave but little for us to accept. Scoffers are to arise in the last days, who will express their contempt of God's promises, and pronounce those, who Noah-like trust in them, to be, if not "mad" or possessed of a "devil," at least "exceedingly soft and foolish." This naturally is to be expected of the world, but unfortunately some of the scoffers are professed believers in that Word of God, which expressly teaches a still future translation to come suddenly, as a snare, upon the Church and the world, which gives us typical, real illustrations of such translations in two noted cases, and which urges us constantly to look and watch for that which is to effect it.<sup>1</sup> It is saddening that men cannot at least treat such subjects with soberness, and discuss them without sneers. This is before the translation; the same will be true of multitudes immediately after it. Acts 13 : 41 will be repeated; and those who are arrested by its occurrence and take it to heart will be unsparingly ridiculed. Human nature will be true to itself, and the doctrine will be particularly detestable to it, since it evinces a species of favoritism—a contrast—condemnatory to its own Naturalistic and Humanitarian position. The Spirit predicts—and His Word is truth—that ridicule, sneers, etc., shall give finally place to so positive a dislike and hatred to all pertaining to it that those who are left and are believing shall experience, not merely a wordy reviling persecution, but the stroke of the descending, beheading sword and axe.

Answered." A portion of the religious press pronounced the statements of Dr. Seiss in the eighth Lec. on the Apoc. respecting this translation, "Millenarianism run mad—nonsense—the gravest error—most destructive heresy"—"a fine prospect for news reporters"—"the last extreme of Millenarianism," etc. The Doctor sustains the assertions of his lecture by scripturally showing that such a removal without seeing death is no new thing, that God deals thus with the living at His Coming, that some will not die, that some will be left, and that the proximity of it is fully maintained (1) by our not knowing the time, hence, for aught we know, may be imminent, and (2) by the commanded posture to watch, etc., lest it come unawares, etc.

Obs. 15. To the critical student it is proper in this place to make some remarks on the phrase "Time of the End" and "Last Days." These terms have been in the past sadly appropriated, and conveniently dated from some period antecedent to the writer and thus represented as present; under its shelter (Dan. 12 : 8-10), with the plea that "the wise shall understand," men have confidently given us predictions relating to the future, which, to say the least, are simply conjectures and inferences suggested by minds strongly impressed by the alleged fact that they were already in "the time of the end." Many writers could be quoted illustrative of this, and several bodies of believers seem, if we are to judge by the usage of this phrase, to make it essential to their system. Books, tracts, sermons, essays are written to show, without proof excepting an array of signs and the declarations of others, that we are now, and have been for some years, in "the Time of the End." Over against all such deductions, the simple fact, as a more careful examination of the Scriptures indicate, is, that "the Time of the End" is still future. It is to be applied to this interval between the two stages of the Advent, a period which may embrace, for aught we know (considering the events that are to take place in it, and that the last week of Daniel does not include the whole time of interval, but only the time when the Covenant is made with the restored Jewish nation, the breaking of the same, and Antichrist's persecution of the Jews), from 35 to 75 years, more or less.

Let the reasons for such a reference be briefly assigned. This interval forms "the end" spoken of by Daniel, i.e. the time when the series of events predicted by himself should terminate; it is the culmination of prophecy, relating to Antichristian powers, the Jewish nation, and the Messianic triumph; it is the time when the end has come and God's judgments are to be poured out upon the nations, resulting in a great deliverance, and thus vindicating the Divine Purpose. When the first stage of the Advent occurs it is evidence that the end of the dispensation has arrived, and from the res. and translation of the believers down to the open Advent, we have literally "the time of the end." The overlapping of the two dispensations by this secret Parousia, instead of proving adverse to our view is corroborative of it, since such in the case of the Jewish and Christian is called "the ends of the world" (1 Cor. 10 : 11) by Paul. The end itself is not an abrupt, sudden end, but embraces time or years in its termination. A series of gigantic events are included in the winding up of this dispensation of so remarkable a nature that no one with the least faith in the Scriptures can doubt respecting the closing period of the age. But to particularize still more, every one can see for himself that this "time of the end" (Dan. 11 : 35) follows (comp. Prop. 160) a long continued and indefinite period of trial to the Church, such as the Church has experienced in the past. Then (Dan. 12 : 6-10) the end is associated with the restoration of the Jews to their own land, which is still future; with (Dan. 12 : 13, comp. Prop. 126) the resurrection of Daniel at the first stage of the Advent; with "the end of these wonders" (v. 6), i.e. with their termination, when they are about to be completed; with (v. 7) the time when "these things (the wonders predicted) shall be finished," i.e. shall approach their termination. Thus a comparison shows that the end commences with the resurrection of the saints, and the time of this end embraces within it God's controversy with the nations and the deliverance of the Jewish nation. For it seems that for purposes of salvation and vengeance, to manifest in an extraordinary degree the supernatural power of God in behalf of His people and in crushing His enemies, this interval between the two stages is (Dan. 8 : 19) not merely "the latter end of the indignation," but "the appointed time of the end"—a time specifically measured off by these stages, and the events connected therewith, composing the end or completion of the combined series of predictions—the culmination. This "time of the end" includes "the times" or "days" of Dan. 12, which, as a dispassionate examination proves (comp. Prop. 173), are contained in this interval, and have special reference to the climax of Jewish tribulation and Antichristian opposition. The "end" itself, or "the end of the days," is the full completion, witnessed in the overthrow of Antichrist and the establishment of the Theocratic Kingdom at the open Parousia. In addition, at "the time of the end" these prophecies will be "unsealed" (Dan. 12 : 9), i.e. they will be completely opened or understood in their unity and culmination. This unsealing is still future, for the simple reason that whatever advancement and knowledge may have been obtained by study, and whatever unity of view may have been secured in grand outlines, no two interpreters of Daniel can be found who perfectly agree with each other, in details at least. But we do know that between these two stages there is a complete unsealing, because the secret Advent with the resurrection and translation stamps at once the chronological status, the method and application of interpretation, the proper reception and place for the Apocalyptic visions, etc. The messages (Rev. 14) following the withdrawal of "the first-fruits" is sufficiently indicative that no lack of knowledge respecting the present and future is then pre-vailing, but that a correct apprehension of the predicted things is universal among believers.

St. John (1 John 2 : 18) uses the phrase "the last time" declaratively respecting this entire Christian dispensation, because Antichristian spirit and principles characterize it during the whole period, while Jude (v. 18), connecting it with the Advent, seems to limit (comp. 2 Pet. 3 : 3) it more to the concluding period of the same. It has been observed (e.g. Faber, Diss. on Proph., p. 87) that the expressions "latter days" or "times," and "last days," do not precisely denote the same period of time. While the former may include the latter to some extent, yet the one is significant of an indefinite termination of this dispensation, i.e. in contrast with the past history of the world or past duration; the other is expressive of "the last days" or "the end," or "time of the end." The chief characteristic of "the latter days" is that of superstition and apostatizing, and the main feature of "the last days" is that of blasphemous infidelity and direct opposition to God. The one is the forerunner of the other; the one culminates in the other; the one, Antichristian, paves the way for the other, the fully developed Antichrist, who denies both Father and Son.

“The latter days” usher in “the last days.” But this view can only be sustained by noticing that this distinction only holds good where they are used in prophetic sense, i.e. in a prediction relating to the future. The student will observe that the phrases “latter days” and “last days” in the Old Test. are the comparative and superlative of the one expression in the original, “the end of days” (comp. Faber’s Diss. on Proph., ch. 3). This refers to this very time of the end and its grand resultant, as seen e.g. in Isa. 2 : 2 ; Mic. 4 : 1 (with which comp. Acts 2 : 16, 17), seeing that the Millennial Kingdom is only introduced in connection with this closing period. The same is noticeable in Hos. 3 : 5, where “the latter days” or “the end of days” is united with the future restoration of the Jews and the Messianic reign. In these “latter days” (Ezek. 38 : 16) Antichrist—still future—is to enter Palestine and meet his doom, which only takes place in this interval. The declaration (Dan. 2 : 28) that God maketh known “what shall be in the latter days” or “at the end of days,” does not simply mean futurity in general, but that God really and truly represents to the King not merely what is “hereafter” (as afterward stated), but especially things which pertain to this culmination of events, this concluding period containing so many pregnant issues concerning Gentile domination, Jewish supremacy, and the Messianic reign. Indeed, a slight acquaintance with the predictions shows plainly that the greatest stress and detail is expended on this very period, to which the eye of faith and hope turns. “The latter times” of 1 Tim. 4 : 1 admits of a wider scope, and indicates, as the context and warning shows, that the spirit to be developed in them is one gradually formed and extending itself, becoming more and more intensive, through a series of times. The phrase “these last times,” in 1 Pet. 1 : 20, if not used declaratively, then refers (as is also true of “the last days” in Heb. 1 : 1, 2) to the fact that Jesus, the Messiah, was manifested during the closing period of the Mosaic economy, which removal was signally verified by the events befalling the nation and capital. However any of these phrases may be employed in a general sense, it is also true, as a careful comparison of the same evidences, that the Spirit employs them to express the closing period of this dispensation, ushering in the interval between the two stages, and then specifically the interval itself, with its result.

The reader will see that this consideration alone utterly vitiates an immense amount of prophetic interpretation and application, and the self-confident exaltation, as specially called witnesses, of various classes. Some systems are so wedded to the phrase as fundamental to their conclusions, that it is impossible to yield it up without at the same time giving up their respective theories of the order of events. The phrase is applied to any period that happens to fit into some favorite chronological period or its close ; and its beginning, duration, and termination varies with the view entertained concerning dates. Various commentaries, Lange, Barnes, Alford, Olshausen, etc., give interesting comments concerning these phrases, but the chronological application can only be found by a careful comparison of the prophecies, and that we are forced to locate, not in the past or the present, but in the future—in the interval between the two stages. And, as already intimated, we dare not, owing to the silence of the Scriptures on the subject, express its exact duration. We cannot limit it to seven years (i.e. the interval) as some do, because those seven years are applicable to a special time, relating to the Jews and Antichrist, and do not cover the entire interval, as seen e.g. in Mic. 7 : 15, etc., and in the events pertaining to the period which cannot, without undue violence (as e.g. the Jews dwelling in unwalled villages safely and prosperously when Antichrist comes upon them, etc.), be crowded into so small a space of time. In reference to the mighty increase of knowledge predicted of this period, it is sufficient to say that the gigantic events (then taking place, owing to the first stage of the Advent, the resurrection and translation of the saints will give the believer such a clear and decisive understanding of the prophecies, its chronology and the events to be anticipated, that then students of prophecy will see eye to eye, and encourage each other out of the fully comprehended Word of God. (On the phrases, comp. e.g. Dr. Braune, Lange's Com. 1 John, p. 72, sqq., and commentators generally on the same as used by Daniel, Isaiah, Micah, Paul, Luke, Peter, and John. The order of events during this "time of the end," as well as "the end" or "the end of the days," will be given under such Props. as 160-163, 166, etc.)

PROPOSITION 131. This Kingdom embraces the visible reign of Jesus, the Christ, here on earth.

Compare Props. 81, 82, 83. The idea of a Theocracy as involved in the Theocratic-Davidic arrangement, God ruling in and through David's Son; the covenant and the promises based on it relating to David's throne and Kingdom (Props. 49, 111, 114, 116, 117, 122); in brief, the entire analogy of prediction demands a visible reign.

Obs. 1. So distinctly is this taught that no Jew, no Christian believer, no one who read the Scriptures doubted this, until the Alexandrian system evolved a series of doctrines, under the notion of exalting the truth and the Son, in which the throne promised to David's Son was transformed into a throne in the third heaven. What influence the heathen mythology had at first in shaping and urging such views cannot be fully determined, but that it exerted some is self-evident in the similarity of views on various points, as witnessed e.g. in the introduction of Platonic ideas and doctrines. Eccl. His., His. of Religions, Treatises on Dog. Theol. and Sys. Div., etc., clearly indicate not only the change, but also the motives which led to it. When the change, however, was once made from the ancient simplicity, it rapidly entrenched itself in the Church as more in accord with the rising Papacy and an alleged advanced improvement.

Having abundantly presented the Jewish and early Church view—having already shown that the doctrine of such a visible reign was universally received by, and perpetuated in, the churches established under apostolic authority—it is not requisite to repeat our statements and quotations. Even the heathen (Kurtz, Sac. His., p. 273) entertained the belief that some great monarch thus reigning would bring back the golden age. The Apocryphal books (Stuart's Com. Rev. Ap.) largely contain it. The Sybils (Stuart's Com. Rev. Ap.) refer to it as an undoubted hope, thus indicating how widespread was the opinion. It is to be regretted that spiritualizing and unbelief have, in a great measure, rooted out this eminently Scriptural truth—the former, either by substituting a spiritual Coming and reign or by locating the same in the past or present; the latter by deliberately rejecting it, as e.g. some Rationalistic Jews who tell us that the only Messiah they look for is “political emancipation.” But such a substitution and rejection (1) ignores the plain Scriptural language, (2) the covenanted and historical connection, (3) the fact of a continuous faith introduced into the Christian Church through the return of a once dead, crucified Messiah, etc. The student will observe the following particulars: (1) The Jewish and ancient expectations, as instanced e.g. Barnes Com. on Matt. 2 : 2; (2) this expectation based on the covenanted restoration of the Theocratic rule in the person of David's Son; (3) this confirmed by the plain grammatical sense of prediction and promise; (4) the opinion of the disciples, Acts 1 : 6 who preached the Kingdom; (5) the language of the apostles and their labors, instead of removing the view only increased it, as evidenced in the primitive belief; (6) this continuity required by the general analogy of the Record, the facts as they existed, and the restoration of the identical Theocratic ordering overthrown; (7) the postponement of the personal reign to Sec. Advent, instead of vitiating a fulfilment, only teaches us the more forcibly how it will be realized. Knapp (Ch. Theol.) and others admit that such a personal visible reign was firmly believed in until the day of Pentecost, but that after that period a spiritual reign was only taught. This, however, makes (1) the very preachers of the Kingdom ignorant and misleading teachers; (2) the grammatical sense of covenant and prophecy to be discarded, without any express revelation ; (3) Jesus Himself to conceal the truth and leave His disciples in gross error ; (4) God to employ a sense (i.e. grammatical) which is not intended to be fulfilled, thus making Him chargeable with misleading ; (5) and that the apostles, if they were led to change their views (which is inferred and remains unproven), were utterly unable to proclaim such a change among the churches established by them as to influence to belief in the same.

Obs. 2. Having in previous Propositions shown with sufficient distinctness that David's Son, Jesus in His humanity, must, if the prophecies are fulfilled, appear in a visible reign ; that He does thus manifest Himself to the sight of all, it is unnecessary (as coming Propositions will materially add reasons for our doctrine to those already given) to enter into a detailed argument, since it is nowhere asserted that the visibility thus exhibited shall ever be withdrawn, and since the denial of such a visible reign is one of pure inference. No one, that we are aware of, has ever yet presented a passage of Scripture to prove the invisibility of the reign in the future. It is wrongfully inferred that the Divine Sovereignty (Props. 79 and 80) embraces this Kingdom, and upon this inference alone is based the opposition to our view, thus overlooking that this specially predicted Theocratic reign on David's throne is promised to "the Son of Man," see Prop. 81. Seeing the foundation of the denial of our doctrine, which has been examined in detail and refuted, it is only requisite to notice the peculiar ideas which originate from a forgetting or ignoring of this covenanted Kingdom.<sup>1</sup> The following illustrations will suffice.

<sup>1</sup> The fact of a visible return (if admitted) itself indicates the purpose of a visible reign, for the visible Advent is undoubtedly intended for establishing and administering His Kingdom. Why thus appear in visible glory, if not, as visibly present, to enter upon His covenanted, oath-bound Theocratic Kingdom? Why then—if a spiritual presence and reign is alone intended—is "the appearing and Kingdom" linked together? Why is the visible appearance of Jesus something directly asserted, as e.g. in the passages relating to "the Son of Man" (the glorified Man) and "the Son of David" (glorified) indicative of a then present human personality? Why is it declared as something that must necessarily exist, if the Scriptures are to be fulfilled, as e.g. in John 1 : 51 : "Ye shall see" (at that time) "the heaven open and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man"? Fausset (Com. Dan. 7 : 13) justly observes : "'Son of Man' expresses His visible state, formerly in His humiliation, hereafter in His exaltation." A little reflection ought to convince us that if His stay on earth at the First Advent as Son of Man included His personal, visible presence, so precisely at the Second Advent and stay on earth must the visible presence and reign be embraced because He then also comes and reigns as the Son of Man and Son of David. This is a sufficient answer to Dr. Keith's objection (Har. of Prophecy, p. 28), who admits a visible Coming, but rejects a visible reign (without proof, saving his own assertion).

Obs. 3. To indicate how persons in their eagerness to deny a visible, personal reign on earth of Christ allow themselves to use unwarranted language (even to deny the personal return to the earth), language which they themselves contradict, we refer e.g. to Barnes, Com. on 1 Thess. 4 : 16, where in his remarks he says : "There is no intimation here of 'a personal reign' of Christ upon earth. Indeed, there is no evidence that He will return to the earth at all," and then he proceeds to place Christ, the saints, the wicked, the living, and the dead in "the regions of the air." This sounds very much like one of the old monkish legends, and is unworthy of so able a man. We need not in reply direct attention to Zech. 14 : 4, where it is said that Christ's feet shall touch the Mt. of Olives, etc., for his own commentary contains an abundant refutation of his words. Thus e.g. in his Com. on Acts 3 : 21, he says : " Until ; this word implies that He should then return to the earth ;" and then to guard his theory after such an admission adds : " but it does not imply that He would not again ascend to heaven." Precisely so, and it does not imply that He will, after His return, leave again. This is added to the Bible by our opponents, because the Scriptures close with the personal Advent, His dwelling with man, etc., and leave Jesus the Christ here on the earth. Neither Barnes nor any other writer has been able to adduce a single passage to support their theory of Christ's Sec. Advent and immediate return to heaven. Yea, more than this, Barnes and others like him, forgetting their objections to our doctrine, do, when adverting to the renewed earth, admit that Christ may personally be present, as e.g. Barnes, Com. on Rev., ch. 21 : 3, " It is not said that this would be on the earth, although that may be, for it is possible that the earth, as well as other worlds, may yet become the abode of the Redeemed," comp. his remarks on chs. 21 and 22, and 2 Pet. 3 : 13, etc., which, in his usual style, may denote this or that, or may not denote it. The concessions, such as they are, unwillingly forced from him, are all that are required to prove a looseness and vagueness very different from the consistent, logical interpretation of the early Church.

We turn from such vacillating and contradictory statements to others who express this visibility as the early Church taught. Thus, e.g. Dr. Increase Mather (Pres. of Harvard Univ.), in his Mys. of Israel's Salvation, pointedly says : " Christ did never actually deny His having such a visible glorious Kingdom upon earth as that which His disciples looked for ; only He corrected their error as to the time of this Kingdom's appearing. Christ did not say to them that there should never be any such restoration of the Kingdom to Israel as their thoughts were running upon ; only He telleth them that the times and seasons were not for them to know ; thereby acknowledging that such a Kingdom should indeed be as they did, from the holy prophets, expect. Herein was their error, not in expecting a glorious appearing of the Kingdom of God, but in that they made account that this would be immediately." And in his Dis. on Faith he remarks, when the seventh trumpet sounds : " Then will his visible Kingdom appear in the greatest glory ; when, also, there will be a personal reign and residence of Christ in this lower world."

Obs. 4. In the discussion of this personal return and reign it is saddening to find good persons placing themselves on the judgment seat, and dogmatically deciding what it is possible or impossible for God to perform. This characteristic is even exhibited in the title-page of some books, as e.g. we read : " The personal reign of Christ during the Millennium proved to be impossible, by James C. L. Carson." This title-page is sufficiently indicative of the spirit of the work, and, we doubt not, if the writer had lived previous to the First Advent, he could with equal propriety, greater force, and with many of the same arguments, have proved it impossible for the Son of God to come, as He did, in humiliation, suffering, and death. The fact is, that the leading objection urged against our doctrine, viz., that it is a lowering, etc., of the majesty of Christ, is precisely the same urged by the ancient Celsus against the First Advent of Jesus, viz., that it could not be credited that a divine Being should assume humanity, suffer, etc., because all this would be a virtual degradation. The old apologists replied that the work He performed, the precious characteristics manifested, the results that followed, etc.—these exalted and glorified such an Advent. So when we are attacked by the same unbelieving argument, fortified by the vivid and glorious predictions, believing in the blessed design and results of this reign, we point to the faithful sayings of God and their fulfilment, thus simply accepting of the Divine utterances without attempting to alter them or to apologize in their behalf. Precisely the same objection, in another form, is levelled by infidels against the Incarnation and Life of Jesus Christ, on the ground that such a Creator and Lord of the universe—including unnumbered worlds—could not possibly degrade Himself to make this, so small a planet, the scene of His special manifestations, etc. It is well known how our opponents meet such an objection, but the identical reasoning thus produced by them favors our own view, and is fatal to their objections against us (comp. Props. 203 and 204).

The reader need not be advised that we have many learned men, professed critics, who speak of this reign of Christ as "a Messianic fiction" or "a Christianized Messianic expectation," admirably adapted to sustain the faith of the Primitive Church, but utterly unworthy of serious reception in this the more enlightened age of the world. We need not be surprised, therefore, that a writer (Westm. Review, Oct., 1861, art. 5) declares that the Apoc. "proclaims to all ages the intense reality, the frenzied fanaticism, the splendid superstition and Berserker transport of our great dreamer of this glorious vision, the St. John of Patmos, the author of the Ch. Apocalypse."

Obs. 5. It becomes painful to notice, in the objections levelled against us, the serious and unfounded change of "carnal," "fleshly," etc. Having already warned brethren how careful they ought to be in the use of such phraseology in designating the personal reign of Christ, lest they be finally found guilty of accusing God's arrangements, the Divine Purpose itself, of carnality, attention may be briefly called to the manner in which this is done. Most excellent writers, such as Rev. Philip (Devot. Guides, vol. 2, p. 287), as well as a host of inferior ones, speak of it as "carnal and vulgar;" under the assumption of superior piety, humility, sanctity, and honoring of Christ, and claim that, under the influence of love, etc., they wish for no such reign, but only a spiritual reign, etc. Without detracting from these brethren, or calling their honesty or piety into question, it may be well to examine this assumption, which is well calculated to beguile and mislead the inquiring. It may be in place to ask what piety, humility, etc., includes. Does it consist in rejecting holy covenanted promises, in denying to Christ what the Spirit ascribes to Him? Without attempting to institute a comparison, we may point to that long line of eminent worthies, whose praise is in the churches, who reverently and humbly receive the Divine Record on the subject just as we do, and exhibited in their lives and deaths as true piety, devotedness (many of them martyrs for the truth) as any of their opponents, and in view of all this, ought such a plea to be instituted? It is simply an evasion of argument, and, if employed by any one, is a sure indication of weakness. The question between us is not the personal piety, etc. of the adherents of one or another theory or doctrine (for as we see in all denominations, the Spirit of God can, notwithstanding error more or less entertained, produce His fruits in various classes on the common ground of faith in Jesus), but it consists in an appeal to the Word of God to ascertain what the Spirit has recorded. Hence all such reasoning is not only irrelevant but painful to a man of candor.<sup>1</sup> This subject will be continued under Prop. 177, so that, for the present, it may be suggested that if the Mill. descriptions are verified as they read; if the personal presence of Christ and His associated rulers is vouchsafed; if the reign is not merely an external civil and religious one, but includes righteousness, wisdom, love, etc., in all their aspects ; if the design of it is to fill the earth with God's glory, etc., then the charge of carnality fails, for the reign and Kingdom is materially different from that exhibited in the efforts of Gentile domination.

<sup>1</sup> Intense bigotry sometimes also appears under the guise of piety, and comparatively few persons have escaped its smooth, velvety vindictiveness. To prostitute the profession of piety either to hide our own weakness or condemn others, is undoubtedly unworthy of a believer. But in view of some persons being influenced by this feature, aided by the plea that the doctrine of the personal Coming is of no practical value, it may be well for such to notice that our views, if properly entertained, have a decided practical value, and tend to develop piety, as seen, e.g. in urging obedience, 1 John 2 : 28 ; holiness, 1 John 3 : 3 ; good works, Matt. 16 : 27 ; Rev. 22 : 12 ; patience, James 5 : 7, 8 ; Heb. 10 : 36, 37 ; sobriety, 1 Pet. 1 : 16 ; temperance, Phil. 4 : 5 ; heavenly-mindedness, Phil. 3 : 20, 21 ; watchfulness, Luke 12 : 35-37 ; mortification of sin, Col. 3 : 4, 5 ; godly living, Tit. 2 : 11-13 ; brotherly love, 1 Thess. 3 : 13 ; exhortation to sinners, Acts 3 : 19-22, etc. (given in detail in the Christian Intelligencer, 1864). Here, indeed, is practical religion urged by the motive of the Coming of Jesus Christ, a motive so distasteful to those who profess to make so much of practical religion. Surely, God does not mistake when He presents a motive before us ! The reader will compare Prop. 183.

Obs. 6. Briefly, the feeble efforts at presenting proof against us drawn from Scripture may be dismissed with a few words. Thus e.g. Ralston (On the Apoc., p. 164 and 165) gives two reasons for rejecting the personal reign of Christ. The first is, that we walk by faith and not by sight (2 Cor. 5 : 7), and the Apostle said, 2 Cor. 5 : 16, "Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more." But if we are to understand the passage in the line intimated, then it proves too much, and would make out that there will be no Sec. Advent, and that the angels and the Apostles were mistaken in their announcements. To press the passage in this direction is far worse than despised "literalism." The second is, that the Saviour is at God's right hand "forever," and will not interfere with the work of the Spirit in applying the atonement, quoting John 16 : 7-11 ; Heb. 10 : 12, 13 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 24-26 ; Acts 3 : 34, 35 ; Acts 3 : 21. To this we reply—(1) by comparing Scripture with Scripture we ascertain the Spirit's meaning of this "forever ;" (2) if thus unduly pressed, it is hostile to the Sec. Advent itself ; (3) the Scriptures quoted do not sustain his theory, limiting the stay until His return ; (4) and the work of the Spirit is not limited but increased by this Personal Coming and reign. Dr. Brown, Christ's Sec. Coming, ch. 5, introduces the same, and urges that our view calls for another dispensation. Exactly so, as we shall show (Props. 137, 138, 140, 167, etc.) farther on, for if the Theocratic-Davidic throne and Kingdom are re-established as predicted, if the Abrahamic-Davidic Covenant is ever fulfilled as written, there must be, in the very nature of the case, a new dispensation or ordering of things. The rest of the objections presented by Brown are met under various Propositions, so that they need no mention here. One of the most recent writers, Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 467, etc.) gives the following reasons against it : 1. Because it is not mentioned in Rev. 20 : 1-6. Reply : If it had been specifically mentioned, such mention, just as that of the resurrection, would have met with the same treatment of spiritualistic interpretation as the preceding immediate context (ch. 19) of the Advent did at his hands. But, it is stated in the promise of the reign of Christ and His saints, for the reign evidently is to be understood of the same that is specially promised to and predicted of Jesus as David's Son. Therefore, to ascertain what that reign is, a comparison of prophecy and covenant is necessary, and the question can only be decided in the light thus afforded. Thus e.g. a comparison of Covenant, Zech. 14, Dan. 7, Isa. 25, and Rev. 20 : 1-6, is alone sufficient to decide the kind of reign intended. Whoever can spiritualize Zech. 14 away will, of course, find Rev. 20 : 1-6 undecisive. 2. The Advent of Christ, Rev. 19, is an ideal representation—a visionary spectacle, representing a certain agency, etc. Suppose it is symbolic, which we grant, the question still returns, Whom does it represent—ideal personages or agencies, or real personages or agencies? The vision of the beast, prophet, etc., represents real actors, etc.—this he admits. So this vision of Christ and of His saints must also; this, too, he is willing to concede to a certain extent, viz., that it is illustrative of the agency of the Church and of Christ's agency invisibly through the Church, claiming that the horse, attendants, splendor, sharp sword is indicative of the ideal. He therefore mixes up in confusion the ideal and the real, and entirely overlooks the main, leading fact that it is a vision of an Advent, a Coming from heaven. Under this vision, like that of the other visions, a real, actual occurrence is represented, and that is the Coming of an irresistible, conquering Christ, and with Him the Coming of the saints. This is the simple construction put upon the passage by the early Church, and it is one that must commend itself to the reflecting mind. For, how comes it that one portion of the vision, under the spiritualistic interpretation, viz., that of the armies of heaven, is made to refer visibly to the saints or Church, and the chief personage in the vision is made only to appear invisibly? By what rule of interpretation is one party, as the beast, and another party, as the Church, made to be present visibly, and the third party, spoken of in the same connection, without the least intimation of a change of condition, etc., is made to appear an actor invisibly? The answer is, solely to save a theory from a fatal objection. 3. That such a personal Coming would assume “an incongruous mixture of the two states of humiliation and glory.” Reply: To make out such a mixture he presumes to judge what is right and proper for the Lord to do, overlooking both that this Advent in no shape or form intimates humiliation, but triumph, exaltation, and glory; and that he himself previously spoke of the Mill. age in the most elevated terms of eulogy. It is simply presumptuous for believers to pen a sentence like the following: “When Jesus entered on His state of glory He could no longer dwell on earth and make Himself visible to men.” Why not? Perhaps Fairbairn knows, or has heard the reason of His absence to be that He awaits the period of His manifestation, a work having in the mean time to be accomplished, and that when He comes this work will be perfected, etc. The objection is based on the same noticed, Obs. 2 and 3, above. The admission, however, that he makes, as we will prove hereafter, is alone sufficient to overthrow his theory, viz., that Christ will come “only when He comes to make all things new, and stamps them with the perfection of His Divine work, then will the world be prepared as the house of the glory of the Lord.” As our argument all along shows, we also hold that when Christ comes the renewing, transforming, recreating power lodged in Him will be exhibited, and logically—without calling into question a single passage in its naked, plain, grammatical meaning—prove that this will be witnessed in the Millennium, seeing also that nothing short of this power can possibly affect it. 4. Fairbairn's next objection is, that the acts specially associated with the Sec. Advent belong to an age subsequent to the Millennium.

Among these he specifies the general resurrection, the final judgment, and the Bride's marriage with the Lamb. But this remains unproven, and he assumes them to be thus future. See e.g. Props. 120, 121, 132, 133, 134, 137, 140, etc., for our scriptural evidence to the contrary. The reference to the Bride's marriage will be answered in Props. 169, 150, 146, etc. But we may well put against Fairbairn's unwarranted postponement for one thousand years of the Marriage announced in Rev. 19, the simple Pre-Millennial announcement of the Spirit, Rev. 19 : 7, "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to Him ; for the marriage of the Lamb is come." This to us is authoritative, and we reverently receive it as crushing to all such theorizing built on a specious spiritualizing of Scripture. Our reasons, as the reader must have observed, lie deeper than mere inferences from isolated passages, or mere deductions from a portion of Scripture stripped of its grammatical meaning ; they are founded in the solemnly, oath-attested Covenant, in the plain, grammatical meaning of the Word, in the general analogy of the Scriptures, and in the accredited faith of the apostolic churches.

The objections urged have only force when a single passage is considered isolated and pressed to the exclusion of others explanatory of order, time, etc. They do not sufficiently discriminate between the work that Jesus now performs and that which is attributed to Him at His Coming. They also forget that they themselves admit that when Jesus comes His enemies will be judged and overcome ; that He now exercises forbearance and mercy, which shall give place to wrath ; that such an overcoming and exhibition of vengeance is associated with a Pre-Mill. Coming ; that even when He comes, such is His union with the Father, "the right hand of power" ever pertains to Him ; that in thus Coming He does not forsake, as God, the Divine Sovereignty lodged in Him, etc. Such admissions and approximations certainly should largely conciliate objectors. Our whole argument indicates that when David's Son, as the Son of Man, comes, God Himself in and through Him condescends to rule in the determined Theocratic manner ; but this does not interfere with the Divine Sovereignty (which Luther meant when he said : "The right hand of God is everywhere," and Dr. Seisa denotes when affirming : "The Son of Man is as much at the right hand of God in Coming to judge the world," etc.). In this discussion it is highly important to observe the connection that one passage sustains to others. Thus, e.g. Heb. 1 : 8 is sometimes quoted as if in opposition to our views, but this is incorrectly done. This application of Ps. 45 : 6, 7 to the Messiah indicates how the entire Psalm is to be taken, and which, as will be shown hereafter, relates to the future, when "thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things," etc. (comp. Rev. 19, etc.). Besides this, in the very same epistle, ch. 2 : 5-9, the dominion is not yet given to David's Son (but will be. Comp. Props. 81, 82, 83, 84), thus showing us not to press one passage to the exclusion of others.

Obs. 7. Some (esteemed brethren) who frankly admit and earnestly advocate the Pre-Millennial Personal Advent, still express themselves timidly, illogically, and unscripturally in reference to the personal reign of Christ here on the earth. Some few advocating, after His Sec. Advent, His withdrawal to the third heaven, from whence He reigns (some stating that He may occasionally visit the earth and appear to men) ; others have a withdrawal into the air or upper regions, or into the New Jerusalem, also located in the air or above the earth. This is done by some under a misapprehension of the Covenant, and to whom the Kingdom is specially promised, and with the idea of honoring the God in Christ ; while others do it under the supposition that such a view will make our doctrine more palatable to others—that such a concession is harmless and will induce others the more readily to embrace a Pre-Mill. Coming. But allow us here to enter our earnest, solemn protest against all such diluting processes which only weaken our doctrine ; all such adulteration of truth to render it more acceptable to others, which only are hailed as evidences of weakness and illogical connection. This subject is too sacred, too precious, too intimately related to the honor of Christ to be either lightly esteemed or made the sport of mere conjecture. Every position assigned to Jesus in this Kingdom ought to have a "thus saith the Lord" for its support, and not the play of human fancy about the propriety of this and that spoken concerning it. We esteem this continued personal presence of Christ the crowning glory of our system, an essential element of its strength. If the reader has carefully noticed the Covenant promises over which we have passed he must have arrived at the conclusion that, if the grammatical meaning is retained, the promises of God require that the reign of Christ and of His saints should be a continued visible one. Bickersteth and many writers assign, as reasons for our belief, passages of Scripture which, if ever fulfilled, demand such a personal presence. These indeed apply forcibly, but with the Apostolic Fathers we ground our belief even on, if possible, a surer, stronger foundation (because plainer), when we say that the utterances of the Covenant are all based on the idea of a personal presence. The central point of the Davidic Covenant is this : that Christ, as David's Son, the promised seed, shall reign on David's throne and in David's Kingdom ; and therefore the very language on the face of it conveys the important notion, that in consequence of this, He, as David's Son and Lord, must be and is visibly present. Such a presence is even taken for granted, is assumed as a self-evident fact, needing no special demonstration. For how else is Abraham's seed to inherit the land, or David's seed to inherit his throne? To transfer David's throne or Christ's inheritance to the air or to the third heaven is simply to make the Covenant and promises null and void, seeing that that inheritance, throne, and Kingdom is here on the earth, and not in the air or the third heaven. And when the Bible represents this Inheritor and King to come to this earth to claim His covenanted right, and leaves Him here in possession of it, that man certainly takes a great liberty who places David's Son elsewhere than in His inheritance and Kingdom. No one, that we have thus far read, pretends even to give a single passage to prove such a return, but simply infers it from considerations of his own. How could such a return to heaven, or withdrawal from the earth, possibly be a fulfilment of the Covenant to David that His Son should reign on His throne forever? And would this fulfil the Prophets, who, with one voice, declare that David's Son shall reign gloriously in Jerusalem, the seat of David's throne, in the midst of the Jewish nation, over the nations of the earth? No! we dare not thus neutralize the precious promises of God. This perversion of Covenant and promise arises from not clearly apprehending what Kingdom is promised to Jesus as Son of Man, as David's Son, and that the humanity of Jesus is to sustain this Kingship, the Divine being united with Him in this Theocratic relationship (see Props. 81, 82, 83, 200, etc.). The Divine in Christ, whatever it may perform in the exercise of Divine Sovereignty in the universe, is associated with "the man ordained" to exhibit a perfect, visible Theocratic government. Let us repeat : Christ is not to come again simply as the Son of God (that relationship to the Father is indeed indispensably requisite to make provision for salvation, to perfect it, and to establish the Theocracy in a permanent form), but pre-eminently and significantly (as the repeated promises to and name of Son of Man fully indicate) as the Son of Man, for the latter is the relationship specifically demanded in the Covenant to be visibly shown and acknowledged to be such by all. Does the Covenant and its promises remain satisfied by a mere visit, as it were, to the predicted inheritance? Such theories, refined to suit the taste of unbelief or weak faith, were utterly unknown to the early Church, whose strong faith firmly grasped and clung to the Covenant in this particular, believing that the underlying idea in it embraced a continual personal presence. We confess an admiration of the men, who, now the objects of witticisms and ridicule from infidels and even professed believers, thus accepted, with Abrahamitic and Davidic faith, of the Covenant as it reads, and received the voice of the Prophets as they also read, and boldly and unequivocally avowed their belief in such a precious presence; enforcing it by the predictions that Christ should return and dwell and reign in Jerusalem, having rebuilt the ruined tabernacle of David in majesty; that He shall rule in it gloriously, making it the place of His throne; that the restored Jewish nation, as well as the saints, shall see Him in His glory; that all nations shall at Jerusalem acknowledge His supremacy, etc. In all this, no matter what man may say, there is, at least, a regular and consistent fulfilment of the Word of God. With them we regard this very presence as a necessary adjunct to redemption, inasmuch as redemption is to be perfected by the Second Adam in this Theocratic relation. While He is carrying on the Divine Purpose intended by this Theocratic-Davidic government, viz., to redeem the race as a race from the curse, He should also, at the same time and in the same place where man fell, exhibit in Himself, as the Head and in a corporate body of His brethren, perfected salvation. By Christ's salvation is not meant that He is to be saved from sin (for He was without sin, otherwise the sacrifice of Himself would have been imperfect and unavailing, and death also would have had dominion over Him), but that as Abraham's seed, assuming flesh for our sakes, with its weakness, imperfections (i. e. natural, subject to disease, sleep, etc.), liability to the corruption of death, He now exhibits in Himself as man a complete deliverance from all those evils voluntarily assumed, and thus a triumph over our enemies, an impressive representation of the power of holiness united with the love of the Father, a Second Adam, in whose person incarnation is glorified. For we must ever keep in mind that Christ is not only "the Second Adam," because a similarity is implied between Christ and the redeemed, resembling that between Adam and his descendants, in that, as death is transmitted by the first Adam, so life is bestowed through the Second Adam ("As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive," etc.), but He is also designated such because in Himself, as man, is to be exhibited "the image of God," defaced by the fall of the first Adam; and hence, as a necessary connection with that image, the dominion originally granted to the first Adam is also in Him restored. Theologians, of almost every class, concede such a restoration. Therefore, it is eminently proper and requisite that in the person of Christ, through whom the race is to be redeemed, should be shown, as that Second Adam, the complete restoration of all that the first Adam forfeited; among others, including the restoration and retention of the forfeited inheritance (which led to those covenant promises that Christ should inherit the land, etc.), the restoration and retention of the dominion or kingly power, which was forfeited as well as moral rectitude, the immortality of man, and the perpetuation of the race in a state of innocency and purity. However, to do and manifest this requires the personal presence of the Second Adam in His restored inheritance and dominion, in order that not only the promises may be verified, but that the most ample, actual, experimental proof may thus be afforded in the person of the Redeemer, the Head of the body, that in Him, our second living Head, we have attained unto all (not a part) that the first Adam (and we through him) forfeited by sin. This Second Adam thus stands forth in our system a revealed representative of God, such as the first Adam was designed to become had he not fallen. This David's Son, crowned with greater glory because of His unbroken union with the Divine, occupies, as Restorer, Adam's place; and if so, how can we, how dare we separate His presence from the place thus restored? This is shadowed forth in Ps. 8 and Heb. 2, and is justly claimed by us as the crowning feature in redemption. For without a personal Second Adam present, redemption itself is incomplete, imperfect.

Seeing what completed redemption requires, and that Jesus the Christ is the one through whom, at His Sec. Advent, it is to be perfected, we cling to those promises relating to the future with earnest faith, believing that all things relating to the Christ, as recorded in Moses and the prophets, will be as literally fulfilled in the future as they have been in the past (Luke 24 : 44 ; 18 : 31 ; 22 : 37, etc.). The student, of course, will understand that our argument does not imply that Jesus Christ is constantly visible to all, i. e. continually seated in regal state, receiving homage. For His Rulership constantly exerted, His Majesty visibly manifested in enduring enthronement may (as now witnessed in earthly rulers) require stated periods when He shall publicly exhibit Himself on State occasions. We only mean that His Kingship is exerted on earth, and the place of central power and manifestation (Prop. 168) is on Mt. Zion, where David's throne was located. This King may even, for aught we know, frequently visit other parts of the universe, but without diminishing His earthly Theocratic relationship. To our brethren, who are so reluctant to admit Christ's personal reign on the earth, but insist that it is over the earth, we, once for all, say that the Messianic Kingdom is the restoration of an overthrown but covenanted Theocracy, in which the personality of the Ruler and His visibility and accessibility to the nation was an essential factor. The highest element of a Theocracy (such as covenanted to David) is that God condescends, in perfect union with David's Son, to act here on earth as earthly Ruler, and if this, the chiefest, most important feature, is stricken out, it is no longer the tabernacle of David restored in his Son, or the covenanted, predicted Theocracy, and God has failed to set up a Theocracy as announced. (Comp. Props. 82, 122, 201, 202, 206, and 207.)

Obs. 8. Our argument is cumulative, and to avoid undue repeating we pass by the prophetic reasoning to be drawn from Dan., chs. 2, 7, etc., that the outward, external, visible world-dominion which the Chaldean monarch contemplated was to be realized fully in the Messiah. We also leave unnoticed the numerous predictions which emphatically declare the visible reign of Jesus here on earth, for they will all be brought forth under various following Propositions. It is in the very nature of a manifested Theocracy that there should be (as already foreshown in the past Theocratic arrangement), not simply faith, but sight. Dr. Brown (Christ's Sec. Com., P. 2, ch. 5) emphatically declares that there is "no Millennial mixture of faith and sight." He takes to task Brookes's saying, that "in the Millennial state there will be an open vision of Christ," and that "it will be a dispensation in which the saints will continually have personal access to Christ." He censures Elliott for teaching a "visibly manifested" conjunction of the earthly and heavenly Jerusalem; he condemns Lord for saying that the nations have access to the glorified (symbolized by the open gates, etc.), and that "they are never to be without the visible presence of God; that its gates are never shut, and that the nations are to enjoy un*interrupted access* to the glorified." He ridicules Birks, McNeile, Bickersteth, and Maitland for teaching such a visible revelation and such an access to the city, such a "seeing the Lord of Hosts manifested in the human nature of Jesus reigning in Mt. Zion," such a visible manifestation of glory that impresses the nations, and such a change in dispensation that sight shall also be introduced. Of course any one who denies that the sight of Jesus (Zech. 12 : 10 ; Ezek. 20 : 35) will influence the future conversion of the Jews ; who rejects the seeing of Matt. 23 : 39 ; Zech. 14 : 1, etc. ; who finds no place in his system of theology for the everlasting Covenant of David ; who spiritualizes Jerusalem, Mt. Zion, etc., and denies a future incoming dispensational change—can find nothing of sight, no matter how plainly presented.

Do not men, in their bitter attempt to disparage this visible reign of Jesus, run some danger of being ultimately found to degrade God's own appointments? In such a case can ignorance be pleaded, when they fully admit that the grammatical sense indeed teaches it, but claim that another (spiritual) sense is intended. The whole matter depends, as our entire argument shows, on the system of interpretation adopted. This reminds us how recent efforts are made to weaken our claim to a literal fulfilment of prophecy. The editor of The Luth. Observer (Feb. 28th, 1879) says : "The Methodist makes this remark : 'The Pre-Millenarians say that the prophecies of Christ's First Coming were literally fulfilled.' It would be more accurate to say that they were exactly fulfilled. This will admit of a little amplification. The prophecies of Christ's First Coming were not literally fulfilled in the sense in which the Jews understood them, which was that He would set up a temporal Kingdom when He came. They were, however, actually and really fulfilled in their true spiritual sense, that He would establish a spiritual Kingdom. This is now universally accepted as the true sense of the prophecies respecting Christ's First Coming. Why should we not, therefore, predicate from this, that the prophecies concerning the Second Coming are also to be understood in a spiritual, and not in a literal and material, sense? Especially, since the predictions and expectations of all who have believed in a literal Second Coming and temporal Kingdom, during more than eighteen hundred years, have been proved by events to be erroneous." We reaffirm that the prophecies pertaining to the First Advent, birth, life, sufferings, crucifixion, death, resurrection, and ascension were literally verified, and this exact literal fulfilment is used against unbelief to identify the Messiah. We reaffirm that the reason why the Messianic Kingdom was not set up at the First Advent was owing to the non-repentance of the nation and its rejection of the Messiah, and that consequently (as we have shown in detail) the Kingdom was postponed to the Sec. Advent, with which the prophecies agree. We reaffirm that this postponement holds good, as the general analogy teaches, until the Second Advent is realized, and that the alleged "spiritual Kingdom" does not meet the conditions either of covenant and prophecy. We reaffirm that this spiritual application is not universal (as the history of the doctrine incontrovertibly proves), but is now generally held by the professing Church, thus fulfilling the predicted lack of faith. We reaffirm that the expectations based on chronological data (even given by our opponents) has nothing to do with the grammatical or spiritual sense of the prophecies, which must stand on their own merits, and that if it were otherwise, and The Methodist's assertions were correct, then there can be no future literal, personal Advent at all. And we affirm (1) that the prophecies relating to the First Advent brought a literal Coming of the Messiah, and not a spiritual one ; and (2) that the predictions relating to the Second Advent, being given in the same intended sense (for no discrimination is made), will also bring us a literal, personal Coming of the Messiah. Simple consistency demands such a faith.

A few words in relation to Barbour's theory (Three Worlds) of Christ's necessary invisibility because He has a spiritual body. Admitting fully, because a spiritual body is one under the complete control of the Spirit, that Jesus can be visible or invisible at pleasure, and that He can be visible to some and invisible to others (illustrated in Paul and his company, Elisha and his servant, yet Barbour goes too far when he says that no other but saints shall see Him as He is, i.e. glorified. He appeared in His glory to mortal man (e.g. Paul and Daniel and Stephen and John), and the prophets and New Test. unite in predicting that He shall come in His glory, and it is this very glory, tremendous majesty of appearance, that shall confound His enemies, prove irresistible to the Jews, and secure the allegiance of the nations. The Jews in the flesh see Him "face to face." In His thief-like Coming this glory is veiled, for the intention of this stage of the Coming is one hidden from the world. But even in this stage He comes glorified, as His glorification is essential to the work that He then undertakes to perform—as we shall hereafter describe in detail. It is at the open Parousia that the glory—hitherto revealed only to the saints resurrected and translated—is manifested in transcendent power. The spirituality does not forbid the visibility of Jesus, as is plainly seen in His Coming being likened to the visibility of the lightning itself. While thus visibly manifesting Himself, it is also true that this very majesty may be veiled to some extent from mortals, and that the glorified saints are alone capable to behold His full glory. Some attempt to particularize, but we must be satisfied with the glimpses obtained, which indicate that the reality will exceed the fondest anticipations of believers and impress with profound reverence the nations of the earth. We think that Barbour is misled by his spiritualistic theory (which practically ignores the Kingdom as covenanted and predicted, and substitutes for it a spiritual one, which is a refinement of the Church-Kingdom view) and by his harvest theory (which, as we shall show in another place, is untenable and violates the plainest Scriptures). It is sufficient to say that his making the present time the period when "the Son of Man" is actually personally present, is a perversion of the phrase "Son of Man" (which is expressive, not of a spiritual presence, but of His humanity), and of the phrase "day of the Son of Man" (which, e.g. Luke 17 : 22, is expressive of a visible presence), and of "the days of Noah" (making the Coming to be equivalent to the same, when Jesus only makes those days expressive of the conduct of men preceding His own Coming, likening His Parousia to the suddenness of the flood), etc. The fact is, that this forcing a meaning out of passages which they do not bear on their face, is met by the simplest declarations concerning the visibility of this Jesus at His Sec. Advent. Take e.g. "the times of refreshing (reanimation) from the presence of the Lord," Acts 3 : 19, and after noticing (see Prop. 144) how this is linked with the sending of Jesus, etc., "the presence" or "face" does not simply mean that the Lord is the author of the same "refreshing," but that it results from His actual, visible presence, for the usage of "face" in the New Test. (as instanced by Barnes, Com. loci) in Mark 1 : 2 ; Luke 1 : 76, and 2 : 31, denotes a real, visible presence. It is frequently thus employed, as e.g. Matt. 11 : 10 ; Luke 7 : 27 ; Matt. 18 : 10 ; 1 Cor. 13 : 12, etc., and the context evidences that this usage of the word is to be observed. We confess that the simple faith of the early Church, as previously expressed by us, is far more consistent with covenant and prediction than such refined interpretations.

The Origenistic, spiritualistic interpretation finds one of its extremes in the Swedenborgian theory (e.g. in Apoc. Revealed, vol. 2, s. 664, and index, or Hayden's Art. "New Jerusalem," in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.), making the Kingship of Jesus to "signify divine truth," His Sec. Advent to be a revealing of truth, and consequently all, including the Kingdom itself (now even claimed to be manifested), is "spiritual." To make out such a theory, and others somewhat similar, everything pertaining to covenant and prophecy must be spiritualized. We protest against such a perversion of the grammatical sense, adopting the language of Dean Alford (N. T., vol. 2, p. 362), who thus writes against spiritualizing the promises and departing from the Primitive Church view : "But I have again and again raised my earnest protest against evading the plain sense of the words, and spiritualizing in the midst of plain declaration of fact. That the Lord will come in person to this our earth ; that His risen elect will reign with Him here and judge ; that during that blessed reign the power of evil will be bound, and the glorious prophecies of peace and truth on earth find their accomplishment ; this is my firm persuasion, and not mine alone, but that of multitudes of Christ's waiting people, as it was that of the His. Primitive Apostolic Church before controversy blinded the eyes of the Fathers to the light of prophecy." We conclude, therefore, with Dr. Schmucker (Exp. of Rev.), that (in view of this Messianic Theocratic Kingdom following on the territory, etc., of the four universal monarchies of Dan. 2 and 7—comp. Prop. 160), "Now as the preceding four are temporal monarchies, homogeneity compels us to consider the fifth empire one of the same nature ; or otherwise these prophecies would appear an impenetrable riddle, and the words without a certain signification, of no use to the Church." Many writers, who fail to fully grasp the covenanted force of this Kingdom and its Theocratic-Davidic nature, still hold to this "glorious reign of Christ on earth with His saints, so often promised in Scripture" (so e.g. Milton, Prose Works, vol. 4, p. 484, who applies Dan. 7 : 13, 14 ; Ps. 2 : 8, 9 ; Rev. 2 : 25-27 ; Ps. 110 : 5, 6 ; Isa. 9 : 7 ; Luke 1 : 32, 33 ; Matt. 19 : 28 ; Rev. 20 : 1-7, etc., to this period), and take the accessibility and the visibility of the King as something inseparable from the reign.

PROPOSITION 132. This view of the Kingdom confirmed by the Judgeship of Christ.

The Judgeship of Jesus establishes our doctrine of the Kingdom, the Pre-Mill. Advent, and His continued personal presence as the King. Intending to show that Judgeship and Kingship are in Scripture equivalent terms, it follows that if they are such, then, since the Kingship is specifically promised to Jesus Christ as the Son of Man, made thus necessary by the covenant, so also the Judgeship ought to be expressed. This is done. He is the Judge because He is "the man ordained," Acts 17 : 31.<sup>1</sup> Some theologians tell us that the reason why the Father thus constituted Jesus the Judge is (Knapp's Ch. Theol., p. 542) "because He is man and knows from His own experience all the sufferings and infirmities to which our nature is exposed, and can therefore be compassionate and indulgent." But the reader can see a far deeper reason, grounded on the Covenant. It is said, "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son ; that all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father," John 5 : 22, 23, and in verse 27 it is added : "and hath given Him authority to execute judgment also, because He is the Son of Man." Why the Son of Man? Because to this Son of Man as David's Son is promised the Kingdom, and Judgeship being included in the promised Theocratic-Davidic government, the Father only judges through this Son. The promises based on the covenant require such authority to be given to and to be manifested through the Covenanted Seed. Hence, as the second Adam recovering the dominion lost by the first Adam ; as the woman's seed who is to crush the serpent's head ; as the promised seed of Abraham who is to inherit the land, possess the gate of His enemies, and make all nations blessed ; as the Son of David who is to reign so gloriously over the earth ; as the God-man who perfects salvation through a Theocratic ordering—it is indispensably necessary for Him to occupy such a position to meet the pre-determined plan of Redemption.

Obs. 1. Before entering into a discussion of this interesting and delightful subject it is proper to say that no single doctrine is perhaps so greatly misapprehended as this one ; for which we are indebted to the originators of monkery and to the schoolmen. Multitudes, embracing even talented and able divines, instead of confining themselves to scriptural representations to ascertain the mind of the Spirit, are content to accept of the interpretations drawn from the writings of monks, mystics, etc., or from false systems of philosophy, human imagination, heathen mythology, descriptions of poetry, paintings, modern definitions of Judge, etc.<sup>1</sup> The early Church, and that band of witnesses which taught the Pre-Mill. Advent and the personal reign of Christ here on earth, have assumed the responsibility of explaining the Judgeship of Christ in one way; those who reject that Advent and reign have taken the responsibility of teaching it quite differently. In view of our accountability in handling the Word, we shall endeavor carefully to base every step in our examination of this important matter upon that infallible Guide, and each one is required, as Luther so forcibly taught, to exercise the right of judgment in determining whether the Scriptures contain what we assert.

<sup>1</sup> It is painful to notice in reading history how the promises referring to the Judgeship of Christ have been even prostituted to the basest of purposes; men, and bodies of men, arrogating to themselves the prerogatives of Christ or His work. Thus to illustrate: How blasphemously Pizarro and his followers used the Scripture, "Arise, O Lord! and judge thine own cause," on the memorable Saturday, Nov. 16th, 1532, preparatory to the horrible massacre of Peruvians. Such extremes, unfortunately, are not rare.

Obs. 2. It seems to the writer that a simple striking fact, frequently repeated in the Scriptures, ought to be sufficient of itself to cause the student to reject the prevailing Popish notion of the Judgeship, or at least to induce him, if an advocate of it, to a renewed examination. It is this: the Prophets describe this Judgeship—the exercise of it—as a matter of congratulation and rejoicing, and not, as it would be if it only denoted judicial investigation of character, a subject of dread or apprehension. Thus e.g. Ps. 67 : 4, "O let the nations be glad, and sing for joy; for Thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth." Comp. Ps. 96 : 10–13; Ps. 98 : 5–9, etc. It is represented as a joyful event by the Spirit; one which will cause exultation and happiness, and this only becomes apparent if we understand it to embrace the reign, Kingdom of Jesus.

For the very best of men, assured of ultimate salvation, have reason to apprehend a judicial investigation lest, owing to sinfulness, unworthiness, neglect, etc., their reward, to say the least, be proportionally lessened. See how scripturally Bh. Heber has expressed himself in the familiar hymn "Lo He comes with clouds descending;" so also Charles Wesley, Baxter, and others. When the judgments of Christ are manifested, and (Ps. 68, etc.) "the wicked perish at the presence of God," then "let the righteous be glad; let them rejoice before God; yea, let them exceedingly rejoice."

Obs. 3. Jesus Christ is the Judge, Acts 17 : 31; Matt. 24 : 30; Rom. 14 : 9, 10; John 5 : 22; Acts 10 : 40; Matt. 25 : 31, etc. The question that we are to propose and answer is this: Are we to understand by this Judgeship that Christ only sits in a judicial capacity to determine cases; that as Judge He only presides in a tribunal of justice to decide respecting the innocence or guilt of men; or, is far more embraced in this term, such as judicial, legislative, and executive action, a supreme power, Kingly rule? If we take the Bible idea of Judge, instead of the restricted, more modern sense engrafted upon it, there is no difficulty in replying that the latter is intended. By reference to the Judges that God raised up to "judge Israel" (such as Gideon, Samson, Jephthah, Eli, Samuel, etc.), it is found that their office consisted in enforcing the Theocratic rule, in executing the laws, subduing enemies, punishing evildoers, and promoting the prosperity of the nation. They were rulers, ruling over the nation in order to advance its interests (Judges 2 : 16-19, etc.). When Moses judged the people he acted as a Ruler, making known and executing the laws of God ; and when he followed Jethro's advice to make other Judges, it is expressly said that he "made them heads over the people, rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens, and they judged the people," etc. (Ex. 18 : 14-26). Dr. Clarke, Com. Pref. to Judges, says : "The persons called Judges, 'shophetim,' were the heads or chiefs of the Israelites who governed the Hebrew Republic (Theocracy) from the days of Moses and Joshua till the time of Saul. The word Judge is not to be taken here in its usual signification, i.e. one who determines controversies and denounces the judgment of the law in criminal cases, but one who directs and rules a state or nation with Sovereign power, administers justice, makes peace or war, and leads the armies of the people over whom he presides." Horne (Introd., vol. 2, p. 42) says : "The authority of the Judges was not inferior to that which was afterward exercised by the Kings ; it extended to peace and war. They decided causes without appeal, but they had no power to enact new laws or to impose new burdens upon the people. They were protectors of the laws, defenders of religion, and avengers of crimes." The same idea is noticeable when the Jews requested a King, they called his ruling a judging. In 1 Sam. 8 : 5, 6, 20, "all the elders of Israel" said "make us a King to judge us." "We will have a king over us, that we also may be like other nations, and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles." Judgeship was therefore regarded as the equivalent of rulership, of kingly rule ; and how largely this idea is incorporated with Scripture will appear in the quotations that will follow. From the use of the word already stated, it is a just conclusion, drawn by the early Church and many eminent writers,<sup>1</sup> that when Jesus is represented to be revealed as the Judge, we are not to understand that He only presides as a Jurist to pronounce innocent or guilty, as the case may be, but that He rules in a princely manner, exercises a kingly office, is revealed as King of kings, Sovereign of the world, and that His Judgeship, being Theocratic, consists in exercising all the powers of a Supreme Governor, legislative and executive as well as judicial, so that the acts of His Judgeship shall be manifested in issuing His decrees, executing His laws, punishing offenders, rewarding the faithful, and carrying on the Divine Theocratic ordering of His Kingdom. In other words, the Judgeship is identical with the predicted reign of Christ, commencing with the Millennial era—an age inaugurated and carried on by the most astonishing manifestations of Sovereign power, judicial, legislative, and executive.

<sup>1</sup> He adds : "Officers with the same powers and nearly with the same name were established by the Tyrians in New Tyre. The Carthaginian Sufetes appear to have been the same as the Hebrew Shophetim ; as were also the Archons among the Athenians and the Dictators among the ancient Romans," etc. Kurtz, Sac. His., s. 64, obs. 3, after giving them through life judicial and magistratic power, allies them with the prophets, and adds : "They were prophets in action ; they, consequently, merely resemble in name, but not in other respects, the Sufetes of the Carthaginians and the Dikastai of the Tyrians." See Calmet, Kitto, Watson, En. Relig. Knowledge, Smith's Bib. Dic., M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop., Herzog, etc. Grotius compares the government of the Hebrews under the judges to that of Gaul, Germany, and Britain before the Romans changed it. Godwin, in his "Moses and Aaron," compares them to the Roman Dictators. Prof. Bush (Mill., p. 129), after referring to Scriptures which show that judging is equivalent to ruling, applies the same to the phrase in Rev. 20 : 4, "that by judgment being given to those that sat on thrones is meant that they received authority to reign and govern, or the right of exercising judgment according to the Hebrew sense of the word 'judge,' which is equivalent to that of reigning, or putting forth the judicial and executive acts of the governing power." So also Wines (Com. on the Laws, p. 538) remarks: "Upon the whole, there can be no reasonable doubt that, as the Lacedæmonians had their Kings, the Athenians their Archons, and the Romans their Consuls, so, according to the constitution of Moses, the Hebrews were to have their general judges or governors of the whole republic." Compare Michaelis (Com. on Laws, art. 53), who makes a similar declaration.

The student will notice that when Absalom (2 Sam. 15 : 4) conspired to become a king, he said, "Oh that I were made Judge in the land," etc.; that Paul (Acts 24 : 10) called the Governor Felix a Judge, and that Daniel (9 : 21) uses the phrase "our judges who judged us," to denote the magistrates, rulers, and kings of the nation.

As e.g. Mede, Bickersteth, Brookes, McNeile, Noel; in brief, nearly all Mill. writers have excellent remarks. Among these Dr. Seiss gives an admirable discourse, in Last Times, on the Judgment. D. N. Lord, Winthrop, Shimeall, Duffield, and others give clear conceptions of Judgeship, etc.

Obs. 4. To confirm this position there are numerous converging arguments. 1. It is linked with His Advent and His Kingdom, as in 2 Tim. 4 : 1, "who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing and His Kingdom." After His appearing is His Kingdom, and judging is connected with both. 2. The Coming of the Lord to judge is united with the Covenant and made synonymous with reigning, as in 1 Chron. 16 : 14-19 and 31-33. 3. The "judgment seat" of 2 Cor. 5 : 10, upon which Christ sits, is translated, Acts 12 : 21, "throne." And in comparing Scripture, it is found that when the Son of Man does this judging, He is represented as seated, not on the Father's throne, but His own throne—that is, the one He inherits in virtue of being David's Son. To indicate how the Spirit so accurately distinguishes between those thrones it is only necessary to consider Matt. 25 : 31, "He shall sit upon the throne of His glory," compared with Rev. 3 : 21, where the Father's throne in heaven is distinguished from "my throne"—a distinction made requisite by the Covenant to David. Whatever of Sovereignty may be displayed by the Divine on the Father's throne, we must bear in mind, as constantly essential, that as the throne covenanted to Jesus Christ belongs to Him as the Son of Man, those allusions to "My throne," "His throne," etc., have undoubted reference to His humanity, and therefore must be, in the nature of the case, understood as separate and distinct from the throne in the third heaven. The references must correspond with the covenant and predictions of the prophets. 4. Many prophetic passages unite this Judgeship with the general one of government, as Ps. 9 : 7, 8; Ps. 96 : 10, 13; Ps. 82 : 8, etc. So that, as a multitude of predictions of this kind evidence, reigning, ruling, governing, and judging are regarded as synonymes, so that all our concordances give as one of its distinctive meanings, "to rule, govern, or reign." 5. This judging, as our argument demands, is united with predictions of Christ's sitting upon David's throne. Thus e.g. Isa. 9 : 6, 7; Isa. 16 : 5; Jer. 33 : 15. The prophets plainly declare that when the revealed King, David's Son and Lord, re-establishes the covenanted throne and Kingdom, He is manifested as the Judge of Israel and of the nations. 6. This Judgeship is also united with the restoration of the Jewish nation, with which the Davidic throne is united, as e.g. Jer. 23 : 5-8, etc. 7. Saints are co-heirs with Jesus in this Judgeship, for they are to judge with Him on earth. But the passages explanatory of this Judgeship (comp. Prop. 154) represent it as equivalent to the possession of authority, rulership, or kingship. 8. There is no act ascribed to this Kingly office of Christ, but what is also identified with this Judgeship, both in Coming and Kingdom. In the delineation of the Mill. era, the latter forms a prominent feature of it. We give a few illustrations: When the majesty of God in Zion is declared, the gathering of His saints, and the issuing forth of a tempestuous fire is announced, Ps. 50, it is added: "He shall call to the heavens from above and to the earth, that He may judge His people"—i.e. re-enter that Theocratical predicted relationship—"and the heavens shall declare His righteousness, for God is Judge Himself." That this refers to Christ is evident from Micah 5 : 1, where Jesus is designated "the Judge of Israel," from the delegating of this judging to Him by the Father, from the Oneness of Father and Son, and from the same things being pointedly ascribed to the Son. In the light of this, many passages present a forcible meaning, as in Ps. 94, "O Lord God, to whom vengeance belongeth; O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, show Thyself. Lift up Thyself, Thou Judge of the earth." Reading on, we ascertain that this revelation of this Judge is desired, that the wicked may not triumph, that the righteous and the inheritance may be delivered, and that the throne of iniquity may be overthrown and His own be substituted. So in Ps. 7, where prayer is offered for deliverance from enemies, and a firm trust is expressed that God will arise and save the upright and punish the wicked, it is said: "the Lord shall judge the people," "God judgeth the righteous." And what this denotes is apparent from Ps. 9, for, after evincing the desire to praise and rejoice in God, the reason is assigned: "when mine enemies are turned back, they shall fall and perish at thy presence. For Thou hast maintained my right and my cause (i.e. the covenanted); Thou satest in the throne judging right." Notice, too, that this is done when the Psalmist is "lifted up from the gates of death (res.), that I may show forth all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion," etc. The student can readily find an abundance of such allusions, a rich golden vein in the prophetic mine. As e.g. in that class of Psalms (96, 97, 98, etc.) which begin with "the Lord reigneth," and then describe the exaltation of the saints, the utter removal of wickedness, etc., and generally incorporate or conclude with expressions referring to the Coming of the Lord "to judge the earth; with righteousness shall He judge the world, and the people with equity," etc. The same strain is found in Jer. 23 : 5-8; Isa. 30 : 18, 19, etc., so that, as ancient and modern writers have correctly observed, the Millennial descriptions either contain or are preceded or followed by representations of this Judgeship. His judicial power shall be especially exercised, when this age is to be ushered in, against the nations of the earth; His legislative, executive, and judicial power in the restoration of His own people and establishment of His Kingdom, in the complete subjugation of all nations to His supremacy, and in the binding of Satan; all the attributes of Judgeship will be exhibited in the administrations of His government in that era, so that all the righteous shall, as the Psalmist predicts, rejoice and be glad in His Judgeship; and at the close of this age the Judge's power will, in a striking manner, be manifested in the raising of the wicked dead, the confirming of their sentence, the final and eternal overthrow of all wickedness, and the continued everlasting security and blessedness of His people. 9. The word "judgment" is employed, as concordances show, to designate "the governing power of Christ," and in this light many passages become significant of the future rule of Christ, as e.g. Isa. 42 : 4; Ps. 76 : 9; Ps. 94 : 15, etc. This arises from the fact that "judgment" itself is derived from "determined"—this kingly office of Christ being covenanted, predetermined." 10. Christ is revealed as King and as Judge, the terms being convertible, at the time of the Pre-Millennial harvest. Compare the parable of Tares and Wheat with Rev. 14, Joel 3, Rev. 19, etc. 11. In Rev. 11, at the time (under last trumpet) the Sovereignty of the world is given to Christ, as part of His Kingly office, judging is announced. 12. A variety of additional reasons will be given under the judging of the saints, the Judgment Day, the Day of Christ, etc., so that we must conclude that the phrase "the Judge of Israel" is equivalent to "the King of Israel;" "the righteous Judge," to that of "the righteous King," or "a King shall reign in righteousness," to that of "He shall judge the world in righteousness."

<sup>1</sup> Storrs (Bible Examiner, Aug., 1862, p. 427, etc.) makes "the Judgment seat of Christ" equivalent to "the form of administering the government and laws ordained." This is correct (it being the Theocratic-Davidic ordering, etc.), but when he afterward makes it equivalent to "the word of Christ" by which (John 12 : 48) we are judged, he mistakes. That word, indeed, is included, but this judgment seat or throne includes far more, viz., the form of Theocratic government then instituted under the rulership of Jesus. The word previously spoken only qualifies or condemns for participation in this Kingdom of Christ. The idea connected with the judgment seat or throne is simply that of authoritative utterance and ordering.

<sup>2</sup> R. Maton (Israel's Redemp.), in reference to the Kingdom specifically promised to Jesus, says: "We may justly doubt whether our Saviour hath as yet executed the office of King." Admitting His rule in the Church, etc., he adds: "Yet, that He doeth not now reign in that Kingdom which He shall govern as man, and consequently in that of which the prophets spake, His own words in Rev. 3 : 21 do clearly prove: 'To him that overcometh I will grant to sit with me in my throne,' etc., from whence it follows that the throne which He here calls His own, and which He hath not yet received (Heb. 2 : 8, 10, 12, 13), must needs belong to Him as man; because the place where He now sits is the Father's throne, a throne in which He has no proper interest but as God. Again, it follows that seeing He is now in His Father's throne, therefore neither is this the time nor the place in which His own throne is to be erected." The critical student need not be reminded that in addition to this throne, which He inherits as David's Son, there is also the Theocratic relationship, which makes this throne the Father's as well as that of the Son, for it is God ruling in and through this Son. The Scriptures only distinguish between the general Divine Sovereignty over the universe and this special, particular rule here on earth. Comp. Props. 80, 81, 82, 84, and 85. Also Props. 199, 200, etc.

<sup>3</sup> This is indicated in Rom. 14 : 9, "to this end Christ both died and rose, and revived that He might be Lord (or exercise Lordship over both dead and living ones) both of the dead and living"—Luke using the same word, ch. 22 : 25, to denote the exercise of royal authority by Gentile kings. With this is to be united the idea presented by Gesenius: "The ideas of ruling and judgment are closely allied, not only in Oriental practice and policy, but also in their languages." Dr. Clarke, Com. on Lev. 26, remarks: "Judgments 'shaphatim' from 'shapat,' to distinguish, regulate, and determine—meaning those things that God has determined that men shall pursue," or that He Himself will execute.

Obs. 5. The modern usage of the words "Judge" and "Judgment" have misled many in comprehending this subject, so that some assert, as Priest, that they cannot see how the Millennial period and judgment can be blended. A reference to any concordance would explain the matter, for those words are used in a variety of ways, as in trying a cause, discerning, reckoning, as well as in ruling, governing, etc., and the meaning to be attached to the word in any particular case must be determined by the context, general analogy—in brief, by the laws controlling language, giving the preference in all cases to scriptural usage. Because "judge" is employed to designate judicial action, that is no reason for discarding the additional meanings attached to it by the Word of God. In this discussion it is sufficient to notice that Judgeship is ascribed to the Kingly, Sovereign power of God and of His Son, and that whatever of judgment there has been in the past or is going on now, or attends us at death, or at the resurrection, or in the Coming Kingdom, etc., it does not affect our line of argument, but confirms it, because all this is represented as an exertion of Divine Sovereignty. The question that we are to decide is not whether judicial action belongs to the station of a judge—this is admitted by all—but whether, when Christ is revealed as Judge, this Judgeship is not an equivalent to His Kingly rule. This we think is already conclusively proven, and therefore those writers who fail to discriminate in this particular make a serious mistake which materially concerns the interpretation of a large portion of Scripture. The Judgeship of Christ is not only perfectly consistent with the glory and blessedness of the Millennial period, but indispensably necessary to secure it. And in this connection it may be added, that the proof of Christ's Judgeship as given by Paul, viz., Acts 17 : 31, "whereof He hath given assurance unto all men in that He hath raised Him from the dead," is precisely the identical proof required by the covenant to show that David's Son is to reign as "the man ordained" in the immortal manner predicted. The duration of this Judgeship is of such a nature that it cannot be predicated of mortal man; whereas in His glorified humanity, never more subject to death, He is abundantly able to verify the promises relating to His Judgeship or Kingdom.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> There have been judgments in the past of Jewish and Gentile nations and individuals, judgments in acts of condemnation or of justification, judgments at death, and there will be judgments at the resurrection, at the translation, at the awarding of positions, etc., but all these of a judicial nature affecting nations or individuals, past or present, do not remove the extent of judgeship ascribed to Christ, and which is to be specifically exerted in His Coming Kingdom. The theories of national, individual, and believer's judgment, however they may be incorporated, do not lessen the force of this future specific judgeship of Jesus. Our argument is only concerned with the latter, and hence the view respecting the destiny of man being fixed in this life or in Hades, etc., does not alter the force of our reasoning.

<sup>2</sup> This enables us to appreciate the definitions that are usually given to the Day of Judgment. Thus, e.g. in the Relig. Encyc., Art. "Judgment" (Day of), it is asserted that this "is that important period which shall terminate the present dispensation of grace toward the fallen race of Adam, put an end to time," etc. This needs no special remark, seeing that it confines judging exclusively to judicial action, misconceives the object and tendency of judgment (which is to bless the race of Adam), and boldly limits time when the Scriptures extend it (comp. next Prop. and e.g. 140, 152, 159, etc.). This writer, however, presents a singular inconsistency that may be noticed : in the same art., Dan. 7 : 10, is quoted as then fulfilled, viz., at this limited Day of Judgment, but in sec. 3 the saints are carefully placed "not on earth, but forever in heaven," thus flatly contradicting Daniel's statements that after the books are opened, the judgment has set, etc., the Kingdom of the saints is here on the earth. The plainest predictions must bend before this Popish theory. This position of ours enables us with ease to refute the objections urged against our doctrine. Thus, e.g. Dr. Lindsay (Art. "Mill." in Ency. Brit.), entirely overlooking, or not understanding, our doctrine, asserts : "That, on the Millenarian hypothesis, there can be no judgment of the righteous whatever, for they, having been once admitted to reign with Christ can never after that be placed for trial at His bar." This objection is based on the supposition (unproven) that there is only one limited manifestation of judgment at the close of the Millennium. We prove, however, a Pre-Mill. Coming of the Judge, a Millennial judging, and a Post-Millennial judgment. It is Lindsay's theory that really produces the grave objection, viz., that saints that have been thousands of years reigning in heaven, etc., shall at the end of the Millennium be subjected to a judicial investigation. We have no long interval between the Advent and judging as he incorrectly ascribes to our doctrine, and hence his objections have no force against us. In reference to the judicial judgment of the saints, who are co-heirs with Christ, and the intermediate state, see Props. 135 and 136.

Obs. 6. The concessions made by writers when not directly opposing us are decidedly in our favor. Thus, to illustrate from a popular Commentator: Barnes, Com., is unwilling to admit that Christ's ruling with a rod of iron (judging), Rev. 19, denotes His Sovereign power exerted at His personal Coming. He refers it rather to providential movements, spiritual power, by which all things shall be subdued, etc. In Rev. 2 : 27, however, when coming to the same promise given to the saints, a difficulty presents itself, viz., that it would be unreasonable and against fact to ascribe such power now to the saints. He therefore correctly applies this ruling with a rod of iron to the period of the judgment. After showing that the phraseology denotes "a power that is firm and invincible," that "no power can oppose His rule," and that "the enemies of His government would be destroyed," he adds: "the speaker does not intimate when this will be, but all that is said here would be applicable to that time when the Son of God will come to judge the world, and when His saints will be associated with Him in His triumphs." Taking this admission given by an opponent, it follows that the Son of Man and the saints enter upon this ruling with a rod of iron personally at the beginning of the Millennium, for at that period the Spirit locates it in Rev. 19, and in Ps. 2 it is also associated with the manifestation of "the King" in Zion.

<sup>1</sup> Barnes, realizing that he was making a concession fatal to his own theory, endeavors to gloss it over by asserting that "the rewards promised refer to heaven," and then adds: "If so, then this passage should not be adduced as having any reference to an imaginary personal reign of the Saviour and of the saints on the earth." To this we reply: It cannot be referred to an imaginary ruling of the nations, breaking them in pieces, etc., in heaven, for (1) this ruling with a rod of iron, etc., is expressly located here on earth and not in heaven; (2) the nations broken, etc., are on the earth and not in heaven; (3) Jesus and the saints are represented (as e.g. Zech. 14) as being on earth and not in the third heaven when this work is accomplished; (4) he himself admits as much in the extract given, when applying it to the Sec. Advent, which takes place on earth; (5) that he added the gloss above, well knowing that his theory, in view of such an interpretation, required such bolstering to give it an appearance of consistency; (6) our doctrine requires no such vain support, being entirely dependent on the unmistakable analogy given by the Spirit. For the fact that the ruling with the rod of iron is stated to occur under the last trumpet, to precede the Millennium, etc., is amply sufficient for our faith, without our attempting, for the sake of opinion, to change the locality and time designated by the Spirit. The reader will notice, too, that Barnes's expression "the Son of God will come to judge the world," while true of Christ, is not the scriptural usage, as can be seen in Props. 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 89, etc.

Obs. 7. This judging is connected with the casting out of Satan. This might be argued from Rev. 19 with the following context, and the general tenor of Millennial descriptions indicating freedom from evil, etc., but we confine ourselves briefly to John 12 : 31. When Christ came to suffer and die under the provisions made for Redemption, He did not assume the character of Judge or King. Yet He says: "Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the Prince of this world be cast out," and this is stated in connection with His death, by which this would be brought about, and He (as David's Son), by the accompanying resurrection, would become the one of whom "we have heard out of the law that Christ abideth forever." Here the future is spoken of as present (Prop. 65, Obs. 9), His death being merely provisionary, for Jesus expressly declares in the same chapter that He came not to judge the world; down to the present time there has been no such judgment, and Satan has not yet been cast out. That a meaning is not forced out of the passage is evident from what Barnes, loci, says of it:

he referring its fulfilment to the Future Day of Judgment and explaining its reference to the death as follows: "Now is approaching the decisive scene, the eventful period—the crisis—when it shall be determined who shall rule this world." The reader, however, is reminded that this judgment and this casting out of Satan thus linked together, the Spirit informs us, is fulfilled at a Pre-Mill. Advent, when Satan himself is bound and confined. Then the Sovereignty, justly claimed by the Son in virtue of covenanted relationship and obedience unto a triumphant death, is publicly assumed. What the Spirit has thus joined together and located in fulfilment, it is daring for us to separate.

Obs. 8. It is no wonder that infidels treat this subject with scorn when it is handled, wildly and outrageously, by otherwise able Christian writers, such as e.g. Reuss. In Reuss's His. Ch. Theol. of the Apos. Age, he frankly admits that the Evangelists clearly teach the views that we entertain, such as the personal Coming of Christ, the idea of judging, saying of the latter, "the Apostles especially, as a recompense of their devotedness, shall sit as judges judging the twelve tribes of Israel, and then the Kingdom shall commence," etc. He emphatically declares that "these representations are clear and simple; they have nothing equivocal about them," etc. "It is evident that the narrators, who serve as our guides, took every word literally, and had not a shadow of doubt in reference to the matter." Then Reuss adds that, because of their Judaistic, Rabbinical correspondence, "grave doubts arise, and it seems impossible that Jesus should have repeated that which the most ordinary Rabbi had long preached in the synagogue." The result to which Reuss comes, after traducing the faith of the Evangelists and the sense grammatically expressed by Jesus, is to reject the plain "unequivocal" teaching, and search out and fasten upon it "a meaning different from that which at first suggests itself." This meaning he finds in death, resurrection, etc., opening a wide door for mystical applications, thus manufacturing a pliant mortar to daub over the promises; for he remarks under this meaning: "the seats of honor may well be dismissed from the dogmatic explanation of the Gospel prophecy," etc. In this total misapprehension of judgment he places Jesus above "the delusive imagination of the prophet," etc., not seeing that he is actually pulling down most precious material with one hand while endeavoring to build up inferior stuff with the other; that he is engaged in destroying the credibility of the narrators; in making Christ's language, knowing their views, an accommodation, deception, etc. If we understand the utterances of Jesus in their true grammatical relation, then, according to Reuss, He "seems here suddenly to give expression to the most visionary hopes as to the immediate future—hopes based not upon an estimate of the natural progress of events, but upon the wildest dreams of fanatic patriots among his countrymen. Do we really find, side by side, with predictions ratified by the event and signally proving the exactness of His knowledge of the future, an error so monstrous that the lie direct is given by history to the most solemn promise of the Saviour?" The "lie" is all in Reuss's imagination, and arises from his basing all fulfilment upon his own "estimate of the natural progress of events," and overlooking the postponement of the Kingdom. Leaving the discussion of the particular promise alluded to by him to the Prop. (154) on the Reign of the Saints, we may say that Christ will take care of the fulfilment of His promises respecting judging, and that His promises are not to be measured by past fulfilment, but left to the period indicated by the Spirit. Alas! how painful to meet such unbelief in such men—unbelief which, perhaps honestly intends to exalt Christ, but virtually condemns His language and belittles the faith of His followers. The whole theory of this class is this: we are not to understand the Word as it reads—if we do it leads to “Judaistic” notions—but we must “spiritualize the letter” and “idealize the picture of the coming age.” Spiritualizing even covenants, it causes no surprise to see the mystical results.

The student is reminded that, although our doctrine has been held by the Primitive Church and many eminent men, works devoted to systematic theology, and which profess to enter into details of opinion, never enter into a discussion of this Judgeship of Christ so as to include the Millenarian view. This omission is noticeable even in the most recent (as e.g. Hodge's), and this evident ignoring of it seems to indicate a fear to place it in juxtaposition to their own theory. To say the least, it is misleading to many of their readers. It is allowable to point out a serious inaccuracy into which so careful a writer as Hagenbach (His. of Doc.) has fallen. In sec. 77, speaking of “the general judgment,” he writes just as if all believers from A.D. 70 to A.D. 254 held to it in a modern sense. An uninformed reader would be left by this statement under a wrong, unhistorical impression. The fact is just the reverse—the immense majority believed in the manner of judgment as delineated by us in this and following propositions. These are only specimens of the injustice done to our view in professed scholarly exhibitions of doctrine, sometimes the result of misinformation, and sometimes that of prejudice.

PROPOSITION 133. This view of the Kingdom is confirmed by "the Day of Judgment."

If the monkish view of the day of judgment, now so prevalent even among Protestants, is correct, then it follows that, it being deemed the period of the winding up, or ending, of all sublunary things, no place can be found for such a Kingdom after it. But, on the other hand, if it can be conclusively shown that this day of judgment is connected with, enters into, and follows through the Millennial era, then it materially aids in supporting our view of the Covenanted Kingdom. That it does this is already evidenced by preceding Propositions, but the Spirit affords us in the Word additional reasons to sustain our belief.

Obs. 1. Again the reader is reminded that the Jewish and Early Church doctrine of the Judgment Day is something very different from the Popish doctrine now so generally entertained. The notion of an assize, a universal gathering of dead and living, pious and wicked, before a tribunal at which character is to be tested, etc., was developed in the Church several centuries later, in the form now held by many writers. On all sides are to be found utterances concerning the judgment utterly unknown, and completely antagonistic to the doctrine once held by the Church. The modern writers, with here and there an exception, express the same hostility to the ancient view. Take a recent author, Dr. Bascom, in his Sermons, 1 series, sec. 11, "The Judgment," most eloquently indorses the Popish view, calling it "a day concluding the world's existence," "a day which shall wrap the universe of man in writhing distortions and dash to pieces the structure of nature," etc., and adding: "This day terminates alike the dispensations and dealings of heaven in relation to our fallen planet." Such quotations might almost be indefinitely multiplied, as evidence of the widespread and falsely extravagant representations of the Word of God on this point; but they are not needed, as every reader must be more or less acquainted with their sad existence.

Obs. 2. Our views (Millenarian) respecting judgment are almost invariably misrepresented (with some honorable exceptions, as Barnes, Brown, Fairbairn) by our opposers; and in no work specially written against us is exhibited a candid statement of our scriptural position.<sup>1</sup> Some writers, as one in Presby. Quarterly Review, 1853, so pervert our doctrine as to make it imply that we hold Rev. 20 : 11-15 to precede the Mill. age, which no one does. In a recent commentary, only so much, and that incidental, of our argument is given that the writer felt able to refute, while the leading reasons presented by us were totally ignored. Even so ignorant (will not say designedly) are some writers that our doctrine of the Judgment is classed with that of the Millerites, when the fact is that the Millerite doctrine on the subject is identical with their own, and bears no resemblance whatever to ours. Another class of writers, more insidious, attack our doctrine under a professed harmony, which is a mere jumbling together of passages, without discriminating between the time of their fulfilment.<sup>2</sup> The truth is, that in looking over a large number of works opposed to us, not one (unless Dr. Brown's of Glasgow can be called an exception, which it is not) takes up our Scriptural reasons given and endeavors to show that these Scriptures are to be understood differently, as e.g. that our view of the Judgeship of Christ, of the Judgment Day, and of their connection with the Millennium, is erroneous. Instead of a comparison of Scripture, and founding an opinion on the mind of the Spirit as thus presented, the proof alleged is entirely inferential and indirect. Thus, to illustrate: Steele (Essay on Ch. Kingdom, Bib. Sac. Nov. 1849), Brown (Ch. Sec. Coming), Beattie (Dis. on Mill. State), Waldegrave (Lec. on N. T. Mill.), Barnes (Com.), etc., all without exception take it for granted (without meeting and answering our arguments concerning the passages quoted), that e.g. Matt. 25 (and Scriptures which simply allege the Coming of Christ to judgment and which affirm that all men shall be judged without assigning the order or time), must necessarily mean to judicially judge "all mankind," "the entire race," at the same time, so that "the whole number of the saved and the whole number of the lost, in two vast assemblies, meets our eyes," "the generations of men cease," etc. Leaving the reader to consult Mill. authors who have reviewed those works in detail (as Lord's Lit. and Theol. Journal, etc.), for a minute consideration of each passage assigned, it is only requisite to give an illustration of this mode of handling the Word of God, seeing that the main objection urged by them (viz., that all the righteous and all the wicked will be judged together at the same time) is fully answered by our adopted line of argument. In illustration we select 2 Cor. 5 : 9-21 : "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one," etc. Now it is affirmed that this teaching, that "all appear," etc., it includes all at the same time. But this is not contained in the passage; and this Scripture itself must be interpreted in the light of others. To put on the words "all" "every one" an emphasis to include the time, if applied to other Scripture, would be absurd, as e.g. 1 Cor. 15 : 22, etc.* All shall appear before His Throne (judgment seat is translated throne, Acts 12 : 21), but at different periods, as e.g. before the Mill. age and at its close—(we leave the proof in our regular order of argument). Without discussing what critics tell us the words here denote, implying not merely a standing, etc., before the throne, but a being manifested to receive the stations, positions, rewards, proportionate to their deeds, etc., the attention of our opponents is called to a certain weakness in their argument. They frequently censure us for bringing the saints back before this very throne to receive stations of honor, kingship, and priesthood, that they may reign, pronouncing it derogatory, degrading, etc., after the honor, bliss, and glory enjoyed. They evidently forget this objection, when they bring those same saints before this same throne to undergo a judicial investigation. Our view surely entails nothing so derogatory upon them, for the very fact of the resurrection of the saints, thus counted worthy of it, and the non-resurrection of the wicked at the time of the first resurrection, counted unworthy of it, proves to us a pre-existing judgment. Our opponents have much to say, and truthfully, that the condition of the individual is determined, in some way even at death, and that his future destiny is shaped by the moral character then sustained, and that this must be the result of judgment exercised. If so, the question arises, Why subject these same parties—especially taking Brown's, Barnes's, etc. idea that the saints have been, many of them for centuries upon centuries, in the third heaven enjoying a development of glory indescribable, etc.—to be brought before a tribunal to undergo a scrutiny of character? This difficulty and others vanish only if we allow the legitimate meaning given to the original by commentators, which involves our idea, that the saints are manifested before that throne to be assigned their position as rulers in the Kingdom, which apportionment is only done at the manifestation of the Kingdom itself, and is proportioned to the deeds done in the body. Such a manifestation is one that we are led to expect. If the objection is raised that Paul included in the word "all" also the wicked, it can be readily granted, for they too at a certain period shall have their final condition awarded by Him who sits on that throne. If it can be shown that all are judged, whether at one time or at different times, the affirmation of the passage is amply sustained. All are raised from the dead, but each in his own order; so also all shall stand before His throne, but each in his order.

<sup>1</sup> Every writer, without exception, opposed to us, conceals as much as possible our scriptural argument—based on the meaning of Judge, Judgment-day, etc. A reader of such works alone could not possibly obtain a correct idea of our scriptural proof. Many such opposers totally ignore our scriptural reasons, as if they did not exist, and ascribe to us views that we do not entertain. Alas! when controversy is so one-sided that it will not properly notice the arguments and reasons of opposers. Many works, as the candid student must allow, present a mere caricature of our doctrine. This lack of candor is evidence of weakness.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Keith, who has given us many admirable things relating to prophecy, presents us a very unsatisfactory chapter (15) on "the judgment of the dead" (also on resurrection) in his Harmony of Prophecy. It is one thing to string together passages which may in some respects have a resemblance in phraseology, and it is quite another to prove that they are correctly taken, and relate to the same event or time. This is readily seen by his quoting things that precede the Mill. age, and linking them with things that follow that age, and then pronounce them as identical; and it is also seen in his refusing to quote in the same connection passages which would conflict with the conclusion that he desires to arrive at as e.g. "the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were ended," etc. The Harmony is, after all, Dr. Keith's and not divine; evincing an ignoring of judgeship previous to, during, and at the close of the Mill. day. Surely, the passages referring to judgment preceding the Millennium cannot without unwarranted license and violence be located at its close. Indebted as we may be to the author for valuable suggestions, it is simply duty to protest against so misleading a perversion.

Obs. 3. The Judgment Day is inseparably linked with the personal presence of the Judge, and therefore, as we proceed, it is unnecessary to repeat what all admit. It is very essential to our doctrine to find the judgment united with the Coming of the Son of Man. Mede (Works, B. 3, p. 762) long ago observed<sup>1</sup> that Dan. 7 contains "The mother text of Scripture, whence the Jews grounded the name and expectation of the Great Day of Judgment." In following Propositions the Jewish view of "the Day of Judgment" and "the Day of the Great Judgment," will be given, including and associated with the personal coming of the Messiah and of "His day." Is it not singular, to say the least, that if the Jews were mistaken in identifying the Day of Judgment with the Coming of the Son of Man in Daniel, and with the reign of the Messiah, that Jesus and the Apostles, by adopting and using the very phraseology current among the Jews, should thus confirm the Jewish usage of the phrases? Our opposers, as Stuart, Barnes, etc., concede that in the N. T. the phrases "the Day of Judgment," "the Judgment of the Great Day," embraces this personal Coming of the Messiah; and this concession, as far as it goes, is important, and may well cause us to ask, Does it not include much more, even the association with the reign of David's Son during the blessed Mill. period described by the prophets and believed in by the Jews? The facts (1) that the phrases originated with Jewish believers, and (2) that they are employed without the least intimation that they are to be understood differently, certainly ought to have some weight with the student.

<sup>1</sup> Mede's argument is the following: "The Kingdom of the Son of Man and the saints of the Most High, in Daniel, begins when the Great Judgment sits. The Kingdom in the Apocalypse, wherein the saints reign with Christ a thousand years, is the same with the Kingdom of the Son of Man and the saints of the Most High in Daniel. Ergo, it also begins at the Great Judgment." After fortifying this by various reasons, he thus concludes: "Now, if this be sufficiently proved, that the one thousand years begin with the Day of Judgment, it will appear further out of the Apocalypse, that the Judgment is not consummate till they be ended; for Gog and Magog's destruction and the universal resurrection are not till then, therefore the whole thousand years are included in the Day of Judgment." "Hence it will follow, that whatsoever Scripture speaks of a Kingdom of Christ to be at His second appearing or at the destruction of Antichrist, it must needs be the same which Daniel saw should be at that time, and so, consequently, be the Kingdom of a thousand years, which the Apocalypse includes between the beginning and consummation of the Great Judgment. Ergo, That in Luke 17, from v. 20 to the end. And that in Luke 19 : 11-15 inclusively. And that in Luke 21 : 31. And that in 2 Tim. 4 : 1." "By these we may understand the rest, taking this for sure ground, that this expression of the 'Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven' so often inculcated in the New Test., is taken from, and hath reference to, the prophecy of Daniel, being nowhere else found in the Old Test." (Works, b. 4., epis. 15).

Obs. 4. The Judgment Day is designated, Acts 17 : 31, "He hath appointed a day wherein He will judge the world in righteousness," etc.<sup>1</sup> By this is evidently meant that a fixed, determined time has been set apart, which, by way of eminence, is called "the Day of Judgment," in which Christ shall be revealed as the Judge. It is variously presented, as in Rom. 2 : 16; 1 Thess. 5 : 2; 1 Cor. 1 : 8, etc. It is called "a day," which in the largeness of prophecy does not indicate an ordinary day, or even a brief period of time, but may include a long, extended time. The word is employed to denote time indefinitely, as "the day of trouble," "the day of adversity," "the day of prosperity," etc. Again, it is used to designate definite periods, either short or long, as e.g. the six days of creation are called "day" Gen. 2 : 4; the forty years in the wilderness are named, Heb. 3 : 8; Ps. 95 : 8, "the day of temptation;" the times of the Messiah are called by the prophets "that day," "the day of the Lord," as Isa. 24 : 25, 26; Zech. 14, etc.; "the day of salvation," 2 Cor. 6 : 2, "the day," Heb. 3 : 7, 13; Ps. 118 : 24, etc., are admitted to embrace an entire dispensation. It is well known that prophecy speaks of events occurring "in that day," which the fulfilment shows occupied hundreds of years in fulfilling. Reference might be made to other passages, such as John 8 : 56;

1 Cor. 5 : 5 ; Deut. 33 : 12, etc., all showing this usage by the Spirit. Therefore, in approaching a subject like this, the student's attention should at once be directed to the applicability of this feature to the Day of Judgment, especially since it was thus understood by the pious Jews.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Some (as Universalists, Swedenborgians, etc.) are anxious to make out that this refers to the present dispensation, saying that the word "appointed" means "to establish, ratify, confirm," etc. But this view is opposed to the decided opinion of eminent lexicographers, Schleusner, Bretschneider, etc., who render it "to appoint or fix beforehand, to ordain," etc. Even if the attempted meaning would be substituted, it would not materially modify the idea, for then it would indicate that God has already ratified, confirmed, or established this day, predicted by the prophets, by raising Jesus Christ from the dead and by the bestowal of the power of judgment. Then a great future event would, in view of its certainty and the preparation made in its behalf, be spoken of as present. For a specimen of spiritualizing and application to the present, see Art. "Agapemone, or Abode of Love," in Appleton's Cyclop. Swedenborgians (as e.g. Noble's Appeal) hold that "the last Judgment" has taken place in the spiritual world in the year 1757, and Swedenborg (Works "On the Last Judgment") asserts that "it has been granted me to see with my own eyes that the last judgment is now accomplished." But misled by the ecclesiastical term "last judgment," he forgets in his alleged seeing to weave into his vision the necessary adjuncts, forerunners and accompaniments pertaining to judgment as delineated by Scripture. Pressense (The Early Days of Christianity, p. 286, foot-note) incorrectly affirms : "The judgment is called parousia, 1 Thess. 2 : 19 ; see 2 Tim. 4 : 1, where it is said that Christ will judge the quick and dead at His appearing." The parousia introduces the judgment and many other things, including the Kingdom, and is never called the judgment, as Popish and some Protestant theology take for granted.

<sup>2</sup> Even so, as various authors have noticed, the Spirit employs the word "hour" to denote extended time, and our translators have rendered it "season" and "time" as in John 5 : 35 ; 2 Cor. 8 : 8 ; Philem. 5 : 15 ; 1 John 2 : 18. Comp. Abdiel's Essays, p. 83, and Sirr's First Res., p. 74, etc. Sirr notices how the Scriptures speak of "a day of judgment" and of "the day of judgment," and presents some interesting remarks. Augustine (City of God, b. 20, c. 1) long ago said : "No one who reads the Scriptures, however negligently, need be told that in their 'day' is customarily used for 'time.'" Oosterzee (Ch. Dog., vol. 2, p. 798) gives the Millenarian, ancient, and modern view, when, after specifying the Pre-Millennial Sec. Advent, he remarks : "The whole Dispensation, which now begins, is a Dispensation of Judgment ; and if this dispensation is spoken of as a day," it is self-evident that here a prophetic day (Ps. 90 : 4 ; 2 Pet. 3 : 8) is to be "thought of, a day of undefined duration." The reader will find additional reasons for our position under Props. 134, 137, 138, 139 and 140. Lange (Com. on "Parable of the Net") says : "From the circumstance that those to whom the process of separation is intrusted, are said to sit down on the shore and to gather out the good, we infer that the day of judgment will be a season of judgment, or an æon (age) in the appearing of Christ." In the "Bremen Lectures" (p. 244), Lange writes of "the One Day which is as great as one thousand years." Richter's Erlearte Haus Bibel, tom. 6, p. 1134, says : "The Universal Judgment begins with the return of Christ, and continues during the one thousand years, until the Lord proclaims the final decision. There are, therefore, not two Universal Judgments, one before and one after the one thousand years' Kingdom, but the whole is one Universal Judgment." Many such references from commentators and others might be quoted, but these illustrations will suffice. One other, given by Dr. Craven in his excellent paper on "The Judgment" (read before "The Proph. Convention"), may be profitably repeated, since it shows that our opponents fully concede the force of our reasoning. Prof. Dr. Glasgow (The Apoc. Transl. and Explained, pp. 511 and 514) receives Mede's interpretation making the judgment a thousand years. Speaking of the Judgment Day, he says : "Now in the text (Rev. 20 : 12) there is nothing said whatever of the length of time to be occupied ; but popular thinkers, with a presumption equal to their ignorance—a sinful presumption—fix it down to a human day of twenty-four or twelve hours. Learned theologians, expositors, and enlightened preachers are more cautious. Of these, I cannot find one (and I have searched libraries) making the time a human day or any brief human period." "There seems much more rationality in the interpretation given by Mede, that the time of judgment is a thousand human years, than in that of those who, without a shred of scriptural authority, restrict it to a human day, or some such little space of secular time. 'One day,' says Peter, 'is with the Lord as a thousand years.'

Whitby quibbles idly about the word 'as.' The very minimum of meaning that can be taken from this is, that a day in God's reckoning of His own works is as a thousand years of human reckoning." He appeals to the scriptural usage of "day," and adds: "The other terms—a season, a harvest, etc.—render a human day impossible, and it appears equally impossible when we consider the work and the means." Surely, such statements, from such a source, ought to have weight.

Obs. 5. The scholastic or eccles. terms "the Last Judgment," Dr. Knapp (Ch. Theol., p. 542) frankly says is not employed in the New Test., and that the phrases "the last day" or "last days" are not "used exclusively with reference to the end of the world. They often designate merely the future, coming days—e.g. 2 Tim. 3 : 1 ; 2 Pet. 3 : 3. They sometimes also denote the last period of the world, or, the times of the Messiah, e.g. Heb. 1 : 2 ; 1 Pet. 1 : 20," etc. Such concessions could be multiplied, but are unnecessary. The Jewish and Early Church view is abundantly sustained by the opinions of eminent writers of various classes. To illustrate: John Wesley, Ser. on Rom. 14 : 10 (Works), says: "The time termed by the Prophet 'the great and terrible day' is usually in Scripture styled the Day of the Lord. The space from the creation of man upon the earth, to the end of all things, is the day of the sons of men; the time that is now passing over us is properly our day; when this is ended, the day of the Lord will begin. But who can say how long it will continue? 'With the Lord one day is a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day,' 2 Pet. 3 : 8. And from this very expression, some of the ancient fathers drew that inference, that, what is commonly called the Day of Judgment would indeed be a thousand years; and it seems they did not go beyond the truth; nay, probably they did not come up to it," etc. He affirms that what is done at the Judgment Day could not possibly be confined to less than a thousand years. Bh. Newton (Diss. on Proph., vol. 2, p. 377), speaking of the Seventh Millenary, remarks: "According to tradition too, these thousand years of the reign of Christ and the saints are 'the great Day of Judgment;' in the morning or beginning whereof shall be the coming of Christ in flaming fire, and the particular judgment of Antichrist and the first resurrection; and in the evening or conclusion whereof shall be the general resurrection of the dead." Now let us proceed to ascertain the correctness of such inferences, and see whether they are not abundantly sustained by the direct testimony of the Word.

Obs. 6. Peter certainly knew the Jewish view of the Messiah's Judgeship, the Day of Judgment, etc., and yet he in the plainest possible manner confirms the truthfulness of it. In 2 Pet. 3 : 7, 8 he introduces the Coming of the Saviour and the reservation of the heavens and earth unto fire "against the Day of Judgment and the perdition of ungodly men," and then adds: "But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day." Having just mentioned "the Day of Judgment," he guards the expression by the words following, lest it should be limited to a short period, or even to a literal day. Foreseeing, by the Spirit, this very error into which multitudes have fallen, he cautions us that this "day" of which he writes, may include, at least, a thousand years. The expression quoted, in its twofold application to time, certainly conveys the idea that we are not to limit its duration to a brief period; and when the same Spirit includes, in what the Prophets call "the day," the thousand years of Rev. 20, then the amplitude of "the day" is verified. In accord with this, in Heb. 4 : 1-11, the great Sabbatism, the Rest or Sabbath day remaining for God's children, is called "a day." And in Rom. 13 : 12 it is said, "the night is far spent, the day is at hand," in which the nature of the two ages is described, the one of trial and the other of light and glory; and the duration of time is embraced, the night being this dispensation, and the day the coming age or dispensation.<sup>2</sup> Now if we turn to the Prophets they with one accord term "the day," "His day," "that day," etc., the very period of time in which the Lord comes to judge or reign—to inflict judgments on the nations as well as to sit as "the Judge of Israel"—the entire Millennial era being thus designated.<sup>3</sup> From all this, we are fully warranted to conclude that "the Day of Judgment" simply denotes a time of judgment, and embraces within its limits the Millennium, a long period of time. This is corroborated by the Judgeship of Christ being equivalent to His Kingly rule; by the Millennial era being frequently designated "the day" in which the Judgeship of Christ is to be manifested; by the acts of the King at the commencement, duration, and close of the period, and by the reasons assigned in the Propositions following.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This subject is so fruitful that we add another testimony: Joseph Mede, whom our opponents, as Prof. Bush, pronounce to be "one of the profoundest biblical scholars of the English Church," says: "It is to be remembered that the Jews, who gave to this time the title of Day of Judgment and from whom our Saviour and the apostles took it, never understood thereby anything but a time of many years' continuance." See Rabbinical references given by Wetstein, loci. Lederer (Nathaniel, Jan., 1871) shows that the Jews entertained the doctrine of a coming day of judgment, and that Paul and the New Test. incorporated the idea, it being taught in the Old Test., from whence they derived it. This was done in opposition to a view entertained by some (in Mishna) of an annular judgment, which last, as other Rabbis asserted, was not to be found in the Old Test.

<sup>2</sup> Commentators generally admit this distinction of time; so e.g. even Barnes loci, when he makes the night the time under the Gospel and the day "the glory of redemption in heaven," etc. The reader may notice how such an admission of "the night" is directly opposed to his theory of the Millennium, for that, too, then would be "night." In Ps. 89 : 4 (Sep.) and Ps. 90 : 4, a thousand years are represented as a watch in the night, and if we take that view of time given by the Holy Spirit, we may well call the entire period of the world's existence, from the curse down, the night (comp. Prop. 139).

<sup>3</sup> Take, e.g. Isa. 2 : 12, and Alexander, Com. loci, renders it "an appointed time for the manifestation of His (Jehovah's) power." So Cooc., Jun., J. D. Mich. "has it appointed" or as Hitzig "hold a day," or as Gesenius, "hold a judgment day." The student will observe the connection, "the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day," not for a brief period, certainly.

<sup>4</sup> It is interesting to note how Mede (Works, B. 3, p. 611) paraphrases 2 Pet. 3 : 8 : "But whereas I mentioned the day of judgment, lest ye might mistake it for a short day or a day of few hours, I would not, beloved, have you ignorant that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day." Then remarking that the style and sentiment is that of the Jewish doctors, he adds: "The words are commonly taken as an argument why God should not be thought slack in His promise (which follows in the next verse), but the first Fathers took it otherwise, and besides it proves it not. For the question is not whether the time be long or short in respect of God, but whether it be long or short in respect of us, otherwise not only a thousand years but an hundred thousand years are in the eyes of God no more than one day is to us, and so it would not seem long to God if the day of judgment would be deferred till then," etc.

Obs. 7. A few additional illustrations may be in place to strengthen our position, and to show the general analogy of Scripture. In Zech. 14, in

“the day” that the Lord and His saints come, when His judgments are poured out upon the nations, and Christ is “King over all the earth,” the phrase “in that day” includes not only the entire age, but the acts of Christ preceding and during its continuance, the overthrow of His enemies, the deliverance of His people, and the reign with its results. Joel 3 informs us that “in the day of the Lord” the nations shall be gathered, the mighty ones come down, the nations are to be judged, the people of God to be delivered, Jerusalem to be exalted, etc. The revelation of Christ as Judge embraces both wrath and mercy—wrath to His enemies, mercy to His saints and Jewish nation, and through them to the spared of the nations. This period of time, called “the day of the Lord,” which the Spirit afterward (as we shall show) more specifically names “the day of the Lord Jesus Christ,” embraces this Judgeship, exhibiting in its acts not merely the exercise of judicial power, but all the attributes of a Sovereign. Zeph. 3 designates “the day” when the Lord shall “rise up to the prey,” when He shall “gather the nations” to pour upon them His anger. “In that day” His “holy mountain” shall be established; “the remnant of Israel” shall be restored and become holy; “the King of Israel, even the Lord, shall be in the midst of thee;” and blessedness and glory are promised “at that time” and “in that day,” such as we find alone in Millennial predictions. Thus the Spirit joins together the Judging and the Day; and we do not feel at liberty to disconnect what is thus united. Finding Jesus revealed as the Judge at the period of the harvest (which is proven to be Pre-Mill.); at the time the last (seventh) trumpet sounds (which is also Pre-Mill.); at the time His Kingdom also comes; at the time His enemies are to be destroyed and His people enjoy a glorious deliverance, etc.; and when we find that to this Judgeship is ascribed the blessedness of that Kingdom and dominion which is to follow; that that Judgeship is described as continuously exercised; that the period of time in which it is exerted is designated according to prophetic usage “the day,” etc.—it is simply to be incredulous and illogical to ascribe to “the Day of Judgment” the ordinary Popish view. We are forbidden to limit and degrade it in this manner, seeing that the results of a continued judging are witnessed in the glory of the Millennium; that the most triumphant (however terrible to the wicked) declarations respecting it, as the means by which all evil shall be rooted out and happiness be restored, are given; that it is the instrumentality by which all the events, so tremendous to the ungodly and so blessed to the righteous, shall be accomplished. This imparts to it a higher, nobler aspect, befitting the descriptions of it, than that of the opposite, prevailing view. In this day the kingly power of Christ is exerted, not in a day of assize, apprehension, terror, awful solemnity arising from mere judicial investigation of character, but in behalf of His own people. This is the testimony of the Prophets, that this day comes for deliverance, for glorious redemption. It is true, that in it the enemies of God shall perish (hence fearful to them), but it is equally true that in it God’s people shall be delivered from those enemies, and be rewarded with peace, joy, etc. In brief, this judgment day or period manifests the Divine Rule of David’s Son and Lord, on David’s throne, and the judgment or rule bestowed upon the saints of the Most High. The Spirit thus gives a sublimity to the administrations of the Judge and of the Judgment Day, making it an object of desire and hope to the righteous, meeting and verifying the predictions concerning it, and binding the promises of God identified with it in a con- sistent, harmonious union. Our faith accepts of the simple fact that the government in this Coming Kingdom of King Jesus and His saints, which is to subject all to the predicted Theocratic rule and dominion, is designated as "the judgment," and the period of its exercise is called "the day," the time, etc. Our faith too receives the additional fact, that it is a covenanted, "appointed" period in which David's Son is to exhibit both His majesty and power. It is promised to Him as David's Son, as Son of Man, and if we desire to know when it will occur, what events will transpire, what results will be worked out, what its duration is, etc., we have only to open the Prophets who predict and describe it, without largely drawing on monkish imagination or old paintings to make out a picture of it. The announcement comes to us in the simplest form, that a period of time is appointed in which Jesus will be revealed as the Judge, the King, assume the visible Judgeship or Rulership of the World, and the events connected therewith, such as the resurrection of the saints, the overthrow of enemies, the restoration of the Jewish nation, the subjugation of all people, the binding of Satan, the rewarding of the righteous, the fulfilment of Mill. predictions, etc., indicate a lengthy period. To this opinion the Early Church, which received its interpretation of the prophets from inspired men, bowed, and we find abundant reasons for doing the same, and thus remaining in "the old paths." It is a precious truth that Christ judges for purposes of Redemption, and that the Judgment Day embraces Redemption in its highest form.

This enables us to appreciate the reason why the early Church so earnestly and gladly looked for "the Day of Judgment," as a means of release from all evil, and of exaltation in power. Thus e.g. Archb. Tillotson (Ser. on "The Day of Judgment," Mark 13 : 32, 33) notices that the early Christians constantly looked for it, insisted upon a continued preparation for it, in order that blessed deliverance might be experienced. Their views of Christ's judging, the Apostles' judging, the saints' judging, and of the day or time of judgment, necessarily made it an object of delightful faith and hope, and they could literally receive and say, Ps. 96 : 10-13 ; 67 : 4, and 98 : 4-9. Alas! how perverted has all this become under the vain substitutions of men. (Comp. e.g. 2 Pet. 3 : 12.)

In conclusion, it may be well to reply to an objection urged by Dr. Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., p. 267) as follows : "At what part of the great Judgment Day do the myriads of mankind who live during the Millennium come in to be judged? Nowhere. They were not in being to be included in the acts of the morning, and share in the resurrection-glory then awarded. The mid-day acts of government and rule are no judicial trial of and decision upon their personal character for eternity ; and the closing act of all, at the end of the Millennium, which is the evening of the day, cannot take them in—the saints among them at least—for it is a judgment of the wicked only. The scheme, in fact, makes no provision for their being judged at all." The doctor evidently overlooked the opinion of many Pre-Millenarians expressed in their works, and of those quoted by himself. If nothing were intimated in the Scriptures whatever on the subject, it would have no weight in deciding the question respecting such judgment, for the simple reason that we anticipate entering a new dispensation, in which there will be an expression given of the Divine Will (see Prop. 167) on many points now either obscure or not broached. But we have sufficient intimations, finding judicial judgment in the Mill. age, and every Millenarian nearly speaks of it as found e.g. in Isa. 65 ; Zech. 14 ; Isa. 60, etc. Then again we have judicial judgments inflicted at the end of the little season, Rev. 20. Then again, as stated in the conclusion of Rev. 20, we have a general raising of the dead, including those who died in the Mill. age, embracing the righteous and wicked, with the exception (as we have shown) of those who may have been translated without death, for it is the expressed view of Millenarians that such translations will be far more extensive in this incoming dispensation than in preceding ones (and this necessarily includes judicial judgment). Such an objection could not be urged if the objector would observe the nature of the Kingdom introduced, the Theocratic form, which, of necessity includes in its ordering and practical form not only the legislative and the executive, but likewise judicial action.

Lange, Com. Rev., 20 : 4, 5, expresses himself thus : " In general, however, the entire æon is to be conceived of as an æon of separations and eliminations in an ethical and a cosmical sense, separations and eliminations such as are necessary to make manifest and to complete the ideal regulations of life. Of judgments of damnation between the judgment upon Antichrist and the judgment upon Satan, there can be no question ; the reference (i.e. to judgment) can be only to a critical government and management, preparatory to the final consummation. The whole æon is a crisis which occasions the visible appearance of the Heaven on earth ; the whole æon is the great Last Day."

PROPOSITION 134. Our view of Judgment (and as a consequence that also of the Kingdom) is fully sustained by the passage of Scripture, Matt. 25 : 31-46.

This passage, employed by our opponents to prove a general, universal assize (the Popish view), is supposed to be the strongest, and wholly incontrovertible. Our argument, therefore, would be incomplete, if we did not bestow upon it special attention, and conclusively show that it forms an irresistible evidence in our favor. Let us take this very Scripture (so much relied on, as hostile to our doctrine) and compare it with other passages referring to God's revealed purposes at the same period of time, and it will be found in complete harmony with our teaching. To avoid misapprehension, it may be proper to repeat that our doctrine firmly accepts of the truth that all men are to be judged, and that their eternal condition (saving that of the heathen) will depend on their acceptance or rejection of the commands of God in Christ (and their personal application), but we reassert that such a judgment is not necessarily simultaneous, for part of it is Pre-Millennial, part Millennial, and part Post-Millennial. Pre-Millennial, as it affects the righteous, the overthrow of the living wicked, and the carrying into postponement the non-resurrection of the wicked dead until the close of the one thousand years; Millennial, as it affects the establishment of the Kingdom, the restoration of the Jews, the apportioning of positions, the execution and progress of the divine government; Post-Millennial, when "the rest of the dead," and Satan himself, are judged.

Some announce this passage to self-evidently teach a great "Day of Assize," "a Judicial Day of Judgment," in which all that ever lived on earth down to the Sec. Advent (so e.g. Edwards's His. Redemp., and others) are brought before Jesus Christ (who acts in the capacity of a jurist) to be tried, either to be justified or condemned, and their destiny for eternity to be determined. But if so self-evident they overlook the historical fact that for several centuries it received an interpretation exceedingly antagonistic to this claimed obvious opinion. The Primitive Millenarianism (Props. 71-75) never entertained such an inconsistent view, and it was only in opposition to its direct teaching that the prevailing notion respecting it arose. Some recent commentators profess to give the Pre-Millenarian interpretation, but very carefully leave out our main, leading reasons for applying it as we do, and then, with this mutilation before them, undertake its refutation!

We have called this a "Popish view." We give a recent Roman Catholic interpretation: Dr. Rutter, in his Life of Jesus, ch. 126, affirms that the Son of Man shall "sit upon a bright cloud as the seat of His majesty;" that the "all nations" include "all mankind;" that this gathering "will probably take place near Jerusalem in the Valley of Josaphet," where will be separated "the elect from the reprobate, the sheep, i.e. the just" will "be taken up into the clouds to meet Him as described by St. Paul, 1 Thessa.

4 : 16 ;" the reprobate, i. e. the goats, will be left on earth to receive their eternal doom ; that the inheritance is given in view of good works, and that the wicked are cast to hell for neglect of such works ; both conditions are eternal. Now compare with this numerous Protestant versions (as e. g. Pres. Edwards's view, His. of Redemp., Barnes's Com. loci, and hundreds of others), and they are identical in spirit and application. Dr. Rutter applies it but mildly in comparison with many of his predecessors and their followers in Protestant churches.

Obs. 1. Those who apply this passage to a general assize can only do so by taking for granted two suppositions, which are, in order to make out their sense, engrafted upon it. (1) It is supposed that the " all nations" mean " all the generations of men that ever existed ;" but this is a mere inference, and, being unproven, is a mere begging of the question. (2) In order to sustain the first supposition, it is conjectured that this necessarily implies a previous resurrection of all the dead ; but this also is mere inference, unsupported by a particle of proof.

Some (as Thomas, Homil. Com. loci) not only thus locate the fulfilment at the Sec. Advent in a general assize with a previous general resurrection, but make out of it a continuous judgment, now progressing, becoming more " intensely conscious" at death, and " intensified" at the day of judgment. A supposition advanced by some is the following : The Parable of the Virgins is fulfilled at the beginning of the one thousand years ; the Parable of the Talents following, at the beginning and during and at the end of the one thousand years ; and this passage, referring to the sheep and goats, at the end of the one thousand years. But this needs no refutation, being self-contradictory, as appears under this and various Propositions. Another view entertained by a few may be briefly dismissed, viz., that this Scripture was fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem. Such a gathering, separation, assignment of reward and punishment, was not there witnessed and experienced. It is only those who strive to rid themselves of a personal Sec. Advent, etc., that present it. We only now say that in ch. 24 we have the conclusion presented of the Second Advent, and warnings given to urge to faithfulness and watchfulness for the same. Then follow three parables in reference to the identical Sec. Advent mentioned in the context ; and these are presented to illustrate and enforce the same. We have three distinctive peculiarities pertaining to that Advent pointed out and impressed, viz., 1. The Parable of the Virgins, indicative of the judgment (separation) of the Church at the thief-like Coming (first stage—see Prop. 130) of Jesus ; comp. Prop. 181. 2. The Parable of the Talents, enforcing the idea of the judgment of believers in order to the bestowment of reward, station, rank in the Kingdom ; comp. Prop. 135. 3. The judgment of the nations at the open manifestation of that Advent. Thus a strictly logical and chronological order that unites these descriptions is preserved.

Obs. 2. Observe the various particulars of the passage, and its harmony with our position.

1. The context. The intimate connections with the preceding statements of chs. 24 and 25 must be noticed, embracing a series of events from the tribulation of the Jews during the times of the Gentiles down to the Sec. Advent, without giving the slightest hint of a Millennial era prior to the Advent. The shading of trial, the continued and culminated wickedness, the waiting, the probation, the mixed condition of the Church, the prolonged absence of the King, the Advent at a time of unbelief as in the days of Noah—all in this epitome of history is opposed to the notion of a previous existing Millennium. Hence the interpretation given to this Scripture must correspond with the context.<sup>1</sup>

2. The interpretation must naturally connect itself with the preceding thought, for a glance will show that v. 31 is closely allied with it. Now what is that leading idea with which this passage stands associated ? It is that of rulership, kingship, an inheriting of a Kingdom ; the position in the same being dependent on the use of talents committed to us, bringing more or less of station or complete rejection. Now this kingship, as the analogy of Scripture shows, is Millennial, and therefore any application to Post-Millennial times is certainly erroneous.*

3. This Coming of the "Son of Man," all (excepting a few) admit, refers to His personal Coming (comp. Props. 82 to 84, and 121 to 130). There is only one future Advent of Jesus delineated in the Scriptures, and that is Pre-Millennial.*

4. This "Son of Man" shall come in His "glory" (with which compare e.g. Matt. 16 : 27 and 26 : 64 ; Mark 8 : 38 ; Luke 9 : 26). This "glory" is asserted in Mill. descriptions, as e.g. Isa. 60 : 1, 2, 19 ; 2 : 19, 21 ; 35 : 2 ; 40 : 5 ; 62 : 2, etc., and therefore fully accords.

5. At this Coming "then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory," or "upon His glorious throne." The stress of "then" is indicative that He then—now, at that time—assumes His throne. In the consideration of this throne, then occupied, certainly the covenanted throne belonging to Him as the Son of Man should be regarded. Having passed over this in detail (Props. 49, 81–83, 122, etc.), it is amply sufficient to direct attention to such passages as Matt. 19 : 28 ; Rev. 3 : 21, and to the Millennial predictions which declare that David's Son shall reign on David's throne, etc. We only now desire to show that the language is in harmony with our position on covenanted ground.

6. At this Coming, a Kingdom is also exhibited for, v. 34, the righteous inherit a Kingdom (comp. 2 Tim. 4 : 1 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 5 ; 2 Pet. 1 : 11). After the delineations of this Kingdom in the Millennial period (demanding the Supernatural to be directly exercised in order to secure its establishment and blessings), and such references as Luke 22 : 28–30, there should be no difficulty, provided the general tenor of the passage admits, to identify the period indicated.

7. At this Advent, "before Him shall be gathered all nations." The question before us is this : Does the "all nations" include "the dead," or only living nations ? In deciding this point we have the following : (1). Nothing is said of "the dead." To say that they are denoted is inferred from the fact that this passage is made—wrongfully—to synchronize with Rev. 20 : 11–15.* (2) The word translated "nations" is never, according to the uniform testimony of critics and scholars, used to designate "the dead," unless this be a solitary exception. This fact, certainly, ought to influence the student to hesitate in accepting such an alleged exception, without the most positive proof that it really forms one. (3) The word is employed to denote living, existing nations, and almost exclusively "Gentile" nations.* (4) The Spirit gives us abundant testimony that precisely such a gathering of living nations shall take place just before the Mill. age commences, and that there shall be both an Advent and judging. Let the reader compare "the beast and the kings of the earth and their armies" of Rev. 19 : 17–20, "the kings of the earth and of the whole world" gathered of Rev. 16 : 13–16, the "all flesh" of Isa. 66 : 15–21, "the nations gathered and kingdoms assembled" of Zeph. 3 : 8–20, "the mighty men, all the men of war, the Gentiles, all ye heathen gathered" of Joel 3 : 9–21, etc., and he will find this identical period of time fully presented. (6) National judgments are only poured out upon living, existing nations, and not upon the dead who are devoid of any organization belonging to the idea of nation or state. Nations are punished or rewarded here on the earth Pre-Millennial, as seen e.g. Zech. 14. (7) As there is no statement that any of these nations arose from the dead, so there is none that any part of them descended from heaven to be judged; the language, provided no previous theory is made to influence it, simply describing nations here on the earth, in some way, gathered together at the Sec. Advent. (8) The phrase "all nations" does not by any means include every individual, much less the generations past deceased, as is seen by the usage of Scripture, as e.g. Matt. 28 : 19; Luke 21 : 24; Matt. 24 : 9-14, etc. (9) The test itself, as applied, certainly does not include "all flesh," much less "all the past dead," because it only is applicable to adults and not to children, to nations having access to the truth and to believers, and not to barbarous and ignorant nations.

8. The separation, as of sheep from goats, is the same figure used in connection with Millennial predictions, as can be seen in Ezek. 34 : 17, etc.; Zech. 10 : 3. That the Mill. era is ushered in by a previous distinguishing between parties and a final parting of them is abundantly shown. (Comp. e.g. Props. 65, 86, 90, 115, 123, etc.).

9. The time of inheriting the Kingdom gives us another decided reason for its Pre-Millennial interpretation. It has been shown in detail, under various Props. (90, 121, 154, etc.), that when the Son of Man comes according to Daniel and others (which is Pre-Mill.), that then the actual possession—the inheritance—of a Kingdom is given to the righteous. We read of no inheriting the Kingdom after the 1000 years, and for the simple reason that the inheritors of a Kingdom have all been previously secured. (Comp. Props. 86, 118, 130, 142, 153, etc.)

10. The inheriting of a "Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" again favors our position (comp. Prop. 2). For, if it refers to a Kingdom designed for them in the beginning, it must correspond with the covenant and the promises based thereon; or if it applies, that this world when formed was designed and appointed for this Kingdom, then the Second Adamic reign is introduced by this overthrow of wickedness and elevation of the righteous here on the earth. In either case it is a Kingdom over living nations, after a restoration of the Jews, etc., making it a Kingdom just the reverse of that portrayed by those who insist upon a general assize. (Comp. Props. 81-105.)

11. He judges as a King, as a Shepherd; and these things are asserted of the Mill. reign, as e.g. Zech. 14, Ezek. 34 : 23, etc. (Comp. Prop. 132.)

12. The Pre-Mill. judgment, as we have shown, is not one of barbarous, heathen nations who have not heard the Gospel, as is seen e.g. in Isa. 66 : 19. If this passage teaches the same judgment, it must correspond with it. This is decisively given in the test of worthiness, for it can only apply to those who had an opportunity to know Christ, and manifest their regard for Him practically through His members. Now all this most accurately corresponds with the condition of the persecuted church, and the character and position of the nations represented to be confederated against Christ, just previous to the Millenium.

13. The test itself is irresistibly in favor of a Pre-Millennial judgment, and under the circumstances advocated by us. Observe the following particulars: (1) The connection (see preceding 2), with the parable of the talents is obvious, and, without a change, we have a continued illustration of the assignment of rewards in rulership in the future Kingdom. Now the apportionment of stations, rank, authority, is not dependent on appropriating Christ by faith, but as a resultant of such faith, faithfulness in the use of the talents committed to us—every one being judged according to his deeds (comp. Prop. 135). The Saviour, therefore, in accord with the general analogy of the Scripture on the subject, declares that when He comes with His saints in glory to set up His Kingdom, out of the nations those who exhibited a living faith by active deeds of sympathy and assistance shall—with those that preceded them (for the time here delineated is not connected with the first or secret stage of the Advent, but with the last or open Parousia)—inherit (i.e. be kings in) a Kingdom. It is a direct lesson of encouragement to those who live during the period of Antichrist in the persecution of the Church, to exercise charity, for which they shall be rewarded. Hence it follows that the test presented is precisely the one needed to ascertain, not who would be saved (for that is not the train of thought, although connected with it), but who would inherit a Kingdom or gain an actual, real rulership in it.<sup>9</sup> (2) He tells us who at that time, viz., the living “righteous” (for those who died in the tribulation under Antichrist as martyrs, also obtain Kingship or inherit, Rev. 20 : 4–6), shall thus inherit (not unbelievers, but “sheep” and “righteous,” expressions employed only in behalf of believers). And this inheriting results from their believing in His promises and appropriating them in practical obedience, as e.g. Matt. 10 : 40–42 ; Mark 9 : 41, etc. (3) The “my brethren” (whether it apply to living and dead, i.e. those who survived, or perished in the persecution) shows that saints were ministered unto by fellow-believers, as enjoined e.g. Heb. 6 : 10. “For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labor of love, which ye have showed toward His name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.” (4) This exhibition of practical charity is obligatory upon the believer, and the entire absence of it, as evidenced in mere professors and unbelievers, results not merely in loss of rulership, but in sad punishment and the cutting off from “eternal life,” because it forms the most positive proof that a living faith in Jesus, which produces “the mind,” etc., which was in Him, is lacking. (5) This divine utterance being designed for instruction and to urge to deeds of charity, the idea is prominently and forcibly set forth that anything thus done to a believer is done to Christ Himself. The manner of presenting this only enforces His previous teaching, Matt. 10 : 40–42.<sup>10</sup> (6) The saints, true believers, who bring forth good deeds, are the only ones who inherit this Kingdom. Outside of this passage this is uniformly taught (as e.g. Rom. 8 : 17 ; James 2 : 5 ; Col. 3 : 24 ; 1 Thess. 2 : 12 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 5 ; 2 Pet. 1 : 11 ; 1 Cor. 6 : 9, etc.), and, therefore, we must interpret to maintain a proper unity—viz., that those who inherit are saints. This inheriting is true of the past saints, the martyr saints, the living saints, who shall be accounted worthy of it.<sup>11</sup> (7) We are not at liberty, in order to remove supposed difficulties, to make a variety of classes or introduce other parties than those expressly mentioned. The passage brings before us the living nations, and these (Gentile nations) are divided into two parties by the divine test. The “brethren” referred to, as the usage (e.g. John 20 : 17 ; Heb. 2 : 11, etc.) of the word uniformly teaches, with the additional emphasis on “My” (Luke 8 : 21 ; Matt. 12 : 50, etc.), are, not the Jews (as Kelly, etc.), but Christians, believers in Jesus, and may refer to martyrs, deceased saints, and living believers before Him.<sup>12</sup>

14. Our position is confirmed by the condition in which the children of God are found just previous to, and at, this open Parousia, viz., one of sore trial and severe persecution (comp. Props. 160, 161, and 162). It will indeed be a time in which "the righteous," "the sheep," the "brethren" of Christ, shall, under the terrible pressure of Antichrist, be "a hungered," "thirsty," "strangers," "naked," "sick," and "in prison." This is a judgment of believers under trial and of their persecutors (as other passages when compared unmistakably show), and Jesus selects it as a salient illustration how the principle in the Parable of the Talents will be evidenced at that period. Many of our opponents freely admit this Pre-Mill. persecution of the Church, with which we, however, link the personal Sec. Advent, and thus introduce the requisite harmony between the predictions.

15. The wicked are removed ("depart from me") from the presence of the King. This accords with Pre-Mill. predictions, that the wicked shall thus be rooted out, etc. (thus e.g. Rev. chs. 14 and 19, Mal. 4, Ps. 37, etc.). Besides this, although Edwards, and others, have Jesus only to appear in the air, and not on the earth (with which only compare Zech. 14 : 4, etc.), and are very positive in asserting that the King immediately after this general ascension returns to the third heaven, yet we find nothing in the passage (and nowhere else in the Bible) of such a return. The Scriptures leave, at His Sec. Advent, David's Son here, just as the covenant demands, removing the wicked from Him.

16. The wicked are represented as cast into "a fire." Now precisely this will occur at the Pre-Mill. Advent of Jesus. The reader is urged to compare e.g. on this point, Rev. 19 : 20 ; Dan. 7 : 10, 11 ; Isa. 66 : 15, 16, 24 ; Mal. 4 : 1-3, etc. Fire, as indicating the vengeance of God, is frequently predicted as belonging to the introduction of the Kingdom or the Mill. blessedness.

17. The student will especially notice, what inevitably decides this Scripture to be an irresistible argument on our side, viz., that this fire is "prepared for the devil and his angels." At this Advent of the King, the fire is only "prepared" for them, and while some others are cast in, they (the devil and his angels) are not then cast into it. This extremely and intentionally guarded expression of the Saviour most fully corroborates our Pre-Mill. application, since in Rev. 20 : 10 Satan is cast into this very fire (thus "prepared" for Him), in which the wicked were placed before the one thousand years ; for attention is called to the fact that it is the same fire by adding, "where the beast and the false prophet are." With which period (Pre- or Post-Mill.) does the language of Jesus correspond ? The only consistent answer is, certainly, that the Pre-Mill. one must be denoted ; for after the Millennium only does Satan and his angels bear company with those accounted worthy of being cast into "the lake of fire" a thousand years previously."

18. The destiny is unalterable. At the close of the Mill. era, these representatives of wickedness continue in "the fire" (under the vengeance of God) into which they were cast, as is seen by comparing Rev. 19 : 20 with Rev. 20 : 10. The non-inheriting of the Kingdom, their doom, is irrevocably fixed.

19. The reward of "the righteous" is eternal. Thus, in the Mill. predictions, immortality, perpetual freedom from evil, continued Kingship, never-ending glory and blessedness, are predicated of the saints.

Thus in every particular a remarkable correspondence is found between this passage and the Pre-Mill. prophecies, so that, on the strength of analogy, perfect accordance with all the utterances of the Spirit, we can justly claim it as corroborative of our doctrine—essential, in fact, for the introduction of the Kingdom. The saints that come with Jesus, as other passages show, participate in this judgment, for they have obtained a priority of rulership or Judgeship, and the intended dealing of King Jesus with the nations, as preparatory to the establishment of His Kingdom, is thus briefly and powerfully stated in the line of thought suggested by the manner in which rulership is secured in it.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This is an important feature, and is violated by able men. Milton (Prose Works, vol. 4, p. 487, Lange, Com. loci) locates its fulfilment after the one thousand years, after the reign of the saints. But there are insuperable difficulties in its reception. Alford, N. T. loci, justly sees that this judgment cannot possibly be applied to the dead saints of the past, and hence—unable to locate it properly in time—he also applies it to a general judgment after the one thousand years, after the Millennial Kingdom, making it parallel with Rev. 20 : 11-15. (The concession made by Alford in the 3d ed. of the N. Test.—and perverted by some of our opponents—that he declined full confidence in his exegesis of portions of Matt. 25, is readily explained by the simple fact that his own exegesis does not fit into his continuously expressed Pre-Millennial Advent of Christ and its results. Unable to meet the difficulties, he does not discard—as some suppose—his Millenarian views, but expresses his inability to reconcile the prophetic facts. This concession, instead of deterring others, should only stimulate us to renewed research and study.) In this opinion several Pre-Millenarians concur (comp. Lange, loci). Olshausen, Steir, and others present the same; but this is a grave mistake, for, as we shall show, the dead are not mentioned, the fire is Pre-Millennial, the inheriting is Pre-Millennial, the nations gathered is Pre-Millennial, the entire representation, as contrasted with other Scripture, forbids it, as well as the duration of the reign and Kingdom when once established. It may also be remarked that during the Millennial age “the brethren” are not “in prison” or “naked,” etc., because then the saints possess the Kingdom, and privation and suffering are excluded, Satan also being bound. “The little season” also does not bring forth such results as to effect the continued happiness of “the saints.” Even such a judicious writer as Judge Jones (Notes, p. 323) is somewhat in doubt as to the location of this passage, for, after a reference to Matt. 25 : 31-46, he says : “Not that we suppose the judgment of the nations described in the latter passage will immediately succeed upon the Advent described in the former of these passages (Matt. 24 : 30, 31 ; Mark 12 : 26, 27 ; Luke 21 : 27). On the contrary, there may be a very long interval between them, to be filled up with the greatest imaginable events. All the things predicted by the Apostle John, from Rev. 19 : 11 to the end of the 20th chapter, even the judgment of all the dead, may intervene. On this point we affirm nothing.” This, however, only introduces confusion, and unnecessarily creates difficulties.

<sup>2</sup> This applies to several classes of interpreters. (1) To those who hold the Whitbyan theory, admitting a Mill. era, but locate the fulfilment of this passage after the same, and have this rulership, inheriting of Kingdom, in the third heaven (with which comp. Prop. 158). (2) To some Pre-Millenarians (e.g. mentioned in preceding note) who locate this judgment scene after the one thousand years, although they have a reign of the saints to precede during the Mill. era. (3) To all others who locate the fulfilment at the destruction of Jerusalem, or who spiritualize it, or who ignore the inheriting of the Kingdom, etc. For the context shows us that this inheriting is the resultant of conduct during the personal absence of the Master, and must—as other Scripture teaches—be realized as a reward of services at the return of the Lord. Logical consistency demands and enforces our position.

<sup>3</sup> Many affirm that after Jesus comes for and with His saints, He then returns to the third heaven, but this also is inferred. It is nowhere taught, and the passages from which it is deduced (as e.g. Rev. 21, 1 Thess. 4 : 17, etc.) are shown, under appropriate Props., to be opposed to it. It is simply adding to the Word that which is not directly taught, just as if the inheritance and reign of David’s Son and of the saints was in the third heaven and not on the earth.

<sup>4</sup> The student who is advanced in our doctrine sees a reason, a remarkable fitness, why Jesus does not say a word respecting “the dead.” The period here described synchronizes with Rev. 19 : 15-21, and applies, therefore, only to living nations. The righteous "dead" have been previously raised up (Rev., chs. 11 and 14. Comp. Props. 125-129) being in the armies—the saints—who come with Him to this scene of judgment; afterward the holy dead who endured the tribulation are raised, but the rest of the dead not until the one thousand years are ended. Hence the righteous dead and the wicked dead are not included in this prediction (it being an exact parallel with Zech. 14, Rev. 19, etc.), which is to be verified at the open Advent of Jesus and His saints, the latter participating in the judgment. Thus no contradiction between the predictions, but harmony exists. Besides, in Rev. 20 : 11-15 the dead and not the living are specifically mentioned, which is intentional in order to preserve unity.

<sup>b</sup> Lord (Lit. and Theol. Journal, July, 1851, p. 38), in his reply to Brown, remarks: "It is used in two relations: first, to denote the Gentile nations in contradistinction from the Israelites; and next, to denote the inhabitants of the world without consideration to which of those classes they belong." We add, for the consideration of the advanced student, that the Spirit purposely here gives the word applicable to "Gentile" nations, because these are the very nations arrayed against the Jews and against the Christ just previous to the Mill. era. A striking consistency, so requisite to the truth, is thus maintained. Comp. e.g. on the usage of the word ethnos, Bush in Anastasis, p. 295; Dr. Cooper in Essay The Judgment, etc., who show in detail that it is rendered "Gentiles," or "nations," or "heathen," or "people," and applied to the living.

<sup>c</sup> It is a matter of surprise that scholarly men should so persistently insist upon the literal universality of "all," when it is so frequently used in Scripture (and all languages) to denote generality or many, a large number, etc., as e.g. Matt. 3 : 5; Ex. 9 : 6; Zeph. 2 : 14; 1 Chron. 14 : 17; Matt. 21 : 26, and 10 : 32; John 3 : 26; 2 Tim. 1 : 15, etc. The same men, however, when pressed by Universalists in this direction, are very ready to concede this meaning of "all," and plead in its behalf with vigor.

<sup>d</sup> It is here in the test itself that writers and commentators involve themselves in so great difficulties, that they are utterly unable to locate its fulfilment without either doing violence to unity of prediction or presenting their views with extreme hesitation and doubt, or refusing to assign its order of realization. After laboring for years in doubt which application to receive, the clue (viz., the judgment of believers which is of works, see Prop. 135), which removes all the perplexities of the order of fulfilment was joyfully obtained and will be given under 13. Of course the Post-Mill. notion (as in Barnes Com. loci) including all the righteous dead and living, and also all the wicked dead and living, is utterly opposed to the test, and consequently must be rejected. But able writers who cling to the Pre-Mill. Advent, etc., are in a self-imposed embarrassment on this point. Olshausen, Steir, Alford, Keil, and others, looking at the test, cannot see how it is applicable to those who are justified and saved by faith in Christ, and in endeavoring to steer away from the Romish idea of being saved by works, fall themselves into erroneous interpretation. Some make these nations to consist of heathen unbelievers, some of whom, although ignorant, through kindness of heart and pity show mercy to believers, and through the exercise of Divine Sovereignty are saved. Others more specifically confine them to nations in contact with Christianity (professedly Christianized, but unbelieving) because such only have the opportunity of being tested by the standard of sympathy and assistance toward believers in their midst. Some make it partly, others wholly parabolic. A popular view is presented by Fowle (Contemp. Review, May, 1872, p. 730), who makes it to relate to all mankind and to present a test not "of personal relationship to Himself (Jesus), but of simple human kindness on the part of those who never heard His name." Now all the well-meant ideas of Olshausen, etc. in this direction only confirms the Romish and Humanitarian views, viz., that we can be saved either by works or the proper exhibition of sympathy and charity, and with all their efforts they raise up unbelievers, who (through the exercise of tender compassion, etc.) are elevated to a kingship with the saints who have appropriated and confessed Christ. (The gloss that some throw in to preserve theological consistency, that it is not "the sheep" out of those nations, but the saints who come with Him who inherit, is opposed, as we shall show, to the drift of the passage.)

<sup>e</sup> Notice the entire context: in Matt. 24 we have a direct reference to the personal Sec. Advent and cautions for watchfulness; this is followed by a warning respecting the secret stage of the Advent in the Parable of the Virgins; then a teaching concerning the determined ground on which rulership is bestowed; and this is followed by stating what will take place at the open, revealed Advent. The principle thus enforced does not, therefore, give the slightest foundation to the opinion that man is saved solely through his works or exhibition of humanity, seeing that it leaves the teaching respecting the condition of faith in, and justification through, Christ untouched, directing attention only to the reward of those who already are believers or profess to be such, and the destiny of those who evidence neither works nor faith in Jesus. Thus interpreted in the line of thought, its teaching is in consistency with all that is said respecting justifying faith, the necessity of good works, and the doom of the impenitent. It also does not interfere with the select and superior rank of "the first-fruits" (144,000) or with e.g. the special administrations of the apostles (on the twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel), because a variety of station and rank will be introduced into the incoming Theocracy.

<sup>9</sup> Some (Cooper, Essay on Judgment) think that by these "brethren" are meant the Jews, who are brethren according to the flesh (Rom. 9 : 5, etc.). This makes a good interpretation and application, seeing that at this very period just preceding the open Parousia in glory, the Jews will also be terribly persecuted. Hence any exhibition of faith in God's Word which leads to the extension of sympathy and aid to them in their dire distress will be acceptable to the King, and will be rewarded.

<sup>10</sup> Some commentators assume that enlightened Christians, true followers of Jesus, are not thus addressed, because none of them could be so ignorant as to forget the plain teaching of Jesus in ch. 10 : 40-42, and therefore they could not put in the plea of verses 37-39, or be unaware of the fact that their deeds of love have been actuated by love to and for Christ. But this takes it for granted that this identical plea will then be employed, and overlooks the fact that our Saviour—in view of the best believers forgetting the motives of action, etc.—only impressively enforces the idea of obedience to His previous teaching, especially in doing good, and illustrates how even the smallest thing (like a drink of water), which at the time might not be ranked by us as a very spiritual or pious act, will not lose its reward. The simple scriptural truth presented is this, that for everything done (even for every word spoken) we shall receive our reward, however forgetful of the fact we may be, and however unconscious at the time of its possessing any special merit. Our Teacher in the illustration shows this effectively, and the great truth brought out is the oft-repeated (but oft-neglected) one, that in honoring the least of His brethren we honor Him. The design of our Lord is not to exhibit His followers as "ignorant," but to enforce this truth in a most impressive manner, and thus encourage to a practical performance of duty and love, in order that the future station of the believer may be enhanced, and that he may "suffer no loss."

<sup>11</sup> This does not interfere with the extraordinary privilege and exclusiveness of the 144,000, Rev. 14, that precedes the harvest, who occupy a higher and nearer position and rank with the Christ, for in the Coming Theocracy—as Jesus Himself teaches and as analogy informs us—there will be gradations of rank. (Comp. Props. 118, 153, 169, 154.) We hold, therefore, with Lactantius, Euthymius, Grotius, and many others, that believers are thus rewarded agreeably to the general analogy, and reject that view which makes those rewarded to be unconverted persons. So we cannot receive the view that confines this to the Mill. age, because (aside from the completion of the inheritors Pre-Millennial) according to Mill. promises the saints are not thus distressed or persecuted, making sympathy and aid necessary. Besides, the Pre-Mill. fire—see 17—decides the matter.

<sup>12</sup> Some make the "sheep" to be the Jews (which makes a fair application, if no better existed), but we learn that the Jews then living do not inherit the Kingdom (they being converted under the sight and providence of the Christ), but, when restored, form a nation over which the twelve apostles rule. They are subjects, and not rulers, of the Kingdom, for, by their unbelief and rejection of the promised Messiah, they have put from them this high and tendered privilege. Others make the "my brethren" to be either the Jews or the saints that have come with Jesus, but the passage shows that the same class taken out of these nations and placed at His right hand are addressed, and not others. Swormstedt (End of the World Near, p. 181) correctly applies this to a judgment of living nations, but falls into an error when he makes these "righteous" to become merely "the earthly subjects of Christ during His Mill. reign," for it is expressly asserted of them that they—instead of being subjects—inherit a Kingdom. The fact is that all then living among the nations who—whether Jew or Gentile—are believers in Jesus and exhibit the same by the practical test applied, will be associated with the glorified saints that come with Jesus in the government of the destined world-wide Theocracy. That sympathy for and assistance tendered to the Jews when also suffering, shall likewise be remembered and rewarded, is clearly taught in other places, but this does not affect our interpretation.

<sup>13</sup> This peculiar and distinctive phraseology seems to be given to meet the prevailing unbelief on the subject, as well as the widespread erroneous application of the passage, and yet it is sad to see opponents totally ignore this scriptural reason for our interpretation, and repeat their suppositions about "all nations," etc., just as if it did not exist. This omission to meet our reasoning and at least to attempt an answer neutralizes the argument (if it may be thus called) of our opponents, who (all of them down to Dr. Hodge in his Sys. Div.—the last repeating Brown's statements) quote Matt. 25 : 31-46, as if it presented no difficulties to them (for they refuse to even look at them); and then coolly appropriate it without e.g. the least attempt to show what fire (Pre- or Post-Mill.) is denoted, identifying it, without explanation or meeting our objections, with the latter portion of Rev. 20. If they deem this satisfactory or even scholarly, they make a grave mistake. This reason was presented by the writer to a number of Post-Millenarian ministers, and they conceded that it was unanswerably in our favor. Several were so impressed by the fact that they voluntarily promised to study the subject; but that was the last of it, for they continue from their pulpits to give it, when referred to, the Popish explanation.

Loughborough (Saints' Inheritance, p. 65), to sustain the crude and unscriptural doctrine of the Seventh-Day Adventists respecting the saints possessing the Kingdom after the one thousand years (thus violating all order of fulfilment, etc.), says that the wicked cast into this fire cannot be consigned to it until after their resurrection, which Rev. 20 locates after the Millennial period. But this is to overlook the fact that the resurrection and the dead are not mentioned, that living nations are exclusively spoken of, and that, therefore, the Spirit (as if to guard against such error) expressly states the fact that the living (not resurrected, but mortal beings) are cast into the fire preceding the Mill. age, as the expression (Rev. 19 : 20) "cast alive into a lake of fire" positively teaches; a confederation of mortal men, who are living at that time (and not after the one thousand years) experience this treatment.

<sup>14</sup> Thus explained, in accordance with the general analogy on the subject, we see how this view sets aside the following errors of interpretation and application. (1) The prevailing one which applies it to a general or universal judgment of all men, dead and living, although it is frankly admitted that the principle by which character is to be determined is one not applicable to multitudes that have died. (2) The Swedenborgian application of judgment, which does not allow this to be a future action here on the earth. (3) All other theories which locate this in the past, or make it representative of something else than the language plainly expresses. (4) The idea that it is future but not Pre-Millennial, being expressive merely of the Divine action and procedure during the thousand years, which ignores a comparison of Scripture that inevitably makes it Pre-Millennial. (5) The view entertained by some former able Pre-Millenarian writers, as e.g. Bickersteth, who, in his Guide and also Promised Glory, thinks that there is a continuous fulfilment, the judgment here being comprehensive, embracing both the judgment at the beginning of the Mill. age (the resurrection of the just) and the judgment at the end of the age (the resurrection of the unjust), but this describes a judgment which occurs at one and the same time, and precisely such an one as numerous parallel passages declare is Pre-Millennial. The inheriting of a Kingdom, the sentence of the wicked, the gathering of nations—in brief, every point of the prophecy is corroborated as Pre-Millennial by other predictions and the general order of events. Brown (Christ's Sec. Advent, p. 265) says that Mede (Works, p. 841) and Birks adopt the view that Matt. 25 : 31, etc. denotes a continuous judgment, one part consummated at the beginning, and the other at the end, of the Mill. age, i.e. "the sentence of absolution to continue all the time of the first resurrection, that is, all the thousand years long. That, once ended and finished, and not before, he shall proceed to pronounce the sentence of condemnation upon such as are to be condemned." But, as Dr. Brown justly observes, this is objectionable, as the impression left by the prediction enforces a contemporaneous judgment; and this, we assert, is proven by the fact that these wicked ones are cast into the Pre-Millennial lake of fire, Rev. 19 : 20.

Obs. 3. If it be thought that the Parable of Tares and Wheat teach otherwise (a general, universal judgment), the reply is ready, that the time of the harvest (which we show to be Pre-Mill.) fixes the period of fulfilment, while the separation is not predicated of the dead tares or the past ripened wheat. Dr. Brown finds a defect in the parable because it is unable to express the idea of a universal judgment including the past dead; we, on the other hand, find no defect, but accurate correspondence with the predicted realization. The parable informs us nothing of the tares and wheat of former dispensations, nothing respecting the heathen, nothing concerning the separation of righteous and wicked at death, but refers us to the operation of the truth presented during the period between the two Advents, to a continuous intermingling of tares and wheat which shall be manifested when the harvest comes, and to the separation of the then existing tares and wheat at the time of the harvest. Neither Hades nor Heaven is harvested, but this world, as it shall exist at the open Advent of the great Reaper. There is no intimation that either former tares or wheat are raised up to be mixed and then separated, while the burning of existing "tares" and the elevation of then living "wheat" coincides with abundant Pre-Mill. prophecy. The consistency of our doctrine is seen in this: that after the one thousand years are ended the dead tares—"the rest of the dead," who "lived not again until the thousand years were finished," are also raised up and their destiny awarded.

Birks (Lent Lec. for 1843, No. 7, note at end, approvingly quoted by Brown, Christ's Sec. Coming, p. 270, note) has "three decisive objections to the view which refers it to the judgment of living nations before the Millennium begins. First: The judgment of the living has been described in the previous parables." (How this can be "decisive" we fail to see, because if an important truth and a warning, the Saviour can repeat, seeing, especially, that the preceding portions deal with the Church, and this includes far more.) "Secondly: The nations not included in the Church are not all gathered together at the opening of the Millennium." (How "decisive" this is will appear by noticing that it is based on two misapprehensions: (1) No nations are included in the Church, which is formed by a people gathered out of all nations—comp. Props. 60-65; (2) the scriptural and a very common usage of the word "all," in the sense of largely, generally, etc., is conveniently overlooked.) "Thirdly: The sentence on the wicked is plainly not the sentence of present death, but of everlasting judgment which follows the close of the Millennium." (But we affirm this fixture of eternal destiny, and hold to no change from the Pre-Mill. entailed condition—both for the wicked and righteous. Thus the "decisive objections" become very indecisive.) Brown's (Com. loci) objection that our reference to the Gentile nations because they are such as have not heard of God, is insufferable, has no force whatever, since we teach the reverse (e.g. Isa. 66 : 19), the entire narration evidencing that they are such as have access to the persecuted believers.

Obs. 4. Having thus a judgment of living nations, if the dead generally are to be also judged, we should have, to give completeness, a portraiture of such a judgment of the dead. Now the judgment of Rev. 20 : 11-15, after the one thousand years, is not one of living nations, but pre-eminently of "the dead." The dead only are mentioned, and who ever adds "living nations" to it (in order to make out a universal judgment) is most certainly adding to the prophecy. Precisely such a judgment is required to fill out in due proportions what otherwise would be lacking, the order of the Divine procedure in the administration of justice. For, if we had no such direct prophecy of the judgment of "the dead" at the ending of the Mill. era, it would justly be regarded as a grave defect in our system of faith. With it, we have a consonant whole.

Not even "all" the dead of past generations are thus included, but all "the rest of the dead," for the priority of the latter resurrection of the righteous (Prop. 127) and the exclusion of "the rest of the dead" until after the one thousand years, evidences this. It is sufficient for the student only to refer to Rev. 11 : 15-18 and he will see that under the last and Pre-Mill. trumpet such a judgment is exercised, and some of the dead rewarded, while in Rev. 20 : 11-15 the remainder are judged.

Obs. 5. The disciples to whom this passage was addressed, preachers of the Kingdom and specially instructed, held to the Jewish views of the Judgment at the Coming of the Messiah, to be followed by a glorious Messianic reign under the restored Theocratic-Davidic throne and Kingdom.

The modern Popish view of judgment, followed by a winding up of all sublunary affairs, was something that they did not believe, and, impelled by covenant and prophecy, could not possibly credit. Now the language of Jesus—corresponding with the language of the prophets respecting the gathering of the nations and judgment at the Coming of the Lord—is admirably adapted to confirm them in their Jewish views, being in strict accordance therewith, introducing no element to discredit the same, or to render it doubtful. That it put no hindrance to their belief, but confirmed it; that it only strengthened them in the hope of a following Messianic Kingdom, is self-evident from their expressed faith (as e.g. Acts 1 : 6). Surely if the prediction is such as many moderns contend for, it ought to have had an opposite tendency. Then again, if the modern prevailing view (which we oppose) is the correct one, and is so easily admissible (as affirmed) from the passage, how comes it that all the early churches, East and West (Props. 75, 76), entertained our doctrine and rejected this one? Surely the Popish notion ought to have had very early advocates, if it be the correct one, seeing that the doctrine of the Judgment was a familiar one with the Primitive Christians, so that Polycarp (Epis. Phil.) appeals to it: "Who of you are ignorant of the judgment of God? Do we not know that the saints shall judge the world, as Paul teaches?" This question suggests the difficulty to our opponents, which none of them have answered, viz., if all the saints are to assist in judging the world, how can they be judged simultaneously (as they infer from this passage) with the wicked—all men? The Early Church doctrine involved no such glaring inconsistencies.

Russell (Our Lord's Return, p. 27) locates the judgment of Matt. 25 : 31-46 in and during the Millennium, but this is an erroneous innovation upon ancient and modern exegesis. While it is true—as we advocate in detail—that judging involves frequently more than mere judicial action, yet the scene and action here described are utterly opposed to his idea, as seen (1) in the gathering of the nations, which is Pre-Mill.; (2) in the inheriting of the Kingdom, which is the same; (3) in the location of the fire and the judgment pronounced, which also is the same; (4) in the test applied, which is sustained by the condition of the Church at that period. "The first-fruits" participate in this judging, and come with Jesus—Pre-Mill.—in order to partake in its honor.

Obs. 6. At the conclusion (Props. 132 and 133) of a subject so important, it is proper to suggest what is requisite to neutralize the comparison of Scripture thus instituted, and indisputably prove the position of our opponents. 1. A specific passage, which teaches that there is but one general judgment. 2. A passage which directly affirms that all men, both the dead and living, will be judicially judged at the same time. 3. To show that the Bible statement, that all men will be judged, is not consistently met, if a judgment at various times includes all men. 4. A passage which asserts that the judgment of all men, dead or living, is after the Millennium. 5. To show that the judgment unto eternal life (resulting from faith in Jesus) is identical with a judgment according to works. 6. To prove that a Pre-Mill. resurrection (which some of them, as Prof. Stuart, fully admit, while others affirm a slight precedence in time of the righteous) does not necessarily include a prior judgment. 7. To show that the Jewish and Early Christian view of the Judgeship and of the Judgment Day is erroneous, and inconsistent with the prophets. 8. To indicate how it came to pass, that under the immediate teaching of the Apostles and the teachers appointed by them, the Primitive Church, almost universally, taught our doctrine. 9. To point out the Scriptures which affirm that God has revealed no order of time in the judgment of mankind, as prophecy predicts. 10. To explain how the saints (being included in their "all") are both judged, and, according to promise, judging others at the same time. 11. That, according to their theory, the righteous are judged and rewarded at death, and then, after a long interval, must again be judicially tried; which requires confirmation from Scripture. 12. How passages simply affirming a judgment, or stating that Christ will deny, be ashamed of, and disown the wicked, or alluding to the rewarding of righteous and wicked at His Coming, or implying the certainty of judgment, or teaching, without expressing the order, the several destinies of the good and bad, are sufficient to invalidate our position, seeing that all these are firmly held by us. Such are some of the things which, we think, have not yet been met in the spirit of fairness and candor; and our opinion is amply confirmed by the record found in books, articles, etc., written against us, which assume their doctrine proven by quoting an abundance of passages relating to the judgment (which we also receive), and containing no manner of specifications how or when they shall be verified.

The following are the passages quoted against us by Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming, ch. 11) in advocacy of a simultaneous judgment of all the righteous and wicked, and to ascertain their relevancy, the reader may refer to them: Matt. 10 : 32, 33; Mark 8 : 38; Rev. 21 : 7, 8; 22 : 12-15; Matt. 16 : 24-27; 7 : 21-23; 25 : 10; 25 : 31-46; 13 : 38-43; John 5 : 28, 29; Acts 17 : 31; Rom. 2 : 5-16; 2 Cor. 5 : 9-11; 1 Cor. 4 : 5; 2 Thess. 1 : 6-10; 1 Cor. 3 : 12-15; Col. 1 : 28; Heb. 13 : 17; 1 Thess. 2 : 19, 20; 1 John 2 : 28; 4 : 17; Rev. 3 : 5; 1 Tim. 5 : 24, 25; Rom. 14 : 10, 12; 2 Pet. 3 : 7, 10, 12; Rev. 20 : 11-15; 2 Tim. 4 : 1. This array of Scripture utterly fails to sustain his inferences drawn from them, as the reader can readily see by comparing his deductions from them with the statements made by us. Lord and others have met these passages in detail, but the illustrations and reasoning presented by us are amply sufficient to explain them. We call attention to Brown's Com. on Matt. 25, where the reader can see for himself how unfairly he presents our views, leaving out the main reasons for our decided opinions. In his controversial work he deals largely in conflicting individual opinions (as if they did not exist, even more largely, on his side), and by an appeal to an alleged almost universal application, which, however, he fails to trace up to its true origin, the apostasy, and in view of various theories, suggesting difficulties instead of establishing his own doctrine and clearing it of embarrassments. We thus specially select Dr. Brown because he has been so highly eulogized as the ablest writer against us, whom Barnes (Com.), Hodge (Sys. Div.), and others confidently follow as authority. The reader will be interested in a concession may by Dr. Brown (Christ's Sec. Com., p. 261), which our opponents try to conceal: "There can be no doubt that the words 'judge' and 'judgment' are used in Scripture, both in the sense of exercising kingly rule and in the sense of inflicting public vengeance," but denies that these senses are intended when "Christ will come to judge at the great day." The student will observe how the words are employed in reference to Christ in the Old Test., and then how suddenly, according to Brown, they change their meaning and must be limited in the New Test., although it is expressly said that He comes as King and judges as the King, etc.

PROPOSITION 135. The doctrine of the Kingdom in full accord with the Scriptural doctrine of the judgment of believers.

The Theocratic Kingdom contemplating for its rulers, associated with the Christ, the saints, must necessarily make provision for the same by a present and future judgment of believers. By this method the requisite qualifications for future kingship and priesthood are made manifest.

Obs. 1. It is self-evident that any one accounted worthy of the better resurrection"—that pre-eminent res. alone attributed to the righteous—and any one deemed holy enough for a translation at the Sec. Advent, must, in view of such a decided preference shown to them, be the subject of an antecedent judgment. How else can it be known that they possess the qualifications requisite for such honor and blessedness? Both the resurrection and translation are represented as a sudden, instantaneous change, and demand a previous preparedness for the same. The same is true of the saints coming with Jesus at His open Parousia, for "all the saints" (Zech. 14 : 5) come with Him. To attain this honor, an antecedent estimate of character must have preceded. So also the saints are to be associated with Jesus in the judgment of the world (1 Cor. 6 : 2), for "this honor have all the saints" (Ps. 149 : 9). This Judgeship necessarily implies the previous judgment of these saints in order to evidence their fitness for so high and responsible a position.

It is a matter taken for granted in every system of theology that judgments are often manifested even in this world, and that an antecedent judgment determines the status of every one at death and in the intermediate state. The principle, therefore, is one fully recognized, and should consequently excite no surprise when thus applied by ourselves.

Obs. 2. Pre Millenarians firmly hold that all men, both the righteous and wicked, will be judged, not only in this life but in the future. The passages teaching this are numerous and emphatic, such e.g. as Heb. 9 : 27 ; Rom. 2 : 2-16 ; Matt. 12 : 36 ; 1 Pet. 4 : 4, 5, etc. But, as already shown, there is an order in this judgment, just as there is an order in the resurrection. Take the expression "As it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment," and we have the universality of judicial action asserted, but nothing as to the order after death, the length of time elapsing, etc. To obtain a correct view of the latter, there must be a careful comparison of all the Scriptures relating to the subject.

Obs. 3. Such a comparison reveals to us a singular statement, which at first thought might be deemed contradictory, but really presents a wonderful harmony, viz., it is said that believers shall not be judged hereafter, and again it is asserted that they will be judged. Now if we comprehend concerning what things they are not judged or are judged, a beautiful consistency runs through the language, deeply impressive. Let us turn first to the declarations that they are not judged. Jesus positively declares, John 5 : 24, "Verily, verily I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." A multitude of critics and writers point out the fact that the original word rendered "condemnation" is "judgment," and, therefore, properly translated, "shall not come into judgment." The context shows that the bestowment of eternal life through the resurrecting power given to the Son, was the immediate subject discussed, and this most emphatic reference to believers then is, that they are not to come into judgment in order to decide whether they are worthy or not of eternal life. That is already decided when they hear and believe, for every believer is at present "justified" (e.g. Rom. 5 : 1, 2 ; Acts 13 : 39 ; Gal. 2 : 16, etc.), which term is indicative of judicial action. This, of course, requires a continuing life of faith, evidenced by its fruits (Rom. 2 : 7, and 6 : 22 ; Rev. 2 : 7, etc.), for perseverance evidences the sincerity of faith and the justification experienced. The resurrection of the sheep belonging to Jesus' fold unto eternal life is secured (for e.g. John 10 : 26-29), for they follow Him, He knows them, gives to them eternal life, and they shall never perish, for no one is able to pluck them out of His hand. The power of bestowing eternal life is lodged in Him (John 17 : 2, 3), "and this is life eternal, that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." Being justified by faith we are assured of eternal life ; the fruits of the Spirit, the work of the spirit, the abiding of the spirit (Rom. 8 : 11), is a testimony of its bestowal, for in Christ Jesus there is (Rom 8 : 1) no condemnation. He has said, John 6 : 37-40, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me ; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. For I came down from heaven, not to do my own will, but the will of Him who sent me, And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which He hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. And this is the will of Him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on Him, may have everlasting life ; and I will raise Him up at the last day." The multitude of assurances respecting the safety and salvation of the believer, the deep self-consciousness of personal religious experience confirmatory of this, and especially the dying grace and hope inspired in the believer at the most solemn and trying crisis of his career—all testify to his justification and his right, through Christ, to eternal life.

Indeed, if it were otherwise Christianity would be weak and unequal to the task imposed upon it. It could not then impart solid comfort and hope. But, thank God, it is vital, life-giving in its power. By faith such a union exists between Christ and the believer, evidenced by a proper fruitage, that the believer is conscious of sins forgiven (a judicial work) through the atoning sacrifice, of a marvellous peace bestowed, of an extraordinary change of heart experienced, of a supreme love inspired, so that he has the assurance that having the Son he hath also life.

Obs. 4. In reference to the ultimate salvation of the true believer there can be no doubt, for has it not been said, Rom. 8 : 31-34, "If God be for us, who can be against us ? He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things ? Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect ? It is God that just, fieth. Who is he that condemneth? And this culminates in the positive declarations that nothing can separate us from the love of Christ; that we are "more than conquerors" through Him. Now assuredly this constant abiding in the love of God, in union with His Son, is indicative of a justified state, and becomes thus the most reasonable evidence that such are not to be brought into judgment to ascertain whether they have accepted the terms (e.g. John 3 : 16, 18, 36) which entitle them to everlasting life. For, Acts 13 : 39, "By Him, all that believe are justified from all things." The "Book of Remembrance" (Mal. 3 : 16, 17) has recorded their names, and God "will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him," because they are His "jewels" or "special treasure." Such are written or enrolled in heaven (Heb. 12 : 23), in "the Lamb's Book of Life" (Phil. 4 : 3; Rev. 13 : 8), and in the consciousness of their "names" being thus inscribed (Luke 10 : 20), they are to "rejoice." All this, of course, is based on an antecedent judgment.

The converse of this is true: the wicked man, the unbeliever, is not justified, but is (e.g. John 3 : 18) "condemned already." "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord," Rom. 6 : 23, and this gift becomes ours owing to the forgiveness of sin by faith in Him. Here let it be remarked that this forgiveness of sin, this cleansing of sin by the appropriated blood of Jesus, demands—reasonably and scripturally—that such sins forgiven and cleansed should no longer be called up in judicial action for the purpose of condemning the believer as unworthy of eternal life. This is impossible, being a believer; and every believer is assured of ultimate salvation. Yet, as we shall explain, sins—even every idle word—are recalled, not to condemn the believer as unworthy of salvation, but to indicate his worthiness for position, honor, rank in that salvation.

Obs. 5. On the other hand, believers are also represented as judged in the future, not as to their worthiness to receive "eternal life," not as to their forming a co-heirship with Jesus (for all this, owing to their union with Christ and subsequent justification, has already been decided), but to ascertain the exact position of rulership, Kingship, and priesthood, to which they are justly entitled. No intelligent writer on Eschatology exists that does not fully admit that numerous passages (such e.g. as Luke 19 : 17, 19; Matt. 25 : 21, 23; 1 Cor. 15 : 41, etc.) distinctively teach a gradation of rank, power, authority, etc., even among the saints in the world to come. Aside from the reasonableness and justice of the same, the Theocratic ordering necessarily entails such differences among the redeemed. Now such distinctions are not based upon faith in, and union with, Christ (for all believers possess these, which entitle them to the blessed eternal life), but upon the works, actions, conduct, life brought forth by this faith and union, "knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance," Col. 3 : 24. Let the following points be observed: (1) "Every one of us shall give account of himself to God," Rom. 14 : 10, 12, "for we shall all stand before the judgment-seat (or throne) of Christ." This includes, of course, all believers. (2) This scrutiny extends to "every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the Day of Judgment," Matt. 12 : 36, and "the secrets of men," Rom. 2 : 16, shall be judged, etc. This evidences the real state of heart, for "the judgment of God is according to truth," Rom. 2 : 2. (3) The reward shall be proportionate (which is not eternal life, for all attain unto it) to the works. Thus e.g. "God, without respect of persons, judgeth according to every man's work," 1 Pet. 1 : 17; "God will render to every man according to his works," Rom. 2 : 6 ; " Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his works shall be," Rev. 22 : 12 (with which compare Rev. 2 : 23 ; Eph. 6 : 8 ; Gal. 6 : 7 ; 2 Cor. 5 : 10 ; Matt. 16 : 27, etc.). Surely on the common principle of justice, apostles, martyrs, reformers, men eminent for labors and sufferings for Christ, men abounding in good works, should possess a distinction above those who were less fruitful, less devoted, less engaged in service.

But we must not lose sight of a principle here which is of vast encouragement to the weak and less gifted, showing how in the bestowment of rewards they may stand as high in God's favor as the most talented. The principle is this : A faithful use of the ability and power committed unto us. This is forcibly illustrated by the two Parables of the Talents and of the Pounds. In the Parable of the Talents (Matt. 25 : 14-30), the one that received five talents gained other five, and the one that obtained two gained other two ; the talents were bestowed "to every man according to his several ability," and we learn that the one with two accomplished just as much as the one with five, i. e. he doubled what he had, and consequently we find the terms of divine approval are identical in expression to both : they receive the same reward. But in the Parable of the Pounds (Luke 19 : 11-27), each one receives a pound, and to make the divine approval to apply equally to all (as evidenced in the other Parable), every one should show forth the same gain. But what are the facts illustrated by the Saviour ? They all started with the same resources, but the gain being diverse one from the other, the rewards are also different. The one gaining ten pounds receives "authority over ten cities ;" the one gaining five pounds obtains rule "over five cities." The lesson that this affords is the following : No one with limited capacities, education, etc. need to be afraid that, owing to his lack of gifts, he must necessarily occupy a very subordinate position in the Coming Kingdom. If he diligently uses what God has given to him, his increase will be just as proportionate as that of men of greater gifts and ability. Indeed, it may be safely asserted that in the final award, when this principle will be carried out, it will be found that many a layman comparatively unknown will stand as high, if not higher, as ministers of extended reputation and eloquence, simply because to the latter much was committed and much required, while of the former less was given and hence less demanded.

Obs. 6. The judgment then of saints in the future is not one unto eternal life, but one pertaining to the position to be occupied in the Theocratic Kingdom, a distinction which is often implied, as e. g. in Matt. 19 : 28-30, where we have judgment, already passed concerning the apostles that follow Jesus, when it is said, "ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel ;" and then, in reference to others, it is asserted that whatever sacrifices are made in behalf of Jesus such shall both "receive a hundredfold and shall inherit eternal life." So in the next chapter (20 : 21-28) the general principle is laid down that future greatness in the Kingdom will be proportionate to present labor and suffering for the truth. (Comp. Luke 22 : 24-30.) Even "a cup of cold water" (Matt. 10 : 42 ; Mark 9 : 41) shall be rewarded. And this view is fully corroborated by the fact that the Sec. Advent, which introduces this judging or assigning of positions in accordance with works, is spoken of as "the blessed hope," something in which we should rejoice, comfort ourselves (e. g. 1 Pet. 1 : 7, 13 ; Tit. 2 : 13 ; 1 Pet. 4 : 13, etc.), which we could not do if a judicial trial, upon which our entire destiny depended, were before us. It is not for those who are accounted "heirs according to the hope of eternal life," Tit. 3 : 17, "heirs of salvation," Heb. 1 : 17, to be thus judged, excepting as it affects the position of the "heirs" in the inheritance.

In reference to Matt. 19 : 30, the principle is merely adverted to, for, taking Luke 18 : 30 and Mark 10 : 30, the parallel passages, it is asserted that for sacrifices thus made there is a proportionate recompense already bestowed "now in this time," or "in this present time" (with accompanying persecutions) by the higher consolations of Christian union, sympathy, and blessing. For it is noticeable that the highest spiritual attainments and enjoyments are those resultant from devotedness in the service of the Master. It is well to notice the Parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard connected in the following chapter (Matt. 20), because some interpreters consider it to teach the exact reverse, viz., that the heavenly inheritance is bestowed upon all, without reference to their labor or amount of toil, as a free gift and not as a reward of merit, and that consequently the glory of all will be identical, just as every laborer, those who worked long and those who labored late, received his penny. But the preceding context, giving a specific reward to the apostles, and the declaration, "But many that are first shall be last, and the last shall be first," indicative of degrees, as well as other Scriptures, forbid such a conclusion. The equality is, when explained, referred to all laborers without distinction in the vineyard inheriting eternal life, and this is a free gift coming from grace through Christ. So also the rewards of station, etc., are represented as of divine favor, but distributed through grace to those proportionately whose works express the highest obedience to God and the most devoted service to the Master. The passage must, therefore, be explained so as not to conflict with other divine teaching. The explanation is found in the simple "whatsoever is right, I will give you," "whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive." The householder reserving the right of giving proportionately whatever he deems proper, as a reward for the labor performed. But when the time of payment arrives he gives the last as much as he gave to the first, being satisfied with the labor performed, thus teaching that it is not merely the length of time employed (for e.g. believers have died young who in a few years have done far more for Christ than many who have lived long, etc.) that secures the highest reward. And this is corroborated by the last assertion: "So the last shall be first, and the first last; for many be called, but few chosen." Whatever truths may be deduced from the Parable, it must not, and does not, conflict with the clearly taught degrees of reward. Hence nearly every expositor fully admits our position. Thus e.g. Barnes says on the last verse: "This is the moral or scope of the parable. To teach this it was spoken. Many that in the order of time shall be brought last into the Kingdom, shall be first in the rewards. Higher proportionate rewards shall be given to them than to others. To all justice shall be done. To all to whom the rewards of heaven were promised, they shall be given. Nothing shall be withheld that was promised. If among this number who are called into the Kingdom, I choose to raise some to stations of distinguished usefulness, and to confer on them peculiar talents and higher rewards, I injure no one. They shall enter heaven as was promised. If amidst the multitude of Christians I choose to signalize such men as Paul, and Martyn, and Brainerd, and Spenser, and Summerfield; to appoint some of them to short labor, but to wide usefulness, and raise them to signal rewards, I injure not the great multitude of others who live long lives less useful and less rewarded. All shall reach heaven, and all shall receive what I promise to the faithful." "It (the parable) is simply designed to teach that in the Church, among the multitudes that shall be saved, Christ makes a difference. He makes some more useful than others, without regard to the time which they serve; and He will reward them accordingly. The parable teaches one truth, and but one," etc. But the student must keep in view, as many writers have correctly insisted, that it is not merely the amount of labor that is performed in connection with time, that made e.g. the last receive twelve times as much as the first, but disposition, zeal, humility, etc., rendering the persons worthy or unworthy, must also be regarded.

Obs. 7. A passage most decisive and worthy of serious consideration is the one found in 1 Cor. 3:10-15. Here we have the following evidence corroborative of the correctness of our view. (1) This is a judgment exclusively of believers, who build upon the foundation laid, Jesus. (2) All who have this foundation and build upon it are saved. (3) But some, in securing this salvation, "suffer loss," while others "shall receive a reward." (4) The reception of reward is conditioned on the fact that they build precious, enduring material on this foundation. (5) The endurance of loss is caused by the worthless material placed on the foundation. (6) "Every man's work shall be made manifest," for it will be tested "of what sort it is." This is only illustrating the principle previously (v. 8) announced, "every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor." Now, to receive a reward for building "gold, silver, and precious stones" on this foundation is not to attain simply eternal life, for those who also build "wood, hay, and stubble" on it secure the same, but, following the Scripture analogy of faith, it must relate to position in rulership and to a corresponding loss in rank. The only rational, consistent interpretation is that which here finds that one, owing to faithfulness, etc., obtains a more elevated rank, a higher reward than another. All obtain a glorious prize (1 Cor. 9 : 24), but not all the highest prize (Phil. 3 : 14); all obtain an entrance into the Kingdom, but one a more "abundant entrance" (1 Pet. 1 : 11) than others.

A few practical lessons may be derived from this subject. (1) The tremendous rebuke that this gives to that narrow spirit of exclusiveness—so apparent in some quarters—which considers its own body as alone building "gold, silver, and precious stones" on the foundation, and that others build upon it "wood, hay, and stubble" (although all such exclusive claims so ill harmonize with humility, etc. that they are open to grave suspicion) and will inevitably be damned while they alone are saved. (2) How guarded we should be in building, choosing the proper material, lest we suffer loss. (3) How we should strive, like Paul, to receive a high reward tendered to us by the grace of God. (4) That such advancement is open to all, and the reward proportionate to the use of talents committed to us. (5) That this building on the foundation, as the analogy of faith shows, includes doctrine and life, faith and obedience, love and its fruit—in brief, all that pertains to a Christian and is specially applicable to teachers. (6) The sweet assurance that this gives to the weakest, the most humble and diffident, that accepting of Christ and building—poorly it may be thought—upon it, they shall be saved, and that God's goodness will bear in remembrance every act, even the slightest, of piety and love. (7) That the best of us may have cause to regret that with precious things we have mingled inferior things. (8) That if such is the criterion respecting the believer, surely then the unbeliever who rejects the foundation itself can have no hope. (9) This gain or this loss is eternal; although all are happy in salvation, yet the superiority gained or lost will evermore remain. (10) No one can avoid this scrutiny, for it is essential to his future appointment. (11) That when this appointment is made we will be surprised to see (owing to the secrets, the motives, etc. of men being revealed) some suffer loss, be barely saved, whom we esteemed eminent in piety, and others receive with salvation a rich reward whom we regarded as low in the scale. (12) That we should strive to secure more than mere salvation, especially since the reckoning will be made according to the ability, means, etc. possessed. (13) Prayer and watchfulness are requisite.

Obs. 8. It is in virtue of this future judgment according to works, that believers are so urgently pressed to good works. God sees how largely their future glory and honor depend upon the character now formed, that repeatedly and perseveringly, yea constantly, this is brought to their attention. Take e.g. Col. 3 : 4, 5, 8, 9, 24; 1 Thess. 3 : 12, 13, and 5 : 4-8; Tit. 2 : 12, 13; 1 Pet. 1 : 7-15; 2 Pet. 3 : 11, 12, and many others, and they show God's deep interest in our future welfare, that as "little children, we may abide in Christ, that when He shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed at His Coming" (1 John 2 : 8); that "our love may be made perfect, so that we may have boldness in the Day of Judgment" (1 John 4 : 17). Good works now glorify God (Matt. 5 : 16), qualify for usefulness and happiness (2 Tim. 2 : 21; Tit. 3 : 8), etc., and they do not lose these essentials in the world to come; for, sanctifying unto honor and making us the more meet for the Master's use, they contribute to glorify the Father, Son, and Spirit. And no one can plead inability to perform them, since "God is able to make all grace abound toward you, that ye always, having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work" 2 Cor. 9 : 8 (comp. Phil. 2 : 12; 2 Thess. 2 : 17; 2 Tim. 3 : 16, 17; Heb. 13 : 20, 21; Eph. 2 : 10, etc.). We may rest assured that "God is not unrighteous, to forget your work and labor of love" (Heb. 6 : 10), but will abundantly, through His wonderful grace, verify His promises, "glory, honor, and peace to every man that worketh good" (Rom. 2 : 10). Therefore, Gal. 6 : 9, "Let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not;" 2 John 8, "Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought (gained), but that we receive a full reward."

This distinction in judgment gives us a clue to salvation by faith and salvation by works. Both are truths. The Protestant and the Roman Catholic sides have their foundation in Scripture. But the one is, as we have shown, a salvation unto eternal life (a judgment consummated in the justification and continued—until death—justified state, of the believer); and the other is a salvation unto special glory, honor, inheritance (a judgment to be decided in the Coming day of the Lord Jesus). The one precedes the other; the one is fundamental to the other; the one is ultimately united and blended with the other. The essential point is to be "saved by faith"—but it is also of the highest moment to be "saved by works"—for while the one secures admittance into the Kingdom, the other determines the lot, the reward in that Kingdom. To secure the highest salvation, both must be kept in view, and both must be in unison. The one being a resultant of the other—naturally flowing from it—they cannot exist independent, the one from the other. A living faith will inevitably produce works, and proportionate to that faith will be the product. The reality, strength, and perseverance of saving faith will be evidenced in its fruitfulness, in works of love. And the fruitage—such is grace—becomes the measure of reward, being indicative of loyal obedience and attachment. A man of strong faith will sow bountifully, and he shall also reap bountifully (2 Cor. 9 : 6); he will lay up treasure in heaven (Matt. 6 : 20), abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that our labor is not in vain in the Lord (1 Cor. 15 : 38).

Whether the secret acts, etc. will be publicly revealed (as some hold, like the failings of Abraham, Moses, David, and Peter) or be privately taken cognizance of by the Lord (as others think), one thing is self-evident, that the lot or position assigned to the believer evidences to all others his past faithfulness in God's service. The gradation or rank will ever tell the story of devoted love, holy conversation, and godliness. Whether any of the saints will be rebuked and be made ashamed, on account of negligence, etc. (as some believe, basing it on 1 John 2 : 28; Col. 1 : 22, etc.), one thing is certain, that the consciousness of a time departed, in which the greatest honor was within their reach but unattained, will be vividly impressed. But such is the glory still attained by the lowest; such the impression that it results from marvellous grace and far beyond desert; such the supreme love to the Divine Master and the glowing affection for the fellow-saints who acted more prudently and wisely; such their appreciation of "the workmanship of God, created in Christ Jesus unto good works;" such their hearty acknowledgment of the justice of reaping in mercy the righteousness sowed; such the fulness, joy, and blessedness of a soul in perfected redemption, that neither jealousy, nor envy, nor unhappiness can flow from such differences of degree in glory. While "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead"—yet all this divergence of glory helps to swell the glory of God Himself. Supreme love to God is the controlling, all-absorbing passion of every saved and honored "vessel of mercy," and hence nothing—even that relating to his own inferiority in the corporate body of Christ, can dampen the unutterable bliss of being, after all, thus incorporated and glorified. The "least" and the "greatest" will have "fulness of joy and pleasures forever more." All that we can justly say on this subject is the following: The judgment, in whatever form it is made, will manifest God's justice in assigning the reward; and the self-consciousness of the individual (which, owing to the past forgiveness of sin, the efficacy of Christ's blood and power of His intercession, alone is requisite) will fully acquiesce in the same, and although of different degrees and ranks, every one justified through Christ and being fully redeemed is presented "faultless before the presence of the Father with exceeding joy."

Obs. 9. A prominent doctrine of Pre-Millenarianism is the reign of the saints with Jesus when the Millennial Kingdom is set up (Prop. 154). The saints judge with Christ, inherit together with Him, etc., and for this purpose are raised up and translated; then (as will be shown hereafter) the Kingship and priesthood is assigned to them, and afterward they come with Jesus in the open Parousia. They are themselves "Judges" in the great "Day of Judgment" (e.g. 1 Cor. 6 : 2, 3), and this necessitates a previous, antecedent judgment of themselves. Hence, as already noticed, certain passages of Scripture exclusively refer to the righteous—to a judgment specially relating to the saints. This is not a judgment unto condemnation, but one relating to position, and will be a fulfilment of e.g. 2 Cor. 5 : 10. And yet, considering such passages as Matt. 22 : 11-14 ; Luke 13 : 23-30 ; Matt. 7 : 21-23, it may be true (what many affirm) that also mere professors will at the same time be rejected. But whether this includes professors of former ages or those then living is another question. As the dead in Christ are only raised at the Coming of Jesus (the rest of the dead not until the close of the thousand years), and then also only those accounted worthy, are translated, it is, perhaps, the most prudent and consistent to confine this rejection to living professors, as is fully illustrated e.g. in the warnings given by Jesus respecting the condition of parties at the Second Advent, as realized in the position of the Ten Virgins. We are told that there will be a judgment "of quick and dead," Acts 10 : 42, of "the quick and the dead at His appearing and His Kingdom," 2 Tim. 4 : 1 ; 1 Pet. 4 : 5. The "dead," as we have seen, follow an order : all the dead are ultimately judged, some preceding the Millennial age, the rest after that age. So with the living or "quick," some are judged at His appearing, others in His Kingdom ; for we have the judgment of "the quick" who are translated, of "the quick" under Antichrist, of "the quick" pertaining to the Jewish nation, and of "the quick" embracing the Gentile nations. The general affirmation of a judgment including "the quick and the dead" is thus carried out, and we must not forget that it also comprises the judgment of "the quick" existing in the Church at the time of the Advent. In the judgment of "the dead" there is a discrimination apparent in the order of resurrection, and in the judgment of "the quick" the same discrimination is manifested in the translation of some, in the delivery of the Church and the Jewish nation from the power of Antichrist, in the overthrow of all enemies, in the exaltation of the Jewish nation, etc., running in and through the Millennial age.

In so wonderful and comprehensive a subject as that of the judgment, we can only present the outlines which give a grander estimate of the vast scale upon which it is grounded than the common, narrow Popish limits usually urged in books and pulpits. It also prevents us from falling into an error on the other hand of extending the judgment of believers only to their death, and declaring that after death there is no more judgment concerning them, appealing e.g. to Paul's crown being determined, etc. Now this takes in only the one side of judgment, which is true so far as the justification of the believer is concerned, but totally overlooks another side, which declares of believers that they shall be judged according to their works and be correspondingly rewarded at the Sec. Advent. The judgment unto life is one thing ; the judgment unto reward is another thing ; the former is decided at death, the other at the Coming of the Lord. To unite those two into one is to do violence to the Scriptures, which discriminate ; for if you locate the fulfilment at death it ignores the passages relating to believers at the Sec. Advent, and if you confine judgment exclusively to the Second Coming, then it passes by the justification, etc. of believers in this life and their surety of eternal life. The only true and consistent method, therefore, is to accept of both truths, the one declaring a freedom from judgment unto condemnation, and the other declaring a subjection to a judgment relating to position in the Kingdom. Some writers who advance good ideas on the judgment mar the whole by failing to notice this discrimination, and apply (as e.g. Barbour, Three Worlds, pp. 62-86) passages describing a future reward of works at Christ's Coming, as not descriptive of the resurrected and translated saints, but of those living in "the restitution age," when the whole tenor and spirit of the New Test. is to make them applicable to all believers, from the First Advent down to the Second. A theory that can misapply such passages is necessarily defective.

Various writers take substantially the same view expressed by us concerning the judgment of believers, as e.g. Dr. Cooper in his Essay on Judgment before the Proph. Conference; Dr. Newton in the Proph. Times, vol. 1; Dr. Brookes in Maranatha; Dr. Seiss in Last Times, etc. We append a specimen or two of utterances: "Greybeard" (Graff), in his Lay Sermons (No. 40), after saying that the river Jordan is a type of judgment, the word meaning "River of Judgment," remarks: "The more common assumption that the river Jordan is a symbol of the Christian's dissolution is erroneous. The Jordan is not a boundary-line at all, and the figure is as wrong in geography as it is untrue in theology. The feet of God's chosen people did not touch the waters of the river, and the secret of their protection was the Ark—the typical Christ. Neither will any of God's children ever come into or be touched by the waters of judgment. As it is written: 'He that heareth My Word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into judgment, but is passed from death unto life.' They will pass through the judgment, but it will be in Christ, their Ark of safety, and they will be shielded from its billows." Brookes (Bible Reading on Sec. Adv.) says: "Of course by the judgment of the saints it is not meant that their persons will be judged, as if it were still uncertain whether they personally had been purchased by the blood of Christ; nor is it meant that their sins will be judged, as if the question of their salvation were still unsettled; but only that their works will be judged, and their station in the Kingdom be thus determined. As to their persons, our Lord expressly declares there is no judgment (see John 3:18, and 5:24, where the words condemned and condemnation should be translated judged and judgment); and as to their sins, the Holy Ghost often declares that they are cast behind God's back, cast into the depths of the sea, all forgiven, and never to be remembered" (Isa. 38:17; Mic. 8:19; Col. 2:13; Heb. 10:17). Many such confirmatory statements could be presented.

PROPOSITION 136. The doctrine of the Kingdom in agreement with the doctrine of the intermediate state.

The intermediate state between death and the Second Advent is such as to confirm our doctrinal position, because the Scripture statements clearly and unmistakably teach a detention of the saints from the promised inheritance and reward.

Our argument is not concerned in the location or description of this intermediate state. Whether it be in the third heaven, or in some place specially set apart for the purpose, or in the grave, etc.; whether it be a conscious state of high enjoyment, or a pleasurable dream state, or one of unconsciousness, etc.—these things, however interesting, do not fall within our line of reasoning. Whatever view may be held respecting the place or the actual state does not affect our doctrinal position, provided such a view places the period of recompensing, rewarding at the future resurrection of the just. Works specially devoted to this subject are accessible, in which these points are discussed by their respective advocates. Our concern is only with one aspect of the subject. For we hold that the principle announced by Calvin (Instit., b. 3, ch. 25, s. 6), of incompleteness of redemption, must be maintained: "Since Scripture uniformly enjoins us to look with expectation to the Advent of Christ, and delays the crown of glory till that period, let us be contented with the limits divinely prescribed to us, viz., that the souls of the righteous, after their warfare is ended, obtain blessed rest, where in joy they wait for the fruition of promised glory, and that thus the final result is suspended till Christ the Redeemer appear." So again he says: "Christ is our Head, whose Kingdom and glory have not yet appeared. If the members were to go before their Head, the order of things would be inverted and preposterous; but we shall follow our Prince then, when He shall come in the glory of His Father, and sit upon the throne of His majesty." (Comp. Tyndale's remarks, p. 324; Works by Fox, and his Reply to Moore, and the references by Brooks in his El. of Proph. Interp., and in Abdiel's Essays.)

Obs. 1. The Propositions that have preceded show that any view which unduly exalts the intermediate state or condition after death must correspondingly depreciate the Second Advent as "The Blessed Hope," the resurrection as completed Redemption, the covenant as still to be verified, and the prophecies as realized on earth. The prominence heaped upon the condition of saints after death (so different from the Scriptural position, which says so little respecting it), and the extravagant eulogies attached to it, are practically leading multitudes to make little or nothing of the Advent, the resurrection, the covenant, and the prophecies. If we are to credit the many statements made, then the latter can make no improvement in the condition of believers, for after death such (we are informed) are crowned, rewarded, inherit, etc. Our doctrinal position enters a protest against this perversion, and to sustain such an averment confidently appeals to the Scriptural teaching and that of the Early Church. The postponement of the Kingdom to the Sec. Coming, the inheriting only at its manifestation, the design of the present dispensation, the Pre-Mill. resurrection and its recompense, the rewards connected with a restored glorious Theocratic Kingdom here on the earth, the time for the ample fulfilment of the Abrahamic and Davidic covenants, and other related points, only find a unity in supporting the same, if the condition of saints during this intermediate period is one in which they are represented as not crowned, as not rewarded, and as not inheriting, but that (whatever their actual state as to conscious happiness) they are still imperfect as to realized Redemption, and waiting for the Advent and resurrection for a completed restoration to forfeited blessings and exaltation to Kingship and priesthood. The reader can readily see that this is an important feature in the argument, and that if the Scriptures sustain us in the affirmation that they are imperfect and waiting, we add another link to our chain of evidence.

How perverted this doctrine in the hands of multitudes has become, so that death itself is transmuted into "the Prince of Peace," and the resurrection is associated with death itself (entire bodies of professing Christians holding the same); how profuse the eulogies heaped upon the saints fallen asleep in Jesus, so that their blessedness is completed, not requiring a Coming of Jesus unto salvation—all this has been pointed out (see e.g. Prop. 121, Obs. 7, and 124, Obs. 2, and 125, Obs. 2 and 5, etc.). Our obituary notices in religious papers are full of untruthful sentences, and many works (like "Heaven our Home," etc.) are replete with unscriptural statements concerning the reward of the righteous. Things which exclusively belong to the period of the Second Advent—and so expressly stated by the Spirit—are misquoted and applied to the deceased in order to comfort the bereaved. Popery and Protestantism, professed Orthodoxy and Heterodoxy, are alike prodigal of exalting the present state of the dead. Very recently a prominent minister eulogized the death of a brother minister, and made, without reflection, the condition of the latter immensely superior to Paul's, for he had him "crowned," etc., when Paul still awaits his crown (2 Tim. 4 : 8). Rev. Dr. — likewise had occasion to describe the blessedness of a brother divine deceased, as follows: "Yes! our brother is saved and crowned forever." "And to the bereaved family, the words of the pitying Saviour to weeping Mary are addressed in all their tenderness and sympathy: 'Why weep ye? He is not here, but risen.' He has already entered the everlasting rest." Thousands of assertions similar to Thomas Gibbon's (Ser. noticed in Crit. Review, vol. 1, p. 566) might be produced as illustrations: "The moment a saint dies, or rather the moment that his veil of flesh drops off, that moment begins his blissful era of perfect life and glory." Victor Hugo's picture of the reception of Louis XVII. into heaven (poem on—Van Laun's His. Fr. Liter., vol. 3, p. 326), is matched (Luth. Obs., March 1st, 1878) by Beecher's saying in a sermon that Pius IX. was carried by angels direct to heaven into Christ's presence, etc. (which Romanists must doubt, seeing that in many churches prayers and masses were said in his behalf). Our hymnology is overflowing with this perversion of promise, and the pulpits aid it on by quoting promise after promise without the least regard to its order of realization. The strong faith and hope, the anticipated triumph over death, the blessed and glorious consciousness of forgiveness, acceptance, and peace, the precious removal of the sting of death, the foretaste and earnest of joy, graciously given by God to many saints in the dying hour, is at once elevated to the standard by which to measure the intermediate state, and deductions are drawn of so extravagant a nature that it is amazing that any believer in the Word—which alone is capable of throwing light on the future—can accept of them.

Obs. 2. The Scriptures bearing on this subject are decided. Thus e.g. the glory with Christ is thus expressed: Col. 3 : 4, "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye appear with Him in glory." (So "praise, honor, and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ," 1 Pet. 1 : 7; "grace that shall be brought to you at the revelation of Jesus Christ," 1 Pet. 1 : 13; "glad also with exceeding joy," "when His glory shall be revealed," 1 Pet. 4 : 13, etc.) The being fashioned like unto Christ is thus declared: "Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doeth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is," 1 John 3 : 2 (comp. Phil. 3 : 21; Rom. 8 : 17-23, etc.). The time of inheriting is thus specified : Matt. 25 : 31-34 ; Col. 3 : 4, 24 ; 1 Pet. 1 : 3-7, 13, when the Son of man is revealed in His glory. The rest is thus given : 2 Theas. 1 : 7, "God will give you rest, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven" (comp. Prop. 143). The mansions are given, John 14 : 2, 3, when "I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also" (comp. Prop. 170). The "new heavens and new earth" are still future, and linked with the Sec. Advent, e.g. 2 Pet. 3 : 13 ; Rev. 21 : 1 (comp. Props. 148-151). While perseverance unto death secures a crown (Rev. 2 : 10), yet the time when the crown itself is given is thus stated : 1 Pet. 5 : 4, "When the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away" (comp. when Paul, and all others, receive their crown, 2 Tim. 4 : 8). The period of rewarding is thus explicitly described : Matt. 16 : 27, "For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of His Father with His angels ; and then He shall reward every man according to his works" (comp. Rom. 2 : 6, 16 ; Rev. 22 : 12, and 11 : 18 ; Luke 14 : 14, etc.). Thus the entire tenor of the Scripture is, as our position demands, an overleaping of the intermediate state, as if it were not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed at the Coming again of Jesus ; and a positive asserting of rewarding, crowning, inheriting, etc., at that time. We dare not reverse the order thus laid down, and any theory which requires such a transposition is most certainly defective.

Hence so very little is said concerning the intermediate state, because it is an imperfect state, i.e. with incompleted redemption. Dr. Poor in Lange's Com., 1 Cor., p. 349, refers to Paul's passing by the intermediate state and linking the hope (as e.g. in 1 Cor. 15) of salvation with the resurrection of the saint. He correctly argues that "the world to come" is not the state after death, but a definite fixed age or period in the future associated with the Sec. Advent and resurrection. Therefore there would be an impropriety to say that at death a soul entered into "the world to come," for, he adds : "That future world or age has not yet come in, and no one can be said to enter it until Christ appears to set up His Kingdom. It is then only that the earth will be in readiness for the reception of the risen saints. And inasmuch as the glory which they are waiting for is to be found here, it will be seen why a resurrection is necessary—why they want a body at all, and a glorified body, since it is in this as their organ that they will be fitted to dwell in a glorified earth and enjoy the felicity of that age. According to Paul's theory, man is not to be separated from this lower creation, of which he forms a part, and of which he is the lord," etc.

Obs. 3. Other Scriptures confirm the imperfect and waiting condition of the saints. Thus e.g. in Heb. 11 : 39, 40—after the apostle had enumerated a long list of ancient worthies, some deceased for some centuries and others more recent, but all in this intermediate state—he says of them : "And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise ; God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." Here it is positively asserted : (1) that not having received the promise (which refers to the promised inheritance, as shown e.g. v. 13, comp. with Gal. 3 : 18, etc.—comp. Prop. 49), it is still future to them ; (2) that in their present condition they are not "perfect," i.e. enjoy the blessings of a full Redemption as promised ; (3) that this perfectness or completeness of realization of faith in God's promises is to be attained in connection with believers in Christ (who also receive the promise by faith, but under increased light, divine teaching, etc.) ; (4) that all believers, ancient and modern, Pre- and Post-Christian, are to be made perfect or complete at the same time, i.e. experience the completeness of salvation. (Some, as Barnes, apply this "perfect" to the completion of Revelation as a system, but this is not the subject discussed; the reference to the non-reception of the promise demands an interpretation of the "perfect" in a realization of the promise by themselves personally.) The saints after death are represented as hoping and waiting for greater blessings (Rev. 6 : 9, 10, 11, comp. with 20 : 4-6), and it is in view of this that the apostles, when comforting the bereaved, do not dwell on the intermediate state, but refer such for consolation to the period when Redemption is completed, as e.g. 1 Thess. 4 : 13-18. And it is because of this still imperfect and waiting nature of the period between death and the Advent, that the apostles, in the midst of trials and sufferings, overleap the intermediate, and exhort to patience unto the Coming of the Lord, e.g. James 5 : 7.

Nast (Com. Matt. 22 : 31, 32) justly observes : "That the Scriptures attach more importance to the resurrection of the body than to the mere self-conscious existence of the soul in its disembodied state, arises from the fact that the disembodied state of the soul is considered in the Scriptures as something imperfect, abnormal, so much so that even the souls of the just look forward with intense desire to their reunion (Rom. 8 : 11, 23) with their bodies." We have only to contrast the Scripture statements respecting death and its results with those of the resurrection and its results, to see that Nast, and many others who make similar declarations, are correct in affirming such an "imperfect, abnormal" condition.

Obs. 4. In the very nature of the case there must be an incompleated salvation during this period, because both soul and body constitute the person redeemed, and so long as "the redemption of the body," Rom. 8 : 23, is not experienced, an imperfect state must exist. Besides this, the forfeited blessings, such as the restored earthly Paradise, the dominion over the earth, the absolute victory over death, are not realized in it. And in the promised blessings of glorification, rulership on the earth, association with Jesus in His inheritance and glory, none of these are experienced, being, as we have seen, always combined, as a resultant, with the Sec. Advent.

Dr. Nevin (Mystical Presence, p. 171) says : "The whole argument in the 15th ch. of 1st Cor., as well as the representation in 1 Thess. 4 : 13-18, proceeds on the assumption that the life of the body, as well as that of the soul, is indispensable to the perfect state of our nature as human. The soul, then, during the intermediate state, cannot possibly constitute, in the biblical view, a complete man; and the case requires, besides, that we should conceive of its relation to the body as still in force; not absolutely destroyed, but only suspended. The whole condition is interimistic, and by no possibility of conception capable of being thought of as complete and final." Dr. Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., p. 24) concedes that death, or the condition after death, is not to be put in the place of Christ's Sec. Advent, and that the state of "the just is not only incomplete, but, in some sense, private and fragmentary, if I may so express myself. But at the Redeemer's appearing all His redeemed will be collected together, and perfectly and publicly glorified." (Comp. Prop. 121, Obs. 7 (4), and note, and Prop. 120, Obs. 4.)

Obs. 5. Another distinctive and remarkable feature corroborates our position. Every writer on the subject of the intermediate state confesses that no attempt is made in any place whatever to describe it. The various theories and descriptions respecting it are drawn from inferences, and the admission is fully made by writers of all classes (who hold to a future personal Sec. Advent), that the eye of faith and the heart of hope is fixed, not so much on the condition after death as to the condition after the Advent. Now why such a procedure? The key lies in this simple fact, viz., that the intermediate state (whatever it may be) has no relationship whatever to the fulfilment of covenant and prophecy pertaining to Redemption, and consequently is not portrayed.

Thus to illustrate the utterances of many theologians, take e.g. Knapp (Ch. Theology, p. 518), who says : " Before this time (i.e. the resurrection of the body) shall arrive, the disembodied spirit will be in a certain intermediate state. The exact nature of this state is not, indeed, particularly described to us, and we are unable even to conceive of it distinctly ; but so much the Bible plainly teaches, that immediately after death the soul passes into that state for which, from the nature of its previous life, it is prepared." In what the rewards and punishments of this intermediate state will consist cannot be determined, nor whether, in addition to those which are natural—the necessary consequences of action and feeling—there will also be, even then, those which are positive and result from the free appointment of God."

Obs. 6. The Early Church doctrine, established under the direct auspices of the apostles, and the elders appointed by them, was, over against Gnosticism and other errors, universally held as follows : that the hope of the believer was in the Sec. Advent (expected speedy), at which period the inheriting of the Kingdom, the crowning and rewarding was located. In the intermediate state it was held that there was a non-fulfilment of covenant promises, the realization of which was allied with the Sec. Coming of Jesus. Much was made of the Sec. Advent, the resurrection of the saints, and the resultant glory, so that in Eschatology these things were pre-eminently prominent—a prominence unfortunately undermined by the Alexandrian school and overthrown by the Papacy. Now how can we possibly account for the Early Church view, given under divine auspices, on so important a matter, unless it be the correct one, sustained as it is by a consistent appeal to Scripture?

Comp. Brooks' Essays (Abdiel's), and El. Proph. Interpretation, Bish. Taylor's Liberty of Prophecy, s. 8. We quote Taylor, charging the Romish Church with contradicting early Church doctrine, as follows : " That is a plain secession from antiquity, which was determined by the Council of Florence, ' that the souls of the pious, being purified, are immediately at death received into heaven, and behold clearly the triune God, just as He is ;—for those who please to try may see it dogmatically resolved to the contrary by Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Origen, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Aréthas Cæsariensis, Enthymius, who may answer for the Greek Church. And it is plain that it was the opinion of the Greek Church, by that great difficulty the Romans had of bringing the Greeks to subscribe to the Florentine Council, where the Latins acted as their masterpiece of wit and strategem, the greatest that hath been till the famous and super-politic Council of Trent. And for the Latin Church, Tertullian, Ambrose, Austin, Hilary, Prudentius, Lactantius, Victorinus, and Bernard, are known to be of opinion that the souls of the saints are in abditis receptaculis et exterioribus atris (in private receptacles and in more outward courts), where they expect the resurrection of their bodies and the glorification of their souls ; and though they all believe them to be happy, yet that they enjoy not the beatific vision before the resurrection." Some writers feel the incubus of the early Church view upon their modern conceptions, and try to make the impression that the fathers entertained the modern engrafted notions. Thus e.g. Pressense (Early Years of Christianity ; The Martyrs, etc., p. 250) attributes to Justin at his martyrdom the expressed belief of an immediate ascension to heaven when his head was cut off, saying, " I know it, yes, beyond all power to doubt, I know it." Now, when we ask for the authority of a belief which flatly contradicts Justin's own published faith, we are referred to Rinault's Acta Martyrum Sincera, a work, like similar ones, which largely draws on the imagination for professed details. When Pressense declares, " The details of the narrative correspond with all that is known of Justin," we beg to differ, and assert—from Justin's own writings—the contrary. In reference to this substitution of death for " the blessed hope," etc., the reader will find some excellent remarks by Gordon in his Essay on the First Resurrection.

Obs. 7. The Jewish view must be considered by the student. This, as stated by numerous authorities, was decided, viz., that the Patriarchs and their deceased descendants, that all who had died true Israelites, were only to be raised to glory and covenanted promises at the Coming of the Messiah. Whatever differences of opinion existed as the actual condition of dead ones, all were united in the common view that at the Advent of the promised David's Son, then, and then only, would the promises of God respecting a glorious Salvation be completed. The abundance of quotations already given under previous Propositions fully show this faith. But now observe that this identical Jewish faith is incorporated in the New Test. and in the Early Church, with this difference, that what the Jews attributed to the First Advent of the Messiah, the New Test. and Early Church applied to the Second Advent of Jesus the Messiah.

Take e.g. such a writer as Knapp, who endeavors to make as much as possible out of death, yet (Ch. Theol., Lects. 149 and 150) he very fairly gives the Jewish view as materially different from the modern one of immediate entrance into heaven, and admits that an intermediate state was held "by many of the Church Fathers—e.g. Justin the Martyr, Irenæus, and Tertullian. The student need only refer to our Biblical Cyclops. and Dicts., in Arts. on "Sheol" and "Hades," as well as those on Jewish belief, and he will find abundant material in behalf of our position. Those who press the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus to a delineation of the bliss and suffering of the righteous and wicked after death, gain nothing after all but an intermediate state separate and distinct from the third heaven or from the rewards, etc., at the Sec. Advent. Whatever view we take of its teaching, this is the result. Thus e.g. Hudson (Debt and Grace, p. 257) remarks: "The Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, also, will not sustain the modern expectation of entering heaven at death. Borrowed from the Jews themselves, it simply illustrates their dramatic conceptions of the under world." So Van Oosterzee (Lange's Com. Luke, p. 256) on the same, says: "Paradise, which is here spoken of as the destined place of the blessed, must be carefully distinguished from the third heaven, 2 Cor. 12 : 4, the dwelling-place of the perfected righteous. The Paradise is, on the other hand, in the intermediate state a place of incipient, although refreshing, rest, in which the Jews conceived all the saints of the Old Test. as united in joy." Some Jews, however, as Hudson (above), notices, "did not consider the Patriarchs as living until the resurrection." But all united in the idea of a detention, an intermediate state.

Obs. 8. While it is true that our argument is not affected one way or the other, no matter what theory of the intermediate state is held (provided only that the non-fulfilment of the covenant promises, the inheriting, crowning, and rewarding, is conceded)—the third heaven theory of the multitude, the spheres of Origen, the intermediate state of Stilling, Hahn, etc., the underground world of Storrs, etc.—yet it may be proper, in this connection, to point out that if this intermediate state is one of detention, if it is intermistic and incomplete, a certain incongruity exists in locating it in the third heaven. Rejecting Romish Purgatory and Cameron's (Future State) prayer for the dead as unscriptural; without attempting to explain the actual place and condition of the saints which the Bible leaves indefinite and unexplained (saving in general terms expressive of security of Redemption and blessedness), it may be sufficient to direct attention to the Primitive Church view as presented by Justin Martyr (Dial. Tryp. c. 80): "If you meet with some who are called Christians" (i.e. Gnostics) "who . . . dare calumniate the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and who say that there is no resurrection of the dead, but that at death their souls are received up into heaven, do not regard them as Christians." This, as Hudson (Debt and Grace, p. 254) has well observed, is "the more remarkable because he had been a Platonist." Irenæus (Contra Hæres. l. 5, c.

31, § 2), thus opposes the Gnostics: "How shall not they be confounded who say that the Underworld (inferos) is this world of ours, and their inner man, on leaving the body here, ascends the supercelestial place?" "The souls of His (Christ's) disciples also, for whom the Lord did these things, go away into an unseen place appointed them by God, and there abide until the resurrection which they await. Then receiving bodies and rising entire, that is, bodily, as the Lord also arose, they come thus to the vision of God." Others, as Polycarp (Epis. Phil.), speak of "the place due and promised," and Tertullian (On the Soul, On Paradise, and On the Res.) asserts that the souls are "detained in safe keeping in Hades until the day of the Lord," "that all souls are compelled into the Underworld" (although the love of martyrdom and its eulogy made an exception as stated by Tertullian: "No one, on leaving the body, dwells immediately with the Lord, except he who, by the prerogative of martyrdom, shall go to Paradise instead of the Underworld." The only key to Paradise is your blood"). Such a doctrine of detention and of non-introduction to heaven itself, in view of the prevailing philosophy and the earnest desire of believers to secure Redemption, could not have arisen and become so extended unless it were derived from apostolic teaching. It is, therefore, the most prudent to avoid a dogmatic expression as to place, seeing how largely the Early Church, which one should suppose, owing to nearness to the apostles, ought to know the truth, if revealed, differs from modern conceptions.

Origen (comp. Prop. 169, Obs. 1) could not spiritualize this intermediate state away, and although somewhat contradictory (showing the change of view progressing) he positively (De Principiis, b. 2, ch. 11) places the saints after death "in some place situated on the earth, which Holy Scripture calls Paradise, as in some place of instruction," etc., but afterward, with his peculiar doctrine of progression added, has them when qualified to "ascend to a place in the air and reach the Kingdom of heaven, through those mansions, so to speak, in the various places which the Greeks have termed spheres, i.e. globes, but which Holy Scripture has called heaven," etc. The intermediate state was one always allied, more or less, with Millenarianism, and so e.g. Neander (Genl. Ch. His., vol. 2, sec. on Mill.) notices how it was specially connected with our doctrine. Prof. Bush (Anastasis) quotes Justin, and remarks that the notion opposed by Justin is regarded by him as "a heresy," viz., "that immediately on death the soul is received up to heaven," but Bush (who denies a bodily resurrection, having a resurrection to accompany, or immediately follow, death, and making such an ascension to heaven a contingent proof of it) explains Justin's view to be owing to "the prevalence of the Millenarian doctrine," and then adds: "That doctrine (Millenarian) has been from that day to this the grand support of the crass conceptions which have been entertained on the subject of the resurrection." This we accept as the highest possible praise (comp. Props. 125-28), seeing that our doctrine thus opposes the Gnostic corruptions introduced which make Redemption incomplete, and Christ's bodily resurrection unnecessary (if not a farce), especially when Prof. Bush has to turn away from the early Fathers and seek consolation in Cicero, praising the "evangelical tone of Cicero," because the latter says in his Tusculan Questions: "that souls may, when they have forsaken their bodies, come into heaven as into their own domicile." Gnosticism, as a reference to Church history (Neander, Kurtz, Mosheim, etc.) clearly shows, had a wonderful moulding influence on the doctrine of the intermediate state. The Papacy incorporated Origen's view, attaching to it the doctrine of purgatory, making the detention, the process of release, and final ascension to heaven a source of power and profit to the church. In the case of eminent or distinguished persons an immediate ascension to the third heaven was predicted (as e.g. when Louis XVI. was beheaded, his confessor exclaimed, "Son of Louis, ascend to heaven"), but of lesser ones a purgatorial requisition was in place. This exaltation of the saints to the third heaven is really the foundation of the invocation and intercession of saints, who (according to the creed of Pope Pius IV.) are now "reigning together with Christ," having either been delivered from purgatory or directly ascended to heaven. This is seen e.g. in the difficulty of Pope John XXII. (Draper's Intel. His. of Europe, p. 394), who raised the question of "the beatific vision," declaring that none of the dead saints would enjoy it until after the Judgment Day. He was accused of heresy, and of taking a course opposed to the interests of the church; for the question was at once raised: "If the saints stand not in the presence of God, of what use is their intercession? What is the use of addressing prayers to them?" It may be that owing to this usage of the Papacy (as well as to its former reception in the Church, and Scriptural support), it (Thompson's Theol. of Christ, ch. 13) "obtains especially in the Lutheran communion, but has able advocates as well in other communions." It is held by many, as can be seen in articles on "Intermediate State" in Herzog, and other Cyclopædias, in "Eschatology," in various Systems of Theology, etc. Thus e.g. comp. art. on in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop., which rejects the idea of the saints immediately after death entering heaven, and declares that the long interval between the decease of Christians and the resurrection "is sufficient to prove that they do not instantly pass from the Church Militant to the New Jerusalem above." Rejecting the state of unconsciousness and of purgatory, the idea of locality, and passage of time, it maintains strictly "an intermediate state." It cites various authorities and quarterlies containing articles. Hudson's "Debt and Grace" has some valuable considerations, referring to the Fathers, Tyndale, Luther, etc., and explaining the passages (2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:21-23) supposed to teach the contrary—holding that "those addressed in the Epis. to the Hebrews did not consider 'the general assembly of the Church of the first-born' as being already in heaven; their names only were written there" (to which we add that the distinctive mention of "first-born" is indicative of a still future resurrection—with which it is allied—not yet experienced). G. S. Faber in The Many Mansions has the spirits of men, good and bad, in Hades, where they are detained, neither entering heaven nor hell, until the resurrection. "Greybeard," in his Lay Sermons, No. 104, makes "the being with Christ," Phil. 1:23, 24, "present with the Lord," 2 Cor. 5:8, etc., a state of blessed repose with Christ in sleep, as though a night, preparatory to an awakening at the resurrection (Hudson, above, explains such passages as an overleaping the intermediate state by anticipation, and seizing the ultimate result at the resurrection). Dr. Smeltzer advocates "The Intermediate State" in The Quarterly Review, April, 1873, and so many who have no sympathy whatever with Millenarianism hold to the same. Even Macnight on Heb. 11:40-43 (Com.) is forced to lay down the doctrine that the righteous are only rewarded at the Sec. Advent, giving as proof John 14:3, Matt. 13:40, 43, 1 Pet. 4:13 and 5:4, 1 John 3:2. Van Oosterzee (Dog., vol. 2, sec. 142) makes the departed saint "only blessed in hope," awaiting the Sec. Advent (with which comp. Martensen's—Ch. Dog., s. 276—advocacy of an intermediate state, and see Hagenbach's His. of Doc., vol. 1, s. 77). Works having a discussion of the subject or references to the same are numerous, including such as Bickersteth's Hades and Heaven, Huidekoper's Belief of the First Three Centuries Concerning Christ's Mission to the Underworld, Sear's Foregleams of Immortality, Whately's Future State, Copland's Mortal Life, Alger's Old His. Doc. Future Life, Fiddes' Doc. Fut. State, Humphrey's Transl. of Athanasoras on State of the Dead, Blackburne's His. View of the Controversy from Reformation to 1772, etc.

It is only necessary to say to the critical student that whatever differences may exist respecting the meaning of "Sheol" and "Hades" (see Bib. Lexicons, etc.), whether it be taken in a most comprehensive or in a limited sense, one thing is self-evident, that neither Sheol nor Hades ever stands for the third heaven, and yet all the departed, both good and bad, enter there; and the simple fact that both classes enter the same designated place ought of itself to be amply sufficient to cause the current third heaven application to be seriously questioned. Every definition of these terms (e.g. by Stuart, Campbell, etc.) including under-world, the region of the dead, state of the dead, grave, etc., forbids its being connected with heaven, and it was evidently this usage that influenced Luther (Table Talk, "On God's Word," ch. 29) to say, as both the rich man and Lazarus entered Hades, the same place: "Abraham's bosom is the promise and assurance of salvation, and the expectation of Jesus Christ; not heaven itself, but the expectation of heaven." (So Trench on the Parables: "Abraham's bosom" is not heaven, though it will issue in heaven; so neither is "Hades" hell, though it will issue in it, when death and Hades shall be cast into the lake of fire, which is the proper hell;" comp. Knapp, Ch. Theol., p. 526, saying of the early Fathers who held to "a state which is neither heaven nor hell:—"This intermediate state they call, taking the appellation from Luke 16, Sinum Abrahami."") A simple comparison of these terms and usage will alone decide the cautious student to avoid the popular application, especially when the few texts supposed to conflict must be controlled in interpretation by the general analogy on the subject. Nothing can be made out decisive by the usage of the word "Paradise," for the student well knows that it was employed to designate both a heavenly and an earthly Paradise—that it means a pleasure or delightful garden, a blissful abode either in heaven or on earth, and that, therefore, the early and later Fathers used it simply to designate a place where the saints were happy. Another subject often blended with this one, viz., the natural or acquired immortality, or the intermediate nature of man, does not require any notice from us, for the reason that whatever view is held (and all these are most ably represented in works specially devoted to them) none of them demands, as a necessary sequence, the rewarding of the saints after death and before the Advent, or the rejection of a detention, imperfect state, or the elevation of the saints to the third heaven. Writers who hold to these several theories unite with us in asserting the incompleteness of Redemption in this intermediate state, the non-exaltation of the saints to heaven, and the necessity of the Sec. Advent to complete salvation. From those who advocate the highest blissful, active consciousness in a Paradise located in Hades, down through those who have gradations of bliss to a pleasant sleep, down to utter unconsciousness—all, whatever they may make out of this intermediate state, insist upon an imperfect state, outside of heaven, which imperfection is removed at the Second Coming of Jesus.

To illustrate how men hastily infer a doctrine and dogmatically assert it respecting the intermediate state, we refer to Dr. Clark's Man all Immortal. He correctly encounters various errors on the subject, as e.g. "that the saints of God enter upon the full realization of their everlasting felicity immediately at death, and independently of their resurrection bodies;" and he shows this to be unscriptural because "everywhere do the Scriptures teach us that it is in connection with his body man is to attain his highest destiny." But instead of leaving "Sheol" and "Hades" represent an intermediate place aside from the third heaven, he insists upon it that the intermediate place embraces for the saints the third heaven. The proof given for this positive declaration is the following: Jesus Christ is in the third heaven, and as dead saints are represented to be with Christ or Christ with them, they must also be in the third heaven. Unfortunately this is pure inference formed by combining two classes of passages, which combination is not given by the Spirit, for no passage exists which describes the intermediate state as located in the third heaven. We admit that Christ is there, but while there He is also here in the believer, in the sacraments, in the closet of prayer, in the Church, etc. God is everywhere (Ps. 139 : 7-12) present, and the presence, care, protection, etc., of Jesus over the departed in this intermediate state is affirmed. Dr. Clarke's argument proceeds on the assumption that if Jesus is in the third heaven He cannot specially be in the intermediate state if one of consciousness and blessedness, and if a place separate and distinct from the former. If Jesus specially appeared to Paul, etc., He can specially manifest Himself to others, wherever they may be located. Harbaugh in "Heaven," etc., takes the same view that Clark does, based on the same assumption, ignoring totally the meaning attached to the Scriptures respecting "Sheol and Hades," into which all enter, and into which Jesus Himself entered during the short period of His detention, and in which David (Acts 2 : 34) is still detained. We conclude by saying: our view of the intermediate state as an imperfect one, the saint still unclothed and waiting, answers the question so often put to us, viz., how we can reasonably expect the saints who have been ages in heaven, enjoying its bliss, clothed upon with a spiritual or semi-spiritual body, glorified or semi-glorified, to come here to this earth to reign, etc., after such a blessed experience? Our answer is plain: No two stages of glorification, embodiment, completed Redemption after death are described in the Scriptures. The glorification, the Christ-like embodiment, the perfected Redemption, are all attached to the Second Advent and the resurrection of the just.

Obs. 9. We insist upon it that the intermediate state, expressed by the terms Hades and Sheol, continues down not only to the Second Advent, but to the end of the Mill. age. For it is only (Rev. 20 : 13, 14) after the close of the thousand years and little season that the realm of the dead, through the power of Jesus, is utterly removed. (Comp. Revision, Vario-rum, etc.) While some are removed from it, and reign with Christ, etc., others are kept in it until this final period. Hence, we cannot, without violence, allow a change to have been introduced at the First Advent, viz., that saints since then are directly taken to heaven, and therefore do not now enter Hades. Such a view is opposed to the general analogy of the Scriptures, which makes every believer to follow the humiliation of the Master, and like Him enter Hades; it multiplies the prayer of faith given to every believer (e.g. in Ps.) for deliverance from Hades ; it makes the distinguishing characteristic of Jesus at His Coming, as having "the keys of Hades," of no personal interest to the believer. One passage alone is decisive of two truths, viz., that the saints in Hades are not in heaven, and that believers at the future res. of the saints are still in Hades, and that is, 1 Cor. 15 : 54, 55, "I will redeem them from the hand of Hades, I will ransom them from death. O death, I will be thy plagues ; O Hades, I will be thy destruction."

Let the student keep in view the following points, viz., (1) Hades (so Sheol) is "in opposition to heaven" (so Lange, Matt. ch. 11 : 23, and see the references to Owen, Alexander, etc., who concede it) ; (2) the Scriptural representations that all believers, like their Head, enter Hades ; (3) that Jesus, at His Coming, having the keys of Hades, delivers His people ; (4) that others remain in Hades until the thousand years are ended ; (5) that in Hades there is incompleteness of redemption ; (6) that those in Hades are represented as waiting for the glorious redemption. The reception of these points—all clearly taught—preserves Scriptural unity. We direct attention to Dr. Craven's Excursus on Hades in Lange's Com. on Rev., pp. 364-378, which will repay perusal. Much that he says is confirmatory of our view, and can be cordially received. He makes Hades an intermediate place in the Unseen World, distinct from heaven and hell, having before the resurrection of Jesus two compartments, one of comfort and the other of misery, one for the pious and the other for the wicked ; but after the resurrection of Jesus, the righteous being delivered from Hades and having ascended to heaven with Him, only the wicked are taken to Hades (reserved in misery against the day of general judgment), while the righteous are taken to heaven. While serious objections can be urged against several of the points taken by him, we are only concerned in this alleged change which takes it as a fact that one compartment of Hades, employed for the retention of the righteous, has been vacated and unused since the ascension of Jesus. However ably urged, we cannot receive this view, because the deliverance of the saints from Hades (e.g. Hos. 13 : 14, comp. with 1 Cor. 15) is directly associated with the Pre-Mill. Advent of Jesus and the resurrection distinctive of believers. His proof (as e.g. John 14 : 2, 3, see Prop. 170) is considered and explained under various propositions, and requires no special repetition. We object not to a partial removal at the resurrection and ascension of Jesus of captives delivered from Hades if that be insisted upon, but we insist on its continuance as the state or abode of all men until the Coming of Jesus, who says : "I have the keys of death and of Hades." (Comp. e.g. Dr. Seiss in The Apocalypse, p. 99.) When He comes then, according to Paul's testimony, death and Hades will be conquered by Him, and give up to the Conqueror those accounted worthy of the better, pre-eminant resurrection.

PROPOSITION 137.—This doctrine of the Kingdom sustained by the phrase "the world to come."

If we find this phrase employed by the Jews to designate a particular period of time, and if it is adopted by the apostles, without the slightest hint as to a change in its meaning, it is fair and just to conclude that in the Apostles' estimation it continued to retain the meaning ascribed to it by the Jews.

Obs. 1. Let us briefly consider in what sense the phrase, "the world to come" was used by the Jews. Prof. Bush (Anas. p. 136) says: "'The judgment of the great day,' the period of 'the world to come,' is that period which in the Jewish Christology was identical with the reigning and judging supremacy of the Messiah." He quotes Lightfoot in confirmation, and adds from the Sohar, fol. 81, "In the world to come the holy blessed God will vivify the dead and raise them from their dust," etc., and then refers to Pococke (Porta Mosis, Not. Miscel. p. 166) who says, that R. Saadiah maintains that "the resurrection is to take place during the Messiah's reign on the earth, and so that the promise of the dead Israelites being brought out of their sepulchres is to be accomplished in this world or age, and that we are not to suppose that it pertains to another; consequently the prediction of Daniel respecting the many that sleep in the dust, with various other Scriptures, is to be fulfilled in the time of salvation, a phrase entirely equivalent to the days of the Messiah." "So it is said in Toreth Adam, fol. 105, that the day of judgment will commence, sub initium dierum resurrectionis, at the beginning of the days of the resurrection." (Comp. Prop. 133.) According to Buxtorf, as quoted by Barnes on Heb. 2 : 5, it was employed by the Jews to denote "the world which is to exist after this world is destroyed, and after the resurrection of the dead, when souls shall be again united to their bodies," or "the days of the Messiah, when He shall reign on the earth." The Targum of Palestine (Dr. Etheridge's Transl.) on Balaam's prophecy has: "If the house of Israel kill me with the sword, then, it is made known to me, I shall have no portion in the world to come; nevertheless, if I may but die the death of the true! O that my last end may be as the least among them." The student will find additional references to the opinion that "the world to come" referred to the reign of Messiah after the resurrection in Lightfoot's works, Wetstein, Schoettgen (Bloomfield, Heb. 2 : 5), Clarke's, Lange's, and other Commentaries. See Props. 138 and 139.

The Talmud frequently speaks of Israelites receiving "a portion of the world to come," "a part in the world to come," and asserts: "He who denies that the Scriptures are from heaven has no part in the world to come," "the generation of the deluge have no part in the world to come," "the generation of the dispersion (at the building of the tower of Babel) have no part in the world to come," "the people of Sodom have no part in the world to come," etc., speaking also of "this world and that to come," etc. Hence

Barnes, Com. Heb. 6 : 5 on the phrase "the world to come," says : "Or, of 'the Coming age.' 'The age to come' was a phrase in common use among the Hebrews, to denote the future dispensation, the times of the Messiah," etc. Littell's Liv. Age, July 26th, 1879, in an art. on the "Talmud," quotes as follows : R. Simeon on Prov. 6 : 22 says : "When thou goest, it (the law) shall lead thee, that is, in this world. When thou sleepest, it shall keep thee, in the grave, and when thou awakest, it shall talk to thee in the world to come." Another utterance on Ps. 23 : 5 is thus given : "In this world ye (Israel) offer me (God) the shew-bread and oblations. In the world to come, I will spread for you a great table, and the nations of the world shall behold and be confounded ; for it is said, 'Thou wilt prepare a table before me in the presence of mine enemies.'"

Obs. 2. The effort made by Barnes, Bloomfield, etc., to make this expression used by the Jews, and adopted without dissent or change, in the New Test. to mean the present dispensation, age, or world under the Messiah fails, because it does not meet the conditions attached to it in that day, viz., it included the reign of the Messiah after the resurrection of the dead. This will appear evident if notice is taken of the distinctive usage accorded to the phraseology in Matt. 12 : 32, "neither in this world (age) nor in the world to come." Critics, Lightfoot, Wetstein, etc., refer the latter to Christ's Kingdom, and according to Wetstein (Lange, loci) it was a proverbial expression referring to the Advent of the Messiah. Jesus adopts it, and links it therefore, as we maintain, with His future personal Advent. And this is conceded (unwillingly) by our opponents, in the simple statement that the sin or guilt alluded to remains unpardoned after the Sec. Advent of Christ, and therefore this world or age to come is included in the period after the Advent. The language being addressed to Jews, without any of those modern explanations attached, is a virtual indorsement of the phrase as understood by them. So Paul, Heb. 2 : 5, "for unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak," argues that this subjection is not witnessed, as many passages prove, down to the Sec. Advent of the Messiah, and hence necessarily locates it in the future after that Advent. Therefore his use of the word corresponding with that of the Jews he intimates no change in its usage, as fairness would have required if it referred to another period. It is never employed to designate heaven or the state after death (as our opponents, Barnes, etc., loci, frankly admit, but to point out this very earth, regarded as "inhabited" or "inhabitable." The choice of the phrase directly refers us to the covenant and its promises, which, if fulfilled, require under the Messiah such a world. The only period when all things, as this predicted world demands, are brought into subjection, is after Christ's Sec. Coming, for down to this Pre-Mill. Advent Gentile domination is existing, and even preceding it confederations of wickedness are witnessed. This world to come is given to Jesus as man, thus corresponding with His future coming as the Son of man, etc. But this expression receives its fair and honest interpretation only by regarding the general analogy of the Word ; and for a proper and full understanding must be viewed in the light thrown upon it by "the day of Jesus Christ," "the end of the age," and "the coming age," as given in Propositions following. Therefore the reader, before deciding, will await the additional evidence to be placed before him. In regard to the phrase in Heb. 6 : 5, however much some may make the tasting of "the powers of the world to come" the enjoyment of religion, etc., in this present dispensation, or the gospel period (thus making the world to come equivalent to "the gospel dispensation"), yet numerous commentators and others, who have no sympathy with our views, tell us that there is a reference to the future, making it to refer to the future heavenly state, so e.g. Bloomfield, Scott, etc. That it has reference to the future, and to the future as understood at that period by the Hebrews addressed, must be apparent to the scholar from the occurrence of no proposed change by the apostle to its usual significance.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> We have found one exception, which charity will attribute to ignorance and not to design, as follows: Winthrop (Lec., p. 197) justly says, after many able critics and writers, that, as Barnes etc., loci, the word translated "world" should have been rendered "the habitable earth," because the word oikumenen is a participle meaning inhabited or habitable, the word earth being understood. A reviewer of Winthrop in The Kingdom of Grace, produces the following remarkable and critical rejoinder: (1) That we are not at liberty to "supply Greek terms when they seem wanting," and (2) that "all plain readers of the Bible suppose this expression to refer only to the future state of men after death." The readers must then be very "plain" and addicted to mere "suppositions," and all versionists are guilty of undue liberty in supplying the terms that the Greek idiom requires. We can respect infidel attacks by ascribing some honesty to them, but such criticisms are simply contemptible, made to subserve an unscholarly purpose. Such a writer evidently has never seen the statements given in our elementary books, as e.g. Horne's Introduct., vol. 2, p. 13, etc. He also fails to notice that this phrase is identified with the Second Adamic dominion restored in the person of Jesus, and which restoration is invariably linked with the Sec. Advent (comp. Prop. 82). H. Dana Ward (Proph. Times, vol. 12, p. 33, etc.) gives an interesting statement of the usage of the three words (αιον, kosmos, oikoumene) translated "world" in our version, and he makes "αιον" equivalent to "a period of time," or "the age;" "kosmos" to order, arrangement, the present order of things, the universe; and "oikoumene" to "the inhabited earth," it meaning "inhabited" and as "a passive participle agrees with ge, i.e. earth, understood." So used Matt. 24 : 14; Luke 2 : 1; 4 : 5; 21 : 26; Acts 11 : 28; 17 : 6, 31; 19 : 27; 24 : 5; Rom. 10 : 18; Heb. 1 : 6; 11 : 5; Rev. 3 : 10; 12 : 9; 16 : 14. Mac-night (Com. loci) "the inhabitable world to come," which is correct. The Comp. Commentary makes it "the state of the Gospel Church," for which there is no proof. Many make it "the coming world," i.e. the Messianic, which we can receive. The Revision has as marg. reading, "the inhabited earth."

<sup>2</sup> To make the phrase "world to come" equivalent to the present dispensation, "the Christian dispensation" (so Stuart, etc.), "the times of the New Test. (so Bloomfield, etc.), involves its advocates in self-contradiction. Thus e.g. such a dispensation has been running for some time, about thirty years, and yet if it is thus referred to; it is spoken of as not present but still future—as something to come. If they endeavor (as Scott, Doddridge, etc.) to unite with the idea of a present dispensation that of heavenly blessedness, thus including the future, they only increase the difficulty: (1) for then the writer still ignores the present by leading us to contemplate that which is to come, and (2) he chooses a phrase which all anciently applied to this earth, this inhabited earth in the future under the Messiah, to describe heaven; but how it can consistently describe the latter these writers fail to inform us. Philo-Basilicus (Judge Jones, Essays, p. 42) says: "Dr. Owen observes 'that it denotes a certain state or condition of things in this world,' that is on this globe, 'for the apostle does not treat directly of heaven,' and to call heaven 'the world to come' because we are to go into it, is, says Beza, 'rather harsh.'" We only add, that it is a period of time following the resurrection, which Polycarp (Epist. Phil., ch. 5) notices: "If we please (the Lord) in this present world, we shall also be made partakers of that which is to come, according as He hath promised us, that He will raise us from the dead; and that if we walk worthy of Him, we shall also reign together with Him." This is only repeating what Barnabas previously stated, viz., that when the Lord comes to renew this world, making "all things new, then shall be the beginning of another world." This has been reiterated by a multitude, who link it with the time of restitution, as e.g. Dr. Goodwin (Ecl. Proph., p. 181), advocating the renovation, remarks: "As God takes the same substance of man's nature and engrafteth the new creature upon it, the same man still; so He takes the same world and makes it a new world to come for the Second Adam. For the substance of the same world shall be restored to a glory which Adam could never have raised it unto. And this God will do before He hath done with it, and this restitution is 'the world to come,' Heb. 2 : 5." So also the reader's attention may be called to Luke 20 : 35. Although in the Greek another word is used (meaning age or dispensation), yet the translators evidently employed it as synonymous (which it is to some extent) with the other. It reads: "But they which are accounted worthy to obtain that world (or age) and the resurrection from the dead," etc., thus showing how the obtaining of the future age or world is linked—not with Hades, or Sheol, or Heaven, or this dispensation, or the Gospel, but with the resurrection of the dead—just as the Jews believed, as the covenants demand, as the promises of God require. Hence Van Oosterzee (Lange's Com. Luke, p. 305, on ch. 25 : 35) says: "To obtain that world. The Messianic aión (age) is conceived as coinciding with the resurrection of the righteous, ch. 14 : 14, which is here exclusively spoken of. It is a privilege which is not communicated to all, but only to the eklektois (the called or elect), while those who at the moment of the Parousia have not died but are found yet living are here not further spoken of." In his comment to ch. 14 : 14, to which he refers, he remarks: "He (Christ), like Paul (1 Thess. 4 : 16 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 23) and John (Rev. 20 : 5, 6), between a first and second resurrection, comp. also Luke 20 : 34-36," etc. (Comp. Dr. Poor's note to Lange's Com. 1 Cor., p. 349.)

Obs. 3. The Bible clearly teaches a dispensation to succeed our present one. This is done in a variety of ways, and is confirmatory of our position. Leaving the intimations of a new ordering or arrangement given by "restitution," "regeneration," "new heavens and new earth," etc., this is virtually admitted by Fairbairn, Brown, and others, in that they inform us that the Mill. age can only be introduced and realized as predicted by the bestowal of new and extraordinary measures, agencies, etc., thus showing marked and distinguishing changes in the order then established. The "harvest" at the end of this age bounds the closing of this and the commencement of the new dispensation. This "harvest" is predicted, as we have shown, Rev. 14 : 14-20 ; Joel 3 : 13, etc., to be Pre-Millennial. The Millennium itself, including the resurrection and events which require the exertion of supernatural power, etc., is indicative of a new era or age. The dispensation that follows is one of Redemption, perfected Salvation, and it is a low estimate to confine the redemptive period to this age or dispensation, in which it remains incompleted down to the Sec. Advent. This is the preparative stage of Redemption ; that which follows is Redemption fully realized. Consequently such declarations as Eph. 1 : 10, "that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things," etc., must be understood of that dispensation still future which shall be ushered in when the times preceding it have been completed. The proof that Eph. 1 : 10 thus refers to such a dispensation is found in the context, for (1) as numerous passages plainly state, this gathering of all things into one is only witnessed when this dispensation or age closes ; (2) in this gathering "all things," in the Greek the neuter form, evidently also embraces the creation then redeemed from the curse, which only is done in the re-creation after this dispensation has ended ; (3) all things are under Christ in this dispensation mentioned, which is not realized until after the Sec. Advent ; (4) the connection of the "inheritance," "the redemption of the purchased possession" with this dispensation indicates the same ; (5) the adopting the exact phraseology of the Jews respecting an incoming age, with the sole change of applying it to Jesus Christ, David's Son and Lord.' It seems to us strange that some theologians, seeing the gathering and oneness ascribed to the Millennial period, seeing that the churches under the direct teaching of the apostles all believed in a future and incoming dispensation—Millennial—should so persistently, to defend a theory, apply this to the present dispensation, and yet acknowledge, as many of them do, that its realization will only be witnessed fully when Christ comes. Such arguments as are derived from the Pre-Mill. Advent, resurrection, judgment, etc., form the introduction of the incoming Kingdom by the power of Christ—indeed all the varied propositions derived directly or indirectly from the Covenant, the foundation of all that is future, converge in a dispensation succeeding this one.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> On this important passage may be added : (1) A gathering is predicated at Sec. Advent, which occurs at the close of this age, as e.g. 2 Thess. 2 : 1 ; 1 Thess. 4 : 17, etc. (2) This gathering is at the end of the age, includes the harvest, as in parable of tares and wheat, Rev. 14 : 19, etc. (3) This gathering includes that from the heavens, as e.g. angels, saints, New Jerusalem, and even dominions, etc. (4) This gathering embraces all on earth, as e.g. saints, the Jewish nation, Gentile nations, restoration of forfeited blessings, removal of curse. In brief, as Olshausen, etc., it includes “the restoration of all things.” Comp. Lange’s Com. on Matt. 13 : 41. Barnes Com. on Eph. 3 : 11 explains “the eternal purpose” to be literally rendered “the purpose of the ages,” i.e. the plan or arrangement of the incoming ages, thus indicating that others follow. Barnes with his theory of a final age or dispensation insists that this “the purpose of ages” means “the purpose formed in past ages.” Admitting that this purpose or plan originated in past ages, yet the line of argument connects the same with the completion of the arrangement in actual realization, and, therefore, relates to the present and future. Locke, Chandler, Whitby, and others render this : “according to that disposition or arrangement of the ages which He made in Jesus Christ, or through Him.” Two things are self-evident, (1) that this Plan or Purpose has reference to Jesus Christ, and (2) that it includes all pertaining to Jesus, and hence of necessity what pertains to Jesus after His Sec. Advent. It includes, consequently, the time following His Coming, or what, Eph. 2 : 7, is specifically denominated as still future “the ages to come.” This is one of the revealed “mysteries,” in which we should be personally concerned, and so clearly stated that the assertions (e.g. of Dr. Rice, in Signs of the Times) of those who declare that this dispensation is the last or final one, remains without the slightest Scriptural foundation. If this is “a Gospel dispensation,” the one Coming is only a far greater one, seeing that the goodness of the Kingdom and of salvation is realized in all its preciousness to a far greater extent in the Coming one. Take the characteristics of the Millennial age, and while they indicate great changes (showing a new ordering or arrangement), yet they all are embraced in the Gospel of the Kingdom ; all are a fulfilment of Gospel promise.

<sup>2</sup> Having sufficiently shown that the Millennial period is an era, a definite age, or dispensation, introduced by Jesus Christ at His Coming, we cannot receive the claims and pretensions of many, who in the past and present, pretend that they or the founders of their sect, introduce a new dispensation (as e.g. in Swedenborgianism, Shakerism, Mormonism, Curryism, Spiritualism, “The Eclectic Church,” etc.). This coming dispensation is not dependent on human instrumentality ; it is directly inaugurated by Jesus Himself, and in so marked a manner—by the works performed, the results attained, etc.—that no one can fail to see it. We only now notice that as there have been past ages or eras (some divide them into Adamic, Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian ; others into Adamic, Noahic, Abrahamitic, Mosaic, and Christian ; others again into Adamic, Antediluvian, Noahic, Abrahamitic, Mosaic, and Christian ; and still others, making the Mosaic Theocratic, introduce another era from the captivity to Christ as Mosaic in part lacking the civil element), so there will be others, as the Millennial and the Eternal ages following. Hence it is, as Barnes, Com., Heb. 1 : 2, has observed, that if the word “age” is used to designate this world or that to come, it does so because “made up of ages.” This age or dispensation to follow pertains to the glory of Christ, and is new, i.e. a new ordering, because it embraces a restored Theocracy, a renewal of the earth, resurrected and glorified saints, etc. It introduces the Theocratic reign of Jesus and His associated rulers bringing in the restitution of all things ; it enforces and exhibits in living realization Redemption through Christ ; it practically illustrates and enlarges Christ’s Redemptive work until it envelops the world in its inestimable blessings. Great and important changes are indeed introduced, but all in the purposed line of Redemption through Christ, which only serve to exalt Him as the Saviour and King ; to magnify His sacrifice, love, mercy, and power ; to honor Him as the combined Prophet, Priest, and King ; and to elevate Him in the hearts of the glorified and of the nations of the earth. Hence Bh. South’s rendering of Isa. 65 : 18 (with whom agrees Dr. Clarke, etc.), “Exult in the age to come which I create,” and there is force in his rendering Isa. 9 : 6, “The Father of the age to come” (with which comp. Bh. Chandler’s “Defense of Christianity” and Lange’s Com., etc.).

PROPOSITION 138. This doctrine of the Kingdom fully corroborated by "the day of the Lord Jesus Christ."

This Kingdom is after the Sec. Advent, and in a period, dispensation, age, day, or time, which, owing to the public, personal manifestation of Jesus Christ, is by way of pre-eminence entitled "His day," etc. Now, if it can be shown that the Jews believed that the day or age of the Messiah was thus identified with the period of the reign of the Messiah on David's throne, and that the Apostles, without any change or transformation, apply this phraseology to Jesus after His Sec. Advent, it at once powerfully confirms our doctrine of the Kingdom. For, if our interpretation of the Covenant and promises is correct, then such a day or time of Christ must be still future.

Obs. 1. The Jewish view is given by many writers. Thus e.g. Mede quotes R. Saadiah Gaon, who indorses the ancient opinion on Dan. 7 : 18 by saying : " Because Israel have rebelled against the Lord, their Kingdom shall be taken from them, and shall be given to those our monarchies which shall possess the Kingdom in this age, and shall lead captive and subdue Israel to themselves in this age until the age to come, until the Messiah shall reign." The ancient opinion of the Jews previous to and at the First Advent are given in Commentaries, Sys. Theologies, etc., viz., that the times or reign of the Messiah was frequently denominated "the day or the days of the Messiah," originating from the prophetic announcements of "the day of the Lord," etc. Knapp, Barnes, Bloomfield, and many others, show how the Jews regarded "the day of the Lord" as equivalent to "the times of the Messiah." Indeed, as stated in previous Propositions, it was fully identified with both the resurrection and the judgment which it was believed the Messiah would bring to pass. How later Jews continued to hold this notion of the day thus linked with these adjuncts is evidenced by the following extract from R. Menassah Ben Israel (in Res. of the Dead, p. 254), who, commenting on Isa. 2 : 12-17, " For the day of the Lord of hosts," etc., remarks : " It is not to be doubted, as we shall demonstrate in the sequel, that by 'the day of the Lord' the prophet intends 'the day of judgment,' which is otherwise called 'the day of the resurrection of the dead.'" Again (B. 3, c. 2), he says, on Mal. 4 : 5, " That great and terrible day of the Lord is the day of judgment, which shall be conjoined with the resurrection." The day of Messiah, the day of judgment, the day of resurrection, the day of the Lord, etc., were all associated in the Jewish mind with the predicted coming and reign of the Messiah.

Gill, Com. on 2 Pet. 3 : 8, gives several Rabbinical citations in which is specified that " the day of the holy blessed God is a thousand years." Lange, Com. Matt. 22 : 2, notices how the Jews thought the feast, the marriage festival, would be held at the end of the age. Many such references are found in the various commentaries, and the critical student will not fail to observe how these views, after the commencement of this dispensation or age, are repeated in the Apocalypse, but always as related to the future, the Sec. Advent of Jesus, and the resurrection of the saints. The reign of the Messiah on David's restored throne was "the day of Redemption," "the day of salvation," etc., and was even claimed by impostors, as e.g. Milman (His. of the Jews, vol. 2, p. 435) informs us that R. Akiba addressed the Jews in behalf of the impostor Bar-cochab, "Behold the Star that is come out of Jacob; the days of the Redemption are at hand."

Obs. 2. Next, it is important to notice, (1) how the inspired apostles adopted this phraseology, applying it to Jesus, and (2) locating this "day," that the Jews expected, in the future. (1) A period of time, separate and distinct from previous ones, is called "the day of the Lord Jesus," 2 Cor. 1 : 14; "the day of Christ," 2 Thess. 2 : 2; "the day of the Lord," 1 Thess. 5 : 2, etc. This is so apparent that it needs no additional mention. (2) That this day of Christ is not in the present dispensation (comp. e.g. John Wesley's remarks, Prop. 133, Obs. 5), but in the future one, is evident by reference to the general tenor of Scripture concerning it, and by then giving the opinion of our opponents as indicative of its relation to the future. Thus e.g. 1 Cor. 5 : 5, "that the Spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus;" Barnes, Com. loci, "the day of judgment when the Lord Jesus shall come," etc. 1 Cor. 1 : 8, "blameless in the day of the Lord Jesus Christ;" Barnes, loci, "in the day when the Lord Jesus shall come to judge the world; and which will be called His day, because it will be the day in which He will be the great and conspicuous object, and which is especially appointed to glorify Him." 2 Cor. 1 : 14, "ye also are ours in the day of the Lord Jesus;" Barnes, loci, "in the day when the Lord Jesus shall come to gather His people to Himself." 2 Thess. 2 : 2, "that the day of Christ is at hand;" Barnes, loci, "the time when He should appear," called "the day of Christ," because it would be appointed especially for the manifestation of His glory." 1 Thess. 5 : 2, "the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night;" Barnes, loci, "Of the Lord Jesus," etc., "the day of the Lord" means that day in which He will be manifested," etc. So also 2 Pet. 3 : 10; Phil. 2 : 16, etc., and Barnes, loci, gives the same. Barnes even indorses the Jewish view on John 8 : 56, when he says, "the day of judgment is also called the day of the Son of man because it will be a remarkable time of His manifestation." (Compare also Knapp, Ch. Theol., s. 155 (4).) Jesus Himself employs the phrase, as e.g. Luke 17 : 24, 30: "So also shall the Son of man be in His day;" "even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed," with which compare Matt. 24 : 30, 31, 37, etc., and then notice the concessions of Barnes, etc., that its ultimate reference must be to the time when He personally comes to judgment, etc. We have thus a distinctive "day of Christ" ushered in at the Sec. Advent; and with the predictions relating to "that day" by the prophets; with the Scriptural usage of the word "day;" with the events connected with it and the guards thrown around it to prevent, if possible, misconception of its duration, etc., it is simply to be faithful not to identify this "Lord's day," this "day of the Messiah," with the promised exalted Millennial times of the Word with which it is blended. That this "day of Christ" embraces a long period of time is apparent from the examples already given, but the Spirit multiplies evidence; for believers, being "the children of the day," see on every side

"the day" linked with the Advent, with Mill. blessedness, with entering into (comp. Matt. 7 : 21, 22), and realizing the Kingdom, and with Barnabas they look for a "holy age" to come, believing Him to be "King of the ages" (1 Tim. 1 : 17 ; Heb. 1 : 2, Vulgate), who will manifest Himself in the day that significantly and appropriately is called after Himself. And when the Spirit, to whom a thousand years are as a day, pronounces it "a great day," we are very slow in limiting it.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> It may be proper to notice the attempt Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 443) makes to refer this to the day of Pentecost. But this fails (1) because there was no Coming of the Son of Man (humanity) at that time ; (2) it violates the context which contrasts this Coming with that of other false Christs ; (3) if fulfilled on the day of Pentecost, then the disciples would see one of the days of the Son of Man which Jesus positively declares, v. 22, they shall not see, owing to His departure ; (4) it is opposed to the Jewish view entertained, whose exact phraseology Jesus adopts without any intimation of change ; (5) it is condemned by the usage we refer to in the text.

<sup>2</sup> Hence we cannot accept of Martensen's (Ch. Dog., s. 287) language : "The final Advent of Christ is to be the end, not only of this present time and this one term of history, but of all time and of all history." Against this, the covenants and prophecy all unite in proclaiming the opposite, viz., that then a glorious period of time is ushered in when the history foreshown and outlined in covenant and prophecy shall be realized. This extreme must, therefore, be rejected as untenable. The other extreme, adopted by a few, that this present existing age shall be eternally perpetuated, is likewise, as we abundantly show, unscriptural. One of Dr. Arnold's admirers (Westm. Review, Jan., 1852, p. 120) says that Arnold's Theology is based on the assumed perpetuity of the age, and that he admits (although claiming it as correct) that "it is the least apostolic in appearance." This admission is amply sufficient, and we rest content in those "times" (1 Tim. 6 : 15, and which Paul in 2 Tim. calls "that day"—comp. Crit. Eng. Test. loci) still future and connected with "the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Obs. 3. To satisfy some objections, it is necessary to allude to Waggoner (Ref. of Age to Come), who refuses to acknowledge an "age to come" to follow this age, on the ground that that which succeeds this is called "an everlasting age" or "the eternal age." But this is a mere play on words so far as the phrase is concerned, for (1) he thus professes his belief in an age to come, although "everlasting ;" (2) he divides this "everlasting age" arbitrarily into two periods, the first part of one thousand years in the third heaven, the second part, or remainder, after the thousand years here on the earth. While we do not even thus limit it by the thousand years (which years do not limit the reign, but the binding of Satan and non-resurrection of the wicked), extending it through and beyond them into the future (Prop. 159). When the characteristic duration, etc., of the age are to be determined, we find it extending to, merging into, and embracing perpetuity.<sup>1</sup> To build up his theory, Waggoner contends that "the end," "Christ's Coming," and "the termination of Salvation," are synonymous terms, and taking this for granted (without the least proof), he proceeds to erect his argument upon it. This is a sad mixture, seeing that Christ's Coming is not to "terminate Salvation," or to make an "end" of all things, but is for purposes of salvation and to gather all things into oneness, etc. Again, a favorite phrase is quoted, and paraded even as a title of sermons and books, as if it were a Scriptural one, viz., "The End of Time," as if it were an equivalent for "the time of the End." In tracing the matter somewhat, it seems to be founded on Rev. 10 : 6 in our Eng. Version, which unguardedly reads "that there should be time no longer." That this is a misapprehension of the passage is evident, for (1) critics and commentators pronounce it incorrect. (See Barnes, Stuart, Elliott, Lord, etc., loci.) (2) It is inconsistent with fact : (a) as to the text, seeing that instead of a closing of time, time is represented as continuing on, and events occurring during its progress ; (b) as to the creation, for while time may be regarded as unmeasured, eternal, yet no creature or event can be duly considered apart of time. Time cannot end ; a day, year, age, cycle may close, but not time ; eternity itself embraces endless time. The arguments erected upon this phrase, therefore, can well be dismissed without more attention, seeing that "times" are connected with, 1 Tim. 6 : 15, "the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ."

<sup>1</sup> Time, even eternity, is marked necessarily by cycles, ages, etc., and we cannot conceive of it without some measure. The Spirit accommodates Himself to this to give us a proper conception, and hence speaks of "the ages to come," "the age of ages," "the eternal ages," or "ages of ages," and refers to Christ as "King of the ages," indicating such grand divisions—while on the other hand expressions are found which, without distinguishing between those ages speak by reduplication of the entire future as one everlasting age. Our idea simply is that this Mill. age merges into the others unchanged as to blessedness, glory, etc., and is thus continued on, although the doom of Satan and the wicked, etc., properly marks an epoch in it.

<sup>2</sup> The reader is referred back to Prop. 133, Obs. 5, and requested to notice how John Wesley speaks of this day of Christ ; also how the Thessalonians regarded this day "as present" (so Alford, Olshausen, Lange, etc.) and the apostle, in order to reassure them, locates it in the future. Multitudes affirm that this dispensation is "the day of Christ," but they do this in opposition to the passages quoted, to the analogy adduced, and to the direct affirmation of Jesus, Luke 17 : 22, that during His absence "the days will come, when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of Man, and ye shall not see it." The student will notice, what our argument has persistently urged, that "the day of the Lord Christ" is, to be such, identified with a personal presence ; it is this presence that constitutes it "His day." Turning to 1 Cor. 4 : 3, 4, 5, and instead of "man's judgment" the Greek is, as stated in the marginal reading, "man's day" (so numerous critics and versions ; comp. e.g. Luther's).* This accords with the analogy on the subject. The time when this was written, and the time from thence down to the Coming of the Lord, is "man's day," and not the Lord's day. The direct contrast in the passage is amply sufficient, and what was true in Paul's time, that the world was controlled by "man's day" (i.e. was largely under the power of his opinions, wisdom, self-will, sway, etc.), is true to-day, being—as history testifies—a fact constantly witnessed from that time down to the present, and—as prophecy attests—will continue a sad fact down to the Sec. Advent, culminating in its exhibition of wilful power and sway just before the open Parousia. This, then, is "man's day"—a day in which the absence of the Lord is self-evident, and in which man's attachment to the world and disregard of God and His dear Son makes it a time peculiar in accord with his views, feelings, passions, etc. And yet this distinctive "man's day," in which the Church is struggling and fighting, is eulogized by hosts of writers as "the Lord's day," although the bridegroom is absent and the marriage postponed to His Coming. To indicate how perversely men will employ this phraseology, a few more illustrations are presented. Scott (Com. Zech. 14) makes "the day of the Lord" to be "the time when the Romans marched their armies, composed of many nations, to besiege Jerusalem, was 'the day of the Lord Jesus,' on which He came to 'destroy those that would not that He should reign over them.'" Alas ! Rev. Robison, in a sermon at Springfield, O., Nov., 1878, made "the day of Christ" in 1 Cor. 1 : 9 and Phil. 1 : 6, 10, to refer to the death of the saint ! Egbert (The Chron. of Henry of Huntingdon) is said to have seen "the day of the Lord" in the conversion of the monks of Hii or Iona, which has been repeated again and again at accessions to the Church. It is wonderful how flexible and full of numerous meanings the phrase becomes in the hands of spiritualizers, denoting almost everything but that really intended. In connection it may be said that we earnestly protest against the theories of those who would locate "the day of the Lord" as already present in any form, as the things connected with such a day have never yet been realized. Hence we reject as utterly untenable the theory of Barbour and others (as seen e.g. in Herald of the Morning, Aug. 1st, 1877), who, basing their view on some unproven chronological positions, declare that "the day of the Lord" commenced in the autumn of 1874." Aside from the reasons presented in this work against it, it is sufficient to say that the misleading view of "the harvest" incorporated with it (which harvest is to last three and a half years) alone shows the incorrectness of the chronological position so positively asserted. When the tares are gathered, and Christ and His angels begin the work of the harvest, we will see—as a comparison of the prophecies relating to the harvest conclusively shows—a very different kind of work than the one described by them. One especial lack in this view of Barbour's is, that in his harvest interpretation he utterly fails to discriminate between "the first-fruits" previously gathered, and the harvest which follows, but adopts an opinion which he thinks is favorable to his groundwork, viz., chronological position.

* The Amer. Bible Union has the following comment : "Man's day : namely, the present, in contrast with the coming of the day of the Lord." So e.g. Fausset (Com. loci), "literally, man's day, contrasted with the day (ch. 3 : 13) of the Lord (v. 5), 1 Thess. 5 : 4. All days previous to the day of the Lord are man's days."

PROPOSITION 139. The Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, as covenanted, is sustained by what is to take place in "the morning" of "the day of Christ."

We now come to one of those beautiful, most forcible evidences of the truthfulness of our position, which no other theory can present. For, the Divine Spirit, taking part of the phrase "the day of the Lord," etc., viz., the morning or introductory of that day, allies with it such events, identified fully with the Millennial era, that the student can be at no loss to distinguish and locate the period of time intended. "The morning" is so widely different in blessing, judgment, etc., from the beginning of this present dispensation, that no comparison can be instituted between them. The fact, too, that this figure of "the morning" is employed by writers separated by ages; that they coincide in attributing to it the same results; that they preserve a wonderful unity in the use of it, establishes us the more firmly in a doctrine universally received by the Early Church.

Obs. 1. The Millennial day being represented as preceded by a "morning," the period of time just previous to the breaking of this morning is appropriately, to complete the figure, called "the night." This is done by the Spirit in Ps. 30 : 5 ; Rom. 13 : 12 ; Isa. 21 : 11. The time of trial, fighting, struggling, pilgrimage, absence from the bridegroom, mixture of tares and wheat, tribulation, sorrow, death, etc., is forcibly designated as "the night."

Dean Alford (Com. Rom. 13 : 12) says, "The 'night' is the lifetime of the world, the power of darkness. The 'Day' is the Day of resurrection." Comp. the excellent note by Riddle (Lange's Com. loci). When adverting to Stuart, Hodge, and Wilkinson as opposing this view, he remarks : "On the other hand, most modern German commentators defend this reference," i. e. to the Second Coming, and instances Olshausen, De Wette, Philippi, Meyer, Lange, and adds : "This opinion gains ground among Anglo-Saxon exegetes, giving Alford's remark. Prof. Lewis (Six Days of Creation, p. 273) says of the Scriptural usage of "morning : " "Whatever dispensation causes to appear a new state of being supernaturally rising out of the old, thus revealing the ever-ascending glory of God, is a new morning, the literal perfection of a new day in the outgoings of that Kingdom which is called (Ps. 145 : 13) the Kingdom of all worlds or ages."

Obs. 2. The Millennial day is introduced by the personal coming of Jesus. To perfect this figure of "the morning," if it alludes to the beginning of the same period of time, it would be highly appropriate, if thus dependent on Christ's Coming, to designate Him either as the Morning Star or as the Sun ushering in this day. This also is done to prove to us, if we will but accept of it, that this coming is the real, veritable coming of the person called "the Star" and "the Sun," who shines forth, not through others, but, in His own proper effulgence. It is therefore with pleasure that we read in "the last words of David," that (2 Sam. 23 : 1-4) "there shall be a Just One ruling over men, ruling in the fear of God ; as the light of the morning shall He arise, the Sun of an unclouded morning, shining after rain upon the tender grass of the earth." Night disappears when the sun comes, so this "night" shall fade away when "the Sun of an unclouded morning" arises, ushering in a glorious day. Hence Jesus is styled also "the bright and morning star," "the Day Star," because His coming shall be the sure sign of the dawning of the foretold morning. He is not merely called such owing to the glory of His person or the splendor of His appearing, but because He reveals Himself in the early morning. For, Hos. 6 : 3, "His going forth is prepared as the morning."

That we are not attempting to force a meaning, the student is referred to the commentaries of our opponents. Thus e.g. on 2 Pet. 1 : 19, "until the day dawn and the day star arise," etc. Barnea, loci, says : "Until the brighter light which shall be shed on all things by the glory of the Second Advent of the Saviour," etc. And on the Day Star he says : "The morning star—the bright star, that at certain periods of the year leads on the day, and which is a pledge that the morning is about to dawn. Comp. Rev. 2 : 28 ; Rev. 22 : 16." Justin Martyr (Dial. with Trypho), long ago, said, "With thee shall be in that day, the chief of thy power, in the beauties of thy saints, begotten from the womb before the morning star," an evident rendering of Ps. 110 : 3. The Dean of Westminster in Good Words renders 2 Sam. 23 : 1-4 : "He that ruleth over men justly—ruling in the fear of God—so is it, as the light of the morning, at the rising of the sun—a morning and no clouds—after a clear shining, after rain, tender grass springs from the earth." Dr. Erdman (Com. loci Lange's) says, that this is a "picture of the blessings that follow the appearance of the future ruler, under the figure of the wholesome effects of the light of the rising sun on a bright morning." Its Messianic reference (as a multitude of expositors hold) is given under Prop. 49. The figure of a preceding night dissipated by the radiance of a splendid morning light at sunrise, is exceedingly impressive, combined as it is with the results of a refreshing rain. Dr. Schmoller (Lange's Com. Hos. 6 : 3) has "His Coming forth is sure as the dawn, etc. Jehovah will appear bringing salvation. This is set forth under the figures of the daybreak and a fertilizing rain. The appearing of Jehovah is denoted as a rising by the dawn. The transition from night to day is set forth." Some endeavor to give another meaning to 2 Pet. 1 : 19, making the day and day star a shining forth of the light of God's grace and truth in the heart, but this is opposed to the usage of those terms. For whatever Christian experience we have here, it is an experience, an earnest given in the night. Hence we adopt in preference Barnes's statement, with which compare e.g. Calvin's and Dietlien (quoted Lange, Com. loci), who make the present dispensation still night (owing to trials, death, etc.) and the incoming one at Christ's Coming (so Dietlien) or at entrance into heaven (so Calvin) a glorious day.

Obs. 3. The events associated with this morning are of such a nature that they can only be realized after the Second Advent ; and they thus confirm the Pre-Mill. Advent, the reign of the Just One in the day following this morning, etc.

1. The resurrection and the dominion of the saints is connected with this morning. Thus in Ps. 49 : 14, 15, the Psalmist contrasts the condition of the wicked and righteous : "Like sheep they (the wicked) are laid in the grave ; death shall feed on them ; and the upright shall have dominion over them IN THE MORNING ; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling. But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave ; for He shall receive me." Here the prophet distinguishes between those who rise in the morning (1st res.) and have dominion, and the rest of the dead who lived not again until the one thousand years were finished. In Ps. 88 : 10-15, after alluding to death and the grave whither he was tending, the Psalmist asks, "Wilt Thou show wonders to the dead? Shall the dead arise and praise Thee?" etc., and then expresses his hope of a resurrection: "But unto Thee have I cried, O Lord; and IN THE MORNING shall my prayer prevent Thee." The same is found in Ps. 143 : 8, where death is described as smiting the righteous one and making him to dwell in darkness, and the prayer, inspired by the Spirit, comes forth impressively: "Cause me to hear Thy lovingkindness IN THE MORNING, for in Thee do I trust," etc. The expression found in several Ps., "I will awake early," can only be satisfactorily explained of his awaking (res.) in this morning. In Ps. 90, after alluding to the universality of death, etc., the petition is offered: "Return, O Lord, how long? and let it repent Thee concerning Thy servants" (that is, do not let them thus be subject to the power of death); "O satisfy us early (lit. as some critics: in the morning), with Thy mercy, that we may be glad and rejoice all our days." If we are to take the rendering given by the Vulgate, Syriac, Chaldee, and by some critics, of the phrase, Eng. Version of Isa. 26 : 19 : "for Thy dew is as the dew of herbs," which is presented as "the dew of the dawn," then in immediate connection with the resurrection there is reference to the morning. Delitzsch, sustained by Alexander on Isa. and others, translates Isa. 8 : 19, 20, "they are a people for whom NO MORNING DAWNS," which the marg. reading, "Heb. no morning," also affirms; thus corroborating that the wicked, living or dead, have no part or lot in this morning.<sup>1</sup>

2. The utter destruction and removal of the wicked is identified with this incoming morning. This we have seen is predicated also of the introduction of the Mill. age. Thus Isa. 17 : 14, speaking of the nations who set themselves against God (as in the last confederation, Rev. 19, etc.), adds: "Behold AT EVENING TIDE trouble; and BEFORE THE MORNING he is not. This is the portion of those that spoil us (compare Zech. 14), and the lot of them that rob us." In Mal. 4 the wicked are consumed and utterly rooted out at the time "the Sun of Righteousness" arises. In Ps. 59 : 16, after describing the confederation and overthrow of the wicked by the power of God, foreseeing the time of its accomplishment, the prophet bursts forth exultingly: "But I will sing of Thy power, yea, I will sing aloud of Thy mercy IN THE MORNING," etc. If we take even Origen's (Ag. Celsus) rendering of the word "early" in Ps. 101 : 8 which he makes "morning," we have affirmed the destruction of the wicked of the land that they may be cut off from the city of the Lord.<sup>2</sup>

3. It is, as the Mill. descriptions predict, a time of deliverance and salvation. Thus in Ps. 46 : 5, after portraying the mighty confederation under the figure of the roaring waters and the swelling sea, and then continuing the figure drawn from the waters and representing the incoming river or Kingdom so gladsome, the Psalmist assigns both the reason and the time when this confederation shall be overthrown and His Kingdom shall be established to the joy of His people: "God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved; God shall help her, and that RIGHT EARLY," or as marg. reading, Heb. "WHEN THE MORNING APPEARETH." If it is allowable to receive the translation of Zeph. 3 : 5 given by Gildas (A. D. 546), there would be a distinct reference to this morning, as follows: "Our Lord is upright in the midst of His people, and in the morning He will not do injustice, in the morning He will give His judgment." Job even (7 : 21) expresses the idea that deliverance shall be granted by God "in the morning" to those whom He, "the preserver of men," has pardoned.<sup>3</sup>

4. This morning is identified with the rule of Christ, and the glorification of the saints. This we have already seen, but the Spirit gives us additional evidence. Thus in Ps. 110 : 2, 3, at the very time that "the Lord shall send the rod of His strength out of Zion and shall rule in the midst of His enemies," then, "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauty of holiness from the womb of THE MORNING" (alluding to "the birth," etc.); "Thou hast the dew of thy youth" (referring to the renewal). If considered in the light of the general tenor of the Word, this passage is exceedingly expressive and beautiful.<sup>4</sup>

5. Having shown and advocated as a necessary condition the restoration of the Jewish nation, a confirmation is found in the specification that this also (as we contended) takes place in this morning. Turning to Hos. 5 : 14, 15, and 6 : 3, when the Jewish restoration is spoken of in verse 15 (see McNeile, Lec. 4, Prospects of the Jews), it is said : "in their affliction they will seek me in THE MORNING;" and in the next chapter, verse 3, the Lord's return or coming is likened to "the morning."

<sup>1</sup> The Millenarian reader will notice two points here in the context, (1) That evidently Spiritualism is described and condemned, and (2) that it is represented as existing just previous to this morning. Patrick (Com. Ps. 49), Graves (On the Pentec., Pt. 3, sec. 4), Horne (Com. Ps. 49), Wines (Com. on Laws, p. 295), and a host of writers refer "the morning" to the time of the resurrection, and speak, therefore, of "the glorious morning of the resurrection." Isaki, Kimchi, Geier, Mendelssohn, and many of the older expositors, express the same. The reader is referred to Tayler Lewis's Intro. to Gen., Lange's Com., on the usage of "morning". On p. 142 he remarks : "The morning, Ps. 49 : 15, when the righteous shall reign," is the great dies retributionis, so prominent in Scripture, and acknowledged too (like the conception of great times) in the earliest language and thinking of the race." He refers in a footnote how ancient Arabian poets used it, as e.g. "God is one. He began (life); He causes it to come back (from death); to Him is the returning in the morning." The Koran employs it, and as the Com. of Al-zamakshari declares "the day of the resurrection" is "called the morning, to impress us with a sense of its nearness." Lewis deems the figure very ancient, "and to have gone back to the days of Job." Even such writers as Ewald and others, who refuse a direct application, still think it gives "a glimpse of the Messianic hope;" we say that it imparts far more, as a comparison of Scripture teaches us.

<sup>2</sup> We only now allude to the order of events as given in the Word of God, as e.g. in Mal. 3 and 4, etc.; (1) the gathering of the special treasure or jewels; (2) the fearful destruction of the wicked; (3) the glorious Sun of righteousness shining forth with healing; (4) the wicked remain fallen. This very order is preserved and enforced by the general analogy, indicative of the introductory (morning) and fulness (day) of the Mill. era.

<sup>3</sup> Other allusions may be found, as e.g. in Delitzsch's rendering of Isa. 62 : 1, "the morning brightness," Ps. 59 : 16; Ps. 130 : 6; Isa. 58 : 8, etc. Whatever view we may take of some of these expressions, as e.g. Zeph. 3 : 5, one thing is self-evident, that God is stated to manifest Himself specially in the morning, which is particularly true of the morning of the day of the Lord Jesus, the Christ.

<sup>4</sup> Prof. Lewis (Six Days of Creation, p. 326) makes the expression "from the womb of the morning, thou hast the dew of youth," expressive of generation or birth before the morning (even as early dew, of the same), but refers it to Christ; we, however, in view of the antecedent "people," prefer to apply it to His brethren raised from the dead. Dr. Conant (New Ver. Psalms) renders : "The rod of thy strength will Jehovah stretch forth from Zion; rule thou in the midst of thy enemies. Thy people are free-will offerings in the day of thy warfare, in beauties of holiness; from the womb of the morning thou hast thy dew of youth." He says : "In beauties of holiness. Sanctified for the holy warfare. There may be a typical reference to the ceremonial purity of the person and garments." "Dew of youth" suggests the freshness and beauty of young life. "Womb of the morning" suggests the prolific source of the countless dew-drops. Accordingly, "from the womb of the morning thou hast thy dew of youth," suggests the countless numbers and fresh vigor of the youthful warriors, as the dew-drops poured forth from the womb of the morning." The res. of the saints, springing forth in this morning, is represented, Isa.

26 : 19, as the coming forth of the bright, sparkling dew. Dr. Nägelsbach in his comment (Lange's Com. Isa.) on the passage refers to that period as follows : "On the morning of the res. a wonderful dew will cover the earth. It is no more the earthly dew, it is a heavenly, a divine dew. If even now the earthly dew, when the rays of the sun mirror themselves in it, sparkles like pearls, how resplendent will be the drops of that heavenly dew, every one of which will be a glorified luminous body, a body of the resurrection!" After advocating the phrase "dew of lights" in preference to "dew of herbs," as referring to the bodies of the glorified, fashioned after Christ, he adds "But whence come these forms of light, which as heavenly dew-drops, will on the morning of the res. shine on the surface of the earth? They have arisen, i.e. they come out of the earth in which they hitherto as gloomy shades have dwelt. At the Almighty word of the Lord, the earth was forced to give up (cast out, v. 19) these that had been hitherto regarded as a spoil that could not be snatched from it." "Dew" is also used as indicative of blessing (e.g. Mic. 5 : 7, etc.), and these glorified ones will (as will be shown under Props. 154 and 156) prove an inestimable blessing to the world.

Obs. 4. The identification of this morning with the beginning of the Mill. day not only confirms the doctrine of the Kingdom, but teaches us how to estimate the spiritualistic conception of "the Morning Land," etc., to be immediately realized after death.* It puts aside as irrelevant a mass of matter put into print concerning "the morning" as connected with the present state of the Church, with death, or with the third heaven. It enables us also to correct such unintentional mistakes into which Lange falls, when he says (Com., p. 355), "the festive evening (hour of final reward) of the Church will take place at the Sec. appearing of Christ, which must not be confounded with the final judgment." The substitution of "morning" for "evening" makes the sentence more Scriptural.

Obs. 5. This subject gives pertinency and preciousness to the promise : "I will give unto Him the morning star." This Star is Jesus Himself, Rev. 22 : 16, etc. There is even here an allusion to the time of a special bestowal, viz., at the period when Jesus is manifested as "the morning star," i.e., even before the dawn of the day itself. Jesus will come, and the saints, to whom the ruling is promised in the context, shall be associated with Him in judgment, etc. We have in "the Morning Star" an implied reference to the first stage (Prop. 130) of the Advent, the thief-like coming for the saints, and to obtain it indicates that we are worthy of the better res. or (if living) of the translation. The mention of this in such a connection is also exceedingly significant of the exaltation of the saints to coheirship with the Christ when the morning breaks. It embraces more than the comparison of Dan. 12 : 3, viz., distinguishing honor and intimate relationship with Jesus at a specified period. Blessed they, who shall experience this bestowal of love.

It may be deemed desirable, in connection with this day and morning, to say something respecting that very difficult passage found in Zech. 14 : 6, 7. A concise rendering, consistent with other Scripture, is still a desideratum. The translations of the Eng. Version, Henderson, Moore, German Bible, etc., are unsatisfactory, because contradictory to other statements given by the same Spirit. Thus e.g. the renderings which say that in that (Mill.) day "the light shall not be clear nor dark," "there shall not be bright light and darkness," "there shall not be brightening light and condensing darkness," "there will be no light, but only cold and frost," "it will not be light, the glorious will withdraw themselves," "there will not be light, and cold, and ice," "it shall not be light, precious things are obscured," "there shall not be the light of the precious orbs, but condensed darkness," etc., are flatly contradicted by the Mill. predictions, e.g. Isa. 30:26; Isa. 60:19, 20, etc. Some (Fausset, Com. loci, and a writer, J. G. W., in Proph. Times, 1874, p. 175) limit this to a "twilight-like time of calamity," or of trial, preceding the Mill. age, but this is forbidden by the context which associates with "that day" Mill. blessedness and glory. Several renderings are presented, each one of which corresponds with other statements, preserving the proper unity. "And it shall come to pass in that day" (introduced by the Coming of the Lord and His saints), "the light shall not be (marg. reading) precious" (i.e. rare but bountiful), "nor (marg. read.) thickness" (i.e. darkened or obscured). "But the day shall be one" (i.e. unbroken) "which is known to the Lord, not day nor night" (i.e. not changeable, but one entire day); "but it shall come to pass, at evening time it shall be light" (i.e. either, when evening comes, the light shall continue, there being no darkness such as we now experience; or, at evening, viz. the close of the Mill. day or period, the light remains undiminished). A friend handed me the following, derived from marginal readings in his possession: "And it shall come to pass in that day, that it shall not be clear in some places and dark in other places of the world. But the day shall be one which shall be known to the Lord, not day, nor night; but it shall come to pass, that at evening time it shall be light." That is, the increased light of the sun and moon as predicted, with the special revelation of light and glory at Jerusalem, forbids in that day our present ordinary day and night; hence there will be no change from light to darkness, and at evening it will still be light—that is, there will be one continuous day. Archb. Newcome's translation is a good one, as follows: "And it shall come to pass in that day, there shall not be a bright light and darkness; but there shall be one day. This shall be known unto Jehovah. There shall not be day, and there shall not be night, but it shall come to pass that, at eventide, there shall be light." Fry (Sec. Advent, p. 122, vol. 2, Sirr's First Res., p. 141) follows Newcome, and explains its meaning to be that "there shall no longer be the ordinary vicissitudes of day and night," "all shall be one entire day, not day and night as now," etc. Comp. Isa. 60; Rev. 21 and 22; Isa. 30:26, etc.

* It is saddening to find that the professed orthodox take up and copy those Spiritualistic phrases, as Davis's Summer Land, Mrs. King's Spirit Land, etc. Recently in an obituary, a divine placed his deceased brother safely in "the Summer Land," where (anticipating Paul's crowning at the Sec. Advent, 2 Tim. 4 : 8) "the angels crowned him"—thus perverting and abusing Scripture promises.

PROPOSITION 140. This doctrine of the Kingdom confirmed by the phraseology of the New Test. respecting "the end of the age."

Having shown that the Jewish idea of a "world to come," a dispensation or age to come, a septenary or millenary still future, necessarily involves the ending of this age and the introduction of another (which the Jews also plainly stated, as e.g. Prop. 138, Obs. 1 and 3), a link in the chain of evidence (seeing that the Messianic Kingdom is with them identified with the closing of this age and the coming in of a future one) is presented by considering how the New Test. language corroborates the Jewish view when reverting to "the end of the age."

Obs. 1. The student will notice how the Jewish idea is presented in Matt. 24 : 3, where the disciples asked concerning "the end of the world." (1) Almost every commentator frankly admits that the word translated "world" is in the original "age" or "dispensation." To the critic or the Biblical investigator, there is no question respecting its reference to "the ending of the age." For, as is well known, the Jews expected under the Messiah (who should abide forever John 12 : 34) such great changes that they looked for a termination of the present, and the introduction of a new order or arrangement of things under Him. Hence the pertinency of the disciples' question, being in accord with the current views on the subject. (2) This is made decisive by their uniting, just as the Jews did, with the ending of the age the coming of the Messiah. The coming and the ending of the age were inseparably connected in the Jewish mind. The reader will also notice that Jesus in His reply gives not the slightest hint of their being mistaken, but proceeds to answer the questions as legitimate. This Jewish usage is also seen in Heb. 9 : 26, where Christ is said to have come, to make a sacrifice for sin, at the conclusion, ending of the preceding dispensation or age, then called "The end of the world," or ages. (Comp. 1 Cor. 10 : 11.) The same is found in the promise of Christ, Matt. 28 : 20, to be with His people "unto the end of the world" or age—that is, down to the very close of this dispensation. Some have confined this to the Jewish age ending at the destruction of Jerusalem, but united as it is with the gospel preaching, etc., it seems rather to apply to the present dispensation. The ending of the age, to usher in another and more glorious Messianic one, is a Jewish conception which has Scriptural foundation and inspired warrant for its adoption.*

* Some commentators, like Barnes, will give no explanation of the phrase in Matt. 24 : 3, and most uncandidly avoid Matt. 13 : 39, 40, 49, because it would be antagonistic to his own theory. We append, for the common reader, several explanations, illustrative of the general concurrence of critics. Olshausen (Com. Matt. 24 : 3) says the word translated world "indicates the time of the world which passes away, while the world itself remains." So Lange, "the present order of things;" Judge Jones, "the end or consummation of the age or dispensation, or the expiration of the age ;" Bh. Newton, "the consummation of the age ;" Nast, "closing of the dispensation or age ;" so also Schaff, Bengel, Alford, Clark, Van Oosterzee, Gill, Steir, Greswell, Ryle, Buck, Carleton, Boos, Lillie, Ebrard, Auberlen, and numerous others make it equivalent to "the age."

It is a harsh interpretation that Barnes and many others give to it to mean "the last dispensation," for Christ to come "at the end of the age" is to come at the close and not at the beginning of one, even if it should prove to be the last one. Again, it is unorthodox, for it does not take into account the Jewish usage of such phrases. Besides, it is not correct, since other ages are to follow this one. The same criticism applies to the phrase "last days," Heb. 1 : 2, etc., which Barnes, etc. interpret the same way, overlooking entirely how the Jewish mind entertained it. Indeed when not biased by a theory, these same writers fully admit that the proper meaning of "aion" is (as Barnes, Heb. 1 : 2), "age, duration," "an indefinitely long period of time, their perpetuity," etc. This is abundantly sustained by Greek lexicons, as every reader can verify for himself. Now, the very selection of such a word in addressing Jews is in itself exceedingly significant, and must not fail to receive the attentive consideration of the critical student. Lederer (Nathaniel, Sept. 1868), gives quotations from Jewish prayer-books, etc., showing their belief in the Son of David restoring the Davidic throne and Kingdom, and among the prayers, used in thanksgiving after meal, is the following : "May He who is most merciful grant us life and make us worthy to draw near and to behold the days of the Messiah, the building of the sanctuary, and the life in the age to come." "The Advance" (1878) objects to Dr. Seiss's (Last Times) Exposition, on the following ground (quoted by the Luth. Observer, May 10, 1878) : "That the starting-point, Matt. 24 : 3, is erroneous, for that Jesus meant by the ending of the age the ending of the Jewish dispensation, and not that of the dispensation under which we live, and that this transition was meant when Jesus declared that the Kingdom of God was at hand." To this we reply : (1) That the concession that the phrase denotes the ending of the age confirms our position ; (2) for the events alleged by the Saviour to precede this end have not yet all taken place ; (3) no such fulfilment preceded the First Advent or the establishment of the Christian Church ; (4) that the reply of Jesus has reference to future time, as the events indicate, thus explaining time to the disciples ; (5) all those taught by these disciples, afterward (Props. 71-75) followed the view entertained by Dr. Seiss ; (6) the Kingdom and establishment are misconceived (Props. 56, 58, 66, 67, etc.) ; (7) the ablest critics, including many hostile to Pre-Mill., coincide with our view. Dr. Schaff in Lange's Com. Matt., p. 555, on ch. 28 : 20, says : "Lit : till the consummation of the (present) æon (as distinct from the future æon after the Advent, or the never-ending world to come)." This distinctive reference to this present age to be followed by an age, or ages to come, is constantly affirmed.

Obs. 2. For it is employed by Jesus Himself in His address to the Jews, without any alleged change of meaning, and in accord with their views. Thus Matt. 13 : 39, 40, 49, "the harvest is the end of the world," "so shall it be at the end of this world," simply means that such things will be at "the end of the age." Every commentator, with sufficient candor, whatever his views may be, will acknowledge that such is its definite meaning. Jesus, thus adopting the Jewish phraseology, points unerringly to a future age to be introduced, after this one is closed, connecting with it the Kingdom of the Son of man precisely as the Jews were accustomed to regard the matter. The disciples to whom the parable was explained understood the phraseology in its usual Jewish significance, as is evident from their questions, Matt. 24 : 3 and Acts 1 : 6. If it be said, that after the day of Pentecost they changed their views, it is found amply rebutted by the continued usage of the phraseology, as in Eph. 1 : 21, "not only in this world (aion, age) but also in that which is to come," Eph. 2 : 7, "in the ages to come ;" Eph. 3 : 21, "throughout all ages, world without end" (or, throughout or unto all the generations of the age of ages), etc.<sup>1</sup> Allusion has already been made to Luke 20 : 34, where the Saviour contrasts "this world" or age with "that world" or age, linking the future one, just as the Jews did, with the resurrection. Addressed to Jews, it certainly must have arises. If this be so, why then not allow this view of the disciples to have equal weight when considering other phrases, as e.g. "the end of the world or age," etc?

Obs. 4. The expressions "end of the world," "last day," etc., have influenced many to reject the Jewish idea of a dispensation to follow this one; and in their eagerness to make out such an age or era impracticable, they have even asserted the complete destruction of the world (some even have it annihilated, see following Prop.), and a previous withdrawal of the righteous to the third heaven, where they forever remain. In brief, the perpetuity of the earth is denied, or at least its being rendered unfit and uninhabitable for the redeemed, is declared. Now our entire argument assumes the exact reverse, and if such a Kingdom, age, day of Christ, etc., is to come at the end of this age, then the continued existence and perpetuity of the earth must, in the very nature of the case, be also a fact. How else can the Davidic throne and Kingdom be re-established, and all the covenant promises be realized? Instead of casting ourselves upon the Covenant, and the promises derived from the Covenant, which boldly take the matter for granted, assume it as self-evident and indispensable, we shall now proceed, in order to guard our argument on all sides, to produce direct reasons given by the Spirit to indicate this very perpetuity.

"The end," and "the end of the world," was employed by the early Christians to denote the end of the age when Jesus appeared, so e.g. Ignatius, Epis. 6; Lactantius, Div. Inst., B. 4, ch. 10, etc. Prof. Bush (and others of our opponents) makes it equivalent to "end of the age, dispensation, or order of things." Lange (Bremen Lec., No. 8) says, "The end of the world is the Kingdom of God in its consummation," indicating an age to follow. We, however, prefer, "The end of the age will witness the Kingdom of God in its manifestation," for then the Theocratic ordering is restored with glorious additions. Even the expression "End of Days" comports with this general analogy, so that Kurtz remarks: "This expression denotes, not only here (Balaam's prophecy), but in every other place, the time when the promises and hopes of salvation indulged by any age should all be fulfilled;" and Hävernick: "They always denote the horizon of a prophetic announcement." We regret the omissions of some writers, thus noticed in Old and New, Aug. 1871, when, after alluding to the fault of Barnes's Com., in finding a double meaning or fulfilment of Christ's Sec. Coming, as in Matt. chs. 24 and 25, it is said: "Even in the parable of the tares, when 'the field is the world' and 'the harvest is the end of the world,' he (Barnes) does not allude to the fact, that two different Greek words are used in the original, and that 'the world' which is ended at the harvest is by no means the same as that which constitutes 'the field.' The omission of the slightest hint to this difference in the original is a great blemish to the book. Every reader of the Greek Test. knows that the end of the earth is never used in the Gospels; but a reader of Barnes's Notes would suppose it to be used very often." Such omissions are calculated to mislead and to prejudice the unlearned against us. Strange that men through inadvertency blunder on this point, as e.g. Dr. Knapp (Ch. Theol., Sec. 154), who, under his preconceived notion of the judgment, asserts, that the disciples in asking what should be the sign of "the end of the world," meant "what are the signs of the end of time." A mere tyro acquainted with the Jewish views, the disciples' opinions, and the usage of the original, could scarcely have penned such an unwarranted statement, which he repeatedly contradicts (as seen in the quotations from him under various propositions) when declaring that the disciples believed in an incoming age under Messianic rule. The idea of "the end of time" never entered into the views of the disciples, who, instead, looked for the restoration of the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom. So Dr. Alexander (Com., Matt. 13: 39, 40) is singularly inconsistent, because biassed by his judgment theory. He makes "the end of the world" (while admitting that the word relates specially to time) to "include the material universe with its inhabitants and time with its great divisions, whether natural or moral. Of these two worlds, or of the world in these senses, the completion, consummation, winding up, denouement, or catastrophe, will be coincident, if not identical." "It shall be in the end of the world, i.e. of the present creation and time." Comment is not needed. Dr. Brown (Com. Matt. 13) evades giving the force of the original aión, and purposely leaves his interpretation so indefinite as to cover the Popish view : "The harvest is the end of the world—the period of Christ's Sec. Coming, and of the judicial separation of the righteous and the wicked." There is no hope of enlightenment when the force of language is thus concealed. We only add : Our translators were too much under the Popish notion of the ending of the world, and therefore it is reasonable to find such renderings as they have given to accord with King James's instructions to retain the ecclesiastical terms in use. (It is strange, that in Heb. 9 : 26 (comp. also 1 Cor. 10 : 11) they translate by the same word "world," the first word denoting the literal earth, and the second word meaning an age or dispensation.) The key to such a rendering may, however, be found in this, that even the word "world" had, at one time, the idea of cycle or age attached to it, and was thus used, as shown e.g. by Prof. Lewis in Six Days of Creation, p. 377, etc. Thus, to illustrate, he quotes Humboldt in his Kosmos, vol. 1, p. 70, as approving the decision of James Grimm, "that the word Welt, and which was weald in the old German, worold in the old Saxon, and weruld in the Anglo-Saxon, was a period of time, an age (seeculum), rather than a term used for the world in space." In his ch. on "Time-worlds" he shows in detail that aiou is employed to designate time in relation to the world ; and also refers to Heb. 1 : 2, "By whom He made the worlds (i. e. the ages);" Heb. 11 : 3, "By faith we understand that the ages (world-times) were framed by the word of God," i. e. adapted, arranged, put in harmony with each other, etc.

Obs. 5. So powerful and convincing are the reasons for holding to the ending of the present age or dispensation and the ushering of another and more glorious (the Sabbatism), that a multitude of the most eminent and learned men firmly hold to it. Indeed it would be almost universal, if all could be persuaded that the predicted reign of the Messiah on earth is still future. Dr. Breckenridge (Knowledge of God Subjectively Considered, p. 668–9) only expresses the opinion of these, when he speaks of the Mill. period, introduced by the Sec. Advent, as "a new dispensation," "as distinct and real as any preceding dispensation," made requisite in order to fulfil the Scriptures. If we accept of the Pre-Mill. Advent, the Pre-Mill. resurrection of the saints, the Scriptural idea of the day of judgment and the day of the Lord Jesus, the personal reign of Jesus and the saints, we are inevitably forced to this position, which the Scriptures so abundantly sustain, seeing that a new period, new ordering, new dispensational arrangements, are a necessary sequence. This is indorsed by the highest theological authorities, as seen e.g. in Rothe, Delitzsch, Auberlen, and others. (Comp. e.g. our quotation from Van Oosterzee, Prop. 133, Obs. 4, note 1.)

The claims of Swedenborgians, Mormons, Shakers, Spiritualism, etc., that "a new dispensation," the one predicted in behalf of the redemption of man, is realized now in their several respective schemes of doctrine, etc., is set aside by the simple and unanswerable fact, that the concomitants, the accessories of such a dispensation, are lacking among them. The deliverance, glory, etc., promised in connection with it are all wanting, and they are just as much under the influence of a sin-cursed earth, having the same trials, temptations, sorrows, tears, etc., as those who set up no such claims. All such schemes are a perversion and belittling of the promises of God in Christ Jesus. Dr. Kling, in art. Eschatology, Herzog's Encyclop., advocates a future incoming age or dispensation, and refers to Rothe (Ethics) and others, as presenting the same. Fausset in his Com. constantly keeps this in view as required by the general analogy. As an illustration of his comments we give the following : On Gal. 1 : 4, he remarks : "Greek, 'age : ' system or course of the world, regarded from a religious point of view. The present age opposes the 'glory' (v. 5) of God, and is under the authority of the evil one. The 'ages of ages' (Greek, v. 5) are opposed to 'the present evil age.'" On Eph. 1 : 10 he translates, "Unto the dispensation of the fulness of the times." While in "the times" are included those of the Gentiles and Jews and Church, he specially refers "the dispensation" to "the times of restitution," the Mill. Kingdom, the New Heavens and New Earth, because this period forms a dispensation of the Divine Purpose in Redemption completed when "the times" allotted it have arrived. The student, of course, will not overlook the fact, as noticed by various writers, that "the times of restitution" indicates not merely one time but a series of times, and this succession of times we find—as shown under different Propositions—fully portrayed in prophecy concerning the events introductory to, parallel with, and following after the one thousand years. Even such writers as Hutton (Essays, vol. 1, p. 122), Eaton (Perm. of Christ), and others, consider the language of the Bible expressive of future "centuries on centuries" indefinitely. Pre-Millenarian commentators and writers, of course, lay great stress on the still future age and ages following the Sec. Advent. Dr. Poor (Lange's Com. 1 Cor., p. 349) expressly affirms that aiōn (world) "properly means an age, a distinct cycle of years," and adds: "The 'present age' is that period which, dating from the Fall, is to last until the coming of Christ. At this point the 'future age' will begin to date, and this will be the age of redemption completed—the age of the Messiah's Kingdom and Glory. And the expression for 'eternity' is generally in the plural—'ages,' or 'ages upon ages,' to signify the ceaseless progression of time, under which conception eternity was ordinarily represented." We, however, prefer to date the 'present age' from the establishment of the Ch. Church, seeing, as the Scriptures teach, previous ages (as the Antediluvian, Mosaic, etc.) definitely existed and expired. Our view also corroborates Boothroyd's Version of Isa. 9 : 6, "the Father of the future age." Comp. the Sep. Version, Cod. Alexd. "(Father of the coming age)", Lange's Com. Heb. 2 : 5, and Coms. generally on Isa. 9 : 6. To the student this is an interesting point, confirmatory of the Messiah's relation to the age and ages.

PROPOSITION 141. This Kingdom necessarily united with the perpetuity of the earth.

Necessarily, because this earth is the promised inheritance tendered to Abraham; this earth is the theatre on which David's throne and Kingdom existed, and if re-established at the Sec. Advent demands its continuance; this earth is covenanted to David's Son and promised to the saints, and hence God's oath and faithfulness are involved in its perpetuity (comp. Props. 137, 138, 139, 140, 142, 144, 152, etc.).

The keynote, so far as Scriptural interpretation is concerned, is given by Dr. Schaff (Lange's Com. Matt., p. 422): "It should be kept in mind, that when 'the end of the world' is spoken of in the N. Test., the term aion, the present dispensation or order of things, is used, and not kosmos, the planetary system, the created universe."

Obs. 1. The misleading phrase "the end of the world" has been considered under the previous Prop. If employed simply to denote the end of an order or arrangement connected with the world, it would not be objectionable, but used as it is by learned divines without explanation in support of a preconceived theory, it leaves the impression that the world itself, the earth or globe, shall come to an end. This indeed has been maintained by Popish and Protestant writers, has been so sedulously preached and printed, until the minds of multitudes, misguided by the phrase just alluded to and the refusal (designed?) of popular commentators to explain it in the Gospels, hold to the earth's utter destruction and annihilation. Dr. Hodge (Sys. Div., vol. 3, p. 853) declares, on the authority of Schmid (Dog.), that the Lutheran doctrine is that the world shall be reduced to nothing. This indeed may be the individual opinion of some Lutheran divines, just as it is that of some Calvinists, but it is no Lutheran doctrine, from the fact that both Luther and Melancthon taught the contrary, and that multitudes of Lutherans, not being bound by any confession on the subject, teach the renewal and perpetuity of the earth.

This statement of Dr. Hodge's was referred to Rev. Drs. Sprecher and Stuckenburgh, both theological professors in the Lutheran Church, and they emphatically disclaimed it as Lutheran doctrine. It was, indeed, held by a large number of Divines (see Bretschneider's Dog.), but never was made a distinctive Lutheran article of faith. The Romish view of the dissolution of the earth, its utter destruction, was enforced by various Protestant divines, and their combined influence prejudiced many against the truth. Thus e.g. Dr. Blair (Sermons, vol. 2, on 2 Pet. 3 : 10) affirms that "the dissolution of the material system is an article of our faith," and then to indicate that faith gives us a specimen of word or fire-painting: "The globe itself shall either return into its ancient chaos, 'without form and void,' or like a star fallen from the heavens, shall be effaced from the Universe, and its place shall know it no more." Alas! what knowledge of the covenants, of Christ's and the saints' inheritance, of the Kingdom and its locality, this evidences! It is a return to the favorite and unscriptural notions of "the end of the world" entertained by monkish ignorance. But such nonsense survives. Thus e.g. discarding John and Charles Wesley's renewed earth, etc., Rev. T. M. Terry (Chr.

Enquirer, March 6th, 1881) engaged in "Pictorial Preaching" in New York (Attorney Street Meth. Epis. Church) and among other pictures on a screen, gave the following: "The last picture was startling. It was a great sphere in space, and burning up. Under the picture were the words: 'The End of the World.' Across the globe were streaks of cloud. Yellow puffs of flame seemed to be bursting from the globe at irregular intervals, and beneath it burned a great fire as though beneath a gigantic kettle," etc. This is imagined to be Biblical teaching!

Obs. 2. It is admitted that there is no direct passage within the lids of the Bible which teaches the annihilation of the earth. It is remarked by Olshausen (Com. Matt. 24) and others, that we never find the expression in the original which would indicate a proper ending of the world in the sense held by many divines. It is simply inferred from an incorrect reception of certain phrases, and from the conflagration of 2 Pet. 3, and finds acceptance because eminently fitted to carry out the spiritualistic and mystical conceptions of their preconceived Kingdom of God. What foundation the inference has in the phrases "last day," etc., has been made apparent, and what basis it finds in Peter's portrayal will appear (Prop. 150) as we proceed in the discussion. Thus much may now be said of the latter, that neither the early Jewish nor Gentile churches taught the inferences so confidently advanced by moderns concerning the results of that fire. If it were so fatally Anti-Millenarian as alleged, it is singular, to say the least, that it had no effect on the Early Church belief, and not even on Peter himself, who, as a host of able men (our opponents), tell us, was "Jewish Millenarian" in view, retaining to the last "a materialistic husk."

It is, therefore, a matter of surprise, considering the prevailing Jewish belief, the universal early Church doctrine, and the lack of positive Scripture affirmation, that eminent divines, guided solely by inference, hastily conclude and dogmatically affirm the total destruction of the earth, as e.g. Quenstedt (quoted by Auberlen, Div. Rev., p. 214), who declares: "Fulfillment does not consist in simple changes or renewal of qualities, but in total destruction and annihilation of the very substance of the world itself." Multitudes of works are enamored with this total destruction and annihilation theory, which, if true, would destroy and annihilate the inheritance of David's Son and of His brethren. Latterly, it seems as if many persons derive their eschatology from scientists, instead of drawing it from the Bible. The romance of destruction is vividly e. g. presented in Miller's Romance of Astronomy and works of a similar nature, and many pulpits repeat the same as a veritable Christian eschatology. Some apology may be made for unbelief, when from alleged scientific data it predicts (as e.g. C. H. Hitchcock's The World before the Introduction of Life) that the earth will pass into "perhaps, sixth, a stage of frigidity, impoverishment, and extinction of life," but none can be made for professed belief, which ignores the Bible delineations of the future happy, rejoicing earth, and endeavors (as e.g. Sermons in the University Church at Cambridge, see Ser. 3) to give the scientific "Catastrophism" a religious turn (ascribing to God, what scientists attribute to nature) as follows: "The trumpet shall sound—the struggle shall come—this goodly frame of things shall be rent and crushed by the arm of its Omnipotent Maker. It shall expire in the throes and agonies of some fierce convulsion; and the same hand which plucked the elements from the dark and troubled slumbers of chaos shall cast them into their tomb, pushing them aside that they may no longer stand between His face and the creatures whom He shall come to judge." Such extravagances, bordering on the blasphemous (and for which ignorance is the only apology), are worthy of association with those emanating from "the dark ages." Science may present its ideas of a "Catastrophism" resulting from an environment of meteors, or the concussion of a comet, or the dire influences of other planets, or the preponderating of some inflammable gas, or the increase of heat, or the gradual decrease of heat, or the sudden suspension of natural laws, resulting in an utter destruction and annihilation of life, but the believer in covenant and covenant promises given by the Almighty can smile at such absurdities. Such, however, give us not merely the fire, but the freezing, theory. Thus e.g. Prof. Clifford (Pop. Science Monthly, July, 1875), in The First and the Last Catastrophe, argues that the duration of the earth depends on the sun, but that the sun is "wearing out," its "energy" is gradually "used up," so that finally it will not afford sufficient heat, and the result is, "we shall all be frozen out." He continues (giving us an alternative), that the earth is not "an absolutely stable thing," so that eventually the earth may fall into the sun. He then sagaciously and sagely adds: "If we fall into the sun we shall be fried; if we go away from the sun, or the sun goes out, then we shall be frozen. So that, so far as the earth is concerned, we have no means of determining what will be the character of the end, but we know that one of these two things must take place in time." He adds: "We may, therefore, I think, conclude about the end of things that, so far as the earth is concerned and end of life upon it, is as probable as science can make anything." (One must wonder what becomes of the boasted immutable laws of Nature!) And this is the comfort that Prof. Clifford derives from his alleged scientific deductions of frying or freezing: "But to those who do see the cogency of the evidences of modern physiology and modern psychology in this direction, it is a very serious thing to consider that not only the earth itself and all that beautiful face of Nature we see, but also the living things upon it, and all the consciousness of men, and the ideas of society, which have grown up upon the surface, must come to an end. -We who hold that belief must just face the fact and make the best of it, and I think we are helped in this by the words of that Jew philosopher, who was himself a worthy crown to the splendid achievements of his race in the cause of progress during the Middle Ages, Benedict Spinoza. He said, 'The freeman thinks of nothing so little as of death, and his contemplation is not of death but of life.' Our interest, it seems to me, lies with so much of the past as may serve to guide our actions in the present, and to intensify our pious allegiance to the fathers who have gone before us and the brethren who are with us; and our interest lies with so much of the future as we may hope will be appreciably affected by our good actions now. Beyond that, as it seems to me, we do not know, and we ought not to care." This is modern scientific (?) heathenism! What a world this would be, if all men entertained such views! Proctor (Other Worlds and Other Universes, Elec. Mag. Ap., 1877, Suns in flames, same, May, 1877) very complacently speaks of the extinction of worlds composing the various systems and of the entire Universe—of "the death of the last surviving member of the system," which "must for countless ages remain as an extinct world." Theologians and preachers, with whom the extinction of this earth forms a cardinal feature of their eschatology, eagerly seize such wholesale deductions, utterly unproven and unfounded, to sustain their own view of the earth's destruction by fire. They parade before us this and that star which has disappeared from view, and claim that analogy proves their theory to be correct. But they rashly conclude an analogy to exist where there is none. Recent astronomers (comp. e.g. art. on Lost Stars in Eclectic Mag. March, 1877, taken from Chambers's Journal) do not regard such stars as lost or destroyed, for they show how "fitful changes of color and specially red scintillations have been long remarked as highly characteristic of an extensive and well-known class of stars termed 'variable stars,' or stars variable in their brightness and consequent visibility through periods of time, extending in different cases from a few days to many years, and occasionally, it is believed, to several centuries." The disappearance and reappearance of a number has been definitely ascertained, and are given by the writer, extending from a few days to several years. Analogy proves our position and not the reverse. That star, especially, which, above all others, has been selected as a representative of the world on fire and destroyed, seen in 1572-3-4, burning and blazing in the constellation of Cassiopeia, is now supposed by astronomers to be the same one seen (as history specifies) in 1264 and in 945, and is believed to reappear about 1890. God does not create worlds to make a huge bonfire out of them and thus destroy them, and He does not frame the laws of Nature so as to make them the sport of chance convulsions, etc. He reigns and orders the Universe, and having faith in our God, we put aside as folly all such sensational theories. We believe in an intelligent, all-wise, omnipotent Creator, and take comfort and hope to ourselves. Our unbelieving scientific friends take refuge in "molecules," in their eternity. Thus e.g. Prof. Tyndall, in his Inaug. Address before the Brit. Association, refers to Prof. Clerk Maxwell (who is a Theist, in allowing a Creator to start the origin of formations in the production of matter): "Natural causes, as we know, are at work, which tend to modify, if they do not at length destroy, all the arrangements and dimensions of the earth and the whole solar system. But though in the course of ages catastrophes have occurred and may yet occur in the heavens, though ancient systems may be dissolved and new systems evolved out of their ruins, the molecules out of which these systems are built, the foundation-stones of the material universe, remain unbroken and unworn." Great, indeed, are "molecules." So also must we reject the unscriptural hypothesis of The Unseen Universe (attributed to Profs. Tait and Stewart). This work, specially designed to indicate a pure Theism, a future state, etc., corroborative of the Bible doctrines, while denying the ultra physical view that the earth will end in mere dead matter as monstrous and unscientific, themselves fall into another error when they make the visible or sense perceivable world, including the universe, by some transferable energy, probably in matter, also to come to an end, i.e. it will become part of their mystical, transcendental "Unseen Universe." Now, take the Bible statements of the wonderful transformation of this world under the mighty hand of the Theocratic King, and it is the furthest removed from such an idea, for covenant and covenant promise, completeness of redemption, all demand a continued and abiding visibility, etc., of the world. One is saddened by reading such works, evidently produced by earnest men.

Obs. 3. In this discussion the reader will not fail to notice the important concessions made by many of our opponents. Literally a multitude of them might be adduced, in which the perpetuity of the earth, after some changes and a process of renewal, is asserted. Neander in several places emphatically declares that at the consummation, restitution, new creation of nature, Coming of Christ, (p. 524), "this globe is destined to be the scene of the triumphant Kingdom of God," and that such is the teaching of Paul, etc. Barnes, Com., advocates the renewal and perpetuity of this earth, but is somewhat at a loss what to do with it after its renewal; hesitating between putting the saints in it, or in the third heaven. Dick, (Phil. of a Fut. State), speaking of the opinion held by some that "the material universe be blotted out of existence," etc., adds: "it is astonishing that it should ever be entertained by any man calling himself a divine or Christian preacher," and then advocates a renewal, etc. Calvin correctly says (Instit., ch. 25, s. 9), "Christ will come, not for the destruction of the world, but for purposes of salvation;" and in sec. 11 advocates a complete restoration. Dr. Hodge, Sys. Div., after finding fault with Dr. Seiss for presenting precisely the view and almost the language of Calvin, finally admits the renewal and perpetuity of the earth. This slight notice of admissions, made by hundreds of writers<sup>1</sup> of a similar tenor, is amply sufficient for our purpose, which is this—that such is the nature of prophecy relating to the earth, the removal of the curse, its renovation, etc., that able and learned men, largely addicted to spiritualizing, find it impossible, without direct antagonism, to indorse either the daring speculation of annihilation, or the equally bold conjecture that the new creation refers to the third heaven. This, as far as it goes, is so much added to our side of the argument. It is remarkable that while there is a general acceptance of Origen's alleged views respecting the end of the world, he himself (De Prin., B. 1, ch. 6), expressly asserts that he did not wish to be understood as presenting them as "a fixed and certain decision," but rather "in the manner of investigation and discussion." His aim, however, to present them "in the style of a disputation rather than of strict definition," was defeated by their being accepted as weapons against Chiliasm. Origen, in the same book (De Prin., B. 6, ch. 6, s. 4), rejects the idea of annihilation or utter destruction, fully indorsing a renewal. Thus the very man, to whom we are the most indebted for influencing, by his system of interpretation, the obscuring of the truth on this and other points, frankly admits in one aspect the Jewish and Early Church view of renewal and perpetuity.<sup>1</sup> commentators. So general an opinion, entertained by—as the above illustrates—men of varied and antagonistic (on other points) views, is worthy of notice and consideration.

The reader will observe how science comes and corroborates the duration of the earth, advocating great changes in the past, subjecting it to changes in the future, but still insisting upon the continuance of the same earth. The Bible predicts this very scientific standpoint in 2 Pet. 3 : 4, but clearly intimates in connection, that, discarding the Lawgiver and His Plan in relation to the earth, it confines itself simply to the operation of the laws instituted, and denies that future changes will be introduced through the direct agency of the Creator. In fact, under the influence of a bias to natural law, they reject the return of Him who has promised to renew the earth, and being “scoffers,” scoffingly say, “Where is the promise of His Coming?” for “all things continue as they were from the beginning of creation.” That which the Bible assumes as a necessary result in order to fulfil covenant and promise, they assume as opposed to fulfilment, viz., the perpetuity of the earth. But why this last assumption? Simply because “they willingly are ignorant” of the Divine Purpose relating to the earth—a Purpose which makes perpetuity an indispensable requisite. Natural law can be no Saviour, as the past ages have demonstrated; the Lawgiver alone can be our Redeemer, and this He becomes without destroying the perpetuity of the earth. Indeed, if He were to annihilate the earth, He would forfeit the perfection of Redeemer. Hence, we may sadly but calmly regard that arrogation of superior wisdom which claims (Contemp. Review, Aug., 1872, p. 431) that those who do not thus scoff with them and make the continuance of the earth an objection to Christ’s coming, are “enthusiasts, dreamers, knaves, and fools.” To indicate the perverseness and desire to find fault, it is only necessary to refer to the Essays and Reviews, p. 208, which presents such passages as Ps. 93 : 1; Ps. 104 : 5, etc., as teaching that the earth does not turn on its axis but possesses “immobility,” when the simple idea conveyed is that of perpetuity and stability. Some scientists (Scribner’s Monthly, May, 1873) reject, from the same premises, the Utopian views of many of the evolutionists, and, from the final exhaustion of coal, iron, etc., the encroachments of the sea, etc., predict first gradual distinction of race and ultimate destruction. Thus extremes meet.

Obs. 4. The Word expressly declares the continuance and perpetuity of the earth, and no one should venture a counter statement without the same is presented in similar positive terms. Thus e.g. Ps. 104 : 5, “God laid the foundations of the earth that it should not be removed forever.” Compare Ps. 148 : 3, 5, 6; Eccl. 1 : 4; Ps. 89 : 36; Jer. 31 : 35, etc. But to place it apparently beyond all contradiction, the perpetuity of God’s promises and faithfulness is contrasted with the perpetuity of the earth, as e.g. Jer. 33 : 25, 26, and, especially when the covenant itself is specified, in Ps. 89 : 34–37. Other passages will be presented in the following Propositions in order to save repetition.

Hence, it follows that such passages as 1 Cor. 7 : 31 and 1 John 2 : 17, which declare that “the fashion of the world passeth away,” “the world passeth away,” must be interpreted in accordance. And this can the more readily be done, because the word translated “world” is “kosmos,” which, as lexicographers affirm, has special reference to the order or arrangement of the world, and this very order, as Millennial prophecies abundantly show, shall be changed. Even such commentators as Barnes (1 John 2 : 17) say : “The reference here does not seem to be so much to the material world, as to the scenes of show and vanity which make up the world. These things are passing away like the shifting scenes of the stage. See Notes on 1 Cor. 7 : 31.” Nearly all commentators admit that we are directed to the palingenesis of the world (Props. 144 and 145), or the deliverance of creation (Props. 146, 148, and 151), connected with the future advent of the Messiah. For, as Dr. Moll (Lange’s Com. Heb. p. 41) justly observes : “Its (i.e. world’s) transformation into a new and nobler form of existence is effected by means of the same Lord through whom it was created,” etc. Comp. Meyer and Luthardt, as quoted by Dr. Hodge in Sys. Div., vol. 3, p. 839. Even such a writer as Anselm (Bh. of Havilburg, Treat. on Rev.) declares his faith in this perpetuity, when he says : “The whole earth, which carried in its lap the body of the Lord, will be a Paradise.”

Obs. 5. Aside from various considerations presented in previous Propositions which direct the eye of faith to the perpetuity of the earth, a few additional may be adduced, as follows. (1) The Early Church, having the advantage of apostolic teaching on a subject which excited special attention, held, as far as known, to the same. (2) Taking the Millennial descriptions as a whole, without forcibly separating them, they clearly teach a purification, renewal, and perpetuity. (3) The promise individually to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to inherit the land, and the same promise to the saints, imply it. (4) The praying of God's will to be done on earth as in heaven—which we know will never be done in the mixed condition of the Church and world down to the Second Advent—infers it. (5) The harvest at the end of the age, by a comparison of the Scriptures bearing on it, teaches it. (6) Separate prophecies which speak of the perpetuity of the Kingdom, etc., after the Advent of Christ, such as Dan. 7, Isa. 65 and 66, etc., cannot be consistently explained on any other ground. (7) The same truth is contained in the predictions, that He shall have all rule, all enemies under Him, etc., after His Sec. Advent, He being at the same time the Restorer. (8) The Pre-Mill. Advent, with the results attending it here on earth, evince the same. (9) The throne and Kingdom—the inheritance of David's Son, cannot be received, as covenanted, unless the perpetuity of the earth after His Coming is upheld. In brief, (10) the restitution, the heirship of the world (Rom. 4 : 13), removal of the curse, the predicted reign of the saints on the earth, the occurrences after the Millennial era, as related by John and the prophets, etc., all inculcate the same truth.

Obs. 6. Besides this, it may well be asked whether an earth so highly honored by the birth, presence, sufferings, and death of Christ (and which is His also by inheritance), can possibly be blotted out of existence. Events, the most intensely interesting in the moral government of God, have here taken place; the most astounding display of Divine attributes is linked with its history; the marvellous Redemptive process has magnified this globe into a prominent place among all the worlds of the Universe, and, unless specifically declared, it is opposed to all our higher and nobler views of God's grandeur, Christ's honor, and the Spirit's agencies, to suppose that such an earth, which witnessed the humiliation, tears, sufferings, agony, and blood of Jesus; which was hallowed by His infant, childhood, and manly feet and voice, and consecrated by His miracles and works of mercy and love, should ever be utterly destroyed. Neither piety nor reason, neither the glory of God nor the welfare of man, desire an earth containing a Bethlehem, a Jerusalem, a Gethsemane, or a Calvary to be erased from the Universe. The thought is revolting. Aside from God's glory in Redemption, it does not accord with our feelings or wishes that this earth, in which we were renewed, the witness of our pilgrimage, the scene of most intimate and endearing relations, the place of ennobling associations, should be blotted out of existence. From such a belief, a reduction to nothing, etc., enlightened piety and reason, and even feeling, shrink as inconsistent with the Divine attributes and the utterances of Scripture. And it is a matter of amazement, that through a mystical conception of God's Kingdom, divines ever entertained a view so derogatory to truth and God's dealings, as well as to the noblest instincts of man; just as if the latter could desire that his own childhood's home—the spot on earth sweetest to memory—should forever perish and attribute the same feeling to Jesus.

It is in view of such sentiments in connection with scriptural proof that Fairbairn (although opposed to Millenarianism), advocating "a redeemed and glorified earth," adds

(Typology of Scripture, p. 461): "Were I left to choose out of all creation's bounds the place where my redeemed nature is to find its local habitation, enjoy its Redeemer's presence, and reap the fruits of His costly purchase, I would prefer none to this." McNeile, Noel, Cummings, Seiss, and others, have expressed themselves forcibly on this point. This, then, teaches us (1) how untenable is the theory advocated by some (as stated by Clark in Man all Immortal, p. 444), that an entire new world is to be created out of nothing after this one is destroyed (for this makes Redemption incomplete, gives Satan the victory, etc.), and (2) how extravagant and unscriptural is Pres. Edwards (His. Red., p. 421) in turning this earth into a hell, "a great furnace, wherein all the enemies of Christ and His Church shall be tormented forever and ever," etc. (just as imaginary as Keerl's—so Bib. Sac. Oct., 1863, p. 769—comets composing whirling, flying hells, etc., and which Swormstedt in his End of the World Near, pp. 131 177, and 179, has reproduced, "the earth and the moon fleeing away as comets," "turned into wandering comets," and sent away as a hell). How refreshing to turn from such imaginings to the utterances of the early Fathers. Thus e.g. Irenaeus (Ag. Hers., 5, 32), referring to this earthly inheritance and the saints reigning in it after their resurrection, adds: "For it is just that in that very creation in which they toiled or were afflicted, being proved in every way by suffering, they should receive the reward of suffering; and that in the creation in which they were slain because of their love to God, in that they should be revived again; and that in the creation in which they endured servitude, in that they should reign. For God is rich in all things, and all things are His. It is fitting, therefore, that the creation itself, being restored to its primeval condition, should, without restraint, be under the dominion of the righteous."

Obs. 7. The renewal and perpetuity of the earth is requisite to secure the Redeemer's glory, in the perfecting of His Redemptive work, etc. If the earth should only contain the Church in its mixed condition, the entailment of the curse, the products of selfishness manifested in wars, etc., down to the Sec. Advent, and it should then be utterly destroyed and ever remain thus, then it follows that the Scriptures respecting the Christ would evermore remain unfulfilled. For down to that Sec. Advent, owing to the postponement of the Kingdom, He does not reign in the covenanted Kingdom; down to that Second Advent, owing to that postponement and a consequent preliminary gathering out of saints, He does not fulfil the promises respecting His own reign, or those pertaining to the saints inheriting the Kingdom. His Sec. Advent being for purposes of salvation, constitutes, in the work then performed, Him a perfect Redeemer. It is fully admitted that down to that Advent salvation is imperfect—the forfeited blessings are not restored. Hence it follows, that if the earth is destroyed, as many hold, soon after that Advent, there is no place for the fulfilment of covenant or covenant promises. More than this: it gives, so far as this earth is concerned, the victory to Satan; for, if the curse is not repealed; if evil is not extirpated; if the forfeited blessings are not restored; if man's long-lost home is not given back to him in its Edenic loveliness; if the race is not brought back to its original condition and dwelling in a purified earth, then Satan triumphs in the ruin accomplished, just as he would triumph if the grave should evermore hold our bodies in confinement; just as he would gain the victory if our hearts would never more exultantly swell with love supreme to God. But in the redemption of the earth itself, in the recreation and perpetuation of it, in the fulfilment of the promises pertaining to it, as embracing the Kingdom extending over it, etc., Christ's power and glory as Redeemer, as King, as the All-sufficient, is duly manifested.

There is no end to the vagaries of man. In a recent work, Arena and the Throne, the author, Townsend, advocates the dissolution of the Universe (the old monkish doctrine) from a new standpoint, viz., in view of the greatness of man, when God perfects the ideal of that greatness as given by the writer. In this "ideal" the Universe, including all other worlds, is made solely for man, and as he advances in knowledge and progress so vast "the physical Universe will have no further end to subservise; it shall be dissolved," etc. In other words, all things become stale, grow effete, and new things must be introduced to please this greatness, just as parents substitute new playthings when their children are tired of the old ones. This imaginary and sensational view ignores covenant and prophecy, in brief, the plainest statements of Holy Writ, and that which pertains to God's honor and glory and the happiness of His redeemed.

Obs. 8. The proposition is apparent even from the manner in which the Bible begins and ends. It commences with an earthly Paradise lost, an earth cursed; it ends with an earthly Paradise regained through Christ, just as Milton, Cowper, Heber, C. Wesley (and other poets), but above all the sacred writers, so sweetly described. The last scene, showing the ability of Jesus to save, is one here on a redeemed earth, for that which is of the third heaven is expressly declared to come down, from God, out of heaven upon it and remains (at least there is no record of its removal afterward). It must be so, or else the Plan of Redemption is imperfect, and the Kingdom of God cannot be manifested as covenanted and predicted. We are sinners, the Plan makes us holy; we lose our bodies by death, the Plan recovers them again; we lost Eden, the Plan restores it again; we lost the personal Presence of God, this Plan recovers that soul-satisfying Presence when God again dwells with man; we lost the contemplated visible Theocratic rule of God, this Plan makes, in the sacred Person of Jesus Christ, the most ample amends in filling the earth with His sovereignty, etc. Thus, in brief, every blessing with the removal of every evil, is linked with the culmination of this Divine Plan, and is inseparably fixed with the continuation of the earth itself. It is a Divine Purpose, culminating in the Kingdom, which shines forth at the end of the Bible in actual realization upon the earth—pertaining as it does to this world—and triumphant in overcoming the evil, and in bestowing the blessings contemplated by it. And if men would read the Word unbiassed, this relationship to the earth would appear as strongly to them as it did to the Early Church, which clung to it as something pertaining to Christ's honor and to man's happiness. However much the caution given by Luther is violated, yet there is profound wisdom in his saying: "It is important for us to recur to Adam's original condition, as we expect all things to be brought back again to that." Man's fall is on the earth, and his recovery is on the earth, and, therefore, the earth itself is called upon to rejoice and exult in witnessing his glorious restoration.

Fred. Den. Maurice in his Theological writings contends, in forcible language, that Redemption is not subject to limitations of space and time. Some able philosophical arguments are adduced in support of the theory, but it is antagonistic to the covenant, which embraces definite limitations of both space and time, without, however, discarding an ultimate entrance into the eternal ages and a constant extension of both, which last is a result of Redemption completed. The Bible deals with the provisions of Redemption and with Redemption perfected, and presents us but little beyond that, excepting in the most general manner.

Obs. 9. The perpetuity of the earth is so much taken for granted, is so undoubted, that numerous promises are based upon it. Thus e.g. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."<sup>1</sup> How this passage is to be understood is apparent from the prophets, who predict the time coming, still future, when this shall be realized, under the reign of David's Son, when the Jewish nation is restored. Ps. 37 alone, from which Jesus quoted, contains this promise several times, and describes its occurrence to be when (as takes place at the Second Advent) the wicked shall be destroyed and utterly rooted out of the earth. The identical earth, occupied and so largely controlled by the wicked, is to be possessed by the righteous. The auditors of Jesus could not mistake the tenor of the promise, seeing that they all believed that the land was promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob individually and to their seed to inherit; and certainly we ought not to spiritualize it away when an inspired apostle, taking into a comprehensive view the covenanted relationship of Abraham, calls Abraham (Rom. 4 : 13),<sup>1</sup> "the heir of the world." The inheriting (as even the Jews believed) follows the resurrection of the just, and Christ's promise is only the confirmation of a general belief on the subject founded upon covenant and prophets. It assumes, as a necessary contingency or result, the perpetuity of the earth, recalling at once the fact that Palestine itself is pronounced to Abraham and his seed to be "an eternal inheritance." The Millennial predictions, embracing the promises of the removal of sorrow, suffering, disease, and even death, portray events here on the earth which are positively located after the Second Advent, so that for their realization the continued existence of the earth is constantly implied, and asserted. Messiah's Kingdom and the blessings relating to it are all experienced here, where the Theocracy was once established—where David's throne and Kingdom once existed; the Bible closing with leaving Jesus, the saints, and the New Jerusalem here on the earth; the Word locating the "we shall reign with Him on the earth" after the Advent; Holy Writ speaking of "the day of Christ," "the world to come," etc., in which a Kingdom under the whole heaven shall be witnessed, after the Sec. Coming here in the world; Revelation making the will of God to be done on the earth in the coming Kingdom as it is done in heaven only after "the appearing" or "revelation of Jesus Christ;"<sup>4</sup> in brief, the Word of God giving so many intimations and declarations as have already preceded (and as will immediately follow), in various propositions, it is impossible, intelligently, to entertain any other belief than the one advanced. The Divine Purpose is expressed in Isa. 60 : 21, "Thy people also shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever; the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified."

<sup>1</sup> In reference to the perversion of this passage to a present fulfilment (against the persecution, poverty, etc., of believers), it is only necessary to refer to the early church view, and to notice how under the severest trials Christians consoled themselves (acknowledging themselves to be "pilgrims and strangers") with the hope that at the end of the age the dominion of the wicked over the earth would cease, and the righteous would inherit the same. So much was this the case, that even Gibbon notices that this hope excited the hostility of some of the Pagan emperors. Many of the ancient and more recent commentaries, and a multitude of writers, express the intent of the promise, when they declare that this earth, purified and renewed, shall become the home of the Redeemed. Many of the comments of Luther, Calvin, Knox, Chrysostom, Augustine, etc., the writings of Mede, Newton, Bickersteth, McNeile, Noel, Knapp, Tholuck, etc., the works of Dr. Chalmers (Ser. on New Heavens, etc.), John Wesley (Ser. on Behold, I make all things new), Dr. Hitchcock (Fut. Destiny of the Earth), etc., all contain valuable declarations favoring a literal fulfilment of the promise. Luther especially expresses a childlike faith that is marked by its contrast to the prevailing beliefs as e.g. "God will make not the earth only but the heavens also much more beautiful than they are at present. At present we see the world in its working clothes; but hereafter, it will be arrayed in its Easter and Whitsuntide" (for he expected for some reasons the Advent of Jesus on Easter) "robes." See Meurer's Life of Luther, p. 573-4, etc. Compare the following Prop., as well as others linked with the same, e.g. Props. 154.

* Dr. Schaff (Lange's Com. Rom., p. 150), on this passage, pertinently remarks: "The promise will be literally fulfilled when the Kingdoms of the world are given to the people of the Most High, and Christ will rule with His saints forever and ever, Dan. 7 : 27 ; Apoc. 11 : 15, and 12 : 10 ; Matt. 5 : 5 ; 2 Tim. 2 : 12." We refer the reader to Prop. 49 for the original promise to Abraham, and it will be seen, that while Canaan is specially designated, yet in the promised possession of the gate of his enemies, in the blessing to the nations of the earth, in the anticipated Theocratic prominence and occupation of the seed, this final glorious dominion—as amplified by the prophets—is already embraced.

* Also "an everlasting possession" (Gen. 48) in which they shall "dwell forever" (Ezek. 37 : 25). In more senses than one is Chrysostom's strictures on Origen correct: "Who can bear Origen giving to us a Paradise in the third heaven and transferring to heavenly places that Paradise which the Scripture describes as belonging to the earth," etc. (Quoted by Cumming, Lec. on Romanism, p. 226.) Many who are not prepared to indorse Origen's view of the first Paradise, make no scruple to interpret the regained Paradise in the same way.

* We cannot too strongly insist upon it that this portion of the Lord's prayer has reference to man's complete restoration to the condition occupied before the fall—to an obedience, holiness, etc., identified with the prayed-for Kingdom ; to the removal of all rebellion, all evil, and bringing the world into subjection to God. Comp. Prop. 105.

Obs. 10. The perpetuity of the earth is so frankly admitted and even advocated in works especially intended against Millenarianism, that it seems to require no additional proof. Thus e.g. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming) receives the doctrine of the earth being renovated at the Advent of Jesus and forming the continued home of the saints, "a congenial-abode for the glorified Church." He defends this view against the charge of "carnalism" or a lowering of the celestial state, ascribing the objection to "some tincture of morbid spiritualism, which shrinks from the very touch of materialism, as if separation from it in every form would be the consummation of happiness ;" and he pertinently asks, "May not the Gnostic element of the essential sinfulness and vanity of matter, be found lurking beneath it?" Barnes on Isa. 45 : 18 says: "The Jews from this passage infer, that the earth shall be inhabited after the resurrection—an idea which has every probability, since there will not be fewer reasons why the earth should be inhabited then than there are now ; nor can there be any reasons why the earth should then exist in vain any more than now." Various writers have held that, whatever changes or transformations may ensue hereafter at the consummation, the earth's continuance will not be interfered with even by a destruction as great as that occasioned by the flood, alleging as proof Gen. 8 : 21, 22. Others have inferred the same from the phrases "an everlasting Kingdom," which shall not pass away or be destroyed (Dan. 7), from the reigning "forever and ever" attributed to Christ (Rev. 11 : 15) in relation to the earth, etc. To this period evidently belongs 1 Chron. 16 : 30, "the world also shall be stable, that it be not moved," i.e. enjoying the stability induced by God's reigning in the Theocratic order. For this Kingdom, prepared from the foundation of the world (Matt. 25 : 34), necessities (as we have previously shown) the laying of "the foundations of the earth that they should not be removed forever" (Ps. 104 : 5). One of the works specifically attributed to Christ is (Isa. 49 : 8), "to establish (raise up) the earth, to cause to inherit the desolate heritages," so that the significant address is made through Him (Isa. 51 : 16): "I have put my words in thy mouth, and I have covered thee in the shadow of My hand, that I may plant the heavens and lay the foundations of the earth, and say unto Zion, Thou art My people." Thus taking the Plan of Redemption, which includes "the redemption of the purchased possession," the restoration of order to the world through Messiah's Kingdom; taking the faith of the Jews, the Early Church and many eminent believers; taking the concessions, etc., of opponents, this doctrine—a requisite link in our argument—is unmistakably confirmed. It crops out, undesignedly, in various portions of the Word, as e.g. in Ps. 148 : 6, where the heavens, heights, angels, sun, moon, stars—all things created are mentioned as praising God, and their perpetuity is announced in "Let them praise the name of the Lord, for He commanded and they were created; He hath also established them forever and ever." The earth has been created to show forth the praise of God, and sin shall not mar this laudation of the Most High (as it now does through the imperfection and evils entailed), and hence the time is coming when the declaration (Rev. 4 : 11) will be verified: "Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created." God's pleasure concerning the things created by Him is to be glorified by and through them; this, in the nature of the case, can only be effectually attained by their continuance, etc. Therefore it is, that in the description of the reign of David's Son, as given in Ps. 72, the perpetuity of the Kingdom, of the Kingship of Christ is contrasted with the perpetuity of the Sun and the Moon—both are represented as enduring forever—the former dispensing blessings and the latter (creation) acknowledging them with grateful praise, under a supremacy over the world (inhabitable, Heb. 2 : 5), only realized after the Second Advent. The statement of Ps. 115 : 16 is true, and the promise made to Noah (Gen. 8 : 21, 22) is ever faithfully preserved.

We cannot refrain, in view of the abundant proof on this point, to again express amazement that such an able man as Pres. Edwards (His Redemp. ch. 9, sec. 7) makes the perpetuity of the earth only available as an eternal hell for Satan and the wicked. After telling us that this world is to "be set on fire and turned into a great furnace wherein all the enemies of Christ and His Church shall be tormented forever and ever;" after making this so "fierce" "that it shall burn the earth into its very centre," he pronounces it an "everlasting fire," in which "all the wicked shall burn, and be tormented to all eternity, and never be consumed," and adds: "This world, which formerly used to be the place of his (Satan's) kingdom, where he set up himself as God, shall now be the place of his complete punishment, of full and everlasting torment." Alas! in a work on Redemption—Redemption itself is made imperfect, and the curse, instead of being repealed, is pressed with increased and eternal intensity upon creation, converting it into a monkish fancied hell. Alas! when men so talented, and able, and pious, grossly misconceive the covenants and their relation to the earth, and thus indoctrinate multitudes in unscriptural and misleading tenets! The high esteem that must be given to Edwards, and the fact that his work is extensively circulated by the Amer. Tract Soc., causes us to select him in preference to others. Whatever may be Bible teaching respecting hell, one thing is certain, viz., that Paradise regained forbids this earth from being converted into such a place. Over against Dr. Brown, however, other opponents urge, in their zeal to make 2 Pet. 3 : 7-10 impregnable against us, an utter destruction of the earth, and reject the doctrine of mere change and a renewal; as e.g. Waldegrave (New Test. Mill. Lec. 6). So bitter are such against materiality (as if it was necessarily sinful), that as e.g. a writer in The Princeton Review, Jan., 1853, p. 81, positively asserts: "We believe that this physical, material world will be no more." Even some Millenarians—as e.g. "Graybeard" (Graff) in his Lay Sermons, No. 95—seem to imbibe the Gnostic idea of matter, in that they have it ultimately when it has sufficiently presented "the drama of Redemption," swallowed up wholly in the spiritual. Thus "Graybeard" says: "At the close of the Millennial Messianic Age, after the setting up of the great white throne and the destruction of all evil, this 'insubstantial pageant,' which we call visible nature, will have vanished forever, and God will be all in all." We may well ask, what, then, becomes of God's promises respecting the perpetuity of the earth, the inheritance of the Christ and His brethren? Brethren who retain this Gnostic element evidently transcend the divine Record, and blot out that which is ever intimately connected with the glory of Jesus and the saints. By this assumed higher spirituality, we only remove the blessed evidences of Redemptive love. No! the places consecrated by God's love, honored by the presence and rule of David's Son and Lord, endeared by the blessed experience of saints, will never, never disappear from the Universe. It ever, ever will be true, that "the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof;" so that we firmly hold with Dean Alford (Com. loci), that "the general tenor of prophecy and the analogy of the divine dealings point unmistakably to this earth, purified and renewed, as the eternal habitation of the blessed." So conclusive does this appear to a student, that Dr. Hodge (Sys. Theol.) well says: "Many of the old theologians thought that the whole existing physical universe was to be destroyed. This view is now universally discarded." (Comp. e.g. Campbell (Chr. Sys., p. 304), Clarke (Com.), Hugh Miller (Test. of the Rocks, Lec. 5), and others, who reiterate such statements, advocating a regeneration, restoration, refinement, and perpetuity of the earth.) (See remarks of Lange, Com. Rev. p. 403, etc.)

PROPOSITION 142. The Kingdom being related to the earth (extending over it), and involving the res. of the saints (in order to inherit it), is sustained by the promise to the saints of their inheriting the earth.

It has been shown that the land is covenanted to the Patriarchs personally (Prop. 49), and that a res. is indispensable to its fulfilment; that (Rom. 8 : 13) "the promise" to Abraham involved, "that he should be the heir of the world," and that all believers inherit—being identified with him as his seed—the same promise with him. This, of course, includes their res. also, for it promises them to inherit the land or earth. Having shown the res., let us notice those special promises as a confirmation of our doctrinal position.

Obs. 1. The re-establishment of the Davidic throne and Kingdom here on earth, as Covenant, Prophets, pious Jews, Rabbis, disciples, Apostolic Fathers, etc., teach, and as presented in previous Propositions, demands, if God reveals at all the destination of saints, a specific mention of their receiving the earth as an inheritance. This has indeed already been established (see e.g. Props. 49 on covenants and Props. 116 and 122), but God has accumulated proof, as if purposely to rebuke and render inexcusable the prevailing unbelief in this particular.

It would be uncandid to consider this Proposition isolated from its connection with others. The student will observe that this inheriting is founded in the covenant (Prop. 49), in the Theocratic ordering (Props. 33, 50, 51, etc.), in the nature of the Kingdom given to "the Son of man" (Props. 81-89), in its establishment here on earth (Prop. 116), and in the inheritance belonging to David's Son (Prop. 122). These and other particulars have been discussed. But in connection with these, in order to obtain a comprehensive view, must be noticed Prop. 168 on the place of manifested royalty, Prop. 117 on the visible Theocracy, Prop. 118 on the barren woman, Prop. 121 on the Pre-Mill. Advent, Props. 131 and 132 on the reign and judgeship of Jesus, Prop. 133 on the judgment day, Prop. 137 on "the world to come," Prop. 138 and 139 on "the day of the Lord Jesus," Prop. 148 on "the Rest," Prop. 140 on "the end of the age," Prop. 141 on the perpetuity of the earth, Prop. 158 on the transfiguration, Prop. 170 on "the Father's house," Prop. 169 on the New Jerusalem, and Prop. 154 on the reign of the saints. These and others contain an abundance of confirmatory matter. Indeed, the present Proposition seems only introductory to what follows.

Obs. 2. The declaration of Jesus, Matt. 5 : 5, that the meek shall inherit the earth, ought to be decisive. But men under the influence of a plastic system of interpretation, urged on by a preconceived notion, leave the plain meaning of the promise and explain it away. One gravely tells us that it is "a proverbial expression," not seeing that, as employed by the Jews, it favors our view. Another informs us "that the Jews considered Canaan a type of heaven," without an attempt of proof, and against their expressed hopes on the subject. One tells us that it means that the meek man is in this world the most prospered, against innumerable examples to the contrary. Another passes it by with some generality or vague expression, that it is "a symbol," or "an outward possession." Some tell us that it is "a spiritual inheritance" over the earth by individuals and the Church; others again, not satisfied entirely with such meanings attached, inform us (as Gerlach, Lange's Com.) that the promises will only be fully accomplished at the Sec. Advent, or (as Neander, Life of Christ, s. 149), that it is not merely to be confined to "the blessedness of the Kingdom of God," but denotes a "world-dominion which Christians, as organs of the spirit of Christ, are ever more and more to obtain as the Kingdom of God shall win increasing sway over mankind and the relation of society, until, in its final consummation, the whole earth shall own its dominion." Every writer too acknowledges that it includes this inheriting in the Messianic Kingdom. Rejecting the manner of introduction suggested by Neander and others, they certainly are correct in the main idea of its including the notion of "a world-dominion," thus identifying it, as it should be, with the possession of the earth given to the saints in Dan. 7, etc. The position of some German and other commentators, as well as that of the Early Church, is alone tenable, viz., that this promise yet remains unfulfilled, and pertains to the future. Now aside from the various and numerous arguments already given to show this, we are content to let only one passage indicate the time of its fulfilment. Let the reader turn to Psalm 37, where this same promise is repeated five times,* and he will find it in vs. 9, 11, 22, 29, 34, directly joined to and following a complete removal of evil-doers, not preceding it or contemporaneous with the continued presence of the wicked. It is significantly pointed out as future by the exhortation to "wait," "wait patiently" for the Lord, and the blessedness that Christ alludes to is also attributed to it. Jesus undoubtedly quoted it, and if so, a reference to the connection in which the promise stands is all that we need to establish the time of its fulfilment—a time too, which the most uncompromising of our opponents fully and frequently admit—is only to be witnessed at the Sec. Advent, for volumes could be filled with the concessions made that "evil-doers" shall exist down to the Advent itself.

It is observable that even Sir John Maundeville (Travels), in his Prologue, asserts that Palestine "is the same land that our Lord promised us in heritage;" and, not observing that this promise is in other passages linked with the Sec. Advent, founds upon this fact an argument why Christians should claim the heritage and drive out the unbelievers. The reader need scarcely be reminded how this plea was used during the Crusades, and in support of Papal claims. The critical student will not forget to consider how such promises were understood by the early Church for several centuries, so that even in the Nicene forms of Eccl. Doctrine (recorded by Gelasius Cyzicenus in His. Act. Con. Nic.), Matt. 5 : 3 ; Dan. 7 : 18 ; Isa. 26 : 6, are united with the resurrection at Sec. Advent. Thus : "We expect new heavens and a new earth, according to the Hol. Scriptures, at the appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. And : Daniel says : 'The saints of the Most High shall take the Kingdom.' And there shall be a pure and holy land, the land of the living and not of the dead ; which David, for seeing with the eye of faith, exclaims : 'I believe to see the goodness of the Lord in land of the living'—the land of the meek and humble. 'Blessed,' saith Christ, 'are the m for they shall inherit the earth.' And the prophet saith : 'The feet of the meek and hu, shall tread upon it.' " (See this quoted by Mede, Homes, Brooks, Bickersteth, etc., comp.) The writings of the Apostolic and Primitive Fathers, as well as the Apocryphal and Jewish, inculcate this inheriting of the land, and, as we give, in various places, numerous extracts, they need not be repeated or enlarged.

Obs. 2. To avoid repetition, we leave direct arguments bearing on this point under following Propositions, and only give some allusions to this future possession of the earth by the righteous. Thus e.g. Prov. 11 : 31, "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth ;" Prov. 12 : 7, "The wicked are overthrown and are not, but the house of the righteous shall stand ;" Prov. 10 : 30, "The righteous shall never be removed, but the wicked shall not inhabit the earth," evidently refer to the time Ps. 76 : 9, when God shall cast the wicked, "the stout-hearted," into a "sleep," when He shall be "terrible to the kings of the earth" (comp. Rev. 19, etc.), and shall "cut off the spirit of princes," and "when God arose to judgment to save all the meek of the earth." Under this period too fall the many promises to the righteous, that they "shall be blessed on the earth," confirming the importance of our seeking true wisdom, "For (Prov. 2 : 21, 22) the upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it, but the wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressors shall be rooted out of it." Hence in this Millennial period, when, as our argument indicates, this is to be realized, the promise is reiterated. Thus e.g. in the sublime description of Isa. 60, it is added : "they (the righteous) shall inherit the land forever ;" and in Isa. 54, "this is the heritage of the servants of the Lord," so that, Isa. 57 : 13, it will be verified that "he that putteth his trust in Me shall possess the land, and shall inherit My holy mountain." If we take the translation given by some (Clarke's Com. loci) to the clause "for His mercy endureth forever," in Ps. 136, viz., "For His tender mercy is to the coming age," or if we only keep in view the idea of perpetuity or futurity in the phrase, and apply the same to vs. 21, 22, then the land is for "a heritage unto Israel," in the time yet to come. In Ps. 115 this doctrine is evolved, for, declaring the people of Israel are the "blessed of the Lord," the Psalmist adds, "the heaven, even the heavens, are the Lord's : but the earth hath He given to the children of men." The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence. But we" (notice the implication sustained by the proof already adduced : we who are raised up from the dead, we who remain not thus in silence, we who shall receive the earth thus bestowed) "will bless the Lord from this time forth and for evermore." The land of Canaan is called "rest," and it is God's "rest" (Ps. 95 : 7), as shown under Props. 122 and 143. It is not typical of something else, for that would overthrow the covenant and its promises. It is His "rest," because in it the headship of the Theocratic government shall be specially manifested. A comparison of Scripture shows that, after a res. from the dead, an entrance into this "rest" is to be obtained. Thus e.g. Ps. 116 has "return unto thy rest, O my soul ; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee. For Thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling. I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living." The identical "rest" promised is the one obtained after a res. The Jews thus understood the "rest" to denote the land, and the making of this rest glorious, etc., to mean that under the Messiah it would be renewed and beautified. Paul in writing to Jews does not contradict, but positively confirms this idea of the future inheritance, for instead of calling this rest the third heaven (as many unwarrantedly add), he (Heb 3 and 4) quotes Ps. 95, and designates the same "rest" the Psalmist does into which certain ones could not enter, but fell in the wilderness. He argues that through unbelief we too shall be cut off, but through faith in Christ, and by the power of Jesus, we too shall enter in "His rest" according to the promise. In the same epistle he declares that the promise is realized when this Jesus comes the second time unto salvation. If the Jews were mistaken in their conception of "the rest," surely an inspired teacher like Paul ought to have corrected their views when adverting to the subject. But he could not, dared not contradict the plain truth, which they also held, and, therefore, as the unity of the Spirit and Divine Plan required, employs the reasoning best calculated to establish them in the only true idea of the inheritance promised to the Patriarchs and to all God's people. (Comp. Prop. 143, on Sabbatism, etc.) This is strongly corroborated by other phraseology also employed by the Jews, indicated further on.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Clement (A.D. 97, First Epis.) quotes Prov. 2 : 21, as follows : "The kind-hearted shall inhabit the land, and the guiltless shall be left upon it, but transgressors shall be destroyed from off the face of it." Then shall be fulfilled such sayings as Prov. 11 : 31, "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth ; much more the wicked and the sinner," as illustrated e.g. Mal. 4. Comp. 2 Esdras 7 : 67 and 9 : 13.

<sup>2</sup> Even such promises as are contained in Eph. 6 : 2, 3 would not be verified in a multitude of cases (for many who have honored father and mother have not lived long in the land), unless in and under them was implied—as God's Purpose teaches—a future inheriting of the earth. If the student will turn to Prop. 82, he will find additional reasons for this inheriting of the earth, and of such a conclusive nature—involved in the Divine Plan of Redemption—that many of our opponents (as e.g. Fairbairn and others, quoted under it) fully admit of such a future inheriting.

Obs. 3. Attention is again called to the confirmation our doctrine receives from the alleged omission of any but earthly blessings promised to believers in the Mosaic record, and long after. Bh. Warburton and others contend that we find nothing but what relates to this earth ; some, as Edwards and others, that heavenly blessings are inferred ; others, as Dr. Graves, that it can be found in a state of very gradual development ; others again, as Horne, think that heavenly rewards, etc., are presupposed as an adopted article of religion. These, and opinions similar, reveal a darkness on the subject which the Jews and Early Church never possessed. The cause of the perplexity in such writers is simply this : coming to the Bible with the foreign derived idea of the saints' inheritance, they find themselves at the very outset confronted with its direct opposite, and they are forced to resort to arbitrary conjectures and suppositions to support an uncalled-for theory. Rejecting Warburton's explanation of the fact, yet he is correct in asserting that nowhere do we find in any of those records any other but an earthly inheritance promised. This has been noticed extensively by German critics, and even enemies of Christianity have sought to make it (on the supposition that the monkish notion of the third heaven inheritance is the true one) a fatal objection to the Bible. Let, however, the entire scope of the Bible speak ; let Moses, David, Paul, let all speak ; let covenant and covenant promises declare what is this promised inheritance, and in perfect harmony each and every one, proclaim it to be the inheriting of the land, of the earth, of the world, and the possessing of it for the ages. There is nothing hidden in these promises ; they mean precisely what the words in their general usage indicate. Moses promises not merely, if the people are obedient, a temporal possession of the land, but a perpetual one. Those who died are still promised the same, implying a triumph over death and the grave; and, what ought to suffice, the assurance that God's promises would, in this respect, be faithfully realized, is the golden chain which binds Moses, Prophets, Jesus, Apostles, pious Jews, Apostolic Fathers, and other worthies to hold that the time will most certainly arrive when all the meek shall inherit the earth.

The simple fact is self-evident, that just so soon as the Primitive Church view was discarded and the Popish notion of the third heaven or the Universe, as an inheritance, was substituted, then a conflict was established between the Mosaic Record, the prophet's predictions, and the supposed corrected view. Men, in their wisdom, ingenuously sought to reconcile an antagonism, when, if the Word is taken in its strictly grammatical and logical connection, none exists. The truth is, that the Bible is censured for much that it does not contain, and the supposed conflict (Draper, His. Intel. Dev. of Europe, etc.) between science and the Bible is only one between science and persons who misconceive the Bible. Unfortunately, men are not willing to discriminate, and therefore the Bible is too often made to bear the errors of its interpreters and supporters. It is even a matter of surprise that such promises as we have quoted should be, over against the express predictions relating to the future, so persistently limited to the present period, when utterly unsupported by experience and history. The critical student will observe that the modern views, especially the one so often expressed (i. e. that the earthly Paradise was a type of heaven), were not entertained by the quite early Fathers; they held to a restoration of Paradise (as part of Redemption) and to an inheriting of it here on the earth. Various writers (as e. g. Fairbairn, Typology, vol. 1, p. 168) have shown that the later views were inculcated and gained adherents just "as the speculative influence of the Greek philosophy gains strength in the Church."

Obs. 4. Surely those who write so confidently that "the land (the earth) is of little worth to such as have tasted of the higher bliss of a heavenly state;" that it would be "an alarming retrograde of being from a heavenly state back to an earthly one;" that the saints themselves, on account of their heavenly experience, would be "unfit for any degree of blessedness this side of heaven itself," besides a host of similar expressions, should well ponder lest they be found underrating, and sitting in judgment over the inheritance itself and its desirableness. This all may appear very foolish to man, but after all it may prove to be "the wisdom of God." All such criticisms arise from making more of the intermediate state than the Bible warrants. If the pious dead are rewarded, crowned, inherit (Prop. 136), etc., as Popery and some Protestantism make it, then there would be some propriety in the objection. But until this is first established, the criticisms have no force. Again, they overlook what has been repeatedly stated by us, that this very possession of the earth is part of the Divine Plan in the Redemption of the race of man, and promotive of the greatest glory. The facts that we have urged, the passages presented, together with the belief of so many of God's children in different ages, ought in themselves to be amply sufficient to prevent such disparaging remarks.

Frazer (Key to Proph.) asks: "Shall we esteem it an additional happiness to quit the presence of the Lord for the society of men? Is it desirable for those who have arrived at their heavenly Father's house to return again to the land of their sojourning?" Such questions, to be pertinent, ought first to ask whether we advocate a leaving the presence of the Lord when the Lord Himself comes; and whether the Father's house (Prop. 170) is really where Frazer locates it. To reply to, or notice such, criticisms would be a thankless and endless employment. Do such ever really consider what is the covenanted inheritance of Jesus as David's Son (Prop. 122), and that believers are coheirs with Him in the same inheritance? Is all the Scripture bearing on this point to be ignored or arbitrarily set aside by spiritualizing it? Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 311), after having forcibly described the redemption of the earth as man's glorious inheritance, says: "No; when rightly considered, it is not a low and degrading view of the inheritance, which is reserved for the heirs of salvation, to place it in possession of this very earth, which we now inhabit, after it shall have been redeemed and glorified. I feel it for myself to be rather an ennobling and comforting thought; and were I left to choose, out of all creation's bounds, the place where my redeemed nature is to find its local habitation, enjoy its Redeemer's presence, and reap the fruits of His costly purchase, I would prefer none to this. For if destined to so high a purpose, I know it will be made in all respects what it should be—the Paradise of delight, the very heaven of glory and blessing, which I desire and need. And, then, the connection between what it now is, and what it shall have become, must impart to it an interest which can belong to no other region in the universe. If anything could enhance our exaltation to the lordship of a glorious and blessed inheritance, it would surely be the feeling of possessing it in the very place where we were once miserable bondsmen of sin and corruption." (See specially Prop. 203 for a statement.)

Obs. 5. Truth demands the correction of esteemed writers, such as Jones, Shimeall, Butler and others, who make this inheritance to extend to the possession of other worlds, or the third heaven, or the Universe, in brief, "all things." Leaving this theory for examination, especially as held by Shimeall, under the Prop. pertaining to the New Heavens and New Earth, and not objecting to the view that the saints in their glorified condition have access to other worlds, etc., we object to the theory on the ground that it makes the inheritance something very different from the one alone promised to the Patriarchs and to David's Son, and under which promise the saints only inherit. That inheritance is the earth and not the third heaven or the Universe. The proofs assigned by Judge Jones (Notes on Scrip., p. 560) are purely inferential and opposed by direct covenant promises. The texts given against our view are the following: 1 Cor. 3 : 21, 23 (which says nothing contrary, merely specifying "things to come"); Rom. 8 : 38, 39 (which only asserts that nothing can separate us from the love of God); 2 Tim. 2 : 12 (that only declares the reign with Christ); Rev. 22 : 5 (which asserts a perpetual reign); John 20 : 17 (which has no reference to the subject). Indeed, we might ourselves select stronger passages than these, but over against any and every such selection can be placed the impregnable covenant, and the multitude of explicit promises based on, and derived from, it.

Millenarianism, to be consistent, must ever keep in view its foundation in the covenant, and this necessitates the positive rejection of the Universe theory, however plausibly and eloquently expressed. This will be shown at length hereafter. So it rejects the monkish theory that the Sec. Advent, instead of bringing blessing and happiness to this earth, is "the end of all sublunary things," as hostile to the entire tenor and spirit of the Scriptures. It also repudiates the anti-scriptural notion (so Pres. Edwards, His Redemp.) that this earth is to be constituted "the hell" of the wicked, thus giving the victory to Satan. In brief, it—if logically correct—refuses credence to every hypothesis which ignores the covenanted land and inheritance, and which makes the restitution to Edenic forfeited blessings incomplete. Hence, we must totally reject Barbour's views (The Three Worlds, p. 36 and 46), who accuses us of holding to "an agricultural heaven," where the glorified saints build, plant, dig, etc. In The Herald of the Morning, Sep. 15, 1877, he thus, under the plea of a higher spiritual discernment (which ignores the plain grammatical sense of covenant and promise), takes our view to task: "While the apostle affirms 'our inheritance is reserved in heaven,' they claim the earth—promised only to the Jews and other nations in the flesh—as theirs; 'While Christ affirms, 'I go to prepare mansions for you,' they claim, Isa. 65 : 2 (a promise only for Jews in the flesh), as their own, and expect to plant vineyards and build houses; while Paul affirms of the dead in Christ, that they are to be raised 'spiritual bodies,' they claim that the same literal earthy, fleshly body is to be raised, and an immortal soul or an immortal spirit of some kind is to take possession of it and permeate its fleshly substance." This is an utterly unfair and prejudiced caricature of our real views. No one of us teaches that the future body raised and glorified is a fleshly body, or that saints, who are kings and priests, plant and build. It is easy to establish a preconceived theory by quoting just as much of a passage as suits, and leave the rest, which is contradictory—as e.g. the revealing of the inheritance reserved at the Sec. Advent (see 1 Pet. 1 : 5, 7, 13, and Props. on same); the scriptural conception of the Father's House and its connection with the Coming again; the manner in which Peter claims the realization of Isa. 65 : 2 in behalf of believers (comp. Props. 148, 151, 170, etc.), etc. Barbour's theory is a rejection of covenant (both Abrahamic and Davidic) promises, and cannot rise to the conception that in this restored Theocratic Kingdom the saints as rulers and coheirs with Christ enjoy a higher plane than the nations of the earth; that with an earthly inheritance (which restores one of the forfeited blessings of the Fall and completes Redemption) they also inherit a Kingdom, higher spiritual and eternal good, with a New Jerusalem position, etc.; that to ridicule "the inheritance of the land" is to scorn the inheritance of the Messiah and His coheirs; that to inherit a Kingdom, a Theocracy, here on earth, must necessarily bring the inheritors into earthly relationship with their subjects, etc. A close adherence to the plain grammatical sense of the covenants, and the promises based thereupon, effectually disposes of all these mystical and spiritualistic theories which are so numerous. We say, in reference to the Obs. itself, with Dr. Tyng (see Hill's Saints' Inheritance, p. 271): "In the great view of the Saviour's personal reign on a regenerated earth, as the final and everlasting abode of His redeemed, I rest with confidence and delight."

Obs. 6. We append a few statements, out of many that could be adduced, in behalf of our position. Fairbairn (whose testimony is the more valuable, being an opponent to Chiliasm) justly refers (Typology, vol. 1, p. 314, 15) this inheriting to the renewed earth after the Sec. Advent, and observes that Christ could not have called a prosperous life in the present world as constituted "blessed," but would rather (as He did) warn against the deceitfulness of riches and the abundance of honors; because "to be blessed in the earth as an inheritance, must import that the earth has become to them a real and proper good, such as it shall be when it has been transformed into a fit abode for redeemed natures." He approvingly quotes (p. 316) Usteri (as given by Tholuck on Rom. 8 : 19) as saying that the "conception of a transference of the perfected Kingdom of God into the heavens, is, properly speaking, modern, seeing that according to Paul and the Apocalypse (and he might also have added Peter and Christ Himself), the seat of the Kingdom of God is the earth, inasmuch as that likewise partakes in the general renovation." Such, he informs us, was the view "adopted by the greatest number, and the most ancient, of the Expositors," such as Chrysostom, Theodoret, Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, Luther, etc. He quotes as indorsing this view Jerome (on Isa. 65), Justin Martyr (Semisch's Life and Times of Justin, Bib. Cab., vol. 42, p. 336), Calvin (Rom. 8 : 21), Haldane (Rom. 8 : 21), Fuller (The Gospel its Own Witness, ch. 5), Thiersh (His., vol. 1, p. 20), and Olshausen (on Matt. 8). How extended this list can be made is readily seen in the Props. on the history of our doctrine. Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 292) argues that the possession of Canaan by the Jewish nation was "an earnest of the whole inheritance, and, as the world then stood, an effectual step toward its realization. Abraham, as the heir of Canaan, was thus also 'the heir of the world,' considered as a heritage of blessing." The tendency to make the one simply typical of the other, or of heaven, vitiates the reasoning and conclusions of many writers, who forsake the covenants for mere human opinions. The Kingdom and the earth sustain an inseparable relationship, and the inheriting of the one is the inheriting of the other. Rothe (Dogmatic, P. 2, p. 58) clearly apprehends this, and says: "He, moreover, designates the blessedness of this Kingdom as an inheriting the earth, for to this Chiliasmatic Kingdom the passage, Matt. 5 : 5, must be referred."

Bengel (Gnomon) makes Matt. 5 : 5 parallel with Rev. 5 : 10 ; Meyer (Com. loci) also makes it to refer to the future Messianic Kingdom ; Nast (Com. loci) says : " The full import, however, of the promise seems to be the possession of the new earth, which God will create with the new heaven (Isa. 66 : 22), and which is the realization of the original destiny of Adam." Fausset (Com. Isa. 65 : 17) says : " As Caleb inherited the same land which his feet trod on (Deut. 1 : 36 ; Josh. 14 : 9), so Messiah and His saints shall inherit the renovated earth which once they trod while defiled by the enemy (Isa. 34 : 4, and 51 : 16, and 66 : 22 ; Ezek. 21 : 27 ; Ps. 2 : 8, and 37 : 11 ; 2 Pet. 3 : 13 ; Heb. 12 : 28-28 ; Rev. 21 : 1) ;" and in his comment on Ps. 25 : 13, and 37 : 9, etc., he makes the phrase " inherit the earth" to be an " alluding to the promise of Canaan, expressing all the blessings included in that promise, temporal as well as spiritual." Such testimonies could be multiplied, which declare with Luthardt (Lehre Von Der Letzten Dingen) that " the earth, not heaven, is the abode of the glorified Church" (comp. also p. 35, where he has " the glorified Church" reigning over " the unglorified humanity," etc.). Men of the greatest learning and biblical research find this doctrine clearly expressed, and joyfully and hopefully cling to it.

On the other hand, we give a few illustrations of the perversion of the passage. Brown (Com. Matt. 5 : 5) makes this a figure drawn from the possession of Canaan, and its secure possession, of " the evidence and manifestation of God's favor resting on them and the ideal of all true and abiding blessedness," but he does not tell us how the possession of a land " for a little while," from which the native was driven, etc., can appropriately be used as " the ideal of all true and abiding blessedness." The Ch. Union, Ap. 23, 1879, answers an inquirer respecting the meaning of inheriting the earth, thus : " The enjoyment of earthly blessings belong not to the grasping but to those who hold them lightly. ' Selfish men,' says John Woolman, ' may possess the earth, it is the meek alone who inherit it from the Father free from all defilements and perplexities of unrighteousness.'" So, then, there is an inheriting without having a possession. Dr. Rutter (Life of Christ, p. 176) renders it : " Blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the land," and interprets " land" as an equivalent to " heaven," for, he adds, if the meek are " ill-treated and driven from their possessions by the ambition and rapacity of others, heaven, upon that title, becomes their due, as their own land and inheritance." This needs no comment. In the same work, he (like Edwards's, see preceding Prop.) thus (pp. 423-5) disposes of the earth : he has the reprobate, at the Sec. Advent, left " on the earth to receive their eternal doom," and the execution of a judicial sentence is thus described : " Yes, the reprobate shall be consigned to everlasting burnings ; the abyss of hell shall open under their feet, and they shall be precipitated into it, surrounded by those raging flames which shall have consumed the whole material world," i. e. hell replaces the earth. We turn with relief from such outrageous perversions of Scripture promise to others, who inculcate the perpetuity and inheriting of the earth. To indicate how covenanted promises (Prop. 49) were clung to by the early Church, we refer e. g. to Justin Martyr (Dial. Trypho, ch. 139) who, instancing Palestine as the land specially covenanted to Abraham and his seed, says : " There shall be a future possession of all the saints in this same land. And hence all men everywhere, whether bond or free, who believe in Christ and recognize the truth in His own words and those of His prophets, know that they shall be with Him in that land, and inherit incorruptible and everlasting good." A multitude of writers like Tomlinson (Ser. on the Mill., and who in Ap. appeals to " Wesley, Doddridge, Macknight, Newton, Clarke, Chalmers, and a host of others," as holding similar views) could be quoted, advocating this earth, renovated at the Sec. Advent, as the future home of the redeemed. (Comp. authors quoted under Props. 146, 148, 151, etc.) Many accord with Eleazer Lord (The Messiah, p. 324) : " The course of things eventually to be realized on earth will be such as would have taken place from the beginning, had no apostasy occurred. The apostasy and the curse on man and the earth will be overcome. The antagonism between the Mediator and the adversary will cease. The earth, freed from the curse and from all enemies, renovated, restored to its original beauty, will be the perpetual scene of holiness and happiness." Such testimonies could readily be multiplied, indicative of a faith fixed on Bible promise. We attach one more, Dr. Moll's (Lange's Com. Heb. p. 41) : " The anticipated reintroduction of the Firstborn into the inhabited world, forms the goal of the ways of God in history, and promises a revelation of glory to which, in hope and faith, we are to look ; which, in the patience of the saints, we are humbly to await ; and for which, in the sanctification of our persons, as children of God born anew to be brethrers in Jesus Christ, and called to be fellow-heirs with Him, we are earnestly to prepare, that we may join the adoring worship of angels."

Obs. 7. This doctrine teaches us how to regard the various theories of inheritance, such as the third heaven idea, the central universe notion, the metaphysical heaven (of Good's, etc.), which gives no place of existence, the spiritualist's visible unfolding of the invisible, "the Sun our Heaven" (so Mortimore, Wittie, etc.), and the infidel's no future inheritance. By overlooking the plainest promises and oath-bound covenants, or by spiritualizing them, men manufacture inheritances of their own. No matter that the inheriting of the earth was a favorite Jewish doctrine based on the Messianic prophecies and the predicted supremacy; when Jesus uttered this promise it must be modernized and accommodated to the supposed advanced theological opinions of the age, moulded by the influence of some favorite philosophy. No matter that the Patriarchs are personally promised such an inheriting; that the Messiah is personally to receive the land as an inheritance; that the saints, as part of a perfected Redemption, are to realize it; that a thousand predictions direct attention to it, the leaven of the old Gnostic spirit against matter and the claimed higher spirituality, deliberately refuses the plain grammatical sense, and substitutes another sense at the will of the interpreter.

The objections usually made are met under Prop. 107, 122, 143, 146, etc. Thus e.g. Pressense (The Early Days of Chris., p. 249), taking 1 Pet. 1 : 4, isolated and overlooking its context, says: "The hope of the Church reaches far beyond the horizon of the Theocracy. It is fixed no longer on an earthly inheritance, like the land of Canaan; it is changed into the lively hope of "an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven, 1 Pet. 1 : 4." Now, the exact reverse of this is the scriptural truth, confirmed by oath. We are to look for a gloriously restored Theocracy under David's Son, its central location in Canaan and extending over the whole earth. But this restoration includes much that is heavenly, as the descending New Jerusalem, the descending Mighty Heir, the descending resurrecting power and glorification, the heavenly derived Kingship and priesthood, all of which is to be revealed (as the same apostle asserts in immediate connection) at the Second Coming of the Restorer. Our opponents seem to be willingly ignorant of the fact—often expressed by us—that the saints, in virtue of their relationship to the Divine-human Saviour and King, have a twofold inheritance, the earth redeemed and the Kingdom, with all its heavenly endowments and accompaniments, established on the earth. Pressense is not consistent with his own theory, for (p. 286) he makes Peter contradict Paul; we quote under Prop. 146. Indeed, such passages as Gal. 3 : 16-18 comp. with Heb. 9 : 9, 10, 13, Rom. 4 : 13, Deut. ch. 28, etc., are amply sufficient, when contrasted with the covenant (Prop. 49) to establish the matter of the inheritance; for Abraham's inheritance and Christ's inheritance is likewise the saints' inheritance. If we look for any other, we deceive ourselves and dishonor God's promises.

PROPOSITION 143. The early church doctrine of the Kingdom is supported by "the Rest," or keeping of the Sabbath, mentioned by Paul.

If it can be shown that the Sabbath was regarded as typical of the Kingdom of the Messiah as covenanted, and of the Millennial era, and then if it is found that Paul adopts the phraseology current on this point and uses it, without change of meaning, in a way to confirm the opinions existing, it forms an additional argument in favor of the primitive view of the Kingdom.

Obs. 1. Observe how the Jews believed on this subject. Bh. Newton has well stated (Dis. on Proph., p. 587) on the thousand years of Rev. 20, "that the Jewish Church before John, and the Christian Church after him, have believed and taught that these one thousand years will be the seventh Millenary of the world. A pompous heap of quotations might be produced to this purpose, both from Jewish and Christian writers." He then produces a few quotations from Rab. Ketina, from "the tradition of the house of Elias, who lived two hundred years or thereabouts before Christ," etc. Mede, Burnet, Lightfoot, Russell, Brookes, Taylor, Elliott, Bush, and many others, give various extracts establishing the general view thus entertained. As impartial authority, we may give what Dr. Whitby observes on Heb. 4 : 9, quoting R. Eliezer (c. 18, p. 41) as saying, "the blessed Lord created seven worlds (i.e. aiōnas, ages), but one of them is all Sabbath and rest in life eternal," and then adds : "he refers to their (the Jews') common opinion that the world should continue six thousand years, and then a perpetual Sabbath should begin, typified by God's resting on the seventh day and blessing it." Elliott notices that this same Rabbi makes (Midras Till., p. 4) "The days of Messiah are one thousand years." Whitby also quotes Bereschith Rabba : "If we expound the seventh day of the seventh thousand of years, which is the world to come, the exposition is, 'He blessed it,' because that in the seventh thousand all souls shall be bound in the bundle of life." "So our Rabbins, of blessed memory, have said in their commentaries on 'God blessed the seventh day,' that the Holy Ghost blessed the world to come, which beginneth in the seventh thousandth of years. Again, Philo is copious on the same subject, stating that the Sabbaths of the law were allegories or figurative expressions."

For the convenience of the reader several more are quoted to illustrate the manner of statement. Bh. Newton (Diss. on Proph.) : "Tradition assents to R. Ketina : As out of seven years every seventh is the year of remission, so out of the seven thousand years of the world the seventh Millenary shall be the Millenary of remission, that God alone may be exalted in that day." The tradition of Elias gives the following : "The world endures six thousand years, two thousand before the law, two thousand under the law, and two thousand under the Messiah," and Newton from Mede (giving the original) adds that then followed the seventh thousand or Millenary embracing in its commencement the resurrection of the just and a renewal of the earth. Brookes, Et. of Proph. Interp., ch.

3, quoting from the Targums, R. Eliezer, R. Gamaliel, Book of Wisdom and Tobit, refers to the tradition concerning the seventh Millenary that in it the world "was to be renewed, and all the promises of God made to the fathers accomplished." He asserts (appealing to Pezron's Antiq., ch. 4, 37) that so general was the opinion among the Jews that after the destruction of the temple, when the Christians urged that the Messiah had come, they deemed it a sufficient reply to point to the fact that the six thousand years had not yet expired. He gives several opinions, as stated in Rabbi Asche, that some thought the Messiah would come at the beginning of the fifth, some of the seventh, and some of the latter end of the sixth, but that the tradition of the house of Elias was the most prevalent. Mede (Works, B. 4) declares that the general opinion of the Jews was the tradition of Elias, gives a number of authorities, shows that in the seventh Millenary the earth was to be renewed, the resurrection of the just realized, etc. Compare the statements of Bush (The Mill., ch. 4), Bh. Russell (Dis. on Mill.), The Time of the End, by a Congregationalist (which quotes Gregory of Oxford, R. Menasse, and Aben Ezra, the latter of whom links the Sabbatism with Isa. 65 : 17), and the articles on the same in our Bib. Dicts. and Cyclops., etc. Delitzsch (Com. Heb.) gives the following from Sanhedrin 97a, "As the seventh year furnishes a festal time of a year's duration for a period of seven years, so the world enjoys, for a period of seven thousand years, a festal season of a thousand years," and justly argues that this Sabbath merges into the eternal Sabbath or blissful eternity. Similarly in a Rab. Treatise on Ps. 92 : 1 (Elijahu Rabba, c. 2, quoted Lange's Com. Heb., ch. 4, Doc. 7), it is said : "We mean the Sabbath which puts a stop to the sin reigning in the world, the seventh day of the world, upon which, as post-Sabbatic, follows the future world, in which forever and ever there is no more death, no more sin, and no more punishment for sin, but pure delight in the wisdom and knowledge of God." For Jewish idea of Sabbatism see also Bush, Com. Gen., vol. 1, p. 47, and for their present cleaving to it, see e.g. Levi's Cer. of the Jews, p. 206, and Mission of Inquiry to the Jews, p. 409. The fact is, as stated by Bh. Russell, Bush, and others, that traces of this opinion, a future coming Sabbatism, is to be found "in the writings of Pagans, Jews, and Christians," "in the Sibylline oracles, in the poems of Hesiod, in Plato," and is "expressed by the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, and by orators, poets philosophers." Dr. Mombert (Lange's Com. 1 Pet., p. 26) refers (giving authorities) to "The Jews saying, 'When God created the world, He held forth His hand under the throne of Glory, and created the soul of the Messiah and His company, and said to Him, Wilt Thou heal and redeem my sons, after six thousand years? He answered, Yes. God said to Him, If so, wilt Thou bear chastisements to expiate their iniquity, according to what is written (Isa. 53 : 4) Surely, He bore our griefs?' He answered, I will endure them with joy."

Obs. 2. Writers inform us that this Jewish opinion of the seventh Millenary, however we may account for it, was continued in the Christian, Jewish, and Gentile churches established by the apostles and their successors, and that it was entertained both by Millenarians and their opponents. This is abundantly confirmed by a little research. Papias (Frag. Ante-Nic. Lib., vol. 1, p. 447, inferred from Euseb. His., B. 3, s. 39) makes the days of creation typical. Barnabas (Epis., c. 15), commenting on the words : "And God made in six days the works of His hands and He finished them on the seventh day and He rested in it and sanctified it," says : "Consider, children, what that signifies, He finished them in six days. This it signifies, that the Lord God will finish all things in six thousand years. For a day with Him is a thousand years ; as He Himself testified, saying : "Behold this day shall be as a thousand years." Therefore, children, in six days, that is in six thousand years, shall all things be consummated. And He rested the seventh day ; this signifies that when His Son shall come, and shall abolish the season of the Wicked One, and shall judge the ungodly and shall change the sun, and the moon, and the stars, then He shall rest gloriously in that seventh day." Such also is the opinion of Irenæus (Adv. Hær., 5), Justin Martyr (Ques. and Ans., 71, Dial. with Try.), Polycarp (see testimony of Irenæus concerning him as given by

Brooks, El. Proph. Inter., p. 38, etc.), Tertullian (Ag. Marcion, B. 3, c. 24, etc.), Lactantius (Div. Insti., c. 14, 24, 26), Cyprian (See Exh. Mart., 11), Ambrose (In Luc., 8 : 23), and others.<sup>1</sup> So deeply rooted was this notion of the Millenaries that even Origen, Jerome, and Augustine indorse it. The student knows that Bh. Taylor (Lib. of Prophecy, s. 5) ranks Origen among the Millenarians, and critics suppose that it arose from Origen's expectation of the renovation of all things at the end of six thousand years. Jerome's statements are to be found in his letter (139) to Cyprian, Comment on Ps. 90 : 4, and Micah 4. As Augustine aided largely in overthrowing and darkening the early Church view of the Kingdom, we may, in this respect, more particularly specify his opinion. In De Gen. contra Manich., he proposes that the six days give a prophetic sketch of the epochs in the history of man, making the sixth the Christian dispensation, etc. In City of God, B. 20, c. 7, he says that he would not object to a literal resurrection to be succeeded by a Sabbath rest during one thousand years, provided it were spiritual : "a kind of seventh day Sabbath in the succeeding thousand years ; and it is for this purpose the saints rise, viz., to celebrate this Sabbath. And this opinion would not be objectionable, if it were believed that the joys of the saints in that Sabbath shall be spiritual and consequent on the presence of God ; for I myself too, once held this opinion." That his opinion concerning the Millenaries underwent no change, is seen by reference to the City of God, last chapter, where he makes the days ages, counting his own age in which he lived the sixth, calling the seventh age the Sabbath in which we shall have rest, and this last day or age he has closed by the ushering in of an eighth and eternal day or age. It has been noticed by various writers that many of the later Anti-pre-millenarians explained the seventh day to be typical of an eternal Sabbath. So generally was this theory of the Millenaries held that, adopting the chronology of the Septuagint, at different periods, when it was supposed that the six thousand years were ending, an almost universal belief in the ending of the world was entertained. The duration of the world for six thousand years, to be followed by a Sabbath of rest, was so rooted into the Church that the Reformers frequently expressed their faith in a speedy end, even after the Hebrew chronology was adopted in place of the Septuagint. Elliott (Horæ Apoc.), Taylor (Voice of the Church), and others (as Seiss, Brooks, Shimeall, Lord, etc.) have given numerous extracts from Luther, Melancthon, etc., indicating this remarkable feature, viz., their belief in a near closing of the dispensation, etc.<sup>2</sup> It would be easy to introduce a long list of eminent names in the Church who have continued to hold to this ancient belief, not only Millenarians, but many of their opponents ; and, account for it as we may, such an opinion, if not susceptible of definite scriptural proof, deserves, in view of its reception and retention, the respectful attention of the Biblical student.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This, according to Gregory of Oxford, is the former Jewish argument, which he gives as follows : " Because God was six days about the creation, and a thousand years with Him are but as one day (Ps. 90 : 4), therefore, after six days, that is, after six thousand years duration of the world, there shall be a seventh day or millenary Sabbath of rest," quoted by " A Congregationalist" in Time of the End, who adds to this Menasse, an ancient Jewish Rabbi, Aben Ezra, D. Kimchi, Eph. Cyrus, etc. Comp. Taylor's Voice of the Church, for same.

<sup>2</sup> Commodianus (The Instructions, S. 80) says that the res. of the saints takes place " when six thousand years are completed." Clement (First Epis., ch. 35) employs the phrase " ages," calling the Creator the " Father of the Ages," having, evidently, the prevailing opinion in view. The martyr, Victorinus (On the Creation of the World), remarks, "that the true Sabbath will be in the seventh Millenary of years, when Christ with His elect shall reign." Lactantius (Div. Insti., B. 7, ch. 14) gives the ideas entertained: "The six thousandth year is not yet completed, and that when this number is completed, the consummation must take place, and the condition of human affairs be remodelled for the better." He appeals to the work of Creation, the six days as typical of the duration of the earth until the Sabbath or Mill. age is introduced; the six days indicating "six ages, that is, six thousand years," quoting Ps. 90 : 4, and the seventh day representing the seventh age or thousand years in which "all wickedness must be abolished from the earth and righteousness reign." Bardesan (Book of the Laws, see Ante-Nicene Lib.) speaks of "the establishment of a new world," after an expiration of six thousand years, thus showing how widespread was the opinion that the earth in its present form would only endure the six thousand years.

Melanchthon's views are so to the point, embracing the early Church belief, that a transcription may be in place. Elliott (Horæ Apoc.) gives the following: "'The words of the prophet Elias should be marked by every one, and inscribed upon our walls and on the entrances of our houses. Six thousand years shall this world stand and after that be destroyed; two thousand years without the law; two thousand years under the law of Moses; two thousand years under the Messiah; and if any of these years are not fulfilled, they will be shortened (a shortening intimated by Christ also) on account of our sins.' Dr. Cox, after quoting the above from Melanchthon's Com., gives the following manuscript addition, that he had found, in Melanchthon's hand, in Luther's own copy of the German Bible: 'Written A.D. 1557 and from the Creation of the world 5519; from which number we may be sure that this aged world is not far from its end.'" It occurs to the author that he somewhere read (cannot now recall the authority) that this Bible referred to is found in the British Museum. Vide Bh. Latimer's Third Ser. on Lord's Prayer, where he asserts that "all learned men"—"excellent and learned men"—affirm that the world was to endure six thousand years, etc. Dr. Seiss in A Question in Eschatology, p. 4, quotes from Walch's Luther's Schriften 14, 1117, Luther's prefacing his chronology of the world with this tradition of Elias, and also refers to Melanchthon. Lord in Apoc., p. 238, etc., extensively quotes Luther and Melanchthon. Comp. Proph. Times, Ap., 1870, etc.

Bh. Russell (Anti-Millenarian) in his Dis. on Mill., testifies to the extended prevalence of the tradition "in the writings of Pagans, Jews, and Christians," holding to "a blessed Millennium, the Sabbath of this terrestrial globe," etc. In Jeffries's Chart of the Churches is found the opinion of the Corinthian (A.D. 81) Church. In Twenty Reasons, p. 26, Bh. Burnet is quoted as saying, "Nothing yet appears either in nature, science, or human affairs, repugnant to this belief of the 6000 years" and the resultant Sabbatism. The following persons are mentioned as teaching it: "Augustine, Cyprian, Justin Martyr, Clement, Origen, Jerome, and others among the early Fathers; Luther, Melanchthon, R. Abraham, Aben Ezra, R. Ben Israel, Mede, Newton, Bengel, Chas. Wesley, Cowper, Adam Clarke, Fleming, and many others, in later times." And Bh. Latimer (p. 24) is thus quoted: "The world was ordained to endure 6000 years. There will be great alterations then. Then shall they see the Son of man coming with power and great glory." The influence that this doctrine had in estimating the nearness of Antichrist, the Sec. Advent, and Sabbatism is noticed, Prop. 160, Obs. 3, note 2, as e.g. the Primitive Church, owing to its adopting the Sep. Chronology (which largely increased the time past), supposed the end of the 6000 years was nigh, as observed by numerous writers (e.g. Prof. Bush, The Millennium, p. 23, Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, vol. 1, p. 533). The fact is, the student will find it imbedded in nearly all the early and modern estimates respecting the nearness of the Mill. age. It is a singular fact, as the reader must already have noticed in the names of advocates adduced, that not merely Pre-Millenarians, but those who are Post-Millenarians—who spiritualize the res. and Mill., etc.—also adopt this view in reference to their spiritual Millennium, or as Anti-Millenarians in relation to the ending of this dispensation. Thus e.g. Bogue (Dis. on Mill., p. 608), Johnston (On the Rev., vol. 2, p. 319) speak of the "glorious Sabbath day of rest and peace and joy," "the great Sabbath of the whole earth," which is to follow the 6000 years. So Tomlinson (Ser. on Mill.) recognizes the Mill. to be "a grand Sabbatical era of a thousand years' continuance," which follows "the completion of the first 6000 years of the human family." S. T. Browne (Christian Morals, P. 2, S. 5) remarks: "The world which took but six days to make, is like to take 6000 to make out" (comp. P. 3, S. 29, and S. 26). Josiah Priest in his View of the expected Mill., advocates a spiritual Mill. in the 7th Chiliad. In Dr. Rutter's Life of Christ, p. 414 (Rom. Cath.), speaking of the rise of Antichrist and the Sec. Advent, he says: "Various have been the sentiments both of the ancients and moderns concerning this final period, but the most prevailing opinion fixes it about the end of the 6000 years," but regards it as uncertain. Even Buck (Theol. Dic., art. Mill.), after his erroneous representation of our doctrine, presents his own spiritual Millennial theory, and faintly indorses the view as follows: "The time when the Millennium will commence cannot be fully ascertained; but the common idea is that it will be in the seven thousandth year of the world." As a curiosity and indicative of prevailing opinions, we give Browne's note to Roger Bacon's Cure of Old Age, Ch. 1: "This year, 1682, with the Astrologers, is celebrated the Climacterick grand Conjunction of the highest Planets. And Divines after St. Peter's Chronology do reckon that the Sabbatical Millennium is not far off; nor without great reason. For if Moral Symptoms, such as Nations rising against Nations, Divisions in Families and between Friends, do portend the last days, we must conclude the world in its testy Old Age, and that that day, the Angels in Heaven, no nor the Son of man Himself, knew not of, is coming on." So deeply is this idea incorporated in past eschatology, that even such a commentator as Scott cannot entirely rid himself of its influence. For (Com. Rev. 20:4-6) he remarks: "Whether the general opinion, that this thousand years will be the seventh thousand from the creation, or the Sabbatical Millennium, the event must determine; it is evident, however, that the dawn of this glorious day cannot be very distant." The Jewish and early Church view thus given by Neander (Genl. Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 396) has never been eradicated: "As the world had been created in six days, and, according to Ps. 90:4, a thousand years in the sight of the Lord is as one day, so the world was to continue in its existing condition for six thousand years, and the end with a thousand years of blessed rest, corresponding to the Sabbath." Even Clement of Alexandria (so quoted by Dr. Burnet in his Theory of the Earth, and by others) observes "that the seventh day has been accounted sacred by the Hebrews and Greeks, because of the revolution of the world, and the renovation of all things," and this, Burnet alleges, "can be in no other sense than that the seventh day represents the seventh Millennium (or thousand years) in which the Kingdom and renovation are to be."

Obs. 3. A few remarks may suggest reasons for there being so widespread and deeply imbedded a feeling that the seventh Millennium will introduce something extraordinary in the Divine Purpose. Students of deep reflection have considered that about the two thousandth year the call of, and promise to, Abraham was given, that about two thousand years after was the Coming of the promised seed to make a sacrifice, and that, judging from analogy, we may reasonably expect something remarkable to occur at the expiration of two thousand years more. Besides this, eminent writers, as Kurtz (His. of Old Cov.), Prof. Stuart (Com. Rev.), and others lay stress on the symbolical character of the numbers ten, seven, three, etc. Among their statements we find it frequently asserted that "seven is the seal of the covenant with Jehovah," of "rest" and "completeness," and is applied to the Abrahamic. But such writers overlook the important and significant fact that if it is such, then it embraces the Davidic Covenant also, which is an outgrowth or enlargement of the Abrahamic. If so (for we are only taking their deductions for granted), then it legitimately follows, provided the symbolical import is adopted, that we are directed to the seventh chiliad as the period when the covenant shall in every particular be realized. Any other explanation makes their use inexplicable. Again, the typical nature of certain seasons has caused many to regard this theory with favor. Thus e.g. the feast of trumpets, which came in with the new moon of the seventh month. The moon is regarded (Dr. Etheridge's Targum, 2 vol. pref.) as an emblem of the Church, and the new moon of the seventh month is selected to indicate that at the seventh period of time the Church in its renewed state shall be the cause of rejoicing, etc. Whatever may be thought of this and similar typical comments, it is certain that the Sabbatical year, introduced once in seven years, has been esteemed by Jewish and Christian writers as a type of the repose, etc., to be enjoyed in the seventh age or the Great Sabbath. The Year of Jubilee, or Great Year of Redemption, after the lapse of seven Sabbatical years, when there was a general release and restitution, has been regarded as a more striking type of the same future Sabbath, when man shall be fully restored, re-instated to all forfeited blessings. With Isa. 63 : 4 ; Isa. 27 : 13 ; Matt. 24 : 31, etc., apparently alluding to the same, thoughtful readers of the Word have been slow to discard the ancient belief in these things.

These types have been regarded so striking that they are used in the titles of books, as e.g. The World's Jubilee by Anna Silliman, The Jubilee of Jubilees or Multum in Parvo, Anon., etc. Lange (Com. Heb. 4 : 9) renders "there remaineth therefore a Sabbath rest" (or in note : "a Sabbath Festival celebration"), and says (Doc. 6) : "The Sabbath rest which commences only at the Sec. Coming of Christ and the accompanying renovation of the world, and which is realized only when the whole people of God have entered into eternal rest." Kurtz (Sac. His., p. 128) remarks : "The year of Jubilee was a type of the great year of that widely extended Redemption (restitutio in integrum) in which all bondage shall cease, all debts be cancelled, all that was lost be recovered, and a new age of the world begin." Comp. "Sabbath and Jubilee-Year" by Dr. Oehler in Herzog's Cyclop., which distinctively states that these were typical of "a redemptive restitution and a return of the Theocracy to its primeval Divine ordering." It is admitted by all that the "Year of Jubilee" is typical of the future ; some making it a type of the present dispensation (which does not meet its requirements) ; others of the resurrection (which only partly meets its demands) ; and others more correctly of the Mill. age (which amply fulfils it). Let the critical reader consider that the "Sabbatical Year" was the "Year of Rest," owing, not only to release from bondage, indebtedness, the recovery of alienated possessions, and general restitution, but to a spontaneous yield of fruit, to a public manifestation that God will provide. It also impressed the Theocratic idea that all, the land and people, belonged to the Lord, and that all from the highest to the lowest, the rich and the poor alike, were the objects of God's care, so that selfishness and oppression could not prevail, but justice, mercy, and love were to be extended. We have no historical evidence of the observance (as legally enacted) of the Sabbatic Year (the institution of which, Milman, His. Jews, vol. 1, p. 206, etc., shows, is proof that the laws of Moses must be earlier than Ewald and others hold, since a retrospective legislation, which facts do not corroborate as existing, would be mere assumption). Why is this ? Let it be evidence of the sinfulness and perverseness of the nation, or, as Milman aptly says, of "the unfitness of the nation for their wonderful destination," still the question occurs, why did God so minutely enact in this direction, foreseeing its practical neglect ? The answer alone is found in the Theocratic idea which it enforces, and which will be realized when the Theocracy is restored under a people and power capable of sustaining it. Gibbon (Decl. and Fall, vol. 6, p. 458, footnote) cannot forego his usual sneer when he says : "The Sabbatic Years and Jubilees of the Mosaic law, the suspension of all care and labor, the periodical release of lands, debts, servitude, etc., may seem a noble idea, but the execution would be impracticable in a profane republic ; and I should be glad to learn that this ruinous festival was observed by the Jewish people." The reason why it was not observed as given, is presented by the prophets ; and they also show that it requires a pure Theocracy (not a "profane republic"), as shall be restored under the Messiah, to institute such a Jubilee. The restored Theocracy alone can fulfil it, as the promises plainly declare, and hence we can wait in hope for the time when the deliverance, typified by a grand restitution in present human relations, shall be realized ; for God does not institute a type (whether the same is practically carried out or not by those who receive it) to utterly fail ; the antitype will come in good time. To the critical reader, it may be observed : it is very significant that Fairbairn in his work Typology, a book valuable and suggestive, carefully omits all mention of the typical application of the Sabbath, the Sabbatical Year, and the Year of Jubilee as presented by many able writers. This omission is the more remarkable, when on other points he can make abundant references to ancient and modern writers, and his work being specially designed to discuss typical application. As a mere matter of information, some notice of this view, so prominently held in the Church, seems to be required, but he appears to have been either afraid of its antiquity and force, or at a loss how to incorporate it into his own system. Lange (comp. e.g. Rev. pp. 56, 344, 406, etc.) makes the Mill. age (like Sander and others) a kind of fore-

Sabbath, while the perfect antitype follows it. But this view is based on a misconception of the duration of the Messianic Kingdom introduced at the Sec. Advent (see this discussed under Prop. 159), and of the identity of Isa. 65 : 17 and Rev. 21 : 1 (see this examined under Prop. 151). Starke (Synopsis, N. Test., B. 10, p. 179) assigns as one of the reasons why he holds the one thousand years of Rev. 20 to be literal, their relation to this very Sabbatism. Others express similar views. We conclude by giving an illustration of interpretation based on the sacred number "seven." Thus e.g. Dr. Frommüller (Lange's Com. Jude, pp. 23 and 24) on the phrase "the seventh from Adam," remarks: "The epithet 'the seventh' cannot be without meaning; Calvin thinks that it is intended to denote the great age of the prophecy; others see in it a secret, mystical meaning. Bengel: 'Every seventh is the most esteemed.' Steir: 'The seventh from Adam is personally a type of the sanctified of the seventh age of the world (of the seventh Millennium, of the great earth-Sabbath); therefore, he prophesies for this time.' Menken: 'The number seven was esteemed in the ancient world as an important signature pointing to the sacred and mystery. The fact that after sin and death had freely exerted their unhappy power during the first six generations, in the seventh generation mankind appeared in the person of one man (who had led a godly life, and was taken by God to God without seeing death) in a state of high completeness and blessed freedom from death, has a kind of prophetic-symbolical significance, and intimates that mankind in general, after having duly completed its course and fought its battle under the oppression of sin and death through six long world-periods, shall appear in the seventh world-period in a state of higher completeness, in a more Divine life and more blessed freedom from death. The seventh world-period is the Kingdom of God on earth. To Adam, the first, was revealed and promised the appearance and advent of the Lord, as a Helper and Saviour; to Enoch, the seventh from Adam, was revealed the last Advent of the same Lord, Helper and Saviour, as a Judge and Avenger, and he was the first prophet, who spoke and taught this among men.'" (With this, the student will contrast our remarks under Prop. 130.) Dr. Mombert adds to the above the following: "'The number seven is sacred above all; Enoch is seventh from Adam and walks with God; Moses is seventh from Abraham; Phineas is seventh from Jacob our Father, as Enoch was seventh from Adam. And they correspond to the seventh day, which is the Sabbath, the day of rest. Every seventh age is in the highest esteem.' Wetstein, citing Rabbinical writings, p. 737. Wordsworth deems it worthy of remark, that Enoch lived as many years as there are days in a solar year, viz., 365, and was then translated, Gen. 5 : 24." (To the advanced student, the following query—suggested by the last clause—is proposed: Query: Does this singular fact possess a prophetic-symbolic meaning, pointing us to the probable length of life of mortal man in this year of Jubilee before experiencing a translation?)

Obs. 4. Now, to return to the use made by Paul of this opinion entertained by the Jews. Brought up under Gamaliel, he must have known how the Jews regarded the Sabbath as typical of the reign of the Messiah, etc. Hence, the references made by him to this opinion, and their future application to Jesus Christ is a virtual indorsement of the same. We have, first, his declaration, Col. 2 : 16, 17, that "the Sabbaths are a shadow of things to come," viz., typical of things future as related to Christ. Second: the "Rest" which the Jews attributed to the Messianic reign, he applies, 2 Thess. 1 : 7, to the period of the future revelation of Jesus from heaven. The very phrase current to designate the Millennial glory (comp. Isa. 11 : 10), Paul refers to the Second Advent. Third: The manner in which he employs the word "Rest" in Hebrews, being addressed to Jews, could not but confirm them in their belief of the future reign of the Messiah during the seventh Millenary. (1) In chap. 3 : 11, 18 he calls the promised land, the land of Canaan, the covenanted land—the "Rest." He locates, as our argument based on the covenant necessitates, the Rest here on the earth. (2) Then, without any change of meaning, he speaks of the same Rest, ch. 4 : 1, 3, etc., as promised also to us. (3) If we take the rendering of verse 3, ch. 4, given by Bloomfield (after Kuin, Wets. and Schoettg.), Stuart, etc., then there is an evident admitted "Jewish cast of reasoning," making the Sabbath typical. (4) This is done, verse 4, where "the seventh day" is specially mentioned as a type. (5) This same "Rest" is spoken of as future, v. 9. (6) An important and significant change is observable in verses 9 and 10, for this "Rest" still in the future is called in the original "Sabbatism" (or marg. read. "Keeping of a Sabbath"), thus indorsing the Jewish septenary or Millenaries. Even Whitby, Com. loci, admits that the change from "Rest" to "Sabbatism" leads us "to the spiritual Sabbath of which the Jewish doctors speak so generally as the great thing signified by their Sabbath." Commentators generally confess that allusion is made to the then existing view held by the Jews.<sup>1</sup> What abundantly confirms this is the manner in which John introduces the one thousand years in Rev. 20. The Jewish notion of the septenary is pointedly reproduced by the Spirit, and referred to the future, being also connected with a resurrection. Now, it is impossible to conceive, if the Jewish idea of the Millenaries is an erroneous one, of a more effectual way of re-establishing and confirming the Jewish conceptions than is done in the Apocalyptic portrayal of the Millennium. This is fully evinced by the profound impression in this direction made upon the early churches. All this, however, only teaches us that, as the Jewish conception of the Kingdom was invariably identified with the future Sabbatism, the language of the apostles indorsing such a Sabbatism, is also virtually the reception of their doctrine of the Kingdom. Otherwise, the matter would have been explained, and a new meaning attached to it. But, seeing that the Covenant promises were linked with the seventh Millenary by the Jews, that they believed that David's Son would inaugurate in His Kingdom the Great Sabbath, we may well contend that, as the apostles employ the same phraseology without the least hint of a change in meaning, that they also held to the fulfilment of the covenanted Kingdom at that period, or, to say the least, taught that such a Sabbath should, in the future, be witnessed here on earth, following regularly preceding ages.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> But very few have the candor to draw the proper inference, viz., the indorsement of the same. See Bloomfield, etc., and then compare Alford, Jones, etc. Some writers, as Brown, endeavor to dispute the septenary meaning by making out that the word simply means rest, over against Schleuaner, Shoettg, etc., and against the express mention of "the seventh day" and the Jewish ideas concerning it. If Paul only meant "Rest," and not the Land of Canaan, he was unfortunate in selecting the word, seeing how it resulted in confirming Jewish views. Besides, such a meaning would not help the matter any, since in the Jewish mind "The Rest" was associated with the seventh Chiliad, etc. Notice Barnes's comments on v. 9, making out that this "Rest" is the third heaven, which is a perversion of the entire reasoning of the apostle. It is somewhat singular to observe, that some of those (as Whitby just quoted) who are desirous to retain in some measure the idea of a Sabbatism, can speak of the Jewish notion as "a spiritual Sabbath," which they, however, discard as "caral" etc., when directly opposing us! Prof. Stuart (Com. Heb. 4 : 3) takes the unwarranted liberty of saying that this "rest" cannot mean the rest in Canaan, for v. 3 says, "Believers now enter into rest." Now, the text does not say so, for the word now is not used; it only gives a promise. "For we which have believed do enter into rest," i.e. in the future (comp. e.g. 2 Thess. 1 : 7), the certainly being specified and not the time (otherwise the absurdity must be reached that while the apostle was writing, believers were in the enjoyment of their rest). Moll (Lange's Com. Heb.) correctly calls this "a Sabbath Rest," "a Sabbath Festal Celebration," "that Sabbatic Rest which commences only at the Sec. Coming of Christ, and the accompanying renovation of the world, and which is realized only when the whole people of God have entered into eternal rest in and with God, and in which all the ransomed are at home forevermore" (see next note). He also quotes Von Gerlach as saying: "And thus the entrance into the rest of God still awaits the people of the Lord ; the celebration of the eternal Sabbath, after the second creation, of which that of the earthly Sabbath is but the type."

<sup>2</sup> Various writers have noticed the indorsement of the Sabbatical idea by the mention of the one thousand years in the Apoc. We append an illustration: Rev. Birks (Lectures during Lent, p. 185) remarks: "'They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years.' Why is this precise period thus marked off, as it were, from the immeasurable ages of eternity? The words of St. Peter suggest an answer: 'A thousand years with the Lord are as one day.' And what mysterious day can be here designed? The key is given us in the very opening of the Word of God. There, in the birth-week of creation, the outlines of God's providence in redemption are set before us. In six days these lower heavens and earth were made, and on the seventh God rested from His works. So, for near six thousand years, the mystery of redemption is carried on, till at length, at the sounding of the seventh angel, the mystery of God shall be finished, and the Millennial Sabbath shall complete and hallow the new creation of God.'" We have under various Propositions quoted the Jewish belief in reference to this thousand years. We append Dr. Moll's (Lange's Com. Heb. p. 89), quoting the Sanhedrin 97a, as follows: "'As the seventh year furnishes a festal time of a year's duration for a period of seven years, so the world enjoys, for a period of seven thousand years, a festal season of a thousand years;" so also a Rabb. treatise on Ps. 92 : 1 (Elijah Rabba, c. 2) says: "'We mean the Sabbath which puts a stop to the sin reigning in the world—the seventh day of the world, upon which, as post-Sabbatic, follows the future world, in which forever and ever there is no more death, no more sin, and no more punishment for sin ; but pure delight in the wisdom and knowledge of God.'" It is disagreeable to point out the defects of writers, but for the sake of truth, the unpleasant duty must be performed. This right is justified by the public statements made in attack upon our system of belief. Thus e.g. Prof. Sanborn in his Essay on Millenarianism (comp. a severe Review of same in the Theol. and Lit. Journal, Jan., 1856), positively asserts: "'The Church in all ages has believed that the rest that remaineth for God's people was in heaven.'" This is refuted (1) by the Jewish belief ; (2) by the primitive belief ; (3) by the belief of many even of our opponents, who make this renewed earth the rest ; (4) by the long line of believers in an intermediate state, who looked only for the promised rest at the Sec. Advent. Prof. Sanborn's view is now indeed popular and prevailing, but it can be distinctively traced in its rise through the Alexandrian school, and its nourishment by mystics, etc. This would make an interesting field for investigation, giving the proof in detail.

Obs. 5. Another feature, which has materially served to perpetuate and enforce this Sabbatical view, is the following : Whatever application prophetic writers or commentators have made of the prophetic dates of Daniel and Revelation, which precede the ushering in of the Mill. era, they have been almost universally made to end within the 6000 years. This prophetic Chronology thus harmonizing with the idea of a Sabbatism following the closing of 6000 years, has necessarily resulted in keeping the Sabbatical idea prominently before the Church. For so limited are the prophetic dates, and within the seven thousandth year, that they serve materially to impress the tradition of Elias.

From an immense array of such applications of prophetic dates, a few illustrations are in place. Thus, take Melancthon (Op. tom. 2, p. 525), who lays special stress on these 6000 years, repeating the saying of Elias, and then proceeds to show that 458 years (unless shortened) must intervene before their close, the Advent of Jesus, the destruction of Antichrist, and the triumph of the saints: "'It is known that Christ was born about the end of the fourth Millenary, and one thousand five hundred and forty-two years have since revolved. We are not, therefore, far from the end. Daniel asked in respect to the time of the end, and a number was given which, although it seems to respect the time of the Maccabees, yet undoubtedly has a reference to the end of the world, and the application is easy, if days be taken for years. They will be two thousand six hundred and twenty-five. We do not endeavor to ascertain the moment when the last day is to dawn. That is not to be sought. But, inasmuch as this number happily agrees with the words of Elias, I regard it as denoting the years through which the world was to subsist from the time of Daniel. There were six hundred, or near that, from Daniel to the birth of Christ. There remained, therefore, two thousand years as the last age of the world.'" 1

Luther (Op. tom. 4, f. 730) took precisely a similar view of the seven thousand years, and thought that the sixth thousand commenced with the eleventh century. This was simply following what the more ancient Fathers had asserted, as e.g. Cyprian (De Echort.), who said that "Now six thousand years are nearly completed," basing it on the world's seven days of creation and rest typifying seven Millenniums. So also Bh. Latimer (Sermon on Lord's Prayer, No. 3), after speaking of the age of the world, following Melancthon, Osiander and others, he says: "The world was ordained to endure, as all learned men affirm, . . . six thousand years. Now, of that number there be past five thousand five hundred and fifty-two years, so that there is no more left but four hundred and forty-eight years. Furthermore, those days shall be shortened for the elect's sake. Therefore, all those excellent and learned men, whom, without doubt, God hath sent into the world in these latter days to give the world warning, do gather out of Scripture that the last day cannot be far off." Dr. Clarke (Ser. on Dan. 2 : 41-45) refers to the ancient traditions, indorses the six thousand years and the ushering in of a Sabbatism, and (Com. Dan. 2) supposed that about one hundred and seventy-one years would yet intervene before the Sabbatical year arrived. Thus we might quote Bengel, Sir I. Newton, Chytræus, Pareus, Dr. Scott, Wesley, and many others, thus establishing the correctness of our statements. A number of writers (Barbour and preceding ones) deduce an interesting calculation based on the fulfilment of the Jubilee Sabbath by referring us to the 70 years' desolation, making them 70 years of Sabbaths (i.e. Jubilees), basing it on the fact "that the land might enjoy her Sabbaths" which the Jews did not properly keep. By a chronological calculation of such Jubilees, it is likewise inferred that we are near the close of the 6000 years. Even Hos. 6 : 2 is supposed by many to have a latent reference to this Sabbatism. It is well known that the Jews applied this period to the res., as e.g. the Chaldee paraphrase has it: "He will revive us in the days of Consolation which are to come; in the day of the res. of the dead He shall raise us up, and we shall live before Him." Bh. Horsley and many others believe that the two days and the third day denote three distinctive periods of the Jewish nation, and that the third day is related to their restoration at the Sec. Advent. The Jews (as e.g. R. Solomon, R. D. Kimchi, and others) thought that these days related to the period of their captivity, and that in the third day they would be restored under the Messiah. Many thoughtful men have deemed these expressions declarative of some definite time relating to Jewish restoration. The key evidently is in this Sabbatism, i.e. in the 6000 years following by a Sabbatism, keeping in view the scriptural statement of one day being as a thousand years. Taking the time when Hosea wrote, and allowing a thousand years for each day, brings us far into the third day, the time spoken of as the one of glorious deliverance, connected with a resurrection, etc. How the Sabbatic idea seems to be expressed by "The Great Pyramid," we must leave the writers on the subject present, as e.g. Dr. Sciss in his "Miracle of Stone," p. 88, etc.

Obs. 6. There is something remarkable in the contrasts presented by this Sabbatism. Man, when created, immediately entered upon the Sabbath, so when re-created (the resurrection being such) he again enters upon one, for the Sabbath is a following after a creation, and it is but reasonable to suppose that the Mill. age, preceded as it is by an astounding exertion of creative energy and power, should be a glorious Sabbatism. God, instituting the Sabbath, assigning the reason of resting or ceasing from creation, refers us (as Lewis, Six Days of Creation) to "a greater Calendar" in which a special Day of the Lord is thus expressed, and as sons of His (made such in realization, as David's Son was, by the power of the resurrection), we enter into the same kind of a rest after a baptism of creative power is experienced, thus in actual experience constantly representing in a lesser state or condition that occupied by God Himself. For being incorruptible, immortal, fashioned after Christ, etc., there is no more creative power to be exerted to bring us to the destiny intended. Creation ceases: a Sabbath follows—a Sabbath, however, in which works of Providence ("He hath worked hitherto and yet worketh"), works of mercy, love, etc., are still continued. With the Sabbath begins man's inheritance; with it begins his divine calling to bless God; with it begins the dominion over the earth : it is fitting that another Sabbath should re-introduce the inheritance which he lost, the divine calling which he prostituted, and the dominion which he forfeited. Hence as Adam in company with Eve went forth into the Sabbath to participate in the rest and enjoyment of God, so the Second Adam accompanied by His "Helpmeet" go forth upon their inheritance, calling, and dominion, in the glory of a Sabbath, which the Spirit of God, which knoweth all things, eulogizes in the most exalted terms.

Unbelievers in the scriptural account of creation have ridiculed the weekly division of creation, making sport of the six days followed by the seventh as a Sabbath. But to a believer, it is found, by a careful comparison of the Word of God, that a profounder meaning is designed—reaching even to the coming dispensation and into the eternal ages—than man unaided by Revelation is able to fathom. Lactantius, who wrote (Clarke's Writings of Lact., p. 460, etc.) largely on the subject, met persons (who abound at the present day) who rejected the Biblical account of creation, for, after referring to Plato, Cicero, and "many others of the philosophers," he says: "Therefore let the philosophers, who enumerate thousands of ages from the beginning of the world, know that the six thousandth year is not yet completed, and that when this number is completed the consummation must take place, and the condition of human affairs be remodelled for the better," etc. Authentic, reliable human history, notwithstanding the sneers of such philosophers of the present day, does not extend back as far as the chronology given by the Bible, and we may well rest content with Lactantius's statement. This reminds us that indirectly our position is sustained by the fact that this dispensation is called "the last time," "the last days," which implies that a larger portion of time preceding this must have transpired so that this period can appropriately be thus designated; this being a final period, after others, preparatory to the ushering in of the Mill. day.

This subject throws additional light on two early Church observances: (1) The early Christians regarded Sunday as a day of rejoicing, so that fasting on that day was esteemed disreputable and dishonoring (comp. Bh. of Lincoln's Illustrations, p. 338, Lord King's Inquiry, pp. 17, 113). The usual explanation is that given by one of the Fathers, viz., that it commemorated the resurrection. This is true, but to observe the full force, the relation that the res. sustained to the ushering in of the Sabbath and Kingdom must be noticed. (2) That even those who "contended that the ritual and ceremonial law of Moses had ceased," also observed the seventh day as a festival as well as the first day, i. e. both Saturday and Sunday. The explanation generally given is, as Bish. Lincoln: "perhaps to be ascribed to a desire of conciliating the Jewish converts." The deeper reason lies in the Millenarian sentiments entertained, which made both the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Sunday precious as typical of that which was to come. Comp. Bingham's Antiquities, B. 20, ch. 3. According to Bingham, both days were at first kept, and then he notices the change that was introduced, so that the Sabbath, originally also kept as a festival by the Western Church, was kept as a fast by the Western Church, but continued to be observed as a festival by the Eastern Church. See the reason assigned by him, sec. 5, pp. 58-60. This very change proves our position, seeing that the Eastern Church retained much longer the Chiliastic views which favored the idea of a festival, while the Western portion fell under the Alexandrian influence, and lost the Chiliastic influence.

Obs. 7. The student scarcely needs to be reminded that the Sabbatism presented needs not necessarily be pressed in its chronological aspect, although great stress has been laid on the same. For, so far as our argument is concerned (which is not a chronological one), it will be amply sufficient, if it be only conceded that the times, past and present, will be succeeded here on earth by another period containing this Sabbatism. This has been fully established, for Pre-Christian and Christian interpretation—aside from the chronological feature, almost invariably attached—takes it as fundamental that such an era will follow other past eras (as the Sabbath follows the days of the week), that it pertains to the earth, and that in it the glorious Messianic blessings will be fully realized.

Obs. 8. As indicative of the class of men who hold to this Sabbatism view, we present a few more illustrations. Rothe (Dog., P. 2, p. 60) says: "The Apostles describe the Chiliastic Kingdom. Paul, in his letter to the Hebrews, calls it 'a Sabbatism' for the people of God." Archb. William Newcome (Bickersteth's Diss. on Proph., p. 106), referring to Rev. 20 : 4, and advocating our view of it, adds: "This is the great Sabbatism or rest of the Church." John Bunyan (First Chaps. Genesis) advocates "the glory that the Church shall have in the latter day, even in the seven thousandth year of the world, that Sabbath when Christ shall set up His Kingdom on earth." Hippolytus (Clarke's Ante-Nicene Ch. Lib., vol. 6, p. 447) remarks: "And 6000 years must needs be accomplished, in order that the Sabbath may come, the rest, the holy day, on which God rested from all His works. For the Sabbath is the type and emblem of the future Kingdom of the saints, when they shall reign with Christ, when He comes from heaven; as John says in his Apocalypse: For a day with the Lord is as a thousand years." Gieseler (Ch. His., vol. 1, p. 100), after stating the universality of Chiliasm in the second century, adds: "The Millennium was represented as the great Sabbath which was very soon to begin, and to be ushered in by the resurrection of the dead."

Quotations could be readily given from Starke (Synopsis, New Test.), Elliott (Horæ Apoc.), Hofman (Prophecy and Fulfilment), Olshausen (Com.), Gill (Com.), Alford (Greek Test.), and a host of others, including the fine—oft-quoted—passage of Cowper (beginning with: "The time of rest, the promised Sabbath comes. Six thousand years of sorrow have well nigh," etc.), and the admirable eulogy heaped upon this Sabbatism by Steir (Words of Jesus). Sufficient is given to show that it is no novelty, but is entertained by able men, and that it admirably sustains our position eschatologically.

Our line of reasoning would be incomplete, if we did not answer an objection which must have occurred to the intelligent prophetic student. The difficulty to be met is this: How do you reconcile the seventh Milliad to follow the six thousand years with the fact that six thousand years have—if we accept of various chronological tables—already transpired, and no such Sabbatism, as the ancients believed in, has commenced? In this work we have not committed ourselves to the adoption of any chronological reckoning for the simple reason that, owing to several designed chasms in the Bible, no two chronological tables are alike, although given by able men. The diversity is so great that the differences between the lesser and the more extended reach to five and six hundred years. According to Usher, Jarvis, and others, we have not yet reached the close of the six thousand years (e.g. Usher allowing one hundred and four years still to come, and Jarvis ninety-eight years). But according to Bowen, Clinton, Lovell, Hales, Cunninghame, and others, we have entered into the seventh Milliad, since they give from Creation to the Vulgar Era, respectively, 4120, 4128, 4231, 5411, 5478, etc. Now if we accept of the more extended chronological tables, then the difficulty above suggests itself. Strongly inclined to receive the extended tables as the most consistent—without indorsing the correctness of any one in particular—we propose the following solution. The key is found in our remarks and application of the Seventy Weeks of Daniel (see Genl. Index, at the close of the third volume, for "Seventy Weeks," and refer). There we show in detail that between the last week and the preceding weeks there is an interregnum or lengthy interval, of which, not being Jewish time, no account is taken. This interregnum embraces a large portion of the time in this dispensation. In illustration of our meaning, let us take e.g. Cunninghame's date, which gives, from Creation to the birth of Jesus, 5478 years; to this we must add as reckoned the time to the destruction of Jerusalem and, at least, a portion of the interval—the remainder of the time falling exclusively within "the times of the Gentiles" is not counted, pertaining to the interregnum. This teaches us (1) that the chronology of the Bible is purposely framed to meet the tender of the Kingdom to the Jewish nation, the rejection of the Christ by the nation, and the dispersion of the nation; (2) that in view of this interregnum and the related portraiture of prophetic periods, it is utterly impossible for any human being—as Jesus Himself said—to declare the exact time of His Coming; (3) that the imminency of the Second Advent is shown to be dependent, not upon chronological data (which at best are only approximative), but upon the Divine Purpose (as e.g. pertaining to the gathering of the predetermined number of Kings and Priests, etc.); (4) that the shortening of the time for the elect's sake may refer to Jewish time as expressed in the last week—the predetermined brevity of which is thus exhibited in prophecy; (5) and that the Sabbatism pertaining and covenanted to the Jewish nation relates to prescribed Jewish time, and hence will only be reckoned and realized according to the time that does not fall under the period of dispersion and rejection, entailed for the fearful sin of putting the Messiah, "the King of the Jews," to death. God thus shows His abhorrence of the crime by even refusing to acknowledge the time of sore punishment. The shortening of the days referred to may, for aught we know, extend to Gentile times; if so, it can be easily seen how, in virtue of the fulfilment of time in general, the Sabbatical year may be, at God's pleasure, introduced. His Will in this matter is supreme, and when the number of His elect are completed (which is only known to Him), then we may expect the immediate measures introductory to the Sabbatism or Rest. The shortening of the time, either as to Jewish or Gentile times, is dependent upon the gathering of the predetermined elect to carry out the Theocratic Purpose, and therefore it leaves the exact time of the Second Advent purposely indefinite. In view, too, of the whole period of Israel's dispersion being called "a small moment" (Isa. 54 : 7), we may well ponder what the Spirit means when He speaks of "shortening" time, and be, as Jesus advises, in the posture of watching servants.

PROPOSITION 144. This Kingdom embraces "the times of refreshing" and "the times of the restitution of all things" mentioned, Acts 3: 19-21.

Having had occasion several times to refer this passage to the Pre-Mill. Advent and the Millennial refreshing that follows, it may be advisable to give, more at length, the reasons for such an application.

Obs. 1. Before entering into a discussion, the reader is exhorted to notice that Peter is addressing Jews who were familiar with, and employed, the phraseology used. The very phrases derived by the Jews from the typical year of Jubilee, from the typical Sabbath, and from the promises of the prophets, and applied by them to express the restoration of the Davidic throne and Kingdom and the happy times resulting therefrom, Peter takes, without explanation, to be fulfilled at the repentance of the nation and at the Second Coming of Jesus Christ. This is so evident that a number of writers on this ground reject Peter's statements as too exclusively "Jewish." If the present time or dispensation was intended, then Peter ought, as an honest man, to have explained the phrases accordingly.<sup>1</sup> If the phrases were to be spiritualized, he ought to have stated the fact, and assigned the reasons for such a transmutation. Those who differ from us should explain, if they can, how Peter could possibly employ the current Jewish phraseology in the connection of a future Coming Messiah, knowing how the expressions were applied, unless he fully indorsed the opinion entertained by his hearers. If the Apostle meant something else, then they ought also to show how it came to pass that all the churches organized by the Apostles still retained a firm and continued belief in the Jewish view of "the times of refreshing" and "the times of restitution," and looked for the same in the prayed-for Coming of the Son of man. If the predicted refreshing and restitution under the Messiah was, as modern writers tell us, to be experienced in this dispensation, why is it that the faith and hope of the Early Church was so constantly directed to the speedy Second Advent? Consistency and the preservation of the integrity of the early faith, covenant and prophecy, all require us to receive those expressions as still relating to the future.

<sup>1</sup> Aside from the unorthodox application, the absurdity of Dr. Knapp's (Christ. Theol., p. 349) explaining this passage as solely relating to this dispensation—"this happy period of the New Testament," etc.—is seen at once by considering how those phrases were used by the hearers, and that Peter's language is adapted to confirm their faith in its accustomed usage. It is flatly contradicted by the admissions of Knapp in other places respecting the Jewish view of restitution. Barnes (Com. loci) is more guarded than Knapp, and includes the present dispensation and what will be performed at and after the Second Advent in the phraseology, but this embraces too much, and is liable to the same objections. The least reflection will show that the sad trials, troubles, persecutions, etc., to which the Christians were then subjected, did not, and could not, in any sense meet the requirements of the usage of such phrases ; and hence, if Knapp and Barnes, etc., are correct, then an explicit disavowal, in justice to the hearers, ought to have been made of the universal belief in them.

Obs. 2. Notice the meaning of "the times of refreshing." Barnes (Com. loci) tells us that "refreshing means properly the breathing or refreshment after being heated with labor, running, etc ; hence denotes any kind of refreshment, as rest, or deliverance from evils of any kind." He speaks of "the common belief of the Jews" concerning it, and adds: "The idea, however, that the times of the Messiah would be times of rest, and ease, and prosperity, was a favorite one among the Jews, and was countenanced in the Old Test. See Isa. 28 : 12, 'To whom He said, This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest ; and this the refreshing,' " etc. Prof. Bush (Anastasis), after giving "refreshment, produced by cooling after excessive heat" (so Vulgate : tempora refrigeris—times of refrigeration), including, as some have it, "free respiration," and adding the idea of "comfort, consolation," and, as Syriac, "times of tranquility," informs us that it means "refreshment and invigoration," and then adds: "It implies a kind of return to the body of its animating principle." Bloomfield (Com. loci) says: "'Refreshing' properly denotes a regaining one's breath after it has been interrupted ; a breathing time from some labor, a rest from trouble or deliverance from evil generally ; in which sense it occurs in the Sept. and Philo cited by the commentators." This interpretation accords with that given by a large number of writers, which need not be repeated, seeing that there is no material difference existing. The differences of opinion arise from the location of the fulfilment of the refreshing. Barnes, however, anxious to apply the phrase exclusively to this dispensation, is forced to acknowledge that it "includes the restitution of all things and the return of Christ," etc. Bloomfield, utterly rejecting its application to this present period, adopts its connection with the Sec. Advent and makes "the refreshing" "the same with the 'rest,' 2 Thess. 1 : 7." Olshausen (Com. loci) contends that "the times of refreshing" and "the times of restitution" are the same, being identical in point of fulfilment. After showing that any other translation is inconsistent with the laws of language, he adds: "The Coming of Christ (i.e. his parousia) is therefore to be conceived as coincident with the times of refreshing, and His sojourn in the heavenly world closes with His return to the earth for the completion of His work." "The expression occurring here, 'times of refreshing,' is easily explained. Life in this sinful world is conceived as a time of conflict and distress, and it is followed by rest in the Kingdom of the Messiah. The phrase is only to be found in this passage of the New Test., and has but feeble parallels in the Old Test., as e.g. 2 Sam. 23 : 7. Probably it takes its origin from a comparison of the Messianic era with a Sabbath day in the higher sense, which, it is known, was very current among the Jews." Let the reader pass over the predictions of this Kingdom under the Messiah, and see how (Isa. 35) "waters shall break out in the wilderness and streams in the desert ;" how "the parched ground shall become a pool and the thirsty land springs of water," and "the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads : they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away ;" how (Isa. 41 : 17, 18 ; Isa. 43 : 19, 20, etc.) drink will be given to His thirsty people ; how the righteous (Isa. 25) shall enjoy "a feast of fat things full of marrow" with victory over death, etc.; how (Rev. 19) they are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb, etc.; and surely the phrase "times of refreshing" is well chosen to designate the period when "the rest" is obtained, and God wipes away all tears. Consider, also, that this refreshing proceeds "from the presence (face) of the Lord" (which, while it denotes that the Lord is the author of it, really with the views of the hearers means more), and to show how this will be done by the Messiah personally, the Apostle proceeds to state that this same Jesus, crucified, preached and ascended to heaven. God will send, thus meeting the objection of the Jew that might be urged, viz., where is the personal Messiah who is to introduce this refreshing? Peter thus transfers the anticipations of the Jews to the time of the Sec. Advent. Lechler's remarks (Lange's Com. loci) are pertinent: "Of that time (i. e. refreshment and blessedness) God is the author and source; it commences with the return of Christ, whom heaven receives during the interval, but whom God will send personally; it consists of all that which God had hitherto promised through the prophets." (See also Doc. and Eth. Remark, s. 6.) Prof. E. W. Hengstenberg (The Jews and Christian Church), although having no sympathy with our views, is forced to say that "the times of refreshing are identical with the regeneration," and "that the detailed description thereof is given in Rev. 21 and 22, is as certain as that its advent is set forth as contemporaneous with the re-appearance of Christ." This view is correct, and how it harmonizes with ours will be seen under following propositions. It is only necessary to add that the varied renderings of "when," "that," "in order that" or "until," the times of refreshing "shall" or "may" come, etc., do not affect the application of the passage, since Millenarians from Irenæus and Tertullian down to Judge Jones (Notes) have received one or the other rendering.* The rendering itself, whichever is attached, forbids the reception of a then existing present condition of things, and embraces the notion of a future occurrence. It is true, as Judge Jones has most ably shown (Notes on Scripture, loci), that if the rendering of the English Version is discarded for "that times of refreshing may come" (which Jones adopts), then "Peter connects the national conversion of Israel with the promised times of refreshing," etc. His argument is that the Apostle urges the Jews, as a people, to repentance and conversion, because the times of refreshing, as the prophets abundantly testify, are connected with just such a repentance and conversion. It is implied that until this is done, such promised times cannot come, seeing that the Kingdom cannot be set up, as predicted, without it. The delay in carrying the Gospel to the Gentiles, the priority given to the Jews, the sparing of the nation for some time, etc., was to still mercifully tender to them—in view of their being nationally entitled to the blessings—the promised times of refreshing on condition of repentance. The continued national unbelief and impenitence prevented—as had been already foreseen and predicted—God's gracious purposes, and delayed them until the "times of the Gentiles" would be fulfilled. It is unnecessary to declare that if this is the meaning, how well this meets the conditions given under previous propositions. On the other hand, if "when" is to be retained, then the idea of Calvin and others may be the correct one, viz., to refer the times of refreshing and the peace, etc., to the Advent of Christ—or Jones's view can be received, implying that then the sins of the nation (under which it is even yet suffering) shall be entirely removed when, owing to its repentance, etc., these times will be introduced. As stated, no matter what rendering is adopted, the allusion is directly to the future as related to the Advent of Jesus.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The careful student, only too glad to receive such valuable hints from studious opponents, will here see a vein opening worthy of consideration. For Bush goes on to say that the Septuagint usage intimates "freshened animation," and "This idea is closely related to the resurrection." "Some commentators have been led to compare this phrase with the Syriac and Chaldaic formula 'day of consolation' for 'day of resurrection,' Hoë. 6 : 2, 'He will revive (vivify) us in the days of consolation, which shall come in the days of the vivification of the dead.'" He goes on to show that as refreshment and consolation were considered analogous, and as consolation and resurrection were anciently kindred conceptions, so refreshment or reanimation is linked with the notion of a resurrection. For Heinsius remarks (Exer. S. S., p. 272), that "the Rabbinical writers call the future life a refreshing—respiration in the world to come, as when they say one hour of refreshment in the world to come is better than a whole life in the present world." Now, if the word "consolation" was used by the Jews in reference to the resurrection (giving comfort, etc.), notice how it serves to explain some passages. Thus, e.g. Luke 2 : 25, etc., Simeon "waited for the consolation of Israel." May not this refer to the resurrection, seeing also Simeon's willingness, instead of desiring to remain and witness Christ's life, etc., to die, the Spirit evidently also revealing to him that the consolation experienced was future—seeing that he makes a reference to Dan, 12 : 2 in "the rising again of many in Israel." One thing is certain, that many believers have associated this phrase and that of restitution to the resurrection—as including it—and some have translated it to bring out this idea (as e.g. Sirr, First Res., p. 144) "Times of reanimation." Hence, instead of this "refreshing" being (as Schulz) "the time of the dead" or "the future rest of the dead in the Lord" (i.e. in the intermediate state), it has reference to their resurrection.

<sup>2</sup> He regards the views which apply this promise to the present as unworthy of serious refutation. We may, therefore, pass by the ideas which few follow, that this prediction applies to release from the ceremonial law and conversion of the Jews (as Kraft); or to the delay of divine judgment upon the Jews introducing a time of long-suffering (as Barkey); or to freedom from Jewish persecution and calamities (as Grotius); or to a higher stage of religion (as Döderlein); or to the present dispensation (as Eckerman); seeing that all such ignore the Jewish and early Church conceptions, the return of Jesus, and the general analogy of Scripture.

<sup>3</sup> If only the Jewish usage and general tenor of the Word are observed, good sense can be made with either of them. The simple fact is, that according to these the time alluded to is not merely one when sin is obliterated (as the force of "blotted out" conveys—see Bloomfield, loci), but the results of sin, including death, shall be removed. The Jewish hearer thus understood Peter as embracing that era, the ultimate hope of the nation, and this view was uninterruptedly transmitted in the early Church. Hence whatever preliminary blessings were enjoyed, whatever earnestness of the future were given, whatever refreshings of grace were bestowed, these were regarded as merely preparative to the promised future refreshing and restitution. Rev. Carleton, in the Theol. and Lit. Journal, Ap., 1861, has an able article on the question whether the "when" of our version should be retained, or "so that" be substituted, and at length defends the former, giving strong reasons and illustrations in its support. On the other hand, Dr. Alexander renders it "so that, in order that," saying that the English version is a "violation of a uniform and constant usage." Dr. R. W. Clark, in his Hope of Christ's Coming, prefers, with Lange, Alford, Alexander and others, "in order that" or "so that," and adds: "It can have no other meaning," repeating Alford's view: "it can have but one sense—in order that." While either interpretation makes good sense, we are at present inclined to the latter, for this reason: such a rendering is in forcible unity with the simple revealed fact (see e.g. Props. 65, 86, 124, etc.) that the Millennial period, "the times of refreshing and restitution," can never be introduced until a certain predetermined number of persons have been gathered out. Those "times" then, as here enforced, are dependent for their arrival upon a previous repentance and faith of a certain determined number, and "in order that" or "so that" more distinctly embraces this idea than "when." The reader must determine for himself the rendering, as both are sustained by good authorities.

The destruction of the temple and dispersion of the nation forms a new epoch, showing that Divine forbearance in allowing the nation, as such, further space for national repentance was past, until a certain time had elapsed, etc. To the critical student it may be well to say that Jones gives a most satisfactory answer to Barnes's inquiry (Com. loci), viz., "that it is not easy to see how their repenting, etc., should be the means of introducing the times of refreshing." It is very easy to see it, provided the prophecies which condition the setting up of the Kingdom on such repentance, etc., are noticed (Prop. 113). Barnes, in addition to the authorities given by Jones (as Lightfoot, Doddridge, Scott, Clarke, and Alexander) for "that," gives Kuinoel, Grotius, Syriac Version, etc., as favoring the same. On the contrary, Calvin, Beza, Latin Vulgate, Schleusner, etc., translate "when" and saying: "meaning that they might find peace in the day when Christ should return to judgment, which return would be to them a day of rest," etc. Again, many writers suggest that the "blotting out of sins" has reference also to the future, that there is a difference between forgiveness of sins and blotting them out, the former being preliminary to the latter, and that the latter is only experienced when all the effects or results of sin, as death, corruption, etc., are removed, or as others have it, when the nation—if it be applied to them—is reinstated in its forfeited position, etc. See a writer, J. G. W., in Prop'h. Times, April, 1874, and also art. 1, for May, 1869. The sins of the nation are specifically mentioned by the prophets as not only forgiven but entirely removed, when this Kingdom is established, so that it is evidenced by their ever-enduring faithfulness and the attainment of the highest prosperity, honor, etc. This is merely suggestive.

Obs. 3. In reference to the meaning and application of "the times of restitution," we shall again chiefly rely upon the comments of opponents and others. Barnes (Com. loci) says: "It means properly to restore a thing to its former situation," and while inclined by this theory to apply it in a measure to the present dispensation, yet he admits that it includes the return of Jesus and the work that He may then perform. Bloomfield: it "properly signifies a restoration of anything to some former state," and he unhesitatingly applies its fulfilment at the Sec. Advent. Prof. Bush (Anastasis) says the word "restitution" means a restoration to a former condition, restitution to original state, and quotes philologists who give such a rendering, and refers it to the future. Scott (Com.) remarks that it denotes the restoration of a thing to the state from which it had fallen, and that it must include the Sec. Coming and the restoration of Israel. Dr. Bell (The Times of Restitution) says: "The word translated 'restitution' might be rendered 'restoration.' Calvin has it, 'The times of restoring.'" The remark of Calvin on the passage is worthy of our notice. He says: "If at this time we see many things confused in the world, let this hope refresh us, that Christ shall once come, that He may restore all things." This was the view of the Reformers generally, several of whom we have already quoted in another connection. Prof. Hackett (Com. on Acts) makes it: "The times of the restoration of all things i.e. to a state of primeval order, purity, and happiness, such as will exist for those who have part in the Kingdom of Christ at His Sec. Coming." Olshausen (Com.), of course, makes Jesus the Restorer at His Coming again, and restitution to be "that of bringing back to its originally pure condition," etc. Lange (Com. loci) says: "It ('restitution') denotes a restoration or return of an earlier condition," and declares: "it commences with the return of Christ," etc. So Lechler and Gerok in Doc. and Eth. remarks, s. 6, confirm this usus loquendi, refer its fulfilment to the Advent, and show that, according to the prophets, it is even more than restorative, transcending all that ever existed. The student, who has investigated this subject, well knows that a multitude of eminent theologians and writers can be adduced, who present similar definitions, and apply its fulfilment to the Sec. Advent. Indeed, this is the almost universal interpretation—both ancient and modern.' But what is to be restored, brought back to its former condition with increased glory? Gerok (Lange's Com. loci, Doc. 6) quotes Baumgarten (Die Apostelgeschichte, 1, p. 80) as saying: "Nothing else than the Kingdom of Israel, the whole power and glory of the Israelitic Kingdom." While Gerok justly observes that it includes more, as the prophets predicted, yet Baumgarten is right in laying stress on the restoration of the Theocratic Kingdom; for that is the burden of prophecy, that is the main, leading object to which the eye of faith and hope is directed. The idea of restoring this Kingdom is stated in Acts 1 : 6, and is plainly repeated in Acts 15 : 16, the same idea running through—from the time of its overthrow and even before—the Old and New Tests. Peter, well knowing how his hearers understood this phrase as directly including the rebuilding of the fallen throne and Kingdom of David, instead of giving it another meaning, tells those hearers that it is postponed until the Sec. Advent of Jesus, thus fully corroborating the statements of the Master concerning the postponement. But, as stated, it embraces more than this, for the persons addressed by Peter—owing to the portraiture given of the things pertaining to, and accompanying, this Kingdom—were accustomed to ally with it the resurrection and the renewal of nature itself, and, as is well known, this uninterruptedly continued to be the belief of the Christian Church for several centuries until the Origenistic interpretation prevailed. The restitution, in the very nature of the case, includes all things specified by the covenants, both the Abrahamic and Davidic, and the promises based upon the same, extending not only to the Jewish nation and to the Gentile nations, but even to creation. For the Kingdom in which this restitution is to be experienced, is the bringing forth the Divine Purpose in a manifested form as the consummating of the Infinite Plan, which has for its object the restoring of man and the world to their originally destined place. The restoration of the Theocracy—thus bringing God again to earth as the Ruler in the Person of Jesus Christ—makes the restoration of all other things not only possible but a requisite measure to preserve the dignity and glory of the then prevailing Theocratic relationship. "The days of heaven," Ps. 89 : 29, to which even Moses alluded (Deut. 11 : 21 "as the days of heaven upon earth"), will through the throne then established and by the power of the Mighty King (The Restorer) produce that ample deliverance from all evil and that perfected salvation of which the prophets so sweetly predict—all resting upon and resulting from the displayed authority and rule of the God-man—the Theocratic King. It is impracticable for a Theocracy—in the pure and high form covenanted—to exist side by side with a prevailing curse, and hence its very establishment is a triumph (in the resurrected and glorified ones, etc.) over the curse, insuring its repeal and ultimate destruction. In brief, this, this will form the day of completed Redemption."

<sup>1</sup> Let another be given : Luther (quoted by Dr. Seiss, Last Times, Third Dis.), "All things are now disordered and decayed; whence Peter says that the heavens must receive Christ until the time when all things shall be restored again to what they were in Paradise; thus agreeing with Paul, that the whole creatureship has been made subject to vanity, and that it is to be hoped that not man only but the earth and heaven shall again be brought back to their Edenic state." The few exceptions gain nothing by departing from the generally received usus loquendi. Thus e.g. some (art. Mill. in Ency. Brit.) make restitution "accomplishment," but Lord (Lit. and Theol. Journal for April, 1856, p. 633) shows that even with such a rendering it sustains our position. So the leaning of Barnes to the idea of "consummation, completion, or filling up" giving the Syriac, "until the complement, or filling up, or fulness (so Bush) of the time of all things," and the Arabic, "until the times which shall establish the perfection or completion of all the predictions of the prophets," etc.; or as Bush, "until the times in which all things shall be perfected," etc. For Millenarians, entertaining the common view, have almost substantially, as also corresponding with their doctrine, given the same phraseology, as e.g. Irenæus, "until the times of the disposition of all things" (so Bush), and Tertullian: "Until the times of the exhibition of all the things," etc. (so Bush). The simple idea in the versions and the quotations given is that all the things predicted by the prophets shall be realized, experienced, when this time of the Sec. Advent has arrived, or the allotted period of fulfilment has come. The reference in all is still to the future and associated with the Advent, so that, as Archb. Trench (quoted by E. M., Proph. Times, Dec., 1865) does, "the restitution of Acts 3: 21, "the new heavens and new earth" of Rev. 21: 1, and the day of which Paul speaks, Rom. 8: 21-23, must all be located within the same period. Alford (Com. loci) says of the effort to limit "restitution" by the substitution of "fulfilment," "is against all precedent," and Brookes (Marantha) observes that "it proves too much," because its advocates admit that Jesus will come again before "all things" (as e.g. resurrection, judgment, re-creation) are fulfilled.

For opinions of the Jews, see Propositions on Resurrection, World to Come, etc. We append a few Jewish interpretations given by Prof. Bush (Anastasis, p. 360). R. Moses Nachmonides in Deut. 45, says: "Man shall be restored in that time, namely, in the days of the Messiah, to that state in which he was before the first man sinned." R. Becai, in Schiloan Orba, fol. 9, col. 4: "In that time (i.e. of the Messiah) the whole work of creation shall be changed for the better, and shall return into its perfect and pure state, as it was in the time of the first man, before he had sinned." R. Berakyah in name of R. Samuel, Bereshith Rabba, fol. 11, col. 3, said: "Although things were created perfect, yet when the first man sinned they were corrupted and will not again return to their congruous state till Pherez (i.e. the Messiah) comes," etc. As to the continued view, this is seen in the apostolic and Christian Fathers, in the Sibylline books, in Eccl. Histories, Dogmatics, etc., and in numerous commentaries.

Obs. 4. While the view of restitution, embracing the restoration of the Theocracy and the return to the condition of things before the fall of Adam, is consoling and grand, yet even this would limit its meaning, for a more sublime and scriptural aspect of it is, that, while including those mentioned, it is a restoration to that very condition which Adam and his descendants would have attained to had they not fallen. Adam himself is restored in that immortal condition which he forfeited by sin (i.e. to that which he had not yet attained), and in the entire restitution God indicates, not merely the bestowment of blessings previously enjoyed, but that of others superadded to qualify those participating in it for the exercise of that government which the number, state, etc., of Adam's descendants and God's purpose in creation makes important or even necessary. Hence in some of its aspects, transcending all experience and knowledge, it may be beyond our comprehension; at least, the Bible intimates in a number of places that it is scarcely possible for us now, situated as we are, to form adequate conceptions of its extent and glory. Hence, also, as we shall show in a following proposition, it extends to the restoration of the race (not of the wicked) as a race to its lost, forfeited condition.

The idea of Origen and others, recently revived by Barbour, that this "restitution" embraces at least a partial, if not complete, restoration of the wicked to God's favor, etc., is based solely upon inference. Unable to receive, on the one hand, the ultra views of the soul, sheol and hades popularly entertained, and, on the other hand, the gross materialistic views of the same, yet we cannot see that, scripturally, the idea of "restitution" can be pressed to include the wicked of past generations. The teaching of the Bible seems to be that no hope exists for those who reject the truth, that they shall be beaten with few or many stripes proportionate to their guilt, that they shall not inherit, etc., and that they shall ultimately perish, being utterly destroyed from off the face of the earth. Whatever difficulties may exist in relation to the ultimate destiny of the wicked, we need not dogmatize on the subject, or advocate any special view, seeing that such a destiny does not affect the establishment of the Theocracy. But, nevertheless, as that destiny is connected with eschatology, it may be said that we cannot possibly receive the Universalist and Restorationist application of this "restitution." Barbour, Russell, Paton (in Herald of Kingdom, Three Worlds etc.) make it to include a restoration of all nations (the dead) back to "their former state" (i.e. a fleshly one), and placing them under a second probation, with the doom of "the second death" (from which there is no release) before them if unbelieving, etc. This is based, specially, on the old favorite theory that Christ died for every man, and the word "all" is made conspicuous after the Universalist mode, and the inference is drawn that "all" must be saved, or have a chance of salvation. Now, we do not propose to say what God may do in reference to heathen, etc., in the future, but we do say that these writers break the force of "all" and their salvability, because Christ died for them, in view of the fact that they themselves allow that some shall die the second death, thus showing that some, notwithstanding the provision made, are not saved. Now, to those who have had access to the truth and obstinately reject it, are incorrigibly wicked, no salvation in the future is tendered. Let the reader observe that "the spared nations" (Isa. 66) are nations then living, who, in the judgments poured out upon Antichrist and his armies, are spared, and that the Mill. age is composed of such existing nations and the glorified saints ruling over them. For, instead of salvation being predicated of the dead who are wicked, we are expressly informed that they "live not again until the thousand years are ended," and then when raised up at its close, instead of a state of probation, we find a judgment which consigns them to the second death. Jukes (The Second Death and the Restitution of all things) even makes the second death the means of life and glory, and thus reverses the Bible order. The order, the nations spared, the reign, etc., will be developed under various propositions following, to which the reader is referred for the reasons determining our position. Whatever of truth may be in Tholuck's idea of a future probation for heathen, etc., one thing is self-evident, viz., that all such views, dogmatically expressed, are derived from mere inferences, for no one can find a single passage of Scripture that asserts a resurrection of the heathen dead or wicked dead (comp. Prop. 127) at the beginning of or during the Millennium. Theories of reconciliation comprised in Universalism, Restorationism, Destructionism, Partial Restorationism, etc., do not affect our argument, which looks forward to and advocates the establishment of the covenanted Theocratic Kingdom. When this is done we may safely anticipate clearer light and a full vindication of God's justice and ways.

Obs. 5. Again, let it be distinctly understood that Jesus "the Christ" is the Refresher or Reanimator, the Restorer, the Mighty Deliverer. This power and honor He has delegated to no one in this future dispensation (whatever the glorified saints may, associated with Him, perform through Him in the world to come), and He justly claims that it belongs to Himself exclusively, as e.g. "Behold, I make all things new," etc. Before restitution comes, Jesus must first come; this is the divine order plainly laid down. In this dispensation, whatever the love and grace of God in the hearts of believers, etc., it cannot remove the curse, renovate the earth, or restore a single forfeited blessing; it cannot save from pain, sickness, or death, from trial, sorrow, or bereavements; it cannot deliver self or our neighbor from the troubles incident and allotted to the present life. The caution thus briefly expressed is the more needed, since believers in the Word too much overlook it.

Thus e.g. those efforts at colonizing Palestine with the idea of beginning "the Restitution" must prove failures. As the American Colony in Palestine, of which (1866) Rev. Adams (Israelite Indeed, May, 1867) writes: "Palestine will soon shake herself from the dust of ages and arise in glory and grandeur, as in the days of old. The great Restitution, as foretold by the Prophets and Apostles, has now commenced," etc. Such language is a prostitution of the Word, and an attributing to man what only belongs to Christ (see Prop. 120). Such caricaturing of the work ascribed to Jesus must be displeasing to God, who honors the Son, etc. On the other hand, the reader need scarcely be reminded how this doctrine disposes of the opposite extreme arising from Fatalism, Necessism, or Pessimism, which hopes for no change. The Divine Plan, attested by historical provisions, which are existing facts, effectually meets, consistent with the highest reason, the evils existing, and shows how they can be removed, etc. For a singular notion of a Restorer, prevailing for centuries, see Von Döllinger's Essay, pp. 360-62, 399 and 410, Proph. Mid. Ages.

Obs. 6. As various writers (e.g. Lord, Judge Jones, Brookes, Bickersteth, etc.) have intimated, these "times" may include successive eras, economies, ascending stages of glory. Beginning with the Millennial period, restitution manifests itself magnificently in the Theocratic order, in the persons of the saints, in the dispensing of blessings, etc.; and by a comparison of Scripture there is reason to believe that the work is—so far as the whole earth and the nations are concerned—progressive, for at the close of the distinctive thousand years additional facts, indicative of the removal of the last vestiges of evil, are mentioned. While the Millennium is thus, in a manner, initiatory to succeeding dispensations or ages, yet, as we shall show hereafter (Prop. 159), the restitution thus affected is not displaced by another one, for it is always spoken of as eternal (see Prop. 159). Whatever of an additional nature is introduced, forms only an increased glory (resulting from continued Redemption), added to that which already exists. As the design of this work is only to take the reader to the close of the Millennial era and the entrance into the eternal ages (where the Bible takes and leaves us), when already refreshing and restitution have been experienced and tested in all their preciousness, it is proper for us to avoid giving, what can only be conjecture, any decisive opinion concerning the phraseology which seems to involve a succession of eras in the continuation of a restored world.

We only remind the reader that this Biblical conception of glorious restitution, sets aside the Optimistic theory of Leibnitz, that this world, as it now exists, is the best, and that evil is a necessary (being mere imperfection or negation) condition of the highest good, seeing that it once was better and is again restored to a better one, evil being removed as unnecessary and antagonistic to the highest good. On the other hand, it shows that the Pessimist theory of Shopenhauer—that the existing world (because of preponderating evil) is worse than no world at all, and that (as Von Hartman added) it is still the best possible (because every possible world is necessarily a bad one)—is refuted by the use made of evil and its ultimate removal (comp. The Pessimist's View of Life, Littell's Liv. Age, May 6th, 1876). Williamson (Rud. Theol. and Moral Science, p. 204) argues in detail that evil is a necessary result of creation, and adds: "We cannot conceive it possible that there should be a material universe, as limited in space and conditioned in time, and filled with all forms of life, in all grades and degrees, without involving the necessity of the relations of evil that emerge from its processes and movements." Now such a restitution (with which compare the deliverance of creation in next proposition), to which the Bible leads us, indicates that this plea of necessity is a grave mistake. We may add, in this connection, that this restitution is indirectly corroborative of the view held (Delitzsch, Kurtz, Lewis, etc.) that creation was produced in a regular order of succession of ages, following one another. The six days of Creation and the past history of the world (in its dispensations) evidences such a succession of ages, and when we enter the Millennial age we find other ages still following, so that the end, as predicted, is in harmony with the past, evidencing a continued advancement and growth. (Comp. Lewis's Six Days of Creation, which has some good remarks concerning the restitution and ultimate deliverance of creation.)

titution" to mean "emendation, restoration to a pristine condition, change to a better state," says: "By the expression 'until the times of the apocatastasis of all things which God has spoken' etc., Peter means the time when all affairs shall be consummated, all the prophetic announcements shall be accomplished, including the inauguration of the Kingdom of the Messiah and its attendant events, the full extension of the Gospel, the resurrection, judgment, etc., in short, the end of the world." The reader will observe that the writer—taking the definite Jewish and early Christian view, as well as the analogy of the Scriptures—crowds entirely too much into his definition. Pressense (The Early Days of Christ, p. 48), speaking of "the first Christians," says: "They believed in an immediate return of Jesus Christ 'to restore all things.' They supposed that the end of the world was at hand, and that the last days foretold by Joel had begun to dawn, Acts 2 : 17 and 3 : 19, 20. Thus they awaited those days of refreshing from the presence of the Lord which were to inaugurate the Second Coming of Christ." Pressense is incorrect when he says "the end of the world," for they located this refreshing and restitution in this world after the Advent, and hence only held to "the end of the age or dispensation." Dr. Schaff (His., Apos. Ch., p. 631), in reference to Acts 3 : 19-21, correctly remarks: "He (Peter) points to a still future time of refreshing, a restoration of the physical and moral world to the state of perfection, to be accomplished at the visible return of Christ, who now fills heaven—a time when all the predictions of the holy prophets of God shall be completely realized." Alford (Com. loci) refers both the refreshing and restitution to the Second Advent, and says of the former, "The times of refreshment (is) the Great Season of Joy and Rest, which, it was understood, the Coming of the Messiah in His Glory was to bring with it," and of the latter, "a glorious and Complete Restoration, especially of 'the Kingdom to Israel,' Acts 1 : 6." This introduction of the Kingdom brings out the distinctive meaning always attached to it by the Jews, disciples, and early believers. Fairbairn (Typol., vol. 1, p. 314) remarks on Acts 3 : 21, that "the Apostle Peter represents the time of Christ's Sec. Coming as 'the time of the restoration of all things,' that is, when everything should be restored to its pristine condition—the same condition in kind, all pure and good, glorious and blessed, but higher in degree, as it is the design of Redemption to ennoble whatsoever it touches." It is a pity that he could not apply this, then, to the restoration promised of the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom as seen e.g. Acts 15 : 16. The Comprehensive Com., so largely addicted to spiritualizing, makes the following comment: "That times of refreshing will come from the presence of the Lord, v. 19, and that they will be times of the restitution of all things, v. 21. There is a future state, another life after this: those times will come from the presence of the Lord, from His glorious appearance at that day, His Coming at the end of time." This we may receive, excepting the Popish idea of time ending, seeing that these times are to be realized in "the day (or time) of the Lord Jesus." This Com. in a foot-note correctly associates these times with the restoration of the Jews, just as Meyer (Com. loci), Baumgarten (Apos. His.), Da Costa (Israel and the Gentiles), and many others. Indeed, they are inseparable; and to the critical student it may be observed that these words were exclusively addressed to Jews, some time before the call of the Gentiles, and therefore must have been based on the prophecies relating to that nation. Dr. Brown (Com. loci) comments:

“When the times of refreshing shall come—rather ‘in order that the times of refreshing may come;’ that long period of repose, prosperity, and joy, which all the prophets hold forth to the distracted Church and this miserable world, as eventually to come, and which is here, as in all the prophets, made to turn upon the national conversion of Israel.” “Restitution of all things—comprehending, probably, the rectification of all the disorders of the fall.” This comment, if logically applied, is an ample reply to much of his reasoning against us in his polemic work Christ’s Sec. Coming; and especially does it contradict that portion of it which leaves out or denies the restoration (as advocated by us) of important blessings forfeited by the fall, and giving us, in place, an imperfect Redeemer and Redemption. M’Clintock & Strong’s Cyclop., Art. “Restitution,” quotes from Kuinöl Com. loci as follows: “Morus and Rosenmüller make ‘times of refreshing’ to mean ‘happy times, not merely the day of the resurrection of the dead, but also spiritual benefits of every kind which Christians enjoy in this and the future life (Morus: the Messianic times), and refer the ‘times of restitution’ (full and perfect fulfilment of prophecy) to the consummation of that auspicious period when all enemies shall be subdued (1 Cor. 15: 25 sq.; Heb. 10: 12, 15; Comp. Ps. 101: 1) and every influence opposing true religion removed.” “De Dieu, Limbach, Wolf, and others, understand by the times of ‘refreshing’ and ‘restitution’ (i.e. the predicted period when the due position will be assigned each one) the days of the last judgment, the times of affliction to the impious and contumacious, but of relief, quiet, and safety to the saints. In support of this view they adduce the frequent arguments of the sacred writers to induce Christians to diligence and hope drawn from the prospect of the last day (Acts 17: 30, sq.; 2 Pet. 3: 7; 2 Thess. 1: 7 and 2: 16), and the fact that Jewish writers were accustomed so to speak of it (Pirke Aboth. 4: 17).” It may be said that if the scriptural idea of judgment is received, then such declarations may be accepted, excepting the reference to this life, concerning which Olshausen aptly (Com. loci) remarks: “The grammatical connection admits only the first view, which regards the two expressions (viz., times of refreshing and times of restitution) as identical, and as not referring to the present time.” Dr. Craven (Lange’s Com. Rev., p. 339) gives an interesting note on this passage, well worthy of notice. He refers to the plural “times” as indicative of lengthened period (to which we also attach the idea of successive stages or periods), and fully advocates our position. We give this extract: “The following seem to be the elements of the restitution predicted in the foregoing Scriptures: 1. A restoration of the hearts of the fathers to the children, Mal. 4: 6. 2. The restoration of the rejected seed of Jacob to holiness and the subsequent favor of God, Isa. 1: 25; Jer. 24: 7. 3. The restoration of Israel to their own land, passim. 4. The establishment of Israel not again to be dispersed, Jer. 24: 6, 7. 5. The establishment of the Kingdom of righteousness as a visible Kingdom, in power and great glory, with its seat at Jerusalem, Isa. 1: 25, 26 (2: 2, 3); 58: 12–14; Jer. 23: 5–8; 23: 7 sq. 6. The gathering of all nations as tributary to Israel or the Church. 7. The Palingenesia, Isa. 11: 65: 17 sq.”

Compare with those given the following, who favor our position. Nast (Com., Matt. 24: 29–36), who makes the restitution future, and the predictions of Joel (inchoately fulfilled) to be then realized. Gloag (Com. on Acts), Doddridge (Com. Acts), John Bunyan (Confession of Faith, in Works, vol. 2, p. 206), Martensen (Ch. Dog., s. 289), Gill (Com.

Rev.*), as well as Auberlen, Elliott, Bellett, Lord, Seiss, Cumming, Woodhouse, Kelly, Fridham, McIntosh, Snell, and many others, either on the passage or in their expositions of Daniel or Revelation, may be consulted with profit and interest. Hackett (Com. loci), who refers this fulfilment to the Sec. Advent, and declares the passage "demands this interpretation," presents one of the most forcible and interesting statements of the early Church view, which will repay perusal. When men speak of introducing these times we may well quote John Knox (Treat. on Fasting): "What were this else but to reform the face of the whole earth, which never was, nor yet shall be, till that righteous King and Judge appear for the restoration of all things." We say, in conclusion, that so long as we live in "the times of the Gentiles" (which now exist, and will continue to exist so long as Jerusalem is trodden down by the Gentiles), these glorious and predicted "times" are not to be realized. This relationship will be fully enforced under following propositions. (Comp. Prop. 70, Obs. 6, for the concessions of Pressensé, Schmid, and Fairbairn quoted.)

PROPOSITION 145. This Kingdom includes "the regeneration" of Matt. 19:28.

This follows from previous Propositions, especially the one relating to the resurrection (which was shown, as in Christ's own person, to be expressed by a renewed or new birth or regeneration through the power of the Spirit),<sup>1</sup> that this Kingdom can only be established, as promised, "in the regeneration." For, its rulers are immortal and reign ever more. Embracing a most precious promise, it is worthy of a more extended notice, making it confirmatory of our position.

<sup>1</sup> It is in view of this fact that the punctuation of the passage does not affect its application to our doctrinal position. Favoring that which unites the regeneration (resurrection) with the Coming and enthronement of the Son of man, yet if it be insisted that it must be connected with the preceding clause, thus reading: "Ye which have followed me in the regeneration," this, too, can be accepted. The objection urged by Barnes (Com. loci) to such a punctuation is not valid on the ground assumed, viz., "Christ was not born again, and in no proper sense could it be said that they had followed Him in the new birth." True in the sense (moral regeneration) Barnes really intends, but his language is too sweeping, since it is declared that Jesus was born from among the dead, and that all His followers, in the resurrection-regeneration morning, shall experience the power of the same birth, through the same Spirit, etc. Therefore we do not limit the passage, not knowing positively which meaning the Spirit intended, for both are proper and available.

Obs. 1. Again, to avoid the charge of forcing the application of the passage, the comments of opposers and friends will be both given. Barnes (Com. loci) says: "It refers to that great revolution, that restoration of order in the Universe, that universal new birth when the dead shall rise," etc., and reads the passage: "Ye which have followed me, shall, as a reward in the great day of the resurrection of the dead and of forming the new and eternal order of things—the day of judgment, the regeneration—be signally honored and blessed." He unites the regeneration with the Sec. Advent. Bloomfield (Com. loci) remarks: "I cannot hesitate to adopt, in preference to all others, the sense assigned to the passage by the ancient expositors in general (and of the modern ones by Kuinoel and Fritzsche), confirmed by the Syriac,<sup>1</sup> Persic, Arabic, Æthiopic, and Italic versions; understanding 'regeneration' of the resurrection to judgment and a new state of existence." He gives this, as required by the context, viz., the revelation of Christ on the throne of His glory (comp. Matt. 25:31), and affirms that the strongest proof of its relationship to the future is found in the fact that those who differ in its application "are compelled to engraft this," and adds: "Nay, even Campbell grants that 'the principal completion of the promise will be at the general resurrection.'" Dr. Wordsworth (Gr. Test. loci) gives: "In the new birth of the saints at the resurrection, in the New Jerusalem. See 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 3:12 and 21:2, 5," etc.

Olshausen (Com. loci) makes this equivalent to "the coming forth of the Kingdom from its concealed and purely spiritual into an external form," etc., calling it "a restoration" advancing from the individual "to the final glorifying of the body" and "the outward visible world as a whole." It thus comprehends the resurrection and the final glorifying, as they stand related to the Kingdom. Lange (Com. loci) says: "The Lord here primarily referred to the final completion of the Kingdom of heaven," and regards it very much in the light Olshausen does, calling it a stronger expression than "restitution" (Acts 3 : 21, with which he says it coincides), since it points to a higher state of existence of man, etc., in the future when restitution is realized. It is scarcely necessary to repeat the interpretation and application of the passage by other commentators and theologians, seeing that it would be, substantially, a repetition of what has preceded. The reader can easily, if desirable, extend such references (with the note appended).<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Murdock's Syr. N. T. gives the following: "Jesus said unto them, Verily I say to you, that, as for you who have followed me, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory in the New World, ye shall also sit on twelve seats and shall judge the twelve tribes of Israel."

which explain it as relating to the future Advent, embracing the notion of renewal, and nearly all specially mention the resurrection as being included. One of the editors of the Proph. Times for Oct., 1867, refers to Burnet, Murdock, Wordsworth, Alford, Robison, Campbell, Lange, De Wette, Meyer, Stier, Kuinoel, Wesley, Clarke, Doddridge, Scott, Hall, Barnes, Olshausen, and Trench, giving liberal extracts indicative of the same position. In the art. on "Regeneration" in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop., it is said: "Our Lord in one instance (Matt. 19 : 28) uses the term 'regeneration' for the resurrection state." Dr. Imbrie, in his Essay, "The Regeneration" (Pre-Mill. Essays, p. 108, etc.), makes it equivalent to "the Restitution of all things." Ebrard (Gospel His., p. 361) says that Strauss himself in one place admits, "This palingenesis is neither a political revolution nor a moral regeneration, but the resurrection of the dead." Schmid (Bib. Theol., N. Test., p. 269) remarks: "The Regeneration is also brought about, which coincides with the commencement of 'the Age to Come.' This relates to the whole world, and is, therefore, a regeneration of the whole world in general, and consequently a renovation of nature in the sense of Rom. 8 : 18-23. For the faithful, in particular, it is also the 'Resurrection of Life' (Luke 14 : 14), the shining forth of the righteous (Matt. 13 : 43), and this is a glorification of the body and not of the spirit only" (Matt. 22 : 23-33). Barrow (Works, vol. 2., p. 565) says: "Sometimes also it (resurrection of the body) is called the regeneration, or iterated nativity, and being born from the dead." "And as to be born at first doth signify the production and union of the parts essential to a man, so to be born again implies the restitution and reunion of the same; a man therefore becoming entirely the same person that he was before."

Obs. 2. Without denying that "the regeneration" when once experienced will include much, or even all, that the writers, just quoted, have attributed to it, yet evidently in the comments of many of them there is a wide departure from the early simplicity attached to the phrase. This is true of later Millenarian authors, who (as e.g. Jones, Notes on Scripture) make it a renovation of all things, a universal recreation, "Paradise restored or brought back again," etc. Freely admitting that when this "regeneration" is experienced, that then, also, the new heavens and new earth appear, that Paradise is restored, that the Kingdom of heaven is outwardly manifested in glory, etc., it does not follow by any means that "regeneration" denotes all these things. Logically, it cannot. Let the reader glance over the various commentators and writers who attempt to explain this phrase, and he will notice one distinguishing peculiarity attending nearly all, viz., that in some way it does, and must, include the resurrection of the body. The primary meaning of a second creation, renewal, restoration, necessarily, when considered in its relation to the future, embraces the idea of the resurrection. Let us give a few more illustrations, showing how persons, whatever their views, are impelled by the signification of the word itself to allow its reference to the resurrection. Augustine (Treat. on Forgiveness, B. 2, ch. 9) quotes Matt. 19 : 28, and refers the regeneration to the bodily resurrection.* Doddridge (Com. loci) calls "regeneration," "the renovation of all things, when all the children of God shall, as it were, be born anew from their graves," etc. Bengel (Gnomen, loci) remarks: "There will be a new creation, over which the Second Adam will preside, when the whole microcosm of human nature, by means of the resurrection, and also the microcosm of the universe will be born again (genesim iteram habebit)." Jones (Notes), including the renovation of the earth, the restoration of the twelve tribes, the re-establishment of the Theocracy, etc., says: "It includes the resurrection, exal-

* Augustine in his City of God, b. 20, ch. 5. refers to it again, and says: "By the words 'in the regeneration,' He certainly meant the resurrection of the dead to be understood; for our flesh shall be regenerated by incorruption, so as our soul is regenerated by faith."

tation, and glorification of the Church of the firstborn or elect." Stier (Words of Jesus) on the passage, calling it "the renewal of the world," also makes it contain "the resurrection of the dead" and subsequent glorification. Simon, the Romanist, translated by Webster (and quoted by Jones), remarks: "By the regeneration most of the ancient commentators understood the resurrection." Beza (margin of the Old Eng. Bible, ed. 1598) refers it to the day of resurrection; so also Olearius (Obs. Sac.) says that part of the regeneration is the restoring of the dead by the resurrection, which itself is called regeneration, illustrative of Epiph. Ad. Hæres. 36 : 1; Deylingius (Obs. Sac.), the same; while Munster (Crit. Sac.) says positively: "This second generation is the resurrection of the dead," etc.; Le Clerc and Hammond make regeneration equivalent to resurrection, so Jansenius (Harm. Ch., c. p. 717), Cornelius a Lapide, Chemnitz (Harm., ch. 132), and the reader will find these quoted at length by Judge Jones (Notes on Scripture, pp. 214-216). This is so evident that Trench (Syn. of N. T., p. 97), after admitting that "the day of resurrection will be the day of 'regeneration,'" adds: "So that those fathers had a certain, though only partial, right, when they interpreted the word at Matt. 19 : 28, as though it had been only equivalent to anastasis (resurrection), and, as a consequence, continually used it as a synonym for the resurrection." Trench himself, as well as many of the authors already alluded to, certainly are illogical when they tell us that the scope of the passage relates to the future, and then drag in that which pertains to the past. Admitting the necessity of moral regeneration before this promised regeneration is experienced, yet the former is not the subject of the promise; admitting also the renewal of the earth, etc., it does not seem appropriate to crowd into this one word quite a number of events which are clearly set forth in other places. The simplicity of the early meaning is to be retained, viz., its reference to the resurrection for the following reasons: 1. The Res. is a "regeneration," admitted by all, and believed in at the time Jesus spoke. The Jews held to the resurrection of the pious dead at the Advent of the Messiah (see Prop. on Res. etc.), and from the prophets believed that this would be followed by a renovation of nature resulting from the exalted nature, power, and glory of the Messiah's Kingdom. But from Isa. 66 : 8-10; Ezek. 37 : 1-14, and other predictions, the resurrection was regarded as a new birth or second creation through the special power of God. So that let the word be applicable to both (and thus employed), yet the meaning that Jesus attached to it must be sought in the general complexion of the passage. Hence, correct at least in retaining the idea of resurrection (without which all the rest could not be attained), let us ask whether the other idea was directly included or only implied. 2. This is answered by noticing: (A) That Jesus speaks of the reward or compensation being received (the reward itself being the resultant) in or through this regeneration, which remarkably accords with other sayings of His, as, e.g., "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just," Luke 14 : 14. (B) It is observable that the reign of Christ on the throne of His glory, as well as that of the apostles subordinately, being placed after the Sec. Advent is uniformly introduced in promise as preceded by a resurrection of the righteous, and with this the words of Christ correspond. (C) "The manifestation of the sons of God," Rom. 8 : 19, precedes the deliverance of creation—the latter being a result of the former having received "the redemption of the body." Jesus—the question of the deliverance of the creature not being suggested but only that of rewarding the sons of God—would hardly introduce the latter when the reigning with Him is invariably—when explained—predicated of this very period of manifestation. (D) The parallel passage in Luke 22 : 28 aids in enforcing our position. Here we have the same promise given to the apostles, by which we learn that by this “regeneration” (omitted by Luke), the apostles receive “a kingdom,” and that, what Matt. declares Christ does, is “in my Kingdom.” When search is made to ascertain how and when this “Kingdom,” in which this reign of Jesus and the apostles is to be witnessed, is obtained, then the interpretation of “regeneration” as “resurrection” stands forth in such a passage as this : “Flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God,” but, as the connection shows, the power of the resurrection of the just with its glorifying accompaniments must be experienced (1 Cor. 15 : 50). Whatever secondary meaning may inferentially or by implication be attached to the word, evidently the primary meaning is the one thus suggested and so long held to by ancient expositors.

Obs. 3. The Kingdom itself, the reign of the saints, the deliverance of creation, in brief, all the blessings, so vividly described by Jones, Seiss, and many others, are introduced by this very “regeneration.” Jesus is the first begotten of the dead, and His brethren must first experience the same birth before these promises can be verified. Hence it is very doubtful whether it is a word as far-reaching as the phrase “the restitution of all things ;” for the latter embraces the resurrection, restoration of Kingdom, Paradise, etc.—the bringing back of all things to their original condition or intention—while the latter, at most, can only refer to man and nature, taking the broadest definitions given to it. But with Lange and others, it must be said to be more precious, since it more directly refers to the individual, not simply restored to a forfeited position, but brought into a life most exalted and glorious through resurrection and transforming power, thus fashioning the saint after the pattern presented by Jesus. The phrase “in the regeneration” does not simply allude to the time when the resurrection is experienced, but to the fact that it is an ever-continuing reality—an unchangeable state from the period of its happy realization. It is during this wonderful regenerated life that the Kingdom of God is manifested ; or, as Robison (Gr. N. Test.), “the complete external manifestation of the Messiah’s Kingdom, when all things are to be delivered from their present corruption, and restored to spiritual purity and splendor” shall be seen ; or, as Van Oosterzee (Theol. N. T., p. 123), it shall embrace after the personal Sec. Advent, “the entire renewal of the natural and spiritual creature.” As the regeneration of the Lord Jesus (Col. 1 : 18 ; Rev. 1 : 5 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 20) is separate from, precedes, and yet is connected, with the ultimate renewal of creation itself, so the regeneration of the believers, accounted worthy to obtain this Kingdom, is separate from, precedes, and yet stands related to, the mighty changes which shall transform nature into the Edenic state so rapturously delineated by the prophets.

See Barrow’s Works, Ser. X., on Apostles’ Creed, where he says : “The resurrection of good Christians, after death, to a better state of life, their entering into immortal bliss and glory, is worthily styled ‘regeneration,’ a being generated or born again ; whereby they received from God another more excellent life and state of being, more like and conformable to God, for,” etc., quoting 1 John 3 : 2 ; 1 Cor. 15 : 49 ; 2 Cor. 3 : 18 ; Phil. 3 : 21, etc., as confirmatory. Here it may be proper to say, that “the washing of regeneration," Tit. 3 : 5, the subject of so much controversy, cannot be properly comprehended, unless (whatever its application may be to the present) the baptism or the renewed state of man here is made emblematical or significant of that regeneration which embraces the whole person, body, soul, and spirit, at the resurrection. It is a washing leading to, and productive of, regeneration under certain qualifications. It certainly is significant that Dr. Brown in his Com. on Matt. 19 : 28, refuses to comment on this "regeneration," sending us from one Gospel to another without any result. Was this subject of so little importance as to be unworthy of notice in a professed commentary, or was he afraid of its application, being unable to fit it into his system? His co-laborer, Dr. Fausset, would, undoubtedly, have given us an able comment, for in the same Com. (Dan. 7 : 44) he remarks : "There must be a 'regeneration' of the world, as of the individual, a death previous to a resurrection, a destruction of the world-kingdoms before they arise anew as the kingdoms of Christ" (Matt. 19 : 18) ; and in Rev. 20 : 6, he speaks of "the regeneration of nations," which we make a resultant of, or associated event with, this "regeneration."

PROPOSITION 146.—This Kingdom is associated with the deliverance of creation.

A Theocracy, perfect and extending over the earth, which brings God—the Creator—into the relationship of an earthly Ruler, and exerting His dominion over all, must, in order to exhibit the dignity and value of His rule, and to promote the welfare and happiness of His willing subjects, remove the evils under which man and the creation have been groaning. The Kingdom itself being redemptive in its intent and work, brings deliverance from the curse, however widespread, restores forfeited gifts, and even bestows riches never before conferred upon man or the earth. The Divine-human relationship of the King, who declares that He (Rev. 21 : 5) “will make all things new,” insures all this; while the Divine Purpose, foreshadowed in covenant, prophecy, provisionary dispensations and acts, and, above all, in the bestowal of the King, and qualifying Him (as the promised David’s Son) for the position of Theocratic King, evidences how reasonable and just are the anticipations of such a renewal. The honor and glory of the King and Kingdom, the ability and representations of God to save, are involved in restoring the earth to its Edenic state. The Plan of Redemption, of which this Kingdom forms the culminating agency of affecting and completing, contemplates a return to the condition existing before the fall, and even to that which man would have attained to had he not sinned. Of course, it must then include the renewal of creation.

This suggests an interpretation of Eph. 1 : 14, “until the redemption of the purchased possession,” which the context unmistakably locates in the future, seeing that believers now have the assurance in the bestowment of “the earnest of our inheritance.” The inheritance, with which this “purchased possession” is linked, consists, as we have shown (e.g. Props. 49, 142, etc.), of this earth, which, as numerous promises testify, is to be redeemed or delivered from the curse in “the day of redemption.” The reasoning of the Apostle in Rom. 8, linking this same earnest with the deliverance of creation and the redemption of the body, confirms this view. The idea of Barnes (Com. loci) that “heaven” is denoted, cannot be admitted, simply because heaven is not the promised inheritance, and because heaven needs no redemption or deliverance (or, if stress is laid on the notion of “obtaining or acquiring,” then it must be shown that heaven is the covenanted inheritance). Many commentators make this “purchased possession” to be God’s people, the saints that are to be gathered out, which (Lange, etc.) gives a good and consistent meaning. So MacKnight (Com. loci) makes “purchased people” redeemed from the grave. It evidently refers either to the saints or to the earth, or to both, for these are promised deliverance, and both are the inheritance of the Christ. Fausset (Com. loci) refers this to the saints, and that it includes what is said in Rom. 8 : 21–23 ; 2 Pet. 3 : 13. Impressed with the connection that it sustains with “our inheritance,” we are strongly inclined to apply it exclusively to the earth, which we inherit. Fairbairn (Typology) fully indorses our view, saying : “What can (Eph. 1 : 14) the redemption of the inheritance be but the rescuing of this earth from the manifold ills which, through the instrumentality of Satan, have come to lodge in its bosom—purging its elements of all mischief and disorder—changing it from being the vale of tears and the charnel house of death into a paradise of life and blessing—restoring to man, himself then redeemed, and fitted for the honor, the sceptre of a real dominion over all its fulness—in a word, rendering it in character and design what it was on creation's morn, when the sons of God shouted for joy, and God Himself looked with satisfaction on the goodness and order and beauty which pervaded this portion of His universe."

Obs. 1. One of the striking peculiarities attached to Millennial prophecies describing the establishment of this Kingdom, is, that the land, the earth is represented as participating in the favors of the King; and the joy and happiness of the nations is immeasurably enhanced by their liberal bestowal. This is so clearly and explicitly stated, was so universally received by the early Church, and has been so generally entertained by eminent divines of all denominations, that it needs no special pleading. Even our opponents, who are the most disposed to depart from the grammatical meaning and engraft a spiritual sense, admit that, if those predictions are fulfilled as recorded, they must bring back a Paradise regained. No system of Theology is completed, without, in one form or another, advocating a final restoration of nature. Without detaining ourselves with a feature that is so commonly received, let our attention be directed to several disputed points.

It may be sufficient to cite e.g. one who is well known as an opponent, Dr. Brown. In his more recent Com., Rom. 8, he makes "the creature" (of vs. 19, 20, and 21) to be "the creation," and says: "the creation itself shall, in a glorious sense, be delivered into that freedom from debility and decay in which the children of God, when raised up in glory, shall expatiate; into this freedom from corruptibility the creation itself shall, in a glorious sense, be delivered." (So Calvin, Beza, Bengel, Tholuck, Olshausen, De Wette, Meyer, Philippi, Hodge, Alford, etc.) If for man's sake alone the earth was cursed, it cannot surprise us that it should share in his recovery. And if so, to represent it as sympathizing with man's miseries, and as looking forward to his complete redemption as the period of its own emancipation from its present sin-blighted condition, is a beautiful thought, and in harmony with the general teaching of the Scripture on the subject." Pressense (The Early Days of Chris., p. 286) thus refers to Paul's teaching: "He associates nature herself with the grand consummations of Redemption; he represents her as groaning and travailing in pain for the deliverance of the sons of God (Rom. 8 : 22), and he leads us to anticipate a sort of resurrection of the material world as the abode of glorified humanity." Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 314) makes Rom. 8 to represent "a redeemed and glorified earth," with which many agree; his remarks are forcible and worthy of perusal, as illustrated in the previous note. Lange's Com., Rom. 8, has, under the Doc. and Ethical portion, some striking remarks on the groaning and deliverance of creation.

Obs. 2. Rom. 8 : 19–23 deserves particular consideration, seeing that some (as Barnes, Com. loci) are disposed to make "the creature" refer only to believers (renewed), and not to inanimate and animate creation. Admitting that the word translated "creature" does not distinctively specify creation (although Barnes says it means "creation, the act of creating, Rom. 1 : 20; the creature, that which is created or formed, the universe, Mark 10 : 6; 2 Pet. 3 : 4; Mark 13 : 19; Rom. 1 : 25 and 8 : 39"), or the renewed man (not unless the word "new" is added), it is evident that its meaning in this place ought to be decisively made out by what the Word in other places teaches shall occur at the manifestation of the sons of God, i. e., at or after the resurrection.<sup>1</sup> Now, Barnes himself so freely admits (as e.g. Notes on 2 Pet. 3; Rev. 21, etc.) a renewed creation after the resurrection, that it seems both strange and inconsistent to deny it in this passage. Bloomfield indorses the view that it means "the whole visible creation" (mentioning "ancient and many eminent modern interpreters, especially Luther, Grotius, Cassell, Danhauer, Doddr.,<sup>a</sup> Michael, Knappe, Rosenm., and Carpzov," as holding to it), showing that the word is used in this sense; he opposes the opinion of Hammond, Le Clerc, etc., that it denotes a "moral creation," i.e., "the Christian Church," which "is liable to insuperable objections, which are well stated by Ammon;" he also objects to the interpretation of Whitby and Ammon, which would limit it to "all intelligent and sentient creatures," i.e., "the human race," and presents an important argument when observing that this deliverance must include "such a renovation as the Jews especially supposed would take place in the age of the Messiah." In addition, we would say, that Paul, knowing not only the views of the Jews respecting a restoration of nature, but that of the Romans even concerning the same, if nature was not to be included in this description, he certainly made choice of very imperfect (i.e. by not defining) language. His phraseology, however, is vindicated both by its meaning being in accord with the views thus entertained, and by the fact that the ancients thus interpreted it. The sublimity of the passage, which troubles some so much that they desire to tone it down, is amply sustained by what Paul knew of the events pertaining to the resurrection. Dr. Neander (His. Plant. Ch. Church, vol. 1, p. 523) says that this is connected with the resurrection of the body, and denotes a restoration of nature, adding in a foot-note: "The later distinguished commentators on this epistle have acknowledged this to be the only tenable exposition; and even Usteri, who had before brought forward the strongest objections against it, has been induced, for the same reasons that appear to me convincing, to accede to it." (See his reasons for rejecting the opposite view.) It is surprising that, to make out a theory (wresting the passage from us), men of ability, as those mentioned and others, will restrict the groaning creature to the Gentile world or to the heathen, not seeing that by so doing they represent such (against fact) as earnestly desiring to become Christian—having this feeling constantly—and of being subjected to bondage without blame, etc. Schmid (Bib. Theol. N. T., p. 511) on this part forcibly says: "That 'creature' here refers to the inanimate creation in distinction from men, is clear, if we consider two points; on the one hand, that a contrast to Christians is thus established; and on the other, the 'creature' is not described as a subject burdened by sin, but only as liable to perishableness. Linguistic usage, the predicates, and the connection of the section, are all in favor of this explanation." Probably Schmid's restriction to inanimate nature, thus excluding animals, etc., is limiting its meaning too much; but he is correct in asserting its distinction from man. The "creature" certainly is something distinct from "the sons of God;" and it cannot be "the heathen world," for it has not waited for the manifestation as here represented.<sup>a</sup> Van Oosterzee (Theol. of N. T.) fully indorses our position, and declares that nature looks for redemption. Even Knapp (Chr. Theol., §. 155 II. 2) remarks, "the passage, Rom. 8:19, seq., also treats of this renovation and beautifying of the world." Dr. Hitchcock (Fut. Cond. and Destiny of the Earth), quoting this passage in Romans, remarks: "That Tholuck, the distinguished German theologian, considers this a description of the present bound and fettered condition of all nature, and that the deliverance refers to the future renovation of the earth. Such an exposition chimes in perfectly with the views on this subject, which have long and extensively prevailed in Germany. And it certainly does give a consistent meaning to a passage which has been to commentators a perfect labyrinth of difficulties. If this be not its meaning, then I may safely say that its meaning has not yet been found out." Kurtz (Sac. His., S. 199, 4), expressly applies this Scripture to the removal of the curse entailed upon nature and to the renovation of the earth. These allusions to authorities who find in the passage a direct reference to the renewal of nature could be abundantly multiplied, but these are sufficient to indicate that we do not seek to force such an interpretation upon the text. Writers of the most diverse views and hostile to Millenarianism freely concede this; and they append that it shall only be witnessed at the Advent of Jesus Christ, and after the resurrection of the saints. This, of course, leads us back to examine when this Advent and resurrection take place. Having proven (Props. 121, 125, 119, etc.) that both are Pre-Millennial, there arises at once a beautiful symmetry between a harmonious blending of the Millennial predictions and Paul's declaration, which no other view can give.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Lange's Com. loci, both in the text and notes, gives it "creation," and says: "Lezically, the word may mean the act of creation as well as what is created, the creation; but actually, the question here can only be the creation in the broader or more limited sense." (Riddle in a note well remarks that a limitation of meaning, if intended, must always be derived from the context.) So decisive is the notion of "the creation," that in the New Revision the English version "creature" is stricken out and creation substituted.

<sup>2</sup> Hardly correct as to Doddridge, who rather represents it as "the whole unevangelized world." Doddridge and others, who favor such an exposition, do not see how fatal even such an interpretation is to their Post-Mill. Advent. For, taking their definition for granted, it would then—if logically carried out—prove that this unevangelized world will not be converted until after the manifestation of the Sons of God, i.e. the resurrection. While we believe the latter, we do not derive it from adding such an adjunct to "creature."

<sup>3</sup> See the strong reasoning against Olshausen's too extended application of "the creature" by Kendrick, p. 54, Kendrick's Olshausen Com. on Rom., Sheldon & Co.'s edition. Olshausen justly affirms that even the inanimate creation is meant (as also Steir, Rückert, Reiche, Schneckenburger, Köllner, and others), but includes with it "unregenerate men," etc—"the whole creation"—excluding the regenerated portion which he holds contrasted with the rest. He beautifully and forcibly explains the representation of creation longing, etc., for deliverance, and produces convincing arguments why the word "creature" should not be restricted to "angels," "animals," "the dead," "Christians," "people of Israel," "heathen magistracy," and "heathen world." The only fault with Olshausen, and which Kendrick notices, is, that he extends the meaning too far; and yet we frankly acknowledge that if he is correct, if the passage truly allowed its extension, it would find a counterpart in the fact that, after the resurrection, when this Kingdom is established, the nations of the earth that are spared will find deliverance, etc., through this manifestation. But this, for the present, we find distinctly taught elsewhere.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. West (Cin. Gazette, Feb. 21st, 1879) makes the creature delivered to be this "planet" including "the material earth, the atmospheric heavens, the vegetable kingdom, and the animal kingdom," and says that this was the interpretation of "Irenæus, Justin, Tertullian, Lactantius, Chrysostom, all the Greek Fathers of the Church and most of the Latin, and all the best expositors of the Scripture to-day." "It is the interpretation of the ablest expositors—men like Luther, Calvin, Melancthon, Erasmus, Beza; men like Bengel, Tholuck, Olshausen, De Wette, Philippi, Ewald, Neander, Delitzsch, Meyer, Lechler, Lange, Kurtz, Ellicott, and multitudes whose names alone fill pages." Sirt's First Res., in Appendix, has a good criticism on the word "creature" and its usage—with which compare the extended notice in Lange's Com. loci. The critical student will observe the shades of difference that are expressed by expositors, as e.g. Lange, who makes the "creature" to be "creation," "the whole creation, rational as well as irrational, not yet redeemed, but needing and capable of redemption;" Calvin, Beza, etc., the "inanimate creation;" Koppe, Rosenmüller, etc., "the universe;" Augustine, etc., the "animate creation;" Tholuck, etc., "the material world surrounding man;" Meyer, De Wette, Hodge, Alford, etc., "inanimate and animate nature in contradistinction from humanity" (which last, we give a decided preference). Still all admit the cardinal, fundamental idea, viz., that creation is intended, and a deliverance of the same promised. Lord (Theol. and Lit. Journal, April, 1860) holds that the perpetual desolation of Idumea (Isa. 34) is an impressive exception to this deliverance and renewal of the whole earth, and that this exception is made to impart a forcible reminder of God's vengeance as stated in Isa. 66 : 24, and he thinks this visible burning is alluded to in Rev. 14 : 9-11 and 19 : 19, 20, etc. Others, however, think that the perpetuity is limited to the generations preceding the Millennium, because the usage of "forever," and similar phrases, allows a limitation in certain cases.

Obs. 3. This leads us to consider whether Paul's declaration and the Mill. prophecies, etc., include the deliverance of the animal kingdom. This, as is well known, was the position of the early Church, as is evidenced by their writings, especially Tertullian, Lactantius, and the earlier Fathers—Papias, Barnabas, and Justin. And, in point of fact, it is impossible for a man to be a consistent Millenarian (hence, with scarcely an exception, the long line of eminent men hold to it) without adopting it. The ablest Millenarian writers unhesitatingly give it their support, and the reason is self-evident. Coming to the Bible, resolving to accept of the sense given by the plain grammatical interpretation, they find involved with the description of this re-established Kingdom at the Sec. Advent and with the blessedness and glory of the saints and the living nations such direct and explicit assertions concerning the change of disposition, etc., in the lower creation, that to reject these predictions (or engraft upon them another sense) would be doing violence to their principles of interpretation and to the Book. As this feature of the renovation has caused some to recoil from the entire subject, as if it were dishonorable to the future state and derogatory to Christ, it may be well to notice upon what it is grounded. Some are influenced by the hasty conclusion arrived at by Doddridge, when commenting upon Rom. 8 : 19 ; he says : " To explain it, as chiefly referring to the brutal or inanimate creation, is insufferable ; since the day of the redemption of our bodies will be attended with the conflagration, which will put an end to them." This allusion to Peter's conflagration is to be found in every writer advertent to this point, and is the main proof relied on against it. As the conflagration theory comes up in a following proposition (Props. 149 and 150) to remove another objection, with which this stands associated, we may, for the present, pass it by with the single remark that such a conclusion by no means follows, provided God has declared that it shall be done and that the animals shall share in the deliverance. It is not for us to limit either God's purpose, or wisdom, or ability to perform. Without laying stress on the admitted fact that the curse has fallen upon the animal creation through man, and that perfected Redemption reasonably claims Divine interference in its behalf, which idea Olshausen, Lord, and others have ably advanced, without insisting that the objection is really based upon a spiritualistic conception of the future abode of the saints out of which the materialistic element has been (Gnostic-like) eliminated, it is amply sufficient to rely upon its being promised in the Word. Following our usual plan to allow those who have no special sympathy for our doctrine to speak their sentiments, it will answer to give first the views of others, to show that in their estimation this doctrine is taught. Thus e.g. Dr. Clarke, in his comments (Com. loci) on Ps. 104 : 29, 30, extends the renewal not only to the earth, but includes a resur- rection of animals, arguing that the mention of their death preceding, and then the addition of "Thou sendest forth Thy Spirit, they are created again," clearly teaches this, and refers to Rom. 8 : 19-23. This probably is going farther than Millenarians, who generally are satisfied with simply saying that the animal condition (with that of the earth) will be changed for the better, leaving the resurrection as a matter open to conjecture. Calvin, on Isa. 11 : 6-8, says that the prophet "asserts here the change of the nature of wild beasts and the restitution of creation as at first," and he substantially repeats this, when in Insti., vol. 3, ch. 25, he says, "I expect with Paul a reparation of all the evils caused by sin, for which he represents the creatures as groaning and travailing." John Wesley, in his Ser. on Rev. 21 : 5, decidedly takes this ground, delineates at length the happiness resulting from such deliverance, quotes Paul and the prophets, understands the prophetic delineations literally, having on the new earth all the animals, etc., so changed that "no creature, no beast, bird, or fish will have any inclination to hurt any other; for cruelty will be far away, and savageness and fierceness be forgotten," etc., and emphatically declares : "He that sitteth upon the throne will soon change the face of all things, and give a demonstrative proof to all His creatures, 'that His mercy is over all His works.'" It is difficult to understand Fairbairn's language (Typology, p. 461) otherwise, when (after making the restitution, Acts 3 : 19-21, at Christ's Sec. Advent "everything restored to its pristine condition") he writes : "It is precisely on the same object, a redeemed and glorified earth, that the Apostle Paul, in the 8th of Romans, fixes the minds of believers as the terminating point of their hopes of glory. An incomparable glory is to be revealed in them, and in connection with that, the deliverance of a suffering creation from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God." So also a large class of writers, who expressly affirm that creation is to be brought back to its former "paradisiacal state," cannot be comprehended, unless violence is done to their own statements of what redemption is to accomplish, without receiving such a deliverance of the animals. Luther gave no uncertain sound, when (quoted by Taylor, Voices of the Church, p. 143) he said : "It is written, God will create a new heaven and a new earth wherein righteousness shall dwell. It will be no arid waste, but a beautiful new earth, wherein all the just will dwell together. There will be no carnivorous beasts, or venomous creatures, for all such, like ourselves, will be relieved from the curse of sin, and will be to us as friendly as they were to Adam in Paradise." The frequent assertions of this Reformer<sup>2</sup> and others of the restoration of the earth to the Edenic state, certainly imply such a restitution. Dr. Kurtz (His. of the Old Cov., vol. 1, p. 81) advocates a return to Paradise, saying : "The heavenly Jerusalem in the transformed earth is Paradise renewed, enlarged, transformed and perfected," etc., and (Pref. p. 118) this includes the deliverance of the groaning creation which, he holds, embraces the animal Kingdom, while Isa. 11 : 6-9 he thinks has reference, at least, to the original state of the animal kingdom, or the state it would have been brought to under Adam. How else can we understand the pious Bradford (Letters, 83) saying : "I therefore take the apostle to mean by 'every creature' simply, even the whole shape and creatures of the world." "As everything and all things were made for man, so, by the man Christ, all and everything, both earthly and heavenly, shall be restored." "In our resurrection, all things shall be repaired for eternity, as, from our sin, they were made subject to corruption." "Now every creature travaileth and groaneth with us; but we being restored, they also shall be restored: there shall be new heavens, new earth, and all things new." Such language is too comprehensive to exclude the lower creation. Dr. Charnock (Attributes of God) forcibly remarks: "As the world, for the sin of man, lost its first dignity and was cursed after the fall, and the beauty bestowed on it by creation defaced, so shall it recover that ancient glory, when he shall be fully restored, by the resurrection, to that dignity he lost by his first sin. A man shall be freed from his corruptibility, to receive that glory which is prepared for him, so shall the creatures be freed from that imperfection or corruptibility, those stains and spots upon the face of them, to receive a new glory suited to their nature, and answerable to the design of God, when the 'glorious liberty' of the saints shall be accomplished." "The earth hath borne thorns, and thistles, and venomous beasts; the air hath had its tempest and infectious qualities; the water hath caused its flood and deluges; the creature hath been abused to luxury and intemperance, and been tyrannized over in man, contrary to the end of creation. It is convenient that some time should be allotted for the creature attaining its true end, and that it may partake of the peace of man, as it hath done of the fruits of his sin, which prevailed more than grace," etc. Henry (Com. on Rom. 8:19-23) has "the whole frame of nature," "the whole creation, the compasses of inanimate and sensible creatures" delivered, and adds: "There shall be a glory conferred upon all the creatures, which shall be (in the proportion of their natures) as suitable, and as great an advancement, as the glory of the children of God shall be to them," etc. Tyndale, on Rom. 8:21 affirming that "all creatures descry that day as the time of their rest and perpetual Sabbath;" Gill (Divinity, p. 427, 8) contending that "every degree of that curse should be removed," so that "the new earth will be an earth refined, and renewed, and restored to its paradisiacal estate, as it was before the fall;" Toplady (Ser. B. 3, p. 470) affirming "that a day will dawn when a period shall be put to every disorder under which nature at present labors," etc.; these utterances, and a multitude of a similar nature that could be quoted, can only be reconciled with the deliverance of the animal world. It is to be noticed that many, aside from Millenarians, express themselves not only indirectly but directly in favor of such a restoration, virtually indorsing the interpretation put upon various passages by us. They substantially agree with Delitzsch (Ser. on Rom. 8:18-23 in Ap. to Sys. of Bib. Psychol.) in advocacy of a restitution of the earth—a recreation of nature—a redemption and glorification extending even to the unintelligent creation, so that "then nature, as all the prophets foretell, shall put on her blissful festal attire; and as it has been compelled to share in the sorrows of men, it shall also be a participator in its glory." It is inconceivable how so many with such views of redemption, extending from man down to inanimate nature, should be fearful in plainly stating—what they leave to be inferred—that this necessarily must include the important links existing between man and inanimate nature. As Delitzsch says, the prophets all foretell this, and in a manner that cannot be explained away. Let the reader turn to what Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 281) says of the restoration of the lost "lordship or dominion" over the earth, or, better still, let him refer to Ps. 8, where dominion over the lower creation is expressly stated as one of the prerogatives of man, and then let him see how this is applied to the Second Adam (Heb. 2.), who restores this forfeited dominion, and it is impossible to exclude the lower order of creatures. Let the question be decided in reference to the Pre-Millennial Advent of Jesus and the resurrection of the saints as the Early Church regarded it and as here advocated, and then let Hos. 2 : 18 be considered in the light of parallel passages ; let Isa. 11 : 6-9 ; Ezek 34 : 25 ; Isa. 65 : 25 ; Zech. 14 : 20 ; Isa. 32 : 20, and other allusions be contemplated as occurring in "the new heavens and the new earth" (so Isa. 65) after the Coming of the Lord with all His saints (so Zech. 14), after the smiting of the earth and the slaying of the wicked one (so Isa. 11), and in connection with the restoration of the Jewish nation (so all the prophets); and any other view, with such facts, cannot be entertained. It is true, that a large number, to avoid such a conclusion, make such language figurative, and hence expressive of alleged changes in the nature of man; but such a theory is forced and inconsistent with the laws of figurative language. It is forced; because (1) against their own assertions of the completeness of redemption, etc., they leave the animals out ; (2) to confine this period to the Gospel (as Barnes), and then ask "how the Gospel has any tendency to change the nature of the lion, the bear and the serpent," is to ignore the fact that Jesus Christ is the Restorer, the One who renews things ; (3) to deny this because it involves a physical change (so Barnes, Com., Isa. 11), and yet affirm, as in other places, physical changes in man and inanimate nature at the consummation, involves lack of faith in God's ability to perform what He has promised ; (4) it transposes the predictions, making a past and present fulfilment, as e.g. the new heavens and new earth of Isa. 65 (under which this is to take place), continuously existing from the First Advent ; (5) it is forced by the inability to show (against the facts of history) a consistent fulfilment of their own figurative sense (in its relation to the predictions as a whole), to shield itself under the expectation of a still future spiritual fulfilment, ample enough to cover the application made, without informing us how this is possible to be reconciled with the delineation of this dispensation down to the very Advent of Christ ; (6) the theory does not regard the predictions as clearly distinguishing between man and the lower orders, for they are represented as separate, and distinct, and, owing to the change wrought in the latter, the former attain security, etc. (7) But it is also opposed to the laws of figurative language when strictly applied, for instead of there being a metaphor used, as supposed, it is literal language, seeing that nothing is attributed to this lower creation but what is naturally applicable to them. The only exception is that of the lion eating "straw, like the ox," which evidently is an expressed simile or comparison (not a metaphor which implies it in thought), and teaches that at this period so great will be the power of restoration, that the lion will live according to the change of nature then introduced.* To discredit this on the ground of impossibility, is to limit the Almighty energy of the Restorer ; to receive it only as metaphorical language, is to overlook the simple comparison instituted ; to accept of the whole as figurative, is to forget that the actions, etc., ascribed to the animals, are such as are strictly accordant with their nature as it once must have been exhibited in the Edenic state, and that a restoration affected by God must, in the nature of the case, present just such characteristics, and that, therefore, the things predicated of these creatures, instead of conveying an absurdity, correspond with the comprehensiveness of the Plan of Redemption. Indeed, admitting this, we find it throwing increased light upon otherwise imperfectly understood passages of Scripture, as e.g. Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem when He rode upon an animal "whereon never man sat" (the words of Jesus and recorded by two evangelists, Mark and Luke). Surely, this has a deeper significance than to prove Christ's power over animals; for taking the analogy of faith, seeing what dominion is predicted of Him, regarding this entry as typical of the one to come, it points us back to the dominion ascribed to Him in Ps. 8 and the prophets—of which the subjection of an untrained animal is a feeble emblem—and then forward to the glorious future when all creatures shall experience the wonderful Will and Pleasure of the same King. Besides this, before the reader comes to a conclusion upon this particular point, let him first pass over the argument respecting the Kingdom; for if the Kingdom of the Messiah is that which we derive from Covenant and Prophecy, from His own words and that of His commissioned preachers, if it contains the restored Jewish nation and the spared Gentile nations, then, indeed, it would be both inconsistent and absurd to have such a Kingdom existing without the presence of the lower creation.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Hence, do not see why Lange quotes him (Com. loci) as sustaining the notion only of "the inanimate creation." So also Beza used language which cannot be thus confined.

<sup>2</sup> Luther's expressions are so terse, Luther-like, that we append another illustration (Muerer's Life of Luther, p. 572): As his little dog was begging for food, some one asked whether irrational animals would be in the world to come, and he replied: "Assuredly, for the new heaven and earth will not be desolate and waste, but filled with beautiful creatures."

<sup>3</sup> For a discussion of the laws relating to figurative language, see various writings on the subject, as e.g. in Lord's Lit. and Theol. Journal, Lord's work On the Laws of Figurative Language, Winthrop's Premium Essay on Proph. Symbols, Sirr's First Resurrection, Brookes's El. of Proph. Interp., Bickersteth's Pract. Guide to the Proph., etc. As it is not part of our purpose to discuss those laws, we may only say, that these writers clearly show that a metaphor strictly taken ascribes something to a creature which it has not the power of performing, and to inanimate objects, acts which only living agents can do, as e.g. the man flies, the clouds fly, the sky frowns, the tempest howls, "he is the pillar of state," the ship flies, etc. The fact, too, is to be noticed that the persons and things to which the metaphor is applied are not to be treated as part of the metaphor itself. Other forms may exist, but to prove their metaphorical character it must be shown that the metaphor—if correct—does not include the whole sentence, but part of it only, and the part which is metaphorical ought to be clearly distinguished from the remainder. But in the prophecies under consideration, our opponents make no such distinctions, but freely appropriate the whole as metaphorical, making creatures, and that which is said of them, figures of speech. We only contend that the very naturalness of the predictions presented, is so much in our favor for understanding them literally, conveying thus the idea of a peaceful, blessed change.

<sup>4</sup> The critical student is reminded (comp. art. "Sabbath and Jubilee Year," in Herzog's Cyclop.) that two ideas in connection with the typical nature of the Sabbath and jubilee (prop. 143) enforce this doctrine of the deliverance of creation: (1) the land itself and the creature upon it was to participate in this Sabbath rest; if so in the type, how much more in the antitype; (2) the type was based on the Divine ownership and Theocratic relationship; if so, how much more largely will this be exhibited in the antitype where this feature is more fully manifested. If the Ark is to be taken as a type of Christ (which many theologians allow and assert), then as the animals were taken in it and preserved (as well as man), so likewise, in reference to perpetuity, will animals find deliverance through Christ, for otherwise the typical nature is not carried to its related extent in the antitype. So strong are the reasons favoring such a deliverance, that commentators the most largely addicted to spiritualize the prophecies and promises still concede it, as we have shown by our quotations. Even Scott (Com., Rom. 8) advocates the deliverance of "the whole visible creation," and while rejecting the idea of "an individual resurrection of all or any of the animals," he still contends that their suffering is "transient," since the passage teaches that at the period of man's resurrection they also shall be delivered from their "bondage." When considering such passages as 2 Kings 6:17 and 2:11, it only serves to confirm the idea that the animal creation will be allied with the renewed earth. Fausset (Com., Isa. 11 : 6) remarks : " These may be figures of men of corresponding animal-like character. Still a literal change in the relations of animals to man and each other, restoring the state of Eden, is a more likely interpretation. Cf. Gen. 2 : 19, 20 with Ps. 8 : 6-8, which describes the restoration to man, in the person of ' the Son of man,' of the lost dominion over the animal kingdom of which he has been designed to be the merciful viceroy under God, for the good of His animal subjects, Rom. 8 : 19-22." Dr. Seiss (The Last Times, p. 226) says : " When God made man, He said to him, ' Have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth.' This dominion Adam lost. The rebellion of the soul against God brought with it the rebellion of the flesh against the spirit, and of nature against the entire man. Discords, antipathies, and a thousand evils ensued. Christ is the Second Adam, and by subverting the empire of Satan He regains the dominion which Adam lost and carries His redemption as far as the consequences of the fall have reached." Bickersteth (Pract. Guide, p. 218) : " The blessedness of the Kingdom of God terminates not merely in the glorified saints being happy in their own glory and the vision of the Lord ; the whole earth, after those purifying judgments which shall come upon it, has the deepest interest in it. It is sublimely represented as now waiting for it with earnest longing, Rom. 8 : 19-23. In this passage there is a clear distinction between a blessedness to be given in the manifestation of the sons of God, and another blessing in the deliverance of the creation at large from the bondage of corruption." Brookes (Marantha, p. 214) exhibits a cardinal doctrine of Millenarianism as follows : " All the departments of nature, involved in the consequences of the first man's shameful defeat, must exhibit the fruits of the second man's magnificent victory." Graff (Graybeard's Lay Sermons, No. 35), referring to the reign of Christ, adds : " Even the natural ferocity of the brute creation will be subdued into gentleness during that age of abounding plenty and restrained evil." Numerous quotations of a similar nature might be given, but we conclude by saying : It is not necessary in adopting this view of an ultimate deliverance of creation to indorse the idea of a resurrection (Clarke, Wesley, etc.) or of continued existence after death, owing to immateriality and immortality (comp. Agassiz's Essay on Classification, pp. 97-99 ; Fiske's Myths and Mythmakers, p. 231 ; Fallister's Thoughts upon the Immaterial Spirit of the Brute Creation ; Wood's Man and Beast, Here and Hereafter ; Cook's Lectures on Biology, Lect. 9 ; Bh. Butler's Analogy, etc.), the view that at the Sec. Advent the creation, as then existing, is delivered, being amply sufficient to cover the promises. It is interesting to observe Huxley's (Are Animals Automotons ? Pop. Sci. Monthly, Oct., 1874) references to Augustine, Calvin, Edwards, Leibnitz, Malebranche, Hartley, Bonnet, Locke, etc., as well as the remarks of Tyndall, Hazard, Lindsay, etc., in this direction.

Obs. 4. As the curse is to be repealed, it is necessary to go back to the record in Genesis to ascertain its extent, and from this deduce what the deliverance will affect. Our opponents, admitting the literalness of the curse (as witnessed to-day) in nearly all its aspects, admit, in consequence, nearly all that is requisite to form the restitution or removal of the curse, as e.g. that relating to the earth and man. But two parts of the curse are set aside and for which no reparation is looked for or deemed necessary, viz., the perpetuation of the race in a fallen instead of an unfallen condition, (and the suffering attendant to it), and the enmity existing between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. The former will be considered in a following proposition (Prop. 152) ; the latter may as well be contemplated under our present one. This becomes the more important, since writers of ability (as Fairbairn, On Proph., p. 85-88) attempt to invalidate our fundamental grammatical interpretation by appealing to this curse, and asserting that a construction of it, in accordance with the usual laws of language, would invalidate our entire interpretation of prophecy, etc. It is a fact that too many, overlooking that history proper (i.e. in its more detailed statements) begins with Abraham, make too much of the introductory to history, and must needs find the Redemptive process fully contained in the curse itself. That is scarcely the place to find it ; and, what is remarkable, finding it in a very obscure allusion and nowhere else, they themselves admit that, as the sacrifices indicate and the piety of those ancients show, etc., they must have received communications not recorded. Precisely so; and the simple fact follows, that the briefest of epitomes is given—just sufficient—in order to understand the relationship that Abraham sustains to those gone before and to those coming after. But to return to the record: the very writers who bring in the objection that Gen. 3 : 15 (“And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel”) can only be understood spiritually, viz., of Christ—the seed—bruising or destroying Satan—theyself admit a literal Eden, a literal fall, that Eve spoke of a literal serpent (v. 13, whatever the influence upon the serpent may have been), a literal curse upon the serpent, a literal curse upon the woman and man, and a literal curse upon the earth. The only exception to be found in the narrative is the enmity; nothing else is spiritualized, neither the grovelling position of the serpent, nor the sorrowful parturition of the woman, nor the toil and corruption of man, nor the thorns and thistles of earth. The enmity, however, is part of the curse and cannot, without violence, be separated from it. The serpent as a bodied being (not merely as an external agent) is cursed; and it is said to him that such enmity should continue to exist between him and the woman, and his seed, and the woman’s seed, and that he should constantly feel and experience man’s superiority in the injury mutually inflicted. The degradation and enmity followed—it has been realized thousands of years—and as every other portion of the curse is repealed, it is not surprising to find that, in the prophecies just noticed (Obs. 3), this very enmity is predicted to come to an end, so that the most unprotected of that woman’s seed (even “the sucking child” and “the weaned child”) shall be perfectly safe in the company of the serpent. The curse thus understood finds its mate (and hence the proof of the correctness of our position) in the removal of the same. Whatever agency (Comp. Martensen’s Dog.) may have been in the background, one thing is certain, that the woman did not refer to it, and there is no just reason for believing that God has such reference in the curse. And, as Dr. Lord (Theol. and Lit. Journal for Jan., 1857) aptly remarks in his reply to Fairbairn: “The punishment of the seed of the serpent is a wholly dissimilar thing from the redemption of the seed of the woman. They present a contrast, not a similitude. The one has no suitability to indicate the other, nor is one necessarily or naturally involved in and a consequence of the other.” It would be difficult, indeed, to show in what the adaptation to represent redemption consists, and this difficulty must have been greater to Adam than to us. A writer (H. A. R. Proph. Times, Aug., 1869) has well expressed this: “Must not the words have been to him a densely dark enigma? An enigma, in its obscurity and mystery, calculated to increase, rather than relieve, his perplexity. Read the words—placing yourself as much as possible in Adam’s position when they were delivered—and find from them alone, if you can, any consolation for the smitten hearts of the disconsolate pair!” Before such an application of the passage is made by Fairbairn and others, it must first be proven: (1) that Satan is the one that is cursed in the serpent in verse 14; (2) that the pronouns in verse 15, being connected by the copulative “and” with the preceding, do not relate to the same serpent doomed to go upon his belly; (3) that the seed of the same serpent cursed are “wicked men" and that the seed of the woman are only "righteous persons;" (4) or, that if the seed of the woman is limited to one person, the seed of the serpent, expressed in the same way, is not also to be thus determined; (5) that when the curse was pronounced upon the serpent's seed, it was virtually a curse proclaimed upon a portion of the woman's seed; (6) that if the wicked are called "children of the devil," etc., in view of this passage (and not because of their adopting, etc., his spirit), then the righteous should be called "the children of the woman," because of the enmity between the two seeds; (7) that if the grammatical sense is not allowable in the 15th verse, why it should be tolerated in the preceding and following verses; (8) that the literal fulfilment of the curse in the woman, man, earth, and serpent should have no influence in deciding the literalness of a fact, viz., the enmity existing between the serpent tribe and man, also evidenced by actual fulfilment. The truth is, that, without denying that the serpent may have been controlled by external agency (for that forms another and different subject), the more we depart from the plain grammatical sense, the greater the difficulties pertaining to the passage, while the nearer we keep to its literal meaning, the easier we make it of solution. We find it as a curse; as a curse we actually see it entailed; and as a curse we find that it shall ultimately be removed; and God's Word and honor is more completely vindicated in observing this connection, which the words do bear, than to seek for an inferential, symbolic, or spiritual meaning which, perforce, they must contain.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Viz., by holding up the absurdity of what he is pleased to call "a bald and naked literalism," which would be "at variance with the character of God," so that "the simply literal for prophecy will not do at the very outset" (although he afterward makes this a plea in behalf of the First Advent of Christ), and that we who hold to such conclusions "are not to be reasoned with, but must be held naturally or morally incompetent to deal with matters of such a kind." The reader feels at once that Genesis is approached by Fairbairn with a preconceived opinion; that it is prejudged before examined, and precisely on the same principle adopted by unbelievers, viz., upon what he may regard proper and right for God to say and do in the matter; and then gives the sense which best suits his ideas of God's character and doings. He may, indeed, have been unaware of the spirit thus openly manifested—for he is a writer that we esteem—but it nevertheless exhibits itself, as various criticisms from different sources have agreed in pointing out, and as the few sentences just repeated abundantly evidence.

Obs. 5. Without pressing this subject into details (which are not given), we ought to be content with the general statements made concerning the deliverance of creation, which are sufficiently extended in their nature to indicate a completeness of Redemption, reaching to a restoration of all the forfeited blessings.<sup>1</sup> To extend this deliverance to the whole universe, as Origen and some moderns, is to extend it beyond the bounds of the prevailing curse; to confine it to "inanimate creation," as Theophylact and others, is to leave the curse unrepealed upon an important member of creation; to limit it to "humanity," as Augustine, or, to "Gentiles," as

Locke, or, to "the Jewish people," as Cramer, or, to "Gentile Christians," as Clericus, or, to "Jewish Christians," as Gockel, or, to "renewed believers," as Barnes, etc., is both to circumscribe the promise of restitution and the actual removal of the curse, leaving out that element of universality commensurate with the extent of the fall. Only two opinions can be held—consistent with the Plan of Redemption and promise—on this subject. One, to which we have given our adhesion, so far as Rom. 8 : 19-23 alone is concerned, is that "inanimate and animate nature in contradistinction from humanity" (so Lange states, as held by Irenæus, Grotius, Calovius, Neander, Meyer, De Wette; Hodge, Alford, etc., on Rom. 8 : 19-23) is denoted. But if confined to this alone, it would do injustice to our real doctrine and to the sentiments of some of those quoted, who, with us, hold that this only expresses the meaning of Paul in Rom. 8, where the deliverance of believers is said to be connected with that of creation (as explained), while in other places the deliverance of the race—humanity as such—is also specifically taught. Hence, it has been intimated (foot-note under Obs. 2) that we can cordially accept of the opinion advocated by Lange (Com., Rom. 8), that in this rescue of "the creature" is denoted, "the whole creation, rational as well as irrational, not yet redeemed, but needing and capable of redemption;" incorporating Riddle's remark: "The limitation to creation, as capable of redemption, implies that only so much of creation as is linked with the fall of man, and subject to the curse, should be included." Now, the curse has fallen upon the race, and all nations experience its sad consequences, but our doctrine of the Kingdom explicitly teaches that after the manifestation or the resurrection of the sons of God, the race, the nations, both Jewish and Gentile, shall be delivered from the heavy pressure of the curse (Prop. 152). Therefore, it is that this view not only harmonizes with our doctrine, but the latter serves to explain how and when it is most fully realized. If it should be thought essential not to exclude humanity and yet preserve the distinction between present renewed humanity and creation (Rom. 8), our doctrine of the Kingdom unmistakably does this, showing that humanity, as it now exists, cannot possibly hope for the deliverance—predicted by the prophets—until the firstfruits of believers receive the redemption of the body. Our doctrine thus even fortifies the opinion of Lange and others, and most forcibly confirms the rendering: "Into the freedom of the glory" (instead of "glorious liberty" of E. V.) "of the children of God," seeing that when the sons of God are manifested in the glory of their rulership, etc., the nations themselves are represented as sharing in the blessings resulting from the same.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Lange (Com., Rom. 8, doct. remarks on v. 18-27, 5.) (2) makes some judicious remarks, suggesting "a return of nature to collective fundamental types," "the preponderance of constant existence over an excited growth," the revival of pure forms, "the negation of parasites," "the reflexive formation of the morbid form of death in original, ideal forms," and "the absolute connection of the creature thus idealized with man, and its appropriation by man." So little has been given respecting the changes then introduced, that we can only conjecture concerning them. The reader will see from our position that we are not prepared to go as far as Clarke, Wesley and others suggestive of a resurrection of animals (neither denying nor affirming concerning it), for as the deliverance of inanimate creation does not demand a restitution of all vegetable life, etc., and as the deliverance of the race (as we shall show hereafter) does not require that all of the past race (excepting believers) should participate in it, so the removal of the curse from animal life does not positively require the resurrection of the dead. Comp. Alford, Bengel, etc., on this passage.

<sup>3</sup> The student is cautioned not to limit this deliverance to the Sec. Advent and resurrection of the saints, or even to the Mill. age. It is true that then an astounding deliverance, a mighty and glorious change is witnessed, so that that period is pre-eminently set before us as the beginning of restitution, a work (as shown before) which runs through the Millennium and finds its ultimate completion in the ages following—for after the thousand years and little season has expired, we find the earth giving up its remaining dead, and “death and hell (Hades, Rev. 20 : 14) were cast into the lake of fire” i.e. are removed from the earth, utterly destroyed ; thus introducing a new order of things, an advancement or progress in which these no longer exist. This whole subject shows how unjustly those (as e.g. Fiske in The Christ of Dogma, p. 111, in The Unseen World) judge Paul, who make him to teach “the end of the world,” a doctrine—however a favorite with some moderns—the most remote from his expressed views. It may be added that the line of Paul’s reasoning, the mention of the creature subjected to vanity and the bondage of corruption, the promise of deliverance from the same, leads us at once to consider the fall and its results as detailed by the Scriptures and experienced by man, and then the Plan of recovery through the Saviour provided, a recovery which promises a complete restitution. If this is done, it inevitably brings us to the conclusions drawn by Paul as a logical sequence, fortified as it is by the early Church belief, a faith evidently drawn from apostolic teaching. Barbour (Worlds, p. 45), to favor his theory of restitution, makes “the creature” of Rom. 8 to be the same as that of Mark 16 : 15 i.e. men in the flesh. But eminent critics include the material creation in Mark, as e.g. Sirr (First Res., Ap. p. 151) renders it : “Going into the whole world announce the glad tidings for the whole creation” (and e.g. Col. 1 : 23 in or “through the whole creation under heaven,” as it was not preached to every individual). So Nast (Com. loci) “to the whole creation,” and points out that Steir makes “creation becoming an actual partaker of redemption, having been through man’s fall subjected (Rom. 8 : 19-23) to vanity and corruption ;” that Bengel makes it applicable as wide as the curse extended to men, the brute creation, and all nature, in brief, “all that needs restoration ;” that the Berlemburg Bible sums it up : “The entire Gospel refers to the relation of the creature to God ; helping it to find its Creator again and its eternal good.” Lange comments : “The renewal or restoration of the world through the Gospel is a promise that pervades the whole Scriptures (comp. Deut. 28 ; Isa. 11 and 65 : 17 ; Rom. 8 ; Rev. 21), and in our text this promise receives the confirmation and sanction of Christ.” “The idea of a universal palingenesis we find clearly intimated by the Apostle Peter (Acts 2 : 20 and 3 : 20, 21 ; 2 Pet. 1 : 4, and 3 : 13).” In view, therefore, of the Gospel containing the glad tidings of deliverance, not only to man, but to the burdened creation, we certainly should be guarded lest we limit its meaning in our interpretations. The personification of even inanimate creation can certainly form no objection to the intelligent reader, after the numerous examples recorded of the same in Scripture, as e.g. in the land, corn, wine, oil and beasts in Joel 1 : 10-20 ; comp. Jer. 12 : 4 ; Isa. 24 : 4-7 ; 13 : 13 ; 33 : 9 ; 34 : 4, etc. Dr. Cumming (The Great Tribulation, p. 29), taking this scriptural view of restitution, eloquently says : “All that God has made, from the star in the sky to the flower upon the field, from the ephemeral insect in the sunbeam to the archangel that worships by the throne, all shall be retained ; what has gone wrong shall be made right, what Satan has usurped shall be taken from his grasp ; and this weary world of ours, that has wept, and groaned, and suffered so long, shall be emancipated from its thralldom, reinstated in more than its pristine magnificence and beauty, and the world close with a Paradise vastly more magnificent and beautiful than that with which it began.” Dr. Nägelsbach (Lange’s Com. Isa. p. 695), in delineating the new heavens and new earth, adds : “There will be a renovation even of the animal world. It will be in harmony with the spirit of peace and love, which will prevail in the entire new creation.”

Obs. 6. In view of the Supernatural being wonderfully exerted in this deliverance, two remarks may be appended : First, in the study of this subject the reader ought to keep in view a fact already evidenced in creation, preservation, Incarnation, etc., viz., that the Supernatural harmonizes itself with the natural. This will curb that extravagance of expression respecting the future Supernatural (i.e. making all such), and will restrain the undue depreciation of the natural (i.e. removing it as if it were, as Gnosticism taught, sinful, etc.). Second, that this deliverance, running like a golden thread through the whole Word, and interwoven as it is with Millennial descriptions, portraying an Edenic state in which the nations of the earth shall immeasurably rejoice, confirms the position that we have taken concerning the church. Fighting, struggling, suffering, witnessing, etc., the Church, instead of experiencing the promised deliverance, looks forward to the day when her believing and faithful sons and daughters shall be manifested, and then her groanings and desires, now constantly arising—pressed out by the curse—shall give place to joy and realization. Any other view is an undue exalting of the Church in its present state, over against existing facts, at the expense of the precious and oath-covered promises of God.

If the reader desires to see how Rom. 8 : 20-22 can be spiritualized and its fulfilment be attributed to causes now at work (as e.g. the union of Science and Religion, education, etc.), he will find it in Beecher's sermon on this text, entitled "The whole world in pain" (Ch. Union, Jan. 30th, 1878). He remarks of our view : "The Second Adventists—honorable, noble men, than whom there are no better—hold that until the personal reign of Jesus Christ is ushered in, it makes but little difference what they do. They hold that all that can be done is to crutch up this world until the Saviour comes, when, by His influence and power He will put an end to all wickedness, and introduce righteousness everywhere." Beecher's view is eloquently expressed, but is contradicted by the plain grammatical sense which entails a curse, a bondage which man, with all the resources of nature, religion, etc., is utterly unable to remove, and which awaits (e.g. Acts 3 : 20, 21, comp. Prop. 144) the return of Jesus, who alone can (Rev. 21 : 5) "make all things new." He fails to inform us how the expedients proposed by him can lift the entailed curse from the creation, when even the most pious and devoted servants of God experience, with tears and sorrow, its continued and prevailing force. We may repeat Dr. Dörner's (Person of Christ, vol. 1, p. 412) pregnant declaration : "Complete victory Christianity never can be, until nature has become an organ of its service, a willing instrument of the perfect man, that is, of the righteous who are raised from the dead." (Comp. Prop. 120.) It is a matter of regret that liberal Jews, accepting of the unbelief of the destructive schools, deny—over against the testimony of their own prophets—this deliverance. Thus e.g. The Amer. Israelite (May 30th, 1879, Dr. Wise, editor) declares : "The Old Test. states nowhere that this physical world will ever undergo a radical change. There is wonderful stability in the laws of nature without the least indication that this planet is to undergo a serious revolution in the next million of years." Alas! what faith this expresses in the promises of God given to Jewish forefathers! Such writers fall under the scriptural category of being "willingly ignorant."

PROPOSITION 147. This Kingdom is preceded by a wonderful shaking of the heavens and earth.

The student who has followed our argument will at once anticipate such a result, for the Kingdom, in its Theocratic aspect, with its design and connections (e.g. restored Jewish nation), cannot possibly be erected here on earth without a fearful commotion, the most terrible convulsions among the nations, in which nature itself is represented as partaking. The Millennial descriptions are introduced by this preparatory shaking, and every prophet, more or less, has portrayed its dreadful nature. It is sufficient to direct attention to two passages, which clearly announce it. Hag. 2 : 6, 7, "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts ; Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land ; and I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come : and I will fill this house with glory," etc. Heb. 12 : 26, 27, 28, "Whose (God's) voice then (at Mt. Sinai) shook the earth : but now He hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven. And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain. Wherefore we receiving a Kingdom which cannot be moved, let us," etc. Two facts locate the fulfilment of these passages in the future, viz., (1) that before and at the First Advent there was no such shaking, for universal peace (Kurtz's Sac. His., p. 273) existed when Jesus came, and (2) that Paul in Hebrew speaks of this shaking, not as past, but as future.

Obs. 1. Unfortunately with the rejection of the doctrine of the Kingdom, many writers, not knowing what else to do with the passages quoted, apply them to the First Advent, thus forsaking the Early Church view which understood them to refer to the future Advent.<sup>1</sup> Notwithstanding this application, others who have but little sympathy with our doctrine, still regard them as related to the future. Thus, e.g. Storr (Diss. on Kingdom of Heaven) affirms that this shaking of the heavens and earth is yet to be fulfilled, and suggests that the apostle, in Heb. 12 : 25, does not quote from Haggai but from some saying of Christ's uttered respecting the Kingdom of God (probably based on the prophet), and not recorded. Gildas (A. D. 546) renders Haggai as follows : "Thus, saith our Lord, I will once move the heaven, and earth, and sea, and dry land, and I will drive away the thrones of kings, and root out the power of the kings of the Gentiles, and I will chase away the chariots of those who mount upon them." The reader will see that Gildas properly identifies Hag. 2 : 22 as explanatory of the other passage, and incorporates it, and thus, instead of applying the prophet's language to an overthrow of the Jewish polity, etc. (as now so current, although the civil polity was overthrown at First Advent), assigns it to a complete downfall of Gentile domination, thus making it accord with numerous predictions. Augustine (City of God, B. 18, Ch. 35) says that Hag. 2 : 6 is partly fulfilled, but will only be fully accomplished "at His last Coming." (Gilfillan, in Christianity and our Era, adopts this double fulfilment.) Numerous opinions of this kind might be quoted, but these are sufficient to indicate how, in the light of prophecies which all admit are still future and pertain to the period of the Sec. Coming, it is impossible for some of those, who adopt the Church-Kingdom view, to confine these passages to the First Advent. Indeed, let any one dispassionately consider what really occurred at the First Advent, then what is here predicted, and finally what a shaking of the heavens and earth, of nations, etc., is still described as future, as e.g. under the last vial, Rev. 16 : 18-21 ; at the conflagration, 2 Pet. 3 ; at the time of the confederation, Rev. 19 ; Joel, 3, etc., and it seems strange that believers in the Word should be so reluctant to acknowledge this shaking to be still future, when they freely locate the predictions mentioned, which include just such a shaking, at a time which is yet to come. The reason is apparent: the theory adopted respecting the Judgment and Judgment Day makes such an interpretation antagonistic to their expressed views, for they cannot reconcile with their theory the Coming of the Desire of all nations, the filling of the house with glory and making the glory of this latter house greater than that of the former, bestowing peace, etc. All these things are opposed to their notions of the ending of time, the winding up of sublunary things, etc., and hence, whether it fits or not, all these things must be engrafted in some way upon the First Advent. Our doctrine is not thus trammelled. The re-established Theocracy under David's Son introduces the Desire of all nations, bestows peace and prosperity, brings a glory to the Davidic and Lord's house transcendently greater than the world has ever yet witnessed.* But this can never be realized without the most extraordinary revolutions, the most unprecedented changes and convulsions, which are characterized as "a shaking of the heavens and earth." Jesus (Matt. 24 : 29 ; Mark 13 : 25 ; Luke 21 : 26), in accord with the general tenor of prophecy, predicts that "the powers of the heavens shall be shaken," which is linked with "distress of nations," "mourning of the tribes of the earth," "men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth," and "the Coming of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven." The reader will notice that Barnes (Com. loci) and many others, who, against a comparison of these predictions, apply this shaking to the Roman army destroying Jerusalem, etc., fully admit that it also refers to the period of the Second Advent. This shaking, too, as the connection shows, is for purposes of overthrow, utter destruction, and radical change ; it is preliminary to the setting up of a Kingdom that cannot be moved, i.e. everlasting, ever-enduring. It is a shaking of Gentile domination (Hag. 2 : 21, 22) to its complete removal, making place for the incoming Kingdom of Jesus. It is a shaking similar to the shaking of the Babylonian heavens and earth mentioned by Isaiah (13 : 13). It is that shaking of the heavens and earth (Joel 3 : 16) preceding the dwelling again of God in Jerusalem and the Millennial glory. It is that terrible shaking of the earth described by the prophet (Isa. 2 : 19, 21), when the glory of the Lord's Majesty shall appear. It includes that "great shaking in the land of Israel," when God shall destroy the enemies and restore the Jewish nation to their own land, thus magnifying Himself in the eyes of many nations.

<sup>1</sup> Thus e.g. the Exp. of Macknight (On the Epis. loci) is very defective (being evidently forced to seek a meaning to suit his theory of the future), and the peroration of v. 28 seems to us a mere parody of Scripture, thus paraphrased: "Wherefore we, the disciples of God's Son, having in the Gospel dispensation received the Kingdom foretold by Daniel to be given to the saints, and which is never to be shaken, let us," etc. How an interpreter can possibly locate Daniel's Kingdom here (at First Advent), when the prophecy expressly limits it after the destruction of the hostile powers, etc.; and how, under the terrible persecution, trials, etc., of the Church, he can profess this to be a fulfilment of Daniel, is beyond our comprehension. The same remarks are applicable to Barnes and nearly all the spiritualistic commentaries. On the other hand, valuable commentaries and writers return to the early Church view, as the only one consistent with Scripture. Thus e.g. Lange's Com. loci correctly refers this shaking to the closing period of this age (Mic. 7:15; Hab. 3; Hag. 2), and adds: "The shaking refers not to any convulsions accompanying the entrance of Christianity into the world (Coccei., a Lapid., Böhm, Klee, etc.), but to the final consummation" (Theodoret Theoph., Erasmus, Bez., Bleek, Thol., etc.). In favor of the latter, Bengel, Hofmann, Delitzsch, Van Oosterzee, Alford, etc. Some, as Fanaset (Com. Hag. 2), make a double or continued fulfilment: "The shaking began introductory to the First Advent; it will be finished at the Second. Concerning the former, Cf. Matt. 3:17; 27:51; 28:2; Acts 2:2; 4:31; concerning the latter, Matt. 24:7; Rev. 16:20; 18:20; 20:11."

<sup>2</sup> Luther (Michelet's Life, Tischreden, etc.) evidently referred this shaking to the future, when in the general consternation produced by the Turkish invasion he said, "they (the Turks) must needs come and give us the promised shaking." For his view of the Voice of Jesus causing this shaking at Sec. Advent, see Meurer's Life of Luther, p. 573-74, etc.

<sup>3</sup> The student need not be reminded that the expression of Haggai "and the desire of all nations shall come" is variously interpreted. It is admitted to be a difficult passage. The original, many critics inform us, cannot well be applied to a person. Hence, other translations are offered as "desirable things" denoting either presents brought by the nations, or the things desired by the nations. The Vulgate has it, "and that which is desired shall come to all nations," or as others "the desired One shall come to all nations," or as others, "the desired things shall come to all nations." Dr. Clarke, Com. loci, advocates "desirable things," that the nations will bring them, viz., the silver and gold mentioned in the next verse, and this would then accord with several Mill. predictions, where the kings and nations bring presents, etc. Dr. Clarke pointedly says: "I cannot see how the words can apply to Jesus Christ." If this is so, it would materially strengthen its non-application to the First Advent. As to the glory of the latter house, this can be readily applied to the Messianic Kingdom in which "the desolate house" shall be rebuilt with a magnificence (see Isa. 60, etc.) superior to the former. It must be borne in mind that in the Spirit's estimation the temple is associated with the Theocratic arrangement, it being erected before the Theocracy was overthrown, and it being the chosen place where God Himself dwelt as the nation's Ruler, associated with the Davidic Kingdom, and that it will be again rebuilt and form a latter house. Many who do not entertain our doctrine make the phraseology apply to "the Kingdom of Christ." Comp. Isa. 2; Micah 4, as given e.g. under Prop. 170.

Obs. 2. One of the best dissertations on this subject is that given by Dr. Owen in a sermon. After refuting the interpretation of Rollocus, Piscator, etc. (who make earth the inhabitants and heaven the angels, which men and angels were shaken with amazement, etc., at events of First Advent and preaching of the Gospel), by showing that the shaking was not yet accomplished when the apostle spoke, that it must exceed all former shakings, and that the things shaken are removed; after rebutting the opinion of Junius and many Commentators (viz., that heaven and earth denote the material parts of the world, etc., and the shaking comprised the signs, prodigies, darkness, earthquake, opening of graves, etc., attending Christ's birth and death) by similar objections, he then refers to the view of Pareus, Grotius, etc., that this has reference to the dissolution of the heavens and earth at the last day, but argues that the things shaken are to be removed that the Kingdom of Jesus may be established, and pertinently inquires, taking such a sense as the ending of all sublunary things, what hindrance the material earth and heaven are to such an establishment, and concludes that the Kingdom will not be brought in until after the Sec. Advent or the judgment.<sup>1</sup> He then enters into an interesting discussion, appealing to Hag. 2 : 6, 7, saying that "I will shake the heavens and the earth" and "I will shake all nations" is a pleonasm for "I will shake the heavens and the earth of all nations—making the "heavens of the nations" the political heights and glory, forms of government, etc., while the nations' earth is the multitude of their people, their strength and power, whereby the heavens are supported." Owen's argument is materially confirmed; if we turn to the latter part of the chapter in Haggai, and notice how the prophet explains by the parallelism how "the thrones of Kingdoms" will be "overthrown" and "the strength of the Kingdoms of the heathen" will be "destroyed," which finds an accurate correspondence in many prophecies as e.g. Pa. 2; Dan. 2 : 44; Rev. 11 : 13-18, etc., that describe the erection of the Messiah's Kingdom to follow the fearful downfall of the Kings and Kingdoms of the earth, who are represented (as e.g. Rev. 19, etc.) as confederated against the truth. In perfect agreement with the tenor of the old prophets, who describe the Gentile domination to come to an end (Prop. 164) and to give place to that covenanted Theocratic order which is everlasting, Paul most delicately (to avoid exciting unduly the hostility of the Roman Empire, under which the believers then lived) and yet effectively declares the result of this shaking, just as Daniel and all the prophets portray it, viz., "the removing of those things that are (marg. may be) shaken" (i.e. those Kingdoms), "as of things that are made" (i.e. temporarily allowed, or created), "that those things which cannot be shaken may remain" (i.e. the covenanted and oath-bound promises respecting the Kingdom now to be realized in the restored Theocratic arrangement under David's Son), "wherefore, we receiving a Kingdom" (the same that is thus covenanted and which saints inherit), "which cannot be moved" (i.e. will never be thus shaken and destroyed like the others), "let us," etc. It is hard to say which excites our greatest surprise and admiration, the remarkable nicety of Paul's language, thus avoiding the prejudice (cruel and persecuting) of Gentile rulers, without in the least sacrificing truth; or the exceeding harmony, even in the minutest particulars, between him and men who spoke many centuries before him.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Heavens is thus used, Isa. 13 : 10-13; Jer. 4 : 23-25; Ezek. 32 : 7; Isa. 34 : 4, 5; Joel 2 : 10; Isa. 14 : 12-15, etc. So earth is employed, Rev. 12 : 16; Gen. 6 : 11, etc.; popular commotion is designated, Rev. 11 : 13, etc.; civil revolution is denoted by a shaking of the earth, earthquakes, etc., as Joel 2 : 10; heaven and earth combined forming "a political universe" (see e.g. Horne's Index to Symb. Language, vol. 2, word "heavens"), Isa. 51 : 16. The reader is referred to Faber's Diss. on the Prophecies, ch. 2, On the Symb. Language of Prophecy, for some interesting remarks on the symbolic or figurative meaning of heaven and earth. A vast number of writers admit the figurative use of heaven and earth and the shaking here meant. We have room only for a few. Archbishop Newcome says on Hag. 2 : 6, etc., that "the political or religious revolutions which were to be effected in the world, or both, are here referred to," etc. (He also affirms that "Messiah's Kingdom" is denoted in the prophecy.) Although mis-applying it, he makes a good remark on the word "once," viz., that it denotes one peculiar, distinctive, great final revolution. Dr. I. Smith, in his Summary View, etc., says: "Great earthquakes and the shaking of heaven and earth denote the commotion and overthrow of kingdoms." Sir I. Newton (Ob. Proph., I. ch. 3): "Great earthquakes and the shaking of heaven and earth are put for the shaking of kingdoms, so as to distract and overthrow them." Bishop Newton (On the Proph.) remarks, p. 362: "In the prophetic language great commotions and revolutions upon earth are often represented by commotions and changes in the heavens." So also Bh. Warburton (Divine Legation, vol. 2, b. 4, s. 4) "as in the hieroglyphic writing, the sun, moon, stars, were used to represent states and empires, kings, queens, and nobility; their eclipse and extinction, temporary disasters or entire overthrow, etc., so in like manner the holy prophets call kings and empires by the names of the heavenly luminaries; their misfortunes and overthrow are represented by eclipses and extinction," etc. So Horne's Introd., vol. 1, p. 389; Barnes's Com. on Matt. 24: 29; Heb. 13: 26, etc.; Bloomfield, Nast, Whitby, Doddridge, etc., on same passages. Stuart on Heb. and Apocalypse, and nearly all, if not all, writers on prophecy. Elliott, Bickersteth, Brookes, Cox, Sirr, and many others refer to this usage, agreeing with Bh. Warburton (Julian, p. 21) when he says: "In the old prophetic language the change and fall of principalities and powers, whether spiritual or civil, are signified by the shaking of heaven and earth, the darkening of sun and moon," etc.

* Dr. Cumming (The Great Tribulation) has a lecture (3d) on this shaking, and he shows (1) that instead of a shaking of nations at the First Advent, there was such a peace that the temple of Janus was shut; (2) that Paul quotes this prophecy as unfulfilled sixty-four years after the birth of Jesus; (3) that this shaking is future, corresponding e.g. with the shaking of the last vial. He also makes Christ the desire of heathen nations, as the response of that sense of want and yearning for light and deliverance deeply prevailing in the heart of humanity. Barbour (Three Worlds, p. 18) seems to think that the shaking is the result of the huge cannon manufactured for future use (!), but afterward correctly attributes it to an overthrow of governments. To appreciate this subject properly, other Props., must be regarded, as e.g. 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 174, etc.

Obs. 3. But while fully indorsing this view, that the great, important meaning of such phraseology is the subversion, overturning, and destruction of Kingdoms, etc., yet this does not forbid our entertaining the firm belief that these things will be accompanied by physical marvels, earthquakes, etc., which shall cause "men's hearts failing them for fear," etc. Analogy, pointing to the plagues preludeing the deliverance from Egypt, to the events connected with the birth and crucifixion of Jesus, should cause us to hold that when the most solemn crisis for the world comes, God will cause His Almighty energy to be displayed in an unusual manner in the material nature which is to be a participant in the glory following. God has hitherto thus condescended to warn and speak, and there is every reason to believe, that as the end of the age draws nigh and the stupendous issues dependent upon it approach, God will again plead with man in a startling, strange, supernatural manner. While it may be difficult, and even impossible (owing to this figurative use of language just designated), to tell in each individual case whether the fulfilment embraces a literal, physical, or moral, or civil, or political sign, yet such is the variety of expression, the attitude of man himself, the actual participation of the material heavens and earth (as will be shown in following propositions) in the changes then introduced, that the wisest and most profound students of the Word have unhesitatingly given their adhesion (see Prop. 174) to such a belief. Indeed, when the writer considers that this period is to be specially characterized by the denial of the supernatural by the worldly-wise, it seems eminently fitting and proper that such an exertion of power should be manifested, not only for the believing and prudent, not only for the admonition of the unthinking, but for the confounding of the crafty, who rely so much on nature.

PROPOSITION 148. This Kingdom embraces the new heavens and new earth.

This is so distinctly taught by Isaiah (chs. 65 and 66), by the pious Jews and Early Church, by a long line of eminent divines, including even our opponents who locate the Kingdom of God in it, and by the magnificent closing (Rev. 21) of Revelation, that it demands no special proof.

Obs. 1. The question, however, arises what are we to understand by this new heavens and new earth? Fully admitting (as e.g. the Prop. preceding 146) that the material atmosphere and earth shall undergo a transformation for the removal of evils, etc., yet, keeping in view what heavens and earth are shaken and removed (viz., the Gentile Kingdoms and their upholders), it is but reasonable to believe that the Spirit to keep up the consistency of the figure thus used, means by "the new heavens and the new earth" taking the place of the former ones, the Renewed Kingdom (i.e. Theocracy) of God and the renewed willing adherents, attached and devoted to it. This accords with the predicted fact that when the Gentile domination is overthrown, then the Kingdom of heaven (Dan. 2 and 7) occupies the supreme authority over all the earth; then (Rev. 11 : 15, Prof. Stuart, Com. loci) "The Kingdom of this world has become the Kingdom of our Lord and His Christ," or (as Lord, Apoc. loci) "The Sovereignty of the world has become our Lord's and His Messiah's." This prophetic usage of language is purposely and most wisely chosen to delineate the restoration of the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, which supersedes all other Kingdoms. The word "new," as has often been noticed, even by opposers, does not necessarily mean something entirely new, but denotes "a renewal or restoration" of something previously existing. It properly, then, denotes the renewal or restoration, with increased glory, of that "heaven and earth" which once existed in its initiatory form; and the entire phrase—as the ancient believers logically held—includes the Messianic Kingdom. How deeply this ancient belief was still held, even down to the Council of Nice, is seen in Gelasius (Hist. Acts Council), when he refers as proof to Dan. 7 : 18; Ps. 27 : 13; Matt 5 : 5 and Isa. 26 : 6 for the expression of faith: "We expect new heavens and a new earth, according to the Holy Scriptures, at the appearing of the Great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ."

Thus e.g. Robinson, N. T. Lexicon, makes "the new" in 2 Pet. 3 : 13; Rev. 21 : 1; Isa. 65 : 17; Isa. 66 : 22, "renewed, made new, hence, better, superior, more splendid. So the corresponding word of the Old Test. means as a verb, to make new, renew, repair, restore, as in 1 Sam. 11 : 14; Job 10 : 17; Ps. 60 : 12; Isa. 61 : 4; Ps. 103 : 5; 2 Chron. 15 : 8; and 24 : 4. Whence are derived the words new, i.e. renewed as in new moon, new heart, new creature," etc. Knapp (Christian Theology, p. 544), after showing how "the destruction of the heavens and of the earth, the growing pale and darkening of the sun and moon, are often used figuratively to denote great changes in the world, the calamity and downfall of particular states and countries." adds: "On the contrary, the phrases, new heavens, new earth, the clear shining sun, etc., are used to denote the welfare and returning prosperity of states—e.g. Isa. 65 : 17 ; 66 : 22 ; 13 : 10." He appends a remark worthy of consideration: "But these very figurative expressions presuppose the literal idea." Comp. art "Heaven," M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop., which says: "Heaven signifies symbolically the ruling power or government; that is, the whole assembly of the ruling powers, which, in respect to the subjects on earth, are a political heaven, being over and ruling the subjects, as the natural heaven stands over and rules the earth." All symbol dictionaries, all critics, whether Pre- Post- or Anti-Millenarian, fully indorse this usage, making heaven a figurative representation of the ruling power, and earth of its subjects. We see no reason for departing from the same, especially when both covenant and prophecy point us to this period of time when the Theocracy shall be most gloriously renewed.

Obs. 2. The creation of "the new heavens and new earth," in Isa. 65 : 17 and 66 : 22, are intimately connected with, and indeed explained by, the unexampled prosperity and joyfulness of Jerusalem, and in the removal of the curse entailing weeping, etc. These are a result of the creation of the former, and, therefore, it is that Peter (2 Pet. 3 : 13), while directing attention to the wrath of God bursting forth in vengeance upon the world, and which will affect the earth materially, yet relying upon these promises given by Isaiah, looks for this very Kingdom to be established, which includes the material changes and blessedness described by the prophet. The Kingdom is designed as an instrumentality to restore man and the earth to the forfeited position, and must, if successful, embrace both in its redemptive purpose, just as the Jews held. Hence it is wrong, as some do, to regard this phraseology as exclusively applicable to a material change, and it is likewise erroneous, as others hold, to confine it entirely to spiritual things or rulership or the Kingdom. Admitting it to be, as Lord (Apoc., Ch. 21 : 1) maintains, a symbol of "rulers of a new order" and "subjects of a new character," yet, as these rulers include a resurrection state and these subjects deliverance from physical evil, the phrase itself is not to be thus exclusively limited, as Peter evinces when he claims the promises of Isaiah, in connection with the conflagration. Insisting, therefore, that the figurative meaning, which applies this to the Kingdom itself, is the primary one, we, at the same time, do not discard the notion that in this new heavens and new earth are embraced material, radical changes which brings the earth back to its Edenic state. The contrast that Peter evidently refers to, must be observed and included. On account of this peculiar usage, it may be difficult at all times to explain the language attached to it, and some latitude of opinion on minor points or details is to be anticipated.

Thus e.g. Rev. 21 : 1, "and there was no more sea." The interpretation of this phrase depends upon that given to "the new heavens and new earth." If the view of an exclusive materialistic renewal is taken, then it follows that there will be no literal sea. If, however, the idea of a renewed powerful Kingdom is entertained, then the symbolic notion attached to the word "sea" (viz., people, multitudes, nations in agitation, revolution, war, etc) in other portions of the Word is to be retained, and the meaning is, that the nations will no longer be swayed by the storms, the commotions of popular tumults, rebellions, seditions, etc. Dr. Kurtz (Bible and Astronomy, s. 6, p. 28) takes this view, saying: "The raging waters are a representation of the raging of the heathen; thence also arise the beasts or hostile powers which Daniel and the Book of Revelation describe; from the face of the renewed earth the sea shall disappear." Various writers indorse this interpretation. Accepting of it, yet it does not forbid us entertaining the belief that great changes may also occur in the material sea, on the principle that the greater blessing contains the lesser. Whatever view is received, whether referring to the material sea or the symbolical sea, the argument of Sirr (First Res., p. 102) is still most forcible, viz., that the expression "no more," implying that "it had been before," shows that the new heavens and new earth sustains a relationship (Sirr says, "were identical") "with the orb we inhabit." They necessarily include the material earth, for that is positively covenanted. A concordance or symbol. dic. will fully illustrate the scriptural usage of "sea." As an indication of the abuse or perversion of the term, we refer to Pisgah's Views, by Dr. Winslow, who makes "the sea" a symbol of God's power, God's love, and of the Atonement! A book reviewer in the Brit. Quarterly, Ap., 1874, remarks: "It is terrible to think what the Bible and evangelical truth have to endure"—to which may be added—at the hands of its earnest friends.

Obs. 3. One of the most eminent spiritualizers of the Word (Barnes) tells us: "There shall be, as it were, new heavens and a new earth, in a spiritual sense, at the end of the world. Thus it is represented, Rev. 21 : 1." But the reader will notice that such indefinite interpretation is inconsistent with the Scriptures and with the outward reality of the things described by "heavens and earth." Allow the figurative use of the phrase, yet realities, observable, are denoted, viz., Kingdoms and their supporters. Some writers who, after the figurative sense is ascertained, append a spiritual sense to it, explain the new heavens and new earth to be an extension of the Gospel dispensation, and find the complete fulfilment in the third heaven. (See Edward's Hist. of Redemption, p. 266-7, for a specimen.) This is a gross violation of prophecy, and a most arbitrary application of promises to the present Church. Isa. 65 : 17, 18 and 66 : 22 are quoted as now realized, which is positively forbidden by the tenor of the predictions (still unrealized) and by Peter, an apostle, expressly locating (2 Pet. 3) their fulfilment in the future. This is abundantly sustained by numerous other passages. The most absurd position, however, is that of endeavoring to transfer such promises to the third heaven (with which compare the singular vacillating and contradictory exposition of Barnes' Com. on 2 Pet. 3 : 13), when the least comparison of the passages and the application of them by inspired men, show that they sustain a relationship to this earth. It required centuries of spiritualizing before such phraseology could be transferred from this earth to the third heaven, and it is the resultant of a total ignoring of the Theocratic-Davidic covenant. So far has this spiritualizing of the phrases gone, that we have large bodies of mystics, etc., who claim that they are already in such a spiritual new heaven and new earth, and one body of them, to carry out their misconception of Scripture, to manifest their realization of it, live in a sort of Communism, neither marrying nor giving in marriage. A number of painful facts, illustrative of this perversion of promise, might be adduced, but these are sufficient. It is in accord with such theories—at least, it fosters them—that Frazer (Key to Proph.) informs us that "the renovation of mankind is so great and extensive that it is called 'new heavens and new earth.'" Newcome (Rev. 21) says: "The new heaven and earth and the new Jerusalem are emblematical of the glory and happiness which will be the reward and happiness of good men forever" (compare Scott, Com.). Now, if such interpretations are to be received, what becomes of the reality and inspired application of these passages to the future here on earth after the conflagration, after the Advent of Jesus, after the shaking and overthrow of earthly Kingdoms, etc., if they do not include the Theocratic rulership, thus preserving the unity of Scripture. Many of these writers are correct when they attribute to the new heavens and earth "renovation," "glory and happiness," etc., for all these blessings are included in and flow from it, but they greatly mistake when they attribute one of these things to be specifically meant or typified by it, and overlook the primary, leading idea that it signifies the renewed outward Theocratic Rule of God manifested in David's Son acting as the Judge or King and the hosts of subjects made willing in the day of His power. If the figurative usage is allowed, then the one that the Spirit Himself has given, referring it primarily to the Kingdom and subjects, is to be retained in preference to all others, seeing that in the weak state of Christianity under the power of Gentile dominancy arrogant and persecuting on the smallest provocations, it was wise and prudent to retain the old prophetic usage,<sup>1</sup> easy of comprehension to believers in the covenanted promises, as evidenced by the faith of the primitive Church. If the exclusively literal idea of a material change is only entertained, then even there is consistency in Schlegel (Phil. of His. Lec., 10), observing: "The last glorious transformation of nature, when creation shall be consummated, and a new heaven and a new earth shall spring into existence, are to be strictly regarded as real and historical." To the writer, however, it appears that the latter can be entertained (being more clearly taught by another class of passages) without discarding the former; yea more, that the former is most accordant with prophetic speech and really, as a resultant, includes the latter.

Thus any concordance will give one of the meanings of "heaven" to be "a state of great dignity," illustrated by e.g. Isa. 14 : 12 ; Lam. 2 : 1, etc. Any index of symbolical language will give (as e.g. Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 465) to "heaven and earth" the meaning of "a political universe." See this explained by Faber, Diss. on Proph., and others.

Obs. 4. In order to make our doctrine discordant, if possible, several criticisms are offered which it is necessary to answer. A class of writers inform us that the promises of the new heavens and new earth in Isa. 65 : 17 and 66 : 22 relate to one period of time, viz., to this dispensation, while those of 2 Pet. 3 : 13 and Rev. 21 : 1 refer to another, viz., after the Millennial age, etc. Aside from the direct argumentation following (Props. 149, 150, and 151), it is now sufficient simply to quote an opponent. Barnes (Com., 2 Pet. 3 : 13) says: "The allusion here seems to be, beyond a doubt, to two passages in Isaiah," etc., quoting the ones mentioned by us. Now if Peter referred in his "according to promise" to these predictions of Isaiah (and this is admitted, for no others of a like tenor can be found), then it follows that he locates those Millennial descriptions of Isaiah with the heavens and earth that succeed the conflagration, and the objection falls. But Rev. 20 : 11 is urged against us, because we are there informed that "from whose (the Judge's) face the earth and the heaven fled away and there was found no place for them," indicates that the new heaven and earth is only after the thousand years, etc., and cannot include Isaiah's prediction. Various writers, however, have pointed out that this phrase here is parenthetical (as like e.g. the riding on an ass, Zech. 9 : 9, 10, etc.), alluding to what was done before, thus identifying the Judge and ascribing power to Him. The phraseology is so accordant with that employed by Daniel and the prophets when describing the consuming of the Kingdoms and their power "so that no place was found for them" (Dan. 2 : 35), which is attributed to Jesus Christ, that the reference cannot be doubted. Overlooking the past tense used, and endeavoring to confine it to the then present time, they see not that the objection—taking their notion of the heavens and earth—is fatal to their own theory, seeing that the earth is represented as continuing, the sea giving up its dead, etc. Even Augustine, commenting on the passage (City of God, B. 20, Ch. 14), does not confine this fleeing away to the actual time specified in context, but locates it “not before the living and dead are judged,” “but afterward,” making the declaration equivalent to that He would perform this. Now, if such liberty can be taken with the verb rendered “had fled” as to refer it to the future in support of a theory, surely no one ought to find fault with us when our explanation is directly sustained by the tense of the verb and the facts preceding the period thus predicted. In this connection may be mentioned the view entertained by Lactantius (Div. Insti., B. 7, Chs. 24 and 26, and Epit. of same, Ch. 71), who has two renewals of the earth, one at the commencement of the one thousand years, and another at its close; also by Barnabas (Epis. Ch. 15), who makes a renewal at the beginning of the seventh Milliad, and another at the beginning of the eighth day. A number of modern writers follow these suggestions, and press them to unwarranted conclusions. Now, whatever truth (and there is some) there is in the gradual restoration of all things to the condition before the fall, and which is only fully reached after the Millennial age is closed, when all wickedness is forever more rooted out, yet it is a mistake to ascribe this to a renewal of “the new heavens and new earth.” This is seen by the simple fact that this phraseology includes the everlasting (Prop. 159) Kingdom of Jesus Christ which is never to be destroyed; that otherwise the Word is made contradictory, for the new heavens and new earth of Isaiah (however it may extend) is represented as “remaining” before the Lord, i.e. is permanent, while that described by Peter (2 Pet. 3 : 13) is implied by the tenor and spirit of the prediction and its righteousness to be ever enduring. These follow the Advent of Jesus, and, characterized as they are, they, in the very nature of the case, do not give place to another general transformation. The Kingdom when once established under David’s Son ever exists—His heavens rule and His earth or people are obedient—whatever changes may be introduced after the ending of the Millennial period. Unless this feature is clearly apprehended, confusion and antagonism follow. The Kingdom (presented by Isaiah under this impressive figure) is so great, so vast a dominion, so exalted over the earth in its grandeur, that “the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind,” i.e., shall not be worthy of comparison, etc., with it. And yet this “heaven and earth” so grandly erected, in which His people shall “rejoice forever” and which is said to be as enduring as “the end and name” of His people, is, we are gravely told, “to pass away.” No! never; and any theory which involves such a contradiction, such a ruinous process, evidences at once an unscriptural foundation. This confusion of ideas is caused, in a great measure, by not observing the meaning of the figure, by neglecting a faithful comparison of Scripture (and accepting of the result), and by confounding things that differ. When the Spirit so directly, as in Isa. 65 : 17, 18 (Comp. Alexander’s Version), and 66 : 22, asserts the perpetuity of the new heaven and earth then created, we gratefully and joyfully accept of the same, not being hampered by the Popish theory of Judgment Day, etc., which forbids the reception of the blessed Millennial predictions associated with, and to be experienced in, this “heaven and earth.”

<sup>1</sup> It is scarcely worth while to notice that class of writers who make this phraseology mere poetic figures, a fine stroke of rhetoric, etc. Such are reminded that the shaking and overthrow of heavens and earth is a stern reality seen in fulfilment, when kingdoms and their multitude of adherents are utterly removed. The same reality, glorious and world-redeeming, will be witnessed when "the heaven and earth" of God is created in the promised Theocratic reign. Such writers do not even allow the Bible to be the exponent of its own language.

<sup>2</sup> The close student is referred to Dr. Goodwin's observation, quoted by Cox (in A Millenarian's Answer, etc., p. 18, foot-note), that Paul's allusions to the new heavens and earth, suggested by Peter (2 Pet. 3), relates to Heb. 2, thus making Heb. 2 and 2 Pet. 3 parallel. If this is to be received, it would materially confirm our view, seeing that the dominion of Christ is the main topic. We are glad to see that the most able writers are more and more returning to the early Church view on this point. As an illustration : Dr. Kurtz (Sac. His. sec. 199, 4) has correctly the new heavens and earth of 2 Pet. 3 : 10-13 ; Isa. 65 : 17 ; Rev. 21 : 1 to be erected at the same time. But he does not inform us how he can possibly reconcile this (see Isa. 65 : 17) with his notion of the Millennial age. It is irreconcilable. For another, see the admission of Dr. Clarke (Com., Matt. 19 : 28) that the new heavens and earth are connected with the Mill. age—which he confirms, in some places, and then again in others seems to contradict, etc.

Obs. 5. It would be interesting to trace how the early Church linked the new heavens and new earth with the one thousand years, quoting Isa. 65 : 17, etc., as e.g. Justin (Dial. with Typho.; see Ch. 3, Brookes El. of Proph. Interp., and writings of Taylor, Mede, Seiss, etc., for references to various of the Fathers), and how it advocated the Kingdom of Jesus Christ as witnessed in, and through, that period, and as being embraced in the heaven and earth. The numerous quotations already presented will suffice to give the reader a just idea of the general opinion on the subject. So also, whatever explanation may be applied to the phrase "new heavens and new earth" itself, yet many theologians insist upon it, that at this future time and as part of the heavens and earth the Kingdom of the Messiah is, as the primitive Church held, set up and manifested. This, whatever views are given respecting details, is corroborative of our position. Thus e.g. in Proph. Times (Sep., 1867), is a translation of an article from Dr. Gess (of Reutlingen) in which the grand outlines of the early Millenarian doctrine are presented and accepted, and in confirmation of the Kingdom then established, quotations, evincing the same belief, are given from Herder, Steudal, Olshausen, J. G. Hess, Lavater, Bengel, and T. F. Meyer. The leading idea presented is, as Meyer expresses it : "With the Lord's Advent begins the real reign of God upon earth, a Kingdom of righteousness, holiness, and peace, consisting of mortals, but with exemption from the Evil One and his enticements, and under a mighty influence of celestial power," etc.; or as Hess terms it : "It has been given to be a Kingdom of God upon earth." Dr. Tholuck has been noticed by Taylor, Seiss, etc., as saying : "The idea that the perfected Kingdom of Christ is to be transferred to heaven is a modern notion. According to Paul, and the Rev. of John, the Kingdom of God is placed upon the earth, in so far as the earth has part in the universal transformation. This exposition has been adopted and defended by most of the oldest commentators : e.g. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Augustine, Luther, Knox, and others." Persons of the most diverse views, hostile even to the Early Church doctrine, still are forced to admit, that the new heavens and earth relate to this globe of ours, and include the Kingdom of God in a most glorious form. Thus from a variety of sources, even convergent, testimony in reference to the teaching of the Word can be multiplied confirmatory of our doctrinal position, seeing that all such make the Kingdom the main, leading idea which includes all the rest.

As we have all along shown, many of our opponents, impelled by the force of Scripture promise, maintain (as e.g. Dr. Urwick, etc.) that this earth renewed, and under the special government of God, shall be the eternal home of the saints (comp. e.g. Prop. 142, etc.). But multitudes follow the Popish doctrine, or the doctrine of Mohammed (Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, p. 402): "Man can have but one Paradise—and my Paradise is fixed above." How persons with the deliverance of creation, the inheriting of the earth, the renewed heavens and earth, the coming down out of heaven of the New Jerusalem upon earth, etc., can say (as e.g. Heaven our Home, Pref. p. 9 and 27), "We have a home for eternity, and that home is (the third) heaven," is something remarkable, especially when such writers are very profuse in professing allegiance to Church doctrine, and totally ignore the universal belief of the Church in the first centuries, based on covenant, prophecy, and promise, and assume the later faith introduced to be the correct one. The arbitrary way by which this is done, has been designated, viz., by making Canaan a type of the third heaven without a particle of proof, and against the express covenant promises of God, and then by quoting promise after promise, without reference to time and order of fulfilment, intermingling the same with beautiful and attractive ideas eloquently expressed. Such writings cannot stand before a scriptural examination, and are misleading multitudes, causing them to put their faith and hope in man's promises instead of God's oath-bound declarations of inheritance. And yet the sad fact is that such writings, filled with perversions and leading the Church into unbelief, are extremely popular.

PROPOSITION 149. This Kingdom is preceded by the conflagration of 2 Pet. 3 : 10-13.

This is self-evident, since this Kingdom is identified with the establishment of "the new heavens and new earth" of Isa. 65 : 17, and 66 : 22. Peter expressly alludes to these two passages in Isaiah and appropriates them as descriptive of "the new heavens and new earth" presented by himself, in the specific phraseology, "according to promise." The Millennial new heavens and new earth thus claimed by the Apostle, and which are associated with the Kingdom itself, are necessarily preceded by the fire described. As this forms the leading objection to our doctrine, and as some have wrongfully (against the most explicit language of Peter) endeavored to locate this fire after the thousand years, it is proper to thus definitely state the facts and assume their weight.

Simply to indicate the perplexity of commentators (fettered by a pre-conceived idea of the extent of Peter's conflagration), and the unwarranted liberties taken with the prediction, we refer e.g. to Dr. Moore (Amer. Translation) in Lange's Com., Isa., p. 113. Acknowledging (1) that Peter refers to those promises in Isa. ; (2) that he evidently regards the fulfilment to follow the conflagration ; (3) that the condition described is only compatible with a continuation of mortal men, etc., he then produces the following as a reconciliation : the new heavens and new earth follow the conflagration, while the remainder of the same prediction (e.g. vs. 20-25) is to precede the fire ! Thus he most arbitrarily divides the predictions (Isa. 65 : 17-25 ; 66 : 22-24) that God has joined together, and makes that to precede which is to occur in the new heavens and earth. All such interpretations indicate a serious eschatological defect.

Obs. 1. It has been noticed by various Commentators, etc., that the Jews, before and at the time Peter wrote, expected that the Millennial era, i.e. the times of Messiah's reign, would be introduced by great convulsions and a terrible fire. Knapp, if using the word "perishing" as many do, goes too far when he says (Christ. Theol., s. 155, II. 2) : "This doctrine of the perishing of the world by fire was unquestionably prevalent among the Jews at the time of Christ and the apostles, although Philo does not accede to it." That the Jews believed in a mighty change, in a renovation, purification, regeneration (see Knapp, same place, quoting Philo), etc., of the earth, and that in some way fire (as the prophets predicted) should be employed as an agency, seems certain from various testimony, but that they believed in so widespread and extensive a conflagration as moderns have fastened upon Peter, is not only unproven but hostile to the expectations they had concerning the Messiah's Kingdom. A little reflection should suggest, that a people who looked for the restoration of the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom over the nation in the flesh, which Kingdom was ultimately to embrace the Gentile nations, could not, and did not, believe in that which would utterly demolish all hope. But, as stated, they did believe that this Kingdom would be preceded by the awful judgments of God, and that fire would be used in connection with them. Now the language of Peter accords with the belief that before the Millennial period could be introduced, such a Pre-Millennial judgment by fire must be inflicted; and his undoubted reference to the only promises relating to the new heavens and new earth in Isaiah would immediately and inevitably—with the prevailing belief—direct the Jewish mind to the Millennial prophecies. If the latter are to be understood, as so many now teach, to be fulfilled prior to this conflagration, then Peter took the very means and language to confirm his readers in the opposite view. We hold that there is no antagonism between Peter and the Jewish belief on the subject.

Houbigant (Pref. to the Prophets), referring to 2 Pet. 3, makes "the scoffers" to be Jews, who reject Jesus as the Messiah, because no change, such as the prophets describe, was realized at His Advent; and profess that it is not to be realized, and that Peter acknowledges that such a change is to be expected (that changes have already transpired in the past) at the Second Advent of this same Jesus, thus fulfilling the prophets. Judge Jones, who refers to Houbigant (Theol. and Lit. Journal, Jan., 1856), justly doubts whether these "scoffers" are Jews only, saying: "There is more reason to suppose that, for the most part, they will be from among the Gentiles." Jews, like the "Reformed" or "Liberal," are rapidly drifting into this scoffing position, imitating the larger proportion of unbelieving Gentiles.

Obs. 2. If we refer to the promises acknowledged by Peter and given by Isaiah, we find this view strengthened by the context. Thus e.g. Isa. 66 : 22 is preceded by "the Lord will come with fire and with His chariots like a whirlwind, to render His anger with fury and His rebuke with flames and fire. For by fire and by His sword will the Lord plead with all flesh," etc. While Isa. 65 : 17 only mentions the sword as preceding, yet, if we take the prediction and turn to its strictly parallel mates, we find that fire also is connected with its ushering in, as evidenced by the same things being delineated as then taking place. Thus e.g. take Isa. 51, and at the very time that God will "plant the heavens and lay the foundations of the earth," that the redeemed return with singing and everlasting joy, the judgments of the Lord shall be poured upon the wicked and "the heavens shall vanish like smoke," etc. At least one thing is apparent, that in the context of Millennial predictions (as Ps. 97 : 3; Joel 2 : 30; Mal. 4 : 1, etc.) there are sufficient intimations to warrant the Jewish belief that there would be, before Messiah's Kingdom is established, an extraordinary manifestation of fire in some form, and that Peter in his prediction adopts this very belief by linking his prophecy with Isaiah's.

Attention is called to the fact that Peter's agreement with Isa. 66 and 65 is so apparent, and consequently its Millenarian bias, that it may account for the opposition to the canonical authority of 2 Peter. For, it is a singular fact that the first persons who expressed a doubt concerning the reception of 2 Peter, are the men who were the most instrumental in opposing Millenarianism, viz., Origen, Jerome, and Eusebius (comp. Lardner's Works, vol. 6, p. 255, and the prefaces to 2 Pet. in coms. generally). This, too, may have largely influenced later opposers (as e.g. Davidson, Introd. New Test.).

Obs. 3. The reader will observe that Peter, instead of giving the least intimation that the Millennial period antecedes, in his account knows nothing of the Millennial era preceding, and gives statements utterly opposed to the notion that it will be witnessed previous to the conflagration. Without pressing into service his well-known views respecting the nearness of, and looking for, the Advent of Jesus Christ (which is antagonistic to such an idea), it is sufficient to notice that he speaks of the wicked existing continuously and boldly down to this very period, and of believers being subjected to their scoffing, etc., down to the same time. Deliverance is anticipated only when this era preceded by the conflagration arrives; and hence that Millennial glory, etc., which some describe as antecedent this conflagration is something that Peter fails to portray or intimate. More than this: the apostle links this era with the Millennial predictions by designating it "the day of the Lord," and "the day of God," which all at that time understood as referring to the day (e.g. Prop. 138, etc.) when these Mill. prophecies would be fulfilled. It was the distinguished time when God should remarkably manifest His power in behalf of His people. The apostle only recognizes the one day future associated with this conflagration. This is in agreement with the general analogy. To illustrate: Mal. 4 describes the day of the Lord "that shall burn as an oven," utterly consuming the outrageous wicked and only leaving the righteous, and previous to this announced day there is no Millennial rest and blessedness for God's children. So Joel 2 and 3, the day of the Lord comes when He shall "show wonders in the heavens, and in the earth blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke," and then follow the Millennial blessings. Peter, imbibing the same spirit of prophecy, introduces no discordant element.

The language of Peter only suits a Pre-Millennial period; for the language expressive of warning, expectedness and denial of Advent, perdition of the wicked, merciful delay, only agrees with a time such as ours, in view of its connection with well-known previous statements of "the holy prophets" and "the apostles of the Lord," which are of primary importance (v. 3) as a practical inducement to holiness and watchfulness. If this related only to that which occurs after the Mill. age (of which we have the most meagre statement in Rev. 20), then the Apostle would not have linked it with persons living in the present dispensation, as something in which they were personally interested and which they should behold. The very setting of the predictions favors our position, and the earnestness with which (v. 12) it should be desired by them, is confirmatory of our view.

Obs. 4. It is admitted, generally, that the scenes described by Peter follow the Second Advent. When Christ comes, He comes "in flaming fire taking vengeance," etc. (2 Thess. 1:8), with "fiery indignation" (Heb. 10:27) that shall consume His enemies. It is at this Advent that believers are also delivered and exalted. The language of Peter, the entire tenor and scope of his description, evinces that he places the Advent—the object of terror to the wicked and of joy to the righteous—at this very period of time. This, therefore, is utterly irreconcilable with the theory (Shimeall and others), that this conflagration follows a thousand years after a personal Pre-Mill. Advent of Christ. The "appearing and the Kingdom" are united, and consequently the appearing, the glorification of believers, the fiery vengeance upon living unbelievers, and the Kingdom are also linked together.

Let the reader e.g. turn to Joel 2:31 and kindred prophecies, and if it is admitted that "the great and terrible day of the Lord" is introduced by the Second Advent of Jesus (as general analogy teaches), then it follows that such a fearful time (coinciding with Peter's description) is succeeded by a Mill. period, as the connection shows. The same is true of Zeph. 2:3; Isa. 24; Deut. 32:22; Mal. 4, and numerous other predictions, all descriptive of a fiery vengeance that shall consume the earth (which we know from the most positive declarations is imposed at the personal Coming of the Son of Man), followed by a glorious Millennial period, in which the Jewish nation is pre-eminently blessed, and in which the Gentile nations joyfully partioipate. Now, when the Spirit lays down this order, and does this repeatedly, we certainly should be guarded lest we reverse it.

Obs. 5. The reader will notice that the Kingdom (as our entire line of argument shows) is introduced at the Pre-Mill. Advent of Jesus, and that Christ then receives His inheritance as David's Son. These two facts alone set aside the views of those (as e.g. Shimeall in I Will Come Again, and Lincoln in Lects. on Rev., and Burgh, Tyso, and Ogilvy), who make the conflagration Post-Millennial, introductory to an eternal state of things. Now on the other hand the Scriptures make the glorious Theocracy established at Jesus' return one that is perpetual, ever-enduring (Comp. Prop. 159, where this is considered in detail), and consequently it does not run the risk of ever being removed or destroyed by the universality of the conflagration. The promises of God forbid it, and therefore, as e.g. in Dan. 7 (where the fire of vengeance, v. 10, 11, precedes or is connected with the establishment of the Kingdom) the Kingdom set up at the Coming of Jesus is declared to be one which shall not pass away or be destroyed. Again—to advocate such an opinion is virtually to say that Christ's inheritance, promised under oath in perpetuity to Him, shall be swept away by a conflagration—an inheritance too for which He suffered and died, which is to be to Him a desire and joy and glory, and which He has already (Isa. 65 and 66) retouched with His creative energy. Surely the brethren who hold to the above opinion do not see that, in the attempt to avoid difficulties connected with Peter's account of the conflagration, they plunge themselves into far greater by the adoption of such a Post-Millennial view. The fire of Peter must, of necessity, be so interpreted as to preserve the unity of divine teaching, and how this is to be done will be the subject of the next Proposition.

For the same reasons we must reject the opinion of Fausset (Com., 2 Pet. 3, and Rev. 21 : 1) that the fire of Peter is in part Pre-Millennial and in part Post-Millennial, the latter the most extended and destructive. Now, aside from Peter describing only one fire and the introduction of only one "new heavens and new earth," which exists forever because righteousness dwells in it—which this view arbitrarily makes to be two—it is sufficient to say that the Kingdom and inheritance of Christ forbids the entertaining of such an opinion, because derogative to both. So Elliott (Hor. Apoc.) makes a Pre-Millennial restricted fire, limiting it to the Roman earth, but does not exclude "the idea of some other and more universal conflagration at the general judgment." We cannot, consistent with the reasons assigned accept of such interpretations, which sweep away an eternally constructed Theocratic Kingdom, and an eternally bestowed inheritance of David's Son and of His brethren.

It is important to notice this in detail (and the reader will please observe that the following Propositions are part of the discussion) since two classes make the conflagration of Peter an insuperable objection to the reception of the doctrine of the Kingdom. Those opposed to Millenarianism, as Brown, Steele, Barnes, Waldegrave, and many others, inform us that owing to the universality of the fire it is impossible to conceive how nations in the flesh, Jewish and Gentile, can survive it to form the subjects of the Kingdom. Every work written against us produces the stereotyped difficulty, as if irremovable. Recently some Millenarians, as Shimeall and others (through an amiable weakness which impelled them to remove what they call "the great stumbling-block in the way of an acceptance of the truth"), have repeated this objection, locating the fire of Peter after the Millennial age.<sup>1</sup> It hence deserves special consideration.

<sup>1</sup> Shimeall (I Will Come Again) writes many excellent things worthy of attention, but he certainly, with the amount of proof given in support of his own position on this point, goes too far when he charges distinguished Millenarians (Dr. Cumming by name, Pref., p. 19) with holding to "a stupendous theological misnomer," of "greatly damaging that system of revealed truth," of forming "the great stumbling-block in the way of inquirers after the truth," and of "a Judaizing and carnalizing the future state and condition of Christ and His saints." Charity should influence us always to remember that in the details of prophetic fulfilment, however cordial our agreement in the great leading outlines, yet, owing to the vastness of the subjects, the difficulties connected with them, the necessity of close comparison, and our own limited capacities, we ought reasonably to expect some diversity of opinion. Let us add that with the light before us we fail to see how Shimeall's modern addition adds any weight to the doctrine of the early Church (it virtually degrades it as carnal, etc.), or how it aids to make Millenarianism one iota more credible and respectable for the sake of a "distinguished Post-Millenarian clergyman." Millenarianism depends on immensely more than our comprehension of Peter's conflagration, viz., on the covenants and the promises of God, etc. If the latter do not urge the student to a Millenarian bias, certainly an accommodating interpretation of Peter's fire will not cause it.

Obs. 1. As stated in preceding Proposition, the language of Peter was in accordance with the views of the Jews. They evidently did not consider the fire so disastrous in its effects that no nations would survive and that the Kingdom could not be set up over the nations as Daniel predicted. The proof is, that all the Jewish converts and churches, as far as we know, never supposed that this passage controverted such an opinion. Instead of being a stumbling-block in the way, this passage was thought to be confirmatory of their belief of the dreadful fire which should devour the adversaries (Dan. 7 : 10, 11, "fiery stream," "the burning flame"), when the Messiah would come. Jewish believers held that Peter only transferred that which they had believed would occur at the First Advent, to the Second Advent. Hence the apostle's statement strengthened them (by his appeal to Isa. and using the phrase "day of the Lord," etc.) in the faith, expressed by the Babylonian Targum (on Gen. 49 : 10), "Christ shall come, whose is the Kingdom, and Him shall the nations serve," or as the Jerusalem Targum has it : "The King Christ shall come, whose is the Kingdom, and all nations shall be subject unto Him." Peter's description, therefore, raised no controversy between the Jewish believers and others.

The critical student will please ponder the weight to be attached to this reasoning. (1) We have the entire Primitive Church universally Millenarian in sentiment ; (2) now, if the language of Peter, as moderns (Brown, Waldegrave, etc.) assert, forbids the Pre-Millenarian view, then an antagonism would have sprung up in reference to the meaning of his prediction ; (3) but instead of such a controversy arising, it was accepted as in complete accord with prevailing views ; (4) this could only have resulted from its being explained as so limited in its effects as not to interfere with the restoration of the Davidic throne and Kingdom and with the perpetuity of the race, as e.g. in the restored Jewish nation and the spared Gentile nations. The first converts were all Jews, who clung with faith to the covenants and prophecies insuring such a fulfilment, and they believed in Jesus as the Messiah, who at His Second Advent would perform this work. Now, if they had supposed that Peter's language raised up an irreconcilable difficulty, we certainly would have transmitted to us the impressions of such an antagonism. On the other hand, they were conversant with the usage of Scripture language, which expressed itself with a degree of universality, when limitations were intended, so that for the sake of vividness and impressiveness universality was expressed to denote extensiveness, greatness, vastness, etc. Thus e.g. take the expressions, Gen. 6 : 7 : "And the Lord said, I will destroy man, whom I have created, from the face of the earth ; both man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air ; for it repenteth me that I have made them ;" or v. 13 : "The end of all flesh is come before me," "behold I will destroy them with the earth ;" or v. 17 : "to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven ; and everything that is in the earth shall die," and yet, notwithstanding this alleged universality, God found means to save the life and the flesh of those in whom His divine purpose would be carried out. So the early Christians confidently rested in the promises of God that, notwithstanding this terrible judgment of fire, those would be saved—in the flesh also—in whom the Divine Purpose would be strikingly manifested.

Obs. 2. The early Church, receiving its teaching direct from inspired teachers (and appealing to them, as Papias, Justin, Irenæus), found no such limitation as was afterward engrafted upon Peter's language. That Church which claimed (as Semisch, Herzog's Cyclop. speaking of Justin's, Dial. with Trypho, doctrinal position) its "belief as the Keystone of orthodoxy," which in the person of Papias (as stated by Jerome'), directly named Peter's instruction, received the epistle without regarding it as presenting the slightest objection to their doctrine of the Second Coming of Jesus, the fearful overthrow (fire as an agency) of His enemies, the exaltation of the resurrected saints, the re-establishment of the Davidic throne and Kingdom over the restored Jewish nation and the spared Gentile nations. One and all held to the fulfilment of the covenant and the prophecies based upon it as succeeding this conflagration : This is clearly announced in their writings. It may be justly claimed, that men who were so near to apostolic teaching, and acquainted with the language then spoken, were qualified to judge how far Peter's statement of the fire was to be pressed.

See Brookes, El. Proph. Inter., p. 37, etc., where the extracts, with remarks, are given from Eusebius and Jerome. So Shimeall (Eschatol., p. 64), who quotes : "He did not follow various opinions, but had the apostles for his authors; and that he considered what Andrew, what Peter said, what Philip, what Thomas, and other disciples of the Lord; as also what Aristian and John the Senior, disciples of the Lord, what they spoke," etc. Another passage refers to his having "learned from the elders," etc., but does not mention Peter by name.

Obs. 3. It is noticeable that no Millenarian author has taken advantage of the doubts cast upon the canonical authority of the Second Epistle. This has been done by our opponents and not by us. That epistle was never urged in the first centuries as antagonistic to Chiliasm, for the leading objection to it was that derived from its being too favorable to our doctrine, owing to its "Jewish conceptions." If we were to accept of its rejection—as suggested by opposers—that would at once end the discussion, seeing that the only passage relied upon to prove that the perpetuity of the Jewish nation and the race is irreconcilable with the universality of the fire at the end of the age, is to be found in this Epistle. But we are not forced to dispute its genuineness or authority, being willing to receive it, on the testimony alleged in its favor, as canonical.<sup>1</sup> The opposition to the Epistle, if so fatal to our doctrine as assumed by many, ought to have come from Millenarians and not from its opponents.

<sup>1</sup> Origen, Jerome, and Eusebius cast doubts upon it. If we could accept of the reasons assigned by Dr. Neander (His. Plant. Ch. Church, vol. 1, p. 376), to prove the spurious character of the 2d Epistle, then all difficulty would vanish. Pressense (Early Years of Christianity, note 1, attached to p. 213) declares it impossible to admit with any certainty the authenticity of the second epistle. He refers to others who doubted it, and includes Calvin as expressing a doubt. This is mentioned to indicate to the reader that in such a discussion, if disposed, some weight might be attached to the grounds given for its rejection upheld by such men, etc. But we have no desire to place ourselves behind the shield thus provided for us, still believing that the objections presented against its authenticity, etc., are too slight—when compared with the evidence in favor—to set aside this portion of the authorized canon. (Comp. Alford's Prolegomena, vol. 4, p. 1.)

Obs. 4. If there is a passage which should be examined and explained according to "the analogy of faith," it certainly ought to be this one of Peter's. The reason is apparent; it is the only passage of Scripture which our opponents allege as conveying an irreconcilable difficulty in the way of accepting what (as we have shown) is taught in the naked grammatical sense in Covenant and Prophecy, and what was unmistakably believed in by the primitive Church. To make a single passage overthrow the Jewish faith, the early Church faith, and, above all, that constant harmony of Scriptural statement down to that point, and to make it the necessity for introducing a spiritualistic interpretation of preceding Scripture, is imposing too much upon one text and is violating the proportion due to the doctrines of the Bible. The rules given by Horne (Introd., vol. 1, p. 342, etc.), are worthy of attention, and if applied will inevitably relieve our doctrine of the Kingdom from any alleged incubus said to be imposed by Peter. Surely when our doctrine of the Kingdom is founded in the oath-bound covenant given to David, is reiterated by prophets, is preached, etc., as Proposition after Proposition has proven, then it ought not to be set aside, or weakened, or condemned by one passage; then the passage assumed to be contradictory ought to be explained in the light of that vast amount of testimony preceding it; then the lesser ought to be interpreted by the greater, the more brief by the more extended, the doubtful by the plainly revealed.

If we only had Peter's description of the conflagration, it might be supposed to be as destructive as many tell us it will be; but unless—having numerous other passages referring to the same—we find this corroborated by other parallel passages, we may easily make a mistake. The apparent unlimited phraseology is no infallible criterion; for as all concede, it is the custom of Scripture to employ the most general language when a limitation in point of fact exists. Thus e.g. "it is appointed unto all men to die," but some we have through Paul will not die, but be changed—so "all Judea" went up, etc., teaching us both that we should ascertain whether all passages sustain the universality supposed to exist, and that the current usage of such language ought also to be considered. Take e.g. the apparently unlimited expressions of Deut. 32 : 22; Isa. 24 : 19, 20, etc., which certainly cannot be exceeded by Peter's language, and we find even in the following context that they are to be so limited as not to destroy the land, the Jewish and Gentile nations. If we were to take such prophecies isolated, and insist that the language must be literally fulfilled just as they read, without any regard to the context or other passages, and without considering that the vengeance of God is thus represented to indicate its intensity, severity, and certainty of extended searching range, we could readily rear up a host of alleged antagonisms.

Obs. 5. Peter's representation of the Kingdom, as given in his own writings, would be vitiated, if we accept of the extravagant estimates made concerning the extent of this fire. Omitting the allusion to Isa. 65 : 17 and 66 : 22 and to "the day of the Lord" as used by the prophets and Jews, sufficient remains to show that he looked for a Kingdom to appear on earth after this fire, and in the form advocated by us. In this same Epistle, Ch. 1, he knows no other Kingdom than the future everlasting Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," for which he urges the brethren to strive, faith in which was confirmed by the Transfiguration (see Prop. 153), and which he represents (as Pet. 4 : 7) as not very distant, thus connecting it with this same Advent and conflagration. Now in the First Epistle, in harmony with the Second, he makes the inheritance and salvation, "ready to be revealed in the last time," dependent (1 Pet. 1 : 7, 13; comp. with 2 Pet. 3 : 13, 14) upon "the appearing of Jesus Christ;" and "the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ" corresponds with "the new heavens and new earth." In both Epistles believers are "pilgrims and strangers," suffering, etc., and urged to hope for deliverance, etc., at the Second Advent. The entire spirit expressed is, a deferring of the Kingdom—promised by the prophets 1 Pet. 1 : 11, 13—until this period. This ignoring of a present Kingdom, and looking for one future, at the Advent, to fulfil the prophets—who locate Messiah's Kingdom on earth as we advocate—is evidence, if we will but accept of it, that he himself had no idea of the prediction, such as multitudes fasten upon it, seeing that the "everlasting Kingdom" once established, is ever more perpetuated, and hence is not to be destroyed by fire at the end of the thousand years.

The reader is urged to observe the following facts additional, established under previous propositions. The times of refreshing and restitution (Prop. 144), the Regeneration (Prop. 145), the deliverance of creation (Prop. 146), the Rest (Prop. 143), etc., all begin with this Second Advent and the manifestation of the sons of God, and a glorious period of deliverance and salvation is experienced, which is invariably described as unending. Now, after such restitution and such blessedness, after a marvellous restoration to forfeited blessings and an exhibition of Christ's dominion, can a single reason (unless it be derived—as is done—from 2 Pet. 3) be assigned for a universal and total conflagration? Is it reasonable that the work of Christ, exemplified by a thousand years of practical reigning and results, should suddenly be blotted out of existence by a devouring conflagration? It seems to us derogatory to Christ's honor and glory, as well as to the saints, who are co-heirs with Him, to thus summarily dispose of the glorious Millennial earth, described by the prophets in the most glowing terms. A renewal (for e.g. Prof. Robinson makes in N. T. Lexicon "kainos" "new," to be "renewed," "made new," as used in 2 Cor. 5 : 17 ; Gal. 6 : 15) is predicated both of the earth (restored to Edenic condition) and of the Kingdom (Davidic tabernacle rebuilt), and this is associated by the Scriptures, Jews, and early Christians with a Pre-Millennial Coming of the Messiah. This renewal, whatever additions successive ages may add in their progress, is always represented as perpetual, never ending. "The world to come" is the Millennial world, as we have sufficiently proven (Prop. 137), and its perpetuity is invariably asserted, for with the obtaining of the same is linked the ever-enduring blessedness of the saints. When Jesus said "My Kingdom is not of this world," He used the word "cosmos" and not "aion" (as some erroneously suppose, building an argument on the error), the same word used, John 15 : 19, "Ye are not of the world," importing the renewal of the disciples, and hence this "cosmos" or "this world" experiences a change or renewal before "the everlasting Kingdom" is introduced in it, becoming "the world to come."

Obs. 6. It must be observed, that while the Second Advent of Jesus is spoken of as a coming in "flaming fire," etc., to destroy His enemies, etc., it is at the same time represented as a coming to bless the earth, so that the earth is called upon to rejoice in His Advent, as e.g. Ps. 96 : 11-13 ; Ps. 98 : 4-9, etc. Creation, as we have seen Props. 145 and 146, is to exult in this Coming for deliverance, so that it is declared to follow as a result from the antecedent humiliation, death, and exaltation of Christ, the resurrection of His saints, etc., as e.g. Ps. 69 : 34 (noticing how the previous portion of the Ps. is applied to Jesus in his death, etc. See Prop. 126). Now such deliverance of creation, such a rejoicing of the earth in the removal of the curse, is not witnessed down to the Advent, and if fulfilled, as written and promised, necessitates, in the very nature of the case, a very material limitation to the destructiveness of this fire. Any indorsement of the sweeping assertions made respecting its universality and totality introduces at once an antagonism (unnecessary) between one passage and a host of others relating to the same time. This is the reason why so many (Prop. 146) employ language respecting the deliverance of creation, insist upon complete restoration, etc., and yet are afraid to mention the animal kingdom or animate nature, fearful that Peter's conflagration would prove an objection to its utterance. Surely there must be something wrong in an interpretation, which builds up from this passage irreconcilable features to other portions of the Word.

In order to show how our opponents raise up an antagonism, and involve themselves in the gravest contradictions, the following illustration (out of a multitude) is appended : MacKnight (On the Epistles), while advocating an utter destruction of the world by fire (in support of his Popish view of the judgment day, etc.), gives us this paraphrastic interpretation of 2 Pet. 3 : 13, which contains the most ample refutation of his own theory : "Nevertheless, according to God's promise to Abraham, as explained, Isa. 65 : 17, we who believe firmly expect the creation of new heavens and of a new earth, wherein righteous men shall dwell forever." Now, let the reader turn to Isa. 65 and see how utterly irreconcilable the description of the new heavens and earth is to his complete and utter destruction of the world by fire ; for mortal men in the flesh, engaged in worldly occupations, living to a great age—according to his own reference—still exist, notwithstanding his utter destruction of all things, and survive in this renewal. And then his reference to Abraham—to whom this earth, and not another, was promised—likewise invalidates his wholesale deductions from Peter's language. To indicate how opponents, after employing 2 Pet. 3 against us, and positively affirming its meaning to be opposed to our view, refuse to give an exposition of the chapter, we refer to Dr. Brown. In a Review of "Dr. Brown's Life and Works," in the North Brit. Review, Aug., 1860, it is stated that he published comments on various parts of the New Test., including the First Epis. of Peter and the first ch. of the Sec. Epistle, and it is significantly added : "He would not, however, venture to expound the remaining chapters till 'better informed and more fully assured, for many difficulties occurred in them ; a token that he was now feeling one of the symptoms of age, in being 'afraid of that which is high.'" While we may admire the modesty of the man, which recognized the difficulties (as e.g. the connection with Isa. 65 : 17, etc.) of reconciling this chapter with his system of belief, yet it certainly finds no expression when employing the same against Millenarianism.

Obs. 7. As just intimated, any view of Peter's statement which makes an imperfect Redemption, in not restoring the earth, the animate creation, and the race of man to their forfeited position, ought at once to be rejected as inconsistent with the Divine Purpose respecting Redemption as given in covenant and promise, and with the perfection, honor, and glory of the Redeemer (Prop. 140, Obs. 7). To make this earth, animated creation, and the race of man, as such, all to be destroyed, rooted out of existence, or (as a climax) to have it all one mass of fire, perpetuated in this state to constitute (so Pres. Edwards' His. Redemp., p. 421) an eternal hell (!) for sinners and devils—this is to make Redemption incomplete, to keep this earth forever under the curse, to restore only a few of the forfeited blessings, and to diminish, with fearful rigor, some of the most comprehensively precious promises that the Bible contains. Strange indeed that men should allow one passage to crush the hope engendered in a groaning creation, in a sin-cursed earth, in the longings of nations, and to limit the rich and full restitution of all things and the expressed ability and willingness of the Mighty King to perform it. The early Church could not be so illogical.

Hence it is that a vast multitude of writers, whatever view they take of the extent of the conflagration, coincide with the statement of the Ency. Brit., art. "Conflagration," viz., "it is more consistent with the narrative itself, as well as with physical science, to consider it as introductory to a new and better state of things—a new heavens and new earth." The difficulty of otherwise reconciling Peter's language with that of the prophets has evidently led to the view expressed by this writer, "some learned and able expositors, among them Lightfoot and Owen," make it figurative, and "have referred it altogether to the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Jewish polity." This last opinion we cannot, however, indorse for the reasons (1) that a future fire in connection with the perdition of the ungodly and the renewal of the earth is associated with the Sec. Advent ; (2) that the same is expressed in the context of Mill. predictions as something introductory ; (3) that the contrast which Peter presents to previous changes forbids an exclusive figurative application ; and (4) that in the overthrow of Jerusalem, etc., no such fulfilment of "a new heaven and new earth" was realized (as described by the promise in Isa. 65 and 66), and hence the application is erroneous.

Obs. 8. Having clearly shown from the covenant made with David, etc., that the land and the earth is Christ's, that the Jewish nation as such (associated with the Theocracy), and other nations through it, belong to Christ, that both form "the inheritance" of David's Son, it is presuming to fasten such an interpretation upon 2 Pet. 3 as will at once and forevermore destroy the very inheritance which is promised to Him. "Feeble and weak" as the apostolic and primitive Fathers were, in some respects, when compared with the profound (?) learning of modern theologians, yet none of them has been guilty of so great a violation of propriety as to introduce a doctrine which sweeps away the inheritance of Jesus and that of His saints ; which makes it utterly impossible for either to inherit promises most solemnly attested to by the oath of the Eternal One. It was reserved for men of real intellectual strength and mental ability to do this ; for those ancient worthies, relying upon the simplicity of the Scriptures, and that every word of God is equally true, could find no such doctrine in Peter. Explaining (as justice and reason both suggest) Peter by the two promises of Isaiah, they found, as we also find to-day, ample evidence that Christ's promised inheritance is not affected by the extent of the conflagration. Turn again to those two passages and see how associated with the new heavens and new earth is the restoration and perpetuity of the Jewish race, of Gentile nations, and even the continued existence and change of animals, and it will be seen how impossible it was for a faith which clung both to the covenant given to David and to Peter's undoubted linking of Isaiah's predictions with his own portrayal of what should take place in connection with this fire, to adopt an interpretation which virtually denies to David's Son His own covenanted throne, Kingdom, people, land, etc. It is true, that those who do this strive to give to Him something which they esteem far better, and thus suppose that they honor Him the more; but this also is done at the expense of ignoring the covenant and going beyond the record.

If this fire is, as multitudes declare, a total destruction of this globe (and some even include the planets, etc.), or if it is as destructive and terrible as the Seventh-Day Adventists and others make it during the thousand years, how is it possible to verify the precise language given to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Prop. 49) that the identical land and countries through which they passed, upon which they reclined, and which they beheld, should be their personal inheritance? Whatever changes the fire may introduce, however terrific in its sweep of vengeance, the promises of inheritance convey the idea that geographically (for the rivers Nile and Euphrates are still boundaries) the land will retain its accustomed place—it will not be destroyed. And this is most fully corroborated by the general tenor and analogy of the Mill. descriptions, which portray this very earth—not destroyed—but blessed with glorious additions, a renewal designed to remove evil and extend happiness. Palestine, changed by the creative power and made beautiful, is geographically the same Palestine, with a restored Jewish nation and Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom under the sway of Christ and His saints, the centre of an earth-dominion. Any other view makes the promises of God of none effect, no matter what substitutions are presented under the specious plea of honoring Christ. We only rightly honor Jesus when we accept of the promises relating to Him as found recorded in the Scriptures.

Obs. 9. The time of this fire is the time when "the harvest of the earth" is gathered and the tares (Matt. 13 : 30, 39, 40) shall be "burned in the fire" (as "the ungodly men" mentioned by Peter), but this harvest (Rev. 14 : 14-20) occurs under the seventh trumpet preceding the Millennial age. When this conflagration takes place it is associated with the resurrection of the saints, for Peter encourages believers to expect a glorious deliverance at that period; this accurately corresponds with the resurrection (Rev. 11 : 15-18) and rewarding of the saints under the last trumpet when "the sovereignty of this world" shall be wielded by Christ. The mention of "the Day of Judgment" (comp. Props. 133 and 134) with a knowledge of the Jewish and Scriptural method of speaking of that day, viz., to be followed by Messiah's Kingdom here on earth as the Millennial prophecies declare; these are additional reasons why we should not force upon Peter an interpretation which must result in introducing an element of discord, thus preventing a harmonious adjustment between the Old and New Testaments.

Compare preceding and following propositions. Hence we cannot receive the expressed views of able writers, as e.g. that given by Brookes (The Truth, vol. 2, No. 12, p. 357), who lays down the following procedure at the close of the thousand years: "Then will follow the burning of the earth and the works that are therein, the new heavens and the earth wherein dwelleth righteousness," etc., and we find plenty of concessions respecting the inheritance of the Patriarchs and of the Son of David, the Millennial new heavens and new earth of Isa. 65 and 66, the perpetuity of Mill. blessedness, the Pre-Mill. Advent and fiery indignation, etc., scattered through his interesting writings, which amply refute this view. Indeed, we cannot see how brethren, when the perpetuity of the Mill. heavens and earth is expressly affirmed by the Spirit, can possibly have a conflagration of such an inheritance. On the other hand, we admire the logical consistency of that class of writers (as e.g. Dr. Seiss in his able third discourse in The Last Times, D. N. Lord in various articles in The Theol. and Lit. Journal, etc.), who make this fire Pre-Millennial, and have the Millennial earth to pass into the eternal ages without losing a particle of its glory by so terrific and destructive a conflagration. Let the student consider that covenant promises and numerous predictions based upon the same outweigh all such deductions of a deluge of utter destructive fire, Pre- or Post-Millennial.

Obs. 10. This passage has received various interpretations. (1.) One class, to which we have alluded (Prop. 133, Obs. 1.; Prop. 141, Obs. 1, etc.), bring the most extravagant interpretation to bear upon Peter, by which they evolve not only the utter destruction of the earth but that of the planetary system. As the very prodigality of expression and profuseness of imaginary extent is—aside from the arguments herein presented—the best refutation of its unscriptural attitude, it may be passed by without additional remark.<sup>1</sup> There is another class, allied with these in a rigorous interpretation, but far more moderate in their estimation of the ultimate result of this fire. While advocating its universality and the burning up of all things, etc., they at the same time deny that annihilation is denoted or such complete destruction is intended as to forbid the renewal and perpetuity of the same earth. In addition to the writers mentioned (Prop. 140, etc.) who hold to this, many others could be added, as e.g. Augustine, Griffin, Jay, Gregory the Great, Fuller, Pope, Benson, Urwick, Hodge, James, Brown, Pye Smith, etc. The distinguishing peculiarity of these two classes is, that they make the conflagration post-Millennial. Another class, who make the fire about as disastrous as the second class noticed, and yet hold that it is Pre-Millennial, that it will be followed by the setting up of Christ's Kingdom as predicted in the Millennial prophecies—are represented by Cumming* (The Gr. Trib., Lect., 12), Irving (Orations), Gill (Divinity), and others. These three classes, by the extent of the fire advocated, make no provision for the Kingdom to exist in its expressed covenanted terms, and none for the deliverance of inanimate and animate creation, having the same destroyed and an entire new creation erected from the ashes, etc. Instead of the curse being removed from the existing world, the world falls beneath the curse and is sacrificed, so that an entire new one which has never borne a curse may be created. The position, however, of the one party, that the fire is Pre-Millennial, is undoubtedly correct. (2.) Then we find a large class who make the entire fire a figurative description; and these again are divided into different parties. Thus e.g. that one which makes the destruction of the heavens and earth the overthrow of the Jewish polity, etc., and the new heavens and new earth the introduction of the Christian polity, etc.; so Dr. Hammond, and various of the destructive critics. Others, as Prof. Bush (Mill., p. 202, etc.), taking the figurative view, apply it to the overthrow of systems of error, etc., by the purifying influence of the truth (i.e. fire), which is yet

* And yet, in justice to Dr. Cumming, it must be said that in various places he expresses himself as if limiting the general destructiveness of the fire, as e.g. in the context of the oft-quoted passage: "Look at the floor on which you tread," etc. See also his Ser. on Rev. 20 : 6.

to bring about "that renovated order of things, moral, mental, and political," etc.* Dr. Thomas (Elpis Israel), and Christadelphians generally, refer the destruction to the Jewish polity, but explain the new heavens and earth to be still future, the introduction of the new polity under the Messiah at His Sec. Coming (thus separating by a long interval what Peter unites in succession). In regard to such applications of the figurative sense, it may be observed, that the destruction here presented, whatever it may denote, is inseparably joined with the Sec. Advent, the Day of Judgment, and the Day of the Lord, and hence is still future; while the contrasting with the literal perishing at the deluge indicates that more must be attached to it than the simply figurative. Mede (Works, Exp. Peter), and others, in adopting the figurative conflagration, are more logical and consistent with the tenor of Peter's statements when they make it adumbrating or symbolizing the overthrow of governments, systems, etc., at the close of this dispensation, preparatory to the establishment (comp. Lord, Apoc., 21 : 5) of the Kingdom or government under the Messiah. It must be admitted, when the figurative language of Scripture is consulted and compared (see Sir I. Newton's Obs. on Proph., p. 1, Ch. 2; Faber's Dis. on Proph., Daubuz, Perp. Com. on Rev., writings of Brookes, Bickersteth, etc.) with each other and with Peter's language, there is sufficient force in the comparison instituted to lead to a belief that it is, at least, included. The Scriptures sometimes include the physical with the moral, etc., as in the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus, etc. To make it entirely figurative destroys at once the express contrast instituted by Peter respecting the perishing of the old world by water; and to make it entirely literal is to ignore the Scripture usage of such language. Taking into consideration the views then prevalent derived from the prophets, the style in which the prophecies are given, and the fact that both things (viz., the overthrow of all human governments and the renovation of the earth) are really embraced at this period, it seems the most consonant to believe that Peter comprehends both, that as water was used to destroy the old world, materially and in its governmental arrangements, so fire (not excluding other agencies) shall be employed in modifying and changing the present heavens and earth, materially and in the overthrow of earthly governments, and that the result will be the introduction of a new heavens, and new earth, materially renewed, and in the establishment of the Theocratic Kingdom. The old "heavens" really did not perish excepting as they adumbrate governments, etc. The contrasting of the three worlds—the three heavens and earth—seems to demand something like this interpretation, indicating that the truth lies somewhere between the figurative and literal application, embracing both in the manner pointed out. For, let us impress the reader with a fact, already noticed in Paul, that the apostles, in view of the enmity and persecuting spirit already prevalent, and which they knew was yet to come, could not be too cautious to express their views respecting the certain overthrow of earthly governments; and that all such teaching, to avoid bitter animosity and persecution, had, in the nature of the case, to be couched in prophetic language. The wisdom and admirable tact of Peter (as in Acts 3, using restitution) is noticeable, in his taking language not only correspondent with the usage of the prophets, but even in accordance with that employed by the nations around him,* and which virtually comprehends both. (3.) Then again there is an able and growing party who advocate that the fire of Peter will be literally experienced, but that it is confined to localities (some few writers have confined it to Judea or Palestine, others to the Roman earth, and still others have made it local, and by slow degrees, gradually extending over the earth), and will not be so disastrous or extensive as many suppose.<sup>4</sup> This view was early presented, has more or less continued, and recently has had a number of writers to express it in a most forcible manner. D. N. Lord in several of his writings, Dr. Seiss in his Last Times (see it eloquently presented in Third Dis., also "Day of the Lord"), and others, have argued against the universality of the fire (1) from the declared perpetuity of the earth; (2) the Noachic covenant, which promises no such destruction in the future as that of the deluge; (3) the saint's inheritance; (4) the meaning of Peter's phraseology; (5) the design of the fire, "the perdition of ungodly men;" (6) the agreements of Peter's language with the descriptions of volcanic eruptions, etc.; (7) the language of the prophets describing the same events, etc. They exhibit those fires as dreadful and connected with "terrific phenomena." In conclusion: looking at those various interpretations, the dispassionate student will certainly feel inclined—considering the Oneness of the Spirit through whom holy men spake—to give the preference to those who, instead of taking Peter's prophecy isolated and then proceed to build upon it a series of tremendous doctrines, endeavor to ascertain its meaning by a comparison with the analogy of faith, with other predictions given by the same Spirit. Caution must be engendered by the simple fact that equally as strong language as Peter uses is employed by Nah. 1 : 5 in reference to Nineveh, and in Deut. 32 : 22; Micah 1 : 4; Isa. 13 : 9-14; Amos 9 : 5, etc., in such a way as to indicate a continuation of the earth, nations, etc., after terrible convulsions and punishments. The same is true of Isa. 24 : 19-23; Isa. 2 : 10-22; Jer. 4 : 23-28, and numerous other passages. The limitation even with which sometimes the word "earth" is used, the verbal criticisms (Crit. Eng. Test.) which unite men of opposite views, the fact that change and not such destruction is evidenced by Ps. 102 : 25-27; Heb. 1 : 10-12 (the parallelism limiting and defining the first clause)—all this should have its influence in forming our decision. Even the "earnestly expecting and ardently wishing, and anticipating" (Bloomfield), "earnestly desiring" (Newcome), "awaiting with eager desire" (Barnes), this "coming of the Day of God," corresponding again with that of the prophets, with the pious Jewish language, etc., should be regarded. While a comparison of the intent of this fire with the overthrow of the wicked—in which fire is also alluded to—Rev. 19 : 19-21; Matt. 25 : 31-46; Ps. 11-6; Dan. 7 : 9-11; 2 Thess. 2 : 8; Joel 3 : 9-16; Zech. 14 : 1-15; Ezek. 38 : 22, etc., leads to the conclusion that it must be—Peter also linking it with Isa. 65 : 17, and 66 : 22—Pre-Millennial. Linked with a coming of the Messiah, with which the restored Theocratic Kingdom is associated; with an earth, however it may experience the ordeal of fire, the same earth renewed; with a continued materiality (see Chalmers's Sermon on 2 Pet. 3 : 13), which, as in glorified humanity, etc., God employs, as the prophets teach, to display His attributes and glory and to make His creatures happy; with a new heavens and new earth, which was inseparably connected in the Jewish mind with the Kingdom of the Messiah and a return to a Paradisiacal state; with the extirpation of sin from the world and not with a destruction of that which is not in itself sinful; with the inheritance of Abraham, the saints, and Christ Himself, which cannot be effaced without violation of God's faithful Word; with

“the restitution of all things,” “the regeneration,” the deliverance of groaning creation, the shaking of heaven and earth, and numerous other promises which are then to be realized—surely with all this before us, the conflagration of Peter can only be explained consistently with the uniform and concurrent teaching of Holy Writ. It cannot, it does not form an exception. Taking, on the one hand, the most positive declarations that sin, suffering, opposing and hostile powers shall continuously exist down to the Sec. Advent, and then, on the other hand, the emphatic predictions that these shall be rooted out of the very same earth—that all sorrow, misery, and wickedness shall cease to exist in it—and that it shall become fruitful, beautiful, etc.,—it follows that the only position—consistently sustained by the reasons adduced—for a believer in all that God says, is that already indicated. Peter’s statement shows us, how both these Scriptural representations are sustained and verified; how the sin-stained vesture and fashion shall be changed for the garments alone suited for the manifested royalty; how this earth now can expectantly look for redemption and then can rejoice and exult in the possession of the same; how God can (for He is not wasteful of material) take the old and out of it bring forth the gloriously renewed without impairing His own workmanship; and how this earth, once pronounced good but now marred by sin, shall again be restored to all its forfeited blessings and to the singing of “the morning stars” and the shouting of “the Sons of God” over its recovery.*

* See e.g. a specimen given by Dr. Seiss, p. 67, Last Times, which he appropriately calls “sublime nonsense.” The descriptive powers of some men are exhibited in what may be aptly called “fire-theology.” To give another illustration: In Priest’s View of the Millennium, we have the following: “The planets dash against each other,” fly toward the sun and “will dash one against the other, which indeed will be a wreck of matter and a crush of world on fire.” Somehow or other, while this dashing of planets is going on, our earth still remains in its orbit to pass through the appointed ordeal; it “hangs amid the trembling air,” which air is caused to tremble by Gabriel’s voice that is equal to “the treasured thunders of ten thousand years bursting from their iron vaults” (whatever that may mean), and “the great solar vortex breaks forth in flames of fire,” “lakes of fire, rivers of melted glowing matter, ten thousand volcanoes vomiting flames all at once, thick darkness, and pillars of smoke twisted about with wreaths of flame like fiery snakes, mountains of earth thrown into the air and the heavens dropping down in lumps of fire,” until finally the earth becomes “a molten sea of fire,” and it “shall be thrown from its orb to where a hell of fire in the deep recess of eternal night hath its place.” Alas! that numerous such specimens can be found in R. Catholic and Protestant writers, so derogatory to the Plan of Redemption and the honor and glory of Jesus Christ. It is saddening to read such views as are given by Prest. Edwards in his His. of Redemption, by Scott in his Com. loci (which is approvingly quoted by Bloomfield, Com. loci, as reducing all things “to as confused a chaos as that from which it was first created;” and who also indorses Shakespeare’s oft-repeated saying respecting “the great globe” dissolving “And, like the baseless fabric of a dream, leave not a wreck behind”); by Barnes, Com. loci, and others. We are forced to ask whether the doctrine of many divines does not accord with that of Sophocles, as quoted by Justin, On the Sole Gov. of God:

“That time of times shall come, shall surely come,
When from the golden ether down shall fall
Fire’s teeming treasure, and in burning flames
All things of earth and heaven shall be consumed;
And then when all creation is dissolved,
The sea’s last wave shall die upon the shore,
The bald earth strip of trees, the burning air
No winged thing upon its breast shall bear.”

* Others, favoring a present development through existing means, interpret it to denote “a universal renovation of manners, sentiments, and actions throughout the world,” or “a universal triumph of political freedom, general wisdom, and exalted piety”—but how it is to remove the curse, make the earth beautiful, etc., as portrayed in Mill. descriptions, they fail to tell us—only asserting that it will. See an eloquent reply to this in Dr.

Seiss's Last Times, pp. 82 and 83; also John Wesley's Ser. on Rev. 21 : 5, where he rebukes those who would limit the New Heavens and New Earth "to the present state of things" or make it "fulfilled when Constantine poured in riches and honors upon the Christians," saying, "What a miserable way is this of making void the whole counsel of God, with regard to all that grand chain of events, in reference to His Church, yea, and to all mankind, from the time that John was in Patmos unto the end of the world!"

* That the Stoics and many others advocated a renovation and the agency of fire, has been noticed by numerous writers. See Writings of Philo Judæus, vol. 4, p. 32, etc., Origen, Ag. Celsus (B. 5, ch. 20, etc.), Wetstein on 2 Pet., Burnet's Theory of the Earth, Commentaries on the passage which, almost all, refer to the fact. For other views, Clarke's Ten Religions, Mallet's Northern Antiquities, Northern Mythology, by Thorpe, Howitt's Lit. and Romances of Northern Europe, etc. Barnes, Com. loci, refers to Seneca, N. Q. 3 : 28; Cicero N. D. 2 : 46; Simplicius in Arist. de Cælo, 1 : 9; Eusebius P. 15, 18. Others, as Seiss, mention Plato, Plutarch's reference to the Persians, Strabo, Virgil, etc. Others, (as Cyclop., R. K.) Pythagoreans, Platonists, Epicureans, Phœnicians, Siamese, Brahmims—also the Sibylline books, Hystaspes, Ovid, Lucretian, etc.

* Thus e.g. Bonar (Redemption, p. 117, etc.) limits it to Papal Christendom, making it the same as the burning in Dan. 7 and Rev. 18, chiefly exhibited in Europe, but may be felt over the whole world. The idea attached to the fierceness and destructiveness of the fire is this: that wherever it falls an utter destruction, not leaving root or branch, will ensue. It does not necessarily follow that the whole earth, every portion, is thus to be visited, for this must be ascertained by the general teaching on the subject.

* Which reminds one of Lederer (Israelite Indeed, May, 1867), that if God made a covenant not again to destroy all flesh, as He did by the flood, and we deny this by saying that He will do it, then "we admit the interpretation of some Rabbies of old, who said that God swore never to destroy the earth by water, but He may destroy it by fire, or in some other way, to be correct. Then God would have sworn an oath with mental reservation, which He would condemn in man, His frail creature."

* This, therefore, answers the alleged insuperable objection, urged and repeated by Brown, Barnes, Hodge, and a host of opponents, how it is possible for mortal men in the flesh (as the Jewish nation and spared Gentiles) to be "tided over this all-enveloping, all-reducing deluge of fire" into the new earth. We answer, precisely on the same principle, that they allow the continuation of mortal men in the flesh in those Old Test. passages (quoted in the text), where the earth is represented as wholly consumed, destroyed, dissolved, etc., and yet—forced by the analogy of Scripture—they admit, must be understood with limitations, because mortals still survive and the earth is not literally destroyed, only the portions thereof which experience the fire of vengeance. Now, if they, in their comments on the Old Test., can thus explain as consistent and truthful (without a doubt) language fully as sweeping and "all-enveloping and all-reducing" as Peter's, and tell us that this is the expression of the Holy Spirit, why, when the same Spirit in Peter employs similar phraseology must it be—volens volens—understood without limitation, when the most cogent reasons exist calling for such a limitation. Simple consistency in their own interpretation of the Spirit's declarations ought to make them less dogmatic in insisting upon one meaning only, and that the most destructive possible, to be given to 2 Pet. 3, in order to raise up, if possible, an insurmountable objection to Pre-Millenarianism.

Obs. 11. But in this discussion we are not concerned in advocating any specific interpretation of Peter's language. Let it be admitted, that all the explanations given are "pitiful subterfuges," and that the fire is universal, yet a believer in God's Word should find no difficulty even in this extreme statement of the case. Let the conflagration be thus universal or local, universal by slow advances or confined to the Roman earth, universal by uniting Pre- and Post-Millennial agencies, or entirely Pre-Millennial, one thing ought to be self-evident to the believer, viz., that this fire, whatever it may be, and however extended in its effects, will not and cannot destroy the mortal men in the flesh, the Jewish nation and spared Gentiles, whom God has determined to save. The difficulty is, as alleged, that we cannot tell how, if the conflagration is general, at the same time, these can be preserved. Taking it for granted that it is thus universal, we are told that we cannot give "a reason" for the hope that is in us, and that our theory is "a stupendous theological misnomer," etc.<sup>1</sup> Having already shown, in various places, the just connection existing between reason and faith, it is not necessary to restate our position. While advocating the use of reason, yet, after reason has once admitted the Omnipotence, etc., of the Eternal One, it must be regarded as very unreasonable to limit the Divine attributes. It is a characteristic of believers, in opposition to unbelievers, to receive all that God says He will perform, even if not able fully or satisfactorily to explain or reconcile all His words and predictions;—and this is properly based upon the reason (derived from reason apprehending God as described), that the wisdom and power of God will be found equal to any emergency that may arise in the fulfilment (in the order given) of His predictions, no matter how inexplicable they may appear unto us. Indeed, one of the writers (Shimeall) who expresses himself so strongly against us on the ground of impossibility, etc., gives us in the very same book a sufficient reply to his own objection in the following just lesson of faith urged against another party who lacked faith: "We might ask, 'Is anything too hard for the Lord? Is our unbelief to be the measure of his truth?' If a few had objected, before the events, the improbability, approaching not only to moral but to physical impossibility, that Messiah could ever be born of a virgin: suppose, further, he had objected to the improbability of such a religion as that of Christ, with such apparently inadequate support, and so contrary to men's prejudices and passions, ever so prevailing in the world, as that one day all nations should bow to Him—how would such an objection meet this antagonist but by arguments that would equally refute his own, viz., faith in the truth and power of God." If this is so, why then urge "physical impossibility" against us, when we even by no means make the emergency for such to arise in our interpretation of Peter? A moral inconsistency or impossibility would be fatal to our argument, but that of mere "physical impossibility" (because the objector cannot see how it is to be done) has no pertinency or force relating to the accomplishment of any prediction that God has given, after the mighty exhibitions of His ability to perform anything and everything that He has determined. Witness the saving of a remnant in the flesh when the deluge encompassed the earth, the birth of Isaac, the salvation of Israel at the Red Sea, the protection of the flesh and even the clothing of the Hebrews in the intense heat of the king's furnace, the conception of Jesus, etc., and surely with such manifestations of God's most wonderful ability to accomplish all things, we must utterly repudiate the principle that we are at liberty to reject any prediction, or to reverse its order of fulfilment, because we, forsooth, cannot comprehend or explain how it is to be done, or how it is to be reconciled with natural causes. Apply this unbelieving principle to the conflagration itself, to the resurrection of the dead, to the changing of the living saints, to the miracles of Christ, creation, the mode of our existence, etc., and see how little these, as well as a multitude of other things, are dependent upon our amount of knowledge concerning them. Prophecies, which before their fulfilment seemed of impracticable (from a human standpoint) accomplishment were exactly realized; and thus others are given (is it to test the faith of Abraham's seed?) in relation to the future, which will be verified in like manner, no matter whether believed or not, simply because God will indeed perform "a strange work," "a new thing," and while engaged in it He is abundantly able to "cover in the shadow of His hand," so that (Isa. 43 : 2) "when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee" (or as Delitzsch : " When thou goest into fire, thou shalt not be burned, and the flames shall not set thee on fire").<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Reading such charges reminds us of what Dr. Auberlen says : " In a time like ours, when not only the Gospel of the cross, but even the most elementary views of God, of right and light, are foolishness to the Greeks, and often even to the noblest of them, it is of paramount importance to be faithful in the simple and fundamental truths which, however insignificant they may appear, are the foundation of all the rest, and to give all honor to truth with manly, moral and logical energy, not heeding the contemptuous shrugging of shoulders of either friend or foe."

<sup>2</sup> The reader will find some very impressive remarks on faith in the ability of God to perform His predictions in Keith's Harm. of Prophecy, the last chapter. The expression of Tertullian, " Credo quia impossibile est," which has excited the ridicule of multitudes, and is most sneeringly brought forth in recent works as evincing " unreasoning faith," contains a sublime truth, being simply founded on Christian faith, which must necessarily believe in that which is impossible to man—otherwise redemption has no need of the supernatural intervening. The foundation laid in the Person of Jesus the Christ, the superstructure, and the culmination—all demands that which is impossible to man. But this very faith in the impossible (as we will show under a following Prop.) is the most reasonable, because it alone meets the requirements of man. The reader will, no doubt, be pleased to be reminded of the quaint remarks of Sir Thom. Browne (Relig. Medici, sec. 9) : " I desire to exercise my faith in the difficultest point ; for to credit ordinary and visible objects is not faith but persuasion. Some believe the better for seeing Christ's sepulchre ; and when they have seen the Red Sea, doubt not of the miracle. Now, contrarily, I bless myself, and am thankful that I lived not in the days of miracles ; that I never saw Christ, nor His disciples. I would not have been one of those Israelites that passed the Red Sea ; nor one of Christ's patients on whom He wrought His wonders ; then had my faith been thrust upon me ; nor should I enjoy that greater blessing pronounced on all that believe and saw not," etc.

PROPOSITION 151. This Kingdom is identified with "the new heavens and new earth" of Isa. 65 : 17 and 66 : 22, of 2 Pet. 3 : 13, and of Rev. 21 : 1.

Having shown that "the new heavens and new earth" of Isaiah and Peter are identical, another step in the discussion is requisite, viz., to prove that the same is also denoted in Rev. 21 : 1, or, that one and the same state is meant by the three prophets. This becomes the more necessary since many attempt to invalidate our doctrine by denying their identity, separating them, and making them descriptive of different eras of time. Thus e.g. some make the heavens, etc., of Isaiah and Peter something of the past and present, while those of John are still future; others make Isaiah refer to the Millennial era, while Peter and John follow that period; others again make Isaiah and Peter relate to the Millennium and John's heaven, etc., succeed it.<sup>1</sup> We believe that they all refer to the same thing and to the same time; and for which belief the following reasons are assigned (comp. Prop. 148) :

<sup>1</sup> In this connection one party has much to say respecting "a Davidic age" and "a Solomonian age," making the reigns of David and Solomon typical (Solomon ought to have turned out a better man to form a type) of those future periods, the Millennial and succeeding. But we cannot receive these types, which are not only merely conjectural, but opposed to the fact that when Messiah's Kingdom commences it is under one Head and eternal (see Prop. 159, on duration of Kingdom). Admitting that at the end of the Millennium its glory may be greater, etc., yet such increase is not thus to be measured by Solomon's reign. Excellent and able men indorse this view, but to us it seems harsh and unjust; because even David's Kingdom is no type of Christ's but a reality which David's Son at the appointed time is to inherit, i.e. the same Theocratic throne and Kingdom over the same elect people. (See Prop. 122.)

Obs. 1. It is not necessary to repeat the arguments which show the connection of Isaiah and Peter. This has been done in the immediate preceding (e.g. 148 and 149) Propositions, to which, in justice to us, the reader will please refer. The views of the Jews, the correspondence of language with their belief, the reference direct to Isaiah by Peter, etc., must, in order to make the line of argument complete, be duly considered. To one party of our opponents, let it be said, that conceding as they do a Pre-Millennial Advent of Jesus and His reign during that age, they must explain how this is to be reconciled with Peter's delineation of the scoffers and their language, which cannot be thus applied to accord with their theory, or with their expressed views of the approach of "the Day of God." But the connection of Isaiah and Peter will appear more fully and distinctively by noticing how John corroborates it.

The position of e.g. Lange's Com., 2 Peter, loci, is alone tenable, viz., that of identifying Isa. and Peter as describing the same new heavens and earth: "This hope (i.e. expressed by Peter) is founded on the word of prophecy, Isa. 65 : 17 ; 66 : 22 ; 30 : 26 ; Cf. Rev. 21 : 1."

Obs. 2. Before showing the latter, the reader ought to determine that the separation of John's account of "the new heaven and new earth" from its direct relationship to the Millennial age in ch. 20, or the finding it recorded after the account given of that era (and upon which so much stress is laid by some), is no proof whatever that its realization must also succeed that period. This is so fully granted by many of those who differ from us, that it should not, in itself, be used as an argument against us.<sup>1</sup> It eminently deserves (to avoid confusion, etc.) a separate and distinctive description, which, connected by parallel utterances, sufficiently, as a comparison evinces, identifies the period of its coming.

<sup>1</sup> As illustrative we select several as follows : Prof. Bush (Mill., p. 94) says that it is "in accordance with a feature of the sacred writings of incessant occurrence, in which events, whether historically or symbolically related, are transposed out of their first chronological order," and quotes Lightfoot (Works, vol. 2, p. 61), "It is a well-known and well-grounded maxim among Jews, that 'non est prius et posterius in Scripturâ.' Their meaning in it is this, that the order and place of a text as it stands in the Bible doth not always infer or enforce the very time of the story, which the text relateth ; but that sometimes—nay it occurreth very oft—stories are laid out of their natural and chronological place, and things are very frequently related before which, in order of time, occurred after ; and so 'e contra.' Nor is this transposition and dislocation of times and texts proper to the evangelists only, but the same Spirit that dictated both Testaments alike ; laying texts, chapters, and histories out of the proper place in which, according to natural chronological order, they would have lain." Horne, Introd., gives, "On the Interp. of Scrip. Proph.," p. 388, vol. 1, the following rule : "The order of time is not always to be looked for in the prophetic writings ; for they frequently resume topics of which they have formerly treated, after other subjects have intervened, and again discuss them." Victorinus (Apoc. 7 : 2), one of the earliest expositors, fully recognizes this principle : "The order of the things said is not to be regarded, since often the Holy Spirit, when He has run to the end of the last time, again returns to the same times, and supplies what He has less fully expressed." Many expositors, especially of the Apocalypse, express themselves in the same way, and point out a number of instances (as e.g. the last Seal embracing things under the sixth, ch. 7, ch. 11, ch. 12, ch. 13, ch. 16, ch. 17, etc.) in which events previously referred to are afterward taken up more in detail. Indeed, however men may differ in the application of the principle in particular instances, every interpreter must, in simple consistency, more or less adopt it.

Obs. 3. Again, as one party seeks to make its view that of the early fathers, Barnabas and Tertullian (see Prop. 148, Obs. 4), it may be as well to state, that the references made by Barnabas and Tertullian do not relate at all to the non-identity of these new heavens and earth. They simply declare, what we also hold, that a complete restoration of all things will not be fully witnessed until the close of the Millennial period. On the other hand, we have the most positive proof that so far as "the new heavens," etc., of John is concerned, they believed it to be fully correspondent with and embracing the Millennial era. Thus e.g. Tertullian (B. 3, Ag. Marcion, ch. 24) says : "For we also confess, that a Kingdom is promised us on earth : before that in heaven, but in another state, viz., after the resurrection, for it will be for a thousand years in a city of divine workmanship, viz., Jerusalem brought down from heaven ; and this city Ezekiel knew and the Apostle John saw," etc. After declaring that this is the city for the saints at that time, he closes : "This is the manner of the heavenly Kingdom." Barnabas, in his argument respecting the covenant being fulfilled in the seventh chiliad, makes the latter the Sabbath, the "blessed rest, when we have received the righteous promise, when iniquity shall be no more, all things being renewed (Rev. 21) by the Lord," etc. Whatever views the Fathers may have entertained respecting succeeding ages and even changes, it is apparent from their writings that they made no distinction between Isaiah, Peter, and John on this point, but quote from all of them directly or inferentially as pertaining to the same period of time. They speak of the perpetuity of the state introduced at the Millennial era, of the eternal duration of the Kingdom then established, and of the everlasting blessedness then bestowed, and in such comprehensive terms that this "new heaven and earth" enters into the eternal ages without being destroyed or passing away. Admitting their liability to error, yet, if sustained by Scripture, a logical consistency, which is to their credit, supports that general unanimity among them.

Obs. 4. The matter, however, must be decided by a direct appeal to the Scriptures, and as this decision is dependent upon time, when Rev. chs. 21 and 22 will be fulfilled, it is in place to point out the reasons why they must be linked with the Millennial period. (1.) The phrase "new heaven and new earth" corresponds accurately with Isaiah's and Peter's language. This is so much felt that some have made Isaiah's heaven typical of the other. (2.) But that it is no type, and will not be superseded by the heaven of Peter or John, is evident from the announcement that the heaven of Isaiah when once created will not pass away (Prop. 148, Obs. 4). God appeals to that heaven as indicating His unfailing faithfulness (Isa. 66 : 22), and the inhabitants (Isa. 65 : 18) are to "be glad and rejoice forever in that which I create," thus disposing of the typical theory, teaching the perpetuity of the heaven and earth introduced at the Millennial era, and informing us how to understand the fleeing away of the heaven, etc., in Rev. 20 : 11 (Prop. 148, Obs. 4). In reference to the last passage, in addition to its being parenthetical, given to identify the Person on the throne and convey an idea of irresistible power by what He had already performed, it may be said that the action described accords with what really transpires (as Millennial predictions show), when the Millennium is introduced ; that from the creation of the new heaven, etc., at the Millennial era, owing to its perpetuity, "no place was found for the old ;" that it is not asserted that the new Millennial heaven fled away, but simply "the earth and heaven ;" that if it is maintained that the Millennial new heaven, etc., flee away, giving place to another, then we have a violation of the order laid down by Peter, who tells us that the present heaven and earth are to be changed, not for Millennial ones, and then afterward for another substitution, not a thousand years after the Sec. Advent, but at the Sec. Coming. He only recognizes one such creation after the present one, and in this sustains the perpetuity ascribed to the Millennial heaven by all the prophets, who with one voice describe at the coming of the Mighty One a glorious restitution which is perpetual in its nature. Taking also the view presented under Props. 147 and 148, that the phrase "heaven and earth" embrace the import, according to Scriptural usage, of government, dominion, and their supporters, it follows (as will be more fully shown under Prop. 159) that such a substitution after the Messiah's Kingdom (which is everlasting, etc., and established at the ushering in of the Millennial era), cannot take place. (3.) If "the new heaven and new earth" of the Millennial era shall pass away, then the language of Rev.

21 : 1, that "the first heaven and the first earth were passed away," would not describe it, seeing that that of the Millennium is not—admitting the very statements of our opponents—"the first," for they have the changing of the present (first) heaven and earth into a new Millennial, and then the changing of this second one into another "new" one. The mention of the word "first" guards us against the typical application, and shows which heaven and earth is changed. (4) The phrase "and there was no more sea," which is supposed to present a serious objection to our view, indicates that the Millennial heaven and earth of Isaiah is denoted. It is gratuitously assumed that because "sea" is sometimes used in its literal sense, it must be literally understood here. But—however the literal to some extent might, for aught we know, accompany it—we find in Dan. 7 : 2 ; Ps. 65 : 7 ; Rev. 13 : 1 ; Ps. 93 : 3, 4 ; Hab. 3 : 8, and numerous places, flood and sea, mighty waters, etc., employed to denote the agitation, unsettled condition, revolutionary tendencies, anarchy, warlike and turbulent commotions of nations. Take this meaning, so emphatically exhibited in prophetic usage, and it is predicted that during this period the nations (showing also that they survive) are disposed to peace under the Theocratic reign of Jesus, thus happily corresponding with many descriptions of the Millennial state which make this peculiarity, freedom from war, etc., a distinguishing excellence. King Jesus "at His appearing and Kingdom" will introduce such an order of things that the turbulence of the sea will be unknown, and war between nations will cease." (5) In Rev. 19 : 7, 8, 9, just before the one thousand years, it is said that the marriage of the Lamb hath come, and His wife hath made herself ready, etc. This conclusively shows that Rev. chs. 21 and 22 are retrospective, and that they do not describe a new order of things after the Millennium. Would it not be strange, when "the marriage is come," and "the Bride is ready," to postpone the marriage a thousand years? Why does the Spirit assert the former, if we are not to understand that the marriage with (Rev. 21 : 9) "the Bride, the Lamb's wife," is then consummated, without so long an intervening period? With the Early Church and a long line of worthies, this notion of an interval (derogatory to the Bridegroom and Bride) after the Coming of the Bridegroom (at Sec. Advent), must be rejected as untenable." (6) By comparing Rev. chs. 21 and 22 with the Millennial prophecies, as e.g. Isa. chs. 60 and 54, keeping in view the connection of the latter with the Advent and the marriage, we are at no loss to see why, under the teaching of inspired men, the Early Church so universally held that all these prophecies portrayed a New Jerusalem state here on the earth in the Millennial age. It seems almost strange that any other opinion can be entertained, when the Spirit employs precisely the same language, presents the same ideas, etc., in all these prophecies. If the passages alluded to are compared, such is the similarity of blessing, of events, of deliverance, etc., that they necessarily must—if there is propriety in language—be applied to the same period of time. It will not answer to admit, as some do, that the same state is indeed described, but that only the eighth age or eternal state after the Millennium is meant by John, for then John, using Millennial phraseology, ought to have specifically discriminated or intimated such a transference of idea ; besides this, according to the theory of such, it is utterly impossible for them to receive Isaiah as describing the state mentioned by John without mutilating and expunging (as e.g. Isa. 60 : 12 ; and Isa. 54 : 15, etc.) passages, which, taking their own admissions, are inconsistent with an era after the Millennial. The fact that the prophecies cannot thus be taken in their entirety, descriptive of one period, although employing the same language, etc., is against our opponents; for denying their complete resemblance and identity, they plunge into difficulties from which there is no escape.<sup>4</sup> To perfect this identity, the same blessings enjoyed in the New Jerusalem state are also attributed to the Millennial era; such as the tabernacle of God with men, wiping away all tears, no more death, no sorrow, crying, and pain, making all things new, the glory of God, the open gates, the brightness that needs no sun, the river and the tree of life, no more curse, the throne of God and the Lamb, the beholding of His face, the name in the forehead, no night, the reigning, etc. (7) The period of inheriting is at the Sec. Advent (when the Mill. age commences, and this inheriting, in Millennial phraseology, is also found in connection with Rev. 21 : 7, thus accurately corresponding with the promises to the saints that at the Sec. Coming they shall obtain the New Jerusalem. Such is the impression made by Rev. 3 : 11, 12; Gal. 4 : 26; Heb. 12 : 22, seeing that the crowning, etc., is invariably linked with the Advent. This again is corroborated by Rev. 22 : 10-15 where the city is spoken of as something immediately connected with the Advent of Jesus, which the righteous shall enter, etc. He comes, and gives the right both to the tree of life and to the city.<sup>5</sup> (8) While the New Jerusalem is manifested in this new earth, "the nations" are permitted to enjoy its "light," etc., agreeably to other Millennial predictions, as e.g. Isa. 60. Those who make the city symbolical of and embracing the saints, and then make these "nations" the same saints, involve themselves in a confusion of ideas. That these "nations" are the same as those specified to exist in the Millennium is apparent from the simple fact that they still require "healing." The saints who inherit the city, with other blessings, are incorruptible, immortal (1 Cor. 15), and need no healing, while the nations being mortal have continued necessity to partake of "the leaves of the tree for the healing of the nations." The latter condition only corresponds with the one delineated in Mill. prophecies.<sup>6</sup> (9) The identity of the Theocratic element, the reign of Christ and His saints, the same grandeur and glory of the Kingdom, the exaltation of the married wife (Prop. 118), when "the desolate one" is again remembered in mercy; in brief, our entire argument bearing upon the Kingdom, clearly shows that the Kingdom of the Messiah, in the same period of time, is delineated by all of these prophecies—only one of them, Rev. 20 : 1-7, specifying a thousand years (upon which really this division is founded), not as a limit to the Theocratic Kingdom, but as the limit of Satan's binding and of the non-resurrection of the rest of the dead. (10) But we are told that the continuance of the seasons during the Millennial age is incompatible with the conflagration predicted by Peter and the state described by John. But here again is a beautiful consistency between Rev. 21 : 23 and Isa. 60 : 19; for the former expressly limits the "no need of the sun, neither of the moon" to the city, indicating by the reference itself that they indeed exist, but that such is the brightness of the city obtained through its august Theocratic Ruler that it does not need that of these luminaries; while the latter has reference to the same locality, being confined to the restored Jewish nation, Jerusalem its capital city (with which the New is associated), with Jewish and Gentile saints united with it, so that the same effulgence of the city, proceeding from the same great source, is represented as extending (not over the whole earth, but) over the holy land. The continuance of sun and moon is also intimated in the next verse. Besides this, the objection takes too much for granted, seeing that the design of Peter's fire is nowhere asserted to be to cradicate the seasons; that the seasons, or rather sun and moon, are given a permanency equal to the existence of the earth, of Messiah's Kingdom, and of God's faithfulness in promise, that if the seasons cease, it must be based on the utter destruction not only of this earth (and the substitution of an entirely new and differing one), but of the solar system, all of which requires no serious refutation. Besides this seasons are mentioned in the "every month" of Rev. 22 : 2. (11) The perfect agreement of Rev. 21 and 22 with Isa. 60, etc., in describing "the nations" and "the kings of the earth" at this period of time can only be predicated upon a complete similarity of view in time respecting its occurrence.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Some, as Shimeall, etc., admit that in the Mill. era, or new heaven and new earth of Isaiah, there is "a most signal change," so that it will "extend to the removal of the curse from the ground and also from the circumambient air which envelops the earth." In brief, a return to the paradisiacal condition. We ask, if the curse is thus removed from the ground and air, and animals, etc., wherein arises the necessity of their destruction as given by Peter? Will God destroy what He has again made good? Will He destroy the inheritance thus restituted of the saints and of Christ for a time enjoyed? Can we believe that a restored Eden can be thus summarily rooted out? Is the restored Davidic throne, the glory of the earthly built Jerusalem, the splendor and magnificence of the Kingdom instituted, as described by the prophets, to be thus fearfully overthrown by fire? No, never! Let able men entertain such views, yet are they opposed to the plainest promises of God's Word. And, stranger still, such persons object to our view—which makes no such demands on the ground of "physical impossibility," while overlooking the moral impossibility in their own theory.

<sup>2</sup> Numerous German, English, American, and other writers could be presented indorsing the figurative use of the word "sea," but they are not needed in the light of assigned Scripture usage. Should it be thought that the rising up of Gog and Magog is an exception which forbids such an interpretation, we reply: (1) That it would also prevent us from receiving the predictions of the Millennial era, which promise universal and continuous peace, the utter removal of war, the destruction of warlike material, etc. It is, therefore, like many others, a general statement, which is true, the solitary exception occurring after so long an interval, only indicating or manifesting its correctness; and (2) this exception may not, in a strict sense, prove to be one. The reason why the promise is given is evidently the implied comfort or idea that no "sea" can exist in that period of time which will cause the least injury to the saints or to the new heaven and new earth established. Hence, when Gog and Magog arise, the saints and the Kingdom are not affected by it, seeing that immediate and swift destruction comes upon Gog from the Lord.

<sup>3</sup> Some few, as Waggoner, to avoid this difficulty, have the marriage consummated and Bride and Bridegroom both return to heaven and remain until the close of the thousand years; but this is opposed to the entire order of events, and introduces inextricable confusion to a fair exposition. This will be noticed hereafter, in connection with the Millennium. Now, it is sufficient to say that such a view entirely misconceives the nature, locality, etc., of the covenanted Theocratic-Davidic Kingdoms, and ignores the restoration of the Jewish nation, the perpetuity of the race, etc.

<sup>4</sup> To illustrate: they cannot quote Isa. 60, etc., without denying the perpetuity assigned, or having part fulfilled in the Millennial age and part in the age following, etc.; they cannot quote Rev. 21 and 22 without repeating Mill. phraseology which, against Mill. predictions, they tell us will not be realized until after that period. Such inform us that the New Jerusalem is a symbolic representation of the saints who are with Christ, and, if the theory is consistently carried out, then the saints only come down from God out of heaven upon the earth after the Mill. era, which is opposed to numerous testimonies to the contrary, as e.g. Zech. 14, etc. Thus also the reign of the saints, identified with the New Jerusalem, is after the Mill. period, which is opposed by Rev. 20, etc. So the dwelling of God with man—the Theocratic relationship thus expressed—is after the same, which cannot possibly be admitted. Admitting, as we cheerfully do, that the work of God is progressive as it relates to the race and the earth during these thousand years, yet the new heaven and new earth begin with that era, and with it also the New Jerusalem state.

<sup>5</sup> Let the reader compare e.g. John 14 : 1-3, fulfilled when Jesus comes again, with 1 Pet. 1 : 4, 5, 7, 13, realized at the same time, and he must be impressed that the mansions and the inheritance then obtained are eternal, ever-enduring, and not to be superseded by their removal and the substitution of others. But we conclusively show that those mansions and that inheritance are gained at a Pre-Millennial Advent, and hence we insist upon their perpetuity. (Comp. also Prop. 170 on the Father's House.)

<sup>6</sup> Delitzsch (Bib. Psych., p. 556) informs us that V. Hofman and Karsten hold to the New Jerusalem being in the Millennium; Delitzsch, however, maintains that it is after that period, and explains "the healing of the nations or heathens" to denote only the increase of power, blessedness, etc., of the Redeemed in eternity, or, as Von Gerlach expresses it, "a reception of God's gifts of grace, as of the tree of life in Eden, an eternal becoming and growing." So also Rinck and others. But this is a far-fetched explanation, especially when it is said that "the expression 'health' must not exactly presuppose sickness, but indicates the perfect state of mature growth into the image of God," etc. But the phraseology does not by any means "indicate a perfect state of mature growth," but a state of imperfection which demands "a healing" process to bring to "a perfect state of mature growth." Delitzsch's interpretation is governed by that on Rev. 21 : 1, but which we have proven is wrong, because making Isaiah and Peter correspond ("according to promise"), it is easy to show that all three prophets are in agreement. According to Lange (Rev., p. 389) we must, in consistency, preserve the idea of "the highest sanative operation of nature" (as then manifested). That physical healing is denoted, is seen (1) from the effects of the fall; (2) from the Divine Purpose inculcating a complete redemption that includes the physical; (3) from the Millennial predictions incorporating such temporal and physical deliverance.

<sup>7</sup> For the reasons thus assigned, we cannot receive the view of Hofman (Prophecy and Fulfilment), Ebrard (The Rev. of John), Brookes (Maranatha), Guinness (Approaching End), and other able writers, who locate the renewal, the new heavens and earth, and the New Jerusalem state after the thousand years, thus forbidding the Patriarchs and others from receiving their inheritance and looked-for city until a long interval has intervened. The fact is, that such concessions made by Millenarians (as e.g. Birks in Four Proph. Empires, etc.) are taken advantage of by Brown (Ch. Sec. Coming), Gipps (First Res.), and others, as evidence of weakness and antagonism, and the discrepancy is shown that the lauded Millennial heavens and earth are swept away with all their glory, and that "the New Heavens and New Earth" agree with their own Post-Millennial theory. The same reasons forbid our accepting of Lincoln's (Lects. on Rev., vol. 2, ch. 19) portraiture of the last chapters of the Apoc., because he has some parts delineating the Millennial state and other portions the eternal state following, making it partly Millennial and partly Post-Millennial and eternal. This introduces confusion, and mars the symmetry of the prediction, and is the inevitable result of his believing (against the testimony of Scripture) that the Millennial earth, Christ's glorious inheritance, is to be utterly destroyed by fire. So also Smith's (Key to Rev., p. 385) theory that "the new heavens," etc., is "a figurative description of heaven," and not a portraiture of something pertaining to the earth, must be rejected as utterly untenable, and evidencing an utter abandonment of covenant and prophecies relating to the earth. The opinion of Calvin, Prest. Edwards, and others that "the new heavens and earth" of Isa. commences with "the Gospel dispensation" (in moral regeneration, etc.) and extends to the final goal when it will be superseded by an entire new creation, is thus shown to be unscriptural, for Peter's direct reference to Isa. evidences its futurity and relationship, as we have proven; and the past has never, as a matter of fact, evinced such a fulfilment of Isa. 65 : 17-25 and 66 : 15-24 as to make it corroborative of such a view. It is a fact that some (as e.g. Durham, quoted by Brown, p. 302, Ch. Sec. Coming) have this earth destroyed by a conflagration and a new earth and new heavens introduced, but do not identify the latter as "the seat of the blessed," and are "at a loss to know what was to be its destination." Surely, such must totally ignore the plainest statements of Scripture, and one must wonder that they undertake to comment on the Scriptures at all. The Compreh. Com., adopting Henry's comment on 2 Pet. 3 : 13, confidently appeals to Isa. 65 : 17 and 66 : 22 as the promises alluded to and then, after the conflagration, realized; but without the least effort to show how on its theory of a universal destructive deluge of fire it is possible for Isa. 65 and 66 to be fulfilled, it coolly proceeds to make "the new heavens and earth" of both Peter and Rev. 21 (and, of course, by implication as the promise then fulfilled, also of Isa. 65 and 66) to be fulfilled after the Mill. age and after its adopted universal judgment. The self-evident and rebutting discrepancy does not seem even to be noticed. Dr. Brown in Ch. Sec. Coming, Pref. to the Ed. of 1879, makes it the leading aim of his work to prove the following: "It is the object of this book to show that 'the heavens and the earth which are now' shall continue so long as sin and death remain, that is, not only to the end of the Millennium, but of the 'little season' of degeneracy and rebellion that is to succeed it; after that" (i.e. as he afterward explains, after all probation is ended and the universal judgment has arrived) "I 'look for new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness,' unmixed with 'anything that defileth.'" Now, here is the fair implication that previously no new heaven and earth exists (unless it be in the sense given above by Calvin and Edwards), which is abundantly refuted by Isa. 65 and 66, describing a state of things which must, of necessity, precede the eternal state advocated by him. So jealously does Dr. Brown guard his theory and raise up alleged impossibilities, that (under the supposition that he can definitely determine the exact capabilities of the renewed earth in the way of sustaining life) he makes, by reason of the conflagration, "the new heaven and new earth" utterly uninhabitable for mortal men, as follows (p. 300): "Whatever 'elements' mean here, as contradistinguished from the 'heavens,' it must be something, the 'dissolution' of which would incapacitate human beings, as at present constituted, from subsisting for a moment. What, then, becomes of the theory of mortal men tenanting the new heavens and the new earth? It is nothing better than a dream?" We are abundantly satisfied with "the dream" of the prophets, when, as we shall show in detail, they describe it as a reality, but must express our surprise that resort should be had to such reasoning. To indicate how even Millenarian writers of acknowledged ability introduce confusion and antagonism, when their utterances are compared, we refer to the comments of Dr. Fausset. In Com. on Isa. 66 : 15 he makes it parallel with "Isa. 9 : 5 ; Ps. 50 : 3 ; Hab. 3 : 5 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 8 ; and 2 Pel. 3 : 7." In *Com. on 2 *Pel. 3 : 13 he directly refers to Isa. 65 : 17 and 66 : 22 as being then fulfilled. In Com. on Isa. 65 and 66, he locates these passages in their realization with 2 Pel. 3 and Rev. 21, as consistency and unity demand. In Com. on Dan. 7 : 27 and Com. on Rev. 21, he has "the new heaven and new earth" of Rev. 21 to follow the thousand years. Such discrepancies and antagonistic views are a blemish to the commentary, and cannot be reconciled by the supposition that the conflagration of Peter is partly Pre-Millennial and partly Post-Millennial (the latter the most destructive, etc.), because (aside from the inconsistency of intervening a glorious Sabbath which is thus to be ended) then the conflagration would destroy a heaven and earth, an inheritance, a Kingdom, a glory and blessedness, whose perpetuity for "the ages of ages" is most positively declared.

Obs. 5. Now, in justice to our subject, and to meet, according to our design, all forms of objections, a point must be noticed, which, if we were to consult simply feeling and the esteem with which we regard differing brethren, otherwise might be passed by. Our allusion is to the opinion entertained by some (as e.g. Waggoner) that Christ and the saints are not upon the earth during the thousand years, but come to it and reside on it after those years are expired; to the view held by others (as e.g. Butler), that Christ and the saints go to the third heaven, and reign from thence in the Millennial period (so also Hess, who concedes, however, that "the monarch of this so flourishing Kingdom would indeed, as in the days of His resurrection, appear again visibly on earth, when some more important end requires He should"), making the New Jerusalem a continuation of the same, etc.; to that of others, who (as e.g. Melville), think that when the Mill. age is introduced the saints shall be caught up to meet Christ, and that both the saints and Jesus will be in the New Jerusalem, not upon the earth, administering the Kingdom then set up; to that of others, who (as e.g. Shimeall) believe that when the Mill. age begins, Christ and the saints will be "in the air, as the capital of His universal earthly empire" (to avoid the charge of caricaturing, see p. 316 of his I Will Come Again) the New Jerusalem state following the Millennial; to that of others, who (as e.g. some of the editors of the old series of Proph. Times), believe that when the Mill. age is ushered in Christ and the saints will be in the New Jerusalem, but separated and distinct from the earth—in brief, suspended above it. Writers from these respective classes have much to say concerning the “aerial thrones,” and “the general superintendency” conducted from “the air” or “the heavens,” etc. The identification of “the new heaven and new earth” of Isaiah, Peter, and John, being a representation of what is done, not in “the air,” or in a place separate and distinct from the earth proper, or in the third heaven, but here on the earth, is a confutation of all such theories. More than this, a correct apprehension of the Kingdom as covenanted to David’s Son and as predicted by the prophets positively forbid such a withdrawal in part or whole of David’s Son and His brethren from the very place specifically promised (not “the air,” but “the earth”) to Him and His saints. The Early Church, more consistent, knew nothing of such a separation of Jesus from His Davidic throne and Kingdom, which only was, and shall be, located on earth, and of such a reign of saints “in the air” or “on high,” somewhere instead of being “on the earth.” Brethren may honestly think that they are honoring Christ and the saints, or that they are making (as Shimeall) Millenarianism more palatable for others, but they will allow us to say, with equal honesty, that planting ourselves firmly upon the oath-bound covenant which expressly locates this very Kingdom, and upon the utterances of the prophets which places the Kingdom and the King here on the earth, at the head of the restored Jewish nation, etc., we hold that a disjoining, a separation of that which God has joined together, evinces, at least, a lack of faith in the very order and connection which the Word gives. Admitting that a diversity of view in regard to the details of doctrine is to be expected and allowed, yet upon this subject, which virtually leaves the Davidic throne and Kingdom (on the earth) without an occupant and head (transplanting Him to the “air” or Third Heaven, etc., where David’s throne and Kingdom never existed), it is proper to insist, in plain terms, upon that view which alone meets the conditions imposed by covenant and prophecy. One writer (J. B., Proph. Times, Aug. 1868), even in distinguishing between the Mill. age and the following New Jerusalem period, asserts: “We have reason to believe that the real throne of God will not be on the earth during the Millennium.” All such opinions arise from not clearly apprehending what the throne of the Theocratic King is, and where it is located. Having shown and proven in previous Propositions that God’s throne (not the Divine Sovereignty, Props. 79, 80) was on the earth, that it was incorporated with the Davidic, and that when the Davidic is restored, as sworn to and solemnly predicted, God’s throne—the Theocratic throne—is again restored for the God-man, the appointed Theocratic King to occupy, it seems to be faithless to doubt the locality (Prop. 122) of this throne. When the tabernacle of David, now in ruins, is rebuilt, when the glorious things spoken of the splendidly restored Theocratic rule are witnessed—does covenant or prophet give the slightest idea that this embraces anything outside of, or in the atmosphere above, the earth? If the transfiguration (Prop. 158) really gave a correct representation, it follows that we have the King and the three classes upon the earth. The inheritance of Christ is on the earth; the inheritance of Abraham and his seed is on the earth; the reign of Christ and of His saints is on the earth; the tabernacling of God again with man is on the earth; the Kingdom under the whole heavens is on the earth; a Paradise restored, with a God present in the Person of Jesus Christ, is on the earth ; a renewal, a restitution, a regeneration, a world to come, a day of the Lord Jesus, etc., etc., is on the earth—nowhere do we find the least teaching, direct, that any of these things shall be witnessed and realized outside of this earth, or that saints are to be, in any way, separated therefrom. Such theories result from pure inference, and the main passage produced from which it is drawn, is the one relating to the resurrection and translation of the saints, who are “to be caught up in the clouds (or as some, in clouds) to meet the Lord in the air,” from which it is wrongfully assumed that the Lord and the saints remain in the air. We might just as logically say that Christ is still in the cloud that received Him ; while they themselves do not constantly keep Him “in the air,” for as the prophecies demand a personal manifestation of Jesus on the earth, some allow that the King will occasionally come to the earth to fulfil those predictions. No ! no ! Simple in faith, unlearned in many things as the primitive church may have been, yet it was far too strong in faith and learned in the Scriptures to advocate opinions which restore a garden of Eden for Adam and Eve, and then carefully place Adam and Eve in “the air” or up “on high,” where the paradisiacal restoration does not affect them ; which repeals a curse from the earth, but translates those who had borne the curse to another place instead of making them “return” as the prophets do, to see and enjoy its repeal ; which establishes a Messiah’s Kingdom, but carefully keeps the Messiah aloof from it ; and which, as one party, brings the New Jerusalem to the earth ; but suspended up on high somewhere in the atmosphere, where its gates are open for the kings of the earth to enter, etc. But we need not discuss the matter—our previous Propositions having done this—for these same writers when (for the time forgetting this theory of separating Jesus and the saints from their inheritance, etc.), opposing the prevailing notion that David’s throne is in the third heaven, use the very arguments that equally refute their own notion of its being “in the air,” or some other place. Thus one (Shimeall) forcibly says : “The sum of the whole matter is simply this : David has no throne in heaven.” (May we ask, Had he one “in the air?”) “And Christ, though born a King, and crucified as a King—the King of the Jews—yet ‘the Kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the Kingdom under the whole heavens,’ has never yet been given to Him or His saints. But there stands the immutable oath of God to David, that Christ as His ‘Son according to the flesh’—mark, not according to the Spirit—shall sit on His throne.” Precisely so ; for any other view detracts from the simplicity, beauty, and sublimity of our system of truth. Hence, we have no sympathy with that view which would make the “air” more holy than the renewed earth, and the remaining “in the air” less “gross and sensual” than being on the redeemed earth, the theatre of Christ’s glorious work, and the place (His dwelling-place in Zion”), where the Second Adam enters the restored Eden ; we would rather, if it is a simple belief and even childlike, contemplate our King as actually and truly personally present, reigning in His covenanted land, throne, and Kingdom, wrested from Satan, dwelling in His “Rest” and “Inheritance,” and thus manifesting, in the very place of His rejection, sufferings, and death, His Davidic—real—Sonship and Lordship. And we love to think of the saints enjoying, in the very place of their former trials and sorrows, the blessedness of perfected Redemption, of completed restitution. Instead of detracting from the honor of David’s Son and of the saints, it is certainly adding to the same and to God's glory to advocate the carrying out of the covenanted promises, the plan of restitution, which restores man truly and literally to his long-lost Eden and through a personal Second Adam—present in this Eden—recovers a lost dominion on the earth.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>2</sup> In this connection we may introduce a passage of Scripture, Eph. 1 : 14, "the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession." This earth is, evidently, that "purchased possession" which the meek inherit (not "the air" or some other locality), for simple consistency demands that the promises to the Patriarchs, etc., of the land through which they passed, saw, etc., should be their inheritance—an inheritance obtained for them through the Christ. But that we may not be charged with forcing a meaning out of Eph. 1 : 14, we refer to one of our most prominent opponents, and give his comment. Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 306) opposes the tendency to make the last clause, "redemption of the purchased possession," equivalent to "the Church" or "purchased people," and favors the idea of "acquired possession or inheritance" in view of its being something prepared for us, an inheritance separate from the person himself, something to be accomplished for us and not in us, etc. He correctly holds that its "needing to be redeemed" shows that it is "something alienated from us, but is again to be made ours; not a possession altogether new, but an old possession, lost, and again to be reclaimed from the powers of evil, which now overmaster and destroy it." He argues that just with the redemption of the body, so with this possession; it is something recovered, and not simply to be made—something alienated and under the power of evil that is to be restored, and that this is the earth under the curse, promised as "an everlasting possession" to Abraham and his seed. We, therefore, insist upon it that any theory, however plausibly presented, which separates in the slightest degree the Patriarchs and saints from direct contact with their promised inheritance, is thus far defective, and dishonors the completeness of Redemption, for it virtually makes the earth still unsuitable for the saints.

PROPOSITION 152. This Kingdom is connected with the perpetuation of the human race.

This follows, of necessity from the preceding Propositions. The Kingdom, as covenanted and predicted, imperatively demands it ; for it could not in its strictly Theocratic order exist without the restored Jewish nation, with which it is inseparably connected. The Theocracy is no type but a reality ; its restoration is not an ideal matter, but one of actual occurrence. Hence the re-establishment of the Theocratic Kingdom always specifies or takes for granted the continuation of the race. This results not merely from its covenanted relationship, but from its very design, which is the salvation of the race in bringing to it the government, etc., that it needs.

The reader will, of course, observe that this Proposition confirms the position that we have taken respecting 2 Pet. 3, for the Word of God does not contradict itself. This perpetuation proves most conclusively that the conflagration cannot possibly be as universal and destructive as many allege, who are compelled by their ultra views of the same to ignore the Scriptures on this subject. Thus e.g. take Isa. 51 : 8, and, after stating that "the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old as a garment," after declaring in reference to the wicked "the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool," it is then added, as expressive of the continued result (as we shall now show in detail) : "But my righteousness shall be forever, and my salvation from generation to generation."

Obs. 1. Complete Redemption requires the perpetuation of the race after the Sec. Advent. Down to that Advent the race, as such, is not saved ; this is so clearly announced that it needs no proof. Yet it is a truth that the Redeemer will restore all the forfeited blessings, that He will bring salvation to the world, and that He will destroy all the works resulting from evil. This is admitted in general terms by our opposers, but in the restitution of those forfeited blessings they leave out one of the most precious, viz., the perpetuation of the race in a state of innocency and holiness—and thus constitute an imperfect Redemption of man. They forget that before the fall the command was given to "multiply and replenish the earth," and that the fall prevented this earth from being peopled by a race, holy, God-fearing, and serving. If restitution indeed means a restoring to its former state and condition, and if it includes a restoration of the very things lost by sin, then, if complete, as the word insists it will be, it must embrace this long-lost, long longed-for intended benefaction. The command of God given to Adam and Eve before the fall to fill the earth with a holy progeny, but sadly marred by the corruption entailed by sin, will yet be fulfilled in their descendants, since His Divine pleasure respecting the real status of the race is evidenced in the injunction, and His Divine purpose, thus indicated, cannot be frustrated by man's fall. The interrupted design of making the race itself holy God will yet carry out, and not leave Satan glory in a defeat.' The oppressive burden borne by the race and productive of fearful suffering shall be graciously removed from it, so that God's merciful end to fill the earth to its utmost limits with a righteous people will yet be realized. "I am the Lord, I change not," is a Divine attribute, which is God's glory; and hence looking back to see what He Himself intended this race of man to become, we find in His expressed intention the Divine Will in the matter; and of Him it is said: "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all in my pleasure"—"I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass; I have purposed it, I will also do it." Therefore, we believe, in humble reliance upon the unchangeableness of God's purpose, that a holy, happy race shall yet possess this earth, and that it will be perpetuated precisely so far as God had intended it should be before man fell. Olshausen (Com., Pref. p. 117) expresses this so tersely that it is worth attention: "The proper fundamental idea of the doctrine of God's Kingdom upon earth (which) is so simple, that we cannot understand how its truth could ever be doubted, until we remember the farragoes of nonsense which have been propounded under its sanction. This simple radical idea is merely, that as, in regard to an individual man, God, by the Saviour, redeems not merely a particular part of him, his spirit alone, his soul alone, or his body alone, but the whole man, his body, soul, and spirit, so the redeeming power of Christ has for its object the deliverance of the entire human race, and of the creation in general, from the yoke of sin." God's purpose is delayed for a time—which to finite man appears long, but to God is "as a day"—until the Saviour is provided, and the proper material has been gathered even out of the fallen race, for the leverage requisite to lift the race out of its sunken condition. The provision of the Saviour, the process of gathering out "the peculiar people," who are to be the source of blessing to the race, proclaims that there is only a brief—to God—interval or interruption, of which He avails Himself to make His own triumph and glory the more conspicuous and permanent. And it is this very feature, which, perhaps more than any other, magnifies and exalts the inexpressible greatness, majesty, and glory of Redemption in Christ. For, instead of gaining here and there "those that believe" out of the nations, saving "the few out of the race while "the many" are lost, confining Salvation to the number of the saved gathered until the Sec. Advent, and leaving the race with its multitudes in the hands of Satan (thus giving the latter, as some one has aptly said, the victory in point of numbers), God in Christ, employing those that are saved as instrumentalities (comp. e.g. Props. 154 and 156) perpetuates salvation in the deliverance and perpetuation of the race until a countless host of righteous ones arises, a multitude of swarming generations of redeemed ones appear to replace the gap made by sin. God, instead of casting away the perpetuation of the race in holiness—as a thing of nought—and remaining satisfied with "the fragments" gathered, regards this as "a precious stone," which He carefully polishes and sets with renewed lustre in His crown as of priceless value.<sup>1</sup> This immeasurably exalts the work of Christ, the purpose of His incarnation, sacrifice, present exaltation and glorious reign, the greatness of the design, and the grandeur of the Salvation that He Himself contemplates to accomplish. It invests Him with a perfection as Redeemer and a sublimity as a King, mighty to save, that no other view can possibly bring to Him.<sup>2</sup>

Christ in "destroying the works of the devil" (1 John 3 : 8) will counteract this, supposes that after some individuals of the race are saved, the race is cut off and becomes extinct, and adds against such a supposition : "That extinct race will be an enduring monument of his (Satan's) triumph. He will have it to boast that he so far succeeded in his work as to bring Jehovah under the necessity of changing His purpose, of altering or modifying His original design. This is a thought not for a moment to be indulged." And yet what a favorite it is, at present, with multitudes, who do not realize how incomplete it leaves Redemption.

<sup>2</sup> Brown (Ch. Sec. Com., ch. 8) endeavors to prejudice others against our view, by pronouncing it "a revolting speculation," "startling," "monstrous," "abhorrent ;" and censures Bickersteth, Birks, and others for presenting it, because of its being "in the last degree repulsive" "loathing," "wretched interpretation," "painful speculations," etc. We leave the reader to judge for himself which theory is the most worthy of credence, his own, which limits Redemption and forbids a complete restoration of forfeited blessings, or ours, which makes Redemption proportionate to the costly and astounding provision made for it in the incarnation, death, resurrection, ascension and return of Jesus Christ ; and commensurate with the perfections of the Saviour, constituting Him a perfect Redeemer. How he can stigmatize our doctrine by the epithets given, when it opens before us such a grand outlook, so honorable to Jesus and the saints, and so fruitful of happiness to the race, is beyond our conception, unless it be attributed to prejudice. Again : some writers (as e.g. p. 195 Princeton Review, April, 1851) hold up to animadversion—with evident horror—that we teach that "sensual indulgences are to be enjoyed forever," in view of this multiplication of the race after the Pre-Millennial Advent. All that is necessary to say in reply may be thus expressed : he must settle this question with God Himself, if he thus judges of the marriage relation as instituted in Eden and as it shall be exhibited in the new heavens and new earth (Isa. 65 : 17-23). We cannot thus dishonor the relation of husband and wife, parent and child, with its hallowed associations and results, especially when, as the Scriptures teach, it is designed as an instrumentality to honor God. He unjustly implies, without positively asserting it, that we have the glorified saints thus to marry and to be given in marriage, over against the declaration of Christ, while the truth is, that all Millenarians discriminate between the saints and mortal men in the flesh. Then he endeavors dishonorably, to associate us as follows : "The Mohammedans, it does seem to us, only carry out the same idea a little farther, when they give to every believer a tent in heaven, fourteen miles square, with seventy wives, and the power of associating with all at the same time!" We leave the writer to reconcile this gross sneer with God's Word, which (as we shall show) eulogizes this perpetuation of the race as a crowning glory of Redemptive mercy and love, because it so dwindles the proportion of the ultimate lost to a mere fractional part, and so immeasurably exalts the number of the saved, instead of bestowing a fragment of the race, that the contrast between the work of Satan and the triumph of God in Redemption is thereby inconceivably heightened.

Obs. 2. While thus firmly holding to and advocating the perpetuation of the race after the Sec. Advent in a condition similar (not attained at once but gradually) to that before the fall, yet, to avoid misapprehension, it is necessary to define our position more accurately. Holding to a restoration of the race to that which was forfeited by sin, our opinion is guided mainly by the account preceding the fall. Able writers (as D. N. Lord, Rev. Newton, etc.), contend for an eternal, everlasting perpetuation of the race, perpetual and strictly never-ending, and rely exclusively upon the words rendered "eternal," "perpetual," "forever," etc. The argument thus presented looks plausible and weighty; sufficiently so, that while not fully accepting of it, we at the same time do not deny it. The reasons which influence us to this caution are the following: The words depended upon (as eternal, perpetual, etc.) have sometimes, as critics of the most diverse sentiments state, a limited meaning, denoting simply a long duration, or a duration coeval with existing orderings or dispensations. The fact that actual eternity, never-ending succession, is meant, must be derived from a more detailed statement, in which this is asserted. Now, it is not stated that if Adam had not fallen his posterity would have gone on perpetually and forever increasing. This is only inferred. The announcement before the fall is simply to "multiply and replenish the earth," and the inference might be made (as some theologians suggested), that at some remote future period, when the earth was filled with inhabitants, a general glorification would cause the multiplication of the race to cease, etc. If never-ending generations had been promised to Adam, then indeed the argument in favor of this view would be valid, for restitution would then embrace it. Then again, coming to the close of the Bible, where the fact is admitted of generations witnessing and enjoying the light and glory of the New Jerusalem state, and the decided impression is made for ages even, yet nothing specific is asserted of never-ending generations. Our position is this: We are satisfied to end the discussion where the Bible ends it, viz., with a portion of the race glorified and the race itself redeemed from the curse, passing on to higher stages of blessedness, and entering into the eternal ages in this happy condition. If Adam forfeited never-ending generations—if this was part of God's original design—then the restitution will restore and carry it out; but if not, then only that wonderful increase commensurate with God's design will be produced. Here we stop: that the race is perpetuated after the Advent is true; that this will continue on after the thousand years (which only limits Satan's binding, etc.), is most certain; that it even may continue on forever may, for aught we know, be also correct (seeing that some language can scarcely be interpreted otherwise), but as to the latter, not feeling positive, we stop with "the many generations" of Isa. 60: 15. The doctrine is not essential in our argument in that form, for if we show, as the Bible does, a completed restitution of all things, that is all that is required to perfect our system—the rest can well be left for the succeeding or eternal ages to develop. Desirous, on the one hand, not to limit the mighty power of God, and on the other hand not to pass beyond that which is positively (not merely inferentially) asserted, we proceed, with this expressed caution, in our argument, with the simple remark added, that such a posture accords best with the ideas of the primitive church on the subject. So far as the ordering of God in the matter is concerned, we are willing cordially to accept of the same, whatever it may be.

Brown (Ch. Sec. Coming, p. 173) thus refers to a just principle, which should make us careful of dogmatizing in this direction: "What canon of criticism is more self-evident and more universally recognized than this, that terms and phrases expressive of perpetuity are to be stretched no further than the known duration of the thing spoken of?—as when the Jews were commanded to keep such and such of their institutions 'throughout their generations by an ordinance forever'—that is, of course, not through all eternity, but through the whole duration of their peculiar polity, and no longer.' This, while true, does not sustain his rejection of our doctrine, seeing that, aside from those terms thus employed, we have the most ample evidence to sustain our position.

Obs. 3. The early Church, consistently with the doctrine of the Kingdom advocated, taught that after the Advent and after the resurrection and glorification of the saints, the Kingdom then established—being the Theocratic-Davidic restored under Messiah, David's Son—would have the Jewish nation and spared Gentiles for its willing subjects. This, after the references made to their belief, needs no additional proof. Attention is called to it for two reasons. The first is: that, unless such a faith is Scriptural and was given under the teaching of the men who organized the primitive churches, it is unaccountable that a belief in so fundamental a point which involved the doctrine of the judgment—in brief, the most momentous interests of man—should have been so extensively circulated and embraced without opposition, and a counter statement, from the Church. The second is: the unjust means resorted to (and even practised at this day) in making out that these early Fathers do not carefully distinguish between the glorified saints (who neither marry nor are given in marriage, and hence of whom no multiplication of the race is asserted) and the men in the flesh, but that they teach that the glorified saints, as well as the others, continue in the marriage relation and produce the generations that follow. The falsity of this accusation has been so well met by honest men who are no Millenarians, that a citation of the fact will be all sufficient to exonerate us from holding to an opinion which is not to be found in the writings of any of the Millenarian Fathers, or of their successors. Our apology in thus specially directing the reader to this point, is the circumstance that books are written and circulated at the present time reiterating this often refuted charge.' Dr. Lardner (Lardner's Works, vol. 2, p. 691, etc., Bickersteth's Guide, p. 190, etc.) gives an impartial account of the ancient faith in this respect, saying on this point: "But that they (i.e. the Fathers) received marriage, and the fruits of marriage, to belong to any of the raised saints does not appear to me a clear point." Then referring to Origen and Jerome, as expressing and insinuating this charge, he adds: "But Irenæus and Lactantius, who were Millenarians, do not express themselves in that manner; what they say is, that at the time of the first resurrection there will be found some good men living upon the earth, and that of them, in the space of a thousand years, shall be born a numerous race, a godly seed, over whom likewise the raised saints are to reign, and by whom they are to be served." So also Bish. Bull, quoted by Prof. Bush (Mill., p. 14), and many eminent writers, having no sympathy with our views, declare themselves, vindicating the Fathers and our doctrine from so gross a charge. Mede, well posted in Patristic lore, informs us by telling Dr. Twisse (see Bickersteth's Guide, p. 191) "how wrongfully the ancient Chiliasts, and Lactantius by name, are charged to hold that the saints which rise from the dead shall marry and get children; whereas he expressly affirms it only of those who shall be alive in the body when Christ comes, nor did any of the rest of the Fathers, Justin, Irenæus, Melito, think otherwise." If even one or more Millenarians could be found (they are not discoverable, and hence no one that has ever brought the charge has presented a single quotation directly taken from a Millenarian writer advocating such a view) who have taught this—this—the mistaken opinion of one or more individuals—should not be charged upon us as a class, or upon our system of doctrine as a natural sequence following from it, when the immense majority and overwhelming mass of testimony are against it. This is a cheap way (but costly) of exciting hostility against a party—an appeal to ignorance and prejudice which only exposes the weakness of those who resort to it. Many of our opponents, we are happy to say, are too manly, intelligent, and righteous to yield to such caricaturing of a faith held by some of the noblest men that ever trusted in and labored for Jesus. As to the alleged charge of “carnality,” “grossness,” and “sensuality,” arising from the dwelling of the glorified saints and men in the flesh in the same Millennial new earth, this has been so fully answered in another place that it needs no reply here. If this is God’s ordering; if the saints occupy the exalted positions assigned to them as Kings and Priests, ruling and ministering over the restored race; if the glorified saints are associated with the Mighty King in a glorious Redemptive process; if they are specially, in view of this relationship, the inhabitants of that New Jerusalem that comes down from God, out of heaven upon this earth; this is amply sufficient to justify it.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Thus to illustrate: The author in The Kingdom of Grace (who conceals his name from merited rebuke), although fully aware of our views and method of dealing with the subject (for he had previously largely quoted from Rev. Dr. Duffield, Winthrop, and others who are guarded in distinguishing the immortal from the mortal, etc.), deliberately asserts (p. 187) that it “is the belief of every consistent Millenarian that men possessing a celestial and immortal nature alone will be on the earth” during this period (i.e. Mill. age); and after declaring this untruth, builds a long argument on the impossibility of having the Mill. prophecies fulfilled, as such saints would not build, plough, marry, etc., carefully concealing from his readers the explanation given by Millenarians. To show the dishonesty of the writer, when referring to p. 193 of the same book, he uses an argument exactly the reverse, viz., that the dead saints are raised and glorified, the living saints are changed and yet have men in the flesh still abiding in the Millennium, and hence are contradictory. Such is a specimen—out of many that could be adduced—censuring us for having no men in the flesh to fulfil Mill. songs, and forcing us into the position to make the saints themselves marry, etc.; and then again condemning us for having such men in the flesh, making out an inconsistency in their being on the same earth, and in either case never alluding to our mode of dealing with the subject. Such a procedure is not worthy of additional remark.

<sup>2</sup> The reader may judge for himself respecting Lactantius and the passage supposed to teach the doctrine we are opposing. Lactantius (Christ. Inst., ch. 24), after having stated the return of Christ, adds: “But He, when He shall have destroyed unrighteousness, and executed His great judgment, and shall have recalled to life the righteous who have lived from the beginning, will be engaged among men a thousand years, and will rule them with most just command. Which the Sibyl proclaims in another place, as she utters her inspired predictions: ‘Hear me, ye mortals; an everlasting King reigns.’ Then they who shall be alive in their bodies shall not die, but during those thousand years shall produce an infinite multitude, and their offspring shall be holy and beloved by God; but they who shall be raised from the dead shall preside over the living as judges. But the nations shall not be entirely extinguished, but some shall be left as a victory for God, that they may be an occasion of triumph to the righteous, and may be subjected to perpetual servitude.” The nearest approach to the alleged teaching (but which does not contain it) that we have been able to find in the ancient writings, is that in the “Test. of Simeon in the Twelve Patriarchs,” in the expression, “and as cedars shall holy ones be multiplied from me forever,” but this is apocryphal and of no weight.

<sup>3</sup> The view of a non-perpetuation of race (based chiefly on the judgment and conflagration) after the Sec. Advent (so Brown, Waldegrave, etc.); the opinion that this renewed earth is to be given up to an entire new race to be inhabited (so Pollock in Course of Time, B. 10, and others); the notion that no mortal men are to be found in the Millennial age, but only the glorified (so Homes in Res. Revealed, Burchell in The Midnight Cry, Perry and others); the hypothesis that the world instead of perpetuating the race is the theatre of their punishment (as Pres. Edwards, etc.—and during at least the thousand years by Waggoner, etc.); the alleged scientific prediction that “as the final outcome of things, the entire universe will be reduced to a single, enormous ball, dead and frozen, solid and black” (so Fiske, p. 16, The Unseen Universe, with which compare Campbell and Byron's Vision of the Last Man. On p. 31 Fiske informs us that “our race is pretty sure to come to an end long before the destruction of the planet from which it now gets its sustenance.” Others, however, claim that fire will be the agency by which the race is swept away); these, and all other views, erected upon an extravagant estimate of the conflagration (as to include even annihilation), are evidently the result of a lack of knowledge respecting the Kingdom of God, the actual demands of covenant and prophecy, and the repeated promises and assurances given concerning the continuance of the race. Indeed, as the reader can see for himself in the progress of our argument, the most positive and overwhelming proof is presented in its behalf, so that it has influenced able writers, a multitude of able men, to advocate it as an essential doctrine of the Pre-Millenarian system, without which the Kingdom, as covenanted, cannot possibly be established, the prophecies, as recorded, cannot be realized, and the reign of Christ and the saints, as portrayed, cannot be experienced.

Obs. 4. Briefly, it would be interesting to trace in what manner this early doctrine, once so prevalent—that the Jewish nation and Gentiles in the flesh would survive the Advent, and the fearful judgments then poured out upon the nations, and would form the subjects of that world-wide dominion under Christ and His resurrected brethren—was gradually undermined and finally almost rooted out. What was said in another place, in a general way, respecting the decline of Millenarianism before the incoming flood of hierarchical and papistical doctrine, will also apply here, but yet this specific point finds a solution in the rise and progress of distinctive doctrine, to which it stood in opposition. Passing by the misstatements of Origen, Jerome, and others (which Mede and others justly expose), let us confine ourselves to a few exegetical and doctrinal phases which had a decided influence in this direction. The unfolding of the present prevailing view of the Judgment Day and of Christ's Coming only to act in a judicial capacity, the plainest of philological errors (fastened by monkish writers upon the neck of the Church), viz., “the ending of the world,” instead of “the ending of the age” or dispensation (as all critics now admit, in accord with the early Church)—these, and similar perversions, converted the Eschatology of the multitude into a palpable contradiction to that previously entertained. Then followed what before the Church, owing to its cherished doctrine of the Kingdom (which was unsuited to the hierarchical tendencies), utterly repudiated, viz., the closing up of all earthly things (some including even the utter destruction, and some the annihilation of the earth), the ending of time, and, of course, the non-perpetuation of the human race. Strange that even the Sibyl (Sibylline Oracles, B. 3), speaking of the future age, should preserve greater consistency than professed theologians in saying: “a race shall be restored as it was in the ancient times.” This change thus produced, gradually but firmly incorporated into the belief of the Church, was but feebly defended at first, and owed its continued and intrenched position to the fact that the party who adopted it became the popular one, obtaining, through civil patronage, the exclusive control of the doctrinal position of the Church, and crushing, by the weight of assumed authority, all opposing views. Looking over the Scriptural basis alleged in support of so radical a departure from the primitive faith, it is found that the main leading Scripture adduced in its favor is Matt. 25 : 31-46. Around this passage, as on a pivot, all others are made to revolve. Having examined this (Prop. 134), it may be dismissed with the remark, that it is only more recently, driven to it in self-defence, that this departure from the early faith is sought to be defended in a systematic form by our opponents. It is necessary—for the sake of completeness—to refer to the line of argument adopted. In addition to the passages usually presented in old works, we have the following reasons assigned in its behalf by Dr. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming), who is regarded as the ablest of our opponents. The reader will notice that they are all based on mere inference, for no one has ever yet found a passage within the Bible that directly teaches that the multiplication of the race ceases after the Advent of Christ; the inference being suggested by a pre-conceived notion of the Judgeship of Christ, the Judgment Day, and the extent of the conflagration mentioned by Peter. Thus Dr. Brown informs us that “the Church will be absolutely complete at Christ's Coming,” and implies from this that after that no others will be saved. Aside from our direct arguments in various Propositions which prove that such a conclusion is erroneous, it is sufficient to say that our doctrine itself embraces the completeness of the elect (i.e. those gathered out and accounted worthy to become kings and priests), who become “the first-fruits,” “the Church of the first-born” associated with Christ in rulership, etc. The Scriptures teaching such completeness, which is consistent with the Plan of the administrations of the Kingdom, do not at the same time declare that no others—after this specific number of chosen ones are gathered—shall be saved. To say this is adding to the Word of God, and is not to distinguish between things that belong to different dispensations. In the next place we are told that “Christ's Sec. Coming will exhaust the object of the Scriptures,” that “the Word” and “the Ordinances” “shall then absolutely cease as means of grace and salvation to mankind,” and from such an extravagant postulate the deduction is made that none will be saved after the Sec. Advent. The early believers, instructed by inspired men, must have been indeed very foolish—yea the apostles themselves must have greatly misconceived the object, the gracious design of Christ's Sec. Coming—when they believed it to be a coming “unto salvation,” and urged all to look and pray for it—not as “the goal of all revelation, its furthest horizon, its last terminus,” but in order that the glorious predictions of the prophets of revelation might be realized. The assumptions so far-reaching defeat themselves by being too sweeping; for admitting even that some things in the Scriptures are only adapted to one period of time (i.e. preceding Advent), that is no reason for assuming that when the Theocracy is re-established great changes will not occur in the manner of the divine administration, making new revelations, etc., necessary (Prop. 167) to adapt the world to the reign then inaugurated. The climax is reached in the next assertion, that “the sealing ordinances of the N. Test. will disappear at Christ's Coming,” and inferring hence that none can be saved after that period. But how does he know that they will “disappear,” after Christ's declaration that He would drink of the fruit of the vine with His disciples in His Kingdom, and when at the very time the Jewish nation is converted, seeing Him whom they pierced, an allusion to water is made? Suppose even that they do “disappear,” is not God able, if another dispensation is to follow, to institute, if it be requisite, a new order of arrangements to carry on the work of redemption? Artfully as the objections are made, they virtually limit the ability of God to effect the changes that may be required in each succeeding dispensation. The remaining reasons derived from the intercession of Christ ceasing, the work of the Spirit for saving purposes ending, etc., are answered in other places more in detail, so that it is needless to dwell upon them.<sup>1</sup> Let us turn to another writer, far removed from Dr. Brown, and a representative of a totally different class, who, while accepting of a literal first resurrection, etc., denies the perpetuation of the Jewish nation and Gentiles, Waggoner (Ref. of Age to Come) assuming that when Christ comes this dispensation ends, and is not followed by another, but by the eternal age, hence argues that there will be no salvation for the race, all probation being ended. His main argument is derived from the universality of the language employed respecting the condemnation of the law (viz., that all the wicked will be condemned by it), and the belief of the Gospel (viz., that all that believe shall be saved). Hence, there are only two classes, while we are charged with creating a third class, neither condemned by the law nor saved by the Gospel. This, however, is a misapprehension of our faith in the matter; for instead of creating a third class, neither wicked nor righteous, we have the Jewish nation converted by the appearance of the Messiah, and the spared of the Gentiles also receive and cordially embrace the truth as it is in Jesus. The universality of language does not by any means forbid the future conversion of nations under the administrations of King Jesus; for the wicked shall perish at the Coming of Jesus (as a class, those who are given up as incorrigible—even among the Jews), and yet some, who are willing to become repentant and obedient, shall be saved. This is illustrated by the universality of expression that all men shall die, etc., and yet we find some that will not die, being translated. This indicates the danger of building a doctrine purely upon inference drawn from such language. Universal as it is, yet some exceptions may occur under it, being in correspondence with the Divine intention. For, even in the present dispensation, infants, small children, and heathen form an exception to the generally applied principles. Believing in a coming dispensation, as taught, we are not concerned in explaining the modifications that may occur (and reconcile them with what men may infer), of which we are not the judges, but leave them as they stand recorded with our hearty acceptance, also believing that they will be found in accordance with the Spirit of antecedent dispensations. That probation is found in “the new heavens and new earth” is evident from e.g. Isa. 65 : 17 seq.; that “the inhabitants of the earth will learn righteousness when God’s judgments are in the earth” (Isa. 26 : 9) is frequently declared; and that the removal of evil, etc. from the suffering nations is linked with the resurrection (as e.g. Isa. 25 : 8 comp. with 1 Cor. 15 : 54) is sustained by the general analogy of Scripture. Let such brethren be reminded, that back of all such inferential proof as they present, is the Davidic covenant, the Pre-Mill. Advent, resurrection, etc., which must first be duly considered, before such an incomplete Redemption is accepted, vitiating even the restoration of the promised Theocracy. We would rather keep in view those fundamental and positive teachings—too much overlooked, owing to their simplicity—which land us, after some preparatory stages (including this dispensation), right at the opening door of the race’s grand destiny; which bind the predictions from the earliest to the latest prophet into one connected chain of evidence testifying that the Kingdom of David's Son is established here on the earth for the express purpose of unfolding and carrying on the eternal purposes of God respecting the race, for a time ("a moment") delayed by the fall of man and the procedure required for redemption.*

* For an extended and able (even severe) reply to those objections urged by Dr. Brown, see Lord's Theol. and Lit. Journal, Nos. for April and July, 1851. Some English works in answer have also appeared, but the writer has not had access to them, such as by Bickersteth, Bonar, the Duke of Manchester and others.

† In this connection, the attention of the student is again called to the fact that the Church out of this dispensation is called "the Church of the first-born" (Heb. 12 : 23), i. e., all who have part and lot in the first (Pre-Mill.) resurrection. The expression itself has reference to a distinguished, pre-eminent relationship to God—a special nearness to Christ—but it also plainly implies that others also will be born and sustain relationship to God as His children. We have here in the "first born," (1) a special calling to favor, having a first-born son's interest and privileges; (2) the result of grace and not of nature, being the offspring (through the creative power of God) of God; (3) the beginning of sons whom God will intimately gather in as the fruits of Redemption; (4) the precedence in honor and dignity over the other sons whom God will cause to be born in His "house."

Obs. 5. In deciding this subject the student ought to receive the testimony of the converging witnesses, contemplated independently in various propositions. The mass of corroborating proof in behalf of our position is so great that we can only briefly allude to some of it, leaving the reader to refer to the places indicated for a more detailed statement. The Pre-Millennial Advent (Prop. 121) at once decides the question; for if Jesus comes before that age is introduced, then, as a matter of course, men in the flesh live after His Coming during that period. This the prophecies inculcate. That it is Pre-Mill., as the early Church held, has been proven. Thus also the Pre-Mill. resurrection of the just (Props. 125-129) implies the same thing, in view of the Advent linked with it as the resurrecting agency. And, as stated, so plainly is this connection made that the resurrection is allied with Christ's obtaining the sovereignty over the nations of the earth, as e. g. Rev. 11 : 15-18. Indeed, the Davidic Covenant (Prop. 49), which has not—since the overthrow of the Kingdom—been fulfilled down to the present day, but which we have shown is to be verified at the Sec. Advent, alone proves the necessity for such a continuation of the race, seeing that without the restoration of the Jewish nation (Prop. 111, 112, etc.) it is impossible to re-erect it as covenanted. The manner in which that Jewish nation is restored (Prop. 113), under the personal auspices of its Mighty King, whom the nation shall again see and with deeply repentant hearts acknowledge, is additional evidence that the race is perpetuated after the Second Advent. Taking any other position vitiates the election (Prop. 24, etc.) of that people, and makes God's promises to them, and His covenant with them, a nullity. Denying this perpetuation, forces our opponents to make prophecies and promises relating to the Divine Purpose conditional, which (Prop. 18) introduces weakness and uncertainty—if not more—into the Word. Prophecies, too, which are admitted to be unconditional, as e. g. Dan. 7, notwithstanding they are linked with a Coming of the Son of man, which Jesus Himself refers to the future, are made, owing to their embracing in the Kingdom, "under the whole heaven," "people, nations, and languages," to be fulfilled in the present dispensation because of the implied and granted perpetuation of the race. Let any one turn to the prophecy of "the married wife" and "the barren woman"

(Prop. 118) and see the increase predicated of the latter after the marriage with the former and the restoration of the latter to God's favor. Can a consistent interpretation be placed upon the passage without admitting the early doctrine? Take the faith of the pious Jews (Prop. 20, etc.), of John the Baptist (Prop. 39), of the disciples sent out to preach (Prop. 43), and can this continuation of the race embraced in that faith be discarded without convicting them of gross error and folly? Take the preaching of Jesus (Prop. 44, etc.) and the postponement of the Kingdom until His Sec. Advent (Props. 58, 66, 68, etc.), and it is impossible to conceive of a Kingdom, such as preached and postponed, that does not include this very feature. This can only be rejected at the expense of denying that the same Kingdom which was overthrown (Props. 32, 33) shall again be restored (as prophets predict); of transforming the throne and Kingdom into something very different (Prop. 122, etc.) from that which the grammatical language indicates; of ignoring a renewed (Prop. 50) covenant and substituting another in its place; of misinterpreting the design (Prop. 86) of the present dispensation; of materially changing the force (Prop. 106) of Christ's temptation; of exalting the deliverance of inanimate (and animate) creation (Prop. 146) over that of the race; and of weakening the analogy of Scripture.' "The world to come" (Prop. 137), in its Jewish usage, adoption, meaning, and specific appropriation to the covenant promises, clearly teaches the continuation of the race in "the habitable world" still future.' So also the comprehensiveness of "restitution" (Prop. 144), of "regeneration" (Prop. 144), of the dominion of the Second Adam (Prop. 82), of "the transfiguration" (Prop. 153), of the reign of the saints (Prop. 154) cannot be consistently explained without including the perpetuation of the race. "The day of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Prop. 138) and "the morning" of that day (Prop. 139), at "the end of the age" (Prop. 140), unmistakably includes this feature (and shows that Waggoner's theory that Christ comes and then withdraws with His saints for a thousand years is untenable—for such a withdrawal is nowhere asserted, but His presence in this day and at this morning in His "inheritance," "the purchased possession" is announced). Our doctrine does not make God's effort at direct rulership over a nation in the flesh a failure (Prop. 201), but shows how God, out of this very unpromising condition (resulting from man's sinfulness), raises up agencies by which this rulership shall yet be manifested in overwhelming grandeur and majesty. In vindication of this, we point to the Judgeship of Christ (Prop. 132)—as explained and defended—to the Judgment Day (Prop. 133)—as represented in the Word—to the Millennial predictions (Prop. 119, etc.), received without transposing or mutilating, and from these we learn, that nations in the flesh after the Second Advent and their perpetuation, are requisites to insure the proper fulfilment of Holy Writ. The glory of that Judgeship, the blessings of that Judgment period (in which the earth and its nations are to rejoice), and the happiness of that Millennial era, can never be realized without these. The "unchangeable priesthood" of Jesus Christ (Prop. 155), as well as the priestly office of His associated rulers (Prop. 156), certainly implies that there must be generations of men who are to be benefited by that priesthood extending into "the ages," seeing that it is founded on the adaptation and relation that it sustains to those (not glorified saints who themselves become "priests") whom it is designed to benefit.<sup>3</sup> The intercession is not limited and made intermediate between the two Advents. Thus also, the work of the Spirit for saving purposes is not confined to this dispensation (Prop. 171), etc., but extends into the age to come, where its greatest manifestations—in glorifying the saints, in converting, etc., the nations—are yet to be witnessed. It is—in view of this preponderating evidence given through different phases of the subject and preserving a unity of purpose—simply faithless to suppose that the conflagration of Peter (Prop. 149 and 150) is to prevent the fulfilment of this perpetuation of the race. The identification of “the new heaven and new earth” of Isaiah, Peter and John (Prop. 151) confirms our position, seeing that it proves the identity of the Millennial era with its perpetuation of the race, with that of the New Jerusalem state. Such, enumerated with the utmost brevity, are some of the reasons which incline us to accept of a doctrine which logically results from covenant and promise; which even “the uneducated and ignorant” (as one calls it) primitive Church could not fail—owing to its nearness to apostolic teaching—to grasp; and which, instead of dishonoring God, or His Christ, or the glorified saints, brings honor and glory to the Father, Son, Spirit, and “the first-fruits” out of the nations, and ultimately to the nations themselves deliverance from the oppressive burden borne for thousands of years. Even some of our opponents, in view of the sublime opening which it unfolds in the future, have, at least, conceded that it is “a magnificent theory,” it is more, for it is the truth of God.

<sup>1</sup> Those, as Whitby, Grove, etc., who make the creation in Rom. 8, the Gentile world, only increase the difficulty of their position; for, accepting of that interpretation, then it follows that the Gentile world will exist after the manifestation, i. e., resurrection, etc. Speaking of analogy reminds us of Dr. Brookes (Maranatha) saying of the judgments still future: “We might argue from analogy that a heavenly people, the Church, would be preserved from it, like Enoch; and that an earthly people, the faithful remnant among the Israelites, would be preserved through it, like Noah; while the ungodly who have despised His love would be overwhelmed by it, like the antediluvian world.”

<sup>2</sup> The reader is reminded that the word “oikoumenē” used in the phrase “the world to come,” not only denotes “the inhabited earth or world,” but is directly employed (being but used fifteen times) to designate the earth in its relation to people, mortals, nations living upon it, as Matt. 24 : 14; Luke 2 : 1; Acts 17 : 6, 31; Heb. 1 : 6; Luke 4 : 5; and 21 : 26; Acts 11 : 28; and 19 : 27; and 24 : 5; Rom. 10 : 18; Heb. 10 : 5; Rev. 3 : 10; and 12 : 9; and 16 : 14. Usage thus abundantly confirms our position.

<sup>3</sup> The reader is reminded that an additional reason may be derived from Christ being a priest forever, or the ages “after the order of Melchisedec.” Kurtz (His. of Old Cov., vol. 1, p. 221) lays much stress on the fact of Melchisedec being then king at Salem, and possessing the country promised to Abraham. This Abraham acknowledges, and gives tithes, while the king blesses him. If this is typical, why not extend it into the age to come, where it will be actually realized? (Comp. Prop. 155.)

Obs. 6. Keeping under consideration the reasons already presented favoring the perpetuation of the race, attention is directed to various passages which proclaim the same truth. Allusion has been made to the contrast found in the beginning and ending of the Bible. After this dispensation has closed and another age of “the ages” (Prop. 139) has been ushered in, and the New Jerusalem state is experienced by the saints, in strict accordance with Isa. 60 : “The nations of them which are saved,” the honor and glory of “the nations” are mentioned (Rev. 21 : 24, 26), which is only applicable to then existing “nations” on the earth, seeing that the saints gathered out of all nations are never designated by this plural form of “nations.” The saints are elected out of nations and in their aggregate form “the peculiar people” or “nation,” to whom the Kingdom is given, while these nations are spoken of as saved in their national capacity, indicative of another dispensation. Taking even the interpretation of our opponents of the city as representing or symbolizing the saints, the nations walking in the light of this city must be people separate and distinct from the city itself. This is, as we have already stated, corroborated by "the healing of these nations," obtaining access—like the saints before them—to the tree of life restored to this paradisiacal earth, thus obtaining immortality as Adam would have done had he not fallen. (This is indicative that all obtain their immortality by the same process, and that the process of salvation continues.) And, the language is so worded as to imply progressive or successive healing as may be required by the growth of these nations.* It is singular how oppositely opinions are expressed; for one (Priest's View) who spiritualizes the Millennial prophecies and yet acknowledges the first resurrection to be literal (but carefully places the resurrected ones in the third heavens), is forced to admit that these "leaves" are for the healing of the mortal nations then living, and in his application proceeds, beyond even Millenarians, to make out that there is no death in the Mill. age (which is contradicted by Isa. 65 : 17 seq., etc., and the final removal of death after the thousand years, Rev. 20 : 13, 14). The fact is, that such passages briefly expressed presuppose a previous acquaintance with the prophecies which proclaim that some will be spared. Turn to Isa. 66, and it is declared that when the Lord comes to plead "by fire and by His sword with all flesh," etc. (v. 15, 16), He will "gather all nations and tongues" (as in Rev. 19; Matt. 25; Joel 3, etc.), and after punishing this gathering it is expressly said that some will escape (v. 19), who shall be sent to distant nations to declare God's glory to the Gentiles. Then the restoration of the Jewish nation is asserted, and in connection with it this weighty assurance, "for as the new heavens and the new earth which I will make shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain." Here we have, then, after this terrible coming to Judgment, after this gathering of nations, and after the creation of this new heaven and new earth, the spared Jewish nation and the spared Gentiles. An increase is predicated of the Jewish nation, and the promise belongs to them, as the context shows, in their national capacity. Again : Isa. 24 describes the fearful ordeal through which the earth is to pass before "the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mt. Zion and in Jerusalem," etc., and in v. 6 it is said : "Therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned and few men left" (a remnant is also alluded to in v. 13), showing that some will be spared. This is followed by the reign here on earth, and in the description of it (next chapter) nations are included. In addition, the song that is to be sung in the land of Judah (ch. 26) corroborates this statement.* That some are spared is also seen in Isa. 10 : 19, 20, 21, when "the consumption decreed shall overflow in righteousness;" in Ezek 36 : 36, where some of "the heathen are left" when the Jewish nation is restored and the "land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden," etc.; in Ezek. 39 : 21, 22, 23 and Ezek. 38 : 23, when God will, by the overthrow of the last confederation (comp. Rev. 19, etc.), make Himself "known in the eyes of many nations" and "heathen" who have escaped; in Isa. 45 : 20, when "the escaped of the nations" shall see "Israel saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation," etc.; in Ps. 69 : 35, 36, as a result of Christ's work, "God will save Zion and will build the cities of Judah, that they may dwell there and have it in possession," etc. The restoration of the Jewish nation, at the very time that God will "raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen" and "will build it as in the days of old" (Amos 9 : 11-15), is followed by the rebuilding of the waste cities, the perpetual occupation of the land, and the possessing "the remnant of Edom and all the heathen" who shall then be converted. In Rev. 15 : 4 (comp. Rev. 14), after the gathering out of a select number, i.e. the elect, we are told that the fearful plagues which follow down to the ushering in of the Millennium are not designed to exterminate the race remaining, but to bring them into obedience, "for all nations shall come and worship before Thee; for thy judgments are made manifest." As intimated, it is impossible—taking Isa. 60 to describe one period of time, and noticing the manner of introduction, the events connected therewith, the inexpressible glory that is experienced, etc.—to locate that passage to be fulfilled before the Second Advent, seeing that the condition of nations and of the earth is asserted to be the reverse of all this down to that Coming. In this Scripture we have the restoration of the Jewish nation, other nations, many generations, and increase, specifically mentioned. The same is true of Isa. 61 : 4-11 and Isa. 62 : 1-5. In no other way can the longevity of Isa. 65 : 20-22, taking place in "the new heaven and new earth, be explained; for "as the days of a tree shall be the days of my people," etc., can only be predicated of such a prolonging of man's life that it shall be like the duration of a tree—a return to the original condition. While the one who is condemned to premature death manifests not only a rule over subjects in the flesh, but an actual return to the former Theocratic punishment. The same longevity is expressed in Zech. 8 : 4 with a joyful increase, so that "the streets of the city shall be full (comp. Isa. 44 : 4, etc.) of boys and girls playing," etc., and this occurs when "I (the Lord) am returned unto Zion and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem, and Jerusalem shall be called, A city of truth and the Mountain of the Lord of hosts, The Holy Mountain." And added to this is a rebuke to those who will not credit it in the words: "If it be marvellous (hard or difficult) in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? saith the Lord of hosts."

<sup>1</sup> A writer, L. C. B., Proph. Times, Dec., 1871, p. 190, says that the phrase "of them which are saved" is "discarded from all the late critical editions of the text." The oldest mss. (see Tischendorf's N. T.), however, retain it. Besides this the expression as it stands fully sustains the same writer's position, since it refers to those nations who are spared, i.e., saved in the fearful tribulation (Isa. 60, Zech. 14.), etc. Lord also omits the phrase in his Apoc., and so does the late Revision, Lange, etc. Its reception or omission (which the reader will decide for himself) does not affect our argument, simply because the mention of "nations" then existing, and the identity of description with Isa. 60 (an admitted Mill. prophecy) is amply sufficient for our purpose.

<sup>2</sup> The "overcomers" of the church of Ephesus (Rev. 2 : 7) also partake of "the tree of life," but if we take the positive declarations of 1 Cor. 15 respecting the transformation to immortality and incorruptibility, they certainly do not eat thereof to perpetuate life, just as they do not "drink of the fruit of the vine in the Kingdom of God" (Mark 14 : 25; Math. 26 : 29; Luke 22 : 18) in order to sustain life, or as an essential to salvation. It must, in the nature of the case, be to them only a source of enjoyment and pleasure. No one for a moment thinks that Jesus, David's Son, requires a constant partaking of the tree of life in order to sustain His immortality, and the saints being expressly fashioned after Jesus, made like unto Him, must be—as the promises indicate—in the same happy condition. Fausset (com. Rev. 22 : 2), on "healing," comments: "The leaves shall be the health-giving preventative securing the redeemed against—not healing them of sicknesses." "Alford utterly mistakes in speaking of 'nations outside' and 'dwelling on the renewed earth, organized under Kings, and saved by the influences of the heavenly city.'" We apprehend Fausset to be mistaken and Alford correct, because (1) it is inconceivable that saints glorified and raised up to immortality, having incorruptibility, and made like Jesus, should still be susceptible of sicknesses so that they must take a medicine, a preventive; and (2) Alford is abundantly sustained by the Scriptures, as e.g. Isa. 60 and 54. The fact is, that the accessibility of the nations to the tree of life serves to explain how it is that the blessings of the Millennial age are produced. Some make "healing" equivalent to "service" and apply it to the saints, as designed not to give but perpetuate life; we prefer, on the other hand, "healing" as more in analogy with the actual results of the Millennial age, and that while both saints, and those of the nations who secure God's special favor by obedience, have access to the tree of life, to the one class it is a means of increased enjoyment and to the other a means of rejuvenation and life. Hence Bickersteth (Prom. Glory, p. 232) is correct when he says "that there are nations on the earth who walk in the light of the city, as distinct from the city itself," calling it an "unspeakably magnificent truth." So Mede (Works, p. 772) remarks: "We must distinguish between the state of the New Jerusalem and the state of the nations which shall walk in the light thereof. They shall not be both one, but much differing." Dr. Craven (Lange's Com. Rev., p. 391) presents his views as follows: "We should also distinguish between the citizens of the city and the nations (21 : 24). The former are risen and glorified Saints who constitute the Bride, the governors of the New Creation. The latter are (probably) men in the flesh, who walk in the light of the City, who bring their glory and honor into it, and who are healed (or kept in health) by the leaves of its tree of life, i.e., who are under its instruction and government." "The nations will consist (probably) of men in the flesh, freed from the sin and the curse, begetting a holy seed, and dwelling in blessedness under the government of the New Jerusalem. They will be, not the offspring of the glorified Saints, who 'neither marry nor are given in marriage' (Matt. 22 : 30), but the descendants of those who live in the flesh during the period of the Millennial Kingdom." In several places he speaks of "the reign of the saints over the race and the earth," which is the decided opinion of numerous able writers.

* Some might regard our argument incomplete if we did not notice Waggoner (Ref. of Age to Come), who asserts that because the word "all" is employed in "all nations," "all inhabitants," "all wicked," etc., being judged in these last days, that no one will escape. Again let it be said that this shows how important it is to interpret no prophecy isolated from its mates. How often it is asserted that "all men" shall die, etc., and yet Paul predicts that some will not die. Such phraseology is current among all nations, indicative of a vast multitude—greater proportion, etc. So "all" Judea came to John, "all" came to be taxed, draw "all" men, etc., which does not literally mean every individual, but denotes something that is general, almost universal. Waggoner's criticism on Isa. 24 : 6 and also Loughborough's (The Saints' Inheritance) on the same, making "the few men left" the saints that go to the third heaven, is shown to be erroneous by what follows on the same earth, as we have indicated. These two writers, with a few others, have, against the primitive church faith, etc., certainly succeeded in introducing a novelty (advocated by a Jewish Rabbi) in the shape of doctrine, viz.: that for a thousand years the earth is left "empty and desolate" of all inhabitants, the wicked being burned up, and the saints housed in the third heaven, from whence they and Christ shall return, at the end of the thousand years, to reside on the renewed earth. This is opposed by the descriptions usually following of a succeeding Millennial age in which nations exist, by Satan being bound during these thousand years in order not to deceive existing nations, etc. This is based on a total misconception of the Kingdom really covenanted, and numerous propositions as given indicate its error. Founded chiefly upon pressing a universality of language (which past fulfilment, as Nah. 1 : 5, etc., should teach how to understand) to an extreme, it places itself, as a theory, in an awkward position, when (as Loughborough) it makes Isa. 65 : 17 seq. to be fulfilled after the one thousand years. Confused by verse 20, we are told that this cannot apply to the new earth state, because John says that there will be no more death, hence if we are to accept of King James's version, "it must apply to what transpires just as that state is ushered in," i.e. the sinner, although he be an hundred years old, is accursed,—not permitted to enter the land, and dies a child. He forgets, however, that a thousand years having thus elapsed, his system makes no provision for either sinner or child. He feels this difficulty and introduces (which does not help him) this rendering given by Paganini: "There shall be no more carried out thence to burial, an infant of days, or a youth, or an old man, who hath not filled his days, for the man of an hundred years shall be as a youth.

Obs. 7. So numerous are the testimonies and allusions, that attention can only be directed to the most important. Zech. 14 presents us a powerful argument in our favor, seeing that not only the Coming of the Lord and of His saints and the establishment of His Kingly authority "over all the earth" is distinctly announced, but that the continuation of the Jewish nation is designated, and then it is asserted (v. 16) that some shall be "left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem" and shall acknowledge (owing to the judgments inflicted) the supremacy of the King, and tender worship unto Him. This corresponds with the increase of Christ's government (Isa. 9 : 7), which also follows a "burning and fuel of fire," and a sitting "upon the throne of David" (thus restored). This agrees with what is recorded in Isa. 59 : 21 that His Spirit and words shall perpetually abide with the nation, and its "seed" and "seed's seed," when "the Redeemer shall come to Zion and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob." This accords with Ezek. 37 : 25, when at the time the nation is restored in its undivided form and "my servant David shall be their prince forever," then the nation shall dwell in the land "wherein your fathers have dwelt ; and they shall dwell therein, even they, and their children and their children's children forever." (Comp. Jer. 32 : 39, 40 ; Jer. 33 : 7-14 ; Joel 3 : 27-30, etc.) The unity on this point running through Scripture is surprising, and the repeated declarations on the subject seem to be given as if to meet the lack of faith in such predictions. Take Ps. 102, and notice the continuation of nations, not only after the Lord "shall appear in His glory," when "the set time to favor Zion is come," and "when the people are gathered together, and the Kingdoms to serve the Lord," but after the heavens and earth are changed "as a vesture," then "the children of thy servants shall continue and their seed shall be established before Thee." The connection makes this conclusive. That most expressive Ps. 72 (keeping in view the Pre-Mill. Advent) describes the extended dominion of David's Son over all the earth, all nations, "throughout all generations" (making them of the city to flourish like grass of the earth), so that the idea of successive generations of men assumes great prominence in the prediction. So also Ps. 45, which describes the fall of the king's enemies, the King in His majesty with the Queen and the King's daughters and virgins manifested, significantly adds : "I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations," etc. (Comp. Ps. 145 : 13 ; Isa. 34 : 17 ; Ps. 146 : 10 ; Isa. 51 : 8, etc.) Admitting (Obs. 2) that "everlasting" and "forever" are sometimes employed in a limited sense (the actual duration being determined by the nature of the thing to which it is referred), and that when applied to the race of man it includes that period—whatever it may be—in which the race shall produce its successive generations ; admitting, too, that the future is made up of succeeding "ages," and even designated "eternities" (so some critics), yet such is the comprehensiveness of the language employed, the vastness of design aimed at indicated by details and the direct association with the re-established Kingdom of the Messiah, that, only inclined to go as far as "the all generations," etc., whatever they may be in number—an immense increase must necessarily be denoted by the use of such terms. The "perpetual generations" in the covenant with Noah (Gen. 9 : 12-16) not only denotes that God will not again, for He will remember "the everlasting covenant," destroy all flesh upon the earth in His wrath, but that there will be a vast, enormous succession of generations of men. This is corroborated by the covenant made with Abraham (Gen. 13 : 14, 16 ; Gen. 17 : 5-8), which embraces, not only successive generations and a multitude of nations, but so numerous that they shall be “as the dust of the earth, so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered,” evincing such a host (comp. Jer. 33 : 22) still to come into existence as shall surpass the ordinary powers of enumeration—a condition very different to that hitherto occupied by the Jewish nation, decimated and downtrodden as it has been. All such promises are bound to the period still future, when (Ps. 89 : 4, 29, 36, 37, etc.) David’s throne is re-established unto “all generations ;” when (Luke 1 : 32, 33) “the Lord God shall give unto Him (i.e. Jesus, Mary’s Son) the throne of His father David and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever (through the ages),” so that there will be (Eph. 3 : 21) “to Him glory in the Church by Jesus Christ” (so Barnes, Com. loci, says literally) “unto all generations of the age of ages,” or “unto all the generations of the eternity of eternities, or the eternity of ages.” or (as Bloomfield, loci) “through the succession of all generations unto the latest period of eternity.”

Fausset (Com. Eph. 3 : 21) comments : “‘Unto him be the glory in the Church in Christ to all the generations of eternal ages,’ lit. ‘of the age of the ages.’ Eternity is conceived as consisting of ages (these again consisting of ‘generations’) endlessly succeeding one another.” The Latin Vulgate (authorized Dublin Transl.) renders Eph. 3 : 21 : “To Him be glory in the Church and in Jesus Christ, unto all generations world without end. Amen.” And Eph. 2 : 7 : “That He might show in the ages to come the abundant riches of His grace, in His bounty toward us in Christ Jesus.” The New Revis. has, “Unto all generations for ever and ever. Amen.” The Kingdom, as various writers have noticed, is linked in its duration with successive generations, expressive of the increase of His government. Hence, according to the sentiment of Prov. 14 : 28, “In the multitude of people is the King’s honor,” we may well believe that proportionate to the greatness and extent of this Kingdom, by such continued accessions, will the honor and glory of David’s Son be splendidly magnified and reflected.

Obs. 8. It may be appropriate to notice some objections that are urged against this view. The author of The Kingdom of Grace (p. 9) gives such a variety of them mingled together that we reproduce them with our answers given parenthetically. He opposes our using (!) the prayer, “Come, Lord Jesus, even so, come quickly,” because we then pray God to end this dispensation (we look for one more glorious); to let no Gospel be preached to sinners (it is successfully proclaimed to Jews and Gentiles and the saints are priests); to multiply no more trophies of victorious grace (we immensely increase these trophies by the salvation of the race); and to finish the number of the elect (true, in order that the vast project of redemption may be carried on through the agency of these same elect). To prove this, he attributes to us what we do not teach, as e.g. that the wicked will be all destroyed, so that there will be none to whom the Gospel shall be preached (the incorrigible will be, while those repentant under God’s judgments will be spared); that as only Christ and glorified saints will be on the earth during that period (which is a mistake), there will be no more death (correct as to saints, and as to those who may afterward be glorified, but not as to one class) nor propagation of the race (after quoting in other places Millenarian authors who directly teach the same). Hence we are guilty of intentionally praying “that the Gospel dispensation may quickly end, and that the number of the elect may be limited and cut off, rather than increased” (which is not our language or idea, for we pray not that the Gospel shall end, but the dispensation, and not that the number of the elect may be limited, but that the number God has determined may be speedily completed ; and this, in order that God's redemptive purposes may be carried out). This, he remarks, is opposed to what Paul says, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ" (that is, "the Gospel dispensation"—which certainly is an interpretation of the Gospel that needs no refutation). "for it is the power of God unto salvation" (neither are we ashamed of the Gospel of Christ because it brings us salvation, perfected, in His Kingdom); and concludes by telling us that when we pray for the Saviour to come, we ought to mean and pray for His Coming at death (this is spiritualizing away the Second Advent as "the blessed hope," and putting in its place a penal characteristic). We have thus allowed the objections of one to appear in their involved manner, and thus briefly answered them, to indicate the nature and practice of a class of books circulated. Others are advanced of a similar character. Thus e.g. a prominent Divine, arguing against the saints and mortal men living in the same "new heaven and new earth," gravely asserts that "the supposition is self annihilating," because "the one class with glorified bodies and the other with natural, cannot inhabit the same world;" and then adds: "If this is the Kingdom of heaven, how can the flesh and blood of fallen man inherit it?" The first part needs no refutation, seeing that the matter solely depends upon the teaching of God's Word, while the latter part is a confounding of those who inherit (i.e. the glorified saints, who actually receive a rulership in the Kingdom) with the subjects of the Kingdom. The objection, so often repeated, that it would be degrading for Christ and the saints to dwell on the same earth where nations in the flesh reside, has been several times noticed and answered, so that it requires (comp. Prop. 203) no additional remarks. Brethren should be careful how they designate that pure Theocratic arrangement—once established—to be manifested in David's Son and spoken of as one of great glory and power, "a degrading" position, lest they be found to be lowering, treating with disrespect, the Divine ordering and the Kingdom of Jesus. The exaltation, as well as the specific work and design contemplated, is an ample vindication of such a dwelling and reigning on the earth, an earth, too, lifted up from its present condition of suffering and degradation. This, while displaying God's wonderful condescension, love and mercy, in being willing to act in the capacity of an earthly ruler, at the same time immeasurably exalts the worth of man in the scale of being, and the astonishing greatness to which the race itself will be elevated. But of all the objections, probably the one most confidently advanced by some, is the following, viz., that if such a propagation of the race continues after the Second Advent, the earth will not be able to contain the vast multitude, that there will be "no standing room," etc. This is simply imitating the spirit of the lord who disbelieved Elisha's prediction of plenty in Samaria; denying the ability of God to perform what He has promised, or that His wisdom and power is equal to any and every emergency. If the fact is revealed, the manner of its accomplishment may be safely left with the Almighty. Unbelief is not the measure of the fulfilment of Holy Writ. Even if there should be successive generations eternally (which we neither affirm nor deny), reason can suggest ways by which the difficulty could be removed, viz., as supposed by various writers, in successive translations, transference to other worlds, etc. God may have ways utterly unknown to us. In the re-creation, when "I make or create all things new," the earth itself may be, for aught we know, enlarged to adapt it for the ages to come. Admitting creative agency exerted, we can assign—as the universe indicates in its infinity of phases—no limit, for the physical conditions that we faintly see revealed in other planets and stellar systems may be partly or entirely engrafted upon this earth. Who can tell e.g. that it may not shine forth in that day with rings like Saturn, etc. With the increased fertility of the earth, with God's ability, if need be, to supply manna, with successive translations, with God's power to meet necessities that He may cause to arise, with an objection relating to the exceeding distant future—so distant that it does not concern us—concerning which, owing to its remoteness, God has given no detailed information—it is unwise and faithless to reject revelation for mere assumption, and assumption, too, reflecting upon the Divine attributes.* Much that was said respecting the extent of the conflagration (Prop. 150) will also apply here. The simple question to be decided is the one, whether God has thus predicted the multiplication and perpetuation of the race? if this is determined in the affirmative, then all such objections have no weight when placed in the balance against that Word. Instead of suggesting difficulties and impossibilities when God promises an astonishing display of His wonder-working attributes, we are content to receive and believe the promises that Messiah's Kingdom shall yet be set up at His Sec. Coming—a Kingdom adapted to the character and wants of man (to the redeemed, the individual, society, and the nation), in which "every knee shall bow of the heavenlies, of the earthlies, and of the undergrounders" (so Sirr, First. Res., p. 104), "and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father;" in which Jesus, seated upon this judgment seat or throne, shall indeed be "Lord both of the dead and the living;" in which "the Church of the first-born," the exalted "first-fruits" shall witness a mighty redemptive harvest following in the revolving ages; and in which, Ps. 113, the glorious Hallel shall be sung, reflecting praise, not only upon the Lord on account of His majesty and dominion over all nations, and in exalting the poor and needy to be Princes, but in making "the barren woman to keep house (Marg. read to dwell in a house) and to be a joyful mother of children."

* Isa. 33 : 17 may have an indirect reference (marg. reading, and Alexander's version, "a land of distances," an extended land), which instead of meaning "foreign travel," "remote parts of Judea," of "seeing far and wide," etc., may denote either that the land shall be given in the distant future or that the land shall be enlarged, extended. Lange's Com. loci expresses the idea of "a wide extended land" pertaining to the Messianic future, saying: "As royal pomp and beauty adorns the person of a king, so immeasurable extent does His land." The Heb. is, "of far distances."

<sup>2</sup> The writer has met with several arithmetical calculations, which, making the most ample allowances for the past population of the globe, indicate that less than one third of the island of England would give sufficient "standing room" for all the race that has ever existed. These, interesting as they may be to meet some absurd speculations, etc., concerning the resurrection, do not amount to much in the eyes of a believer. For the latter constantly feels that the promise is ours, but the manner of fulfilling it belongs to God. The objection, if it has any force at all, is equally applicable, and more so, to a propagation of the race on an unrenewed earth, with its vast tracts of desert, etc., for a Millennial era of three hundred and sixty thousand years! Whitbyans, therefore, should be the last to urge it.

PROPOSITION 153. This view of the Kingdom with its two classes (viz., the translated and dead saints, glorified, forming one class, and mortal men the other) is forcibly represented in the transfiguration.

The transfiguration, not only in view of its being so notable an occurrence, but of its being a typical or real representation of Christ's Coming in His Kingdom, is worthy of separate and special consideration.

Dr. Hodge (Sys. Div., vol. 3, p. 796,) says: "The transfiguration on the Mount was a type and pledge of the glory of the Sec. Advent, 2 Pet. 1 : 16." This is correct as far as it goes, but the transfiguration embraces much more, viz.: the glory of that Sec. Advent as manifested in His Kingdom.

Obs. 1. Notice its introductory. "About eight days before" (Luke 9 : 28), Jesus told His disciples what they must do in order that they might be rewarded when the Son of man should come "in the glory of His Father with the holy angels" (Mark 8 : 38), or, "in the glory of His Father with His angels" (Matt. 16 : 27), or, "in His own glory, and in His Father's, and of the holy angels" (Luke 9 : 26). This, undoubtedly, refers to the Second Advent. Now, keeping in view the idea thus advanced, and, mark it, addressed to Jewish hearers who invariably linked the Coming of the Son of man in glory with the prediction of Dan. 7 : 13, 14 (respecting the glory and Kingdom then manifested), our Saviour proceeds now to give His disciples (with their Jewish interpretation of Daniel uncontradicted) an assurance that He will give some of them a specimen of this Coming in glory. In Matt. 16 : 28 follows: "Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here (Mark : some of them that stand here ; Luke : there be some standing here) which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in His Kingdom (Mark : till they have seen the Kingdom of God come with power ; Luke : till they see the Kingdom of God)." That this Coming in His Kingdom does not refer to the Church (so Barnes, Storr, etc.), is evident from the connection which the language sustains to His Coming at the Second Advent, the time of judgment and rewarding presented in the context, and from the fact that the Coming is to be witnessed only by "some," i.e. a few, then present. To interpret this as an invisible Coming at the destruction of Jerusalem (Prof. Bush, Whitby, etc.), making out a fulfilment of Dan. 7, is forced and unnatural, being a violation both of the preceding and succeeding context and the Jewish interpretation of Daniel as held by the disciples and evidenced by their preaching. As Olshausen has well observed (Com. loci) that "the immediate connection of these words (in Matthew) with the foregoing context, in which the Coming in His glory refers so unmistakably to the Parousia, does not admit of this explanation (viz., as describing powerful manifestations of living Christian principle), without reference to the personal return of Jesus." The translator of Olshausen, Dr. Kendrick, adds the following pertinent note: "I think it can scarcely be doubted that 'the Coming of the Son of man in His Kingdom' refers here to the following scene of the transfiguration. The words 'shall not see death until they see the Son of man,' refer not to length of life, but to privilege; some shall have the privilege of beholding Him in His glory even before they die. So some ancient commentators. The transfiguration is thus regarded as a type of the Saviour's future glory in His Kingdom." Schmid (Bib. Theol. of the N. Test., p. 220) explains the passage to refer to "His return as Lord and King of His Kingdom on earth, in the clouds of heaven for judgment." Lange says that Chrysostom and many others believe this to relate to the transfiguration; and Lange, Meyer, and others think that it has respect to His future manifestation of, or state of, glory. That it unquestionably refers to the transfiguration is conclusive by the use of the phraseology, "the Son of man coming in His Kingdom" (which was only employed, Props. 81, 83, 130, etc., in reference to His personal Coming, etc.), and by the fact that immediately following, a few days after, occurred the transfiguration, which even our opponents admit (as Bloomfield, Com. loci) to be "a figurative representation of Christ's final Advent in glory to judgment." Avoiding the idea of its being "figurative" (for it was real), the scene enacted in the transfiguration is a representation of the very appearance that the Son of man will assume when He comes in glory at His Second Coming in His Kingdom. That all the disciples lived—did not taste of death—until long after the transfiguration (so Whitty) is no objection to its reference to that scene, because all but three did die without having "the privilege" of seeing it. The indistinct allusion to the three disciples who should witness this Coming of the Son of man—the manner of specifying it without mentioning the names of the parties who should see it—binds this passage in the strongest possible manner to the following transfiguration, because the disciples thus favored were expressly charged to keep it a secret until after Christ's resurrection. Hence, this very Coming to be seen being intended as a strictly private or secret matter, explains the indefinite language of Jesus both in reference to the persons and the time, to avoid the questionings, etc. (Jones, Notes loci), that would assuredly take place, had He been more specific. This is only another of those indirect, most delicate, but most powerful, attestations to the truthfulness of the Evangelists. And, as Judge Jones has well suggested, owing to this indefiniteness of language (which must have surprised the disciples at the time), we are indebted to the fact that the Evangelists who state it are also careful—to remove all obscurity—to narrate in immediate connection—as the best comment—the promise and consequent fulfilment."

<sup>1</sup> Neander (Life of Christ, Sec. 181) takes a liberty with the text of Matt. 16 : 28 not allowed by the passage. He says: "He (Christ) announced to them that many among them would live to see this Kingdom of God," etc. Now the three Gospels, instead of saying "many," all unite in the same word "some," and confine these "some" to "some standing here." It is limited to a few among those present, and as the connection—immediate—shows, to three persons. The notion that the Church was the Kingdom intended suggested the "many." Fairbairn (On Proph., p. 443) surely failed (purposely?) to see the connection that this verse sustains to what follows, or he would not have said that it could only be applied to the apostles witnessing "the manifestation of Christ's divine power after His ascension, when introducing the new dispensation and formally removing the old. This is the only thing that can be regarded as properly falling within the terms of the description." We suppose he refers to the day of Pentecost, which was the coming of the Comforter, which not some but all the apostles witnessed, and which ignores the context and the testimony of Peter, substituting mere conjecture. Neander is influenced by his "peccoralistic theology" (see Kurtz, Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 355), and Fairbairn by his Anti-Millenarian bias. Brown (Com. loci), as a matter of course, applies this to the establishment of the Christian Church "beyond doubt," as if assertion were proof. Ebrard (Gosp. His., p. 340 and 343) gives a choice criticism in order to enforce such an application of the text, as follows: "Jesus was speaking here, not of His own return, but of the formation of His church, and especially of the events of the day of Pentecost; this would be apparent from the preposition en (in His Kingdom), which must mean in and not to. Christ comes in His Kingdom, when he founds His church, and appears therein. His coming to judgment would be coming to the Kingdom, not coming in it. He could only be represented as coming in the Kingdom, if by kingdom we were to understand the ornatus regius, or the angels attendant upon Him; but this would be entirely opposed to the usage of Jesus and His apostles." Briefly in reply: (1) If Ebrard is correct it would not be true that some, or a few, witnessed it; (2) he is contradictory, for in the same work, he has the Kingdom already formally established by the appointment of the twelve—then received at death, and again at Pentecost, etc.; (3) his reference to judgment is based on the Popish idea which we reject; (4) the Sec. Advent is invariably associated with a kingdom in which the Son of Man is the central figure, or with which He is associated; (5) the criticism is unworthy of the ability of the writer, and was evidently suggested by a preconceived opinion. Alexander (Com., Matt. 16 : 28) applies it thus: "It has reference to a gradual or progressive change, the institution of Christ's Kingdom in the hearts of men and in society at large, of which protracted process the two salient points are the effusion of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost and the destruction of Jerusalem more than a quarter of a century later, between which points, as those of inception and its consummation, lies the lingering death of the Mosaic dispensation and the gradual erection of the Messiah's Kingdom." This interpretation is based on an entire misapprehension of what constitutes the covenanted Messianic Kingdom, as elsewhere shown, and pointedly violates the usage which appropriates personality to the phrase "Son of Man," and which, therefore, only denotes a personal—not spiritual—coming. Hence we must reject, as unsatisfactory and contradictory, all interpretations which do not apply this "some" to the three favored disciples, as will be shown in detail.

* Matthew Henry (Com. loci) says: "Christ has said that the Son of Man should shortly come in His Kingdom, with which promise all three Evangelists industriously connect this story, as if Christ's transfiguration was intended for a specimen and an earnest of the Kingdom of Christ, and of that light and love of His which therein appear to His select and sanctified ones, and so Peter speaks of it as the power and coming of our Lord Jesus." The reader, if observing the force of verse 27 (which coming is admitted to refer to the Sec. Advent and to be a personal one), can readily see for himself that "the coming" of v. 27 being thus associated must relate to a similar coming. Dr. Rutter (Roman Catholic) in his Life of Jesus, p. 263, remarks: "As these last words—Matt. 16 : 28—cannot be understood of the last coming of Jesus, some understand them of the glory which He received by His resurrection, others of the glorious establishment of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ throughout the world by the preaching of the gospel. But others, with greater probability, refer them to His transfiguration, an account of which is immediately subjoined by the Evangelists. This promise of a transitory view of His glory He was induced to make, first, to prove what He had just asserted, viz., that He should one day come, in all the glory of His Father, to judge each man according to his works; secondly, to afford by this glorious scene some consolation to His apostles, who had heard, not without the greatest emotions of grief, the prediction of His approaching death, and the necessity they were under of following Him."

Obs. 2. Another feature as introductory ought to be considered. Just previous to this promise that some should see Him as He would come in His glory, the confession had been made by Peter that Jesus was "The Christ of God" (Luke 9 : 20); "The Christ" (Mark 9 : 29); "The Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16 : 16). In these words are contained not only a reference to His Messiahship as the promised King, but (as in Matthew) to the Theocratic (Divine) relationship that this ruler as the

Anointed One sustained. (Comp. Prop. 205). It is God again condescending to act as Theocratic ruler in the person of this Jesus. The phraseology denotes the Theocratic Rulership as associated with the restored throne and Kingdom of David. There is no doubt concerning this according to Jewish usage, etc. Having dwelt largely upon this Theocratic ordering in other propositions, it is only necessary to repeat that, identified as this Kingship was with the Jewish nation, the term "Christ" was an equivalent to the phrase "King of the Jews," as seen in the significant superscription of the cross, and in Herod, the Priests, and Scribes making "the King of the Jews" in the question of the wise men identical with that of "Christ." Notice carefully, that Jesus cautions His disciples to tell no one that He was "The Christ;" that this injunction is given after the death of John the Baptist, after the representative men of the nation took counsel together to destroy Him, after His rejection by the leaders of the nation and the refusal to repent; that the postponement of the Kingdom had already been determined, as evidenced by Jesus, immediately after this confession, referring to His approaching death—through the Elders, Chief Priests, and Scribes—and resurrection. The mention of His death in connection with His "Christship," as a matter of course perplexed (as the narrative shows) the disciples. To give an assurance that He was still "The Christ," although He would "be killed," He now promises to "some" such an evidence of His being "The Christ," that they could no more doubt its reality and its ultimate visible fulfilment on earth. If "Christ" only means, as multitudes inform us, that Jesus is "the anointed One to save sinners," can any one assign a reason—just and proper—why the disciples should be charged to secrecy respecting the title. But denoting as it does that Jesus is the Theocratic King, the appointed One to rule over the Jewish nation both as David's heir and God's Son (God thus ruling in and through Him), we see a reason why He should not, at that time, be proclaimed "The Christ," viz., that this would be in effect announcing Him as "the King of the Jews," which, in view of His rejection, the postponement of the reign, the contemplated sacrifice, the unnecessary collision, charges, accusations, etc., that would be evolved, it was not prudent or advisable to adopt. Now, although this "Christship" was to be kept a secret for wise purposes, and to avoid the animosity of His enemies and the jealousy of the Roman power, yet Jesus promises to give a favored few such a manifestation of that same "Christship" that it may be effectual in sustaining them, amid the terrible trial that was coming, and in preparing them, and through them, believers, for His removal from the earth. The disciples saw Jesus, but not as "the Coming One" in His Kingdom; they only saw Him in His state of humiliation; but the former is a reality as well as the latter, and the confession of the former having been elicited, Jesus now graciously proceeds to verify the former, so that hereafter, when withdrawn for a time, the apostles may proclaim the glorious truth that He is indeed "The Christ"—" The King of Israel." This very withdrawal of Jesus, the fact of His death publicly by crucifixion, the unbelief of the Romans and Jews in His resurrection, etc., being thus a protection (although as history informs us, Prop. 73, the application served to arrest the attention of the Roman Emperor) to the preaching of His "Christship"—for then, as now, the vast multitude have no faith in its legitimate meaning (Prop. 184)—as applied to Jesus, and none in its ultimate fulfilment as the title itself imports. The trial of the nation being ended by the death of John the Baptist, and by the conspiracy against the life of Jesus, and now the trial of the Son of man and that of His devoted followers coming on, in this extremity something extraordinary—something out of the usual course of events—is needed to indicate the truth which the approaching death seems to crush, and that need is supplied in the wonderful transfiguration.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> It is interesting to the student to notice that after the death and resurrection of Jesus, the injunction of secrecy being removed, this title of "Christ" becomes a favorite one, not merely as some suggest owing to "popular usage," but because the evidences presented proved Him to be such; the title suggested the glorious fulfilment of covenant and promise. The same Peter who made the confession, who saw the coming of the Christ in His glory, was the first to proclaim (Acts 2 : 30) "that God had sworn with an oath to him (David) that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, He would raise up Christ to sit on His throne," etc.

<sup>2</sup> Another feature which shows that the covenanted Kingdom is not the Church, and that it is still future, is exhibited in Peter's rebuking Jesus for asserting His death, and the reply of the Saviour. Peter had just confessed that Jesus was "the Christ," and this naturally suggested the pleasing prospect that then, at that time, He would inaugurate the Kingdom which was invariably linked with the manifestation of "the Christ." The reference to a coming death given by Jesus, of course, was opposed to such an expectation, and hence the strong language of Peter. The mistake of Peter, which, alas! is the mistake of the vast multitude, was that he looked for the Messiah's Kingdom in a world groaning under the curse of God; that he had no proper conception of the expedients and preparatory measures that were necessary before this world would be prepared for the Messiah's Kingdom as predicted by the prophets. Therefore the sharp answer of the Saviour follows, which is alleviated by the privilege afterward allotted to Peter. The student, if closely observant, will also notice how one of our previous propositions (that the Kingdom was not set up in the time of Jesus) is sustained by the fact that Jesus forbids even the announcement that He is "the Christ." Jesus, foreseeing His rejection and death, and the resultant postponement of the Kingdom, secretly gives this manifestation, and forbids its publication until after His death, thus delicately and lovingly saving His followers from a dreadful persecution. For if this had been done publicly and noised abroad—prematurely, as after events showed—it would have been seized, interpreted, and reported by His and their enemies to the Roman power as rebellion, the same charge precisely which the Jews pressed before Pilate and secured the crucifixion. This desire to save others, and even the nation, from unnecessary evil is the key to several things, as e.g. His refusal to give a sign to the Jews, and His revealing at times more of Himself to Gentiles than to Jews, to which infidelity ignorantly objects.

Obs. 3. The transfiguration itself is a real occurrence, as the entire narration fully demonstrates. Passing by the mere unfriendly supposition of Strauss that it is a mythical fabrication of the love of the marvellous to eclipse the account of Moses, or, the simple ignoring of it, without explanation, as unworthy of credence (a summary way of disposing of Scripture, which certainly taxes reason), or the attributing it to an "optical allusion," in which thunder, lightning, mists, and an excited imagination play their allotted parts, let us briefly consider what some have called "The Dream of Peter" (Furness, etc.), or a kind of visionary appearance (Palfrey), a scenic representation which appeared mentally or in some other way to the disciples, but had no real existence—so that Jesus, instead of being really transfigured, only appeared to be so in a dream, or kind of vision. The ablest defender of this view, probably, is Dr. Neander, who (Life of Christ, Sec. 185) admits, however, that it may be "an objective fact," i.e. a real, outward transaction, but, if so, it took place in view "of some unknown object for it," of which we must "confess our ignorance." Being thus at a loss—from his Church-Kingdom standpoint—to account for its occurrence, if a real manifestation, he inclines to adopt the theory of its being "a subjective psychological phenomenon," i.e. that it was only a mental conception, a vivid dream or vision induced by the impressive circumstances in which the disciples were placed, viz., by the prayer of Christ. Thus one of the most sublime exhibitions of Christ is transformed by this eminent man into a dream. He admits the difficulty how, if a vision, a mere mental affair, the three disciples obtained it at the same time and in the same form. Strauss, Renan, and others are more consistent and logical in their rejection of the whole matter as mythical, than Neander and others are in receiving it, and then divesting it of all force and propriety, by constituting it a kind of dream. If only a dream, why, as Neander queries, should all three at the same time dream it; why then forbid its revelation to others; why present it as a matter of historical fact; why specially assert that they beheld it "when they were awake;" why should they, from an upright position, fall upon their faces with dread, and what need of the Saviour to encourage them; and why introduce Peter as speaking? The style of narration, the particulars given, the design intended—all forbid such a caricaturing or belittling of that sublime representation. Having just shown that the preceding context contemplates that "some" of the disciples then present should "see," with their own eyes, "the Son of man Coming in His Kingdom," and finding that "six days after" three of these same disciples did see this transfiguration, which represented Jesus in His glory as "The Christ," we are fully prepared to find that these witnesses are positive in asserting that it was a real transaction, as e.g. John (Jno. 1 : 14) "we beheld (Gr., we distinctly saw, so Bloomfield, etc.) His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father." Barnes (Com. loci) says: "There is no doubt that there is reference here to the transfiguration on the holy mount. To this same evidence Peter also appeals, 2 Pet. 1 : 16-18. John was one of the witnesses of that scene, and hence he says, 'We beheld His glory.'" John thus vindicates the reality of the transaction, and sustains the three Evangelists in their representation of it. Then Peter (2 Pet. 1 : 16-18) mentions the place, the voice and saying from the Father, and emphatically declares that those who were on "the holy mount" at the time "were eye-witnesses of His Majesty."

Among the reasons assigned by Neander (His. Plant. Ch. Church, vol. 1, p. 376) for rejecting the Epistle of Second Peter as spurious, one is based on Peter's allusion to the transfiguration. He says: "But it certainly is not natural to suppose that one of the apostles should select and bring forward from the whole life of Christ of which they had been eye-witnesses, this insulated fact, which was less essentially connected with that which was the central point and object of His appearance." It certainly is doing injustice to the Epistle to come to it with a low estimation of the transfiguration, and then judge it by such a previously formed standard. Dr. Neander utterly failed to comprehend "this insulated fact," to see how it stands related to "the Christ," how vitally it is connected with the one great event to which both covenant and prophecy point, and how an apostle favored with so special a privilege of beholding that which represented the future Advent of the King in glory, would "naturally" refer to it us a most important and precious revelation.

Obs. 4. The transfiguration, following the announcement that "some" should, before their death, see "the Son of man Coming in His Kingdom," is a representation of the Kingdom in some of its aspects, viz., in the glory of "the Christ" or King, in the presence of (who also "appeared in glory," Luke 9 : 31) the translated and dead saints, and in the witness- ing of that glory by mortal men. It was a temporary display, an outward manifestation or revealing of the majesty and glory that belongs to Jesus when He comes at the Second Advent in His Kingdom with His saints to reign over the nations. That this is the correct idea appertaining to this astonishing transaction is evident by regarding Peter's reference to it. He (2 Pet. 1 : 16-18) says : " We have not followed cunningly devised fables" (as so many now allege) " when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of His Majesty," etc. Notice that he calls this transfiguration scene, " the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ," thus identifying it fully with Matt. 16 : 27, 28. This is unquestionably, then, linking it with the still future Advent as a striking exhibition of the glory that shall be revealed—which is confirmed by Peter introducing this allusion to prove that Christ would thus again come, and by his uniting such a Coming with (ch. 1 : 11) " the everlasting Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," and with His Coming, the new heaven and new earth (ch. 3 : 4, 13) of prophetic promise. (See also the references to this Coming in first Epistle.)<sup>2</sup> Let us survey these several aspects. First and supreme stands forth the transfiguration of Jesus, changed in form, so that " His face did shine as the sun and His raiment was white as the light" (Matthew) ; " His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow, so as no fuller on earth can white them" (Mark) ; " the fashion of His countenance was altered, and His raiment was white and glistening (Luke)." Here is the Theocratic King arrayed in light and glory, His face shining with brightness like that of the sun and His garments dazzling in their whiteness. Thus (comp. Rev. 1 : 13-16, etc.) will the Mighty Christ appear when He comes to re-establish the Theocracy. Next we have " two men" (Luke 9 : 30), Moses and Elias, who also appeared " in glory." The Coming of Christ in His Kingdom is usually associated with that of the saints, His brethren, who are co-heirs with Him in the same glory. Hence, to give a representation of His Coming—His appearance when Coming—in His Kingdom it was eminently suitable to have—to fill out the picture—the saints, glorified, also represented. This is done ; and in view of the fact that at His Second Advent these are made up of two parties, viz., the dead saints and the living saints translated, these two, Moses and Elias, are purposely chosen as a correct exhibition of the two parties—forming one class—who shall then appear "in glory" with Christ. Moses represents the body of saints who have died, but who will also be glorified with Christ ; and as he was in converse with the glorified Saviour, so will they also be in nearness to Him. Moses and Elias both appearing " in glory," seems to indicate the same glorification of body.<sup>3</sup> Elias represents another body, who, like himself, shall not fall " asleep," but shall be translated without experiencing the power of death. These two, the dead and the living, who shall be glorified at the Coming of Jesus, are graphically portrayed in 1 Cor. 15 : 51, 52, and 1 Thess. 4 : 15-17. These not only see His glory, but partake of the same, 1 Jno. 3 : 2 ; Phil. 3 : 21, etc., for of them it is said : " When Christ" (notice, as " Christ"), " who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory, Col. 3 : 4." But in addition to these, we have, to meet the prophetic announcements and to fill out the representation, three persons, Peter, James, and John, unglorified, mortal men living on the earth, who see this glorified Christ and His glorified associates, and are so deeply impressed, so delighted with the exceeding glory revealed, that through the spokesman

Peter, the emphatic declaration is made: "Lord, it is good for us to be here." Thus, if willing to receive it, will it be at the Second Advent, when Christ, "The Christ," comes in His glory and with His brethren gathered and glorified, then shall the spared Jewish nation and Gentiles, as prediction after prediction in glorious language portrays, rejoice and exult in the marvellous glory that shall be manifested. Jesus personally appears in His Kingly aspect; the saints personally are present in their glory; the disciples personally behold and admire the astonishing splendor and "majesty" of the scene. Jesus is here, "the Coming One" (a phrase well understood by the Jews), as He will exhibit Himself "in His own Kingdom;" the saints form "the first-fruits," who, as the predicted "kings and priests," reign with Christ in His Kingdom; and the mortal men are the servants or subjects (as even the tender of the three tents indicates) who gladly receive this glory, and are willing to abide under its radiance. The conversation respecting the approaching death at Jerusalem indicates that this was a temporary assumption of glory, in order to be, if we may so express it, a counterpoise to that which virtually—to the Jews—seemed to end the fondly anticipated Christship of Jesus, giving a most direct proof that the covenant and prophets would yet be fulfilled. The voice of the Father, lovingly acknowledging (having previously in answer to prayer brought about this supernatural change in David's Son) the Christship of Jesus and the power thus committed unto Him, binds the whole together into an earnest, actual reception of glory, which, thus represented, shall characterize David's Son and Lord when He comes to restore the fallen throne and Kingdom, and reigns indeed and in truth the manifested Christ. The presence of the Father and some kind of avowal, or confession, or acquiescence is requisite to meet the requirements of prediction (comp. Prop. 83) concerning the Coming of the Messiah in His Kingdom (as e.g. Dan. 7; Ps. 2, etc.), and thus perfect the representation of the real Theocratic position of Jesus.<sup>5</sup> Surely, when considering how many particulars this transfiguration meets, how it demonstrates in the most forcible manner "The Christ," how it supplies additional evidence of the ultimate manner of procedure in the Redemptive scheme, it is folly to ascribe all this, compressed into a few brief sentences, to the natural descriptive powers of "uneducated and ignorant" men, or to make it out a trivial, unimportant affair not worthy of our special attention.<sup>6</sup> Viewed, as we have done, in the light of the great, leading doctrine of the Kingdom, it stands forth, pre-eminently, as a Divine confirmation of the Theocratic Kingship of Jesus, of the glory of His saints, and of the happiness of the nations who shall witness it—a fact so striking and corroborative of the ultimate Redemption of saints and of the race, that Peter seizes upon it as a grand proof that Jesus shall come unto so great Salvation.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>2</sup> NAST (Com., Matt. 7:1-13) speaks of the transfiguration "as an earnest of that glory which was His destined inheritance," which "typically foreshadows the earnest of glory which was promised to the faithful followers of Christ," and which "is an emblem of the Kingdom of glory in which the risen saints shall dwell with their Saviour." It "strengthened Jesus for the last decisive struggle," and encouraged "the faith" of the disciples. While he thus correctly makes the transfiguration a resemblance of the future, he errs in two particulars: (1) He makes it "typical," "an emblem," whereas it was a realistic representation; and (2) he does not link this transfiguration scene with the previous context (Matt. 16:28), but makes it, "Christ's providential coming to overturn the whole Jewish policy in the destruction of Jerusalem, by which catastrophe the Christian Church was finally and fully separated from Judaism." A number of Pre-Millenarians, like Nast, make the transfiguration typical of the Kingdom, while others more correctly affirm it to be a real actual resemblance of the appearance of Christ and the saints in the Kingdom; and this, probably, is also the opinion of the former, since they regard it as "an earnest," "an example," "a representation on a smaller scale," etc. When e.g. Olshausen says: "The transfiguration was intended to prefigure the Kingdom of God, in which the glorified saints shall dwell with Jesus," he evidently means, as his additional remarks show, that this occurrence was not strictly a type (which may be different from the antitype) but a real likeness.

<sup>3</sup> It is sufficient for our argument that Moses represented the body or portion of the saints who died. And, for aught we know, he may have had a resurrection body; at least this conjecture is quite as good as that of Lange, etc., that spirits have corporeity or form, or that his body was used on this occasion, or that (as Th. Aquinas) he made use of a body not his own, or that (as Delitzsch) he assumed a visible appearance conformable to his future body, or that (as Grotius) God gave power to see the body in this instance, etc. Yet we may give a reason for our conjecture. Kurtz (His. Old Cov., vol. 3, p. 495), when answering the question, "Why should Jehovah Himself bury Moses?" says: "It is true that Moses was not saved from death in the same manner as Enoch and Elijah; he really died and his body was really buried—this is expressly stated in the Bible history—but we may assume, with the greatest probability, that, like them, he was saved from corruption. Men bury the corpse that it may pass into corruption. If Jehovah, therefore, would not suffer the body of Moses to be buried by men, it is but natural to seek for the reason in the fact that he did not intend to leave him to corruption, but at the very time of his burial communicated some virtue by His own hand, which saved the body from corruption," etc. Why not, however, assume that He buried him in order that his resurrection might be more privately (as the translations, etc.) secured? The justice of God being satisfied by his death, grace is specially manifested in view of his typical character (as Mediator or Prophet), etc., and because of the foreknown fact of his participating in this very transaction. A resurrection similar to Christ's, without seeing corruption, would suit this typical character. But we have more than this:—Jude's reference to the body of Moses (v. 9) seems to favor a resurrection. Why did the devil claim the body, if not in view of the fall and its doom to corruption or the grave? If it was to be buried like other bodies and beleft in the grave, there could have been no cause of dispute—even suppose the body would be embalmed or made incorruptible, yet it was bound, like all other dead, by death, that Satan (as Paul says, Heb. 2: 14, "He has the power of death") introduced and wielded. The ground of disputation was that something very special, quite out of the ordinary way of disposal, was to be done with the body of Moses. What so reasonable as to suppose a resurrection, which Satan would undoubtedly oppose as an entrance into and interference with his dominion; especially when this was done previous to the provision made by Christ by which death could be overcome, etc.? Moses, no doubt, gave, by the particular sin mentioned, Satan an opportunity to press his claim; God allowed it so far as death itself was concerned, but may have tempered the same with mercy by a brief detention.

<sup>4</sup> It seems strange that notwithstanding the accumulated proof that the disciples saw a transient representation of "the Christ" as he would appear in His Kingdom, that able men, under the influence of a theory and of hostility to Millenarianism, should endeavor to make this transfiguration no fulfilment of Matt. 16: 27, 28, and in doing this urge the destruction of Jerusalem (which John only survived) as the fulfilment. How this can be reconciled with a coming in glory, with a coming of the Son of Man (i.e. in His humanity), etc., we are not informed. More than this: this coming is specifically predicted, over against all such assertions, to be one, not for the destruction of Jerusalem but for its salvation, as e.g. Ps. 102: 16, "when the Lord shall build up Zion, He shall appear in His glory,"—with which compare Micah 3: 12 in connection with following chapter. Zech. 14, Amos 9: 11, etc. The very selection of the mount, distant from the temple and Jerusalem, was no doubt intentional, in order to give no basis—inferential—to some of the interpretations of this coming. It may be added: the glorified condition of Christ, Moses, and Elias thus indicates, as various Props. prove, the futurity of the Kingdom.—a Kingdom not to be realized at the First Advent in humiliation, not during the absence of the Bridegroom, but at the Sec. Advent, when He and His saints come "in glory."

<sup>5</sup> Olshansen, Com. loci, makes a suggestion which will arrest the attention of the critical student, viz.: that this acknowledgment of the Father thus given was virtually thus appointing Him the Ruler and Lord of the earth, and that the Saviour refers back to this transaction when He says "all power was given (so Greek) to me in heaven and on earth." Kendrick, in a foot-note, adds: "the Aorist 'was given' seems to point to a special occasion of the bestowment of the power, and may confirm the author's view." How this adds an argument to the reality of the occurrence need not be stated. That this virtually insured such authority to Jesus is indisputable, but the reader must observe the caution, that while this is so, it was thus delegated to Him, not outwardly assumed, seeing that from this state of glorification He returned to His state of humiliation. May we add:—how greatly this transfiguration must have encouraged David's Son to meet death.

<sup>6</sup> This indicates how to estimate such criticisms as e.g. West. Review, Jan., 1873, p. 94, that when Jesus promised His disciples that some should see Him coming in His kingdom, He was "evidently mistaken," implying that it never took place. So also the use Spiritualists make of this sublime scene, viz.: degrading it into an indorsement of the anti-scriptural seeking after the spirits of the dead. Thus, e.g., Howitt (His Supernat., vol. 1, p. 218) makes this an "express abrogation of the Mosaic law regarding the spirits of the dead." Jesus is constituted into a medium and His important works are performed through the spirits of the dead. Is there a truth, that some men will not pervert?

<sup>7</sup> Pre-Millenarians hold fast to this consoling, hopeful view of the transfiguration; many writers of eminence in this country and Europe substantially present the interpretation as given. But the reader is cautioned against two errors engrafted upon this division of classes. 1. The class of mortal men, thus represented, is not (as a few allege) a special, or another, race placed in an Adamic condition relative to Salvation, but the regular descendants of our fallen race, elevated and restored through Christian and Theocratic influences to a state of purity and holiness. Otherwise a Perfect Redeemer would manifest Himself unable to restore a forfeited blessing, to save the race as a race. This class also become saints, but subordinate to the saints raised to special Theocratic position under "the Christ." 2. We are not authorized (as the Duke of Manchester in The Finished Mystery), to limit the saints elevated in the Theocracy to Kingship and Priesthood with Christ, to those living between the First and Second Advents. The transfiguration which introduces Moses and Elias who lived before, evidences this fact, which is abundantly proven by the fundamental basis of this dispensation, viz.: that we live under the Abrahamic covenant, renewed in Christ, and which (Prop. 50) contains the promise of inheritance. Hence the Scriptures, logically, as flowing legitimately from a consecutive Plan, insist upon an engrafting on the Jewish stock, a continuation of the election, the virtual becoming by adoption the children of Abraham, so that we may inherit with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The glorified saints represent all—of the past ages—who are worthy to inherit the Kingdom and glory with the Christ, and hence (as Judge Jones, Notes, p. 173) we may regard our Lord's brief intercourse with these departed saints as a type, or exhibition on a small scale, of the society and intercourse between Him and His redeemed in His Kingdom. In this sense, it was a fulfilment of His Promise (Matt. 16 : 28), for it was an open manifestation of Himself, as Son of Man, in the glory with which He will appear in His Kingdom.

Obs. 5. In this connection it may be well to consider the disputed passage, Matt. 10 : 23 : "Ye shall not have gone over (marg. end or finish) the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come." Under the influence of the Church-Kingdom theory, this Scripture has received the most varied interpretations. Barnes (Com. loci) gives the most prevailing, when he makes the Coming of the Son of man to mean "the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the Jewish economy." This is contradicted by the fact, well expressed by Olshausen (Com. loci), that the Coming of "the Son of man" "has a definite doctrinal signification—it always refers to the (Parousia) Second Coming." The phrase, so expressive of His humanity, indicates a visible, personal Coming, which was not exhibited at the destruction of Jerusalem. Beside this, all excepting John were deceased before the city was overthrown. This direct reference to a personal Coming is also opposed to the conjectures that it denotes the outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost (which was the sending of the Comforter by Christ) or to Christ's presence in the Church (which is never designated as the Coming of the Son of man). Others, seeing that the phraseology involves a personal presence, suppose that (as Lightfoot) His resurrection is denoted ; but this is always spoken of as a rising from the dead, not as a distinctive Coming of the Son of man. Others make it to mean : " You will not need to hasten through all the towns of Judea, in the persecution which you are to meet with ; I will be with you again ere that," but, as Olshausen remarks, this is against fact, for " Jesus does not come to them, but they come back (Luke 9 : 10) to Jesus ; besides, it is a harsh interpretation not suitable to the spirit of the language." Olshausen's own view is, that there is a blending of the subsequent mission of the disciples with the present one, reaching down through their successors to the Second Advent. This interpretation is ably advocated by Sirr (First Res., pp. 61, 62), who paraphrases, " Ye shall not finish the reformation of the cities of Israel, ye shall not perfect these cities, till the Son of man be come." But this is evidently seeking after a meaning, and making up one to suit the case, for the language appears to be specifically addressed to the disciples, is at variance with the expressed itinerary of the disciples through the cities of the Jews (which was the work then actually in progress), and is not applicable, owing to the contemplated downfall of those cities.<sup>1</sup> There are only two interpretations which reconcile, fully, this passage with the peculiar phraseology contained in it, and, especially, without doing violence to the implied personal Coming. The first is that of Newton, Wilson, etc., viz., that the Son of man alludes to His triumphal entry into Jerusalem, which occurred subsequently (Matt. 21 : 1-11). This is represented as a typical Coming of the Son of Man, being (v. 5) a fulfilling of the prophet, "Behold, thy King cometh unto thee," etc., and was so regarded (v. 9) by the multitudes. This took place before the disciples had made the tour of the cities, and meets the conditions of the passage. The second is that the transfiguration, which also occurred after this saying, is in all respects a fulfilment of the passage—the Coming of the Son of man in His personal appearance being accurately represented by the transaction as we have just delineated. This Scripture, therefore, which has been so persistently used in advocacy of the Church-Kingdom theory, etc., is susceptible of a far more consistent and scriptural explanation from our standpoint than from that of our opponents.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This passage is variously disposed of by interpreters. Thus, e.g., Brown (Com., loci) rejects Lange's application to Christ's coming to them personally before they had completed the round of the cities, and refers it to the establishment of the Church and the destruction of Jerusalem, saying : "The Coming of the 'Son of Man' has a fixed doctrinal sense," which is true, but he certainly fails to designate it. Dr. Alexander (Com.) considers it "an indefinite expression, meaning sometimes more and sometimes less, but here equivalent to saying, till the object of your mission is accomplished." Nast (Com. loci) : "By this Coming of the Son of Man we may understand either the ushering in of the new dispensation by the resurrection and ascension of Christ, or the overthrow of Judaism by the destruction of Jerusalem." Rev. Brown (the Evangelist) and others make this reference future, relating to the future period of the Jews' conversion, when, they say, Christ will come before it is finished. But this is forced, (1) because personally addressed to the apostles ; (2) applicable to a work then in progress, and to places then existing ; and (3) the Jews, as a nation, converted under Elijah and the Messiah, and not under a mission of the apostles. A writer, E. M., in the Prophetic Times (vol. 7, p. 166), gives a view (which Dr. Alexander in his Com. calls a "good sense," although rejecting it) which merits the attention of the student ; in the parallel passage, Luke 10 : 1, we find that "After these things the Lord appointed other seventy also, and sent them two and two before His face into every city and place whither He Himself would come." The idea then is that the twelve, just as the seventy, acted as forerunners, preparing for the personal arrival of Jesus Himself. The only objection that can be urged against this interpretation is the one assigned by Olshausen in the text as applicable to the twelve. If admissible, it would preserve the distinctive personality included in the phrase "Son of Man."

<sup>2</sup> Either of the two interpretations given in the text, as well as the last one presented in the previous note, afford a meaning which brings the passage in harmony with the analogy of Scripture. Able men adopt the one or the other, and recently the interpretation applying it to the transfiguration has gained ground. (So e.g. Rev. Dr. Nast, art. in West. Ch. Advocate, Aug. 6, 1879.)

Obs. 6. Before concluding, it is well to contemplate an additional circumstance, which conclusively shows that the transfiguration was both a reality and a representation of the future Advent. The veritable appearance of Elias at the transfiguration suggested the question of the disciples (Matt. 17 : 10), "Why, then, say the Scribes, that Elias must first come?" Jesus had just proven Himself to be "The Christ;" Elias had been seen with Him, and Peter had, in view of the offer he made to erect a tent for him, hoped that he would remain and fulfil what Malachi (4 : 5, 6) had predicted of him. But Elias disappeared, for "when they lifted up their eyes, they saw no man, save Jesus only," and this removal prompted the question. All this sustains the real occurrence of the wonderful pre-figuration of the Second Advent. Notice, however, not only what suggested the question but the reply of the Saviour. The Scribes held (comp. Justin's Dial. with Trypho., ch. 8) that Elias would be a forerunner of the Messiah when He came to re-establish the Kingdom; the disciples saw him, not as forerunner, but coming after Jesus came, and then instead of remaining he departed from them. They wish to know whether the Scribes were not in the wrong concerning this opinion. The answer is given that the Scribes taught correctly, for "Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly cometh first" (as the Scribes say), "and" (when he shall come) "he will restore all things." That is, the appearance of Elias in the transfiguration and his departure does not make that doctrine of the Scribes nugatory. Then follows the allusion to John the Baptist : "But I say unto you, that Elias is come already and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed." The intent of this is sufficiently plain from Luke 1 : 16, 17, viz., that "he (John) shall go before Him in the spirit and power of Elias;" that is, he should be a forerunner of the Messiah like unto Elias who is also predicted to be such. But a deep reason underlies this likening of John to Elias. Let the reader turn back to the propositions pertaining to the preaching of the Kingdom, and he will find abundant proof showing that John actually tendered the Kingdom on condition of repentance to the Jewish nation. He thus came as Elias will come, having the same spirit and power, and, if the nation had received him, would have accomplished what Elias is to perform. The more modern notion that John was in all respects the Elias predicted in Mal. 4 : 5, and that no other need to be expected from the language of the Saviour here, was unknown to the early (Brookes, El. of Proph. Interp., p. 90, says "down to Jerome"), Church. One of the earliest Commentators, the martyr Victorinus (On the Apoc.), asserts that Elias will yet come in the future, quoting Mal. as follows : "Lo, I will send to you Elias the Tishbite, to turn the hearts of the Fathers to the children, according to the time of calling, to recall the Jews to the faith of the people that succeed them." Tertullian (On the Res., ch. 22), Commodianus (Instruct., Sec. 41) and others, make Elias still future, an idea being developed that he would be a contemporary of the Antichrist at the last times. So deeply rooted was this opinion, derived from the primitive Church, that even Augustine (City of God, B. 20, ch. 28) advocates the personal Coming of Elias and the conversion of the Jews before the Advent of Christ to judgment. Modern commentators have revived and defended this early view, as e.g. Olshausen, Judge Jones (Notes), Ryle, Hitzig, Maurer, Ewald, Alford, Steir, Fausset, Mal. 4 : 5, 6. It not being our purpose to discuss this point, but only to indicate its relationship to the Second Advent, a brief mention of the reasons why John the Baptist is not to supersede, or make unnecessary, the still future Coming of the Prophet Elias, must suffice. (1) John, an inspired man, directly affirms, in answer to the priests and Levites (Jno. 1 : 21), that he was not Elijah, which he could not have done, if he was the one predicted by Malachi 4 : 5. (2) John was a harbinger of the Kingdom (i.e., he tendered it, and in this sense is Elias), but the Jews rejected the offer of the Kingdom, and he did not "restore all things" as Elijah the prophet, more successful, will do.' (3) John did not come "before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord," which in Malachi is associated with that terrible period when the wicked shall be burned up as stubble, etc., a day which, awful as it is to the ungodly, is designed (not, as some assert to make out a case, for the destruction, but) for the deliverance of Jerusalem, as is seen by Joel 2 : 31 seq.—and which is linked with the Second Advent.' (4) That John is only Elias in a certain sense is apparent from the indefinite language of Matt. 11 : 14. "All the prophets and the law prophesied until John, and if ye will receive (it), this is Elias which was for to come." On this verse Olshausen observes that the clause "if ye will receive (it)" with a comparison of all the passages "clearly shows that the Redeemer called him so (Elias) only in a certain sense, viz., because he wrought in the spirit and power of Elijah, as Scripture says, Luke 1 : 17." (5) John coming in the spirit of Elias is rejected, and thus is not the Elias, because Jesus Himself, of whom he is the forerunner, is also rejected by the nation, while the forerunner of the manifested "Christ" is successful with the nation ; the mission of both John and Elias being to the same nation. (6) Those passages must not be interpreted according to the Jewish standpoint then entertained, viz., that there was but "one captivity under Babylon, but one return from Babylon, one Advent of Elias, one Advent of the Messiah and that His Advent of glory and power in His Kingdom. Whereas, in fact, two oppressing Babylons were foretold, and two returns from captivity, two Advents of Elias, and two Advents of Messiah, and yet but one Kingdom." (Jones's Notes on Scripture, foot-note, p. 179.) The rejection of the Kingdom and its postponement serves to explain the apparent difficulties and adds most forcibly to the inspiration of the Word, evincing a preservation of unity in the most delicate of Divine purposes. Such a remarkable preservation of agreement, indicative both of God's willingness to make John the Elias, if the nation had repented under his preaching, and of God's foreknowing that John would be rejected and that another Elias was therefore appointed to come, is beyond the ability of "mere fishermen" to concoct, bearing as they do a relationship to the deepest purposes of God. The two Advents, the one in humiliation and the other in glory (the latter transiently represented in the transfiguration), forms the key for apprehending these extraordinary statements—preserves consistency in prophet, John, and Jesus—satisfactorily answers the question of the disciples, and directs us in accepting of the transfiguration as a reality, pointing onward to the glory to be revealed at the Second Advent, for which glory the Jewish nation shall have Elias sent to them on a special and successful mission.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>2</sup> So Kurtz (Sac. His., S. 145), "that Elias truly should first come and restore all things for the Lord's second appearance unto judgment, but that, already at His first appearance in lowliness, an Elias had appeared in John the Baptist."

<sup>3</sup> Drs. Ebrard and Kendrick, in attempting to correct Olshausen (Com. on Matt. 11 : 14), who correctly refers "the great and terrible day" to the Second Advent (when Jesus comes to tread the winepress, etc.), certainly are incorrect when they make "the day of the Lord" to begin with Christ's incarnation. See this amply refuted Prop. 138. Besides this, these very men, excepting in this solitary place, are unwilling to make out a dispensation of mercy and grace to be "terrible," etc.

<sup>4</sup> Lord (Theol. and Lit. Journ., Oct., 1860, p. 240) interprets: "The expression, 'if ye are willing to receive (it),' i. e. are disposed to receive (it), means, not if ye will believe what I say, but if ye will take it in the sense in which I say it." We are, however, inclined to receive the interpretation of Dr. Richards (Theol. and Lit. Journ., Ap., 1857, p. 597), which supplies (the verb having in the original no object expressed) "him" instead of "it," making the phrase "if ye will receive him," etc. This accords best with the facts in the case, the Kingdom being offered on condition of repentance by John, and if the nation had received him he would indeed have become Elias to them. Hence the hypothetical statement. See Judge Jones's Notes on Matt. 17 : 10 seq., and Alford loci. The student will carefully notice, that while John's mission to the nation as a nation was a failure, such a failure is not attributed to the second forerunner, but that the nation as such will repent and receive Jesus as the Christ (Zech. 12 : 10, etc.). Elias will be specially commissioned to the nation, and the result, as predicted, will follow, not before (as Augustine, etc.) the Sec. Advent, but after the same, and after the gathering of Antichrist's forces against Jerusalem.

<sup>5</sup> Barnes (Com.), and others, make the only fulfilment of Mal. 4 : 5, 6, that can be expected, to be realized in John. But they make no effort to meet the difficulties of their interpretation by informing us how the original prophecy is fulfilled in John. If they are correct, then it follows that the inspired prediction has failed to find its mate. This we cannot receive. Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 1, p. 333-4) makes Elias a type of John, and refuses credence to a future coming. All that need to be said in reply is this: taking his own affirmed position, that the antitype must always be more significant and higher than the type, we find that John (the alleged antitype) sinks beneath Elias (the supposed type), simply because what is ascribed to Elias was not realized in John. Besides this: prophecy and its fulfilment is not dependent upon our faith or lack of it. Barbour (Three Worlds, p. 121) makes Elijah a type of Christ and His res. saints (others refer it to Christ alone), and presents some fanciful applications of it to the Church. But Jesus speaks of Elias as being another person, and the prophecy gives him a distinctive personality not only by name but by designating him "the prophet." The stress laid on the phrase, "he will restore all things," as only applicable to Jesus, overlooks the usage of Scripture, which attributes to instrumentalities that which is done by God, as e.g. the apostles are "the salt of the earth," "the light of the world," etc., which, as other Scriptures show, they only are through Christ. Some enthusiasts, like the leader of "The White Brethren" (Art. on, Appletons' Cyclop.), and others, have claimed to be this coming Elijah, but instead of observing that his mission was one of mercy and reformation to the Jews, they denounced vengeance and the destruction of the world. Such claimants require no refutation. A few writers make this Elijah to be simply a representative man who will come like John the Baptist, i. e. in his spirit, etc. But the reasons already assigned forbid our rejection of that Elijah whose personality is described by the office he held, "the prophet." Rev. Andrews (Bib. Sacra, No. 96, Ap., 1866, p. 254), in behalf of "the Catholic Apostolic Church" (which professes to have, by divine direction, restored the ministry of the apostles), says: "They believe that the restoration of apostles is the fulfilment of the promise to send Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." Without pressing the plain grammatical sense as utterly opposed to this self-appropriation (just as they appropriate to themselves the sealing process, the 144,000 of Rev.) of the passage; without laying stress on this mission of Elijah being exclusively promised to the Jewish nation and not to Gentiles; without calling into question, and rejecting as untenable, their claim of authoritative revelation under the plea of special divine illumination, it is amply sufficient to say, that the assumed end contemplated by their Elijah-mission is wholly at variance with the plain teachings of the Word. They ascribe to this apostolic restoration the success of Elijah's mission in reuniting men, and developing, to a remarkable extent, the faith and strength of the Church before the Sec. Advent, which, as is shown under various Propositions (on Unbelief, Antichrist, etc.), contradicts the portraiture of the Church as given by inspiration. Admitting that they include learned (Kurtz's Ch. His.) and pious men, and that they are aiding in gathering out a people for His name, yet the smallness of their numbers and evident lack of success, should cause them to feel some doubt respecting the soundness of their conclusions, based on affirmed inspirations, seeing that Elijah's predicted success does not result from their doctrine and labors. We only add: the view of a still future coming of Elijah is not merely held by Pre-Millenarians, but, as already seen from our quotations, by others. It was strongly rooted in ancient writers, so that Theodoret, Theophylact, Cyril, and even such as Origen, Chrysostom, and Jerome entertained it. It is of interest to notice a singular parallel, viz., that the first forerunner was provided by special supernatural means (Luke 1 : 18, being conceived after the ordinary course of nature), the second will also come through the supernatural.

Obs. 7. This distinction existing in the coming Kingdom (as intimated e.g. under Props. 86, 114, 118, 124, 130, etc.) and evidenced in the King, the glorified saints, the converted and believing Jews, and the accepted Gentiles, is even presented to us in the tabernacle and temple. While it is true (so Kurtz, Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 411) that the typical interpretation of the tabernacle can easily become absurd when pressed (as in the case of parables) to every minute particular, yet it is also true, as the Apostle declares (Heb. 8 : 5), that the tabernacle was made according to a pattern furnished, and that there is deep significance in it, being "a shadow of good things to come" (Heb. 10 : 1). Now, aside from the ceremonial and sacrificial aspects, the reader is reminded that the Tabernacle was Theocratically associated, and therefore relates to the Theocratic ordering. It was (Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 96) "partly to be a palace of His Presence (God's) as King of Israel, Ex. 40 : 34, 35." As "the tent of assembling," "the habitation" of the King, etc., it foreshadows the future, especially in its three grand divisions: (1) the habitation proper consisting of the sanctuary and the holy of holies or holiest of all (the partition between which is abrogated for the priesthood in the Christ); (2) the outer court for the Jewish nation to assemble; (3) the external space for Gentiles. If at all typical of the future Theocratic ordering, it certainly refers to the threefold nearness to the King as exemplified in the glorified kings and priests who are associated with Him, in the Jewish nation which is His special inheritance, and in the Gentiles who joyfully acknowledge this Theocratic supremacy.

Goodwin (The Israelite Indeed, Vol. 9, p. 31, etc.) makes numerous typical applications. Fairbairn (Typology, Vol. 2, Ch. 3, Sec. 2) refers in detail to numerous typical interpretations, and gives his own conclusion that it applies to Christ and His people, etc. While a descending to the minutiae may lead to the conjectural and fanciful, it seems that a reference to the future Theocratic ordering in some of its aspects, is legitimate. The personal dwelling of God there, the manifestation of His glory, His enthronement as the earthly Ruler, the patterning after the heavenlies, the place of meeting and witness, the divine superintendence and devising, the exhibition of beauty and splendor, "the seat of the divine kingdom on earth," the accessibility to the King, the holiness belonging to it, the special consecration pertaining to it, the priesthood connected with it, the worship and homage tendered, the honorable and dignified service attached to it, the removal of the one class from all servile employment and their exclusive possession by God, the intermediary service between the King and the subjects, the personal purity and adornment required, the clear and unmistakable revelation of the divine will—all typify a similar condition and aspect in the restored Theocracy. It is only typical (comp. e.g. Jer. 3 : 16, 17 ; Zech. 14 : 20, 21, etc.) of a corresponding exhibition, on a grander scale, of "the Glory of the Lord," of Theocratic rule, of special nearness to the King, of required consecration and holiness, of participation in the favor and blessing of God.

This subject, necessarily alluded to in many places, is worthy of separate consideration. It is foreshadowed in the ancient Theocracy; for, while the supreme legislative power was vested in God, other rulers or judges (see e.g. Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 42) were appointed under His direction, by whom the laws were administered, etc. Let the Davidic Kingdom be restored as predicted, and, in the very nature of the case, to verify the promises, the Theocratic king will also have His associated rulers assuring the most perfect administration of the laws, and securing the most perfect government, productive of peace, prosperity, and happiness, such as the world has never yet witnessed. The Word emphatically teaches that those thus chosen, accounted worthy of this rulership, are the saints. They are "joint heirs" (Rom. 8:17) with the Christ, who graciously divides, without marring His own superiority and supremacy (but rather exalts it thereby), His own inheritance with them. What Jesus, the Christ, inherits, has been abundantly shown, viz., this Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, in which His exalted Rulership is to be manifested. Hence, to inherit with the Christ, has a most deep and precious significance, indicative of joint rulership with Him in His coming Kingdom. To be inheritors with Christ in His Kingdom evinces the astonishing wisdom of God in the Plan of Redemption, that without doing violence either to His moral government or to the free agency of fallen man, He raises up and purifies a material which, when the time comes, is employed in perpetuating the purity, holiness, etc., of a Divine-Human government again restored with untold grandeur to a needy, groaning world.

As we have before intimated, such a powerful Theocratic Kingdom as will be exhibited under the mighty Messiah, David's Son, is necessitated to counteract the fearful inroads of human depravity. A glance over the divine Record shows, that at the close of every age or dispensation, the depravity of man was in the ascendancy. Thus it was at the Deluge, at the deliverance of the Jewish nation, at the First Advent, etc.; and thus, it is specially predicted, will it be at the end of this age. Hence, God having patiently waited, tested and tried human nature, and during the trial gathered out the material suitable for His purpose, will suddenly and irresistibly manifest His Theocratic order, originally designed, now made so overwhelmingly strong by the addition of this previously prepared element of destined power that its supremacy is forever insured.

Obs. 1. Before assigning the Scripture bearing on the subject, let us caution the reader, whatever his views may be relating to it, not to disparage our doctrine concerning it, lest peradventure he be found detracting from the honor promised to the righteous. We have been deeply pained to find, even among eminent men, such language held respecting this doctrine of the joint rulership of the saints with Jesus Christ on earth, that is simply presumptuous, designating it as "degrading," etc., and as far less honorable and desirable than the indefinite, unexplained reign assigned by themselves, and which they suppose God will bestow in some spiritual Kingdom in heaven or in the universe. This reigning, whatever it is, is the Lord's appointment and not ours; and hence to ascertain its true meaning, that which God has said concerning it ought to be diligently compared. And when the plain grammatical meaning undoubtedly teaches just such a reign as we advocate, it ill becomes the believer in the Word, even if he rejects the teaching, to speak or write disrespectfully of it.<sup>1</sup> Surely the position in which we place the saints (reigning jointly with Christ), and the design of such a reign (the delivering of the world from all the results of sin, and filling it with blessing and glory), should protect our doctrine from extreme charges, which tend to materially lessen the promises of God, and virtually to reject—as unworthy of credence—the honor of the Messianic Kingdom. Taking for our guidance the principle of interpretation thus far adopted, we firmly hold that God's promises are to be fulfilled just as they read; that He means what He says through the Spirit, and intends to fulfil it; and that such meaning is ascertained, not by engrafting another upon it, but, by that which the words in their plain grammatical connection indicate. Taking such a position, it follows, of necessity, that a veritable kingship or rulership must be received. How else can we explain the phrases to "reign with Him," "to sit on His throne," "to be ruler over His goods," "ruler over many things," "to have power over and rule nations," to be "crowned," to be "Kings" and "Judges" and "Princes," "to inherit and possess a Kingdom," etc. If these do not denote a real, substantial elevation to rulership, great exalted honor and authority in the Coming Kingdom, then language itself has no precise, adequate meaning. This the words plainly denote, and, however much we may feel that such a position is far above our deserts, the astonishing grace of God will bestow it. Grace adopts us as sons, and as such we become "heirs of God," and consequently "joint heirs with Christ," and then, as an ancient writer (Sel. from the Prop. Scriptures, Anti-Nicene Lib., sec. 44) expressed it, "all the faithful are called kings, brought to royalty through inheritance." In the Frag. of Cassiodorus (Anti-Nicene Lib.), com. on First Epis. of Peter, ch. 2: 9, we have, in accord with this idea: "That we are a chosen race by the election of God is abundantly clear. He says royal, because we are called to sovereignty, and belong to Christ," etc. The faith of the primitive Church in an actual reign of the saints, derived from the grammatical sense of the Word, is so well known, that it needs no special illustration.*

<sup>1</sup> In looking over the works of opponents, it will be found that not one of them denies the grammatical sense, but upon this sense fasten another to suit their theory. Unbelief in God's promise of such dominion is characteristic of multitudes, and they ridicule those who cleave to the grammatical sense. Some scoff and sneer at the idea that a poor saint, perhaps now a day laborer, a mechanic, or farmer, should years after this be raised up and have power as a ruler over others. Such a prospect excites their mirth and wit; and they profess to pity the ignorance and weakness of the man who believes in such promises. Do such ever pause to reflect, one moment, that if really contained in the grammatical sense, it is at least found in God's Word; and that all such witticisms only become the unbeliever? More than this: do they ever think, that if, after all, this

literal sense should be fulfilled, they must, no matter what their professions or piety, in so far sustain loss as they have been guilty of disparaging and ridiculing God's own promises;—the inexcusableness of the conduct being aggravated by the plainness in which the promises were given? The objection found in a few authors, "How can it be taken literally, for where are the subjects over whom they can reign?" is so indicative of a lack of knowledge of our system of doctrine, of the rudimentary principles of Millenarianism, that it deserves no answer, seeing that almost every author on our side distinctly announces who these subjects are. Those who cannot tell are to be found among the class who deny the perpetuation of the race (Prop. 152) after the Second Advent.

* It is also found in the Sibylline Oracles, in the Apocryphal books, as in the "Ascension of Isaiah," "Fourth Book of Esdras," "Book of Enoch," etc. (Comp. e.g. Stuart's Apoc., Vol. i., pp. 42-74.) The entire early Church appreciated the magnificence of these promises, and earnestly grasped them by faith. When threatened with death, they inspired the most lively hope, as in the expressed belief of Ignatius when brought before the Emperor Trajan, he declared that the future kingdom of the Lord Jesus should be his—"whose kingdom be my portion."

Obs. 2. Let us notice next, when this reigning is to take place. It is remarkable that we are indebted to the Origenistic opposition to Millenarianism for the introduction of the theory that saints are now reigning in the Church—driven to it in the effort to spiritualize away Rev. 20 : 4. Augustine has been already quoted (Prop. 90, Obs. 2, and see in same Obs., by way of contrast, Barnabas) as one of the advocates of the view. This is an opinion indorsed by many, and in the past has led even to many a deed of violence and blood. For, it is a fact well attested by history, that, under the notion that the church is the Kingdom of God, the Romish and other churches, as well as sectaries and heretics, have claimed that believers, the saints, are now authorized to reign, bear rule, lay down laws, execute them, punish, etc.' Instead of endeavoring to refute this interpretation of most precious promises relating to the future and not, as alleged, to the present, let Augustine himself perform this work, when for the time he overlooks his own theory of reigning, as follows (City of God, B. 20, S. 17): "Who is so absurd and blinded by contentious opinionativeness, as to be audacious enough to affirm that in the midst of the calamities of this mortal state, God's people, or even one single saint, does live, or has ever lived, or shall ever live, without tears or pain—the fact being that the holier a man is, and the fuller of holy desire, so much more abundant is the tearfulness of his supplication," etc., quoting as proof a number of Scriptures. In another place, he refers to the saints as "pilgrims," "bearing burdens," some "feeble minded," others "weak," some "tempted," others "overtaken by a fault," all "needing grace" and "assistance," being "healed while still they sojourn in this earth," etc. Now, the condition of the saints, as represented by himself, is utterly opposed to the notion of their reigning as promised; and it is a fact that no true believer has ever yet expressed himself as conscious of thus reigning as predicted. Having shown the inconsistency of such a notion previously (Prop. 90, etc.), it is unnecessary to dwell upon it. The time when this reigning is to take place is specifically mentioned. Being "joint heirs with Christ," they "inherit the Kingdom" "at His appearing and Kingdom." Consequently, it occurs at the Second Advent, and after the first resurrection. As all these points have been made clear in previous propositions, it is only necessary to add that the early Church invariably linked the reigning with the resurrection of the saints, as e.g. Polycarp (Epis., ch. 5): "He has promised to us that He will raise us again from the dead, and that if we live worthily of Him 'we shall also reign together with Him,' provided only that we believe." This is so plain that it is expressly asserted that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God." To inherit a Kingdom, if it has any propriety of meaning, undoubtedly denotes the reception of kingly authority or rulership in the Kingdom—for thus it is also explained by parallel passages which follow. But this Kingdom—this rulership with Jesus—cannot be inherited by mortal men, it requiring immortal beings who resemble the mighty Theocratic King; for the heirship with Jesus, the identity of associated rule, the unspeakable honor, etc., which can only safely be confided to persons previously prepared for it; the duration, the perfection, design, and results of the reign—all demand this previous resurrection and glorification.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The present reigning of the saints in heaven is a cardinal doctrine of the Papacy, and in the Creed of Pius IV., Art. 20, is thus referred to: "I do likewise believe that the saints, reigning together with Christ, are to be honored and invoked; and that these saints offer prayer to God for us; and that their relics are to be had in veneration" (which gives rise to Gibbon's sarcastic remarks, Decl. and Fall., Ch. 28, S. 3). This perversion was firmly held by multitudes, illustrated e. g. in The Chron. of Henry of Huntingdon, p. 116, where it is said of King Ceadwell in his epitaph:

"Sure wise was he to lay his sceptre down,
And change an earthly for a heavenly crown."

And on p. 118, the writer calls the two deceased kings, Ethelred and Kenred, "Kings of heaven;" and on page 122 exhorts all to become "Kings of heaven." Many Protestants, especially in obituaries, teach the same doctrine of present reigning, having deceased saints—over again, at the most positive teaching to the contrary—already crowned. The Anabaptists, Mormons, and others, claim that the title of "Kings and Priests" already belongs to them; and while this caricaturing of splendid promises may excite pity because of delusion, yet it is a fact that many in the church of the past have misapplied these promises in the same destructive way. The Papacy may, indeed, have extended this to a climax, by the reign of the Virgin Mary, designated "Queen of Heaven" (comp. 'Mariolatry' in The North Brit. Review, Feb., 1848, Cumming's Lects. on Rom., etc.), but Protestants have imitated the spirit on a smaller scale; and both have applied the reign of the saints to the Church as now constituted. The plea that the saints were to reign on earth, was the plea that Popery often tendered to reconcile its encroachments on the civil power, and to apologize for its assumptions of universal power. The most precious promises relating to the future were prostituted to cover up its lust after aggrandizement. Protestants, too, often imbibed and exhibited the same spirit, not so arrogantly, but equally unscriptural. As an illustration, we refer to the speech of Cromwell to the "Barebone Parliament," which was inspired by the idea that the predicted reign of Christ and the saints was to be inaugurated under his auspices: "Jesus Christ is owned this day by the call of you, and you own Him by your willingness to appear for Him. And you manifest this, as far as poor creatures may do, to be a day of the power of Christ. I know you will remember that Scripture, 'He makes His people willing in the day of His power.' God manifests this to be the day of the power of Christ; having through so much blood and so much trial, as hath been upon these nations, made this to be one of the great issues thereof: to have His people called to the supreme authority." The speedy overthrow of this alleged supreme authority under Christ did not check the misapplication of the Scripture promise. The world is filled with similar assumptions, and the present reign of Christ and His saints is taught and enforced by a multitude of learned and leading divines. To those who claim a present reign of the saints, the irony (comp. Fausset, Com., 1 Cor. 4 : 8) of the apostle, if nothing else, should prove a profitable study. The Church-Kingdom theory is fruitful of results, and one of the engrafted doctrines is this reign. Thus e. g. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming, p. 477), on Rev. 5 : 10, "We shall reign on the earth," rejects our view, and also its application to reigning in an eternal state (heaven), and then declares that it applies to "the Church, as it now is, upon earth," and represents "the ultimate triumphs of Christ's cause upon earth during the present state;" but how it can do this, when the Church itself at the outcome of this dispensation, instead of triumphing, shall be dreadfully persecuted, he fails to inform us. All this class, when kings and princes are favorably disposed to their respective churches, have much to say about "nursing fathers," etc., perverting Mill. predictions.

<sup>1</sup> So extensively did this conjunction of the reigning with the period of the resurrection prevail, and so deeply rooted did it become, that we even find St. Patrick (born about A.D. 372, see Neander's Mem. Ch. Life, p. 433), the apostle to the Irish, after alluding to his probable martyrdom, saying: "Beyond a doubt we shall rise again in that day with the splendor of the sun, that is with the glory of our Redeemer Jesus Christ, who is the Son of the living God, as fellow-heirs with Christ and bearing His image; for we shall reign by Him, and through Him, and with Him." For the saints crowned after the resurrection, etc., also see 2 Esdras 2:38-43. Lactantius so briefly and tersely expresses the general opinion of the early age that we quote it: "Those that shall be raised from the dead shall rule over them that are alive, in the manner of judges." So Irenæus, Justin, Barnabas, and a host of others.

<sup>2</sup> As we advance in our argument, we see still more clearly what Jesus meant, Matt. 21:43, when he said, that the Kingdom should be taken from the Jewish nation and be given to another, to be gathered out (Prop. 65), i.e. to the saints. This high position of inheriting the Kingdom, of becoming kings and priests in a universal Theocracy, was tendered to the nation on condition of repentance. The nation rejected the offer; now it is attained by the saints, including the engrafted children of Abraham. This giving of the Kingdom denotes the inheriting of it, the actual real possession of the governing power, and this is bestowed upon the faithful. The Jewish nation instead of inheriting the Kingdom becomes subject to its dominion. A supremacy is indeed accorded to it over all other nations, owing to its covenanted Theocratic relationship (as we have already explained, Prop. 114), but the saints rule over it. It is the glorified, united to Christ, who reign over the unglorified. Tyng (He Will Come, p. 159) correctly observes: "It is a very false representation of Scripture which pictures the Church as subjects of the coming Kingdom. They shall indeed acknowledge a submission to their Lord, but toward the inhabitants of the earth they will assert a majesty. For this they will have been qualified by their glorification, and to this they have even now been assigned by prophecy and promise." Much is said by mystical writers concerning "the mystical body" of Christ, Himself being the head and believers His members, the whole forming one body. Now without indorsing the mysticism which is so largely fastened on it, yet it is a truth—exceedingly precious—that Jesus and His brethren constitute one body, and this union is especially made manifest at this glorification and joint-rulership. To the critical student it may be said in this connection, that this ultimate raising up of Rulers and the establishment of a Theocracy answers the objection so often urged by unbelief, viz. that Revelation, if real, ought to have been given to all nations, and not to have been confined to one, the elect Jewish nation. But such an extension would only have increased the difficulties of securing the end designed, owing to the perversity—as seen in the Jewish nation—of human nature. We are satisfied that the Divine Plan accomplishes the end intended more effectually and speedily—consistent with moral agency—in the way that the Word points out and history unfolds, than if the opposite course, suggested by unbelief, had been adopted. The mode of procedure adopted by infinite wisdom commends itself even to our short-sightedness, and in the day of the manifestation of the sons of God will find no gainsayers.

Obs. 3. The place where this reign is to be manifested is expressly stated: "We shall reign on (or as Stuart, over) the earth." In the very nature of the case, if they inherit with David's Son, the restored Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, it must be a reign here on and over the earth. It is after the Coming of the Son of man, after the rise and progress of the fourth beast, the ten horns and the little horns, and at the destruction of these Gentile and Antichristian powers (Dan. 7:22) that "the time came that the saints possessed the Kingdom," and that "the Kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the Kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." It is taking an unwarranted liberty with covenant, prophecy, and promise to locate this Kingdom and reign in any other place than this earth; and yet multitudes venture to assume it, believing themselves, under a spiritual interpretation, not only justified, but that they are actually exalting the Word by so doing. Many who advocate a kind of reign here on the earth in this dis-

penation, also affirm that the ample, complete fulfilment is only realized in the third heaven, not seeing that the reigning is united with the Second Advent, the resurrection of the saints, the setting up of Christ's Kingdom, the rehowal of the earth, etc.; and that such a supposed reign is utterly antagonistic to the description given to us of the saints during this intermediate period, viz., a time of waiting, etc., until the blessed moment comes of inheriting, of being crowned, etc., at the Advent.<sup>1</sup> The locality of reigning is so unmistakably indicated by the Kingdom that Christ reigns over (with whom they inherit), by the Pre-Millennial Advent and resurrection, by various propositions presented, that a mere mention of the fact is sufficient under this heading.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> To illustrate how interpretations are forced, we append the following: Priest, in his View—giving but the expression of many—declares that “when Christ has set up His Kingdom in the heart of a believer,” on account of “the victory” obtained over sin, “therefore of such an one it may be said, he reigns on the earth.” Thus two blunders are conjoined to make out a case against us, for he has not attempted to prove that the Messiah's Kingdom is in the heart, and that the overcoming of sin by grace in the individual man is a ruling on or over the earth. But in the same book the strange anomaly is found that he concedes a literal first resurrection, but—like Prof. Stuart and others—places these saints and the reigning in the third heaven and not on the earth. This accounts for attempting in some way, even so indirectly, to find a reign on earth to meet a scriptural demand. Authors like Butler (Apoc.) have the saints of Rev. 20 : 4, 6, reigning but not in their resurrection bodies, but they differ widely respecting the reign. The fundamental mistake of all such is simply the misapprehension of what really and truly constitutes the covenanted Messianic Kingdom. This point clear and settled, the rest follows as a natural sequence. Hence Dr. Bell, and others, pass beyond the record when they have this reign over the Universe. What Christ may do in His Divine Sovereignty as God is another question, and does not pertain to the covenanted Kingdom, and is not described; but as “the Christ,” the God-man, David's Son and Lord, His Kingdom and reign and that of His associated brethren is on the earth. And this is the Kingdom with which we are personally concerned.

“With Thee we'll reign, with Thee we'll rise,
And Kingdoms gain beyond the skies.”

The notions of reigning over the universe, in mid-air, and in heaven, have already been adverted to, and shown (Props. 151 and 168) to be opposed to the covenant promises. Some able men advocate the same, but they assign no proof in its behalf which can set aside the reign on earth. Irving, and many after him, advocate the removal of the saints in mid-air, and reigning from thence. Anberlen makes the saints to return with Christ (when no such return is mentioned in the Bible) to heaven, and to rule the unglorified from thence. Fausset (Com., Rev. 11 : 15) says : “The glorified Son of Man shall rule mankind by His transfigured Church in heaven, and by His people Israel on earth.” And in an article (Ch. Herald, May 1, 1879) remarks : “The transfigured saints will then reign over the earth. They will not live upon the earth as their home. This was the error of the ancient Millenarians, owing to their confounding the glory of the transfigured saints with the glory of Israel over the nations, and so in some measure they produced the expectation of a carnal Kingdom.” Now in reference to all such theories, we vastly prefer the alleged “error” of the ancient Millenarians, as far more in accordance with covenant and prediction, giving the Patriarchs the land and the meek a real inheriting of the earth, planting the inheritance of David's Son where it geographically belongs. Fausset (Rev. 21 : 10) adds : “Even in the Millennium the earth will not be a suitable abode for transfigured saints, who therefore shall then reign in heaven over the earth. But after the renewal of the earth, and at the close of the Millennium and judgment, they shall descend on an earth assimilated to heaven itself.” This is based on the mistaken idea that there is no New Jerusalem state on earth during the Millennium (comp. Prop. 151), and is abundantly refuted by the “ransomed of Zion,” the resurrected saints, participating in this glory, as e.g. the apostles ruling over the twelve tribes, etc. We cannot disconnect the glory of the saints and that of the Jewish nation during this period, because of the intimate relationship existing between the two, the nation itself being identified with the Davidic Kingdom. The view of the Seventh-Day Baptists, expressed by

Waggoner and others, that the saints are removed to the third heaven during the thousand years, while the race and the earth is destroyed, belongs to the same category, and is simply refuted by their quoting Zech. 14 : 5 as applicable to the Sec. Advent, the context of which they cannot reconcile with their theory. Indeed so contradictory and lame is the view, that when comparing the New Heaven and New Earth of Isa. 65 and 66 with Rev. 21, they are forced logically by their own position to the absurdity that the saints glorified (and not mortal men in the flesh) build, plant, etc., as delineated in Isa. 65. Their system, of course, makes redemption incomplete, the race as such is never restored to Edenic conditions, the covenants as given to Abraham and David are not realized as written, and the promises to the Jewish nation remain unfulfilled.

Obs. 4. As preliminary to the reigning, if it is to take place at the time and in the place designated, we ought to expect a definite statement of the saints coming at the time, and to the locality specified. This is plainly given, as e.g. in Zech. 14, at the personal Pre-Millennial Advent, "the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with Thee." (Comp. Joel 3 : 11 ; Matt. 24 : 30, 31 ; 2Thess. 2 : 1 ; 1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17, etc.). It is significant and in perfect harmony with the requirements of our doctrine, that in the delineation of the last events which precede the ushering in of the Millennial era, the harvest of the saints is gathered before the fearful vintage (Rev. 14 : 14-16) ; and when the "King of kings" comes (Rev. 19 : 11-16) "the armies" (i.e. the redeemed, so Barnes, etc.) accompany Him. A mere statement of the accurate presentation of details requisite to complete the account of the commencement of this reign is all that is necessary.

The reader will observe that a personal coming of the saints is a prerequisite, because this rule is to be under a real, actual manifested Theocracy, and as such is characterized not merely by "a spiritual rule" but a civil or political one, for this rule is conducted in a government in which Church and State are one, and, as promised, the saints assist in overcoming enemies, subjugating kingdoms, in punishing those that resist its authority, in protecting and blessing its subjects. Some say that it is a question whether the saints reign visibly or invisibly over the nations of the earth. They might just as well question the visibility or invisibility of this coming of the saints. The idea of the twelve apostles ruling over the twelve tribes of restored Israel invisibly, is utterly opposed to the Theocratic ordering. This is no question to those who carefully compare the Scripture statements respecting the visibility of the metropolitan city, of rulership and worship, the visibility ascribed to the acts of the King, the homage paid to Him, the accessibility of the rulers, etc. This does not, of course, forbid the power—like angels—of rendering themselves, at pleasure, invisible to mortal eyes, etc. The latter feature is designed to facilitate the power, discrimination, etc., of the glorified ones. Com. Props. 168, 197, etc.

Obs. 5. In giving the proofs verifying such a reign of the saints, so abundant is the precious material that we find a difficulty in properly arranging it. Let the following order suffice. 1. This rulership of the saints is contained and promised in the covenant made with Abraham. Thus in Gen. 17 : 6 and 35 : 11 the promise is that "kings shall come out of thee." If this promise is limited to the few past literal kings of the Jewish nation, well may the contrast offered by infidels be considered, viz., that a promise coming from the Almighty God, which on the face of it indicated great kingly authority and was only fulfilled in kings who in power and dominion were far inferior to the great monarchies surrounding them, is scarcely a promise commensurate with the greatness and majesty of God. Admitting that the sinfulness of the Jewish nation dwarfed this promise in the past, yet God's covenanted promises, to which His oath is attached, are not to be defeated by the perversity and sinfulness of man. For this would at once argue weakness and imperfection in the Supreme Being, viz., that foreseeing the failure of the proportions due to such a promise coming from Him, He should affirm it by oath. The Apostle Paul had no idea of such a failure, for from this very promise in the covenant he declares "that the promise to Abraham was, that he should be heir of the world" (Rom. 4 : 13). The inheriting of the earth by the meek, and the inheriting of the Kingdom, are equivalent phrases designating the same destiny, rank, and power. This company of kings are to proceed from Abraham, in virtue of his being thus chosen, and hence results the imperative necessity, as has been already demonstrated, of our being grafted in, adopted, and reckoned the children of Abraham, that we, as Gentiles, but now recognized as belonging to the elect nation, may inherit with him, or become kings and priests. This promise is repeated in another form (Exodus 19 : 6) and amplified by Peter (1 Peter 2 : 5, 9) as still future, God being engaged in the process of gathering out the people who shall appear as this Kingdom of royal priests, fulfilling the Divine purpose (Isa. 43 : 21) : "this people have I formed for Myself ; they shall show forth My praise." 2. It is in view of this Divine purpose of raising up a Kingdom of kings and priests (i.e. a Kingdom unexampled in its manifestations of regal splendor and glory), that the most positive declarations are made. Thus in Rev. 5 : 10, speaking of the redeemed, it is added : "And hast made us unto our God kings and priests ; and we shall reign on the earth." That this embraces actual, real rulership is so apparent that even those most inclined to spiritualize admit it, as e.g. Barnes (Com. loci.), who at least says that "the redeemed will be so much in the ascendancy that the affairs of the nations will be in their hands," a state of affairs that will not, according to Scripture, be found down to the Second Advent. In Rev. 3 : 21, it is stated : "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame and am set down in My Father's throne." This emphatically teaches that the saints share or participate in the rule of the Messiah, for in no other way, without violence, can the words be applied. Matt. 24 : 46, 47, has "Blessed is that servant whom his Lord, when He cometh shall find so doing. Verily I say unto you, that He shall make him ruler over all his goods." (Compare the being "faithful over a few things" and becoming "ruler over many things," Matt. 25 : 21, the "authority over ten cities," etc., Luke 19 : 17, and "if we suffer with Christ, we shall also reign with Him," 2 Tim. 2 : 12). Such language is based on the idea that the reward bestowed upon faithfulness is an elevation to a position of superiority evidenced by the exercise of authority and rule. Such are (Rev. 1 : 6) "made kings and priests unto God," raised (so Barnes loci), to "exalted rank and dignity," or (as Prof. Stuart, Apoc. loci) "constituted a kingly order, the members of which are all like priests, i.e. holy and consecrated to the service of God and in the possession of elevated dignity." If we take the rendering offered by Bengel (Gnomon) and Stuart of the last named passage, viz., that "the whole body of these priests form a Kingdom," and read it "made us a Kingdom," it increases, if possible, the force of the expression, seeing that the Kingdom is represented as contained, centred in royalty itself, as e.g. Dan. 2 : 38.* 3. Saints are "the heirs of a Kingdom," James 2 : 5. which they inherit at the Second Coming of Jesus when He is revealed as King, "in His glory," and "shall sit upon the throne of

His glory," Matt. 25 : 34. Reference is again made to this in order that the reader may consider that "heirship of a Kingdom," and "the inheriting of a Kingdom" embraces much more than a mere admittance into and enjoyment of the blessings of a Kingdom. It evinces the coming into such actual possession of a Kingdom as is alone met by the idea of a participancy in government and of regal authority. Thus the language is understood when used among men; and the Spirit never would give a promise which, expressed in a definite usual form, denotes this, and yet mean that we should regard it as exaggerated, and therefore we should soften the implied dignity down into what might suit our humility or fancy." 4. A class of passages which describe the actions of the saints associated with Christ, can only be received as indicative of an actual acquired rulership. When Jesus the Mighty King comes He is represented as commencing His rule by terribly overthrowing His enemies (Prop. 115); now the saints come with Him (Obs. 4), and they too are exhibited as engaged in and performing the same kingly acts. Thus Rev. 2 : 26 : "And he that overcometh and keepeth My words unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron, as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken in shivers, even as I received from My Father." Our opponents on this passage make all the concessions that our argument demands, for they concede (as Barnes, Com. loci), that it means that the saints "would partake of the final triumph and glory of the Saviour, and be associated with Him," and in reference to the time of fulfilment : "All that is said here would be applicable to that time when the Son of God will come to judge the world, and when His saints will be associated with Him in His triumphs." It is true that Barnes, and others, endeavor to shift this passage to a rewarding in the third heaven, but the futility of it is evident from its describing a scene and events taking place upon the earth. So also the Psalmist (Ps. 149 : 5-9) makes "the saints joyful in glory" at the appearance of "their king" and declares : "Let the high praises of God be in their mouth and a two-edged sword in their hand; to execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people; to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron; to execute upon them the judgment written:—this honor have all His saints. Praise ye the Lord." Jude (14, 15) likewise invites the King and the saints in their Coming "to execute judgment upon all," etc. Thus the Spirit, in attributing to the saints the same irresistible authoritative action which belongs to Jesus Christ in His regal character and manifestation, certainly teaches that they obtain associated rulership, glimpses of which even seem to flash out of the song of Deborah and Barak (Judges 5 : 13, 31).<sup>4</sup> 5. Jesus Himself is styled (Rev. 1 : 5) "The Prince of the Kings of the earth," i. e. as Commentators inform us, "the first in rank." So also in Rev. 17 : 14 and 19 : 16, He is called "The Lord of lords and the King of kings." The phraseology implies a recognition of this precedence. But if applied, as usual, to earthly monarchs in this and former dispensations, it loses some of its force by the fact that the claim here set up has not been acknowledged, for wickedness and rebellion have characterized most of such kings. The language is expressive that those kings over whom He is the Prince, the Leader, etc., receive Him as such. This therefore can only be referred to the saints who are mentioned in immediate connection with those passages, and in one expressly denominated "kings," in another designated His "armies," and in the third "the called and chosen and faith- ful." Admit the elevation of the saints to the dignity of kingship, Christ being the Mighty Leader and King, and we at once recognize the beauty, force, and sublimity of the claim, and how joyfully this will be acknowledged by the kings themselves. For then the title really assumes its intended dignatory form, seeing that a body of exalted kings and lords are associated with and under Him in His Theocratic government. This is strikingly corroborated in Heb. 1 : 9, where, after the direct reference to the throne and sceptre of the Son, it is added : "Thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows"—that is, above the kings who are nearly related to Him. Barnes (Com. loci) comments : "Above thine associates ; that is, above all who sustain the kingly office," and after correctly opposing Doddridge's supposition that these fellows were "angels," adds : "The more natural construction is, to suppose that it refers to kings, and to mean that He was the most exalted of all." These "fellows" are evidently "the co heirs with Christ," He being the chief inheritor, the Sovereign among them. The title given to the Messiah by Micah 5 : 2 (see Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 271) is indicative of His being the supreme commander as distinguished from subordinates. The Psalmist expresses his hope (Ps. 94 : 10) of renewed rulership at the very time that the enemies of the Lord shall perish in being then "anointed with fresh oil"—phraseology equivalent to kingship. And when the kings thus associated with the Mighty One "hear His words" and exercise their rule, it will be fulfilled that (Ps. 138 : 4) "all the kings of the earth shall praise Thee, O Lord (which is not done down to the Advent, but must be after, as seen Rev. 19)." 6. It is in view of this promised rulership that so much is said concerning the exalting of "the horns" of the righteous. The "horn" was extensively used as emblematic of regal power, rule, or dominion, as e.g. Jer. 48 : 25 ; Dan. 8 : 5, 6, 20-22, etc. It is an apt speaking symbol of power and authority. Now it is repeatedly declared that the time is coming when (Ps. 75 : 10) "all the horns of the wicked also will I cut off, but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted." Hence the promise to the righteous one is : "his horn shall be exalted with honor;" and let the reader ponder the words that follow (because the saints when they receive this honor come with King Jesus "to execute the vengeance written"), "the wicked shall see it and be grieved ; he shall gnash with his teeth and melt away ; the desire of the wicked shall perish." Therefore it is that in Ps. 89, where the most positive assurance is given that the Davidic covenant, long delayed, shall be fulfilled in David's Son restoring the throne and Kingdom, it is appropriately added : "in thy favor our horn shall be exalted." 7. Another class of passages, in strict accord with this idea of acquired authority, tell us that the saints are to be crowned, as in 1 Cor. 9 : 25 ; James 1 : 12 ; Rev. 2 : 10, etc. The time of bestowing this crown coincides with the time previously stated, as e.g. 1 Pet. 5 : 4, "When the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." So Paul also expected (2 Tim. 4 : 8), the crown to be given only to himself and others at the "appearing" of the Lord Jesus. The emblematic "crowns of gold" of the Elders (Rev. 4 : 4) are indicative of their sustaining a kingly office.' 8. Hence, we are prepared to find the saints even called "princes," etc., because of such received honor. This has been seen already in the title of "kings and priests," but in addition to these other expressive names are bestowed. In the 113th Psalm at the time the Barren Woman (Prop. 118) becomes the "joyful mother of chil- dren," God "raiseth up the poor out of the dust and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill, that He may set him with Princes, even with the Princes of His people." In the 47th Ps., when "the Lord most High" is the "great King over all the earth," and "He shall subdue the people under us and nations under our feet," then "the Princes of the people are gathered together, even the people of the God of Abraham: for the Shields (Sep. strong ones; Horseley, protectors; Vulg. strong gods; meaning, so Clarke, kings or rulers), of the earth belong unto God: He is greatly exalted." Even Ps. 110:3 is supposed by some (as Dr. Clarke, Com. loci) to bear the rendering: "Thy princely people in the day of thy power." etc. (with which may be compared Justin Martyr's: "With Thee shall be, in the day, the chief of Thy power, in the beauties of the saints," etc.). And various commentators, instead of applying Isa. 32:1 to Hezekiah, interpret it (correctly), as referring to the Messiah: "Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness and princes (some read, as to princes) shall rule in judgment."<sup>9</sup> The more indirect allusions growing out of the purpose intended are numerous. Saints are to occupy the same place, i.e. "the heavenlies" (see Prop. 107, Obs. 3), now usurped by Satan. Recalling how the future, anticipated by hope and most firmly grasped by faith, is spoken of as present, "the heavenlies in Christ" (Eph. 1:3 and 2:7, comp. with Eph. 3:10 and 6:12) will be fully realized in this rulership. In Ps. 72:3 in the description of the Messianic reign, "the mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills, by righteousness," which some commentators (as e.g. Clarke, Com. loci) explain to denote that princes and inferior governors or rulers bring peace. Anciently kings or rulers were called shepherds, and this is referred to in Isa. 23:4 in connection with the reign of the Messiah. In Isa. 60:17 that God "will make thy officers" ("who should be appointed to rule," so Barnes, who follows Sep., which gives "Rulers") peace and thine exactors (magistrates, so Barnes, etc.), righteousness." Reference may be made to this feature in Jer. 33:26, and in Ps. 94:15, as some render it (as e.g. Clarke Com. loci): "Until the Just One shall sit in judgment, and after Him all the upright in heart." Receiving what writers on the figurative language of the Bible inform us, that "a star" denotes a ruler, this idea attached to various promises, as e.g. Dan. 12:3, would increase the comprehensiveness of the same. The most delicate allusions are but too frequently overlooked, owing to our keeping this reign of the saints too much in the background. Thus, e.g. in Prov. 8:14-16, after showing that "sound wisdom" gives "strength," it is added, "By Me (i.e. in possessing Me) kings reign and princes decree justice. By Me princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth." This can be only true of the saints, for as the history of the world shows, comparatively few such pious kings have existed; but the passage receives due force if we admit that the time is coming when all who have "sound wisdom" shall be "kings, princes, and nobles." The same delicate reference is contained in the saints being then associated with "the hand" (emblem of power), of the Lord, in their riding upon "white horses" (emblem of victory, used by rulers), in becoming "pillars" (as used e.g. Rev. 3:12—emblem of chief supports), in becoming lordly "cedars," "trees of righteousness," etc. (emblems of the nobles of a kingdom, so Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 469), and even in "the mounting up with wings like eagles," indicative of exaltation.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For such are "the Sons of God," and declared to be such, as Jesus was (Rom. 1 : 4) "by the resurrection from the dead." This Sonship, as "the first-born," already implies the rulership. Thus e.g. Knapp (Ch. Theol., p. 132) on the phrase "Son of God" as given to Jesus in Ps. 2 : 7, says : "It is the dignity of this office of King or Messiah, of which the Psalmist appears here to speak. The name Son of God was not unfrequently given to Kings ; it is not, therefore, nomen essentialis, but dignitatis messianicæ. The passage would then mean, 'Thou art the King of my appointment,' etc. So others (Ency. Relig. Knowl., Art. "Son of God," etc.) say it was applied to magistrates or rulers. Now, aside from a divine relationship, the title evidently is given to include the future relationship that they sustain to God in the power bestowed upon them and exercised by them. As Adam was "the Son of God," having dominion accorded to him, which he forfeited, this "image of God" lost shall be restored through the second Adam. What this image or likeness denotes, we may leave an opponent to inform us. Thus Bush, Com., Gen. 1 : 26, says : "But there can be as little doubt that the phrase in this connection denotes primarily the possession of dominion and authority." The "Sons of God" to be truly such must be restored back to their forfeited dominion. It is this "peculiar people" that God calls forth in this Messianic ordering. Then Prov. 4 : 8, 9, will be abundantly verified : "She (Wisdom) shall promote thee ; she shall bring thee to honor, when thou dost embrace her. She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace ; a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee."

<sup>2</sup> We can see then how the time is coming when such passages as Ps. 138 : 4, 5, will be literally verified : "All the kings of the earth shall praise Thee, O Lord, when they hear the words of thy mouth. Yea, they shall sing in the ways of the Lord : for great is the glory of the Lord." Now but comparatively few kings honor the Lord, then all kings shall exult in Him. When these Scriptures are realized in all its fulness, then and then only will the title (Rev. 1 : 5) of Jesus most significantly and gloriously appear : "Prince of the kings of the earth," whose loyalty to and supreme love for "the Prince" cannot be questioned. The New Revision renders Rev. 5 : 10 : "And madest them to be unto our God a kingdom and priests ; and they shall reign upon the earth." Lange's Com. loci : "And didst make them unto our God a kingdom and priests ; and they reign upon or over the earth." Dr. Craven, in a foot-note (p. 160) opposes the idea of "the saints reigning as mere subjects (i. e. to be kings without authority over others)," on the ground of its being "inconsistent with (1) the essential idea of reigning, which is to exercise authority over others ; (2) the express intimations of the word of God ; comp. Dan. 7 : 22, 27 ; Luke 22 : 29, 30, etc." "If it be asked, Over whom are the Saints to reign ? it may be answered, (1) Some, as superior Rulers, over their brethren (see Luke 22 : 29, 30 etc.) ; and (2) all, as kings, over the human races to be born after the establishment of the Basileia, and, perchance, over other races throughout the universe. Speculation as to this last point, however, not only as to answer, but as to question, should be restrained."

<sup>3</sup> It is a sad fact that these exceeding precious promises are frittered away until they become indefinite and lose their designed meaning. To reconcile the inheriting with the spiritualistic theory of a Kingdom, it is denied that a Kingdom is really inherited, but only "the effects" of it. Thus Hodge (Sys. Div., Vol. 2 p. 599) remarks that "the word Kingdom is used metonymically for the effects of the exercise of royal authority." In this sense he says "men are said to inherit the kingdom of God." The figure that he refers to is used e.g. in the rendering (2. above) "made us a kingdom," i. e. metonymically ; conferred (not the effects but) "the exercise of royal authority," but to "inherit a Kingdom" the same idea is expressed without figure, if we allow language any adequate meaning. This inheriting, as we show by the numerous passages adduced, is explained in so many different ways that it cannot, without violence, be resolved into a figure of speech. What a relief such a faith in real, substantial regal honor and position imparts at the side of the vague mystical, spiritualistic conceptions of mysticism, pantheistic individualism, and of semi-belief in general. Here is something plainly expressed in the grammatical sense, for hope to grasp, tangible, readily comprehended, transcendently ennobling and glorious.

individuals in the present state of conflict, but to those who at 'the end' should appear as conquerors." That Christianity possesses a power over the heathen world is not denied; the power, however, is not that of 'the iron sceptre,'—the power of government. The adjournment of these promises to the day of the Parousia is in accordance with the express language of Christ Himself.

† Ingersoll and those like him may make sport of this anointing oil (designating it "hair oil," etc.), but to the believer it has a significant and precious meaning. For when it is said Ps. 23 : 5 (comp. Ps. 92 : 10 ; 89 : 20 ; 45 : 7, etc.) : 'Thou anointest my head with oil,' it is indicative of a consecration to Rulership and Priesthood. We only now remind the critical student that this union of kings and priests with the Christ is essential to the completeness of the Theocratic ordering, is requisite to fill up the measure of His own glory and dominion (comp. e.g. Eph. 1 : 23 and the comments of commentators on the same). The exaltation of Jesus is correspondingly to this associated body of kings and priests, glorified and honored, reflecting His redemptive work and personal glory. It adds by a visible manifestation to the perfection of the mighty Redeemer and Sovereign, especially when it is regarded as founded on grace, and made instrumental in extending the praise of God. Fausset (Com., Pa. 45 : 16) makes the following comment : "As earthly monarchs govern widely extended empires by viceroys, this glorious King is represented as supplying all the principalities of earth with princes of His own numerous progeny." The Theocratic unity demands this intimate relationship, which brings corresponding exaltation and faithfulness.

‡ Then shall be fulfilled the special promise made to Zerubbabel, the son of Shealtiel (Hag. 2 : 23), who shall be made "as a signet," i.e. occupy a most honorable position, and participate in that mighty shaking of kingdoms, etc. (Comp. Prop. 147.) It is in view of this power lodged in the saints and their coming with Jesus at the Sec. Advent, that they are even implied in the phrase "The Son of Man cometh in the clouds of heaven with power and glory." (Comp. the excellent remarks of Olshausen—Com., Vol. 2, p. 250—on the word "power," and its meaning in reference to a host.) We cannot separate the Head from His members in this coming; the Spirit unites them, and this union we must respect and observe.

§ Strange that De Wette (Com., 2 Tim. 4 : 8) should bring the charge of pride against Paul in claiming a crown for himself personally, when he distinctly in the Epistle, and other places, ascribes his victory and future glory to the marvellous, unmerited grace of God extended to him, and declares that all believers shall share with him in the same glorious salvation. The reference to himself personally is precisely what we, who follow his teaching, require as evidencing the strength of his faith and hope.

¶ Of this striking passage we give the rendering of Sirr (First Res.) following, or probably is, Horseley's : "The willing (or voluntary ones) of the peoples are gathered together, a people of the God of Abraham. Because the Protectors of the earth are for God, He is greatly exalted." Justin Martyr renders it : "The rulers of the nations were assembled along with the God of Abraham, for the strong ones are greatly exalted on this earth." These "strong ones" reminds us at once of "the mighty ones," who came down at the gathering of the heathen to the winepress, Joel 3 : 11. It may be added that the expression of Ps. 113 quoted is a reproduction of Hannah's prayer, 1 Sam. 2 : 8, 9, in which, however, we find the most significant explanatory addition, "to set them (i.e. these poor, etc.) among princes, and to make them inherit the thrones of glory." Comp. also Ps. 45 : 7 with verse 16.

‡ Delitzsch's translation : "Behold, the King will reign according to righteousness; and the princes according to right will they command. And every one will be a shelter from the wind and a covert from the storm; like water brooks in a dry place, like the shadow of a gigantic rock in a languishing land." Fausset (Com. loci) refers this to the future Messianic reign, and "the princes" are "subordinate, referring to all in authority under Christ in the coming Kingdom on earth, e.g. apostles, etc., Luke 22 : 30 ; 1 Cor. 6 : 2 ; 2 Tim. 2 : 12 ; Rev. 2 : 26, 27, and 3 : 21."

§ Many indirect allusions are only available in the light of direct Scripture. Thus e.g. Jesus re-establishes the Davidic house, and the saints gathered out form part (Heb. 3 : 6) of His house, i.e. they are incorporated into the royal house (comp. Obs. 5, 2), and with Christ compose its regality. So Rom. 16 : 20, "the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly," cannot be limited, as many do, to the Church at Rome, as if it denoted the gaining of victory over "discord, contentions, and divisions" in the congregation. For in point of historical fact this is not the truth, seeing that Satan, instead of being bruised at Rome, made that the theatre of miserable retrogressions, hierarchical tendencies, and persecution. It refers to the victory over Satan and the resultant reign as presented in Rev. 20 : 1-6. The word "shortly," which has misled so many, is given by the Spirit according to the measure of time that belongs to Him (Comp. Prop. 173.) Some writers (as e.g. Proph. Times, Vol. 10, p. 28, etc.) make the cherubim foreshadow the reigning saints; others derive additional confirmation from the tabernacle or temple, as typical of a future ordering. Interesting deductions have been made by Thomas and others, from Zech. 3 and 4, the "men of wonder" or "representative men," "thy fellows" being regarded as representing these saints or rulers, etc.; but having so many other passages, presenting the doctrine in plain terms, these symbolical representations may only require this reference.

Obs. 6. Another proof is worthy of separate consideration, viz., the passages relating to the judging of the saints. Having shown (Prop. 133), what the Judgeship of Jesus Christ is, when He comes to judge the world, viz., that it designates His regal kingly rule, it is corroborative of the correctness of our doctrine that the saints are represented as associated with the Lord Messiah in judging. In Dan. 7 : 22, in connection with the Advent of the Ancient of Days, the Coming of the Son of man, the overthrow of the enemies of God, "judgment was given to the saints of the most High;" this itself is explained as possessing the Kingdom, dominion, etc., in verses 22 and 27. Having given in detail the Scriptural idea of "judging," it will suffice to present the opinion of a scholarly opponent. Thus Prof. Bush (Mill. p. 129), in interpreting the phrase "judgment was given to them" (Rev. 20 : 4), advocates by various references the Scriptural usage, and then says: "Numerous passages to the same effect might be readily adduced, from which the inference can scarcely fail to be drawn, that by judgments being given to those that sat on the thrones, is meant, that they received authority to reign and govern, or the right of exercising judgment according to the Hebrew sense of the word 'judge, which is equivalent to that of 'reigning,' or putting forth the judicial and executive acts of the governing power." Fairbairn (On Proph. p. 450), admits that "the thrones set for judgment" and "the reigning" indicates "their (i.e. saints) kingly power," which is exercised in authority and rulership over the nations. Now keeping in view the Jewish idea of a Judge (i.e. a Ruler) let us regard 1 Cor. 6 : 2, 3, "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? And if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that ye shall judge angels?" The sense of the passage is plain, viz., that if destined to the promised kingly rule over the world (as predicted by the prophets, etc.), that if even angels shall be subjected to that kingly exercise of power (for the angels are subjected to "The Christ," and being associated rulers, with Jesus, they even will willingly yield obedience to the "co-heirs"), they ought to be sufficiently worthy to exercise some authority even now in such matters pertaining to the saints.' It is in view of this determined rulership that Jesus (Matt. 19 : 28; Luke 22 : 29, 30) promises specially to the apostles: "Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye shall also sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Here the restoration of the Theocratic order is not only intimated, and the Messianic reign stated, but the apostles are to be elevated to regal position of "Judges" or Rulers. It is in opposition to the spirit of the passage, parallel Scripture, and usage, to explain this (so Priest in View of Mill.), as fulfilled on the day of Pentecost, or (so Prof. Bush, Mill.), as verified by the "Christian Church in the midst of which the apostles are to be conceived as enthroned, and continually exercising judgment by means of their writings embodied in the sacred canon," or (so Lightfoot), as exhibited in the ministerial authority with which the apostles were invested. (See Prop. 145, on Regeneration.) Such interpretations are rejected as untrustworthy and a lowering of the promise by those who have no doctrinal sympathy with us. Thus e.g. Bloomfield (Com. loci) refers the fulfilment to the Second Advent after the resurrection of the saints, and supposes that the high exaltation" of the apostles is denoted. Barnes (Com. loci) locates the realization of the promise at the same period, and after stating that "to judge denotes rank, authority, power," as evidenced in "the ancient judges of Israel," adds: "And as earthly kings have those around them dignified with honors and office, counsellors and judges, so Christ says His apostles shall occupy the same relative station in the great day." Comment on such concessions is unnecessary; but it may be interesting to notice how those who reject our doctrine find it difficult to retain an interpretation without inconsistency and even contradictions. Taking one of the most guarded writers, Neander (Life of Christ), he informs us (sec. 76) that the apostles "were to lead the Kingdom (i.e. the Church) as His organs," and as confirmatory of this mission quotes in a footnote Matt. 19 : 28, and Luke 22 : 30, "ye shall also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." He here, as also in Sec. 51, applies this judging to the present dispensation. But when he comes to Sec. 228 he then interprets it (correctly), as referring to the period "when the Son of man should appear with dominion corresponding to His glory in the renewed and glorified world;" saying that "the word 'judging' includes the idea of 'governing' according to its ancient acceptation;" for "the idea of a participation of believers with Christ in the government and judgment of the future world is bound up with the whole mode of representing the Kingdom of God in the New Testament." With all his efforts to make something "symbolical" out of it, he gives us all the admissions that we desire, even in the sentence: "There are to be 'judges' and 'judged,' 'rulers' and 'ruled,' but in an exalted sense—in the new form of the Theocracy as well as in the old." Such is our doctrine.<sup>1</sup>

Wisdom, Ch. 2 : 7, 8, which, speaking of the return of the dead, says : "In the time of their visitation they shall shine, and run to and fro like sparks among the stubble ; they shall judge the nations, and have dominion over the peoples (Vulg.), and their Lord shall reign forever." To have rule over angels ! What honor, dignity, and glory ! (Comp. e.g. 1 Cor. 2 : 9, 10.) Fausset (Com. 1 Cor. 6 : 2, 3) properly says : "There is a distinction drawn by able Expositors, between the saints who judge or rule, and the world which is ruled by them." To reign and to be saved are not necessarily synonymous.

* Some endeavor to make an unnecessary difficulty in the statement that the twelve apostles are only promised a rulership, and that in Rev. 21 : 14 the twelve foundations are only inscribed with the names of twelve apostles, from which it is argued that Paul is excluded (some even going so far, that this exclusion indicates the superior position of the twelve and the inferiority of Paul, notwithstanding his protestations of being at least also an apostle), and that Revelation is Anti-Pauline. But all such inferences are beyond our province. Paul is definitely promised a crown or rulership, 2 Tim. 4 : 8, and for aught we know the Lord, in view of his abundant labors, etc., may have a better thing—a special position—in reserve for him. We need not trouble ourselves about the crown that Paul will receive, for it will be commensurate with his apostleship. Because God has not seen proper to particularize his position, it is simply folly to conclude that it must necessarily be lower than that of the rest. Therefore, we need not resort to the explanation of Hengstenberg (loci), who supposes that Mathias's appointment was only provisional, and that when the Lord Himself made choice to fill the vacancy Paul became the true twelfth apostle ; or, to that of Reuss that Paul did not call himself a thirteenth apostle but simply an apostle, all believers being apostles (which does not meet the difficulty, and is opposed to Paul's own definition of an apostle and of what constitutes one). In conversation with a friend, Rev. Rogers, who takes Hengstenberg's view, he pointed out the fact that Mathias was chosen without God's direction at the expressed opinion of the other apostles, and that Paul was the one whom God had chosen to take Judas's place. The apostles correctly reasoned that the original number should again be filled ; but instead of waiting, and leaving God to take the initiative, they prematurely undertook the work of supply, too much assuming God's place and call, and leaving it to an election when it was God's part to do the choosing. There is force and propriety in this, seeing that this important event transpired before the day of Pentecost, and that this election is all that we hear of Mathias. If this is to be received, then Paul's name will be with the rest, Rev. 21 : 14. It also then shows the exceeding delicacy of the New Test., in simply recording the fact without note or comment, or afterward referring to it. Augustine (City of God, B. 20, Ch. 5) makes the number "twelve" to signify "the completeness of the multitude of those who shall judge," so that it would include Paul, who, he says, in 1 Cor. 6 : 3, unmistakably considers himself included in the number of judges." We prefer the definite number of twelve as more agreeable to the analogy of Scripture on the subject. So Dr. Schaff (His. Apas. Ch., p. 512) rejects the election of Mathias on the ground that Peter was "precipitate," and "thought that the vacancy in the sacred number of twelve, occasioned by the crime of Judas, must forthwith be filled, without waiting for the promised outpouring of the Holy Ghost." "There seems to be no alternative, but to pronounce the election of Mathias a well-meant yet hasty and invalid act, and to substitute Paul for him, as the legitimate apostle." Steir (Discourses of the Apostles, 2d ed.) takes the same view ; others maintain the validity of the election. Whatever may be the truth in the matter, one thing is conclusive, viz. : that Paul will receive his exalted position as Judge, Ruler, King, and Priest.

Obs. 7. The witticisms that some eminent men have attempted to pass at the expense of "the mother of Zebedee's children" (Matt. 20 : 20-29) recoil upon themselves, inasmuch that in denying that there are positions of honor and rulership in the Messianic Kingdom, they evince far less knowledge of the subject than she possessed. Instead of this mother entertaining low and grovelling views respecting the Kingdom, she evidenced her appreciation of its glory and her understanding of the predicted rulership in it by making her request. Making due allowance for her motherly feelings, yet we can accord no sympathy to her apparently selfish purpose of securing the elevation of James and John to a position superior to that of the others. The narrative, as recorded, confirms in the strongest manner that while incorrect and blamable in preferring the request in behalf of her children, she was not wrong in supposing that the Messianic Kingdom, when erected, shall contain various stations of honor or degrees of rulership. Let the reader consider the following particulars, and such a confirmation will inevitably appear. (1) The time when this request was made is but a short time before the death of Jesus, and, consequently, after He had frequently spoken of the Kingdom. (2) This mother made the request through (evidently Mark 10 : 35) the solicitation of James and John, the latter having not only had the Kingdom explained to them by Jesus, but had even gone out and preached it to the nation ; hence they ought to have known something concerning it. (3) James and John had just previously heard from the lips of the Saviour (Matt. 19 : 28) that the apostles would be rewarded in the Kingdom with a rulership on twelve thrones ; hence the request itself is indicative of this acquired knowledge of rulership and of their faith in its ultimate attainment. (4) James and John had also witnessed the transfiguration, and, therefore, had more exalted views respecting the Messianic glory (see Prop. 153, on Transfiguration). (5) Jesus, instead of denying that such gradations of rulership will exist in His Kingdom, expressly announces that they will be manifested, (a) by making them dependent upon suffering in His behalf, and (b) by asserting "but to sit on My right hand, and on My left, is not Mine to give, but (or, except to those) for whom it is prepared of my Father," thus showing that such posts of honor shall exist, but will be awarded to those accounted worthy of them.' What follows is better illustrated by Luke 22 : 24-30, when they (disciples) had "a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest." Now, corroborative of our doctrine we have those points presented : (1) This strife indicated (while exhibiting a wrong spirit in the apostles) what views they held concerning a future rulership in the Kingdom. (2) Referring to Gentile rulers, Jesus tells them (because they anticipated the speedy setting up of the Kingdom and did not recognize its postponement, etc.) that instead of becoming such rulers now they must be servants. They were to be only the heirs of a Kingdom. (3) He does not rebuke the views of rulership held, but confirms them by these particulars : (a) By showing how one could become "the greatest" and "the chief"—viz., by serving ; (b) by referring to Himself, who, although the King—the Mighty Chief—of the Coming, still future Kingdom, now also served ; (c) by then specifically, in view of the forseen service they would render, telling them, "I appoint unto you a Kingdom," i.e., you shall inherit a Kingdom, receive power of rulership ; (d) "as My Father hath appointed unto Me," i.e., it will be as real, substantial an exercise of power, although subordinated to mine ; (e) "that ye may eat and drink at My table in My Kingdom," i.e., you will be so exalted in special honor as to occupy, because of your stations, places of dignity near Me ; (f) "and sit on thrones," i.e., elevated to Kingship ; (g) "judging the twelve tribes of Israel," thus explaining why they are to be enthroned, viz., to govern the restored Jewish nation, which will again be manifested in its tribal divisions (comp. e.g. Isa. 1 : 26, 27). It is impossible, taking these statements entire, and comparing them with the general analogy of the Word and with the Messianic Kingdom, as it must appear in its covenanted form, to form any other just conclusion than the one we are advocating. We may rest assured that "the saints of the Most High" (marg. "of the high places" or "things," i.e., to which they are destined and which they shall occupy) "shall take the Kingdom and possess it forever, even forever and ever," Dan. 7 : 18. (Some, however, read "the supreme holy ones," and in verse 22 "the supereminent saints.") Isa. 49 : 7 will yet be verified in a high sense "kings shall see and arise, princes also shall worship, because of the Lord that is faithful and the Holy One of Israel."

<sup>1</sup> The English version, as many critics have pointed out, is very unfortunate in the introduction of the italicized words : "it shall be given to them." The rendering as given in effect limits the power of the Saviour and contradicts other statements (Matt. 25 : 31-40 ; Luke 19 : 11-27 ; Jno. 5 : 22, 27, etc.), respecting His rewarding the saints at His Coming. It limits His power over against Luke 22 : 29. Hence Prof. Bush (Introd. Genesis, p. 29) omits italics and gives : "To sit, etc., is not mine to give, except to those," etc. So Barnes, Com. loci, gives as "the correct translation" "except to those," and Lange, Com., "but it is for those," with which Clarke, Com. loci, and others agree. The Revis. has : "but it is for them." The Father gives (Prop. 83) the Kingdom to the Son and the position of the co-heirs is also bestowed by Him, and the stations of these heirs are dependent upon the character formed. When the time comes for awarding, this will be done by King Jesus according to the purpose of the Father. The order laid down by the Father will be followed ; and hence before the development of the specific character, etc., and even the time for the Kingdom to be established, it is premature, it is not in the province of Jesus to bestow such specific individual honors. Indeed we suspect more ;—as Jesus had intimated, the honors that would be given to the twelve apostles, this special one—even higher—being reserved for others (e.g. Paul, David or Abraham, etc.), Jesus delicately and in accordance with a general principle (from which the only deviation was that in favor of the apostles as a body, owing to their being chosen, etc.), gives James and John a refusal, indirectly intimating that such an award would not be in accord with the Father's will, being held in abeyance for some others. We confess to amazement at Lange's view (Com., loci) that if the request had been acceded to, they would have occupied the place of the two malefactors ! Meyer's (Com., loci) view is more consistent : "Ye know not that the highest posts in my Kingdom cannot be obtained without sufferings such as I have to endure,"—thus admitting the distinctions of honor, position, etc.

<sup>2</sup> To indicate how oppositely our opponents treat these passages an illustration is in place. Scott (Com.), Bh. Hall quoted by Scott, and others, apply Matt. 19 : 28, Luke 22 : 30, concerning the apostles, judging the twelve tribes, to their being "assessors in judgment" (the Popish idea of judgment being understood), i.e. acting judicially in the great final general judgment, or "in that great day to judge the quick and dead ;" "to sit upon several thrones to second and assist this awful act of final judgment on the rebellious Israel." They thus limit the scriptural idea of judgment to judicial investigation and sentence, and the Theocratic idea is entirely overlooked. Now, on the other hand, one leading opposer, Dr. Brown (e.g. Com., Mark 10 : 35-45) concedes our reasoning to be correct when he presents the following comment : "But to sit on my right hand and on my left hand is not mine to give, save to them for whom it is prepared," i.e. the stations will not be assigned "on a principle of favoritism ;" and then justly observes : "Our Lord, it will be observed, does not deny the petition of James and John, or say they shall not occupy the place in His Kingdom which they now improperly sought ;—for aught we know, that may be their true place." In Dan. 7, instead of reading "the saints of the Most High," many able critics read "the saints of the most high (places) shall take the Kingdom and possess the Kingdom, even for ever and ever" (so e.g. Tregelles, etc.) ; and this accords best with the analogy of Scripture, indicating the blessed truth that the saints are appointed to "most high places," and, in consequence of this ordering, they take and possess the Kingdom, i.e. exercise lordship in and over it, associated with the Son of Man as Supreme Ruler. This is a return to the ancient application as given e.g. by Justin Martyr, who freely renders verse 27 : "And the great places of the kingdoms under the heavens were given to the holy people of the Most High, to reign in an everlasting Kingdom, and all powers shall be subject to Him and shall obey Him." To the critical reader, it may here be said, that in view of the supremacy of the Jewish nation being connected with this rule of the Saints, able writers, as Tregelles, Fausset, and others, distinguish between the "Saints" and "the people of the saints or holy ones" as given by Daniel ; the former being the glorified rulers, the latter the Jewish nation to whom the former sustain, as we have explained, a peculiar relationship by engrafting.

Obs. 8. The wonderful Plan of God is shown in gathering out an elect body which shall, in the Coming Theocracy, be associated with the Christ in rulership in order to promote the redemptive process of the race, and to fill the earth with the praises and glory of the Lord. Instead of being defeated in His Theocratic purpose, God has been steadily making preparation for its sudden and overwhelming appearance. Bh. Newton well remarked concerning these risen and glorified saints that they "have the principal share in the felicities of Christ's Kingdom upon earth." They form a chosen body, a peculiar distinctive people who alone inherit the Kingdom (for flesh and blood cannot inherit), while the Jewish and spared Gentile nations form the willing subjects of the Kingdom. Being thus a select corporate body to whom the Kingdom is given (Props. 60-65 and 90, 124, etc.), who alone are crowned as the kings and priests of the restored Theocracy, we find deep reasons for the astonishing expressions recorded of the union, oneness, and fellowship with the Father and Son. The taunt employed in the early Church (evidently derived from this doctrinal feature) that Christians were a "genus tertium," a class elevated above others, is, after all, but sober truth. Those royal prerogatives, belonging exclusively to them, are sometimes presented in phraseology which requires a little reflection to apprehend. Thus e.g. in Eph. 1:23 the Church is "His body, the fulness of Him," etc., which, as many interpreters have stated, is expressive of the fact that in some way the Church is to fill up or complete the dominion of Jesus Christ; He being the Head and the saints the Body (thus forming a perfected dominion), a close and vital union subsisting between them. Calvin on this passage remarks: "This is the highest honor of the Church, that the Son of God regards Himself as in a certain sense imperfect unless He is joined to us." This is only consistently explained by the doctrine of this co-heirship in dominion, by which the saints form with Christ the perfected Theocratic order of inaugurated rulership. The preceding context corroborates this interpretation, because the apostle had just referred to the calling of the saints, their redemption, the dispensation when all things should be gathered together in one, the inheritance, the redemption of the purchased possession, saying: "That we should be to the praise of His glory who first trusted in Christ," and "that ye may know what is the hope of His calling and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints." Thus intimating not only the elect condition of believers and that they should in a special manner promote "the praise of His glory," but that the glory obtained by them by heirship would augment the glory of the Christ. The filling up or completeness of Jesus Christ mentioned here, and alluded to in other places, can only receive its due force and full meaning when regarded in the light of this doctrine; it then obtains a richness and propriety that must bring admiration and joy to the heart of the believer. This reign of a corporate body of rulers, with the engrafted Gentiles as fellow-heirs, is the finishing of the mystery (Eph. 3) mentioned by Paul. Therefore, it is that the lengthening out of this dispensation is represented as so gracious and merciful in God, in order that these destined rulers may be duly gathered even from among the Gentiles. And an amazing feature in the Divine Plan, evincing unbounded grace to us Gentiles, here presents itself; the Jewish nation, the elder, having rejected the offer of this Kingdom at the First Advent (Prop. 57), the Kingdom, as an inheritance, is to be given to others grafted in (Prop. 61, etc.), the younger.<sup>1</sup> Hence the distinction between "the married wife" and the restored "barren woman" (Prop. 118), which even the Psalmist alludes to. (Ps. 45:16) "instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth." What Lamartine says of worldly rulers (Girond., vol. 1, p. 53), viz., that "a throne even in fragments will not admit of participation," may be true of human nature as at present constituted, but does not apply to these accounted worthy of co-heirship with Christ, owing both to the infinite superiority of the Theocratic King and the perfect glorification of these rulers, who can never give place to the failings and imperfections of frail humanity.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Barnabas (Epis.) has been ridiculed because he refers to the children of Rebecca ("The elder shall serve the younger;") and to Jacob's blessing the children of Joseph, also giving the preference to the younger, as "types of the people to arise afterward," and applying it to the saints, viz., that they are represented by the younger. But when we come to consider that Jacob would not place his hands, as directed by Joseph, etc., the conclusion certainly is not ridiculous, that some typical meaning is attached to these things. Now the only thing that meets such a typical design is this reign of the saints—a body formed chiefly of Gentiles engrafted—who in the Divine order are really and truly to bear rule over the elder elect national body, i.e., the Jewish nation, etc. There is deep significance in such allusions.

<sup>2</sup> In this exalted position of the saints, we begin to see what Jesus means in Luke 12 : 35-46, where He not only pronounces those "blessed" that are watching, but positively declares that "He shall gird Himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth to serve them," i.e. He will in a special manner show them honor. His glorious destiny as portrayed e.g. in Ps. 8 will be verified, "crowned with glory and honor," for "the babes and sucklings" receive "dominion over the works of Thy hands," and (so Luthardt, Bremen Lects., p. 125), "Thou hast made him to be but little lower than God," or (as Gesenius in Robinson's Com.), "Thou hast caused him to lack but little of a God."

Obs. 9. The Kingdom itself is purposely delayed for thousands of years (long to man, but brief to God). in order to raise up this body of rulers to sustain it when manifested with a purity, dignity, power, stability, and glory worthy of a Theocracy. If the question be asked, why did not God establish the Theocracy in such a form in the time of Moses, or of David, or at the First Advent, the answer, as testified to by history, is apparent, viz., that man was not prepared for it. The essential element to sustain and give it its immortal, enduring characteristics had not yet been prepared and gathered. Looking at the predictions and promises, at the Kingdom as it shall appear, we see at once that a Theocracy with such a Ruler—God-man—and with such associated kings and priests requires, in view of the intelligent freedom of man and his bias to sin, a period of preparation, a set time in which an elect, peculiar, royal people may be gathered. God could, as asserted, have raised up this body, if necessary, even "out of stones," but He chooses rather in forbearance and wonderful patience to raise them up out of depraved man, not by compulsion or a forcing of the will, but by the application of His own truth to their self-consciousness and free will. Those who accept of this truth and manifest such acceptance by faith and obedience, become "the heirs of the Kingdom," are adopted as members of this body; all others are rejected as unworthy of inheriting the Kingdom of God. The Almighty, foreknowing the requirements of the Theocratic, determined order, has also predetermined (hence, in some Liturgies the prayer that God would speedily complete the number of the elect) the number of those who shall be associated with David's Son in the establishment of this Kingdom; and until this number (known only to God) is completed, the Kingdom itself will not be revealed. Such a Theocracy, in the nature of the case, cannot suddenly appear, without previous preparation, and is not the product of compulsion, but cheerful obedience to God. But when the last elected one is gathered, when the preparatory measures are all completed, then comes the sudden revelation of the Majestic King and His associated kings upon an awe-struck world. The re-establishment of the Theocracy is no longer left dependent upon previously gathered material to establish its efficiency and enhance its glory.

Like the ancient Judges, these are Rulers, holding their office as long as they exist, non-conferrable to others; whom to resist would be treasonable; whose authority is subordinate to the Supreme Will which it enforces; who are ministers of justice and law, defenders of truth, order, virtue, religion, the good of the individual, family, society, and state, being pre-eminently the officers of the great king, promoting His pleasure and dominion. By such an order, glorified and under the supervision of a mighty infallible king, that which is so difficult for an earthly kingdom to attain to will be effectually secured, viz., stability and constant progress. No reverses can befall it; nothing to shake its solidity can possibly arise; for reason cannot conceive of any power ample enough to overthrow it, or to impede its glorious mission and destiny. For (taking Gildas' rendering, A.D. 546, Works, S. 45) "The Moon shall blush and the Sun be confounded, when our Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Sion and in Jerusalem, and be glorified in the sight of His seniors" (for "seniors" comp. 2 Thess. 1:10). But this high and noble calling is elective; we are now cordially invited to accept this destiny tendered, for the time will come when the door is closed. Fausset (Com. Rev. 20:6) aptly says: "The privilege of our 'high calling in Christ' is limited to the present time of Satan's reign; when he is bound, there will be no scope for suffering, and so afterward reigning with Him (ch. 3:21; 1 Cor. 6:2)."

Obs. 10. Should the inquiry be started, by what principle of justice these elect saints are so highly honored above the righteous of the Millennial and succeeding ages, the answer is given in the Word in the principles announced, and in the difference of the dispensations, as e.g. Rom. 9:16, 17; Luke 22:28, 29; Rom. 11:28, 29, etc. For such extraordinary glory these saints must be trained in obedience and suffering, in temptation and trial, just as the King Himself has been. The subjects of this restored Theocracy, owing to the binding of Satan and the unspeakable blessings of the Messianic reign, will not be subjected to the same privations, temptations, and crosses that those now are who are schooled for their future appointments. The condition of those who succeed these in the Millennial age is vastly improved, faith being aided by the sight of grandeur and glory, suffering being removed, and aid and strength being imparted by this very rulership. This future Kingship is really the secret cause of that chastening that oftentimes is now so grievous. God designs that by our trials we may become fitted and prepared for the position in the Coming Kingdom. The elementary principles of holiness, wisdom, self-denial, love, zeal, etc., are to be implanted, forming the basis of the elevation intended, and qualifying us for the high and noble designs of this determined rulership. God does not take "the beggar from the dunghill to set him with princes," until He has passed through a preliminary training, including, in many instances, this state of poverty itself as part of the discipline necessary. When elevated to this kingship, it will be found that the state of probation, the constant contact with and conflict against evil, was most admirably adapted to qualify these rulers for their stations; not only as to their own personal relationship to each other, but likewise to bring them into sympathy with the nations of the earth. The physical and moral evil encountered, the valuable experience obtained, the relative change realized, the characteristics developed and confirmed, these, with the abundant additions of the Spirit, qualify them for the honor of kingship and priesthood, making them intelligent and wise kings, sympathetic and loving priests. Suffering, etc., prepared the blessed Master for His Theocratic position, and the disciple is not above the Master in this respect, but must fill up the measure of His sufferings, inasmuch as he shall also be allied with Him in the joy and glory of reigning. While the happiness and glory of David's Son is thus promoted by His obedient suffering, the same is also greatly enhanced by another principle, viz., by the bestowal of blessings and glory upon others in virtue of His own exaltation; now the same is stated of these rulers, for while obtaining blessedness and glory in view of their faith and obedience, the same is made an instrumentality for communicating happiness to others and promoting blessings throughout the world. Whatever of good, etc., may be in self, it is also made subservient to the good of others. This principle runs through the past dealings of God, is incorporated with His Theocratic ordering, and will be, as Millennial predictions abundantly show, manifested in this regal Judgeship. This Theocracy is designed for blessing the world, and exhibiting the majesty and glory of God.

This comforting and delightful subject can readily be extended. We remind the reader that these very preliminary qualifications again indicate, what has been before stated, that there are degrees of rank among these kings. That such degrees exist is evident from the terms "least" and "greatest" (Matt. 5 : 19), from the ruling over five or ten cities (Luke 19 : 17-19), from the gain or suffering loss (1 Cor. 3 : 14, 15) from the simple announcement, so often repeated, of rewarding every man according to his work, etc. Salvation is indeed of grace, but the proportionment of stations is dependent upon the faith and obedience of the individual. Hence the numerous cautions and exhortations to secure not simply admittance to but "an abundant entrance" into, the Kingdom. It is not a vain interest, therefore, that John manifests, when he says (2 John 8): "Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought (or gained), but that we receive a full reward." Error, neglect of duty, wilful sin, etc., may largely detract from our future reward. Barnes (Com., 2 John 8) refers to this loss, and adds: "The crown which they wear in heaven will be less bright than that which they might have worn, and the throne which they will occupy will be less elevated. The rewards of heaven will be in accordance with the services rendered to the Redeemer, and it would not be right that they who turn aside or falter in their course, should have the same exalted honors which they might have received if they had devoted themselves to God with ever-increasing fidelity. It is painful to think how many there are who begin the Christian career with burning zeal, as if they would strike for the highest rewards in heaven, but who soon waver in their course, and fall into some paralyzing error, until at last they receive, perhaps, not half the reward which they might have obtained." A consistent, faithful life alone secures "the full reward," and such assurances should certainly urge every believer to strive to secure for himself a glorious destiny. Such degrees are most reasonable, for a diversity of degrees exists in the whole order of creation, in the firmament above us (to which Paul appeals: "There is one glory of the Sun and another glory of the Moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory," 1 Cor. 15 : 41); in the world around us; in the angelic hosts; in the Church as constituted. (Comp. e.g. Lange's Com., Heb. 4 : 1-10, Doc. 5.) It is perhaps in view of this that the inheritance (e.g. Acts 26 : 18; Coms. loci) is designated a "lot" (e.g. Dan. 12 : 13), and that believers are exhorted (Rev. 3 : 11) to be careful "that no man take thy crown" (for they are limited in number). Graff ("Greybeard") in his "Lay Sermons," No. 6, truly observes that "the present or ecclesiastical dispensation may therefore be said to be allotted to the development of Christ's aristocracy, the nobility of His Kingdom, the ruling class in the world to come." After urging that humility precedes exaltation, he says: "If Christians were not forgetful of the distinguished honors which await them in the future, they would be less concerned about the honors and emoluments of the present." Pregnant words; but, alas, how few heed the lesson imparted. In No. 13 he has some thoughtful words on "the Reward of Good Works that is superadded to Salvation," in which occurs the following sentence : " And although the literature of the Church abounds in ' crowns for the departed,' it is not improbable that there will be many crownless heads on the day when the Lord shall appear to receive them, inasmuch as the three crowns (whatever they may typify) designated in the Scriptures, are mentioned in each case as the reward of some special service or merit. (The ' crown of righteousness ' to those that ' love His appearing ;' the ' crown of glory ' to those who feed the flock of Christ willingly, etc. ; the ' crown of life ' to those who endure temptation and persecution.") Whatever may be thought of this attempted distinction of crowns, the idea of loss, of simple salvation, is a correct one, as e.g. evidenced by the apostles' teaching in 1 Cor. 3 : 8-15. The principle of being thus rewarded for enduring hardship, self-denial, duty, etc., for Jesus' sake is distinctly recognized by Jesus, e.g. when He addressed His disciples, prefacing the " And I appoint unto you a kingdom," etc. by the declaration, giving a reason for the same : " Ye are they which have continued with Me in my (trials) temptations," Luke 22 : 28, 29. The unspokeable honor thus conferred explains why the demands of God in reference to supreme love to Him, unreserved surrender to His Will, etc., are, as required in this dispensation, not fanatical requirements (as unbelief suggests), but essential in view of qualifying the saints for this rulership. Hence the Scriptures inform us that we should receive our trials and even tribulation joyfully, because if we endure the testing, these things shall give us a fitness for the special honor of kingship and priesthood.

Obs. 11. This exaltation to a joint Theocratic rulership with David's Son is an honor so unspeakably great that it should most deeply affect the heart of the believer. To be associated with the "King of kings," to be enthroned with the Mighty One, to be a Ruler with such an august Personage, this, indeed, is dignity and grandeur far beyond that ever attained by mortal monarch. Made Christ-like through the power of the resurrection, with angelic power and more than angelic glory in virtue of relationship to Jesus, they "shall shine as the brightness of the firmament and as the stars forever and ever (Dan. 12 : 3), or "as the sun in the Kingdom of their Father (Matt. 13 : 43). So great is this honor and so productive of happiness, that the Spirit employs the most striking figures to indicate the same. They are "My jewels" (Mal. 3 : 17) i.e. God's own peculiar, prized treasure ; they "come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy" (Isa. 35 : 10) ; they shall "be glad also with exceeding joy" (1 Pet. 4 : 13) ; they shall have "in Thy presence fulness of joy and at Thy right hand (place of authority) pleasures forever more" (Ps. 16 : 11). The least in this body of kings and priests is far greater than John the Baptist, Matt. 11 : 11, for then will be verified the declaration, Ps. 91 : 11 : "I will set him on high, because he hath known My name." It is "a manifestation of the sons of God," a multitude of royal personages, forming the ruling power of an earth-wide dominion ; the very number of them, all arrayed in magnificence, swelling the splendor of the court of the great King, thus presenting a scene of glory that shall be the praise of the world. The very services rendered by these kings and priests aid materially to exalt and endear them to the nations over whom they rule ; for not only their authority shall be recognized, but their love, favor, and friendship. Royalty, however splendid, when distant, cold, and heartless, loses its attractions, but when brought near to the masses for purposes of beneficence, immensely augments them. The results, too, of their rule will augment their exaltation in the eyes of the nations. Greatness in Sovereign power is measured by the degree of success and the stability attained ; this measure applied to the reign of the saints only evinces the more the grandeur of a reign which fills the nations with peace, plenty, and happiness, and the whole earth with the worship and the glory of the Lord. Each individual king now realizes—whatever his station—that (Prov. 4 : 8, 9) “wisdom shall bring thee honor,” and “a crown of glory shall she deliver thee.” And then shall the prediction of Ps. 89 : 15, 16, 17 be abundantly fulfilled, taking Dr. Clarke’s translation : “Oh, the blessedness of that people that know the joyful sound (i.e. the sound of the trumpet on the morning of the Jubilee). They shall walk vigorously in the light of Thy countenance. In Thy name shall they exult all that day (viz., time of jubilee), and in Thy righteousness shall they be exalted,” etc. (See Ps. 68 : 13.)<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The reader’s attention is directed to several forcibly written discourses by Hon. Gerard T. Noel in his Brief Inquiry into the Prospects of the Church of Christ, upon this subject. His views are so much in accord with those presented, that an extract or two will be acceptable. “The higher management and control of the world will be in the hands, first of Christ Himself, and under Him, in the hands of men—of men, once like the mortal sojourners they govern, but now glorified like their Lord, and living amid their mortal kindred, as benefactors, princes, and kings. It is not needful to suppose their presence to be always apparent to their happy subjects; but still their visible manifestations to be sufficiently frequent, to sustain the mutual allegiance and concord of mankind; to cheer the intercourse of life; and to perpetuate an abiding recognition of their intense benevolence and their sovereign authority,” (ch. 8). He makes (ch. 9) a beautiful suggestion : “Is it not a reasonable anticipation, that in the future scenes of predicted glory it may be within the power of the glorified saints still to mingle invisibly amid the mortal sojourners of earth; sometimes to veil the radiance with which they will be clothed? And thus when the earth shall be at rest, the voice of men be silent, and strife be hushed in the land, it may be permitted to these beneficent immortals, though reigning in the world, to lay aside their ensign of power, and to cheer some peaceful home of virtue and of loveliness with the intercourse of a kindness that shall only seem kindred to its own.” Let the reader compare our doctrine of this reign, thus making the saints, while highly exalted, engaged in the most noble work in behalf of the race, with that shadowy, intangible, ethereal theory now so prevailing in the church. Or, if he pleases, in view of our being called “so credulous,” let him compare it with Figuiers’s “Quintessential Sun Beings” and such expressions as “a throne of fire must be the throne of souls,” etc., alluding to their floating in the sun’s fiery element, and see who is the most credulous. Dr. J. G. Schmucker (Expos. Rev.), on Rev. 20 : 4-6, makes the saints have “a familiar and perhaps daily intercourse” with mortal men, as “the Lord’s ministers and agents in the administration of His government”—so many others.

<sup>2</sup> Let the reader contrast the sublime destiny of the believer, as given by unlettered prophets and fishermen, with that presented by unbelieving learned men of the past and present day. Thus e.g. ponder this exalted position of kingship and priesthood, so correspondent with what the heart and reason desires, with the conclusions of Prof. Tyndall’s Inaugural Address, which, cleaving to a gross materialistic religion, expresses the hope that “you and I, like streaks of morning cloud, shall have melted into the infinite azure of the past.” What a contrast! So, also, compare our view with the vague, indefinite, spiritualistic views so prevalent and see the great difference. Here we have something substantial, real, for faith to see and hope to grasp, founded, not on the vain conjectures of man, but on the oath-bound covenants of God and His precious promises, which are “Yea and Amen.” Our doctrine does not present the saint in his future inheritance as subject to a blind fate, or the unswerving forces of nature, or resolving back into original elements through natural causes, or uniting with the Supreme in some Pantheistic union, or taken away from his forfeited inheritance to unknown regions, or being enshrouded in a mystical grandeur and glory that no one can comprehend, etc., but it presents him in a definite inheritance, in a well-known Kingdom, in a position so accurately described, that we behold him sustaining an intelligent, religious, social, and civil relationship with the Supreme Intelligence and Ruler, being evermore a blessed, exalted co-worker with God and His Christ.

Obs. 12. As charged by Jesus Himself, who saw the destined honor of His brethren, we should despise none of God’s little ones. Every believer, who runs the race successfully, is heir to a kingdom, heir to a substantial kingship. He is a prince in his minority, although perhaps struggling with poverty and without owning a foot of land, or house to shelter himself and family. He may be despised and overlooked by the rich, or by his neighbors, and yet he is destined to a position far higher and more honorable than that occupied by the proudest, richest, greatest monarch that ever lived. This is sober truth based upon precious promises that God intends to fulfil. That God now regards the poor Christian as far superior to a wicked king, however great and noble of birth, is apparent from Eccl. 4 : 13, 14. 'This passage cannot be appreciated unless we understand "the prison" alluded to as referring to the grave (shown to be a scriptural usage in Props. on the Resurrection). "Better is a poor and a wise child (being pious) than an old and foolish king who will no more be admonished (i.e. remains wicked). For out of prison (i.e. the grave) He cometh to reign (according to promise); whereas also he that is born in His Kingdom becometh poor." At least, the pious, although not born to an earthly Kingdom, shall, by virtue of their union with Christ, inherit a Kingdom after the resurrection, while a wicked king, born to a kingdom, shall lose his crown; for, rejecting the one tendered to him, he shall never obtain another. From the testimony of the Word we learn that God will gather these princes and kings more from the ranks of the poor and the ignorant than from those of the rich, mighty, and worldly wise, simply because the former are more disposed to receive and obey the truth than the latter. All are equally invited, and many rich, learned, etc., have gladly availed themselves of the distinguishing privilege thus accorded to us, above those who shall follow us, in succeeding dispensations, of becoming heirs of such an inheritance.

Some, who would be unwilling to express language indicative of the spirit which actuates them, almost act like the Sumatran (Marsden's Hist. of Sumatra, p. 289) who observed that the poor could not expect immortal life, "that only great men went to the skies; how should poor men find admittance there?" According to Müller and others, some nations assign the condition of man in the future to his rank here and not to his conduct. The old anecdote of the Spanish grandee who expected to enter heaven on account of the merit of birth, has really had its counterparts. These priests and kings are not merely taken from the earthly kings of the past, however lauded and eulogized by State churches and court preachers (comp. Thackeray's scathing and merited remarks respecting the pulpit flatteries on George the Second), but from believers, whatever their station. Dr. Macleod (Memoirs, vol. 1, p. 329) well appreciated this distinction when beholding Christ and heirship in the believing poor, he expressed himself "to see kings and queens shining through their poor raiment." We are reminded of some of the last utterances, as given in his "Ecclesiastes," as follows: "Know then, O Christian! thy true dignity, not acquired by merit, but given thee from heaven. I am speaking to thee, whether thou art a man or a woman, young or old, rich or poor, noble or ignoble, a king, a peasant, or a weaver; and I tell thee, whoever thou art, if thou art born again in Christ, thou art a king! thou art a priest! thou art a saint! thou art the temple of the living God! Dost thou gaze in wonder at a temple of marble shining with gems and gold? Thou art a temple more precious than this! Dost thou regard as sacred the temple that Bishops have consecrated! Thou art more sacred still."

Obs. 13. The wicked shall see the glory and feel the authority of these saints. This is abundantly evident from the action of these saints at the Second Advent, ruling the nations with a rod of iron, etc. It is unnecessary to repeat what has been made clear under other propositions, and we only refer to this again to call the reader's attention to the effect that it will produce upon the wicked. Thus, e.g. in Ps. 112 : 9, 10, when the horn of the righteous is exalted with honor, "the wicked shall see it and be grieved, he shall gnash with his teeth," etc. The wicked shall see this at the beginning of the Millennial era and again at its close. It will be a dreadful sight to them to see the saints thus honored with power, riches, dominion, and glory—triumphant heirs with Christ—and themselves defeated in their wickedness, fallen under Almighty power, trembling at the outpouring of the long-delayed wrath of the Lamb, and filled with forebodings of an impending and inevitable doom. No wonder the Spirit, all-foreknowing, tells us that they will “gnash with their teeth,” for agony and despair with deep, untold remorse must be theirs when they contrast the exaltation of saints with their own unhappy one, and then remember that just such honor and blessedness and rank was freely, lovingly, and most urgently pressed upon them, but they—loving evil rather than good—foolishly and even contemptuously refused it.

It is hard to bear the contempt, scorn, and derision so lavishly heaped upon Christianity, and which shall finally culminate in another dreadful persecution of believers. But the time is coming when all this will be changed. When the stations are assigned, and the saints “execute the judgment written,” then will appear God’s estimate of men and the world’s estimate of the followers of Jesus. Now the world, irrespective of religion, or even moral character, exalts, in view simply of great talent or intellect, a Goethe or Byron, and a host of others, including military chieftains, statesmen, etc., far above the Christian. But then the weakest believer, brother to Jesus, having not been ashamed to confess and obey Him, shall stand immensely higher; for the King of kings will acknowledge and honor them, while those immoral, irreligious, unbelieving favorites of the world will be rejected as utterly unworthy of favor and blessing. Men shall and must reap as they have sowed, and the harvest will bring either blessing or wrath.

Obs. 14. One grand cause of the amazing power of these kings and priests has already been explained under our repeated references to the supernatural. They shall receive the promised Baptism of the Holy Ghost and Fire (Prop. 171). It is for this reason that Jesus promised His disciples that they should perform greater works than He had done while on earth; and that all things that they would ask for would be granted, etc. This has never yet been realized. There was a partial fulfilment in the case of the apostles and their contemporaries, but even then their works did not exceed the miraculous power exerted by the Master. It is a mere begging of the question to say that, although miraculous power has ceased, greater power is really given, because charity, etc., is rather to be chosen, according to the apostles, as a more excellent gift. For, if the greater gifts are thus given, as alleged, why should not the lesser be witnessed? The truth is, that the more excellent gifts are such because they relate to, and are an indication of, moral character, while miraculous power, intrusted to believers, is not exclusively dependent upon spiritual attainments, but can be conferred independently of them. The weakest as well as the strongest can exert the power, if communicated. But the time is coming when this same miraculous power shall be given to those who have made themselves worthy of it in a higher degree than ever yet experienced—those spiritual attainments forming the ground of conference—for Christ’s promises are all true and will be verified. The inchoate fulfilment is evidence of the more ample one when the apostles and believers inherit the Kingdom. This feature explains, therefore, that matchless and irresistible power with which they stand invested at their manifestation.

This, aside from the supernatural power lodged in the Supreme Ruler, explains the triumphant predictions of the prophets respecting the irresistible progress of the Kingdōm in overcoming all enemies, and obtaining universal dominion. Those Kings are invulnerable, being immortal, and clothed with such a baptism they can readily execute the commands of their King. Having the gift of tongues, they can express the Will of the Majesty, and possessing the requisite power duly enforce the same. The perfection of the Rulers, their complete adaptedness to the positions assigned, will be fully recognized. Even their personal appearance, fashioned after the Christ, will secure immediats reverence, for, Ps. 68 : 13, "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold." Being equal to the angels that "excel in strength," a host like Sennacherib's can offer no resistance of moment. These rulers are "raised in glory and power," with the likeness of the mighty Elder Brother impressed upon each one, so that to behold one of them is to see a representative of the glorified King Jesus. The flashing name of the Saviour in their foreheads, the splendor of their raiment, the beauty of their appearance, the multitude of them, the supernatural manifested in action—all glorifies the Head and impresses the nations with awe and reverence.

Obs. 15. God's equity is vindicated by this reign of the saints. We do not now allude to the restoration of forfeited blessings, for this has been mentioned before, but to the simple fact that the very place, here on earth, which was the scene of the saint's pilgrimage, the Church's struggle, the martyr's suffering, the believer's fight of faith under trial, shall become the witness of the saint's elevation, the Church's honor, the martyr's triumph, the believer's reign. God's justice and grace has crowned all with the kingship and priesthood, thus vindicating His assurances of ultimate uplifting in the very earth where humiliation was experienced in reliance upon His Word. It is no small thing that the saints shall be kings where they once were poor and needy ; that they shall be happy Princes where once they suffered ; that they shall be rejoicing Nobles where once they sorely wept and prayed ; and triumphant Rulers where once they were tempted, tried, persecuted, and afflicted. When this reigning is thus experienced, how will God's ways be vindicated before the enraptured saints and an astonished world.

Then a thousand promises, but imperfectly realized now, will be most amply verified. Having sought and found the Kingdom of God (Matt. 7 : 33), "all things" shall be added, being made (Matt. 24 : 47), "ruler over all His goods." Prov. 8 : 18-21, "Riches and honor are with me ; yea, durable riches, and righteousness. My fruit is better than gold, yea, than fine gold ; and my revenue than choice silver. I lead in the way of righteousness, in the midst of the paths of judgment : that I may cause those who love me to inherit substance ; and I will fill their treasures." Prov. 22 : 4, "The reward of humility and the fear of the Lord are riches and honor and life." The Saviour's love and joy will be to make His own supremely happy, so that He may be glorified in them. As earthly courts, with their officials, splendor, and wealth, reflect the greatness and grandeur of the monarch, so, but far above the power of description, will the court of the Messiah, with its associated rulers, its splendor, its riches, reflect the greater glory of "the Prince of the kings of the earth."

Obs. 16. Indeed, this subject serves to throw light on the difficult subject of Divine Providence. For it indicates that evil cannot, and will not, ultimately triumph ; its limits are definitely fixed. Owing to the proposed Theocracy being postponed until a number of chosen ones are gathered, and in view of these elect ones being tested in order to develop the character required by their subsequent Theocratic relationship, evil is allowed to the righteous as a source of trial to qualify them for their future positions, while prosperity and domination is given to the wicked for a time only, and then the triumph of the latter shall forever cease. The believer amid evil is sustained by the consciousness of Divine approval, the adaptation of Divine truth to his moral wants, the habit of devotion and its receptive action, the implantation and cultivation of Christian graces, and the well-grounded hope, corroborated by experiences, that all things work for his ultimate good. The final restoration of the Theocracy with its blessed results vindicates the present ordering instituted as a suitable preparatory state and discipline.

Then what new light, what intensity of meaning, will be thrown on numerous encouraging promises of Scripture. When "the exceeding and eternal weight of glory" is realized, then how vividly will appear such declarations as Peter's, 1 Pet. 1 : 4-13, or Paul's, Rom. 8 : 17, 18, 23-39 ; 2 Cor. 4 : 17, 18. The dark Providences of the past will shine forth, illuminated by the end purposed. Now much is perplexing and trying to our faith, but then the value of this disciplinary dispensation will be clearly, by actual experience, appreciated. The divine ordering, in the precious fruitage exhibited, will be fully vindicated.

Obs. 17. This reign of the saints, with its exalted and unending results, in such a Theocratic relationship, affords an additional answer to the astronomical objection of Paine and others. Aside from the questions of moral and civil government, the honor, etc., of God thus upheld, the interest which He manifests in intelligent creatures (His own workmanship), etc., which it fully meets, the happiness, immortality, employment, and Divine union which these kings enjoy—eternally, too—indicates that how-over great the condescension and grace of God in procuring it, this salvation exemplified in this form is, according to our highest and noblest conceptions, worthy of the Almighty, redounding to His praise and glory. It is a wonderful adaptation to existing circumstances, bringing forth a display of Divine attributes and a condescension upon the part of the Almighty, which lifts humanity into the sphere of the Divine.

Again we suggest that glorified saints may visit, owing to their construction (like unto angels) and relationship to the Divine (Christlike), other worlds ; this is only repeating what many Christian divines have taught, and what many now teach in their progressive theories. While the special sphere of the ruler is here on the earth, yet we need not limit his constant attendance to this planet. He may, for aught we know, tell the wondrous story of the Father's mercy and Saviour's love, of man's fall and restoration, to the inhabitants of other worlds. The relationship that this world, now broken by sin, sustains to others will, as the descending and ascending angels show, be restored again. Let us not be accused of extravagance, for such a view is sustained by strict analogy and intimations. To test the power of credence, let the student endeavor to believe what Figuiet (ch. 13, The To-morrow of Death) presents under the garb of science, viz., that "the Solar Rays are Emanations of Spiritual Beings who dwell in the Sun." It certainly takes faith to accept of these "Emanations of the Souls of the Sun people," and thus virtually return to the ancient Sun reverence. To have beings floating about in "a gaseous incandescent mass or a globe of matter in a state of fusion, surrounded by an atmosphere of burning gas," requires an amount of reasoning and faith which the weakness of Biblical faith does not demand at our hands. This reminds us that Figuiet and others say that Christianity cannot explain what becomes of infants. They are mistaken ; for the extreme ultra views of some theologians do not constitute the Bible truth. We need not resort to Figuiet's successive re-incarnations. They return with the ransomed at the resurrection (Jer. 31 : 15-17), not being condemned on account of sin, and being regarded worthy of the Kingdom. Not having sustained a probation to develop character, nothing special is said respecting their future position, leaving it for the future to determine their position, both in reference to the rulers and the nations of the earth. They too will be supremely happy and blessed in Redemption.

Obs. 18. The notion that the kingly office of Christ is continued and perpetuated in the ministry is shown to be erroneous. To make out a fulfilment of kingship and priesthood, as promised, and to exalt the ministry,

Popery has incorporated this feature, which is also characteristic of some portions of Protestantism inclined, more or less, to hierarchical tendencies. The doctrine of the Kingdom, of the covenanted Messianic reign and that of the saints, is utterly opposed to such unscriptural deductions, making a kingly sacerdotal caste in the Church. The early Church, and Millennarians ever since, has been against such extravagant and injurious assumptions. Hence it is that Neander and other Church historians, when tracing the rise and progress of those lofty sacerdotal claims, this sad change from a church equality grounded on a common relation to Christ to a separate distinct mediatory royal priesthood, pass by the advocates of our doctrine, and clearly show that this change arose through the opposers of Chiliaism. In the very nature of the case, our doctrine could not encourage such usurpations of position and authority, when it distinctly ascribed the fulfilment of all such promises to the Second Advent of Christ in a still higher sense.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand, this pre-determined rulership indicates how we ought to regard the efforts of a class who, to bring about the promised Millennial glory, dream of a period of time when all persons shall be forced in an equality of position, rank, and possessions. This Kingdom and reign—the result of God's wisdom and His choice as the best adapted for the world—show that it is a wild theory of ignorance (although presented in attractive garb), arising from an overlooking of the present depravity of man and of the ultimate Divine purpose in elevating humanity.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Popery, not satisfied with its claims of kingly priesthood exerted here on earth in the present dispensation, even has the absurdity of pretending by acts of canonization to exalt the position of deceased saints, if not in heaven, at least on earth. Looking at the life of Ignatius Loyola (Nicolini's Hist. of the Jesuits, p. 263), we find him represented in such regal style that only Popes like St. Peter, Emperors like the Virgin Mary, and Sovereign Monarchs like God the Father and Jesus Christ, "enjoyed the bliss of seeing him." Alas, what ignorance of Scripture is thus manifested.

<sup>2</sup> The time of the Second Advent is the period of reigning, and not before. Thus e.g. Lange, on the Parable of the Pounds (Com. loci), declares that the faithful ones "expect their share in the government of the world, not before, but only after the personal return of the Lord" (so comp. Lange on Matt. 19 : 28 ; Matt. 25 : 21, etc.). Bh. Butler (Memoirs, p. 298) says : "Since they (Christians) are not already invested with that degree of glory that will be communicated to them, they could not, under the notion of members of that kingdom, claim any earthly dominion before the glorious reign of Christ shall commence, when they shall indeed reign with Him upon the earth."

Obs. 19. It has been supposed (as e.g. Noel in Brief Inquiry, ch. 8) that Deut. 32 : 8, 9 (of which the Sep. gives the following : "When He separated the nations, He set the bounds of the people according to the number of the angels") compared with Heb. 2 : 5, and the intimations of present angelic rule and interference, as given by Daniel (see Barnes on Dan. 10 : 13), etc., is "a type and model of the sovereignties of the elect Church." His idea is, that the world is now in a measure controlled by angels, but the world to come is to be controlled by the glorified saints. Under such Scripture there may be an allusion to this future rulership of the saints, even to the extent intimated, viz., that the stations, etc., were determined in the division and settlements of the nations. At least, considering the foreknowledge of the Almighty, and that, as in the case of the Jewish nation in its tribal divisions and settlement such divisions occurred, through His overruling Providence, there is nothing in such a supposition but what magnifies God's knowledge.

The perpetuity of the reign of the saints is dependent upon the perpetuity of Christ's reign, which is examined in detail under Prop. 159. Briefly, it may be said that the Scriptures are positive in asserting a never-ending reign, for e.g. (Dan. 7) they "shall possess the Kingdom forever, even forever and ever," "whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom," etc. The glory, including associated rank with Jesus, which they receive at the Second Advent, is an everlasting glory. It is this eternal nature of their union with Jesus in Theocratic ordering, that immeasurably enhances the preciousness, the inestimable worth, of this kingship and priesthood. The splendid gifts coming from the loving heart of the King of kings will never, no never be withdrawn, for we then enter "into the everlasting Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." Prov. 3 : 16 will ever be verified respecting the results of wisdom : "Length of days is in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor ;" and therefore, "the fulness of joy in His presence and the pleasures forever more at His right hand" (Ps. 16 : 11), which Jesus gives to His believing brethren, shall never suffer the least diminution, but, on the other hand, expand and enlarge in proportion as they delight themselves in doing His Will, and in experiencing the gratification of seeing "the increase of His government" prospering through their instrumentality.

Obs. 20. It would be exceedingly interesting to give the statements of others concerning this Kingship, but, out of the large number, we have only space for a few by way of illustration. Rothe (Dogmatic, p. 2, p. 60), referring to "the Chiliastic Kingdom," says : "Especially does Paul describe it as a reigning of believers 'together with Christ.' The Apoc. exhibits this co-regency as the chief element of blessedness in the Chiliastic Kingdom. The redeemed reign with Christ, sit on His throne, have power over the nations, and participate in the destruction of the enemies of their Lord. Priests and kings, they receive white robes, garments of light, and in these walk about with the Redeemer. They obtain the hidden manna, eat of the Tree of Life, wear the crown, and possess the white stone with the new name, which none know but they who have it. They are pillars in the temple of God to go out no more, and over them the second death has no power." Richter's Erklärte Haus Bibel, Tom. 6, p. 1134, remarks : "They (of the first resurrection) shall, thereby, at the same time, rule as kings with Christ, according to Divine right. But where do they dwell, and where do they exercise their office? Not indeed any more secluded in heaven, and hid in God, but openly manifested, because then, for them, heaven is upon earth and earth is heaven. They are like the Risen and Glorified Saviour, with a spiritual body, no more bound to the limits of space. They reign and minister with Christ, because Christ Himself shall then be openly the King-Priest over the whole earth (1 Cor. 15 : 24; Ps. 47; Ps. 72; Isa. 65 : 17). As certainly as Christ, the Risen One, was among the not yet risen, during forty days, so certainly shall the many who are risen with Him be, like Him, among those who are not raised." Birks (Lects. during Lent, p. 187) says : "The scene of the martyr's sufferings shall witness their exaltation. They who have been ejected outcasts in a world of rebels shall be crowned with honor and dominion over a world redeemed from the fall. The glorious equity of God shall thus be no less conspicuous than the triumph of His grace ; and men and angels shall join in that adoring song : 'Great and marvellous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty ; just and true are Thy ways, O Thou King of saints !'"

Hundreds of similar declarations, ancient and modern, could readily be given, expressive of the same faith and hope. It is gratifying to think that the acquaintance of such, whose testimony has been so cheering, shall be formed at this period, and that we shall hear from their own lips the praise flowing from actual realization. The history that we have given of the Pre-Mill. doctrine, sufficiently indicates the abundance of material from which we could multiply quotations. We, however, only append a few more, interesting on account of the reference to passages of Scripture. Dr. Schmucker (On Rev. ch. 20 : 4-8, vol. 2, p. 352) correctly says : "The Lord here invests those worthy and qualified from among His combatants with royal authority to govern the different nations, kingdoms, countries, and States as His viceroys, under His superintendence and direction. This is indicated by the thrones, upon which they seated themselves to execute krima, temporal judgment, against the disobedient," etc. (Comp. Fausset's comment on same passage.) We insist upon it that the only correct view in reference to this reign, is that which assigns to it both a religious and civil rule, because in a restored Theocracy the religious and the civil, the Church and the State, are united. Able writers, under the influence of a spiritual Church-Kingdom theory, that warps their interpretation, fall into mistakes, showing that they do not correctly apprehend the covenanted and predicted Kingdom that is to take the place and sway of the preceding world empires. Thus e.g. so excellent an author as Olshausen, yet more or less under a mystical influence, falls into an error while in the act of an attempted correction of Hase (in his Life of Jesus, p. 84 seq.). The latter correctly applies the promise of reigning (however he fails to locate the fulfilment) to a political or civil rule as entertained by the Jews (in a lower sense than that given by the prophets) in reference to the Messiah's Kingdom. Olshausen remarks (foot-note, Com. vol. 2, p. 117, Matt. 19 : 28—with which compare his concessions on ch. 20 : 20, 21) : "The rule of the apostles is no political one, but purely spiritual ; the receiving of earthly blessings is not external, but the possession of them in Christian love, inasmuch as the very peculiarity of the Kingdom of God consists in the abolition of all exclusive possessions on the part of the individual, and the giving of the whole to each." While insisting upon the spirituality and blessing to all connected with this Kingdom, yet the fallacy of such a one-sided view is easily set aside by a few considerations. Did not the ancient Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom include political rulership, and, if restored, as covenanted and predicted, must it not embrace the same? Will not the restored Jewish nation and spared Gentile nations be, of necessity, in order to meet the requirements of prediction, under political rule? If the dominion and sovereignty of the world, over all people, is given to the saints, must it not include the civil? Does the Kingdom of God abolish individual exclusive possession, even in crown, station, reward, and glorification received? Must not each one receive and retain the allotted position and honor, however it may be employed for the benefit of the whole? If "the receiving of earthly blessings is not external," how do we know that they are received, for life, health, riches, honor—ten thousand things—consecrated as they may be by Christian love, are real, external? Our argument, under numerous propositions, meets such applications and enforces our position, which is sustained by the expressed opinions of numerous able Pre-Mill. writers.

PROPOSITION 155. This Kingdom exhibits Jesus, not only as the King, but as "the Priest."

A Theocracy, in the very nature of its government, requires a priesthood to minister in sacred things. It is a Kingdom in which the Church and the State are united, and hence both are represented in the officials. In the restored Theocracy this priesthood is represented differently from that one once connected with it. The High-Priest and the king were separate personages, but to preserve unity in the coming Theocracy, the priesthood and kingship are united in the same Person. Hence, the Messiah is designated a Priest as well as a King in His official relationship as the Theocratic Head.

Obs. 1. The High-Priest was God's representative on earth. If any grave question affecting the interest of the Theocracy was to be decided, he was the one who obtained an immediate decision from Jehovah. In the restored Theocracy as Priest and King, Son of David and Son of God, are the same person, all important questions, requiring an answer, are decided by Himself. God and man are in union, and represented by this High-Priest. (Comp. Props. 81, 199, 200.)

Obs. 2. The Scriptures, when speaking of the priesthood of the Messiah, makes it something that shall evermore continue. Thus in Heb. 7 : 21-25 we read : "The Lord sware and will not repent, Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." "But this (Priest), because He continueth forever, hath an unchangeable priesthood. Wherefore, He is able also to save them to the uttermost (marg. read evermore ; some critics, forever) that come unto God by Him, seeing that He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (comp. ch. 5 : 6, 10 and 6 : 10 ; Ps. 110 : 4). Here the Priesthood of Jesus is inseparably connected with the continuance of Jesus Himself, just as our whole argument demands.

Our opponents endeavor to limit this priesthood to the present dispensation in order to avoid our Pre-Millennial doctrine of the continuance of the saving work of the Christ after His Sec. Advent. They persistently cling to the Popish view of limiting the capability of receiving salvation to this dispensation alone (hence confining salvation exclusively to those of this and former ones), asserting in the most positive terms that the priesthood of Jesus will come to an end at the close of this age when the harvest and vintage occur. A glance at the works opposed to us shows that this is a favorite and oft-repeated assertion. The chapters most misleading and sophistical in the work of Rev. Dr. D. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming), most eminently calculated to darken the truth, and produce the predicted faithless state in discerning the Divine Purpose, are those relating to the completeness of the Church at the Sec. Advent, the ending of the work of the Holy Spirit, the cessation of the priesthood or intercession of Jesus for saving purposes, and the declaration that the object of the Scriptures is exhausted by the Coming of Christ. How these propositions are based on mere inferences has been shown by various writers (Lord and others), and it is not necessary to repeat the answers thus given, seeing that each objection is fairly and adequately met in the present work under appropriate headings. Our argument contends for the completeness of the church (forming "the married wife" in contrast to "the barren women," comp. Prop. 118), but proves that this very Church, thus completed and perfected, is employed in Saving work in the age to come; for a vast host, including the restored Jewish nation and spared Gentile nations, are also to be redeemed, etc. The Church of "the first-born," "the first-fruits," implies this distinctive feature, and by no means excludes salvation from others who may follow, because two classes of passages have to be considered; first, those relating to completeness, and second, what this body, after being made complete, is to perform. The ceasing of the work of the Spirit, of intercession for saving purposes, is refuted by the extraordinary Baptism of the Spirit then (Prop. 171) to be experienced, and by "the unchangeable priesthood" of Jesus, while the extraordinary statement that "Christ's Sec. Coming will exhaust the object of the Scriptures" is utterly unworthy of serious refutation in the light of covenant, prophecy and promise. His Coming again is to amply fulfil and not exhaust the Scriptures, to bring in and perpetuate the everlasting Kingdom as revealed in them.

Obs. 3. This Priesthood is a royal one, i.e. it is firmly, inseparably united to His royalty. Hence Zech. 6 : 13 says of the Messiah: "He shall sit and rule upon His throne, and He shall be a Priest upon His throne." When this Messianic throne is established, has been abundantly shown and proven under various Propositions (comp e.g. Prop. 83, 122, 131, etc.). His covenanted (Prop. 49) throne is established at His Sec. Advent, at which time He sits on His throne, bears rule, and exhibits Himself on that throne as the "great High-Priest." Therefore in Ps. 110, when "the rod of His strength shall come out of Zion," He shall "rule in the midst of His enemies," "strike through kings in the day of His wrath," "judge among the heathen," "wound the heads over many countries," have a "willing" and "holy people" "in the day of His power," and in the morning (all of which is distinctively related to His Sec. Advent), then, at that time, the priesthood is also manifested, for then is to be fully verified: "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec," or, as some render it, "A priest for the ages (to come) after the order (manner) of Melchisedec," i.e. a king-priest.

The pregnant words of Fairbairn (Typol., vol. 1, p. 264) are worthy of notice: "Melchisedec already, in a measure, possessed what Abraham still hoped for—he reigned where Abraham's seed were destined to reign, and exercised a priesthood, which in future generations was to be committed to them." Now, apply this to the distinguished "Seed," as Scripture does, and Melchisedec becomes highly typical of Christ's reigning and priesthood united in the same person and the same capitol. Therefore, Kurtz's (Sac. His., p. 75) remarks are better; after referring to Jesus as "a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec," and calling Him, therefore, "the eternal Priest-King in the city of the great King," adds: "When the priesthood of Abraham shall have been manifested in Aaron and his royal rank in David, and when both features, in union, shall have been manifested in their most complete form in Christ, the future will be seen to be infinitely more glorious and perfect than the present time." It is strange that, notwithstanding the plain declarations that we hold to an eternal priesthood of the Christ, and our quotations favoring the same, a writer in the Princeton Repository, January, 1853, has the unfairness to say that we only make Jesus a king after His Sec. Advent and no priest; declaring that we teach "that the present is the priestly age of Christ, the age yet to come, before entering upon which He will have finished the work of intercession, is His kingly age." See the scathing and well-merited rebuke that the article received from D. N. Lord in the Lit. and Theol. Journal. The writer foists upon us a doctrine that we reject, and which forms an important element (comp. Dr. Brown's Christ's Sec. Com.) of his own system, and is partially (at least) held by some followers of Miller, the Seventh-Day Adventists, and others.

Obs. 4. Now, He is a Priest (Heb. 8 : 1) on the Father's throne, and when He is on His own throne (as David's Son, Rev. 3 : 21) He continues Priest, simply because His great sacrificial act, performed once for all, ever stamps Him as a Priest—a successful and acknowledged High-Priest. Gratitude, love, reverence, honor, blessing, salvation—all regard Him as the Priest, and so long as these endure the priesthood of Jesus remains a reality. When He tendered His priceless offering, when He ascended to heaven and interceded for man, this only indicates that He is the worthy Priest who shall come again—for His work as Priest ever remains, and is inseparably connected with His official station. As Priest He secures for us (Heb. 9 : 12) “eternal redemption” and not a mere temporary deliverance, and, therefore, it becomes this Priest, as such, and thus recognized, ever to remain in immediate relationship with this redemption.

The peculiar views of the Seventh-Day Adventists and a few others, respecting the cleansing of the sanctuary after 2300 years (which they make the heavenly, and now in progress), we have met in another place. Aside from the representations (Heb. 8 : 2 ; 9 : 11-14 ; 10 : 12-14, 19, 20 ; etc.) that an atonement has been made and perfected, that Jesus has already entered the most holy place for us, etc., it is sufficient to point out the incorrectness of such a view, from the fact that it incorporates, as an essential factor to sustain it, the notion that when this alleged act of atonement is finished, then also the priestly office of Jesus ceases. This, as we show, is opposed to the most express declarations of an ever-abiding priesthood. So also the peculiar views incorporated with the above respecting the Ark of the Covenant or Testimony, are abundantly met and answered by considering the typical nature of the same, and its contents, and how they are fully mated in Jesus, in the divine-human, pardon in Him, “the end of the law,” magnifying the law, the righteousness of God in Him, etc., without taking from Him one of the most honorable and distinguishing offices pertaining to Him personally.

Obs. 5. Therefore, the continuity of His priesthood is identified with the perpetuity of His own existence (Heb. 7 : 24, 25) : “But this man (Jesus) because He continueth ever (Gr. remains forever) hath an unchangeable priesthood.” “He ever liveth to make intercession.” It cannot be taken from Him and given to others, but as long as He exists, so long does the priesthood pertain to Him. He alone stands forth in all succeeding ages as the High-Priest. In an epistle specially devoted to exhibit “the unchangeable priesthood” of Jesus, it is expressly declared (Heb. 13 : 8) : “Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever.”

This permanency of Jesus is exceedingly precious to the believer, opening up before him an eternal inheritance secured by co-heirship with Him. He changes not ; this is the uniform teaching of Scripture on the subject. Ages may pass, changes may be introduced, revelations may be given and extended, etc., but Jesus will ever remain the same Prophet, Priest, and King ; and this unchangeableness presents the assurance that the kingship and priesthood inherited through Him are also ever enduring.

Obs. 6. This blessed truth is reiterated in such a way as if purposely to meet the unbelief respecting it. Thus (Heb. 7 : 15, 16) it is positively announced, “that after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest, who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life.” Barnes himself (Com. loci.) has to admit, over against his own theory, that this means : “By an authority of endless duration,” that it denotes a priesthood “unchanging in its character,” “it was enduring and perpetual as a priesthood,” but, after all, makes it such only to fit into his Post-Millennial scheme for this dispensation.

Dr. Brown, in the last ed. (1879) of Christ's Sec Coming., waives (in foot-note) the argument drawn from the locality of intercession as not necessary ; and then as to the continued priesthood of Christ has the following : “Nor do I enter into the questions which have been raised about the continuance of Christ's intercession, and in what sense, after the whole Church has been gathered and perfected. I will not be drawn into such matters." Of course not; for, if drawn in, he would have to contradict himself.

Obs. 7. This priesthood, being after the similitude of Melchisedec, is exhibited in its completeness with His kingship. Now, at His Sec. Advent He comes as King, and reigns as King; it follows, therefore, that He is also revealed as Priest. The two offices are united in the same person, and so long as the one endures the other must also remain. His Kingship is eternal (comp. Prop. 159), so likewise must be the priesthood.

Some few endeavor to date the priesthood of Jesus from His ascension to heaven, but this is incorrect, as abundantly shown in the reasoning of Hebrews, etc. For He was called before His death, He was to tender a sacrifice which was Himself, etc., so that in view of His appointment and His sacrifice for sin, He was received by the Father as a worthy, acceptable High Priest. While on earth He was Priest and King, but His priesthood and kingship were both veiled. The latter was, owing to the unrepentant state of the nation, held in abeyance; the former was only indirectly presented until the tragedy of the cross, under the enlightening interpretation of the Holy Spirit, shed a flood of light on the subject. The sacrifice was one act of this Priest; the presentation and acceptance of that sacrifice in heaven was another act; the intercession and advocacy is still another continuous one; the public exhibition of the results of His ministry is another; and the symmetrical union of all His offices publicly manifested is still another.

Obs. 8. If the saints are to be "kings and priests" in the future Kingdom (Props. 118, 153, 154), then it follows that the Elder Brother is also the same. This necessarily follows, because His brethren are co-heirs with Him to the same inheritance, honor, and glory. He is the great High-Priest, they are associated with Him as Priests. (Comp. Prop. 156.)

Obs. 9. Jesus, the Christ, ever remains "an High-Priest of good things to come" (Heb. 9 : 11), inasmuch as the Redemptive work, of which He is the Priestly-Head, shall continue after the Sec. Advent. This is seen in the finished Redemption of His brethren and in the blessings enjoyed by them; in the conversion of the Jewish nation, which obtains repentance and grace though His blood and intercession, after His Coming; in the mercy and happiness bestowed upon the spared Gentile nations after His Advent and conflict with Antichrist, which can only be predicated of His priestly influence; and in the perpetuation of the human race for saving purposes and the glory of God, which results from His continued efficiency as Mediator. He is the Priest of "the everlasting covenant," and as such He not only provides the provision for its realization, but being its "surety" He remains personally interested in the same, and secures it for us.

Obs. 10. The Theocracy is designed to secure for us all the forfeited blessings. To do this, and bring in the predicted righteousness and glory, demands the personal supervision of our High-Priest. Full and complete deliverance from sin and evil, so far as this earth and this race is concerned, is only promised to exist one thousand years (and a little season, Rev. 20) after the Sec. Advent. The priestly office will yet evidence its sufficiency in wresting from Satan His victory, and in ultimately crushing out all sin and all its sad consequences.

Obs. 11. Such a continuing High-Priest evidences the spirituality connected with this Kingdom. Our opponents stigmatize it as "carnal," etc., but the presence and official station of this Priest sufficiently refutes such a charge. He is the great Presider over things relating to the Divine; He is the Head of all religious affairs; He is the Oracle of God's truth; He is the final and infallible arbiter in all questions. Through Him and in Him, the Father is always approached, and worship, and reverence, and praise to the Godhead always ascends in His name.

Obs. 12. When we consider the greatness and majesty of this High-Priest, the incomparable and all-sufficient sacrifice offered, the exaltation and power, God's special choice and not man's, bearing the people on His loving breast, His immense superiority over all other priests, His confirmation by oath and perfection, His Holiness, then we can rest assured that His priestly work will be fully accomplished, and that as the priestly agent He will ever, as such, rejoice in it.

This shows us how we thus obtain an infallible Head, not after the vain and sacrilegious caricature given to us by human wisdom and craft, but after God's own wonderful devising. Such an accessible Head humanity needs, and this need will be most gloriously supplied.

Obs. 13. It is only requisite to remind the reader, that this priesthood largely pertains to the humanity of the Christ. While the Divine united to Him gives it increased dignity, efficiency, preciousness, etc., yet we are told (Heb. 2 : 16, 17) that "He took on Him the seed of Abraham, wherefore in all things it behoved Him to be made like unto His brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful High-Priest in things pertaining to God," etc. (comp. v. 14, etc.), and that "He sprang out of Judah" (Heb. 7 : 14). This priesthood is part of the exaltation of His Humanity—it is inseparably identified with it, and the entire reasoning of Hebrews associates the call and perpetuation of that Humanity, as David's Son—in its earthly and glorified condition with the same. Thus united, we dare not separate them, lest we detract from the ever-enduring exaltation of Humanity itself, as seen in this High-Priest and His associated priests.

Obs. 14. The Primitive-Church view confirms our position. For several centuries after the First Advent, the ministers clearly taught the Pre-Mill. Advent, the conversion of the nations following, etc., thus continuing the priestly work of Jesus in mediation, intercession, and saving purposes. The present prevailing belief on the subject, founded on a Post-Mill. theory, was utterly discarded (comp. Props. 74-76). The teaching of men so nearly allied to apostolic instruction, should have some weight in a matter so important, especially when we find the same so fully substantiated by the present infallible rule of faith, the Scriptures.

Obs. 15. The views of eminent writers and commentators, corroborating this doctrine, tends to show, that in the estimation of such, it is a truth clearly taught, which should be unhesitatingly received. We append a few utterances.

Judge Jones (Notes) has two exceedingly interesting comments on Melchisedec (p. 190 and 233, seq.), and repeatedly, in detail, urges the future and eternal priesthood of Jesus as the Son of man. He makes "His sovereignty, and priesthood commensurate and inseparable," and correctly makes the gathering out of the present elect "not the whole of our Lord's redemptive work. As the Son of man and the patriarchal King and Priest of the whole world—the true Melchisedec and King of peace," etc. (comp. Prop. 196). The views of Alford, Olshausen, Bengel, Steir, and others are interesting and confirmatory. Even such a commentator as Moll (Lange's Com. Heb.) designates Jesus as "the promised eternal priestly King" and writes of Him as "The bearer of an eternal and untransferable priesthood." He also carefully distinguishes between His priestly office exhibited in sacrifice and entrance into the Holy Place as the antitype of the Aaronic high-priest, and this special priesthood after the order of Melchisedec; the former being of a propitiatory nature and manifested in the offering of Himself and the divine acceptance of the same in His ascension to the Holy of Holies above; the latter being a royal priesthood, "a position exempted from future sacrifices, and fraught with unlimited homage, honor, and capacity for the bestowment of blessings." Numerous comments from opponents, admitting an eternal, unchangeable priesthood, might be quoted, which alone logically fit into our system of doctrine.

Obs. 16. This unchangeable priesthood, in connection with the ever-enduring priesthood of the saints, seems to confirm the opinion of those who hold to an endless succession of generations (comp. Prop. 152, on Perp. of Race). We would not deny the inference, because it possesses weighty reasons for its entertainment, and such a succession for many ages, at least, is clearly taught. But we can easily conceive of a continued priesthood, even if such a perpetuation of the race should cease, on the ground that the superior, the ruling power, will always minister in Divine things to the inferior, the subjected one. We leave this matter, as stated in Prop. 152.

PROPOSITION 156. The doctrine of the Kingdom enforces the future priesthood of the saints.

The promise is that the saints shall be both "kings and priests" (Rev. 1 : 6, and 5 : 10, and 20 : 6) in the coming Kingdom. Prop. 154 shows the civil relationship of the saints, this one relates to the religious, for, like Christ, the Theocratic King, they are both civil and religious rulers. The nature of a Theocracy demands, in view of the inseparable union of State and Church, such a leadership in order to secure the requisite purity and perfection.

The doctrine of "the Universal Priesthood," as held by many denominations—a special favorite of some theologians—and applied to the ministry and laity of the present dispensation—all true believers—is only a faint earnest of the future one. Indeed, equality of all believers in this respect finds a strong corroborating evidence in the ultimate universal priesthood as exhibited in the Theocracy.

Obs. 1. A Theocracy, to preserve a manifested unity and enforce its authority supremely, requires the union of priesthood and rulership in the same persons. The inseparable union of Church and State, the Head of both Church and State being God Himself, demands both a religious and civil administration, and hence to insure the proper, equitable, and perfect combination of authority, and the essential enforcement of law and order, it is the highest wisdom to lodge the rulership and priesthood, not in two distinct bodies, but in one special raised up body. This wisdom, which commends itself to reason, is fully exhibited in the Divine ordering pertaining to the restored Theocracy.

We may well imagine that the Spirit lays stress on the word "royal" in "royal priesthood" (1 Pet. 2 : 9, called before that, ver. 5, "an holy priesthood"), indicative of priests possessing the dignity of kings. The palace of the Theocratic ruler was the temple, and in view of the presence and majesty of the Sovereign, the pomp and splendor of the priesthood in their administrations is readily accounted for, and gives us the idea—supported by promise—of the future splendor and glory of the priesthood.

Obs. 2. Jesus in His Coming Kingdom is both King and Priest. This has been shown in detail, and is one of the most precious of truths relating to His future glory, the station of the saints, and the destiny of the race. Now, the saints being co-heirs with Him, participants of His honor and glory, partake of His Kingship and Priesthood. In this they "shall be like Him," thus fulfilling the promises pertaining to the greatness of their joy, honor, and glory. Hence they are distinctively promised, not only the exaltation of kingship, but also that of priesthood. And, we may rest assured, "that both will be most amply verified, seeing that it is God who gives us the assurance."

Anciently, as various writers (comp. Fairbairn, Typology, vol. 2, p. 221, who refers to Vitringa, Müller, etc.) have shown, the kingship and priesthood were united (as e.g. in Melchisedec), so that, as Müller expresses it, "it might be said with just as much truth, that the kings were priests, as that the priests were kings." (This union is also illustrated by the Greeks and Romans, as Vitrings has shown in princes, magistrates, heads of communities, and even of families.) Now, just as the earlier kings were "priest-kings," forming "a specially highly privileged nobility," so these latter kings will be recognized as "Priest-Kings"—a nobility associated with the Theocratic King.

Obs. 3. A Theocracy being a Divine-Civil Government, God Himself being the earthly Ruler, a certain pre-eminence is given to the religious above the civil. This is seen in the Theocracy as once existing, in the provisions made for its restoration (the religious qualifying for the ultimate civil), and in the simple fact that the Divine is fundamental to all other relations whatever. Hence we need not be surprised that prominence is given to this priesthood, as in Ex. 19 : 6, where God promises to raise up unto Himself "a kingdom of priests," and in Rev. 20 : 6, where the being "priests of God and of Christ" is mentioned as a distinguishing characteristic associated with the reign.

The same prominence is indicated if we take the ms. rendering (Tischendorf's N. Test., the S. and A.) of Rev. 1 : 6, "a kingdom, priests," and Rev. 5 : 10 (the S.), "a kingdom and priesthood," pointing us back to Ex. 19 : 6. The principle inculcated in Prov. 25 : 5 will be manifested in the highest degree : "Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness."

Obs. 4. In Ex. 19 : 5, 6 we have presented God's desire to exalt the Theocratic ordering by making it "a Kingdom of priests," i.e. a Kingdom so permeated by heartfelt allegiance to God, the Ruler, that it would be under the permanent authority of a holy priesthood, thus making the Divine a controlling element. A Theocracy in its purity demands holiness, an entire consecration to its Ruler. This idea remained unrealized, notwithstanding its tender to the Jewish nation, on account of disobedience. But this sinfulness of the nation will not prevent God from ultimately realizing in ample fulfilment His purpose as indicated. This will be done when the Theocracy is restored under David's Son. In the mean time, to insure the complete realization, God is constantly raising up those who are destined to officiate as Priests in the coming Kingdom. These are specified, and the promise of Ex. 19 : 5, 6 applied to them, by Peter (1 Pet. 2 : 9) "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people." By the process of engrafting, these priests, being thus all the children of Abraham, are fully incorporated with the commonwealth of Israel.

The student must here be cautioned against dogmatically interpreting some Millennial predictions. Owing to this engrafting and incorporation of the glorified priests with the Jewish nation, it is sometimes difficult to discriminate between what pertains to the glorified and what to the unglorified portion. Both are mingled and inseparably united as e.g. in Isa. 60, 45, etc. Jews in the flesh (comp. Obs. following, and the one on order) shall also be priests (as e.g. stated Isa. 66 : 21), but they occupy a subsidiary position when contrasted with the glorified. Both the glorified and unglorified (for "all shall be righteous," etc., when once united in the Theocratic ordering) seem to be denoted in places as e.g. Isa. 61 : 6, "But ye shall be named the Priests of the Lord ; men shall call you the Ministers of our God," for the context refers both to the saved of this dispensation and to the restoration of the nation.

Obs. 5. "The first-born" of Israel were regarded as specially belonging to the Lord and consecrated to the Priesthood. Writers on the Jewish Laws (as Michaelis, Wines, etc.) have noticed this in detail. Thus Wines (Com. on Laws, etc., B. 2, ch. 8) says : "On the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, all their first-born males were sanctified to the Lord and destined to the altar. But the difficulty of obtaining from each family its first-born son, the difficulty of detaching them from their private interests, as citizens of such a tribe or such a town, rendered this mode impracticable. Moses, therefore, without in the least changing the original principle, substituted for this service the tribe of Levi, in place of all the first-born" (Lev. 8 : 2-5 ; Numb. 8 : 5-22, etc.). This substitution is represented as "a gift," and as a constant reminder that the principle remained unchanged, that God's claim still existed, a redemption price for the first-born was exacted.<sup>1</sup> Owing to human imperfection and weakness, God's just claim could not be carried into practical execution, and He only designs to teach us by this (1) that on account of dependence upon Him and His regal authority, a Divine service tendered to Him is, in virtue of His Divinity and Majesty, of the first importance in a Theocratic ordering ; and (2) that this should be a sign or type of the realization of the ultimate Purpose of God, viz., that "the first-born" of the Church should become Priests in the incoming Theocracy.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Fairbairn (Typol., vol. 2, p. 221) says that many leading Jewish authorities (Jonathan, Onkelos, Saadiah, Jarchi, Aben Esra, etc.) and men of great learning (Grotius, Selden, Bochart, etc.) held, that among the privileges of the first-born was that of the priestly function, basing it on Ex. 24 : 5, Esau's birthright, and God's special consecration of the first-born after their redemption in Egypt. This opinion, he thinks, however, "as almost universally abandoned," and says, in view of the special Levitical arrangement subsequently made, that the right to the priestly office was not "reckoned among the rights of primogeniture. These rights Scripture itself has plainly restricted to pre-eminence in authority among the brethren, and the possession of a double portion in the inheritance." Fairbairn is evidently incorrect, as the references to the Scriptures abundantly prove. The restriction that he refers to is based upon the simple fact, that, owing to the constant redemption of the first-born and the provision made for others to officiate in their place, it is not mentioned as a distinctive privilege which was realized. Numbers ch. 3 : 12, 13, 40, 51 ; ch. 18 : 15 ; Ex. 13 : 12, 13 and 34 : 19, 20 ; Numb. 8 : 17-19 are decisive on the matter, and clearly show the correctness of our position in the text, which is corroborated, wonderfully, by the typical nature of the same. Before the appointment of Levi's descendants, "the first-born of every family, the fathers, the princes, and the kings; were priests. Thus Cain and Abel, Noah, Abraham, Melchisedec, Job, Isaac, Jacob, offered themselves their own sacrifices" (art. "Priests," Ency. R. Knowl.). This universal principle remained unchanged, although modified to suit the special circumstances of the nation.

<sup>2</sup> To indicate how even our opponents concede that this promise of God respecting the priesthood, typified by "the first-born" is verified in the priesthood of the first-born of the church, we refer to Prof. Bush, Com. on Genesis, ch. 25 : 32. "The following are usually enumerated as the principal privileges which constituted the distinction of the first-born : (1) They were peculiarly given and consecrated to God, Ex. 22 : 29 ; (2.) they stood next in honor to their parents, Gen. 49 : 3 ; (3.) had a double portion in the paternal inheritance, Deut. 21 : 17 ; (4) succeeded in the government of the family or Kingdom, 2 Chron. 21 : 3 ; and (5) were honored with the office of priesthood and the administration of the public worship of God. The phrase 'first-born,' therefore, was used to denote one who was peculiarly near and dear to his father, Ex. 4 : 22, and higher than his brethren, Ps. 89 : 28, and typically pointed to Christ, and to all true Christians, who are joint-heirs with Him, to an eternal inheritance, and constitute the first-born, whose names are written in heaven, Heb. 12 : 23." In view of Paul calling Esau "a profane person," he adopts the view of the Pict. Bible that Esau specially ignored and despised the spiritual or priestly, rather than the temporal, advantages of his birthright. This may be so, because the temporal might be retrieved by industry, etc., but the priestly once forfeited could not be renewed. Many writers of ability indorse Bush's position.

Obs. 6. The priests were specially charged (Deut. 33 : 9, 10 and 17 : 9-13 ; Lev. 10 : 11 ; Hos. 4 : 6 ; Mal. 2 : 7, etc.) to preserve and teach the laws, Theocratic, that were already given. They could not change them, or substitute others, for this would have reflected upon the wisdom, etc., of the Theocratic King, the mighty God, and would have introduced confusion and anarchy. The purity of a Theocracy demands such a position of the priests—a subordination to the Divine Majesty and the upholding of His enactments. In the restored Theocracy this again will be the attitude of the priesthood. When “the law shall go forth of Zion and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem” (Mic. 4 : 2 ; Isa. 2 : 3, etc.) ; when the incoming dispensation (Props. 140, 141) shall introduce new revelations of God’s Will (Prop. 167), a renewed ordering (Props. 131), these priests, the first-born of the Church, will be the grand medium of communicating the same. Then it will be true (Ps. 68 : 11) “The Lord gave the word : great was the company (army) of those that published it.”

Obs. 7. The priests acted as Judges (Dent. 21 : 5 and 17 : 8-13, etc.), so that with the priestly, there was inseparably associated the civil character. They were by virtue of their priesthood in the service of the State and Church—they were, as a Theocratic ordering necessitates, ministers of Church and State.<sup>1</sup> Thus will it be again, but with this vast difference ; the priesthood, instead of being deposited in the hands of mortal, weak, and fallible men, is then committed to glorified and infallible ones, united by the firmest bonds that grace and salvation can bestow to the mighty Theocratic King.

<sup>1</sup> The ancient priests were distributed through all the territories of Israel, so that they could best promote the general interest and welfare. The High Priest permanently resided at the Capitol, and from this centre the priesthood radiated to the extremities of the nation, to exalt law, order, peace, the Theocratic polity. Specially they were called to Jerusalem on stated times for purposes of worship, but ordinarily they resided among those whom they taught and judged. These priests were inseparably bound to the State, seeing that all their interests, station, and honor were bound up with it. They were not only priests, but, as such, civil magistrates. Thus Wines (Com. on Laws, p. 612) remarks : “The Levites were not a mere spirituality. Certainly they were the ministers of religion and charged with all the functions appertaining to the public worship of Jehovah. But so close was the relation between the law and the religion of the Hebrews, that all ecclesiastical persons were at the same time political persons. The entire tribe of Levi was set apart to God, the King of this Commonwealth. Politically speaking, they were Jehovah’s ministers of state. Hence this tribe, as constituted by Moses, was not only a priesthood appointed to the service of the altar, but also a true temporal magistracy, having important and vital civil relations. The burden of government was, in a great measure, laid upon its shoulders. Besides performing the ceremonies of public worship, it was destined to preserve in its integrity and to interpret in the seat of justice the text of the fundamental laws ; to teach these laws to Israel ; to inspire the people with a love for them ; to oppose all its own authority and influence against any and every attempt to overthrow them ; and to bind firmly together all the parts of the body politic.”

Obs. 8. In ancient times there were various orders of the priesthood, the high-priests, the priests that officiated at the altar, and the various companies of assistants. Following analogy, and the hints given respecting the variety of station, rank, reward in kingship ; observing the exclusiveness of the 144,000 and the position of the future martyrs ; considering the possibility asserted in the Scriptures of attaining unto eternal life and yet suffering loss, etc., it is reasonable to anticipate that under the leadership of the great High-Priest there will be gradations of rank and order in this priesthood. Not all believers will be kings or priests (Props. 130, 153), but only those especially counted worthy of the honor. But such will be the honor and delight, the fulness of happiness and the recognition of grace, that even the most subsidiary position will be abundantly satisfactory, as expressed by David, Ps. 84 : 10. A diversity in unity, a variety of gifts and ministrations, a distribution of rank and office, enriches the communion and intercourse of the saints with each other and with the nations ; it serves as the basis of a mutual impartation of benefit and blessing.

The twenty-four courses of priests in order to secure a constant attendance and succession, the specific appointments to certain performances (as to incense, singing, etc.), all may, for aught we know, foreshadow a similar arrangement in the restored Theocracy with increased splendor and glory commensurate with the renewed and majestically enlarged ordering. To enter into details, and endeavor to fix with any degree of exactness, what may be in the general dimly typified, would be rashness and presumption. Time, with its fulfilment, can alone inform us correctly.

Obs. 9. These priests tender the sacrifices of heart, lips, and life—"spiritual sacrifices" (1 Pet. 2 : 5 ; Heb. 13 : 15, 16, etc., showing how the word "sacrifice" is employed). The offerings that they bring are not bloody sacrifices, for these are superseded by the one offering (Heb. 10 : 12-14, etc.) of Jesus, but offerings indicative of allegiance, friendship, reverence, gratitude, praise, service. This has been so amply discussed that it needs no repetition (see Prop. 172). These priests conduct the public worship of God ; they show forth His excellencies in Creation and Redemption ; they stimulate to gratitude, love, prayer, and praise ; they teach, proclaiming the truth as committed to them and exemplified in themselves ; they advise and decide questions referred to them ; they enforce, by the weight of their relationship to the Christ and by their authority, the Theocratic constitution and laws.

Dr. Thomas (Kingd. of God, p. 44), misapprehending the last chs. of Ezekiel (which see explained, Prop. 172), makes the glorified priests to be referred to in Ezek. 44 : 16, as engaged in bloody sacrifices. But that the saints, glorified and exalted, are not denoted is self-evident from the context, which presents things connected with these priests, which cannot be applied, without undue violence to Scripture statements, to the immortal priests, such as e.g. have a reference to the clothing, sweating, polling the hair, marrying, mourning for deceased relatives, cleansing, and sin-offering. To apply such things to the co-heirs of the Christ in the Millennial age, is to degrade them to a mortal, sinful state utterly inconsistent with the promises. To enforce this, Thomas concludes because Zadok means "the Just One" that they are "resurrected men ;" but these "Sons of Zadok" may have been thus called because they would have been called in his line, or because, if realized, they should be faithful in their duties as Zadok, etc. At least, the portraiture as given by Ezekiel does not identify them with "resurrected men" as presented to us e.g. by Jesus and Paul.

Obs. 10. These glorified priests are an elect, chosen body (Props. 62, 64, 65) in person and office, representative of the majesty of the Theocratic King, raised to their exalted position and nearness officially to Him that they may be "to the praise of His glory." Their number, rank, duty, devotedness, etc., serve to glorify the Messiah (comp. preceding Prop., Obs. 8). They are specially designed to exhibit the Theocratic ordering—its authority, institutions, laws, privileges, blessings, etc.—forming a medium between its King and its subjects, its magnificent throne and the nations. The designation of priests indicates that they are a channel of communication between God and the nations, the latter being brought largely through their instrumentality into Theocratic order and unity.

God will say of this priesthood: "This people have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise" (Isa. 45: 21). In view of this, it will be the joy of saints to serve the King, to whom they are indebted for all honor and glory. It will be their highest desire to do His will. As Lincoln (Lect. on Rev., p. 232) has well said: "For surely it would be a diminution of heaven's joy, if, once there, we were no more allowed to serve Him whom we love—if our hearts, brimful, had no outlet provided for their relief."

Obs. 11. All these priests are Divinely called and commissioned. Now, alas! men may intrude themselves into sacred offices utterly unfitted for them. The record of the past presents multitudes of painful instances, and infidelity seizes upon them, and the acts attributed to them, as legitimate results—notwithstanding their positive scriptural condemnation—of religion itself. But no such dishonoring feature can possibly be incorporated with this Theocracy, for every priest will possess undoubted authority, vouched for by his glorified condition and his divine relationship to Jesus and the New Jerusalem. If any one should even attempt (of which we cannot conceive a probability) to take the position of such a priest, Korah's Theocratic punishment would speedily follow.

Obs. 12. All these priests are secured by a previous training; they are tested and tried (comp. Props. 86, 135 and Obs. 9 and 10 in preceding one). Sufferings, temptation, and trial were essential to the full and perfect development of the great High-Priest Himself (Heb. 5: 6-10 and 2: 9, 10, 11 and 4: 15), and such are requisite to form the characters of His associated priests. Their love to God and His Christ, devotion to the truth, affection for their fellow-men, etc., all the elements of a priestly official are imparted and developed. Hence two things necessarily follow: First, these purified ones are, through Redemptive grace and power actually experienced, bound to the King with a love so devoted and intense, so supreme and overwhelming that the interests and glory of the Church and State united in the Theocracy are perfectly safe in their hands. And second, they, like the High-Priest Himself, become sympathetic priests. Their past experience, indebtedness and elevation by grace, completeness in Christ, etc., all tend to make them specially accessible to the nations, and to cause them to manifest a deep interest in the welfare and happiness of all.

In Heb. 12: 1-13; James 1: 2-4, 12; 1 Pet. 1: 6-13; Matt. 5: 12, etc., we are exhorted to regard our present trials as preparative for the future, and thus even to rejoice in them in view of the ultimate result. In this discipline God's love is manifested, but cannot, owing to our weakness, be properly appreciated until we become kings and priests. Then it will be seen what an intimate and important relationship existed between our testing and the reward. Our lack of faith, want of confidence, non-appreciation of God's promises, rebellion under trial, yielding to temptation, ought to be rebuked by this positively declared connection between probation and exaltation. The example of Jesus ought, in this respect, to be all sufficient. Alas! how few, comparatively, endure this testing as they ought. The personal conflicts, the Christian experience, the temptations, the sorrows and afflictions—all, aside from their qualifying and elevating tendency, will be of incalculable value in their intercourse with the nations. Now we are styled "vessels of mercy, afore prepared into glory," and this should encourage us to endure unto the end. The esteem and love of the subjects of such kings and priests will be founded, not simply upon their rank or dignity, but on the character obtaining and sustaining the rank.

Obs. 13. This priesthood is, therefore, destined to be, what those called strive after now, "a holy priesthood." This firmly cements the Theocratic ordering together into an enduring and perpetual Kingdom, seeing that its officials, perfected in holiness, are thus completely consecrated to God and His service. Holiness is the distinguishing characteristic of them, and is suggested, in view of the promises and duties associated with it, by the name. The priesthood is not given to persons liable to pervert or abuse the law itself, but to holy ones who honor and exalt the law.

"Without holiness no man shall see the Lord," much less be elevated to an official position. The teaching of the Scriptures is plain and decisive. A person who has developed a character opposed to holiness is entirely unfitted for kingship and priesthood. The purity and intent of the Theocratic government forbids his employment and elevation. Hence the most positive statements of complete exclusion. The "treasure" must first be deposited in "earthen vessels" before it is deemed worthy of being transferred to glorified, heavenly ones. The object of the Messiah now is to secure the redemption and sanctification of His followers, in order that a true oneness may exist between them, "for both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one; for which cause He is not ashamed to call them brethren" (Heb. 2: 11). Owing to this requirement, as a pre-requisite, there is deep meaning in "the few," "the little flock," and kindred phrases, indicative of "the many" rejecting it and failing in securing "the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." What bliss is in store for true ones! The body glorified, the soul sanctified, love perfected, then no sin will grieve the soul and no yielding to temptation will bring remorse to the heart and tears to the eyes, for a sweet self-consciousness of purity and nobleness of character will ever be present to the saint.

Obs. 14. This priesthood elevates humanity. How this is done by the High-Priest is shown under Prop. 20<sup>a</sup>. The exaltation of the Redeemed to such nearness and association with Him in His offices and authority, evinces the highest position to which humanity can attain, and when the honors and dignities of kingship and priesthood are once enjoyed this will be witnessed and acknowledged.

God Himself is interested in their honor and glory; He, by virtue of their position, blessedness, etc., is glorified and admired through them. It follows that if "The Christ," having all power and majesty, promises such exaltation at His appearing, it will be exceedingly great. Hence in the persons of these priests in view of co-heirship with Jesus and participation in His Theocratic rule, we have exhibited the splendid destiny to which man can be elevated.

Obs. 15. These priests are designed to bless the nations, for this is one of the objects of the Theocracy. (Comp. preced. Prop. Obs. 11.) Considering the beings to whom this is intrusted, with power to enforce and love to extend the same, nothing can be better adapted to secure the grand result intended.

These priests, on the one hand, honor God and His Christ, and, on the other, act in behalf of the nations, presiding over things relating to the Divine government both in the interest of God and of man. In virtue of their office they are near to God and accessible to men, and their influence will be felt in a commanding manner among all nations.

Obs. 16. These priests, being all "baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire" (See Prop. 171), are endowed with supernatural powers. Hence, now enabled to perform "the greater works" promised, they are admirably adapted by sympathy and ample power to minister to the wants, necessities, etc., of the nations, and to materially aid their Master in mitigating and removing the curse as the Theocratic dominion extends itself. It is not mere imagination to suppose that they will visit, and lay hands upon, the sick and dying, that they will dry up tears of anguish and grief, that they will administer comfort, consolation, mercy, and hope.

Obs. 17. Being glorified, fashioned after Christ, made "equal unto the angels," neither space nor physical obstructions can prevent their ministrations. Having "spiritual bodies" (i.e. bodies subject to the will of the Spirit) they can assume visibility or invisibility, they can visit with ease and celerity through great distances, at pleasure. Thus endowed, they can (as Peter, etc.) discern the very heart, the requirements, the necessities of their subjects. Thus pressing want can never be concealed from them, worth can never remain unrecognized by them, and deception can never be practised upon them.

This future Baptism (Prop. 171), with glorification, gives them the power of transporting themselves at will like Christ and the angels, of assuming different appearances at pleasure, of appearing in glory or veiling it, of performing wonderfully, having the elements under control, of opening doors or entering without opening as angels and Jesus, of eating and drinking with men, of supplying and multiplying food, of healing the sick, of supplying food, of protecting from evil, of delivering out of trouble, etc., etc.

Obs. 18. Hence it follows, that this priesthood, in a glorified condition, is entirely free from the trials and difficulties, the weakness and embarrassments, the temptations and errors incident to a present ministry. Specially under the Spirit, it is most reasonable to anticipate it as a most eloquent, powerful, and successful priesthood, who, with glorified tongues and sanctified hearts, with Christ-like power and authority, and imbued with love, wisdom, fervor, faithfulness, and holiness, will so present the will of the Father and Son that the hearts of countless multitudes will joyfully respond to it.

Obs. 19. This priesthood demands no personal sacrifices. Thanks to God, these are only preparatory. The terrible sacrifices, under persecution, bigotry, hatred, envy, malice, for the sake of the truth; the tears, the groans, the suffering, the blood, the life offered in behalf of duty and the welfare of others, are then things of the past. Blessing, happiness, fullness of joy, pleasures forevermore, are ever connected with it, and instead of being a source of sorrow or a burden, it is a source of never-ending gladness and an "eternal weight of glory." What an encouragement to our weakness and feebleness now!

Obs. 20. Writers on the ancient priesthood inform us that they were "the literati," "the learned," "sages and professors," "the chief instruments of a continuing and progressive mental, moral, and religious culture." This will be eminently true of these priests, as indicated by intimations of increased knowledge, by their glorified condition, by their union with the Christ, and by their official station. Through them the nations of the earth may anticipate the most wonderful accessions to learning and knowledge of all kinds, because specially under the influence and guidance of the Spirit of Wisdom.

Obs. 21. This priesthood, as well as the kingship, shows that God in the Coming Kingdom has something for His saints to perform. Idleness and selfishness enfeeble and degrade; activity and imparting to others are elevating and joy-producing. It will still, then, be true, that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." To be made instrumental of doing good to others is Christ-like, God-like. And this activity in honor of God, in behalf of others, in joyfulness to ourselves, is unceasing. Being glorified, there is no need of recuperation to remove fatigue or weakness, and, therefore, as expressive both of a constant activity and a never-decaying vigor, they are represented, e.g. as serving God "day and night" (Rev. 7 : 15-17).

Barbour (Three Worlds, p. 44), misapprehending Ps. 149 : 5 in the use of the word "beds," makes resting "a necessity or pleasure." He would scarcely, with his Gnostic theory of a spiritual body and spiritual kingdom, have fallen into such an incongruity, if he had noticed that the original word "couches" is expressive of the couches around the divan of an Oriental prince, and hence, according to Oriental usage, indicative of honor and exaltation. Comp. e.g. the remarks of Moll (Lange's Com. Heb., p. 88) on the promised Rest combined with activity, and his references to Rothe, Tholuck, etc.

Obs. 22. These priests have no family connections, no private interests, no attachments to tribe or nation, no earthly relations of any nature which can interfere with their official position. Hence an exclusive devotedness to the interests of the Theocratic King and Kingdom must be predicated of them.

Obs. 23. This priesthood and their services indicates the spirituality of this Kingdom. The spiritual and the temporal, the heavenly and the earthly, the glorified and unglorified are combined in a Theocracy. The union of Church and State under such a leadership in behalf of the redemption of the race, plainly evidences this feature. The objection, therefore, urged against our view that we ignore the spiritual is easily set aside, seeing that with a glorified High-Priest and associated Priests the highest spirituality must result from the Theocratic ordering.

In a higher sense than now will it be true that (1 John 1 : 3) "truly our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus the Christ." The earnest of present fellowship insures the open, manifested fellowship of the future. The spirituality of the priesthood is fully manifested by the constant access that they have to the New Jerusalem and the presence of the King, by the worship and service that they tender, by the simple fact that the most glorious themes (rendered living and heart-pervading by actual and most blessed experience), such as the love of God, the love and mercy of the Saviour, the blood shed for the remission of sin, the scenes of Calvary, etc., shall ever flow from their joyful lips.

Obs. 24. This priesthood, elect, tried, holy, etc., form one body with Christ. Now there is a lack of unity; diversity, and even antagonism, exists. The history of the past ministry records the sad story of divisions, proscriptions, excommunications, etc., among them. But now under this arrangement all this ceases, for these priests are all actuated by the same spirit, interest, and principle. Then the prayer of the Saviour respecting a oneness will be fully and amply realized; not merely exhibited by fraternal regards, but openly manifested in the one, exclusive Theocratic ordering. (Comp. Prop. 184.)

This oneness is the more remarkable since they are gathered out of "all nations and kindreds, and people, and tongues." But the same "mind which was in Christ," the same redemption and glory, unite them. It is delightful to contemplate this oneness, and the persons, from Adam down, who shall compose it; and it is refreshing to think of the time when we shall associate with them and enjoy their acquaintance. Union and exaltation with the Christ, kingship and priesthood, will be a sufficient introduction to an eternal fellowship and intimacy.

Obs. 25. This priesthood will undoubtedly exhibit the praises of God and His Christ by singing and music. They enter into this Theocratic Kingdom "with singing" (Isa. 35 : 10), and in it they continue to sing (Rev. 5 : 8-10) as "kings and priests," and this praise is represented as exciting that of others (Ps. 66 : 1, 2, 3, 4). Music accompanies them, as the mention of harps suggests. Indeed the sublimest singing is exclusive and pertains to the 144,000 (Rev. 14 : 3). Music and singing has charmed, comforted, cheered, and elevated the soul ; in mortal hands it has inspired devotion, thrilled the heart, aroused the deepest feelings, etc. What will it be in glorified hands, and coming from glorified lips ! "Having the harps of God" (Rev. 15 : 2) and singing "the new song" (Rev. 14 : 3), "the song of Moses" and "the song of the Lamb," indicative of redemption and its glories, the highest efforts of the past will be but feeble—mere child's play—in comparison with the exquisite skill, enchanting voices, and tender, ennobling, sublime utterances of these harpers and singers.

We can imagine them, not only leading the praise of Jerusalem and of congregations, but on their visits to families and individuals, ravish them with the delightful and heavenly melodies of experienced Redemption. The Bible frequently refers to this feature, and these references, corroborated by the power of music and song in the past, certainly must meet with a fulfilment commensurate with the glory of the occasion, the persons, the Theocracy. The vast number thus engaged at times in perfect praise, will produce a blended harmony and a grandeur far beyond our present experience and conceptions. The emotions of the glorified, the joy, the triumph, the love—all will be brought forth in this swelling music and song. Handel, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Jenny Lind, and others sought to express feeling ; when these glorified minstrels seek to express theirs, music and song will be faultless.

Obs. 26. The ancient priests were to be free from all bodily blemish. Religious purity was allied with physical purity. So it will be again, for these priests have their "vile body" "fashioned like unto His glorious body" (Phil. 3 : 21). Their personal appearance, beautiful and splendid, will accord with their official position. Even the clothing, the adornments, the fine vesture of the ancient priests were significant, and, we can readily believe in view of the intimations and promises, that these priests will be clad in a royal, magnificent manner, as evidencing their high station, and as impressing visibly their authority upon the nations. As Jesus the Messiah is represented in His glorified condition, so His associated priests will likewise appear, even to the raiment.

Obs. 27. The vast number of the priests, represented as an immense multitude, indicates both the majesty of the Theocratic King and the extent of His dominion. The number and splendor of officials, connected with earthly courts and surroundings, has much to do to elevate them in human estimation. The majesty of the Theocracy, the powerful and extensive, world-wide dominion, is exhibited most impressively to the nations by the number of the glorified priests. Just as an earthly court of eminent, wise, talented, and powerful persons aids in glorifying an earthly King, so the appearance, ability, character, etc., of a host of such materially assists to convey an idea of the grandeur of our King.

Read Thackeray's Four Georges, the Memoirs of the Court-Life of Louis XIV. and XV., and numerous others, and however brilliant the society and distinguished the talents, yet the simple truth reveals always among them characters steeped in the lowest vices and trampling upon faith, justice, virtue, morality, and religion. Such can find no place in this court. Hence to provide the suitable persons for a representation of the majesty of the Theocracy, God allows dispensations to pass, selecting those who evince purity and holiness. Rulers, like earthly ones, selfish, vicious, etc., can find no station in a restored and pure Theocracy.

Obs. 28. God's equity is vindicated in that these priests officiate here on this earth, where they endured temptation, suffering, and trial. Here where they fought the good fight of faith, they become triumphant priests, thus following in the Master's path (comp. Prop. 84). This increases their interest in the redemption of the world, when visiting the very places where their prayers ascended, their tears fell, and their labors were sustained.

Therefore we should encourage our hearts, as Moses did, by contemplating this great change, thus increasing love, desire, hope, and joy. Let us endeavor to appreciate its excellency, its nearness, its nobility, its spirituality, its blissfulness, and it will enlarge our boldness, firmness, patience, cheerfulness, and submission.

Obs. 29. This priesthood is perpetual. The Kingdom inherited is ever-enduring (Prop. 159), the kingship is perpetual, and the priesthood is inseparably united to both of these. Again, being co-heirs of Jesus, and His priesthood being a continuous one (Prop. 155), the saints necessarily are ever priests with Him. The perpetuity of such a high honor and dignity is a strong element of happiness; when once gained, nothing can deprive us of it, for it is an eternal possession; and, as shown already, no pressing of feeble old age, or sickness entailed, can cause its being surrendered to some youthful or more vigorous successor.

Obs. 30. The associations of such priests, their loving fellowship, must be a source of constant and growing pleasure. Composed of the noblest of earth, embracing the most eminent and faithful, intercourse with each other in duty or pleasure, in praise or social converse, in study or visitation, in public or private, must be, in the nature of the case, a delightful element of priestly happiness. Especially ravishing when among them we find formerly loved and dear ones, now clad with such dignity.

Obs. 31. This priesthood corroborates the first dominion, the pre-eminence, the supremacy of the Jewish nation (Prop. 114). For, being grafted in, and become part of, the elect nation, they now, being glorified, raised to irresistible power, and exalted with David's Son "the King of the Jews," materially assist in elevating the nation to its predicted position, and in bringing to it the glory promised.

Believers now by faith come "to an innumerable company of angels" (Heb. 12 : 22, or "to myriads of angels in an assembly or joyful convocation," Barnes, Com. loci). These angels were employed preparatory to the Theocracy, at the introduction of the Theocracy, etc., and it is most reasonable to believe, as taught, that they will continue to be interested in, and engaged in behalf of, the Theocracy when gloriously restored.

In ref. to number, names, nature, power, past service, and ministrations of angels, see arts. on, in Bib. Dicts. and Cyclops, and in Sys. Divs. Fausset (Com., Heb. 2 : 5) notices an implication in the words, "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come" viz : "Implying, He has subjected to angels the existing world, the Old Test. dispensation (then still partly existing as to its framework), v. 2, the political kingdoms of the earth (Dan. 4 : 13 ; 10 : 13, 20, 21 ; 12 : 1), and the natural elements (Rev. 9 : 11 ; 16 : 4), and even individuals (Matt. 18 : 10)." The rule that they may exert is then given over to the saints.

Obs. 1. The supremacy and exaltation of Jesus, the Christ, over all angels (Col. 1 : 16 ; Eph. 1 : 21 ; 1 Pet. 3 : 22), their attendance on and service to Him at the First Advent (Luke 2 : 9-14 ; Matt. 4 : 11 ; Luke 22 : 43, etc.), their deep interest in things pertaining to Him (e.g. Eph. 3 : 10, 11 ; 1 Pet. 1 : 12, etc.), their connection with the events of the Sec. Advent (Matt. 16 : 21 ; Luke 12 : 8, 9, etc.), their worship of Him (Heb. 1 : 6 ; Rev. 5 : 11, 12), His power over them (Matt. 26 : 51, 52 ; Heb. 1 : 4, etc.)—these, as well as other considerations, show that at the restoration of the Theocracy, the Messiah shall swell His glory by that of the angelic host. Now let the student but observe the relationship that "the first-born," "the first-fruits" sustain to Christ, and he will clearly see that this body obtain, in virtue of their union with Jesus as co-heirs, a power over angels.

Angel being equivalent to "Messenger, ambassador," and employed to designate not merely angels proper (Heb. 1 : 7, 14), but Christ (Zech. 1 : 12 ; Mal. 3 : 1), gospel ministers (Rev. 2 : 1, 3, 12, 18), and agencies to execute God's purpose (Rev. 15 : 8 and 14 : 6, 8, 9), it is difficult for us in every case to tell who are denoted—whether the unfallen angels or the redeemed from among men.

Obs. 2. In the future will be verified Christ's promise to Nathaniel, Jno. 1 : 51, "Verily, verily I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man." The futurity is evidenced, not simply from the fact that the past has never witnessed such a fulfilment, but by the "hereafter" and the "Son of man" referring to the period of the Sec. Advent, as seen in Luke 22 : 69, and Matt. 26 : 64. The evidence of its certainty (to which assurance the repeated "verily" points) is given in the assurance that it shall be openly manifested that others shall be witness of it.<sup>1</sup> This wonderful commingling (foreshadowed by Jacob's dream, Gen. 28 : 12) of the heavenly host with the Son of man and His associates in their glory, implies a continued ministration. It is not reasonable to suppose that angels who ministered to Jesus (Matt. 2 : 13, 19 and 28 : 2, 5 ; Acts 1 : 10, 11, etc.) and saints (Heb. 1 : 14 ; Gen. 24 : 40, etc.) on earth while suffering, who ever exhibited a deep and abiding interest in their welfare and in the progress of redemption, should cease to manifest interest and association when salvation is completed. We are assured of the contrary, e.g. in Rev. 5 : 11, 12 ; Luke 12 : 8, 9 ; Rev. 3 : 5. It is this manifestation, openly expressed, that forms an important feature in the glory of "the Christ ;" and hence He refers to it as such, Matt. 16 : 21 and 25 : 31, 32 ; Mark 8 : 38 ; Luke 9 : 26. The Theocratic ordering is not only honored but evidenced by such an association. The angelic ministration witnesses to the fact that "the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them."

<sup>1</sup> The effort is futile to make this promise to be realized in some unrecorded facts of the past in the history of Jesus and Nathaniel. Aside from the reasons assigned against it, the importance attached to it by the repeated "verily" which would, in case of past fulfilment, have led, in honor of Jesus (to establish His veracity, etc.), to a declaration of the same, forbids such an interpretation. To make this, as some do, merely symbolistic of Jesus and the divine communications received from heaven through Him, is to weaken the force and meaning of the promise, relating to experienced completed Redemption, when it is witnessed. The expressions of "angels," "seeing," "Son of man"—all evidence an actual real occurrence in the future, demonstrative of the union existing between heaven and earth. Hence we prefer and adopt Kyle's (Notes) view of angelic communication at and after the Sec. Advent. It is not figurative but real.

<sup>2</sup> If God, in the person of Jesus, thus again Theocratically dwells with man, it is the most reasonable to believe that angels shall be specially present to witness His glory, and convey the tidings of Redemption to others. For their employment in the service of God is continuous, and their appearance and agency in honoring Him is something to be anticipated. Hence the promise of Jesus to Nathaniel will be literally and truly verified in the restored Theocracy. What a sublime view this opens before us of the future. With this contrast the spiritualizing and dwarfing of the promise, as e.g. by Bushnell (Christ and His Salvation, Dis. 21, p. 434), who makes "a heaven opened in the soul itself," and "there lives the Son of man, reigning in His heavenly kingdom at the soul's own centre, and from Him go up couriers and ministers of glory, descending also back upon Him there." Comment is unnecessary. A Theocratic ordering, making God Himself the earthly Ruler, involves the attendance of angels, as a distinguishing prerogative pertaining to the Divine. Hence they attended when the Theocracy was first instituted, and hence we are informed that when again restored they shall also be present and rejoice.

Obs. 3. Angels represented as the highest and noblest of beings, having access to the presence ("face") of God, care for believers (Matt. 18 : 10) and, in virtue of the present and future of the repenting one, rejoice at the conversion of the sinner (Luke 15 : 10) ; they witness the struggles of our pilgrimage (1 Tim. 5 : 21 ; 1 Cor. 4 : 9 and 11 : 10), and they are fellow-servants of the prophets and apostles as manifested in their employment for the good of God's people, and in bringing directions and revelations of God's will (Gen. 19 : 15, 19 and 22 : 11 ; Acts 5 : 19, 20 ; Dan. 8 : 17, 19 ; Acts 8 : 26 and 10 : 3, etc.). In the very nature of the case, beings so exalted and personally employed in aiding in the developments of the Divine Plan relating to the Theocracy under Jesus and in securing its ultimate realization (e.g. Dan. 10 : 11-22 ; Zech. 1 : 9, 12, 14, 19 and 2 : 3, etc. ; Acts 7 : 53 ; Gal. 3 : 19 ; Heb. 2 : 2 ; Rev. 1 : 1, etc.) must rejoice with great joy in the grand result obtained through Jesus' sufferings, death, resurrection, and exaltation. It is then fitting that they should be present at Christ's Coming, and that ascriptions of praise and honor to the King of kings should be given by them, seeing rebellion to God crushed, an entailed curse repealed, children of God resurrected, glorified, and exalted, the race itself redeemed, and a pure Theocratic government, with its inestimable blessings, inaugurated. Their holiness, wisdom, station, love to God and Christ—all must thus inspire them—an inspiration continuous and ever present.

Obs. 4. To be "as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. 22 : 30), or to be "equal unto the angels" (Luke 20 : 36) may, as the context seems to indicate, only refer to the mode of existence (i.e. in reference to marriage, happiness, and immortality), but there is one passage which distinctly teaches a certain pre-eminency over, at least, some of the angels.<sup>1</sup> In 1 Cor. 6 : 3 we read : "Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" which evidently means ruling over angels, just as "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world?" indicates clearly a ruling over the world. This is seen by a reference to Props. 133, 134, and 154, where the meaning of judging is given in detail.<sup>2</sup> Now, such a governing power, bestowed in view of associated Rulership or Kingship with Jesus, is undoubtedly exercised in behalf of the administrations of the Theocratic Kingdom, and, consequently, must minister to the good, directly or indirectly, of its rulers or subjects. The realization can alone teach us the extent and the results of such a judging.

<sup>1</sup> We say "some," because when regarding the vast number, names, and rank of angels, it would perhaps be extreme to extend authority over all. While all may adorn the Theocratic King, while all may exhibit the deepest interest in, and love for, the glorified saints, yet some may be so exalted in rank and power, that, saving the command of "the Christ," no glorified one would presume to exercise authority over them, either by virtue of his relationship to Jesus or of his own station. The passage itself, "judge angels," is indefinite as to the number, station, or rank, and would be realized fully, if "some" out of the "innumerable company" (Heb. 12 : 22) were thus "judged."

<sup>2</sup> To limit this judging of angels to judicial investigation (Barnes, Com. loci) is to overlook the meaning (Prop. 132 and 133) of judging as given in the Scriptures. Preferable would be Prof. Stuart's opinion, as quoted by Barnes, and which he does not reject, viz. : "This may mean that the saints shall in the future world be raised to a rank in some respects more elevated than even the angels in heaven." If they rule over angels, such an elevation must certainly exist over some, if not over all, and arises from their union with the King and participation in His privileges and glory. Being "joint-heirs" with Him, and correspondingly exalted, they receive this honor because of Him. Hence we take the more comprehensive scriptural meaning of judging, not confining it to simple judicial action. Just as Jesus could, if requisite, command legions of angels to appear, so will His co-heirs have power over angels.

Obs. 5. In Dan. 10 : 13, 20 ; Heb. 2 : 5 it is intimated that angels are concerned in the present government of the world. Whatever views (Commentaries loci) are entertained respecting the exertion of their power, it is generally admitted that in some form or other they can exert, as thus taught, an influence favorable or unfavorable to nations as well as to individuals. Such a view is in sympathy with the doctrine of the Divine Sovereignty, and, so long as the restored Theocratic Kingdom has not appeared, is in accord with the spirit and intent of the dispensations. But when the restored Theocracy under Jesus and His brethren appears, then the complete sovereignty under the whole heaven (Dan. 7 : 27) is given to them, and dominion over nations and individuals is exerted by them.

This the predicted reign of "the Christ" and saints again and again emphatically declares, so that the angelic agency that may have been exerted in the past in national counsels and national movements is superseded (Heb. 2 : 5) by a direct visible agency exerted by Jesus and His body. But such angelic presiding over nations, even by "the chief princes," only indicates how interested the angelic host must be in the development of the ultimate deliverance of the nations from the bondage under which they groan. The past agency insures a continued interest, and such sympathy and aid as may be in accordance with the Theocratic ordering.

It is not requisite to enter into a discussion of the agency of evil angels as implied in Dan. 10 (comp. Com. loci). For such, in view of the overthrow and binding of Satan, and his ultimate complete withdrawal from the race, will be entirely superseded by the established Theocracy. Dan. 10 and other passages set aside the opinion of Christadelphians, Universalists, and others, that Satan and his angels only denotes personified evil or sin or a principle. The general analogy of Scripture is opposed to it, however, in certain instances a figurative or symbolical application is intended. The latter by no means remove the former. Indeed, if the Christadelphian view is correct, it would be difficult to vindicate the teaching of Jesus and the apostles from the charge of an abject accommodation to ignorance, prejudice, and error. The reference accuser, etc. (as adversary, etc.), that is made to men, to evil, to organized Anti-Christian bodies, etc., does not diminish the force of meaning when also applied to fallen angels. When correctly regarded, the one—owing to the same spirit, enmity, etc., exhibited—sustains the other. That fallen angels exist is unmistakably taught, as in 2 Pet. 2 : 4 ; Jude 6. It is impossible, except by the grossest spiritualizing, to avoid the conclusions of Mark 1 : 24 ; Luke 4 : 41 ; James 12 : 19 ; Acts 16 : 16-18 ; and 19 : 13, 15, 16 ; Luke 10 : 17 ; Jude 9, etc. To evidence the absurdity of a total ignoring of fallen spirits, it is only requisite to make evil personified, or an evil principle to have gone out of the two possessed and entering the swine (Matt. 8 : 28-34). Whatever difficulties may—owing to the conciseness of statements, the manner of representation, etc.—be connected with the doctrine of fallen angels, one thing is self-evident that immensely greater, so far as the integrity of the Word and the testimony of Jesus is concerned, attach themselves to its denial (comp. Arts. on in Bib. Dicts., Sys. Divs. etc.). Adopting the principles of our opponents, it would be easy, because of the application of the word angel, to deny the existence of good angels, making them personified holiness, or a good principle. The ground of denial is, to say the least, a dangerous one.

Obs. 6. One of the blessed ingredients of future happiness and glory will be the intercourse of the glorified saints with the angelic host. This will prove a never-ending source of blissful enjoyment. To converse with those who witnessed creation, who have been the trusted messengers of God in countless missions of mercy and love, who for ages have had the honor and glory of God at heart, who are so exalted in knowledge, wisdom, and power—this will be a privilege indeed. To familiarly associate with such beings, to visit with them earth or heaven, to be united with them in the strongest ties of a common devotion and communion, to interchange experiences of the past and present, etc., all this is an honor exceedingly great—such as never was found in the most splendid of earthly courts.

PROPOSITION 158. The doctrine of the Kingdom aids in locating the Millennial period.

The Millennial predictions are descriptions of this restored Theocracy under David's Son. This has been abundantly shown under previous propositions. This Kingdom being overthrown, the throne and Kingdom of David being still desolate, the postponement of its restoration being fully stated and witnessed down to the present day, the events immediately connected with its restoration not having occurred, for these and other reasons the Millennial predictions necessarily relate to the future.

The reader will observe that the varied views entertained by our opponents fully meets the objection urged by Waldegrave (New Test. Mill.), on the ground of differences and antagonism of interpretations by Mill. writers. He forgets, however, two things: (1.) that Pre-Mills. differ among themselves as to the details of their system, but agree in the grand outlines (as e.g. in a Pre-Mill. Advent, a first literal resurrection, the reign of the Christ and His saints, the establishment of His Kingdom on earth, the second resurrection after the thousand years, etc.); (2.) that our opponents have even greater differences and antagonisms, not merely in details, but in the outlines (as e.g. in the location of the Millennium, the denial of a Millennium, the resurrection, the reign, the Kingdom, etc.). His implied boast of unity falls to the ground, because many of his own party refuse to adopt his presented theory of the Millennium. Thus e.g. The Princeton Review, July, 1856, in an art. on his work, eulogizes his supposed demolition of Millenarianism, but just so soon as the writer comes to the 7th. Lecture, where Waldegrave sets fourth his own doctrine of the Mill., then he enters his dissent and protest. The value of Waldegrave's critical effort is seen and estimated by his favoring a Mill. that is even now in progress, if not already past! having its persecuting powers and its martyrs! Blessed Millennium!

Obs. 1. Hence the doctrine of the Kingdom refutes the theory of those who locate the Mill. era in the past. Grotius, Prideaux, Lightfoot, Brightman, Usher, Turretin (the elder), Ewald, Bush, Stuart, Davidson, and some others, hold to this theory. It has been so ably refuted by Shimeall (I Will Come Again) and others, including many of those who have written against us (as e.g. Brown, Fairbairn, etc.), that it is unnecessary to repeat the arguments. It may, however, be observed that their systems containing their views of the Kingdom led to some such departure, owing to the impossibility—without gross inconsistency—of reconciling a literal resurrection, the reign, etc., with their notion of the Kingdom. Surprise, too, is allowable in seeing able and talented men take a view which, one (Bush) of them himself admits, at first appears "revolting" (and hence has been but little followed). Telling us that in the plain grammatical sense there has been no fulfilment; that to find a fulfilment the prophecies must be spiritualized or curtailed or shorn of their alleged "Oriental imagery;" that the language and ideas are "too Jewish" to suit the enlightened condition and circumstances of a Christian dispensation, and hence must be rejected or some other meaning be engrafted thereupon, these persons take the most exalted Millennial descriptions, and force them, against express language and the facts of history, into the past history of the Church and as thus already fulfilled. Surely when such violence is done, that the mixed, often persecuted, sorely tried, often relapsed and struggling condition of the Church can be made to cover Millennial prophecy; that a period of time, at the pleasure of the interpreter, can be separated from the Millennial predictions of Daniel, Isaiah, etc.; that an era of promised happiness and reigning can be converted into one of severe trial to accommodate a theory; that characters, to say the least, very suspicious are elevated (as e.g. Constantine) into the predicted Saviour of the Church; that a period festering with heresies, intolerance, bigotry, superstitions, relic worship, etc., is the blessed Kingdom—these things are amply sufficient to evince the utter untenableness of such a theory. The Kingdom predicted by the prophets presents entirely different and most glorious aspects from those given to us by Eccl. History. The latter is a sad commentary on human frailty and depravity, while the former is a triumph of humanity made strong under the supervision and leadership of David's Son and Lord.

It is sad to witness the legitimate extreme outgrowth of the spiritualizing interpretation. Thus e.g. take the "Perfectionists" (see His. American Socialisms, by John Humphrey Noyes, or art. "Amer. Socialisms," Westm. Review, Ap., 1870.), who maintain that the Millennial age is past, that the Sec. Advent took place about 90 years after the First, that the victory of Christ over sin and the devil is now gradually accomplishing and will, in this dispensation, result in abolition of bodily disease, physical death, etc. Entertaining the view that now they are in the Kingdom of God, they reject the institution of marriage as not existing in the present Kingdom of heaven, and under the plea of oneness with Christ and each other they encourage promiscuous sexual intercourse. Let the student refer to the history of Noyes, as given by himself, and see how men under the influence of the teaching of Moses Stuart, Robison, Taylor, and others, are led step by step to new notions abhorred and condemned by such instructors, but which are based on their doctrines respecting the Kingdom of God and the Millennial era. The primitive church view gives no place for such errors, and discourages all tendency to lead to them, making the present probationary and preparatory, and fixing its hope on the Second Advent and Kingdom. As illustrative what able men will do with their favorite Church-Kingdom theory run to an extreme, we instance Lightfoot (Works, vol. 6, p. 255), who commences the thousand years at the time when Paul, Barnabas, and others first preached to the Gentiles, and says the devil was bound (?) during this period and got loose again (?) afterward. Turretin (Inst. Theol., p. 650) is a little undecided when to date its rise, mentioning the incarnation of Christ, His passion and death, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the accession of Constantine, as points of commencement. So also Mastricht (Theol., vol. 1, p. 483), Marck (comp. Theol., p. 631). But all such theories carry such an enormous load, that few accept of them.

We might, perhaps, find some apology for the ignorance of (Annals of Roger De Hoveden, vol. 2, p. 521) Pope Innocent III. and others, who held that the thousand years ended A.D. 1200 (some before this ended them A.D. 1000 and later), and that Satan was then loosed, but with the additional light thrown by history, etc., on prophecy, it seems very strange that such a man as Hengstenberg (Apoc., vol. 2, p. 334) should date the rise of the Millennium from the erection of the "Holy Roman Empire" under Charlemagne, A.D. 800. What a Millennial period! darkness, martyrdom, idolatry, infidelity, religious wars, persecutions, revolutions, anarchy, all the evils that could possibly afflict the Church and the world experienced. The dreadful wickedness, malice, and cruelty of the dark ages, show that Satan, instead of being bound, revelled with his votaries, and that the saints, instead of reigning, were crushed to the earth, having to seek the caves and dens of the mountains to save life. Lange (Apoc., p. 352, as quoted by Dr. West) well remarks: "The chaining of Satan ill admits an assignment to the Middle Age; as if Machiavellism, the inquisition, dragonades and the like, belong to the periods of the First Resurrection." Auberlen (The Prophet Daniel) presents some good strictures on such a perversion. If the past is all the Millennium to be expected (for Satan was, in Hengstenberg's theory, let loose in the French Revolution, and we are now in the time of "Gog and Magog"), then the predictions are a plain failure. The very Empire that he so highly exalts is represented in Scripture as a beast, and one to be destroyed before the Mill. age begins. In the Nuremberg Bibel, Ed. 1747, in the brief notes attached to Rev. 20 : 1-6, the thousand years are dated from the time the Apoc. was written, and such a theory with those who adopted the Augustinian view was favorably entertained, because they supposed as the Turks came after a thousand years this was a fulfilment of the letting loose of Satan, and a sign of the nearness of the Second Advent, not seeing that by such a process they made void the predicted Millennial blessings, reversed the chronological order of events, and were compelled to spiritualize largely in order to accommodate Scripture to their position. Compare the views presented by Lange in the Intro. and concluding portion of his Com. on Rev. and Dr. Craven's Excursus.

Obs. 2. This doctrine also disproves the theory of those (as e.g. some R. Cath. Theologians and others, who simply regard the Millennial prophecies as a portraiture of this dispensation past, present, and future. The same reasons alleged against the view under Obs. 1., will apply here ; and we may add several more which are opposed to both these opinions. It is taken for granted that this dispensation is equivalent to "the times of the Gentiles." But as many writers have clearly shown, they widely differ, seeing that "the times of the Gentiles" extend back into the Mosaic dispensation from the time of the overthrow of the Kingdom and the captivity of the Jews, being a phrase denoting the period of Gentile domination, while, on the other hand, this dispensation can only be dated from what followed the First Advent. By this identification and union of things that differ, they hope to get rid of "the Jewish" aspect of the Kingdom and show that the Millennial predictions describe "the times of the Gentiles," when the real truth in the case is, that the Millennial portrayals represent the Millennium to commence, the Kingdom to be established, at the very time that the "Gentile Times" come to an end (Prop. 164). Indeed, it is impossible for the Kingdom to come so long as Jerusalem is trodden down by the Gentiles (Props. 66, 112, 122, etc.). The process in this dispensation of engrafting Gentiles does not make it a Gentile dispensation, for the Jews enjoy precisely the same privileges of the Gospel and Church that the Gentiles do ; the invitation and blessings are common to all, and it becomes a dispensation of grace to us Gentiles in that the adoption of Gentiles is so accessible under it. Again, it is supposed that this dispensation embraces the Millennial era as part of it, on the ground that the Church is the Kingdom, and will develop itself into the stage indicated under the Millennium. But we have shown at length (Props. 88-102) that the Church cannot possibly be the Kingdom, being opposed alike to covenant, promises based on the covenant, predictions of the prophets, and by the lack of everything that is essential to the promised Theocratic Kingdom. Besides this, having proven the undoubted postponement (Props. 57-68 and 94) of the Kingdom, the mixed condition and continued trial of the Church to the end of this age, the fact that the Kingdom as predicted is linked with the Second Advent, the ushering in of another era or dispensation after the Sec. Coming of Christ distinctively called "the Day of the Lord Jesus," and numerous other particulars, all showing that this dispensation is not the predicted one in which Jesus and His saints reign in the manner indicated by prophets, it produces an evident antagonism in Scripture to fasten upon it such an opinion, and it leads to many embarrassing and really (under its direction) unanswerable objections from unbelievers, which the current apologetics but lamely meets.

For a specimen of well-intended spiritualizing, see Cowles on The Minor Prophets, especially Zech., ch. 14, where the Origenistic ideas are modernized in a manner that ought to accommodate Swedenborgianism, etc. Let the student compare the plain grammatical sense and the context in its entire connection, and he must feel that the exposition is a complete failure to reconcile the chapter with modern notions of the Millennium. Many, otherwise able, writers evince, in this direction, not only the fault of spiritualizing (in order to force passages into an accommodation with their respective theories), but evince a total disregard to the time and order of fulfilment, mingling passages together, as if related, which the Spirit has separated by an interval of time and the events of which are successive. Gipps (Treatise on the First Res.) affords another illustration of such spiritualizing application, so that the Millennial era is not to be regarded even as future. The extreme is reached when men apply the Millennial predictions to their own Church establishments, as Swedenborgians, Shakers, and others, and recently repeated by a Mr. Schroeder (N. Y. Evangelist, Jan. 16th, 1879), who has published a prospectus of a new movement or religious organization, which he calls "The Millennial Church of our Lord." Catholicism sees in the Romish Church the Mill. predictions realized, and finds its strong support in the perversions of the Augustinian (City of God, 20: 7-9) theory, which makes the Mill. age the age of the Christian Church. The modified views of Grotius, Hammond, Hengstenberg, and others attributing to the Church in the past some such Mill. era, or even of Gipps, Waldgrave, etc., as now progressing in the revival of the martyr spirit, are, more or less, in unison with Augustine's spiritualizing notions. And it is a matter of surprise that such writers as Wordsworth and others, misled by a favorite Church-Kingdom theory, should revive the unscriptural and unhistorical views of Jerome, Eusebius, etc., who lauded and magnified the Church beyond its present design. The small following that it has, even among our opponents, indicates that it is deemed unreliable and one-sided.

Obs. 3. The line of argument already adduced adequately meets all other opposing theories respecting the Millennium. Totally to ignore the Millennial era, to pass it by in silence, or to ascribe it to a human origin, is either to manifest disrespect to the Spirit, who has so largely dealt in it and makes it the culminating point of Redemption, or to deny that the Word is given by Divine inspiration. Transplanting the Millennial blessedness into the third heaven is so gross a violation of the entire tenor of Scripture, which locates it here on the earth, that very few have ventured to advocate it. Making some particular Church organization or association of belief or form of doctrine the fulfilment of the crowning excellency of Millennial prophecy, is so palpable a caricature of them that it is a matter of amazement that most amiable and learned men have given their influence in dissominating it. Ascribing only to Mill. prophecies the inherent desires of the soul after deliverance, and which will be realized in the natural development of humanity, is both to lower the origin of those prophecies and to advocate a manner of realization beyond the power of a corrupted humanity. Locating the Millennium in the future, but spiritualizing its predictions (i.e. after the grammatical sense is ascertained to add to it another and alleged higher sense), is to leave its manner of verification to the caprice or imagination of the interpreter; to destroy the Divine unity of the Word by changing, modifying, reconstructing, and adding to covenant and prophetic phraseology; to set aside, as unworthy of fulfilment, the oath-bound covenant promises of God, and to deny to David's Son, the Son of man, the throne and Kingdom specially and gloriously covenanted to Him. Such "hypotheses" respecting the Millennium are purely of human origin and, according to our detailed argument based step by step on Scripture, have no foundation in the Word. They may, therefore, in the abundance of proof presented against them in our various propositions, be dismissed with the remark, that such a variety of them and the prevailing extent to which they are advocated (intrenched in the churches with able men as their advocates) is necessary to meet the predictions of the times just preceding the ushering in of the Millennial era which are characterized (Props. 174, 177, 178) as pervaded with unbelief concerning the Coming and Kingdom of the Lord Christ. For such a result to be produced, to bend the thinking and believing of the multitude into such a condition of disbelief, necessarily (unless we greatly underrate the intelligence of man) requires the aid and labors of sincere, pious, and learned men, and the dissemination of various and antagonistic views. Alas! the obscuration of truth, the darkening of the most precious covenanted promises under the leading influence of "philosophy falsely so called," the humiliating form in which so many alleged defences of the early Church appear, the removal of the ancient landmarks of a grammatical interpretation and the substitution of others to suit the Spirit of the age—these things surely indicate that we even have been under the shadow of an already commenced and continuing eclipse. If wise to enter into and receive the spirit of prophecy relating to these things; if observant of what occurs around us just as predicted, we will be slow to receive theories which in their very tendency pave the way for men to undergo the severe trial yet in store for the Church and world.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Some who profess themselves abundantly able to oppose Millenarians and enlighten us on prophecy, etc., are still unable (see a specimen criticised in Lord's Journal, Ap. 1857) to decide the simple fact, whether the Millennial age is past, or present, or future; or, whether it will be, if future, a better state than the present. The Shakers with their mistaken present "Millennial Church," or the Swedenborgians with their asserted existing "New Jerusalem Church," or the Mormons with their new built "Zion," are far more consistent and logical than such indefinite, prevaricating writers. Millenarians may differ in details, but they do not produce such antagonistic systems. The fact that the spiritualizing interpretation introduces those widely divergent and hostile views—that even the grand outlines are in direct opposition one to another—ought to arrest the student's attention. A recent extravagant effort at producing a Millennial theory is that of T. Spence, who presents us with "A Receipt" (recipe, he probably means) "to make a Millennium, or Happy World,"—a kind of easy free-love, communistic Millennium, after the Woodhull and Claflin pattern.

<sup>2</sup> When such a man as Hengstenberg dates the 1000 years from A.D. 800 in the erection of "the Holy Roman Empire" under Charlemagne (and Rev. informs us that this same empire is "a beast" to be destroyed); when Bede applies the 1000 years to the Christian dispensation, and makes the first resurrection to be equivalent to baptism; when Augustine makes the 1000 years to begin with the earthly life of Jesus, when Satan was alleged to be bound, and he was cast out into the abyss, i.e., from Christendom into the hearts of the wicked, non-Christian nations; when the Nüremberg Bible (ed. 1747) asserts that the 1000 years must have begun when the book (Apoc.) was made, since the Turk had appeared at the end of a thousand years, we need not be surprised at the various theories which ignore the things predicted of the reign of Christ and His saints, and the events which are described as pertaining to the thousand years and following it. The inferential manner in which many passages of Scripture are adduced in support of some of those theories, reminds one strongly of the seven golden candlesticks of the Apoc., the seven-branched candlestick of the Tabernacle, and the seven churches of Asia being adduced to prove, against Galileo, that only seven planets were possible, or how in Scotland fanning mills were denounced as contrary to the text "the wind bloweth where it listeth," etc., because in league with Satan, who is "prince of the powers of the air," raising "the devil's wind" (White's Warfare of Science). The Post-Mill. theory, developed by Whitby and advocated by Brown, Barnes, and a host of others, is the prevailing view in the Church, leading, through the ability and number of its advocates, to the predicted unbelief in the Coming and Kingdom of the Messiah as covenanted and prophesied.

Obs. 4. Our opponents even claim for their denial of a Millennium proper that such is "the Church doctrine." Thus, e.g. the Princeton Review (Ap.

1850, p. 330, etc.), in opposing Rev. Imbrie's Millenarian Sermon, "The Kingdom of God," virtually re-adopts the Popish view, viz., that there is no Millennium in the future, saying "there is to be no such Millennium as is assumed by the advocates of the other theories to be predicted"—"it is not assumed (i.e. by himself) that there is to be any Millennium strictly speaking." But then the writer explains: "The glowing passages which are referred by some to the period of Christ's personal reign, and by others to a spiritual Millennium, are, according to this view, to be understood of the state of things after the final consummation" (i.e. are to be located to a period after the last resurrection, final judgment, etc.). And this he calls "the Church doctrine," a doctrine utterly unknown to the Primitive Church for several centuries, and repudiated by a host of the ablest expositors and theologians; and which in the form given is really held by very few Protestants. The Princeton Review simply revives Burnet's "Theory," which locates the Millennium—against the express order of the Apoc. and the analogy of Scripture—after the general judgment, engrafting the same on the Popish view, so that what cannot be appropriated to this dispensation is conveniently, without regard to context, turned over to this consummation."

It would be gratuitous to criticise Berg's The Stone and the Image: or the American Republic, for it is evident that a writer who can make the Fifth Kingdom of Dan. 2 and 7 to be the American Republic, of which the Messiah is king, can readily see already the glorious dawning of the Mill. day—its first rays flashing before the dazzled eyes of this enthusiastic divine. "The Seventh-day Adventist" notion (expressed by Waggoner, etc.) that the Millennium is a thousand years, in which the earth is made void and destroyed, the saints reigning in heaven, is so utterly opposed to the analogy of the Word and the doctrine of the early Church, that it needs no special refutation. So Hazard's (Rev. Revealed) idea that "Antichrist during this period (i.e. thousand years) reigned despotically over the nations," making Christ's reign a spiritual one in the heart of believers, is such a reversal of the facts of the prediction, that a mere mention is amply sufficient. Düsterdieck (Offenb. Johannis, p. 555) mentions "Wetstein, who regards the thousand years as the times of the Messiah reduced to the period of forty years (!) onward from the death of Domitian; Gog, and Magog being Barcochba." One wonders whether men are really serious in such perversions. Some few, to get rid of the whole matter, speak of the thousand years as "a timeless spiritual condition," i.e. a representation, spiritual, of the Church in all time, past, present, and future. But such overlook its exact historical time, chronological order, with events preceding, containing, and following. Some endeavor, in vain, to occupy a neutral position as e.g. a writer in the Princeton Review (July, 1856, p. 550) quotes Dr. Alexander as saying, "To what period the thousand years in the Apoc. refer, we profess that we do not know; and therefore we cannot be sure whether it is past or future. We are, therefore, neither Millenarians nor Pre-Millenarians." This profession amounts to nothing, seeing that in his interpretations of related passages he shows himself to be a decided Post-Millenarian. Beside, such professed neutrals are very positive in denying its location in the future as advocated by us, showing that the profession of non-knowledge does not forbid the assumption of being better acquainted with the subject.

Obs. 5. Against all theories which locate the Mill. age (the thousand years) in the past or present, or after the last resurrection, it is sufficient to point out, what every able commentator of the Apoc. concedes, viz., that the distinctive thousand years of Rev. 20 follow after the seven seals, seven trumpets and seven vials; after a certain harvest and vintage; after a particular Advent and conflict; after a complete overthrow of Antichristian enemies; after a binding of Satan; and then after the supremacy and ruling of saints it is followed by "a little season" witnessing a remarkable but futile outburst of enmity; and then, and only then, after the thousand years are ended comes the last resurrection and the entrance into the eternal ages. No such order, no such events have been witnessed in the past or present, and by the very nature of the predictions, interposing time and events, cannot be transposed to the eternal state. Simple unity, justice to the order laid down, demands that Rev. 20 : 1-6 should be regarded as a distinctive period, that of the binding of Satan, after which he is released and the events follow which precede the consummation of the last resurrection and judgment. No Bible reader who simply follows the order laid down can mistake the plainness of prediction.

It is only a preconceived opinion that violates this order. Thus e.g. the Church-Kingdom theory is made the starting-point. Bush, Barnes, and others assume that the kingdom of Dan. 7, for instance, was set up in the past (over against the regular series of chronological events which precede such an establishment—comp. Prop. 121), and consequently Rev. 20 : 1-6 is applied to sustain this unfounded assumption, and all the Millennial prophecies are perverted to its support. Waldegrave (New Test. Mill., S. 7) even advocates a Millennium now in progress, if not entirely past! And he introduces into it, over against the plainest predictions, persecuting powers, and martyrs! The thousand years are a period not, of triumph, but of suffering and martyrdom! in which the Church is in sack-cloth and ashes! And such a theory we are to receive as more scriptural than the early Church view defended in these pages. As an illustration of the popular method of handling this subject, we present the ideas of Rev. Dr. Joel Swartz, who, in an art. on "The Millennium" (Luth. Observer, Jan. 17th, 1879), undertakes to tell us when and how the Mill. age is to be introduced. After eulogizing the power of Christianity overunbelief (keeping in the background the reverses, retrogressions, etc., of the Church, and carefully avoiding the predictions of future persecutions from rampant unbelief), he culminates as follows: "Shall we say the Millennium is coming? Shall we not rather say it is here? I am one who rejoices to believe that the only Millennium which this earth is ever to know, is already initiated, and hastening toward its glorious completion. Its dawn began already to tip the hill-tops of Judea when the servants of Jesus Christ were sent forth." This is the Popish idea revived, making the Mill. age equivalent to this dispensation, as e.g. advocated by Wordsworth in his Hulsean Lectures. Not satisfied with Hengstenberg's Charlemagne's "Holy Roman Empire" or Grotius's and others' downfall of Paganism in the fourth century, he returns to the Augustinian view adopted by the Romish Church. He endeavors to enforce his Millennial theory by the usual objections (which we repeatedly answer in this work; and then to establish his unscriptural position proceeds to repeat the stale abuse that our doctrine is "Jewish," "a Jewish heresy," "hostile to the Gospel," that it "sides with infidels in their being no conversion of the world," is one of "despair and not of hope," "akin to unbelief and not of faith," allied with "extravagance, fanaticism, and infidelity," containing (as in the late Proph. Conference) "Grotesque absurdities," "foolish literalisms," "amusing contradictions," "large pretensions," and "heresies which it was its chief aim to establish.") On the strength of this, we are to receive his doctrine utterly repudiated by the early Church for centuries, and fully condemned by the Scriptures, and branded by Luther as "a doctrine of the devil," and regarded as entirely unfounded (saving in men's own imaginations) by many of the ablest and most devoted sons of the Church (comp. Hist. of Doc., Props. 73-78). West, in his essay on the Hist. of Doctrine, has well remarked that no more erroneous and contradictory system of interpretation was ever invented than that adopted by the Origenistic school, which makes the conclusion of the Apoc. to be its beginning (with which compare Auberlen's Daniel, p. 322; Luthardt's Lehre, p. 234; Elliott's Horæ Apoc., vol. 4; Biekersteth's Prom. Glory, p. 177; Birks's Unfulf. Prophecy, p. 81; Rothe's Dogmatic, 3, 77; Lange's Apoc., 343; Mede's Works, p. 549; Dürstediack Offenbarung Johannis, 32, 43, 225, 541; Kleiforth's Offenbarung, 3, 247; Rierck's Zeichen, p. 331, and the works of Brookes, Seiss, and Pre-Mill. writers in general who advert to the same). An exceedingly arbitrary arrangement is that found in Ralston (On the Apoc., p. 167), who introduces into this Millennium four of the trumpets, the two witnesses, etc., so that he produces a remarkably diversified Millennium, utterly unrecognizable from the one given by the Spirit.

Obs. 6. The Millennial period is inseparably connected with the restoration of the Jews (which the restored Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom absolutely demands—see Props. 111, 112, 113, 114). The prophecies, the covenant, the restitution, all require this as a preliminary. Millennial blessedness without the cessation of Jewish tribulation and the elevation of that nation to its predicted supremacy, is something unknown to the Scriptures. Hence this simple distinctive point is itself sufficient to crush opposing theories which contradict it.

This restoration and supremacy of the Jewish nation, this union of the nation with the restored Davidic throne and kingdom, invariably linked, and implied, with the Millennium, effectually answers the dating of the Millennium from the birth or ministry, or death, or ascension of Christ, or from the day of Pentecost, or from the preaching of Paul, or from the giving of the Apocalypse, or from the destruction of Rome, or from the victory of Constantine, or from the reign of Charlemagne, or from the Reformation, or from the French Revolution, or from the era of Missions, or from any other imaginary date of the past. Events, as predicted, unwitnessed and having their fulfilment in the future, are utterly antagonistic to them. The past and the present pronounce them visionary and misleading. Eloquence may eulogize them, poetry may adorn them, great names may give them weight, but, nevertheless, they lead into grave error and to a position opposed to that commanded by the Master.

PROPOSITION 159. This Theocratic Kingdom of the Lord Jesus, the Christ, will never come to an end.

It is asserted by some (as e.g. Calvin, Insti., B. 3, ch. 25) that our doctrine limits the reign of Christ only to the one thousand years. This is incorrect. While some Millenarians explain the "delivering up of the Kingdom" somewhat similar to our opposers, yet even nearly all—if not all—of these, as far as we have any knowledge of their writings, affirm that Jesus continues to reign in the same Kingdom, subordinately to the Father, after the close of the thousand years. The reasons for the perpetuity of the Christ's Kingdom will now be presented, and the only passage that seems to militate against it will be examined.

Richter's Erläuterte Haus Bibel, Tom. 6, p. 1134, advocates the perpetuation of the Kingdom, and incidentally remarks: "Calvin is zealous against the heretical teachers (Anabaptists), who circle off and restrict the duration of Christ's Kingdom of glory to one thousand years, and deny its much greater and everlasting duration after the one thousand years expired." (But Calvin while denouncing one error, fell into another, viz., restricting the thousand years to the Militant Church in this dispensation, thus following Augustine.) Tyso (Pre-Millenarian) holds that at the end of the thousand years, Christ and the saints will leave this earth forever, which has just as little foundation in Scripture, as the opposite extreme held by some Seventh-day Adventists that Christ and His saints are not on the earth during the thousand years, but come after that period. The critical student is reminded that the perpetuity of the Kingdom is denied by some (e.g. Koch, Das Tausendjährige Reich), because, as they suppose, when the thousand years' reign is ended, it will be succeeded by another as portrayed in Rev. 21 and 22, thus making the latter to follow the former in chronological order. This is a fruitful source of misconception, and has been answered in detail under Prop. 151. The doctrine of the perpetuity of the Kingdom, so long as the distinctive covenanted throne and Kingdom is preserved intact, does not prevent the idea of changes or additions being produced as circumstances or developments require, or as a growth or advance to ultimate perfection (as e.g. in the final rooting out after the one thousand years of all evil) demands. We may add that many writers of ability (as e.g. Thompson in Theol. of Christ, p. 28) affirm the perpetuity of Christ's Kingdom when established, without explaining or referring to 1 Cor. 15: 24. So general was this in the past, that Dorner (Person of Christ, vol. 1, p. 409) says: "It is false to say that any one of the Church writers conceived the one thousand years' Kingdom to be the last. On the contrary, they represent it as a stage of transition to eternal life," etc. This is true—impelled to it by the Scripture affirmations concerning the perpetuity of Christ's reign—of the idea of reigning evermore in some form or other, but is incorrect when applied to the distinctive reign of the one thousand years, which some supposed to come to an end.

Obs. 1. While the words "eternal," "everlasting," "forever," are sometimes employed to denote limited duration (i.e. duration adapted to the nature of the thing of which it is affirmed), yet such words applied to the Kingdom of Jesus Christ cannot be thus restricted, because an unending duration intended by them is stated in explanatory phraseology (as e.g. Luke 1: 32 "of His Kingdom there shall be no end," etc.). The thousand years are specifically mentioned as the period of Satan's binding and of the time existing between the two resurrections, and of this era it is also asserted that Christ and His saints reign. The declaration of their reigning during this period does not limit the reign to it, but is added to indicate that the reign is already commenced and extends through this Millenary age. Jesus is not merely the king of "an age" but of "the ages" (1 Tim. 1 : 17 Greek), and His Kingdom is united, not merely to "an age," but to "the age of ages" or "eternal ages," thus indicating its extension onward through the vast succession of time in unending series. Hence the perpetuity of the Kingdom is freely declared in 2 Sam. 7 : 16 ; Heb. 1 : 8 ; Luke 1 : 32, 33 ; Rev. 11 : 15 ; Isa. 9 : 7 ; 2 Pet. 1 : 11, etc., and this is explained, Dan. 2 : 44, to be "a Kingdom that shall never be destroyed," and in Dan. 7 : 14, "His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and His Kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."<sup>1</sup> Indeed, so expressive are these and kindred passages that even those who advocate a transfer of the Kingdom to the Father and some kind of an ending of the Kingdom, are still forced, by their weight and concurrence, unhesitatingly to acknowledge, in some form (as Barnes, etc.) "the perpetuity of Christ's Kingdom and His eternal reign." Hence this reign, beginning at the Millennial era, is not terminated by the close of the thousand years.<sup>2</sup> The idea of the perpetuity of Christ's reign was so generally diffused in the early Church, that we even find it in the Sibylline Oracles (B. 3) "the Holy King of all the earth shall come, who shall wield the sceptre during all the ages of swiftly moving time," etc.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Daniel also predicts that "the saints of the Most High shall receive the Kingdom forever, even forever and ever." Numerous critics have observed that this reduplicated form of successive ages must necessarily imply "absolute eternity" (so e.g. Lewis, Six Days of Creation, p. 372, who, however, thinking it used in relation to the world as to time, renders it "for the world and the world of worlds;" we prefer its direct reference to time as related to this world). Even Barnes (Com., Dan. 7 : 14) fully and frankly admits that Daniel's phraseology denotes that the Kingdom thus established "would be permanent and eternal" (and as he applies this prediction to the Church as constituted in this dispensation, which in other places he affirms shall cease thus to exist, his concession is contradictory to his system of eschatology).

<sup>2</sup> Some advocate these thousand years to be literal ; others that they are prophetic years (making three hundred and sixty thousand) ; others that they are a round number for an indefinite period, and a few others the symbol of perfection or eternity. The connection that these thousand years sustain to the preceding Millenaries, while definitely employed to indicate the binding of Satan, to fulfil prophetic announcements, etc., at the same time seem to indicate, in view of a separation of time corresponding with each of the six preceding—a literal period thus constituting the week with its Sabbath given in a distinctive form, preparatory to the ages following. The question, however, is not essential. By way of explanation we add : it is a misapprehension of Waggoner and others, that we limit "the day of the Lord"—"the day of the Lord Jesus Christ" to these one thousand years. Such phraseology extends beyond it, being indefinite and declarative of the time when the Lord is specially manifested. The making the one thousand years' reign in heaven and at its close on earth is so opposed by covenant and prophecy, by the continuity of fulfilment, by the proper conception of what constitutes Christ's kingdom, by the elect condition of the Jewish nation, by the early preaching and primitive faith, etc., etc., that it needs no serious refutation separately, as all the objections alleged are fully met under propositions.

<sup>3</sup> The Jewish idea of the perpetuity of the Messianic Kingdom is given by Knapp (Ch. Theol., p. 353), who informs us that the Jews "spoke of the eternal King and the eternal Kingdom of David, Ps. 89 ; Sam. 7." While some (see Art. "Messiah," Herzog's Cyclop.) differed as to the duration of the Kingdom, yet Knapp's statement is supported by the more general opinion, sustained by an appeal to Scripture. Therefore, Reuss (His. Ch. Theol. Apos. Age) affirms that the perpetuity of the Kingdom was held by the Jews, saying that, "The idea of cessation or end was incompatible with the very conception of the Christ." Especially will this be seen by observing that the doctrine of the resurrection and immortal blessedness was associated with it. The early Church view has been sufficiently stated in various quotations from the Fathers, but as the Kingdom lost its distinctive covenanted character and the notion of the Divine Sovereignty was substituted in its place, expressions evidencing the change became more and more apparent, even while the perpetuity was still held. Thus e.g. in the Synodical Letter of the Bishops assembled in Council at Sardica (Theodoret's Eccles. His., p. 78) the orthodoxy of Marcellus is declared, because "he did not affirm, as they (his enemies) represented that His (Christ's) Kingdom would have an end. On the contrary, he wrote that His Kingdom had had no beginning and would have no end." But Hagenbach (His. of Doc., vol. 1, Sec. 139) says that Marcellus was one of the first who interpreted 1 Cor. 15 : 25 as indicative that Christ's Kingdom will at some future time come to an end. Cyril of Jerusalem opposed this notion, appealing to Luke 1 : 33 ; Dan. 7 : 13, 14, etc., and "in reference to 1 Cor. 15 : 25 he asserts that the term 'the end' includes the terminus ad quem." The student only requires to be reminded that the Nicene Constantinopolitan Creed emphatically teaches of the Messiah's Kingdom : "Whose Kingdom shall have no end."

Obs. 2. But in the Proposition it is stated that the Theocratic Kingdom of Jesus Christ shall not end. This is an important point, and deserves, for the sake of the honor and glory pertaining to Jesus, the Christ, careful consideration ; especially as we are forced to differ from a multitude of expositors on this subject. Let the reader turn to the covenant which bestows this Kingdom upon Jesus, to the prophets which describe it, and the Bible (unless it be one solitary passage which will be duly examined) only recognizes one Kingdom, this Theocratic one, which pertains to Jesus, the Christ. And what is more to the purpose, the declarations of perpetuity, of never ending, of never being destroyed, etc, are all predicated of this identical Kingdom and not (as some unwarrantably affirm) of another one. If there is any force or propriety in language, this is most positively asserted, confirming and enforcing various propositions given relating to this Kingdom. It shows that the Kingdom described by Daniel, Isaiah, David, John, and others, when once established under the Messiah, is a perpetual, ever-enduring one, extending into eternity. Linked and identified as it is with restitution, with the new heaven and new earth, with the New Jerusalem state, etc., it possesses within itself the elements (saying nothing of the immortal King and associated rulers) of perpetuity. It is significant that the apostles adopt the Jewish phraseology, speaking of the perpetuity of the Messianic reign and Kingdom, without giving the least intimation of a change in meaning. The character, person, offices, position, in brief, all pertaining to the Messiah, as David's Son, once obtained by Him are appropriately represented as belonging to Him evermore. The inheritance given to Him as David's Son ; the reward bestowed upon Him as such is never given up by Him, or withdrawn from Him. To say that David's Son will ever occupy a lower, subsidiary position, or that He will yield up His inheritance or dominion given to Him as "The Christ," is to contradict numerous prophecies and promises, which, while giving an extended detail of the Messianic Kingdom, always describe it as perpetual, never-ending. Indeed, it could not be otherwise, for this Theocratic throne is declared to be both the throne of the Father and the Son—this has been repeatedly noticed—the fundamental idea of a Theocracy embracing the oneness of the Father and David's Son when acting in the capacity of an earthly Ruler. Hence much that has been assumed and written respecting the supposed differences of thrones in "the delivering up of the Kingdom," is based on a total misapprehension of the facts as they pertain to the Messianic throne. The prophets and apostles always recognize this Theocratic feature, and speak of the throne either as the Messiah's, or as God's, or as the Father's, or as Father's and Son's together; and the conception of the Theocratic idea in all its comprehensiveness indicates that it is the Divine purpose evermore to exercise the Rulership of a God over the whole earth in and through the Person, the glorified humanity, of the Lord Jesus and His associated brethren. The honor belonging to the distinctive Christ is never lessened or altered. Hence, in view of the general statements of the Word respecting the perpetuity of the Kingdom of the Christ and the evermore distinctive inheritance, honor, and glory of the God-man, the Theocratic King, it is painful to read the utterances of able and eminent men who, hampered by one text, override a multitude of others, and persist in dethroning "The Christ," as Christ—in having the covenanted King David's Son to yield up His throne and dominion (to the Father, as if it were not already the Father's in the highest sense), and then, on the other side, hampered by the texts indicative of the perpetuity of the Kingdom, they endeavor to reconcile their theory by a still more unwarranted procedure, viz., by dividing the Christ, and conjecturing that "Christ in His Divine nature, as God, shall never cease to reign." The humanity is thus set aside (see below), and it is not "The Christ"—God-man and Theocratic King—that reigns, but only a part of the Christ—that is, the Divine. Now, any theory, no matter from what source, that is driven to such a division of Christ and such a withdrawal from Him of the specifically bestowed honors, etc., is most certainly defective. For those nice distinctions which theologians have introduced by which the Messiah is made to transfer His Kingdom—to abdicate the Theocratic throne, i.e. the Davidic—and yet, after all, to reserve in some form, with the loss of the reign and dominion of the God-man Jesus Christ, a kingly position is utterly unknown to the Scriptures. It virtually reduces the matter to this: That the Messiah yields up His inheritance and Kingdom promised to Him forever, and that He rules no longer as Jesus Christ, but only as God. Surely a doctrine so pregnant in results, which merges the humanity into Deity, takes away from Jesus, David's Son, that which Holy Writ ascribes to Him for all succeeding ages, ought to be well founded, most plainly taught.*

* Thus e.g. Dr. Hodge (Com. 1 Cor., and Sys. Div.) has much to say respecting the universal dominion exercised as God-man (and which the Christ is to yield up at the end), but we discriminate between the express covenanted Kingdom (the Theocratic-Davidic) in which He openly rules over the earth as Theocratic King in David's line, and the dominion pertaining to Him (Prop. 80) as Divine. He will ever, in virtue of His relationship to the Father, His oneness with Him, His carrying out His will, be placed at the right hand of the Father—a phrase indicative (1) of the power exercised by Him, and (2) of a certain subordination to the Father. Our view does not introduce a humiliation of Jesus, or a removal of that which is inherent in Him as the Divine; it preserves to Him inviolate that which pertains to Him as David's Son, and that which belongs to Him as God-man and the Divine.

* To give the reader the idea that we correctly state the opinions of others, we reproduce several taken by random. Dr. Hodge, Sys. Div., vol. 2, p. 637, says in explanation that "absolute dominion is committed to Christ as Mediator." It is for the benefit of the Church and to consummate redemption, "that as the God-man, He has been thus exalted over all created things." Then, "having been committed to Him for a special purpose, this universal dominion as Mediator will be relinquished when that purpose is accomplished" and "He will deliver up the Kingdom unto the Father," and yet in some way "reign forever as King over the redeemed." Knapp, Theology, Sec. 98, makes "the government" to end, saying: "At the end of the world, when the heavenly state commences, the government which Christ administers as a man will cease," telling us that “thenceforward the Father will no more make use, as before, of the intervention of the Messiah to govern and bless men, for now they will be actually blessed.” But, forced by Scripture, adds: “The glory and majesty of Christ will remain, however, unaltered, and He will still far excel His friends and brethren, who enjoy a happiness similar to His own.” These are bold words respecting David’s Son. Barnes, Com. 1 Cor. 15, makes Christ “rendering back to God that office or authority which He had received at His hands;” but still has Him, after giving up “the dominion which God would exercise through the Messiah,” reigning as God in the Father. Grotius, as quoted by Barnes, has a “delivering up of the Kingdom as the governors of provinces render again or deliver up their commission and authority to the Cæsars who appointed them.” The Christadelphians in Declaration of Principles, p. 15, assert that “in the end of that period (i.e. the thousand years) an entire change will take place in the constitution of things; Christ will surrender His position of supremacy, and become subject to Deity as the Head of a complete family,” etc. The Kingdom of Grace, p. 44, affirms the same change, and adds: “Then He will be known no more as a Mediator or Saviour, but only as the King of kings and Lord of lords, and He shall reign visibly on the throne of the Universe forever and ever.” Quotations could be multiplied, some cautiously expressed yet agreeing in the main with the preceding, while others are extravagant and reckless, making Jesus, after the delivering of the Kingdom, a mere cipher. And yet a few seem to draw back, without assigning any reasons, from such deductions, as e.g. a writer in the Princeton Rep. for Jan., 1853, says: “We believe the Scriptures plainly teach that Christ is now King in Zion; that His mediatorial Kingdom has already commenced on earth in the hearts of His people and is to be perfected and perpetuated through everlasting ages in the world to come.”

Obs. 3. There is only one passage in Scripture which is supposed to teach the yielding up or ending of the distinctive Messianic Kingdom, viz., 1 Cor. 15 : 27, 28. Whatever view is engrafted upon or derived from these verses, nearly all (excepting those which utterly degrade Christ, and hence are unworthy of notice) admit, whatever delivering up is intended, that Jesus Christ still reigns, either as God, the humanity being subordinate, or as God-man deprived of His dominion and occupying a lower station, etc. Neander (His. Plant. Ch. Church, vol. 1, p. 529) more cautiously than many, says: “The Kingdom of Christ in its peculiar” (i.e. mediatorial) “form will come to an end, when it has attained this object, when, through the efficiency of the glorified Christ, the Kingdom of God has no more opposition to encounter, and will no longer need a Redeemer and Mediator.” “The Mediatorial Kingdom of God will then merge into the immediatorial, such is the declaration of Paul in 1 Cor. 15 : 24–28.” (Comp., however, his utterance, Prop. 49, Obs. 7, Note 1). Lange (Com. Mat. 3 : 1–12, doctrinal), more unguardedly, remarks: “At last when the Kingdom of God shall have been perfected, it will also have reached its full and final development, and be ripe for self-annihilation which awaits it,” thus, as he explains, giving place to a Kingdom of glory. Barnes (Com. loci) incautiously says: “It means the Incarnate Son, the Mediator, the man that was born and that was raised from the dead and to whom this wide dominion had been given, should resign that dominion, and that the government should be re-assumed by the Divinity as God.” Stephenson (The Atonement) makes Christ reigning first as “an independent King” and afterward as “a subordinate King.” Thus David’s Son, who is One with the Father, actually as Theocratic King seated on the Davidic throne adopted and incorporated by the Father as His throne, is made to yield up a throne and dominion which in many other places is pronounced—in view of this very relationship to the Father—never ending.<sup>1</sup> Can there be a contradiction between Scripture such as these interpretations present? After careful consideration of the various passages directly bearing upon the subject, we unhesitatingly—in the name and for the sake of David's Son—answer, that it does not exist saving in the interpretations thus attached to it. In giving our reasons for no such antagonism, let the reader notice, that we do not present our criticisms, or those of persons favorable to Millenarianism, lest we might be chargeable with seeking out an accommodation for our doctrinal position. Instead of urging our own views of the passage in question, it is sufficient to let others specify them and thus indicate the wonderful harmony preserved in Holy Writ. In the phrase, "then cometh the end," we are not concerned in accepting of the interpretation of many critics, who, connecting the word translated "end" with the idea of the order of resurrection, render it "the last," viz., the last band, i.e. the rest of the dead. If this is discarded as untenable, then the idea of Barnes, etc., may be adopted, viz., of consummation, termination or limit, or that of Prof. Bush, who says that the true sense is more nearly allied to perfection or consummation than termination, imputing ultimate issue, perfect accomplishment. On the next phrase, "when He shall have delivered up the Kingdom;" etc., eminent critics, such as Storr, Bush, and others,<sup>2</sup> have declared that the nominative of the verb translated "shall have delivered up" is not Christ, as our translators (Eng. version) supposed, and, therefore, that the Kingdom delivered up is not Christ's. They affirm that this is an instance of a "common scriptural idiom in which the verb is used without any personal nominative, but has reference to the purpose of God elsewhere expressed in His Word," giving the rule and adducing examples of this idiom both from the Old and New Testaments (see e.g., Bush's Anatasis, p. 376 and 377). They make the following paraphrastic translation: "Then cometh the end (the grand consummation), when the prophetic announcement of the Scriptures require the delivering up (making over) of all adverse dominion into the hands of God or the Godhead (the Father and the Son conjointly) to whose unrivalled supremacy everything is to be made finally subject." Or, "Then cometh the end, when by the announced purpose of God in the Scripture, the Kingdom or Kingship, hitherto usurped by the rulers of this world, is made over to its rightful Divine Proprietor." It would be too lengthy to assign all the reasons and the examples assigned for such a rendering, and the reader is referred to the works which give them in detail. Barnes, who is inclined to the common view, adds it briefly to his comments, and speaks favorably of it. The phrase, "for He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet," does not limit—as is shown by examples (Bush, etc.) of Scripture phraseology and the admissions of all that some kind of a reign continues—the reign of Christ. The 28th verse, "And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all." In the reasoning of the apostle he had just replied to an objection that might be alleged, that if Christ has "all things" put under Him, His supremacy might exceed that of the Father, by saying that "He is excepted which did put all things under Him," and, in consequence, it follows, as an inevitable result, that if the Father is excepted and has put all things under the God-man Jesus Christ, He will retain His pre-eminence and that Christ is still subordinate, even after He has acquired His greatest power and glory in His Kingdom. Bush well observes: "A delegated authority necessarily implies a supremacy to him who conferred it. This is undoubtedly the force of the original (τότε καί) 'then also' i.e. then, just as now—which the rendering of the common translation entirely fails to represent." "As Christ, in the great mediatorial scheme, now holds a place inferior to the Father, so, notwithstanding all the grandeur and glory that is predicted to accrue to Him from the final subjection of His enemies, He is still ordained to occupy that subordinate station." Storr and others explain the 28th verse as follows: The adverbs ὄραν and τότε being regarded as influenced by the word translated "shall be subject" not as a future of time, but merely as a logical future denoting an inference, the verse is correspondingly rendered: "Since (ὄραν), therefore, all things have been (by a Divine decree) put under Him, it will follow (τότε) that the Son Himself is or is to be, subject to Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all."<sup>1</sup> Having thus hastily passed over the passage, giving the impartial, unbiassed views of Post and Anti-Millenarians, instead of finding it, as alleged, teaching the ending of the Kingdom, it stands in harmony with the prophetic announcements proclaiming the perpetuity of the Kingdom. In the language of Van Valkenburg (Bib. Repos., vol. 2, "Essay on Duration of Christ's Kingdom"), "As the Father was excepted when all things were put under the Son, so also shall He be excepted when all things are subdued unto Him. It appears, then, that this passage does not even intimate that there will ever be a termination of Christ's Kingdom, or that He will ever deliver up His Kingdom to the Father. The dominion shall indeed be rescued from His enemies, and restored to the Godhead, but not in any such sense, but that His dominion is an everlasting dominion, and that of His Kingdom there shall be no end." Storr (Diss. on Kingdom) takes the ground that "the government which it is said, verse 24, He shall restore to God, even the Father, must not be supposed to mean Christ's government, but that of every opposing power, which is evidently declared to be destroyed, that the power may be restored to God"—adding truly and most forcibly (as our Propositions abundantly prove) "the government is restored to God when it is restored to Christ." Thus the passage is made by them to be in accord with Rev. 11 : 15, "The Kingdoms (or Sovereignty) of this world are become the Kingdoms (or Sovereignty) of our Lord and His Christ," and when this is done, Father and Son united in this Theocratic ordering and Personage, "He shall reign forever and ever."<sup>4</sup> It is the fulfilment of Dan. 7 and other predictions, from which we learn that the Father gives Him dominion, that He exerts it until all His enemies are subdued, and reigns with acknowledged supremacy (subordinate as this passage teaches in His God-man rulership to One only) over all the earth. One thing must be self evident to the believer, that this passage, so difficult of interpretation (universally so acknowledged), ought not to be pressed against the testimony of a multitude of other passages, either to the separation of the Christ, or to the removal of His distinctive kingship as the Christ, or to the diminishing of any honor, etc., conferred upon Him.<sup>6</sup> The honor of both the Father and the Son are identified with the perpetuity of this Theocratic Kingdom, for it is just as much the Father's Kingdom as it is the Son's—the most perfect union existing between them constituting a Oneness in rule and dominion.<sup>6</sup>

and assigns as a reason: "He ceases to be the mediate cause of the execution of God's council, which now in its totality is accomplished" (just as if God's Kingdom was not the Christ's, and the execution of God's counsel ceased through Christ). Fuller (The Gospel its own Witness, ch. 5) makes Christ's Kingdom to end, calling it "a delegated" Kingdom, "the delegated authority of Christ," which is finally yielded up to the Father. This Kingdom he has in "the period allotted to this work, which extends from the time of the revelation of the promised seed to the day of judgment;" and he distinctly announces that God's will shall only be done here "after the general conflagration," etc., so that the same is not verified in Christ's Kingdom, thus making it a failure. Stanley (The Epis. to the Corinthians, p. 315) says: "Even if, in this world, a distinction must be allowed, the Invisible Eternal Father, and Christ, the Lord and Ruler of man, he (the apostle) points our thoughts to a time when this distinction will cease; when the reign of all intermediate objects, even of Christ Himself, shall cease, and God will fill all the universe, and be Himself present in the hearts and minds of all." (Here we certainly have more than the substitution of the Divine Sovereignty, a kind of Spiritualistic Pantheism, which crushes the promised eternal reign of Jesus and the distinctive, precious Christ.) Alexander (Psalms, vol. 3, p. 103), speaking of Christ's reign, remarks: "This session (or investiture of supreme dominion) is to last until the subjugation of His enemies, that is to say, this special and extraordinary power of the Messiah (as the Son of man) is then (when the last enemy is subdued) to terminate," and as proof refers to 1 Cor. 15:24-28. (So Jesus, after the victory is complete, gives up His "supreme dominion" when it is most reasonable to suppose that He would then reign the more gloriously with "supreme dominion"). This limitation of reign was also expressed by the fanatical Anabaptists. Thus Luther (Things of the Anabaptists) states that John of Leyden (who professed to reign on the throne of David, Comp. Michelet's "Life of Luther," p. 234) had on his crown the inscription, "A King of righteousness over the world," and that the missionaries sent forth by him, among other things said: "And when the king (John of Leyden) shall have caused righteousness to be established throughout the world, then will Jesus Christ resign His power into the hands of God the Father." Bloomfield, Com. 1 Cor. 15:24, speaks of Christ that He "shall resign the government of all things to God the Father," and approvingly quotes Grotius illustrating the same "from the custom of the Presidents sent by the Roman Empire to govern provinces; who, at their return, used formerly to restore their authority into the hands of their Sovereign." (Surely, we introduce nothing so derogatory to the dignity and honor of Jesus, that He forever yields up His inheritance, purchased by His obedience and death.) Dr. Brown (Christ's Sec. Coming, p. 160) says that the delivering up the Kingdom means "the Mediator giving an account of His Stewardship" (as if the Father and the Son were not one, and such a thing were necessary), and that it "seems to imply the end of the Kingdom in its present form," but is continued in another, which recognizes Christ's "mediatorial merit and Person," and this last is "the everlasting Kingdom." Lincoln (Lects. on Rev., vol. 2, p. 167) has Jesus to give up the Davidic throne at the end of the thousand years, and to occupy another throne. Fausset (Com. 1 Cor. 15:24) observes that this statement seems at variance with Dan. 7:14, etc., and to rid himself of the difficulty resorts to a "mediatorial Kingdom" (which was never covenanted to Jesus), and finds simply a change "in the manner of administration," and this consists in "God shall then come into direct connection with the earth, instead of mediatorially." (But the Messianic Kingdom is the Father's Kingdom, and this "direct connection with the earth" is established at the Sec. Advent and during the Mill. age as one of its most distinguishing features—the Father being manifested in the Son—as e.g. compare Jno. 14:9 and related passages with Isa. 25, 60, 61, 62, 64, etc.) Even so able a writer as Rothe falls into the same mistake, saying (Dog., P. 2, p. 60): "The Apoc. fixes the duration of this Kingdom at one thousand years." Breckenridge (Knowledge of God, Subj. Consid., p. 668) makes a somewhat similar statement. So also in the "Declaration of Faith," adopted by the General Assembly of the Free Italian Church (Milan, June, 1870), in the last art. is a declaration of Pre-Millenarian views, and in reference to the second resurrection at the end of the thousand years, the clause follows: "And after His Kingdom all the rest of the dead shall rise to be judged in judgment."

But let the student observe that nearly all these writers effectually contradict their own statements respecting a limitation of reign, when commenting on the passages where the perpetuity is positively asserted. Numerous examples of this might be given, but we select one to serve as an illustration. The perpetuity of the Kingdom is expressly asserted e.g. in Ps. 45:6 and applied to Jesus in Heb. 1:8, concerning which Fausset

<sup>4</sup> We also give Sirr's (First Res.) rendering : " The Worldly Kingdom of our Lord and His Christ is come (so Greisbach, etc.), and He shall reign for the ages of the ages. " This reminds one of the marginal reading of Ps. 145 : 13, " Kingdom of all ages. " " The times of restitution," which run into the ages, are always spoken of as Messianic. Comp. Props. 140, 144, 148, etc. The Revision has it : " The Kingdom of the world is become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, and He shall reign (marg. reading) unto the ages of the ages. "

<sup>5</sup> May we remind our opponents, who charge us with a lowering, etc., of Christ, when we affirm His Coming to reign with His saints here on earth in His covenantal Kingdom, as David's Son and the Christ, renewing the earth, etc., that we certainly are not so liable to such an accusation as those are who make this same Christ yield up His Kingdom and inheritance, although the specific promises of perpetuity are given to " the Son of man," i.e. pertain to, and include the humanity and inheritance of Jesus.

<sup>6</sup> The critical student will observe, that evidently a reason why Paul is so guarded in his language arises from his desire to avoid the hatred and persecution of the jealous Roman power. For had he plainly stated the hope that Gentile domination must thus be subjected, etc., it inevitably would have excited bitter and unrelenting hostility. This he avoids by the peculiar construction of the passage, without yielding up the truth and evincing the most delicate prudence. Also : the student is reminded that this very subordination of Jesus the Christ to the Father results, not from the Divine, but the Human nature possessed ; because He continues to be the Son of man this subordination ever more continues. The Melchisedecan Priesthood (Prop. 155) supports our position, and in the Messianic Kingdom the Kingship and Priesthood are inseparably united, the Kingdom being Theocratic, the Civil and Religious, the Church and the State, being One, the perpetuity of both is asserted. This perpetuity the Jews affirmed when they declared of the Messiah that " He abideth forever " (Jno. 12 : 34 ; comp. comments of the various commentators). Hence we must reject, as utterly untenable, and derogatory to the Christ, such declarations (Chr. Sys., p. 153). " The kingdom which Jesus received from His Father, however heavenly, sublime, and glorious it may be regarded, is only temporal ; " for over against this, it is affirmed to be perpetual, ever-enduring, etc.

This has already been intimated under Prop. 104, Obs. 2, etc., but being an important landmark in the comprehension of prophecy, attention is again called to it in this form. The depressed condition of God's people, the overthrow or withdrawal of the Theocracy is limited by the continuance of the four great Gentile monarchies or empires, which run a predetermined period, called by way of significance and identity "the times of the Gentiles" (a phrase which in itself duly considered is hostile to the notion of the establishment of the Messianic Kingdom).

So e.g. Bh. Newton (Diss. on Proph., vol. 2, p. 87) says: "The times of the Gentiles will be fulfilled when the times of the four great kingdoms of the Gentiles, according to Daniel's prophecies, shall be expired, and the Fifth Kingdom, or the Kingdom of Christ, shall be set up in their place." And preceding this he remarks: "It (Jerusalem) is still trodden down by the Gentiles, and consequently 'the times of the Gentiles' are not yet fulfilled." The student will readily see the force of this, and how strongly it condemns the misapplication of Daniel's Messianic Kingdom to the Church as now constituted. We may depend upon it, that God's portrayal of events and their nature is far more reliable than the estimates and eulogies of men. The union of these successive Empires in one image (Dan. 2) is indicative of a succession of the same pride, spirit, motives, ambition, etc., and the separate portrayal (Dan. 7) shows their succession and hostility to each other—an ambition that resisted and overcame all opposition. The metallic portrayal, evincing the grandeur of rule, is given to a Gentile to accord with Gentile ideas; the bestial is a representation to a believer of the true nature and characteristics of the same. The reasons why these four were specially selected (and not the Egyptian, Carthaginian, Parthian, etc.) arise from their being the principal ones successively existing, their domination over others, their relation to the destiny of the Jewish nation, their accurately measuring the time of God's judgments on the Jewish nation and land, and the connection that the last sustains to the Sec. Advent and Jewish restoration.

Obs. 1. Without repeating the reasoning elsewhere given, it is sufficient to say that this Kingdom, according to Daniel 7, is received by the Son of man after the Fourth Beast or Roman Empire is divided; after the rise of the ten horns and little horn, and at the very time that the judgments of God are to be poured out upon the divided Empire. The First Advent took place when the Empire was consolidated, the Second will occur when it is divided into its ten-toed form; for the smiting is upon the feet of the image, the reception and inheriting of the Kingdom is after the saints have long suffered from the arrogance, etc., of the powers arising out of this Empire, and these powers are to meet an awful infliction of tribulation.

It has often been noticed that one of the fundamental eschatological ideas of the early Church, always attached to the division of Rome and the closing of the Empire the consummation. The Antichristian persecution, the Sec. Advent with its results were invariably linked with the Empire, which was unquestionably regarded as the fourth. Thus e.g. Lactantius and many others, which was more or less adopted and urged by

Cyprian, Gregory the Great, etc. So prevailing was the primitive view in its relation to the Empire that, as Gibbon (Decl. and Fall, vol. 2, p. 80) intimates, it was one cause of the hostile spirit and persecution of the emperors, although mentioned with caution and reserve it became known, and (Mosheim, vol. 1, p. 413) the Montanists were censured because they disclosed it so freely and prominently. Pre-Millenarians, almost universally, hold to the same view, and as it is incorporated and upheld in this work, our argument would be incomplete, if we did not trace the Roman Empire and show how the Sec. Advent is linked with it. To indicate to the student how delicately this was anciently handled, we refer e.g. to Josephus (Ant. 10, 10, 4), who relates Daniel's dream (Dan. 2), and vaguely refers to the interpretation of it. After intimating that the fourth kingdom is the Roman, he, in view of the action of the Stone, to avoid giving offence, says: "Daniel did also declare the meaning of the Stone to the king; but I do not think proper to relate it, since I have only undertaken to describe things past or things present, but not things that are future." Compare for Jewish ideas Prayer 12 of the Nineteen Prayers, Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 107; for the Fathers' views, B. Newton's Diss., p. 192, etc., where he gives Jerome's adherence to it and apology for the same. Mede (Works, B. 4, Epis. 6), therefore, says: "The Roman Empire to be the fourth kingdom of Daniel, was believed by the Church of Israel both before and in our Saviour's time; received by the disciples of the apostles and the whole Christian Church for the first 300 years, without any known contradiction. And, I confess, having so good ground in Scripture it is with me tantum non articulus fidei, little less than an article of faith."

Obs. 2. Hence, it is a matter of importance to trace the Roman history as a confirmation of our faith. Generally it is supposed, with the exception of a few scholars, that the Roman Empire is something that existed long ago and with whose history—saving as it may illustrate the past and afford lessons for the future, we have no personal interest. This is a mistake, as prophecy itself indicates. Let us receive the impartial teachings of historians and writers, who had no reference to prophecy when giving their historical statements, and see how wonderfully the Spirit foresaw and described the course of events long before Romulus was in existence. The Roman Empire when divided into its Eastern and Western divisions, and when ruled over by several emperors conjointly, was still regarded as one great whole. Many writers have taken it for granted that when the Western head fell in the person of Augustulus (deposed about A. D. 476), the Roman Empire became entirely extinct in the West. But history rejects such a conclusion, seeing that the Roman Senate acknowledged the emperorship of Zeno at Constantinople, declaring that "the Majesty of a sole monarch is sufficient to pervade and to protect at the same time both the East and the West," etc. (Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, ch. 37). The West on various occasions, in the most public manner, received the decrees, etc., of the emperor at Constantinople, as those of their lawful ruler. Having consented (so Gibbon) "in their own name (i.e. the Senate's) and in the name of the people, that the seat of universal empire shall be transferred from Rome to Constantinople." It is unnecessary to add proof to that which history has made so plain. Attention is called to two facts—that, as predicted, the Empire, regarded (as Faber has so well established) as a unit in law, but beginning to feel the weight of its greatness and extension, was ruled over by several emperors at the same time; and that the privileges of Rome had been extended over the whole Empire, so that Paul, though a native of Tarsus, was born a Roman. Another fact must also be noticed, viz., that to constitute a person a Roman emperor it was not requisite that he should have the seat of power at Rome. This was abundantly shown in the emperors ruling at Constantinople, Antioch, etc., and especially in Diocletian making Nicomedia his Capitol. It has been supposed, and to some extent correctly, that a connection in some form or other (publicly or privately, i.e. acknowledged or allowed) with Rome is requisite to form a Roman emperorship, but this even was not an indispensable requirement, as is seen in the case of the Eastern emperors, who finally lost all jurisdiction over Rome, and in that of some of the associated emperors who had no power or control at Rome. Prophecy itself intimates as much by assuring us that the Empire, once consolidated, shall become internally, politically, divided, losing much of its cohesion and strength. Before the Eastern emperorship fell (1453) the Western was revived in the person of Charlemagne (800), so that for a number of centuries two emperors of the Roman Empire existed, one in the East and the other in the West. As this is a matter of importance in tracing the fulfilment of prophecy and in evidencing our prophetic position, some remarks, for the general reader, are appropriate to show that Charlemagne was regarded a Roman emperor. So fully is this exhibited in history that we find it stated by numerous writers. Thus e.g. Machiavelli (His. of Florence, B. 1., ch. 3) has, speaking of Charlemagne, "the Pope and the people of Rome made him emperor, and thus Rome began to have an Emperor of the West." Ordericus Vitalis (Eccl. His., B. 1, ch. 24) says: "Thus, in the fifth year of Pope Leo, which corresponds with the year 808 of the incarnation of our Lord, King Charlemagne became the eighty-third emperor from Augustus, and the Romans proclaimed him by that august name." James (His. of Charlemagne, p. 362, 3) remarks that he was crowned and saluted with the imperial salutations: "Long life and victory to Charles Augustus, crowned by God great and pacific Emperor of the Romans," that he was adored by the Pope "according to the forms employed toward the Cæsars (attested by Eginhard, Annalles and all the other Annals). From that hour the titles both of king and of patrician were laid aside, and the monarch of the Franks became the Emperor of the Romans. Thenceforward his coins were inscribed with his new dignity, and his acts were dated from the years of his Empire." Representations of those medals are given by various writers with the legend "Renovatio Imperii," "the revival of the Empire." Bower (His. of the Popes, Leo III.) gives a very clear statement of the transaction drawn from the Annalists, who, as also Sigonius, etc., call it a revival of the Western emperorship. Baronius, Bellarmine, and others, have noticed this bestowal of the emperorship upon Charlemagne by the Pope as an instance of the supreme power vested in the Pope over all kingdoms, alleging that this was a translation or transferring of the Imperial dignity from the East to the West, but this assumption, made only to exalt the Papacy, is disproven by all history. For there was no deposition of Irene (who then ruled in the East); the people and senate of Rome participated in the bestowal of the dignity (a number of writers, twenty, according to Du Pin, Bower's His. of the Popes, vol. 2, p. 179, do not even mention the Pope); and the subjection of the Pope, and acknowledgments made of the same, to the emperors, evidence the contrary. Indeed, ample proof is found in the embassies and communications which passed between the Western and Eastern Emperors that no such translation was intended, but that the Imperial dignity was allowed to both divisions. Gibbon (Decl. and Fall, ch. 49) relates the coronation scene; describes the extent of Charlemagne's dominions; informs us how he was styled "the sole and supreme Emperor of the West;" how he called the emperor at Constantinople by the "familiar appellation of brother;" how a treaty of peace and alliance was concluded between the East and West, the East acknowledging "the august Charlemagne" to be "the Basileus and Emperor of the Romans." It is sufficient, for our argument, that the acknowledgment was thus made, the insolence, pride, claims, concessions, etc., of after history amounting to nothing, being only what ought to be expected from the weakened and divided state of the Empire. Eginhard (quoted by Bowers, vol. 2, p. 187) asserts that one of the articles of peace included "that the Greeks should acknowledge Charlemagne for Emperor of the West, and allow him that title." Thus we have the Western Emperorship revived in the person of Charlemagne. In the division of the dominions of Charlemagne, history declares that this Imperial dignity was held by the Chief of Germany, having also sway over Rome, whose title was that of "Emperor of the Romans" (designated "Kaiser" or "Cæsar"), and whose Empire was officially styled "the Holy Roman Empire." The coronation of some of those emperors at Rome (as e.g. Otho, A.D. 962), the allegiance of Italy and Rome (Gibbon, vol. 5, p. 56 and 58), the letters addressed by these Roman emperors to others, the official acts as "Emperor of the Romans," prove that it was regarded as a real, vital succession. The incidental references (as e.g. in Luther's celebrated Appeal to his Imperial Majesty, etc., see D'Aubigne's His. Ref., vol. 2, p. 93, in Dante's Inferno, in the Vision of Charles the Bald in Chron. of St. Denis, etc.) of the universal feeling on the subject are multitudinous, and the self-identification of these Emperors as the actual successors of the "very Augustus" (employed in letters) appears in the most unexpected manner, as e.g. in the remarkable letter of "Frederick, Emperor of the Romans, to Saladin, ruler of the Saracens" (Annals of Roger De Hoveden, vol. 2, p. 100-2). Frederick, in his capacity of successor, speaks of "our dictator, Marcus Crassus." The quarrels and struggles between these emperors and the Pope, between them and disaffected portions of their dominions, etc., accords with the delineations of prophecy, as e.g. Dan. 2 : 41, 22, 43, and does not interfere with the fact that the Roman Empire, enfeebled as it was (and sometimes faintly manifested by weak monarchs), was still represented by a "German Cæsar," chosen by an electoral College (Gibbon, vol. 5, p. 70).<sup>1</sup> Thus, when the Eastern part of the Empire was everthrown in 1453, the Western still survived and continued down uninterruptedly until 1806, to the abdication of Francis II. Francis, forced to it by his disasters, renounced the long-held Roman emperorship; and Alison (His. of Europe, vol. 5, p. 690) gives his language as follows: "Being convinced of the impossibility of discharging any longer the duties which the Imperial throne imposed upon us, we owe it to our principles to abdicate a crown, which could have no value in our eyes when we were unable to discharge its duties and deserve the confidence of the princes, electors of the Empire. Therefore it is, that, considering the bonds which unite us to the Empire as dissolved by the Confederation of the Rhine, we renounce the Imperial crown, and, by these presents, absolve the electors, princes, and States, members of the Supreme Tribunal, and other magistrates, from the duties which unite them to us as their legal chief." Here, then, we have a continuous headship of the Roman Empire existing from the days of Augustus down to A.D. 1806, and in connection with it, descended also from the divided state of the Empire, the Papacy with its claims Empire derived. The divided condition of the Empire has been with prophetic writers the chief object of notice—many writers, as Bh. Newton, etc., endeavoring to make out precisely the number of ten kingdoms—while the fact that a headship of the Empire existing has been too much ignored.*

<sup>1</sup> Corroborative of our position, we quote from Gibbon (vol. 5, p. 73): "Nor was the supremacy of the emperor confined to Germany alone; the hereditary monarchs of Europe confessed the pre-eminence of his rank and dignity; he was the first of the Christian princes, the temporal head of the great republic of the West; to his person the title of majesty was long appropriated; and he disputed with the Pope the sublime prerogative of creating kings and assembling councils. The oracle of the civil law, the learned Bartolus, was a pensioner of Charles the Fourth; and his school resounded with the doctrine, that the Roman Emperor was the rightful sovereign of the earth, from the rising to the setting sun. The contrary opinion was condemned, not as an error, but as a heresy, since even the gospel had pronounced: 'And there went forth a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed.'" Zimmerman in his Pop. His. of Germany, vol. 2, ch. 6, distinctly shows how Charles became "Roman Emperor" by receiving 'the Imperial crown,' and remarks: "To the Romanic nations Charles now appeared in the position of the old Cæsars, with divine sanction for universal dominion over all that had belonged to the Western Empire." He also speaks of "the Empire of the West being restored." Even our school histories state the fact, as e.g. Wilson's Outlines of History, p. 259, says of Charlemagne crowned "Emperor and Augustus:" "This act was considered as indicating the revival of the Empire of the West, after an interruption of about three centuries. Charlemagne, a king of the German Franks, was thus seated on the throne of the Cæsars." Compare arts., "Carlovingians," "Charles I.," in Appleton's Cyclop.; Seebohn's Era of the Protestant Revolution, p. 28, etc.

<sup>2</sup> We are glad to find that the continuity of the Roman Empire is now advocated by able scholars, as e.g. Bryce in The Holy Roman Empire, Freeman in Historical Essays, Essay VI. (also North Brit. Rev., March, 1865), Palgrave, Finlay, and others. Thus Freeman pointedly and justly observes: "It may seem a hard saying, but it is one which the facts fully bear out, that hardly one student in ten of mediæval history really grasps that one key to the whole subject without which mediæval history is simply an unintelligible chaos. That key is no other than the continued existence of the Roman Empire. As long as people are taught that the Empire came to an end in the year 476, a true understanding of the next thousand years becomes utterly impossible. No man can understand either the politics or the literature of that whole period, unless he constantly bears in mind that, in the ideas of the men of those days, the Roman Empire, the Empire of Augustus, Constantine, and Justinian, was not a thing of the past, but a thing of the present." "In a word, as we began by saying, the history of the Empire is the key to the whole history of mediæval Europe, and it is a key which as yet is found in far fewer hands than it ought to be." The student will be interested in the essay and its overwhelming proof. The prophetic student, if solicitous to be historically accurate in tracing historical prophecy, cannot ignore this valuable key. Its reception and use will prevent the adoption of a vast amount of misleading prophetic interpretation.

Obs. 3. It would be well if the Church, until a better explanation is given, would carefully note the interpretation presented by G. S. Faber in his Revival of the French Emperorship. In tracing the Roman emperorship from Francis II. he is supported both by prophecy and historical fact, and in continuation of the subject we will incorporate his view for the information and consideration of the reader. Turning to Rev. 17: 9-12 we have a delineation of the civil polity (heads) of the same fourth beast (so numerous commentators and writers) described by Daniel 7. The Revelation speaks of seven forms of government that should exist, and as a source of identification informs us that five of those heads "are fallen," which writers agree in deriving from Roman history (Livy, Tacitus, etc.) as follows: (1) Kings, (2) Consuls, (3) Dictators, (4) Decemvirs, (5) Military Tribunes. Then John tells us "one is," i.e., that one form of the government was then existing. Now this sixth head of which the prophet speaks, is the Roman emperorship which, as we have seen under Obs. 2, continued uninterruptedly from the time of John down to Francis II. If there is force in historical facts and in the revival of the emperorship in the Western part of the Empire before the Eastern was overthrown, then Faber's position that this emperorship continuously existed down to the abdication of Francis II. is impregnable.<sup>1</sup> Therefore the sixth head that John described can only be followed by the seventh head after the abdication of Francis II. In 1804, two years before the sixth head fell, Napoleon proclaimed the emperorship of the French, and annexed Rome and the Roman States to his dominions. To confirm his power he was crowned an Imperial head, not only at Paris, but had the Pope brought to assist at his coronation. It was this head, in some respects separate and distinct from the sixth head, which caused the abdication of Francis II. This influenced Faber and others to regard it as the seventh head which was to come after the sixth one. The apparent confirmation by its being short lived "and when he cometh, he must continue but a short time" (for the Napoleonic dynasty in the person of the First Napoleon only lasted about eleven years), and by its being "slain by the sword of military violence" (so Faber explains Rev. 13 : 3 in connection) led Faber in 1818 to suggest that the Napoleonic dynasty being the seventh head, Rev. 17 : 11 plainly called for its revival. This opinion was based (1) on the alleged fact of its being the seventh head; (2) that the beast, employing the necessary figure, is represented, being headless for a time, to re-exist, i.e. receiving a renewed polity; (3) and this revived polity is to be of the seventh, and yet in some respects an eighth, head. The revival of the Napoleonic dynasty in the person of Napoleon III. was, at least, a remarkable fulfilment of Faber's deductions. It is to be regretted that some persons, with the best of intentions overlooking the fact of a head being a dynasty and may thus embrace a succession of individuals, persistently applied Faber's view to the individual person Napoleon III., and that Faber's application of the same to the French emperorship was also changed by the American Publishers (Appletons) into "Napoleon III., the man of Prophecy." This and the death of Napoleon III. has caused many persons to discard Faber's theory, forgetting that, as he himself expressly guarded it, the head is not necessarily limited to one person, but may embrace a succession, and hence should not thus be limited without express warrant either from prophecy or the proper development of the Antichrist in him. We thus direct attention to his theory, which seems to be correct down to Francis II. It is asserted three several times, as if calling special attention to it, that the beast was to exist, i.e. have a head or political chief, then it was to cease to exist, i.e. have no such a head, and then it was to again exist, i.e. obtain such a head. In Faber's view, the non-existence of the beast cannot be established until after the overthrow of the Napoleonic dynasty, making the beast twice headless, viz., between Napoleon I. and Napoleon III. and since the downfall of the latter. So that the overthrow of the dynasty, instead of militating against Faber's view, really establishes it, seeing that our attention is specifically called to this very headless condition of the beast as something which we are to expect. But the real question to decide, after all, is this : Was the Napoleonic dynasty really a seventh head? In some respects it might be deemed such, but in others it seems impossible to concede it such a place, for it was regarded by the actors in it as a revival or return to Charlemagne's Imperial state (so Napoleon himself speaks of "Charlemagne, Emperor of the French and our august predecessor" in the 19th vol. of Cor., Eclectic, vol. 5, No. 1),<sup>3</sup> and, as Faber himself states, it was not a violation of unity in law for the Empire to have several emperors. Another objection is, that this Napoleonic head arose before the other fell, while the impression—not decided, it is true—made by the prediction is that these heads are to follow in succession. Again, the history of Napoleon III. indicates that he was completely patterning after Napoleon I., was identically in all respects the same head, and hence could not be called an eighth. This is seen in all the official acts, and was acknowledged by himself and the nation. Now, both these persons regarded themselves (and it seems proper that the Spirit of prophecy should designate the parties intended according to their own estimation of regal position) as regular successors to the Cæsars in the line of Charlemagne and his successors. Even admitting (which may be true) that Napoleon I. was a distinct seventh head, it does not follow that Napoleon III. was the eighth. The prophecy would then only await the revival of the French emperorship and its claims to Cæsarship, to make it of the seventh, and yet some remarkable traits superadded which would so distinguish it as to make it an eighth. But if the Napoleonic dynasty is only a continuation of the sixth Imperial head with an interval, then this seventh head is still future, and from Rev. 17 : 8, 11 is identified with a period of time (such as now exists) when the beast is headless, i.e. follows it. The student of prophecy is therefore reminded that this very predicted headless state of the beast (so discouraging to some) is a decided attestation to the truth, and a warning to us that it will result either in the rise of the seventh head to which the eighth is attached or to the revival of the seventh head with the same result. Prudence dictates that we do not dogmatically express ourselves on such points, but that we seek light from all directions and ponder well the interpretations and hints given, and see how they will correspond with the development of history. Faber's view respecting the sixth head is firmly established down to Francis II. ; how much more we can receive will be determined when the beast again exists—for that it will again live is clearly proclaimed.<sup>4</sup> Because the Empire does not now exist with a head, multitudes suppose that it is entirely perished (forgetting the imperial spirit and advocacy within its population and the maintenance of its ancient laws, etc.); but the Word informs us that we must not allow ourselves to be thus deceived, that headless as it may be for some time, yet the elements of the body remain, and that it shall again be resuscitated, and in its final aspect form a fearful and most powerful confederation against the truth.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> It is impossible to receive, in consistency with the Record, the interpretation of writers (revived by a recent one, Barbour in Three Worlds) that one of these heads is the Papacy. That any and every enumeration of the seven heads, which includes the Papacy as one of them, is most certainly erroneous and misleading, can be proven incontrovertibly by the following reasons : The beast (ch. 17) is distinguished from the woman or Papacy—the former supporting the latter, i.e. the seven-headed beast sustains the woman ; (2) the beast under its last head crushes and destroys the woman or Papacy ; (3) the beast under its last head continues after the Papacy is destroyed (ch. 17 and 19). Hence all such theories must be rejected as utterly untenable, being opposed both to prophecy and the attested facts of history. Likewise the views which, like Mede's Newton's, More's, Cunningham's, Elliot's, Lord's, etc., overlook the legal unity and uninterrupted historical continuation of the Roman Emperorship, for the Western Emperorship, or the professed Christian Emperorship, or the claims of absolute sovereignty, etc., did not change the unity or legal status and character of the Emperorship, as Faber has historically pointed out. The simplicity and historical accuracy of Faber's position is thus far incontrovertible. It is indorsed by many able writers, and is incorporated in foreign works, as e.g., in Epp's Die Entsiegelte Weissagung des Prop. Daniel.

<sup>2</sup> Castelar, in art. on "The Republican Movement in Europe" (Harper's Mag., Jan., 1875, p. 260), calls the Napoleonic dynasty a "species of Roman or Carolingian Empire." Audigier (Origin of the French, 1876—epitomized by Buckle, His. Civ., vol. 1, p. 566, etc.) held that the Antichrist would never appear in the world until the French Empire was destroyed. This notion was based on the idea that the French royalty was God-derived, through Charlemagne, the Church's favor and blessing being allied with it. Von Döllinger, Essays on Proph. Spirit, says that the Jesuit Viera, in his His. of the Future, makes the Fourth Empire to be the Roman-German—hence a regular continuation of the original Roman—and then makes the Fifth (showing that the Church in the past was not understood by it) an empire universal, etc., as described by Daniel, to have its centre in Portugal.

<sup>3</sup> Without utterly discarding other views, the writer may be allowed to say that Faber's line of argument, whatever defect may be in the latter part of it by premature application, is the best, most consistent, and logical thus far produced. It is erroneous to make the Papacy, as some do, the seventh or eighth head, for it was not short-lived, and the same is true of the Christian Constantinian head, which also was a regular—as preceding—succession of the sixth head, and not, as some writers maintain, a seventh head. The Empire was not conscious of a change in the emperors, whatever the changes introduced by the emperor himself. To make the reigns of Diocletian and his colleagues the short-lived seventh head is utterly opposed to the facts of history, which invariably and universally recognize them as belonging in regular succession to the sixth head. In brief, there is no scheme, so far as the sixth head is concerned, which meets so well the conditions of prophecy and history as Faber's, and the prophetic student, at this period of the headless state of the beast, will carefully keep in mind the subject, and await momentous developments. Let us only suggest as additional, that there are only seven heads, and, in all probability, the eighth spoken of is not one of the succession, but an associated head, which is of the seven, i.e. in union with it. Such a conjecture is strengthened by the fact that the last head of the beast is found thus in close union with another party, as e.g. Rev. 19 : 20, etc. Again the student is reminded that the Papacy—a favorite view of many—cannot possibly be a head of the beast, seeing that (as ascertained in a note) the beast itself first supports the Papacy and afterward causes it to be destroyed (Rev. ch. 17, etc.). The great defect in all such interpretations is, that they make the Papacy to exist down to the very open Advent in its organized form, when this is opposed by prophecy (Rev. 17), which declares that shortly before that Advent the Papacy shall be overthrown by the ten horns (not past, but still future, under the last head), through the leadership of the seven-headed beast.

<sup>4</sup> A few additional remarks are in place concerning the present views entertained respecting the seven heads. The critical student will see that the importance of a just discrimination on this point in view of its vital relationship, is a sufficient apology. We select a few leading writers and views now urged, which will, so far as our reply is concerned, include all others. Faber's line of argument conclusively shows that Dr. Elliott's (Hor. Apoc.) application of the 7th head to Diocletian's creating a second Augustulus, is a violation of consecutive rule, of the unity of the empire (which allowed such an increase), and of an unimpaired Imperial rule. This leads necessarily to confusion of ideas, as e.g. when to account for the wounding of the seventh head to death, he applies it to paganism, thus leaving the civil form of government denoted by a head (his own correct representation of heads previously given) and transforming it into a system of false faith and worship which happened to be associated with it (and also makes the Popedom to be the eighth). The same is true of Lord's (Apoc.) interpretation, when he makes Constantine and his successors a seventh head, the same being in regular succession, and so recognized by Roman law, and as a result contradicts the alleged wounding of the head, etc. It also sets aside Cressner's view of the Gothic kings, Mede's of the Latin emperors (after the division of the empire), Cocceius of the sevenfold future religious division, being the seventh head and the deductions from the same. In fact, it logically and historically disproves all other theories, which do not preserve the unity of the empire in law and the regular historical succession. Thus e.g. when Auberlen makes the seven heads to be "the seven world monarchies—Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome, and the Germanic Empire"—he destroys, not only unity in the symbol, but unity in history. The same applies to Wordsworth, who classes the seven heads Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Greek, Syrian, Egyptian, Roman Heathen Imperial, Imperial power of Germany; or Glasgow, who gives Egypt, Palestine, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Yavan or Hellas, Rome ; or Alford, who presents in the main Auberlen's application. It indicates the extreme arbitrary interpretation of Prof. Stuart ; and that the expositions of Bh. Newton, More, Cunningshame, and others cannot, so far as the seventh head is concerned, and the deductions therefrom, be received. There is one feature in the application of this prediction, viz., that it must not only be in unity with the symbol and of history in fulfillment, but that, at the same time, it must be in unity with other predictions, as e.g. Dan. 7 and Rev. 17. It is this violation of unity that makes them either in part or in whole objectionable. Hence we cannot possibly receive those interpretations which include the Papacy as a head, as e.g., Elliott's, and others. As the latter view is widely circulated, a few illustrations are appended. Thus e.g. Barnes (Com. Rev. 17) gives the following heads : Kings, Consuls, Dictators, Decemvirs, Military Tribunes, Emperors, Dukedom of Rome (comp. Bh. Newton), Papacy, which is historically incorrect as neither the Dukedom, nor the Papacy ever was a civil head of the empire, the civil power being restricted to a small portion of Italy. Bengel (Gnomen, vol. 5, p. 271) makes the beast itself to be the Roman Papacy, but this is still a wider departure from the unity of symbol, history, and parallel prediction, for the simple fact that the seven-headed beast supports the woman (Papacy), and afterward in the ten-horned state persecutes her, indicates a separate and distinct power. Baldwin (Armageddon, p. 328, etc.) is even more arbitrary and imaginative when he makes the beast "The Universal Imperial Church" (i.e., the Church organized throughout the Roman Empire) and the seven heads to be seven successive empires (Western Empire, Charlemagne's, Papal, Charles V., British, French, and probably Russian), of which the head wounded and healed was the Papal head or empire, being open to similar serious objections, and because of its utter antagonism to parallel prophecies. Waggoner, Barbour, and others, in their respective classification of the heads, also introduce the papacy as one, overlooking the distinctive and separate characteristics of the beast and of the woman (Rev. 17) as previously stated by us ; for the beast, seven-headed, with the allied horns destroys the papacy and after such destruction makes war with the Lamb at the open parousia. The heads enumerated are, in some of these schemes, exceedingly fanciful, being e.g. distinguished from the horns and then again converted into a horn (the little horn), or elevated to a civil headship, which history does not accord, or all made future, when John positively (for the sake of identification) says "five are fallen" and "one is." To confine the heads to the judgment period destroys a proper continuity and the relationship to other predictions.

To fortify our position on all sides, the attention of the critical student is directed to one feature that requires explanation, lest it mislead. In Rev. we have the beast (Roman Empire) having only seven heads, and in Dan. the heads are not given, but only the horns. Now, the little horn of Dan. is the Antichrist, and to make Rev. and Dan. to correspond, the Spirit in Rev., when giving the ten horns, omits the little horn, because the eighth, which is of the seven, is identical with him being the same Antichrist. Hence, in order to avoid a discordance, the cautious language of Rev., viz., that this eighth is not really a distinctive head, so that eight heads can be enumerated, but it is this little horn that arises after the ten horns and revives in himself the power of this seventh head, assumes the same Imperial and Absolute rule, and is thus really a prolongation of the seventh, under whom the civil life of the beast, after being headless, is restored with great power and arrogance. Now, such accuracy of statement to avoid a conflict of statement, and yet to give us from different aspects a view of this beast in his last form, can only be predicated of a divine inspiration. We must not overlook another fact (whatever may be said respecting the Napoleonic dynasty as a head by Faber, Frere, Gauntlett, Irving, Keith, Garrett, Fausset, Gregory, Purden, Baxter, Wangle, and a number of other writers), viz., that admitting it at least to be a continuation of the Imperial sixth (or forming a seventh even), the seven-eighth may be found geographically and nationally in another direction, as portrayed in Dan. ch. 8, on the territory of one of the four kingdoms established by Alexander's generals, which were absorbed, inherited, and conquered by the Roman, and revives with its revival.

Obs. 4. It is in the divided state of the Roman Empire that we are to find it, for a time, headless, i.e. without a leading civil, imperial form of government. It could not be under the sixth head which, as we have seen, was continuous down to 1806, and if, as we suspect, it includes the Imperial Napoleonic, down to very recent times. It is headless now, no one distinctively claiming to be the Imperial head of the Empire. But this, according to prophecy, cannot remain thus; a head will be formed and be recognized as that associated with and swaying rule over the Empire. When the Kingdom of the Messiah is to be manifested, the prophets teach that this Roman Empire is to exist in its broken, divided form and yet sufficiently united under the leadership of the last head of the same to form a most powerful combination against the true believers. Hence the efforts made in some directions to find the Antichrist (i.e. the one who shall wage war against the Lamb, Rev. 19) outside of the Roman Empire as e.g. Russia, Babylon in Asia, Mahommedanism, etc., is utterly opposed to the fundamental requirements of prophecy. Prophecy describes the Fourth Empire; runs it down consecutively to the time of the end; portrays its commingling of weakness and strength after its division; informs us that out of it shall arise the last confederation against Christ; associates the head of the last combination with this same identical beast or Empire; and thus fixes our attention, not to outside nations or governments, but to the Empire itself for the rise, progress, and terrible career of the last head. Every effort to call away the attention of believers from the Roman to some other power as the head around whom the Antichristian forces shall gather, is in so far a departure from the plain truth, no matter how plausibly represented or ingeniously portrayed.<sup>1</sup> On this point we must come back to the position universally occupied by the early Church, viz., that the Antichristian power, the last head of the beast, the oppressing power which shall culminate just previous to the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom and the ushering in of the Millennial age, must arise in, and be fully identified with, the Roman Empire. This belief, entertained by the churches established by the apostles, has its firm and immovable basis in Dan., chs. 2 and 7—in Rev. 17, etc. This faith, entertained by believing Jew and Gentile, is evidently also one that the inspired apostles fully indorsed, as seen in the Revelator John enlarging upon Daniel's Fourth Empire and in the universality of belief which can only be appropriately accounted for on the ground that it was sustained by the private (public being avoided for prudential reasons) instruction of the apostles and elders. Hence correctly, the deduction was made that the Roman Empire in some form or other would exist down to the end of this age, and that its close would be followed by the universal Empire of the Messiah. So deep was this feeling that Tertullian (Apology, Sec. 32) gives as a reason why they pray for the stability of the Empire: "For we know that a mighty shock impending over the whole earth—in fact, the very end of all things, threatening dreadful woes—is only retarded by the continued existence of the Roman Empire."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Any other outside power, like Russia, etc., could only become such provided it became incorporated with, as an integral part of, the empire, and thus would become its acknowledged head. If e.g. Russia would conquer Turkey, fixing its seat at Constantinople, and then as a master stroke of policy—imitating Charlemagne, the German Emperors, and Napoleon—would with its Czarship or Russian Headship incorporate the Roman Emperors, it would then to all intents and purposes become a head of the empire. If such should be the case, then prophetic interest would especially centre in its development and progress. It is not sufficient to base an opinion on the words "Gog and Magog," etc., of Ezekiel, unless it also be shown that Russia is, at the time of the end, an essential part of the Roman Empire. It likewise is not sufficient (Wallace's Russia, vol. p. 443, etc.) to show that the grand Prince of Moscow and all Russia is (after the fall of Constantinople) the chief Protector of the Greek Orthodox Church (thus becoming in one form a sort of successor to the Byzantine Emperors), or that there was a marriage with the Imperial family, or that the assumption of the title Czar is conclusive, or that we are to assume the fable (unproven) that the great ancestor Ruik was a descendant of Cæsar Augustus. For what prophecy in its direct historical development demands, is some Roman power, on the territory of the empire, who thus culminates, etc. Now, Russia can only become this last head, if directly incorporated, by conquest or confederation, as a part of the restored empire. Isolated as at present, with a vast territory beyond the limits of the fourth empire, etc., it has, as yet, none of the distinguishing characteristics requisite for a complete identity. Still, if intended, they can be speedily developed and openly manifested.

All the ancient Fathers, so far as we have their testimony, unite in declaring that the Antichrist shall arise out of the Roman Empire. Lactantius represents the early opinion, when he holds (Div. Inst., B. 7, ch. 16, etc.) that the empire should continue in a divided form being "dispersed among many and divided" until the final confederation. The Jews, from Daniel alone, entertained similar views which were perpetuated. In the twelve prayers of the Jews (Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 107) the Jews pray in the 12th prayer: "And let the kingdom of pride (the Roman Empire) be speedily rooted out and broken in our days," thus correctly apprehending that their nation cannot be restored until this power is broken. Lactantius also (Div. Inst., B. 7, ch. 15, etc.) refers to the Sibylline books as declaring the perpetuity of Roman power until the Advent of the King. Vide Victorinus's Com. on Apoc., about A.D. 290, Hippolytus, Irenæus, etc. It would be interesting to notice how deeply rooted was this opinion so that it was perpetuated down through the Middle Ages. See Von Döllinger's Prophecies of the Middle Ages, in which frequent reference is made to the fact that the present ordering of things, this dispensation itself, was thought to be dependent upon the continuance of the Holy Roman Empire, saying e.g. on the Cosmopolitical Prophecies, "There was but one fundamental thought in this and the following time, that the existence and the duration of the present order of the world were indissolubly bound up with the continuance of the Roman Empire, as this was renewed in, or made over to, the Carolingian dynasty, and after its overthrow to Germany and its kings. It was accordingly styled the Holy Roman Empire of the German nation; for it was held to be the all-supporting key-stone of the Christian world, which could not be abandoned until the process of the world's dissolution began. While this kingdom lasted and the people did not desert it, the last day was still distant, so they believed and so they spoke." Von Döllinger illustrates this by a number of popular prophecies. The student is requested to notice, as a matter of curiosity, that Roger De Hoveden (about A.D. 1190) in his Annals, vol. 2, p. 183, says: "Some of our learned men assert that one of the kings of the Franks will hold the Roman Empire afresh, and in all its integrity, who will exist at a very late period of time, and he himself will be the greatest and the last of all the kings," etc. While the true idea of the kingdom was perverted, yet even Popes (as e.g. Gregory the Great, Bower's His., p. 405, etc.) held to the notion that the Roman Empire would endure to the end of the world, or age.

The reasoning of Olshausen (Com. 2, Thess. 2) against Max Von Schenkendorf, that the Roman Empire would not again be revived, is inconclusive, based as it is upon the idea that it is impossible to restore the empire to its former condition, owing to political changes, etc. (although admitting its continuance, modified, to 1806). In reply, it would be sufficient to direct attention to the prediction; if predicted it will come to pass, as God alone foreknows the future. But aside from this, we must not forget that changes and modifications are incorporated in the prophecies as characteristics of the latter end, so that we are not to look for the empire in precisely the same form as in the Middle Ages or in the days of Augustus Cæsar; even the last head is to be so diverse, that he is scarcely recognizable as a continuation of the seventh head. Hence we prefer to receive the ancient view, which preserves the unity of prediction by making the Roman Empire existing down to the Second Advent, the end of the age, the culminated Antichrist, and which even such writers as Jerome (Com. on Dan.), Andreas of Cæsarea (Apoc., ch. 13), Aretas (Apoc. 13), and a host of others admit.

Obs. 5. To indicate this perpetuation of the Roman Empire, we will present, in the briefest manner compatible with clearness, an outline of a portion of Daniel, chs. 11 and 12, leaving the reader to supply the details. Expositors generally agreeing down to the 31st verse of ch. 11, we will begin with the same, giving a running commentary. First, however, it may be said that the opinion held by some that Antiochus Epiphanes is still the subject of prediction, is, aside from reasons given by Bh. Newton, refuted by the simple facts that the power delineated in the following verses endures down to the time of the end, to the period of the restoration of God's people and the resurrection of His saints in which Daniel is promised to participate, Prop. 126. In view of the history of the past and the still delayed resurrection of the saints, it is easy for us to see that the ancient opinion that these verses apply to the power which is to develop the Anti-christ is the correct one.' Nearly all admit that in verse 30 the Romans are introduced in the phrase "For the ships of Chittim shall come against him," and the view of Sir I. Newton, Bh. Newton, and many others, that in verse 31, the Romans are re-introduced and form the subject of the prophecy is evidently the correct interpretation, because in this way a harmony is affected between this and other predictions. The transition from the Greeks to the Romans becomes the more apparent by the remarkable fulfilment of the outlines here given. Without following particularly any writer, the interpretation that history affords seems to be something like this: v. 31, "And after him arms shall stand up" (the translation of the Newtons, Faber, etc.); that is, after Antiochus, a great military power shall possess the ascendancy, which was the Roman.' "And they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength;" history testifies to such a profaning and razing of the temple by them, etc. "And they shall take away the daily sacrifice;" which was done effectually by the destruction of the temple. "And they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate;" now, whatever the meaning to be attached to this disputed phrase, the reader is requested to notice that Jesus, Matt. 24 : 15 (against the Antiochian theory), places this to occur after His First Advent, the Spirit thus giving us an additional reason for applying it to the Romans. Some refer this to the idolatrous Roman ensigns, others to the building of the temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, etc.; but noticing the widely differing renderings in versions, etc., the idea conveyed by the phrase seems rather to be, that "the bestial" power that maketh desolate shall be firmly planted in the conquered city and country, productive of great misery. V. 32, "And such as do wickedly against the Covenant, shall be corrupt by flatteries;" let the reader notice that Jerusalem being now destroyed, etc., the Christian Church, God's people, are now alluded to, and it is a historical fact that the Roman emperors in various ways endeavored to seduce believers from their faith in the covenant promises of God, and we have reason to believe, in too many instances, with success. Newton and others tell us that many apostatized. "But the people that do know their God shall be strong and do;" that is, such shall perform their allotted work, being strong and heroic in faith, uneducible, they shall proclaim the Gospel to the saving of them that believe. V. 33, "And they that understand among the people shall instruct many;" which is fulfilled in the remarkable and extensive success of the early preaching of the Gospel in all parts of the Empire and even beyond it. "Yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil many days;" which was fearfully verified by passing through repeated persecutions, extending more or less over a period of nearly three hundred years. V. 34, "Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help;" history informs us (1) that the Christians were driven to great extremities by the persecutions heaped upon them; (2) that in this crisis help was extended by the accession of Constantine, by which the general persecutions ceased; (3) it was “little help,” for while stopping the persecutions of paganism, it paved the way for others, in his intolerant edicts, perversion of Christianity, introducing the hierarchy, in the acts of himself and successors. “But many shall cleave unto them with flatteries;” which was verified in the multitudes of Pagans that were brought into nominal Christianity by the hope of honor, emoluments, etc., so that some in the Church were alarmed at the flood of worldliness poured in upon them. V. 35, “And some of them of understanding shall fall;” this may denote that some of the pious, resisting the introduction of those evils, were persecuted and crushed, some even being put to death. Examples of this kind are not of a rare occurrence at this period. Or, it may mean that some of the pious shall be so deluded by this external prosperity—shall be so controlled by the splendor of the civil power professedly enlisted in behalf of Christianity, that they shall fall, i.e. yield up their principles and adopt those introduced, as witnessed in the pomp of worship, image worship, introduction of new doctrines, etc. And, if the reader carefully notices the next verse, he will find that the prophet, having directed attention to the times following Constantine, now describes this to be virtually the condition of the true Church down “to the time of the end;” that is, some shall fall, either being seduced by prosperity or being persecuted. For it is added: “To try them, and to purge and to make them white, even to the time of the end, because it is yet for a time appointed;” the Church is to be tried and tested, is a fighting, struggling Church, down to the time of the end. It is the language applied to the saints who endure temptation and fight the good fight of faith. Having described the condition of the Church, the prophet returns to the Roman power. V. 36, “And the king shall do according to his will;” that is, shall be absolute. “And he shall exalt himself;” in extension of dominion, conduct, etc.; “And magnify himself above every god;” if the word “god” means (so some) king or ruler, then he shall magnify himself above all kings, as evinced in the titles and conduct of the emperors, or, if it denotes objects of worship, then the fulfillment would be found in the control of worship, direction of doctrine (as in Imperial decrees of Constantine and successors), assumptions of authority, and in crushing opposition to ecclesiastical encroachments, etc. “And he shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods;” as in the amazing assumptions of authority over the consciences of subjects in public decrees, in sustaining the pretensions of the papacy, in persecuting believers, in ascribing divinity to itself, in doing great wickedness under the garb of religion. “And shall prosper until the indignation is accomplished;” that is, this Roman power shall exist more or less flourishing during a period of time in which the anger of God is manifested toward a people. Now, we learn that this people upon whom God’s indignation is poured out is the Jewish nation—the Theocracy being overthrown and Gentile domination allowed for a certain period. This elect nation is under God’s indignation (Prop. 57, etc.), and here it is said that this Roman power shall remain in existence until (Ch. 12 : 7) the time has arrived for the withdrawal of the same, thus corresponding with various other predictions. Hence (1) this power exists so long as the Jewish nation is scattered; (2) it is instrumental in oppressing Jews; (3) it will resist Jewish restoration under its Theocratic king; (4) when this power is utterly destroyed the Jews will be completely restored; (5) in some form or other it is a leading power in the times of the Gentiles, but its prosperity will suddenly end when these times are expired. This also shows how mistaken those are who find a fulfilment of this prophecy before the Christian era. "For that that is determined shall be done." V. 37, "Neither shall he regard the god of his fathers;" fulfilled in the change of the Empire, against the efforts of the Pagans, in its religion—really such a change that Paganism—the god of the fathers—was obliterated. "Nor the desire of woman." This last clause is much disputed, and it is difficult indeed to decide upon a definite meaning. Some (as Faber, Elliot, Smith) make it to denote Christ, He being the object of desire of Hebrew women. This, perhaps, is scarcely its meaning, but, if so, would evince, what we have already stated, a disregard to the paramount authority, etc., of Christ. Others (as Bh. Newton, etc.) think it denotes discouraging of marriage, which would find a verification in the repeal of the laws (Julian and Papien) encouraging marriage by Constantine, the veneration of monastic life, celibacy, etc. Others (as Stäudlin, etc.) interpret it as meaning cruel, i.e. disregarding the tears of women, or (as Bertholdt) would not spare little children, the object of a mother's love, or (as Jerome) would be lustful, licentious, etc., all of which would find ample fulfilment in the history of this power. "Nor regard any god, for He shall magnify Himself above all;" see v. 36, the reader noticing also that as the Spirit takes into view this gigantic power as one whole, some of this exaltation or magnifying is still for the future to manifest. V. 38, "But in his estate shall he honor the god of forces." Critics find the phrase, "the god of forces," the most difficult in the prophecy, and some versions, unable to give a meaning, retain the original. It has been rendered "God of forces," "the strong god," "god of fastnesses or fortresses," "gods-protectors or tutelar gods," etc. The idea, as all admit, that this "god" is one of power, having force or ability to exert in protection or sustaining, etc., is very evident, and a clew is given to its character, etc., by the next verse, in which it is called "a strange god." Let history in its indisputable facts tell us of the only "god" or ruler that was venerated and adored by the Roman power during this period, and the answer is, the Pope, who was acknowledged the Spiritual Head, having the keys of heaven and hell, who was called the viceregent of God on earth, who was so adored that even his foot was kissed by emperors. This "god" also sustained the Imperial power in its crowning, blessings, decrees, etc., and when, in antagonism at times with it, exhibited itself as a formidable power, able, upon several occasions, to depose and bestow the crown. If Bh. Newton's rendering (see his Diss. on Proph.) is correct, that the word "forces" denotes "protectors," then there would be an allusion to the worship of saints and images as "protectors." The relationship that the Papacy sustained to the Empire is here briefly but distinctively expressed corresponding to past history. "But in his estate shall be honor," etc.; Gesenius, Luther, De Wette, etc., suppose this to mean, "But in his place or stead he shall honor;" if so, then it would denote that the Pope shall be adored or honored in the place of the former gods of the Roman power. Barnes and others think that the idea of base or foundation is conveyed, so that it may denote "in his foundation," i.e. in his throne, by civil power shall he honor this god. If this should be the meaning, then again is it fully verified in the imperial decrees by which the Papacy was exalted, the supremacy given to the Bishop of Rome, in the grants of territory and civil power, and in the supports often tendered to it by the emperors. The notion of being firmly established and highly honored by Imperial patronage is the one conveyed. "And a god whom his fathers knew not ;" that is, the ancient Imperial power was not cognizant of this Papal power, for it was to arise, being distinct from anything that had preceded, in the course of its history. Brief as the description is, yet how applicable. "Shall he honor with gold, with silver, and with precious stones, and with pleasant things ;" the student need scarcely be reminded that the enormous wealth of the Papacy, in every age, has been drawn from the patronage of this Roman power through grants, gifts, taxes, legacies, indulgences, revenues, endowments, etc. The riches of Rome, the seat of the Papacy, during the past centuries has been notorious, and the source from whence derived is equally well known. V. 39, "Thus shall he do in the most strongholds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory ;" which may denote that in all parts of his dominion, including his strongholds, this god should be honored, or, that under the auspices, aid, etc., of this god he should take strongholds. Critics are divided as to its meaning, but either one or the other would find ample fulfilment in the Papacy. Bishop Newton's translation (Diss.) brings out the idea that the defenders or abettors of this god, he (the Roman power) shall honor with the god ; so also Mede's rendering and others'. "And he shall cause them to rule over many ;" that is, the aiders, upholders of this god, shall be also honored with power over others, as exemplified abundantly in the priesthood, bishops, archbishops, etc., of the Papacy. "And shall divide the land for gain ;" among these Papal officials, as witnessed in the bishoprics, dioceses, etc., in the bestowment of special grants, church lands, endowments, etc. Indeed, so much was this the case, that the power and wealth thus obtained became a serious embarrassment to nations, and led to great contests. V. 40, "And at the time of the end." The prophet having given a rapid but distinctive description of the Papacy, its union with this Roman power, etc., now turns to the time of the end, viz., to the closing scenes of this Gentile denomination, to the period when this Roman power, notwithstanding its greatness, shall come to an end. This that follows, then, wholly relates to the future, being yet unfulfilled. The Roman Empire in its divided form still exists in the spirit and principles avowed (and while it is for the present headless, yet this is particularly predicted as something that shall come to pass, so that we are cautioned not to be misled by its headless condition), and this god, the Papacy, also exists and still is honored, more or less, by the adherents and advocates of Imperialism. Our attention is pointedly called, to avoid all mistake, to the time of the end, the closing period of this gigantic power, viz., to the time of the last head of this power, described in other prophecies as the fourth beast in the long-continued succession of Gentile rule. In the interpretation that follows, the conjectures or suppositions that appear the best supported by the text are only given. "Shall the King of the South push at him ?" Much depends upon the locality where the revived head will be restored ; if in France, then Spain, Italy, etc., might form the King of the South ; if in Austria, then Italy, etc., might be the power denoted, or, as some do, Egypt, Turkey, etc., may be denoted. In fact, the power here predicted may or may not be in existence at present, and relatively to the locality or seat of the last head of the beast is a "King of the South." "And the King of the North shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships;" that is, this Roman power will also be attacked by some king or power located toward the North, as, e.g. England, Germany, or Russia. While mere conjecture can only be presented, yet the "many ships" indicate a power possessing a navy. "And he shall enter into the countries"—this is perhaps the clause which has caused the greatest difficulty to critics, owing to the sudden transition from one person to another. If we were to confine ourselves to this prophecy, it would be impossible from the language to decide what king this was that is to enter into the countries; whether the King of the North, or of the South, or of the Roman Empire, but we are not left to conjecture upon this point. The king who is thus victorious at the time of the end we find in Dan. 2 and 7 and Rev. 17 to be identified with the fourth beast, the Roman power. Taking other prophecies as interpreters, it refers to the Roman power under its last head, who shall invade other countries, thus implying that the King of the South and the King of the North have been unsuccessful against him. What countries these are, time must reveal, but the language impresses the idea of conquest, for it is added, "And shall overflow and pass over;" beating down all resistance and obtaining the victory. V. 41, "He shall enter also the glorious land;" this land ancients and moderns have, almost universally, applied to Palestine.* This corresponds with Zech. 14; Joel 3; Rev. 14:20, etc., which all agree (see e.g. comparison of Faber, Diss. on Proph., vol. 2, ch. 11, sec. 3) in placing the overthrow of the last great power in connection with his entrance into Palestine and subjugation of the same. "And many countries shall be overthrown;" the word "countries" is supplied by the translators; it may refer to countries, cities, places, forces, etc., evincing that his course would be a devastating, victorious one. "But these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom and Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon;" whether the countries geographically known as such, or whether those are figurative appellations for other countries that shall escape, is difficult to decide. Yet, if the former, the student may find a reason for their escaping in Prop. 166, in the extraordinary proceedings that will at that time be inaugurated at Mt. Sinai. V. 42, "He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries," or "send forth" (so Luther, and marg.); occupying the position of conqueror, perhaps by levying heavy taxes, or by sending forth forces to countries not immediately in his course. "And the land of Egypt shall not escape, but he shall have power over the treasures of gold, and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt, and the Libyans and Ethiopians shall be at his steps." The course of this power in its career of conquest seems to be this: after enduring a struggle with the King of the South and the King of the North, he invades the countries, passing on to Turkey and into Palestine, and from thence into Egypt, obtaining the wealth of the country augmented by those who fled there before his invasion. From Egypt he returns to Palestine, the extent of his conquests being intimated by the Libyans and Ethiopians (see Barnes, loci) attending him. V. 44, "But tidings out of the East and the North shall trouble him;" what those tidings are it is impossible to tell, but that they are in some way related to the Jews (Mede, Faber, and many others) is reasonable, for the tidings bring him back to Palestine. What portion of the North is meant, whether, as some, England, or, as others, Russia, or, some other country, it is impracticable to say, but the tidings from the East can be more definitely fixed. If the reader turns to Prop. 166, where it is alleged that the formatory, introductory movement of the Theocracy is initiated at Mount Sinai, just at this period, he will see abundant reason for tidings directly East from him (for he is in Egypt when they arrive) to reach him which, owing to their remarkable nature, are sufficient to "trouble him." Taking the period of time denoted and the prophecies relating to it in consideration, there can be no doubt but that the question of the restoration of the Jewish nation and the re-establishment of the Theocracy at Jerusalem is involved. The last head of the Roman power is to have possession of Palestine at the time of the restoration (and, as some Jews have, perhaps through his instrumentality, been put in possession of Jerusalem), he returns to Palestine to fight against Jerusalem, as e.g., Zech. 14 : 1, 2, a revolt from some cause having taken place after his departure to Egypt.' "Therefore he shall go forth with great fury to destroy and utterly to make away many;" the tidings enrage him to make a war of extermination, and it is well to notice, as Bh. Newton, Faber and numerous writers have observed, that as the original of "utterly to make away many" signifies to anathematize, to consecrate, to devote to utter perdition, it strongly implies that this war shall be prosecuted on the account of religion, and that religion is in some way related to it. This supposition is supported and confirmed by the fact that this beast under his last head is represented as finally making war against the Lamb, etc. V. 45, "And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain;" his royal tents shall be planted, not only at Jerusalem, between the Mediterranean and Dead seas, but in Jerusalem (for "the city shall be taken," Zech. 14 : 2) and on Mount Zion.* "Yet he shall come to his end;" that is, shall be overcome and destroyed. The manner in, and the instrumentalities by, which this is to be accomplished are succinctly stated in other prophecies, as, e.g., Zech. 14 ; Rev. 19 ; Dan. 7, etc. "And none shall help him;" his destruction is certain and without reparation. Ch. 12 : 1, "And at that time;" the reader will observe the intimate connection that the following sustains to the manifestation of the last head of the Roman power in Palestine. "Shall Michael stand up, the great Prince which standeth for the children of thy people?" It is not in our province to discuss the question concerning Michael, some contending that an Archangel is denoted, specially devoted to and intrusted with the interests of the Jewish nation, while others believe that the Messiah is thus designated, and still others that Michael is named here as the guardian angel of the nation who will be associated with Christ.* Taking the several prophecies relating to this period, it is not very material to decide such a question, the main, leading, and important particular being the great results that are to be affected by the Christ or His agents. One thing, however, must not be overlooked, viz., that this interference is made in behalf of the Jewish nation, whose extremity—the closing act of their long-continued tribulation—is great, as seen in Zech. 14 : 2. "And there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time;" that is, a time of unprecedented trouble. According to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, our Saviour predicted the trouble befalling the Jewish nation at the destruction and continued down-trodden condition of the city and nation until it culminates at this very period, being at this crisis "the time of Jacob's trouble," Jer. 30 : 6-9. But great as this is, owing to its long continuance, long-borne calamities, its climax under this Roman power, it is as nothing compared with that which the vengeance of God shall pour out upon the vast confederation of Gentile nations found arrayed against Jerusalem and His people. If there is a prophetic truth distinctly taught, it is the one that as and after the Jewish tribulation closes, then a most fearful season of trial, indignation, and woe will befall the Gentiles (see Prop. 162). "And at that time thy people shall be delivered ;" that is, notwithstanding the greatness of this Roman power and the extremity to which it shall reduce the Jewish nation, that nation, Daniel's people, shall be delivered. But let the reader keep in mind our Props. relative to the election of this people and how the Gentiles by faith are engrafted into that elect people, and he will at once be prepared for what follows : viz., that at the glorious restoration of the nation under the Theocratic ordering predicted, the time has also arrived for the resurrection, not only of the Jews, but also of the engrafted believers—all God's people—to participate in the blessings and glory of the Messiah's reign. Hence in the following verses the resurrection is predicted, for which see Prop. 126, our purpose now only being to show that the Roman power will exist in its last form, a destructive force, down to the end of this age, and will only be removed when the Advent of Christ, the resurrection of the saints, and the ushering in of the Theocratic Kingdom has come. To indicate that the series of predictions run down, past our time, into the future, the most solemn assurance is given, Ch. 12 : 7 "when He shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." The Jewish tribulation is not yet finished ; the nation is still scattered ; the capitol is still trodden down ; the times of the Gentiles still endure ; and while this lasts we must still look for the fulfilling of what is thus predicted, with the experience attached Ch. 12 : 10.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Even Jerome, Theodoret, Luther, Ecolampadius, Geier, Calovius, Klieforth, Keil, and many others applied the prediction to the New Test. Antichrist. A multitude of able writers ally it, in some form or other, with the Roman state. It is a matter of surprise that the Antiochus Epiphanes theory should even yet, notwithstanding its direct and logical antagonism, be indorsed by some commentators. Others make a sort of compromise in order, if possible, to remove the difficulties, viz., while making a direct reference to Antiochus, they advocate a double fulfilment—one in Antiochus and another in the future Antichrist, the former being typical of the latter. But the context forbids such a twofold application.

<sup>2</sup> Some writers introduce Antichrist at verse 21, but we vastly prefer, upon the historical grounds given by Bh. Newton and others, to adopt the view here presented. Nothing is gained by so premature an interpretation, which is opposed by historical connection and unity. On the other hand, the introduction of the Romans, corresponding accurately with history, and the final development of Antichrist out of it, agreeing with the general tenor of prophecy, is in accordance with the spirit and intent of the prediction. We also thus avoid making a chasm in prophecy and fulfilment, bringing it into full accord with Dan. 7 and Rev. 13, 17, etc.

<sup>3</sup> Barbour (Three Worlds, p. 111) makes this to be the Papacy setting itself up in the church (i. e. in the "holy place," "the temple of the Holy Ghost"). We deem this, for reasons assigned, premature. The only interpretation and application (considering ch. 12 : 11 ; ch. 9 : 27, and the reference of Jesus, Matt. 24 : 15) is that which directly applies it to the Roman Power, and which (whatever fulfilment in the past) finds its culminating point under the last head of this same power (in connection with the last siege, Zech. 14, of Jerusalem).

<sup>4</sup> The student need only be reminded that the empire was designated "Holy ;" that its emperors were such "by the grace of God," divinely appointed, and thus "the Lord's anointed ;" that the subjects were taught to regard their rulers, divinely commissioned, with reverence and awe ; that laws were instituted which assumed power over conscience, regulated worship, enforced under penalties uniformity, recognized a State Church with a civil establishment, persecuted dissentients ; that the spirit evidenced a dominion over religion, founding or accepting of special commands, institutions, codes, rites, objects of worship, ministers, etc., either by its own will or adopting that of the Papacy which it supported.

<sup>2</sup> Elliott and others think that "push at him" is incorrectly rendered, the preposition in other places meaning "with," so that they would translate it as implying union or alliance with the Roman Power.

<sup>3</sup> Hence Bh. Horaley (Letter on Isa. 18) says: "I have an unfashionable partiality for the opinions of antiquity. I think there is ground in the prophecies for the notion of the early Fathers, that Palestine is the stage on which Antichrist, in the height of his impiety, will perish." See also the opinions of the Jews, Jewish Rabbies, Jerome, etc., as given by Newton, Mede, Faber, etc. May we add, that the application of this part of the prophecy by the Jews themselves to the Romans, as Jerome and others state, and not to Antiochus (as Porphyry, Grotius, Barnes, etc.), is at least evidence that they did not regard Antiochus as fulfilling the prediction.

<sup>4</sup> Many writers (as e.g. Brookes, Maranatha, p. 437) have a covenant existing between the Jews and Antichrist which is broken in the middle of the last week; this will be referred to under another aspect of the subject.

<sup>5</sup> If the reader desires to see a laborious but utterly futile effort to accommodate this to Antiochus Epiphaneus, let him refer to Barnes, Com., Dan. loci. Bishop Newton has well observed that it cannot possibly apply to Antiochus, for he returned no more to Judæa, but miserably died on his journey (not from Egypt but) from Persia on the frontiers. To satisfy a theory, undue liberties are taken with the text, viz., in accommodating it to the closing scenes of Antiochus's life in a mountainous region where probably a heathen temple stood which the prophet calls "holy," etc.

<sup>6</sup> We only notice that the opinion seems to be gaining ground that the Messiah is denoted, so that even Fairbairn (On Proph.) agrees with Ode, Vitrings, Hävernick, Hengstenberg, etc., in making Michael, Rev. 12 : 7, 8, another name for Christ—"a name given Him in special connection with this great conflict to indicate the certainty of His success grounded on His divine nature, for it means, 'who is like God?'" On the other hand, able writers maintain that Michael is only an attendant of Christ's, of whom an allusion is found in 1 Thess. 4, as "one of the chief princes" (Dan. 10 : 13, 14) who minister unto Him. So Tregelles (On Dan., p. 154) makes this the Archangel spoken of by Jude, and pertaining to the economy respecting Israel. Much weight is given to this view by a reference to ch. 10 : 13 (comp. Barnes, etc., loci), and hence Fausset (Com. Dan. 12 : 1) makes him "an archangel" and "the guardian angel of Israel." In favor of making him to be the Christ (in virtue of the meaning of the name and the action ascribed to him) are many of the older exegetes, various commentaries, and writers (as e.g. Kurtz, His. Old Cov., vol. 1, p. 192; Smith, Thoughts on Dan., p. 241; White, The Redeemer and Redeemed, p. 16; Cummings, The Great Tribulation, p. 19, etc.). But, on the other hand, many assert that an archangel, so named, is intended (comp. e.g. Barnes, Com. Dan., and the arts. on "Michael" in Cyclops.). We need not dogmatize on the point, as strong reasoning is presented on both sides; and surely we need not exhibit the credulity and superstition (For. Quart. Review, vol. 36, p. 331) of the monks of Mt. St. Michael in France, who do not hesitate to exhibit, as pious relics, the sword and shield with which Michael combated the dragon of the Revelations.

<sup>10</sup> Some who are partial to chronological deductions—very unreliable data for the reason that the precise periods are purposely obscurely given—may desire us, perhaps, to express our opinion respecting the dates given in ch. 12. None that have as yet fallen under our observation seem to fill all the conditions required. If we are to receive the year-day fulfilment, then the best starting point, historically established, is that suggested by Newton and others, viz., the time when the Pope became truly a temporal as well as an ecclesiastical Prince. Some refer this to the time when Charlemagne gave certain grants to the Pope, but history informs us that he only renewed and enlarged those previously given by Pepin. It is in the year 755 (see Bower's His. of Popes, Stephen II.) that the Bishop of Rome was raised to the rank of a Prince. The thirty and forty-five additional years have, as suggested by various writers, a relation to the restoration of the Jews. But if we are to take the literal day fulfilment, then these prophetic periods have reference to the closing period of these wonders, relating more specially to the career of this last head of the beast in his course of conquest, and to the time of sore tribulation preceding that of deliverance. Whatever the wise may understand in reference to the general outlines of the prophecy (ch. 12 : 10), yet there is sufficient said in ch. 12 : 9 to indicate that some things shall not be clearly apprehended until the time of the end, the closing period has arrived and is actually inaugurated. And of all things thus concealed the prophetic dates, giving no definite starting point, are the most difficult of comprehension, thus teaching us, if we will but receive it, not to dogmatize concerning them. For aught we know they may have reference to the initiatory proceedings of Christ and His saints in re-establishing the Theocratic ordering, which process begins the period of wonders that shall then be witnessed. We may indeed offer conjectures, but they are only conjectures. The Book of Dan. (Jewish Apoc.) remains at least sealed, 12 : 9, for the nation to the time of the end, while Rev. (Christian Apoc.) is unsealed, Rev. 22 : 10, inviting study and knowledge. The student will, additionally, observe several things : (1) That this continuation of prediction down to the Advent and resurrection, sets aside that contradictory interpretation which locates the fulfilment of these things in the past. Such a procedure violates unity and lessens, immeasurably, the predicted results. (2) The "time of the end" is one that specially pertains to the period in which this Antichristian power is to rage. Hence we must reject as utterly untenable the theories, however plausibly presented by a number of writers at the present, that we have already passed into this special "time of the end." Prophecy clearly and unmistakably unites it with the career of this last head of the Roman beast in his devastating work (comp. last Obs. of Prop. 130). (3) That it is utterly impossible, with the intimate connection of this last head with the Roman Empire, to receive those theories, however forcibly expressed by otherwise able writers, which make this last Antichristian power some one outside of the Roman Empire, i. e., some power not actually incorporated and acknowledged as a head, as e. g. the Turco-Mohammedan, etc. Such views are prevalent and highly esteemed by some students of prophecy, but, as shown, are irreconcilable with the demands of prophecy. (4) That no theory respecting the Antichrist in its culminated head can possibly be received, which does not make Him a controlling civil head of the Roman Empire ; this sets aside a mass of loose inferential pleading on the subject. (5) The reason why this empire is to receive, as predicted, the vengeance of God, is its history as a pagan beast and professed Christian beast, its support of hierarchy, its Antichristian developments and persecuting manifestations. (6) The view that is given by some that we have a regular history of the successors of Alexander down to Antiochus Epiphanes, or that the last is primarily to be applied to Antiochus and secondarily to Antichrist, is not admissible by the historical connection, the time of fulfilment, the events connected therewith, and the harmony of other predictions. (7) That the views which make the delineation of the Antichrist still future are to be preferred (although they differ as to the interval, some preferring to commence from v. 20 or 21, others from 30 or 31, or 33, or 36) to those which make the same past or simply typical. Tregelles (On Dan.) and others give interesting interpretations of these prophecies, but we are not impressed to specially defend one or the other, the material point being—in harmony with other predictions—to extend the career of the wilful king or Antichrist to "the time of the end," and preserve its relationship to Daniel's people in the latter days. (8) Some writers, in their eagerness to present and urge a present fulfilment, pervert the historical connection, as e. g. Sparkes in A His. Com. on 11th of Dan. (who makes vs. 44 and 45 refer to the Crimean War—as if the Antichrist were the Turk and would be destroyed by man), Swormstedt in The End of the World Near (who, under the plea of special aid from the Spirit, makes extraordinary work of the prophecy ; for, crowding almost the whole chapter within forty years, he allows his imagination to distribute the events between the Sultan of Turkey, Victor Emmanuel, Egypt, Antichrist, England, Russia, etc.), and others. (9) Probably one of the most arbitrary, imaginative, and wild of expositions, is Baldwin's Armageddon, in which the United States is eulogized as the prominent prophetic figure of Daniel, the Fifth Universal Empire, etc. ; and consequently everything must be, volens volens, interpreted to apply, as e. g. the United States is designated by "the glorious holy mountain," by "Michael," by the "holy people, etc. But a writer who e. g. can make the new song of Rev. 14 : 1-5 to be the song of freedom in the U. S., or the statement of Rev. 11 : 15-18 to be applicable to the U. S., etc., etc., is capable of any interpretation and application. This is evidenced by his application of the Stone, the Ancient of Days, the Advent of the King of kings, etc., to the United States. Certainly no Pre-Millenarian, even of the most extreme and fanatical sect, has ever produced such vagaries, or extravagances. (10) We conclude by saying, that so plain is this reference to the future Antichrist, that commentaries largely addicted to spiritualizing and to the Antiochus theory still admit such a reference, as e. g. The Crit. and Experimental Com. says on this point : "The wilful king here, though primarily Antiochus, is antitypically and mainly Antichrist, the seventh head of the seven-headed and ten-horned beast of Rev. 13, and the beast of Armageddon, who gathers together thither the kings of the earth against the Lamb (Rev. 16 : 13, 16 and 19 : 29)."

Obs. 6. The same feature, viz., the continuation of the Roman power to the time of the end, is contained in the now largely received interpretation of the seventy weeks of Daniel. If we are to accept of the explanation of those weeks (Dan. 9 : 24-27), as given by Dr. Burgh, Sir Denny, Tregelles, Kelsall, Maitland, B. W. Newton, Strange, Taunton, Guinness, McCausland, Parker, Bickersteth, Birks, Seiss, Brookes, Baxter, etc. (and as intimated by ancients, as Irenæus, Hippolytus, Julius Africanus, Victorinus, Apollinarius, Primasius, etc.), then it is self-evident that the Roman power continues to exist down to the final and complete deliverance of the Jewish nation at the Second Advent. The scheme as presented is, at least, worthy of due consideration from the prophetic student. It has been well observed by various writers that if the seventy weeks are to end with the death of Christ and the incoming destruction of Jerusalem, it is simply impossible—with all ingenuity expended in this direction by eminent men—to make out an accurate fulfilment of prophecy from the dates given, for the time usually adduced being either too long to fit with the crucifixion of Christ or too short to extend to the destruction of Jerusalem. That, and that alone, which seems to meet the difficulty, is to allow, that the Spirit when He comes to a certain period, introducing the Roman power, separates a portion of those seventy weeks from the rest, because of the rejection of Christ by the Jewish nation and the domination of the Gentile power. But, that the reader may obtain a clear idea of the matter, we present in the briefest form a running comment upon Dan. 9 : 24-27, given without reference to those authors just named, but corresponding accurately with, and adding to, the position assumed by them. Before proceeding, attention is called to Daniel's prayer, which was for the restoration of the nation and city and the introduction of the promised blessings of the prophets. Barnes and others tell us that the answer to his prayer is not direct, that instead of being told of the restoration of the nation, etc., he is informed of the First Advent of the Messiah, the closing of the temple service, and a more enduring destruction of the temple, city, etc. We take the ground, that as Daniel's prayer included a complete and final deliverance of his people and a continued (as previously predicted) restoration to their land, God answers Daniel according to the spirit and intent of his prayer.* For the partial restoration from Babylon which followed does not, as history proves, meet the scope of Daniel's prayer as derived from previous prophecies, or even those given by himself in Chs. 2 and 7. Hence in a special revelation, the restoration from Babylon—which never fulfilled the magnificent predictions pertaining to the Jewish nation—is rapidly passed by, and the mind of Daniel is directed to several great events that must first transpire before (so implied, seeing that the fulfilment of the prophecies is taken for granted) the prayer of Daniel in its fulness could be realized. Those events directly alluded to are the Coming of the Messiah (but instead of the restoration), His removal, the destruction of Jerusalem, and continued ruin until a certain period of time was reached. V. 24, "Seventy weeks;" seventy sevens of years, or seventy weeks, symbolizing years (see Barnes, etc., loci). "Are determined;" Gesenius, and other critics, inform us that the original properly denotes a cutting off, a dividing off, and Barnes gives the meaning thus: "This portion of time, the seventy weeks, was cut off from the whole duration, or cut out of it, as it were, and set by itself for a definite purpose." This criticism is well sustained by fact, seeing that it is only a small portion of time out of that larger period of Jewish overthrow, etc., before their final restoration. If the question be asked why such a brief period should be cut out of the larger portion and be thus expressed, several answers are suggested: (1) the time stated is, if we may so call it, Jewish time, i. e. time relating to the nation, and hence the period of Gentile domination is not included under it; (2) the Divine Spirit in a most remarkable manner presents His abhorrence of the appalling act of which the nation was guilty, viz., in crucifying the Messiah, by which act the nation forfeited for a period God's recognition of it as a nation, and hence the period of such non-recognition is not reckoned; (3) Jesus Himself tells us that "the times of the Gentiles" shall intervene, which are not included, they becoming such pre-eminently by the rejection of the Messiah. For, at the appearing of the Messiah, as we have seen (Prop. 57, etc.), the Kingdom was tendered to the nation on condition of repentance. Had the nation repented, the period of seventy weeks alone would have embraced their degradation, for the Kingdom would have been re-established, Prop. 55, etc. Hence the prophecy is given in view of the offer of this Kingdom, and yet fully by implication expresses the refusal of the same. The events recorded in the prophecy are such as pertain preparatory to the re-establishment of the Theocracy, and down to the sixty-ninth week the Theocracy to be restored was freely within the choice of the nation, as evidenced by the preaching of this Kingdom (Props. 54-58). But in view of the sinfulness of the nation, it was postponed, Prop. 66, and hence a week is detached from the rest, which is only verified when God again recognizes the Jewish nation as a nation in the work preparatory to the setting up of the promised Theocracy. The Gentile times will come to an end, and time specially related to the people belonging as an inheritance to Christ will begin again. This will appear more clearly as we proceed—these remarks being now made that the reader may observe the force and propriety in the phrase that this designated time is something cut out of, separated from time in general—thus in the outset calling attention to the fact that another (and as history shows the larger) portion is not reckoned in view of the rejection of the nation for its treatment of the Messiah. "Upon thy people and upon thy holy city;" respecting or pertaining to the Jewish nation and Jerusalem. "To finish the transgression;" the reading generally adopted (Barnes, Hengstenberg, etc.) is that of the margin: To restrain, confine, shut up. Here it is positively asserted that at the end of the seventy weeks "the transgression," either the sin which brought such misery into the world, or the results of such transgression, or, perhaps more specially, the sin and punishment pertaining to the Jewish nation, shall be restrained, shut up, ended. If we take the usual interpretation given to the passage that this was done at the First Advent in the sufferings and death of Christ for sin and to restrain sin in His followers, we reply that it does not meet either the spirit of Daniel's prayer or that of the prophecy, because the death of Christ fearfully increased the sinfulness and the punishment of the nation, and increases the sinfulness of the world in rejecting Him. Transgression produced that death, continued transgression rejects Him, and yet the prophecy declares that, as pertaining to them and the city, at the close of the seventy weeks they shall be no longer under the dominion of transgression. Comparatively few Jews were converted, so that the immense mass of believers are Gentiles; and it is certainly wrong to insist upon a fulfilment, in which neither the nation

nor city, as such, participated to any extent, but terribly suffered for transgression. On the other hand, the prophets predict a period of time when the sinfulness of the Jewish nation shall be forgiven, when transgression shall be blotted out and the nation shall be gloriously delivered, when Satan himself shall be restrained, shut up, so that "all shall be righteous,"—the time that Daniel evidently longed and prayed for—which is still future. Now this prediction, in some way, stands related to this period. So far as the sixty-nine weeks are concerned, there is no difficulty, for there is, as numerous writers (Tregelles, Brookes, etc.) have shown, a strictly chronological fulfilment down to Christ's death. The trouble is what to do with the last week which is in excess to that death and too brief to extend to the destruction of Jerusalem. It is at the end of this last week that the transgression is to be restrained. The only explanation is, that, as the prophecy itself intimates, this one week is detached, separated from the rest, and held in abeyance—owing to the rejection of the nation and pre-eminence of Gentile times—until this nation is again recognized in its national capacity. The closing of the seventy weeks, separated by an undefined period—the resultant of the death of the Messiah and the non-recognition of the Jewish nation as such—is to be found at the ushering in of the Millennial period, when transgression shall indeed be restrained. "To make an end of sins" or, as many, "to seal up sins;" the meaning being, as Barnes, etc., "to remove it from sight, to remove it from view," to banish it, etc. The usual explanation given, is that "faith in Christ forgives sins and makes them inert," etc. But this is defective for the same reasons just assigned under previous clause, and from the fact that although God pardons sins, yet, like David's, Peter's, etc., they are not necessarily concealed from view, and that pious men have constantly to resist sin. This promise specially given to the nation and city cannot, without violation of the prediction, be thus applied to the present experience of believers. But the time is coming when sin shall be effectually removed from sight, when Satan himself is confined and a seal is affixed (Rev. 20 : 3), when holiness shall be triumphantly established. "And to make reconciliation for iniquity;" critics tell us that the meaning of the original is not "to make reconciliation," but "to cover" or "to cover over," and, Barnes says, is often used in the general sense of to pardon or forgive. The reasoning already given will equally apply to this phrase; for, instead of pardoning the iniquity of the Jewish nation, to whom the prophecy specially applies, the nation is still feeling the effects of God's withdrawal, but the time is coming when their iniquity shall be forgiven and the forgiveness manifested in prosperity and exaltation. See Props. 112, 113, 114. "To bring in everlasting righteousness;" literally, "to cause to come," "a permanent enduring" state of "righteousness," or, as some, "to cause to come the righteousness of the ages," which is emphatically true of the Millennial era bringing in an enduring period of righteousness. "And to seal up the vision and the prophecy," or "prophet;" this indicates, keeping in view that the prophecy pertains to the Jewish nation, that the nation would not comprehend this vision or prophecy. They did not when the Messiah came; they do not now; and they will not until the Second Advent. Or, if it denotes, as some may think, the fulfilment of the whole prophecy, this will only be accomplished at the end of the seventy weeks. If this prediction is not thus understood by the Jewish nation, how comes it that Gentiles may understand it? The sealing of it alludes to the proph- ecy as it pertains to the Jewish nation and not to the times of the Gentiles intervening, and not to those who would accept of the Messiah, for Jesus Himself gives an unsealed Revelation relating to this intervening period and the closing of this prophecy which also is only received by believers, and not by the nation. "To anoint the Most Holy;" passing by the different views (Barnes, etc., loci) of this phrase, it is sufficient to indicate its probable meaning; either that Christ will consecrate, at His Second Coming, with His presence the Holy hill of Zion; or, that the New Jerusalem will thus be exalted; or, that Christ Himself shall then (as Dan. 7) receive the Kingdom from the Father; or, that it pertains to the glorified saints. It refers us to an act of consecration, because of its connection with the preceding, at the time of the Sec. Advent, and refers either to Christ Himself or to some place, as Jerusalem, Mount Zion, New Jerusalem, or to the corporate body of saints that there inherit the Kingdom. It is perhaps impossible to definitely fix its meaning." V. 25, "Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem unto Messiah, the Prince, shall be seven weeks and three score and two weeks." Omitting the lengthy details of commentators (Barnes, etc.), it is sufficient for our purpose to say, that the almost generally received opinion that the time of the decree of the Persian king (commonly called Ezra's), extending down to the First Advent of Christ, which precisely includes those sixty-nine weeks (with slight variations), seems to be the best founded.<sup>1</sup> This throws the ministry of Christ either into the middle or at the close of the sixty-ninth week. This view has been so ably defended by numerous writers, independently of the interpretation that we have adopted (as e.g. Barnes, etc.), that it requires no extended mention, our object being merely to notice the relationship that the prophecy sustains to the Roman power and the future. There is a phrase, however, added in the 25th verse that we must apply differently from other writers, viz., "the street shall be built again and the wall even in troublous times." In the wide diversity of rendering given to this, it may be regarded impracticable to definitely determine its meaning. From the renderings given we suggest the following: "The way or broad way" (Barnes, etc.) "shall be restored and built" (Hengstenberg, etc.) "and the threshing instrument" (the word "wall" in original so used in Isa. 28 : 27; Amos. 1 : 3; Isa. 41 : 15; Joel 3 : 14 marg.) "in a time of distress" (Hengstenberg). This phrase is erroneously affixed to the ending of the seven weeks or forty-nine years, but it is expressly stated as following the sixty-nine weeks and the coming of the Messiah. Aside from the impossibility of showing that there was this rebuilding of Jerusalem just after seven weeks, the location of the statement in the prophecy, as following after the sixty-nine weeks, forbids such an application.<sup>2</sup> Even if it refers to the rebuilding of Jerusalem, as our version has it, then the reference is to that rebuilding which is still future and predicted. But let the reader turn to Prop. 34, and see how the prophets describe the future glory as dependent upon the Advent of the Messiah without indicating which one is meant, owing to the fact that the First Advent itself tendered to the nation this Theocratic restoration. Hence the prophet, having referred to this Advent, before describing the rejection of the Messiah, in strict accord with the other prophets, declares that "the way or broad way shall be built," which is done when the Millennial age is ushered in, as seen in Isa. 35 : 8-10; Isa. 43 : 19-21; Isa. 62 : 11, 12, etc. That the millennium is preceded by a "time of distress," has been repeatedly stated, and that the Jewish nation becomes at that time "a new sharp threshing instrument" (Isa. 41 : 15 ; Micah 4 : 13 ; Joel 3 : 14, comp. Prop. 115), has been shown. Had the Jews accepted of the Messiah thus sent and repented, this, too, would have been accomplished, but, rejecting Him, this is now postponed to His Second Coming, and therefore the prophet gives us what follows. "And after three score and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off;" this, as eminent commentators have abundantly shown, was fulfilled in the death of the Messiah. "But not for himself;" if this rendering is correct, then He died for the benefit of others; if the marginal reading is to be preferred, "and shall have nothing," it refers to the fact that the Messiah, as David's Son, did not obtain His inheritance (Prop. 67); if the Vulgate, "and they shall not be His people who shall deny Him," reference is had to the taking away of the Kingdom and bestowing it (as an inheritance) upon others (Prop. 61), if we are to follow Hengstenberg (similar to Syriac), "and is not to Him," i.e. dominion, authority is not to Him, which would agree with the postponement of the Kingdom (Prop. 66). Thus almost every rendering given to the concise and difficult phrase would find a fulfilment in fact. Now we come to the part of the prophecy having reference to the Roman power. "And the people of the prince that shall come;" this refers to the events following the cutting off of the Messiah, and all commentators who favor the Messianic reference of the prophecy agree in making "the people" alluded to the Romans. The prince is the Roman emperor or head who comes with his armies after the death of the Messiah for purposes of devastation. "Shall destroy the city and the sanctuary;" how this was accomplished under the Roman power is part of history, and needs no explanation. "And the end thereof shall be with a flood;" the end of the city or nation shall be involved in the ravages, overwhelming devastation of this power. "And unto the end of the war desolations are determined;" the idea, as critics inform us, is apparent, viz., that for an indefinite time a decreed measure of desolation would be continued upon the city, which is contained in our version and in the following: "And unto the end is war, a decree of ruins" (Hengstenberg), or "and the great desolations shall continue unto the end of the war" (Bertholdt), or, "and after the end of the war desolation is determined" (Vulgate), or "and unto the end shall be war, a decreed measure of desolations" (Prof. Stuart), or "and unto the end of the war, desolations are decreed" (Barnes). The city and the sanctuary being overthrown, this desolation would be continued on during a period of time decreed or determined by God, as e.g. the Messiah predicted that Jerusalem would continue (after it was taken) to be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles were fulfilled. The impressive feature that after the taking of the city by the Romans the overthrow and desolation of the Jewish nation would not cease, but continue on, has been fearfully verified in its history. V. 27, "And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week;" here, after the indefinite, unmeasured period following the sixty-nine weeks, is introduced the last week, making the total of seventy weeks; and the one alluded to, who shall make the covenant, is by the tenor of the prophecy connected with "the people of the prince that shall come," i.e. shall also belong to, or be head of, this persecuting Roman power. The effort of Barnes and others to apply this to Christ is futile for the simple reasons (1) that it follows the cutting off of the Messiah ; (2) it succeeds the destruction of the city and sanctuary, and this pre-determined tribulation of the Jewish nation ; (3) it is connected with its antecedent, the Roman power ; (4) Christ did not make a covenant for a week, or seven years ; (5) the impossibility of making this week, seven years, fit with the public ministry and death of Christ. The only tenable position is to apply the personage denoted to a successor in the line of the destructive power previously mentioned. But with whom does this Roman power make a covenant? It is generally supposed by the writers referred to that a covenant with the Jews, raising them into the position of a nation (thus commencing the seventh week), is intended, and there are many things which make such a view plausible—such as the restoration of the Jews to their land under the agency of some power previous (Zech. 14 : 1, 2) to their restoration under Christ and the indirect allusions to some such covenant (as in Isa. 28 : 18 ; 33 : 8 ; Ps. 55 : 20). While this opinion is worthy of the serious consideration of the student, yet another covenant, compact, or agreement that the last head of the Roman power shall enter into is more specifically noted in the Scriptures, and may be the one here denoted, viz., the agreement and union with the ten horns or powers mentioned in Rev. 17 : 12, 13. It is this covenant entered into between the revived head of the Empire and the ten kings that leads to the last great conflict. The brevity of the agreement also corresponds, while the relationship that it may sustain to the Jewish nation (viz., partially restoring it) is implied by a comparison of predictions. “And in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease ;” this may refer either to the terrible persecution of the Church under this last head, by which the nations shall be led to embrace the Antichristian worship, or, as many suppose, to the removal of the worship instituted by the Jews at their partial restoration, or, to the restoration of idol, image worship and the exclusion of other forms. Perhaps the best commentary on this clause is the one given by the Spirit in Rev. 14 : 9 and Rev. 13 : 14–16. The worship of the true God is to be ignored and persecuted with marvellous success.” “And for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate ;” amid the great diversity of rendering and interpretation, it seems scarcely practicable to give one that could be dogmatically maintained ; but the reader is requested to consider one peculiarity admitted by a large number of critics, viz., that the phraseology implies, if it does not explicitly declare, that idol or image worship or something relating to false worship is meant, by which desolation is produced. Taking, then, the more recent predictions in Revelations as explanatory of the concise statements here, it appears that when the last head of this Roman power arises and causes by oppression and fearful persecution the worship of God to cease (i.e. forbids the liberty of such worship), in place of that worship shall be substituted the image worship to which all are forced upon pain of death, just before the Millennial age is ushered in (see Rev. 19 : 20 ; 14 : 9–14 ; 13 : 14–16).” “Even until the consummation ;” that is, until the completion of the period appointed, showing that all is under God’s control, and that this power, after all, endures just as long as He allows it. “And that determined shall be poured upon the desolate or desolator ;” God has foretold the rise, progress, and apparent triumph of this Roman power, but He has also predicted the fearful vengeance that shall befall this hostile power at the time of the end. What God has determined to pour out upon him is stated in numerous prophecies, as e.g. in those already adduced, Rev. 19 : 20, 21 ; Rev. 14 : 10, 11 ; Rev. 16, etc. Thus the latter part of this prediction was applied by the early Church to the events preceding the future open personal Advent of Christ, and a careful consideration of the passage, in its relationship, indicates the propriety of such an application, and teaches (because no change is intimated after the Romans are introduced) the continuation of the Roman power down to the time of the end, and the dreadful nature of the events introduced under the last head of this power.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In looking over and comparing the various applications of the prophecy to other predictions and the facts of history, there is not one that will stand the test of a critical examination being based on a complete and perfect fulfilment of the 70 weeks in the past. It was this failure that, no doubt, caused Prof. Stuart (Hints on the Interp. of Prophecy, p. 104) to say : " It would require a volume of considerable magnitude even to give a history of the ever-varying and contradictory opinions of critics respecting this locus vexatissimus ; and perhaps a still larger one to establish an exegesis which would stand. I am fully of opinion that no interpretation, as yet published, will stand the test of thorough grammatico-historical criticism ; and that a candid, and searching, and thorough critique here is still a desideratum. May some expositor, fully adequate to the task, speedily appear." To make the 70 weeks to fit an exact chronological period in the past, has been the aim of numerous writers, and this is constantly repeated (as e.g. Amer. ed. in Lange's Com. on Dan. loci). Ten different dates alone are given in Lange's Com. from which to date the 70 weeks, and to make the conclusion meet the supposed demands of the prophecy the method of parallelism, or of intercallation, or of transposition, or of analogical application, or of reckoning by lunar years, or of counting by jubilee periods, or of substituting Chaldee years, or of enumerating mystically, has been resorted to in order to remove difficulties. The nearest approach made by any effort, worthy of consideration, makes Christ's death to take place in the end of the 69th week, or the middle of the last week, but fails in linking this last portion to any significant historical fact predicted.

Thomas in "Elpis Israel" and the "Chronology" attached to it, after treating with his usual contempt all efforts but his own in arranging chronological eras, takes it for granted (p. 94, Chronology) that 490 years must necessarily end with the crucifixion, and hence conveniently arranges his figures to bring about the foregone conclusion, but most signally fails to show how the last week is realized when he extends it beyond the crucifixion to the reception of believers who ceased to offer bloody sacrifices, and how this abomination, desolation, and destruction is realized within its bounds. The objection he urges, that if the last week is separated from the 69th and placed in the future, it would make Jesus no Christ and Christianity a fable, is of no force whatever in view of the explanation given in the text. For if Jesus was crucified at the end of the 69 weeks, as many able writers hold, that itself is amply sufficient to prove His Messiahship, over against the usual dogmatism of Thomas. So Barbour (Three Worlds, p. 159) ridicules our view, which comes with special bad grace from him, since he cannot, with all his positiveness, show how the weeks are continuous chronologically, and shields himself (so complacent at his success in fixing definite time) under such admissions : " There is some obscurity in relation to the ending of the last week." " For some reason God has left this one week obscure, and neither the Bible nor history give any further light on that point." Baldwin (Armageddon, Appendix), finding that he could not fit in the 70 weeks chronologically, boasts of " a new and wonderful " discovery, a key to prophetic chronology, a solvent of difficulties, viz., to count " labor time," to which must be added " rest time," or unite " secular " and " spiritual time," thus obtaining respectively 564 and 603 years.

<sup>2</sup> Hence the retention of 70 in the prophecy. Daniel made inquiry concerning 70, and the angel informs him that another 70 relating to his people must transpire. God, while revealing to Daniel the future iniquity and punishment (preliminary to deliverance), in mercy to him and the nation, does not reveal in connection and detail the long-continued overthrow of the nation under Gentile domination, seeing that such a minute revelation would have been, in the nature of the case, terribly depressing. (The glimpses that Daniel received deeply affected him.) He therefore leaves out, cuts out, divides off a long interval, which belongs specially to the climax of unbelief, reaching from the crucifixion of the Messiah to the closing period of their dispersion.

the four world empires of Dan. 2 and 7, previously existed, yet Jewish time existed more or less contemporaneously down to the First Advent; for while periods of non-recognition existed (owing to sinfulness, and almost total in respect to the ten tribes), yet, in view of the divine purpose of God relating to the First Advent, He still recognizes the city and nation until we come to the crucifixion of the Messiah, when the non-recognition intervenes, and Gentile domination has paramount sway in power and time. The non-recognition of the years of Abraham with Hagar, of the years under bondage to Midian, of the 70 years of Babylonish captivity, of periods after the return, etc., are presented by some writers as illustrative of this method, and e.g. Brooks (Maranatha) thus reconciles the enumeration from the Exodus to the building of the temple (480 added to 121 under a foreign yoke and in slavery, making 601).

<sup>4</sup> Let it be observed that the intercalation of a period of time, especially between the sixty-ninth and seventieth weeks, has been adopted (Lange's Com. on Dan., p. 208) by l'Empereur, Newton, Koch, Beer, Uri, etc., in order to remove the discrepancies of fulfillment. Even so early a writer as Hippolytus (p. 207) declared that the last week denotes the future period of the Antichrist at the end of the dispensation. So also Apollinaris of Laodicea located the Antichrist still future in the last week, considering the prophecy as only applicable to him. So likewise (p. 212) others, as the Berleburg Bible, Kliefoth, Keil, etc., consider the last week as only realized in the history of the still future Antichrist, with which view many, as intimated above, agree in interpreting the prophecy eschatologically. The views generally entertained we cannot accept consistently with prediction. Thus e.g. that of Hävernick, Hengstenberg, etc., who make the conclusion applicable to the destruction of Jerusalem under Titus, which is opposed by the chronology of the 70 weeks; that of Ewald, Hitzig, etc., who refer the whole to Antiochus Epiphanes, which is contradicted both by chronology and the facts predicted; that of Hofman, Delitzsch, etc., who have a primary fulfillment in Antiochus and a secondary in the future Antichrist, which is a mingling of two things not supported by chronology and the facts of history; and that of Kliefoth and others, who make the weeks mystical or symbolical periods, extending regularly down to the end of this dispensation, thus mixing the literal and the mystical, the length, location, and indefiniteness of the periods at the pleasure of the interpreter.

<sup>5</sup> The "veil" is still over the nation. However individuals may accept of personal salvation in believing, the nation, as such, bears a strong dislike to Jesus of Nazareth, and regards with disdain the interpretation of prophecies which would link the ultimate forgiveness and glory of the nation with a reception of this same Jesus. It is too humiliating for faith to accept, being at present regarded as a degradation for them to owe their final recovery and restoration to, "the crucified One."

<sup>6</sup> If we adopt the reading of many, viz., "a holy of holies," it then seems to direct our attention to the fact that not only the Theocratic order and worship is re-instituted, but to those who officiate in the highest relationship in connection with it. The Theocratic King, His nearness and accessibility, His associates in rulership and priesthood, are evidently included.

<sup>7</sup> Comp., however, the able argument of Dr. Tregelles (On Dan. loci), who prefers the decree of Artaxerxes given to Nehemiah (that given to Ezra by Cyrus referring to building of the temple, and that given to Ezra by Artaxerxes pertains to the worship, while this one relates to the restoration and rebuilding of Jerusalem. From the date of this decree to the death of Jesus, he makes precisely 69 weeks. (Comp. his excellent remarks, p. 99.)

<sup>8</sup> Still, able writers adopt it as referring to the rebuilding after 49 years. So Tregelles (On Daniel, who renders: "The street shall be again built, and the trench, or scraped rampart, even in pressure of times") and many others. The reception of this application would not affect our general conclusion, since Tregelles fully adopts the same. The division into sevens and the rebuilding under Ezra, suggest both the rendering and application, while we accept of the plain implication that it is something following the 69 weeks—in fact, linked with, and resulting from, the 70th week.

<sup>9</sup> The opinion (Hävernick, Hengstenberg, etc.) that this refers to Christ's expiatory sacrifice superseding the Old Test. institution of sacrifice, cannot be accepted for the reasons, that (1) this is not asserted of the Messiah but of another; (2) the verb does not express superseding; (3) Christ's work and death did not cause the temple service to cease, seeing that it was continued down to the destruction of Jerusalem; (4) the impossibility of fitting the 70th week with the death of Christ or the destruction of the temple; (5) the transposition and violation which such an application produces.

view," which tend to "desolation," so that some designate it "desolating abomination of idolatry" (Lange's Com.); others have it abominations, i.e. idolatrous image worship, led on by a desolator; some, "the desolator comes upon the pinnacle of abomination;" others, "On the head (summit) of the abominations is a desolator;" others, "a destroyer comes on the wings of idolatrous abominations;" marg. reading, "upon the battlements shall be the idols of the desolator;" others, "upon the summit of abomination comes the destroyer," etc. Numerous writers affirm that it is applied to idols or that which is abominable and detestable in worship, and this fully accords with what is predicted to take place at "the time of the end."

<sup>11</sup> The critical student will not fail to notice one peculiarity connected with this prophecy, viz., that God in the manner of presenting the truth avoids the fearful depressing effect that the real facts of the future would have had, if fully stated, upon the nation. Suppose e.g. that the Spirit had revealed that the time determined upon the Jewish nation and city would embrace over eighteen centuries of trial and persecution—what a terrible blow this would have been. God's mercy veils this in the peculiar manner of prediction. Daniel, who obtained a view of this long interval, was so deeply affected that for weeks he mourned and fasted (ch. 10 : 2, 3). Let us briefly place ourselves in Daniel's position, and then we may more correctly imagine his feelings. He had previously received (chs. 2, 7) an epitome of history which indicated the deliverance of the nation at the Advent of the covenanted Messiah. But these were also so framed that they mercifully concealed the awful fact of the rejection and death of the Messiah by the nation and the consequent long-continued tribulation. The framework of the prophecy, dealing with the times of the Gentiles, allowed this skillful and compassionate veiling of the nation's sin and doom. Now Daniel, because of this merciful concealment of facts, entertained (ch. 9 : 2-19) the hope that, according to Jeremiah, the restoration from the Babylonish captivity would result in the ultimate restoration under the Messiah. To ascertain the correctness of this hope, he proceeds to "prayer and supplication with fasting, and sackcloth and ashes," and proceeds to a confession of sin and supplication for mercy. The result is, that God reveals to him the inexpressible painful fact that his nation would reject the Messiah, and that fresh and long-continued tribulations would have to be endured, Jerusalem again being destroyed. No wonder that Daniel was astounded and mourned over that dreary, dark future—having a clear and unmistakable view of the inevitable postponement of the Messiah's Kingdom. Happy we, if, like Daniel, we feel deeply interested in, and ponder over, such predictions. In the world to come we may hear from Daniel's own lips how powerfully his feelings were wrought upon, and what fervent supplications flowed from his heart. God will honor him for his expression of feeling, and we, too, shall be honored with him because of our respect and reverence for such communications.

Rev. Baxter (Coming Troubles) enumerates a large number of expositors and writers who adopt such a view, and to these we have added others. Tregelles (On Dan., p. 96, etc.) gives the idea of all these, when he makes the prediction to extend to the time of the future Jewish restoration and Messianic Kingdom, thus including the interval from the crucifixion of Jesus to the reception and persecution of the culminated Antichrist. So Brookes (Maranatha, p. 421, etc.), who correctly declares that this prediction relates not to the Christian Church, as erroneously supposed, but to the history of Israel, indicated by "thy people," "thy holy city," etc. Compare e.g. Bh. Nicholson, Pre-Mill. Essays, p. 229; Ebrard, The Rev. of John; Epp (German) in his tract on Prophecy; Brewster's Life of Newton, p. 250, says that Newton made the 70 weeks to run down to the Sec. Coming of Christ; Lange, Com. Rev., p. 47, who likewise (by a symbolical application) extends the weeks to the Sec. Parousia; Fausset, Com. Dan. loci, who says of Auberlen's and Tregelles's application of the last week: "Perhaps both interpretations of the whole passage may be in part true; the Roman desolator, Titus, being a type of Antichrist, the final desolator of Jerusalem."

PROPOSITION 161. This Kingdom will not be re-established until after Antichrist is overthrown.

This has already been represented under Prop. 123 (and other places, as Prop. 160, Obs. 4, etc.), and follows in view of the elect position of the Jewish nation in this Kingdom (being the special inheritance of David's Son), and the predicted fact that this nation is fearfully oppressed by the Antichrist, and only finds deliverance and restitution at the open manifestation of Jesus and His saints, Zech. 14, etc. We present the subject again in this form in order to add some observations to a very important matter, deeply affecting the interests of man.

For special articles on Antichrist see Herzog's Cyclop., Smith's Bib. Dic. and Cyclops. in general; for particular applications see commentaries of Lange and others on 2 Thess. 2 and Rev. 13 and 17, and also special commentaries like Tregelles, Anberlen, Roos, and others on Daniel; for representations of the subject compare such discussions as are given by Alford in Proleg. to 2 Thess., Greswell on Parables, Elliott's Horæ Apoc., etc.; for works which largely treat of Antichrist see Bonar's Development of Antichrist, Frere's Combined View of the Prophecies, Knight's Lectures on the Prophecies Concerning Antichrist, Faber's Dissertations and Sacred Calendar, Keith's His. and Destiny of the World and Church, Frederick's Times of Antichrist, Cameron's Antichrist, Clarke's Diss. on the Dragon, Beast, and False Prophet, Todd's Dis. on Antichrist, Malvenda's Antichrist, as well as the writings of Lord, Birks, Darby, Thomas, Cressener, Roach, Fysh, Bickersteth, Brooks, Read, Cunninghame, and Pre-Mill. authors generally. Trench's Synonyms of the N. T., and works of that class, are instructive.

Obs. 1. The Church has always kept its eye fixed on the prophecies pertaining to Antichrist. Every century, from the Christian era down, gives us in the writings of eminent men an expression of opinion relating to it. However important the subject in the past, interest in it increases proportionately to the increasing nearness of the Millennial age. The Millennium can never be introduced before the fearful scenes under that Antichrist are first witnessed and experienced. The prominence given to Antichrist in the Scriptures and by the faith of the Church; the nearness of fulfilment that may be nigh to us; the delineation of character and work given by the Spirit; these are sufficient warrant for a careful consideration of this powerful actor in the world's history.

Alas! multitudes of professors, and even believers, turn away from the subject as foolishness. They do not reflect that this was a subject much dwelt on in apostolic days (e.g. 2 Thess. 2 : 5, 6; 1 John 2 : 18), and that a very large portion of Scripture is taken up either in descriptions or references. The conduct and example of the apostles and primitive Christians, as well as the prominence given to the subject by the Spirit, should rebuke our neglect or inattention. The worldly spirit of the age is censured by the language held in former days, as e.g. given by Turner (His. of Anglo-Saxons, vol. 2, p. 477), expressive of a subject of contemplation, in a sermon beginning: "Beloved men! there is great need that we should be aware of the fearful time that is now approaching. Now, very soon, will be the times of the Antichrist; therefore we ought to expect him, and carefully think upon him."

Obs. 2. It was a generally received opinion of the Jews (comp. Reuss, His. of Ch. Theol. Ap. Age, p. 115, etc.) that the Messianic Kingdom could not be introduced without the previous manifestation of the Antichrist. This view was derived from Daniel and the other prophets, who described such an Antichristian power—the great enemy portrayed in its outward culminated form—as preceding the coming of the Son of man to set up His Kingdom.<sup>1</sup> This belief was incorporated in the early Church, and was universally held as belonging to the period immediately antecedent to the open, visible Advent of the Lord Jesus at His Second Coming. It evidently, too, was a point much contemplated, so that John (1 John 2 : 18) could say, “Ye have heard that Antichrist shall come,” and Paul (2 Thess. 2 : 5) could assert, “Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things?” The language, etc., of the apostles fully corroborates the Jewish view, only applying to the Sec. Advent what had previously been supposed to pertain to the First. This at once confirms our previous positions respecting the Kingdom, viz., that the Church is not intended, because Jesus at the First Advent came in a time of peace and not of war with the Antichrist as predicted by Daniel, Zechariah, and others. The student will here recognize in the prophecies a most wonderful evidence of inspiration in the foreseen rejection of Jesus, the postponement of the Kingdom, and hence in describing the continued Gentile domination passing over the First Advent and linking its overthrow under the culminated Antichrist with the Second Coming—and doing this, too, without specification of the same, lest it interfere with the tender of the Kingdom to the nation. The doctrinal position of the early Church, the general drift of the prophecies, pertaining to the Antichrist alone, if duly considered in its connections, abundantly confirms our view of the Kingdom. Prophecy links the re-establishment of the Kingdom with the destruction of the Antichrist; any other view is utterly untenable; for it is impossible to uphold such a previous erection of the Messianic Kingdom, seeing that Antichrist, not only oppresses the Church and the Jewish nation, but is actually represented as triumphant over both Church and nation, holding Jerusalem, Palestine, etc., in his power at the time of the Advent.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Thus e.g. the word “wicked” in Isa. 11 : 4 was by many regarded as an equivalent to “the impious Roman.” So the Chaldee, Beng. Gnomon, V. p. 364. The name given to Antichrist by the Jews was “Armillus” (Clarke’s Com. on Isa. 11 : 4, Smith’s Bib. Dic., art. “Antichrist,” which refers to Buxtorf, Eisenmenger, and gives an abstract of view entertained), and some Rabbinical works had him “born of a marble statue in one of the churches at Rome,” professing himself to be “the Messiah.” He was generally regarded as a Roman, identified with the Roman power. Renan, Life of St. Paul, p. 165, when speaking of the Antichrist, mentions it as an ancient opinion, and refers as its basis to Dan. 7 : 25 ; 9 : 27 ; 11 : 36, Targ. of Jerusalem, Numb. 11 : 26 ; Deut. 34 : 2, Targ. of Jonathan, Isa. 11 : 4, etc. A brief statement of the Mohammedan traditions and belief is given by Smith’s Dic., Sale’s Koran (Prel. Dis.), in which the Antichrist is made to be the Jewish Messiah Ben-David, who will finally be slain by Jesus. The Sibylline oracles and Apocryphal books also refer to the Antichrist attacking the people of God, after which comes deliverance (Comp. e.g. the various extracts given by Prof. Stuart in The Apoc., vol. 1, p. 91, etc. Comp. Tregelles on Dan. and coms. generally.)

will bring the pride of the most haughty and arrogant that ever lived to the dust. But it is not man that does this work ; it is not the Church that overcomes this proud and victorious enemy ; it is the Second Advent, with the divine agencies resulting from it, that effectually crushes the Antichrist.

Obs. 3. It will be interesting to give a brief statement of the opinions entertained respecting Antichrist, because it serves, not only to illustrate the interest taken in the subject, the influence of mere prejudice, the crudeness of interpretation and comparison, but also that Divine revelation has purposely enshrouded the matter so as not to interfere with the free agency of man in development, so as to cause a diligent comparison and study of the Word, and to excite a state of watchfulness in view of the constant presence of Antichristian elements. A sufficiency is given for warning and for recognition when the time arrives ; a minute tracing of the Antichrist, giving the details concerning him, would in many respects have been unwise both as to the proper attitude of believers and of unbelievers ; an omission of mention, on the other hand, with a general description including the outlines, would have been in opposition to the uniform merciful kindness of God, who will not leave any without suitable admonition and caution. Like all subjects which are given by the Spirit in a fragmentary form, here something and there something, it can only be properly comprehended by observing all the passages relating to it ; by confining ourselves (being prophetic, and hence beyond man's power to portray) closely to the Scriptures ; and by drawing conclusions supported by the general analogy of the entire Scriptures. The great variety of opinions, to which we shall now refer, does not weaken the scriptural representation of the subject—that remains unchangeably the same, although a multitude more were added—it only indicates the weakness of man in often violating the first principles of interpretation, or in giving place to mere passion designing to make others odious, or in substituting mere human deductions for the prophetic announcements. The history of this doctrine and the use made of it in the past may lead us to renewed caution in its application to the future.

1. The quite early Fathers express themselves in general terms very different from that exaggerated, fabulous addition appended afterward. Thus, e.g. Justin Martyr (Dial. Trypho., etc.) clearly teaches, as Bh. Kay (Kay's Justin, p. 103) remarks, "the appearance of the man of sin as immediately connected with the Second Coming of Christ in glory, and His appearance as the prelude of severe persecutions against Christians." Irenæus (Ag. Heresies, B. 5) does the same, declaring his overthrow by Christ's Advent, and then "the restoring to Abraham the promise of the inheritance," etc. In tracing the Antichrist, the early Fathers in some way identified him with the Roman Empire, which (as by Irenæus, etc.) was made the fourth beast of Daniel, and that his ascendancy and downfall would be "in the six thousandth year." Barnabas before these speaks of the time, viz., at the close of the six thousand years, "when His Son shall come and abolish the Wicked One." Polycarp refers to the Antichrist in John's language ; Hermas speaks of it as a subject well understood, in that he predicts and warns the Church to "endure the great trial at hand," which Coming tribulation was universally attributed to the Antichrist. Tertullian (Res. and Apol.) also locates the Antichrist before the open revelation of Christ, and specifically identifies the appearance of him with the division of the Roman Empire into ten Kingdoms. This notion of an existing Antichrist at the personal Coming of Jesus, was not only common to Chiliasts, but to their opposers of the Origenistic school, and even to those who, in antagonism to Paul, developed extreme Jewish notions respecting the law. An example of the last can be seen in the author of the Epistle of Peter to James prefixed to the Clementines (comp. Neander, Ch. His., vol. 1 p. 361).<sup>1</sup> All parties, too, were agreed in referring Antichrist's appearance to the closing of the sixth Milliad, so e.g. Origen, Clemens, Alexandrinus, Lactantius, Cyprian, etc. One feature deserves attention; one reason why so much interest was taken in the subject by the early Fathers was the supposed imminency of His appearing arising from the adoption of the Sep. chronology.<sup>2</sup> The resistance already manifested to the truth, the persecution of believers, etc., led them all, in the language of Ignatius, to say: "The last times are come upon us;" or, in that of Clement of Rome, "Ye see how in a little while the fruit of the trees come to maturity. Of a truth, yet a little while, and His will shall be accomplished suddenly, the Holy Scripture itself bearing witness that He shall come quickly and not tarry," etc. Persecution was invariably associated with the time preceding the Advent, and its presence and experience, more or less during the first centuries, always induced a belief either in the speedy Coming of the Antichrist, or else, if the persecution was very severe, of His being already here in the persecuting power. Hippolytus wrote a tract concerning the Antichrist, and in portions of an exposition of Daniel, preserved in Syriac in the British Museum (see Trans. in Journal of Sac. Lit. N. S., vol. 8, p. 348-354), he makes the Antichrist to be destroyed by the personal Coming of Jesus followed by the establishment of "the Kingdom of heaven." Victorinus wrote in the same style; also Sulpitius Severus, Cyril, Nepos, Coracion, Melito, Commodian, Methodius, Apollinarius, in brief, all the Fathers so far as their writings have come to us or their sentiments are expressed by others. All located the Antichrist and his destruction according to the plain prophecies.<sup>3</sup>

2. The writers down to the Reformation continue to locate the Antichrist in the future and preceding the Advent. Thus, e.g. Jerome (Bh. Newton's Diss., p. 412, Bickersteth's Guide, p. 112), and in view of the supposed nearness of the close of the sixth Milliad, the Antichrist's approach was also conjectured to be nigh. So also Augustine, Chrysostom, and others identified the coming of the Antichrist with the breaking up of the Roman Empire, and insisted that without his preceding, Christ would not come, laying special stress on 2 Thess. 2. The views thus held by recognized leaders in the Church were incorporated in the writings of a long line of successors. Even the rise and progress of the Papacy, the triumph of the Church in its temporal emoluments, etc., which now produced a change of doctrinal position, and led men to predict increased prosperity, could not eradicate belief in a coming Antichrist. One of the most noted instances is that of Gregory the Great who (Bower's His. Popes, vol. 1, p. 409), resisting the effort of the Patriarch of Constantinople to obtain the title of "The Universal Bishop," declares: "But this is the time which Christ Himself foretold; the earth is now laid waste and destroyed with the plague and the sword; all things that have been predicted are now accomplished; the king of pride (that is), Antichrist, is at hand, and, what I dread to say, an army of priests is ready to receive him; for they who were chosen to point out to others the way of humility and meekness, are themselves now become the slaves of pride and ambition."<sup>4</sup> It so happened that when this title, denominated antichristian by Gregory, was adopted by the Papacy, and that the ambition, vices, etc., of the Popes were exhibited, men here and there arose who either called the popes Antichrist or forerunners of him. Indeed, as time developed still more and more the characteristics of the Papacy, this application to the Popes of the name became so notorious that, as Bh. Newton remarks, the Pope in the Lateran Council (Lat. Conc. sub. Julio et Leone Sess. 11., specified in Jewell's Defence) "gave strait commandment to all preachers, that no man should presume once to speak of the coming of Antichrist."<sup>5</sup> When Mahomet arose in the East, and his religion extended far and wide, the name of Antichrist was applied to him or to Mohammedanism, and this in proportion to the widening conquests. In addition to this, as will appear in a following observation, parties hostile to each other accused one another of being forerunners of the Antichrist. The feeling increased in intensity as the periods approached (assigned by the opponents of Chiliasm) of the end of the world, as in the tenth, fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

3. The reformers continued to advocate either the presence of the Antichrist (as in the Papacy and Mohammedanism, or in both) or the coming of the same, of which forerunners already existed. Thus e.g. Brooks (Elem. Proph. Interp., p. 266) instances Luther, Melancthon, Zwingle, Calvin, Knox, Latimer, and Hooper; Bickersteth (Pract. Guide, p. 119) gives additional Cranmer, Ridley, Bradford, Jewell, Frith, Tyndale, Fulke among the English, and Æcolampadius, Martyr, and Musculus among the foreign, reformers. This list might be greatly swelled from the co-laborers and contemporaries; for, as Brooks justly observes, "it is notorious that in the times of the Reformation the opinion that the Pope was Antichrist became general and decided among Protestants." The student well knows that this very belief materially aided in advancing the Reformation.<sup>6</sup> Indeed, so generally did this opinion advance that we find it finally even inserted as an article of faith in the Confession of the French Reformed Church at the Synod of Gass in 1603,<sup>7</sup> and in the Smalcald Articles (Rechenberg's Ed. 2, 4, p. 314, and Ap. p. 347.)

4. Since the Reformation, down to the present, men have variously advocated the doctrine of the Antichrist, chiefly applying it to the Papacy, or to Mohammedanism, or to both combined, or to some existing system or party, or to a power or person still future. Those who make an application to the Papacy are numerous, as e.g. Bickersteth gives Gualter, Frith, Danaeus, Fox, More, Whitaker, Downname, Abbott, Beard, Maresius, Keach, Halifax, Hurd, Mede, Warburton, Bh. Newton, Cressener, Cunningham, Bonar, Elliott, Fleming, Gregory, Gault, Jones, Keith—a list which could be swelled by many hundreds of Protestant writers, such as Ramsey, Hoe, Broughton, Bengel, Daubuz, Lowman, including various commentators, as Vitringa, Clarke, etc., down to recent ones, as Barnes, etc. Some of these, as e.g. Doddridge, Fox (Book of Martyrs, p. 675, etc.), Bickersteth (El. Proph. Interp., p. 164), Homes (Res. Revealed, p. 148, etc.), held to several Antichrists existing in Popery and Mohammedanism—thus reviving the view of Sulpitius Severus (2 Dial. de Vita Mart., ch. 14) who in the fifth century spoke of two Antichrists who should arise, one in the East and the other in the West. To these last many others can be added, as Keith, Habershon, Brooks, Rabett, Owen,

Wigand, Smith, King, Whitaker, Frere, who, like Scott (Com.), pronounce these two "twin sisters," or who, like Prideaux (Faber, On Proph., vol. 1, p. 256), seeing two such powers arise about the same time, said: "That Antichrist had at that time set both his feet on Christendom together, the one, in the East, the other in the West." Others, as e.g. Graserus (His. of Antichrist), Whitby (Schema of Prophecy), etc., confine the Antichrist to Mahomet or the Turks. While others reject the application to the Papacy, deeming it either as fulfilled in some other power, as Pagan or Imperial Rome, or Mohammedanism, or Infidelity, or in one still future to arise, as e.g. Zanchius, Grotius (comp. Maresius's, Marcus's and Limborch's answers to -sane), Hammond, Bossuet, Sheldon, Thorndyke, Maitland, Burgh, Horsley, Fraser, etc. A class of these, among which Faber is a noted example, while discarding the title as applicable to the Pope or the Romish Church (holding that "the Antichrist" is still future), yet interpret passages, usually attributed to the Antichrist, as e.g. the little horn of Daniel 7, declinative of the Papacy. Davies, in "Two Antichrists," definitely makes two, viz., Infidelity and Romanism. Some have a number of Antichrists, as e.g. Riland in the very title of his work, "Antichrist: Papal, Protestant, and Infidel," or Rutherford, in his "Spiritual Antichrist: Opening the Secrets of Familism, Antinomianism, etc." Others again evince a low spirit in making out an opposing system of religious belief to be such, as e.g. Bh. Williams in his "Antichrist Revealed," maintaining him to be the Presbyterians; or Tazewell, "On the Antichrist," making him to be the Quakers; or Bramhall's (Smith's Dic., Art. Antichrist) suggestions respecting the General Assembly of the kirk of Scotland. Comparatively few have condescended to such perverted interpretation, and these, too, have exerted no influence upon others. Govet and others, both Protestant and Romish, have placed the Antichrist in the future, and this opinion has been latterly gaining ground among prophetic interpreters. Döllinger, while making (Lange, 2 Thess.) a kind of typical Antichrist of Nero, also places him, with other Roman Catholic writers, in the future. Calvin (Lange, 2 Thess., p. 134) included Mahomet and Sectarianism; Kern, Bauer, and Hilgenfeld returned to the Neroic theory; Schneckenburger has a mere personification of evil; and Jowett has it fulfilled in the Jewish heretics; and Nevin makes it to consist in "the spirit of sect and schism."

5. It may be interesting, as a matter of history, to notice to whom, in addition to those mentioned, the name has been applied. Calmet states (Dic., Art. Antichrist) that Nebuchadnezzar, Cambyses, Herod, Judas Iscariot, Simon Magus were regarded as types, and that most of the Roman Emperors, under whom persecution arose, were either considered Antichrists or forerunners of him, or types of him, such as e.g. Claudius, Nero, Domitian, Marcus Aurelius, Severus, Decius, Gallus, Diocletian, and Julian. Antiochus Epiphanes was supposed by some to be the Antichrist (an opinion revived by Erasmus, etc.), but Jerome, Theodoret, Cyprian, and others only made him a type. It is remarkable that Grotius, in his efforts to neutralize the Protestant interpretation relating to the Papacy, made Caligula and then Simon Magus the Antichrist; Dr. Hammond applied the same to Simon Magus and the Gnostics; Le Clerc, to the rebellious Jews under the leader Simon, the son of Gioras; Whitby, to the Jews who rejected Christ; Schötgen, to the Pharisees and Rabbies; Krause, to the Zealots; Harduin, to the High Priest Ananias. Faber (On Proph., p. 87) informs us that the character was attributed to Cerinthus and the Manicheans, and also to the impostor Barchochebas. Balaam was not overlooked. Wetstein gives the title to Titus; Herder, to Simon Gorionides; Gensler, to Julian the Apostate; Bossuet, to Diocletian; Feuardentius, etc., to Luther;<sup>9</sup> Rupertus, to Genseric; Talitskoi, to Peter the Great; the Starovers (or Old Believers, Harper's Mag., p. 421, 1872), to Nikon, the Reformer; Davis, to Czar Nicolas; Nelson, to Oliver Cromwell; Christadelphians, to Russia; Faber, to the French Emperorship; Baxter, to Louis Napoleon III. (the same being formerly bestowed upon his uncle, Napoleon I., because in Hebrew Corsica numbered 666, etc.); some, to Louis XIV.; the priests of Spain and Italy, to Gustavus Adolphus; others, to the infidelity connected with the French Revolution or to infidelity in general; Hilary, to a semi-infidel power; Pelt, to a mere tendency, and F. D. Maurice, to Vitellius.<sup>10</sup>

6. But it must be noticed that the application of the name by many in these ways—being designed simply to designate that which was regarded antagonistic to Christ or at variance with His doctrine—did not supersede the notion that the Antichrist, by way of pre-eminence, in its culminated form was still future.<sup>11</sup> The generality of writers thought that he was revealed (as e.g. in the Papacy, Mohammedanism, Infidelity, etc.), but would finally culminate in one great personal head in whom all the marks, inchoately fulfilled, would be found. Some of the writers favoring such a view are Bickersteth (Pract. Guide), Brooks (El. of Proph. Interp.), etc. Others thought that the term Antichrist could not be legitimately given to any but to the one who was still regarded as future, as e.g. Faber (On Proph., p. 87, etc.) Lange, (Com., 2 Thesa. 2; Doct. 2), etc. These both agreed that the distinctive great Antichrist was yet to be revealed. The former, while insisting upon a present fulfilment, looked for a more comprehensive and striking one; the latter, while considering the Papacy, etc., unchristian, and applying Scriptures usually interpreted as belonging to the Antichrist, also awaited a future revelation which should properly be thus designated.<sup>12</sup> Neither party went to the length, as a few have done, to make these conflicting and hostile elements, however presented, a necessity in the history of nations, but both, whatever truth they may have possessed, and whatever services they may have rendered, spoke of them as opposed to the true doctrine and interests of the Church, and originating in the freedom and depravity of man. Amid the diversity, there is a general agreement (aside from rationalistic interpretations) respecting the meaning of the word Antichrist, the time of his appearing, viz., preceding, and at the open manifestation of Jesus Christ and His saints—the formation of a confederation by him—and a terrible persecution to the Church, etc. It is a subject properly belonging to eschatology, and forms an important link in the history of “the last things,” which cannot possibly be omitted<sup>13</sup> without serious injury to a proper understanding of the historical connection. Within the last twenty years many writers (those of ability), after a careful examination of the Scriptures, have come to the conclusion that, whatever inchoate fulfilment has been exhibited in the past or the present, the Antichrist, who is to exist at the Coming of the Lord Jesus with His saints, has not yet arisen as predicted. Among the more recent writers who, relying upon a comparison of scriptural announcements, hold to this opinion, are the following: Lange (Com., 2 Thesa. 2.), who announces (Doc. 4, p. 136) “a resumption of the Patristic interpretation” and a "leaving open the prospect of a still impending realization of the prophetic picture" (and instances Bengel, Roos, Olshausen, Hofman after deducting his Antiochus redivivus, Luthardt, Baumgarten, Von Gerlach, Heubner, Döllinger in a second future fulfilment, Thiersh, Von Oettingen, Alford, Ellicott, Lillie). M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop. of Bib. Lit., Art. "Antichrist," fully indorses this view, and specifies various writers of eminence who hold to it, as Ben Ezra, Burgh, S. Maitland, Newman, C. Maitland, and others. Hundreds of recent writers in Europe and America could be added.

<sup>2</sup> Thus, in view of the excess of the Sep. over the Hebrew, we have (Shimeall's Reply to Shedd) "of the chronological calculus of the writers of the early Church, as founded on the Septuagint version, Clement of Alexandria terminated the 6000 years about A.D. 374; Cyprian earlier, in A.D. 243; Eustathius, Lactantius, Hilarion, Jerome, etc., in A.D. 500; Sulpitius Severus, in A.D. 581; and Augustine, in A.D. 650." This gives us the key to much that was written in expectancy.

<sup>3</sup> About this time also arose what may be called the Nero-myth theory: viz., it was suggested by Victorinus and others that Nero was the Antichrist, some even believing that he would return and fulfil the Scriptures. It would be scarcely necessary to notice such a view, if it had not been revived in modern times by Reuss, Bleek, Kern, Bauer, etc., and incorporated by Prof. Stuart in his Com. on Apoc. Millenarians may be charged with credulity, but nothing in the annals of Apocalyptic interpretation can exceed this rationalizing effort in absurdity. More than this, it detracts from the inspiration of the book, makes the writer incorporate an idle superstition, and invalidates its truthfulness. The theory is misleading and utterly untenable, because the events predicted to occur under the Antichrist (as e.g. confederation of nations, war with Christ, overthrow, etc.), and which were to follow his destruction, never took place. The derivation of the name from the Hebrew, upon which so much stress is laid, is unsatisfactory, seeing that, for consistency's sake, it ought to be in the same language in which the account is given. The theory, too, is hard pressed to make out its three and a half years, being largely dependent upon conjecture in thus making the angel give John an indorsement of a fable. This interpretation cannot be sustained by criticism, much less by faith in Divine inspiration, in a comparison of Scripture, as e.g. Daniel and Apoc. The only real point of coincidence is in the persecuting and lawless spirit manifested, which gives propriety to Neander's remark (Ch. Hls., vol. 1, p. 94): "There was something intrinsically significant in the fact that the individual by whom the renunciation of everything on the side of the divine and moral was most completely carried out, that the impersonation of a creaturely will revolting against all higher order, must give the first impulse to the persecution of Christianity." We may well imagine the Antichrist to exhibit Neroic traits.

<sup>4</sup> As the language, etc., of Gregory is highly interesting in view of the fact that a successor of his not long after assumed the very title which was regarded as Antichristian, we append the following. Writing directly to John the Patriarch, Gregory loads the title of "Universal Patriarch or Bishop" with all the reproach that suggested itself, calling it "vain, ambitious, profane, impious, execrable, anti-Christian, blasphemous, infernal, diabolical," reaching the climax by applying to him Isaiah's description of Lucifer: "Whom you do imitate in assuming that arrogant title? Whom but him, who, swelled with pride, exalted himself above so many legions of angels, his equals, that he might be subject to none, and all might be subject to him?" (Bower's Hls. Popes.) Again, Bh. Newton (Diss., p. 413) quotes from Gregory these remarks: "I speak it confidently that whosoever calleth himself universal bishop, or desireth so to be called, in the pride of his heart, he doth forerun Antichrist." "By this pride of his" (i.e. John's) "what thing else is signified but that the time of Antichrist is now at hand."

<sup>5</sup> The student will require some references. Bh. Jewell, in his Defence of the Apology, refers to St. Bernard making out Petrus Luna an Antichrist "gotten into Peter's chair." He also quotes Arnulphus as saying: "The very Pope himself, notwithstanding any, his canonical election, if he want charity, is Antichrist sitting in the temple of God;" and in the council of Rheims (10th cent.) Arnulphus declared: "What think you, reverend Fathers, of this man" (i.e. the Pope) "sitting on high in his throne, glittering in purple and cloth of gold? What think you him to be? Verily, if he be void of charity, and be blown up, and advanced only with knowledge, then he is Antichrist sitting in the temple of God and showing out himself as if he were God." "The bishops in the Council of Rheimsberg say thus: 'Pope Hildebrand, under a color of holiness, hath laid the foundation for Antichrist.' Dante, by express words, called Rome 'the Whore of Babylon.' Petrarch likewise saith: 'Rome is the Whore of Babylon, the Mother of Idolatry and Fornication, the Sanctuary of Heresy, and the School of Error,' " Joachimus Abbas said: 'Antichrist is already born in Rome, and shall advance himself higher in the Apostolic See.'" (Bickersteth, Pract. Guide, p. 173, gives also the above with others.) Bh. Newton (Diss., p. 414, etc.) calls attention to the extent to which this was carried, by showing that "the King of France, with the advice of his council, interdicted that any should call the Pope Antichrist;" that Grotius (afterward Montagu, Fell, etc.) composed his treatise concerning Antichrist as a kind of apology or defence of the Pope who was thus denominated; and that "James the First had written a treatise to prove the Pope Antichrist." So Queen Elizabeth also (Smith's Dic., art. Antichrist). Bower (His. Popes, vol. 1, p. 224) says: "Bellarmine employs a whole book to prove that the Pope is not the Antichrist" (thus showing how extended the opinion was to make such a work necessary), and then adds in a foot-note: "Our king, James I., used jocularly to say, that he would not swear that the Pope was the Antichrist: but if there were a hue and cry after the Antichrist, the Pope would certainly be taken up." Bower also informs us (vol. 2, p. 405) that "Eberhard, Archbishop of Salzburg, in a speech which he made at the Diet at Ratisbon, in the time of Frederick II., calls 'Hildebrand the founder of the Empire of Antichrist, and the first that, under color of religion, began the wicked war, which has been not less wickedly carried on by his successors.'" The fact is that, as evinced by some of these examples, Imperialism, in its contest with the Papacy, resorted to the use of such terms of reproach. Brooks's (Elem. Proph. Interp., p. 265) instances among others taken from Clarke's Proph. Records, Gouthier, Bh. of Cologne, Tergand, Archb. of Treves, the Clergy of Liege (according to Aventin, lib. 4), Frederick I., Frederick II., Darsilius of Padua as having designated the Bishop of Rome as the Antichrist. Gensbrand and Baronius are pointed out as designating the tenth century as containing popes "more like apostates than apostles." Vitringa (Apoc., p. 74) says that in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries many pious persons held that the Pope was Antichrist and Rome Babylon. Girdlestone (Analyt. Comment. on Rev.) declares "that some spiritual men of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the most eminent of whom were Peter John Olive and Hubert de Casali, denounced the gross body of the Church of Rome as the Babylon of the Apocalypse." This reminds one of the threat stamped on certain coins (Mosheim's Church His., p. 9, vol. 3, text and note) by Louis XII., that he would overthrow the Romish power designated by the name Babylon. It is well known that the Waldenses gave this title to the Pope and Romish Church. Thus e.g. in a treatise concerning the Antichrist, etc., dated A.D. 1120, supposed to be written by Peter de Bruys (see long extract Ency. Rel. Knowl., art. Antichrist), it is asserted that "Antichrist is not any particular person," but "a system of falsehood, adorning itself with a show of beauty and piety," etc. "The system of iniquity" with its ministers and supporters—"this is the congregation which, taken together, comprises what is called Antichrist, or Babylon," etc., and is applied to the Romish Church at length. In this interesting treatise the Antichrist is made both an Imitator and Oppressor, as e.g. "He is termed Antichrist, because, being disguised under the names of Christ and His Church and faithful members, he opposes the salvation which Christ wrought out," etc. The Encyclop. Reliq. Knowledge, in the art. Antichrist, remarks, after alluding to Gregory and Arnulphus: "In the eleventh century all the characteristics of Antichrist seemed to be so united in the person of Pope Hildebrand, who took the name of Gregory VII., that Johannes Aventinus, a Romish historian, speaks of it as a subject in which the generality of fair, candid, and ingenuous writers agreed, that at that time was the reign of Antichrist." The Paulikians, Cathari, Sect of the Holy Ghost, Apostolic Brethren, Fraticelli, Flagellants, Wycliffites, Hussites, early Moravian Brethren are specified by writers as expressing the opinion that either the Pope or the Romish Church is the Antichrist. In Dr. Döllinger's Essay on the Proph. Spirit and the Prophecies of the Christian era are found a number of references. He instances such men as Wm. St. Amour, Ryckel, and Jacobus de Paradiso (p. 332, Dodd & Mead's edition, edited by Prof. Smith), who had no hope in the reformation of the Church, but looked for the appearance of the Antichrist. In the Cosmopolitical Prophecies (sec. vi.) he gives a view of the expectations excited from the Carlovingian times down to the sixteenth century, the first part, especially "in the ninth and tenth centuries and until the middle of the eleventh, the coming of Antichrist and the approaching end of the world are the well-nigh exclusive objects of men's presentiments;" and this was continued, more or less, down into the 14th and 15th centuries (p. 331) in the class of men stated above—St. Amour, etc. Döllinger includes the periods of the time of the Black Death, the Papal Schism, etc., when prophecies pertaining to "judgments impending over Rome, Popes, and Clergy" gradually increased in intensity (against predictions relating to renovation, reformation, renewed prosperity, etc.), until, he remarks, "so that at last, this prophetic expectation became the consciousness, the saving anchor of faith, of all earnest religious spirits." These judgments were believed, even by those who looked for reformation, to come, owing to the antichristian conduct of popes and clergy. The more moderate, as Jordanus of Osnabrück (p. 356), writes: "Since the Roman Empire has shared in the great honor of constituting the bulwark of the Christian world against the Antichrist, who could not appear until that Empire was overthrown, all these forerunners, who assist in this overthrow, are but preparing the way for the Antichrist; and the popes, chief enemies of the Empire, are doing this most of all," etc. The same view was expressed by others, especially by a party of the Joachimites (the Minorites or Spirituals, p. 379), who, we are told, were inclined "to unsparing and severe condemnation of the popes and their avaricious and luxurious courts." Of the latter, Arnold of Villanova (p. 39) was, probably, one of the boldest, for "it seemed to him that the whole Western Church was already completely ruined, beyond redemption, by the excess of its sins; and so he thought that everything must rush quickly to perdition; and therefore (about 1297) he put the coming of the last great Antichrist in the year 1316 and the end of the world in 1335." Dr. Döllinger, in his Sec. on "The Joachimites," distinctly announces (p. 367) "that Joachim had discovered more than one Antichrist in the history of the Church and in the prophetic intimations of the Bible;" and "that, in consequence of the deep corruption of the Church and the poisonous influence of the Roman Curia, he naturally came to the idea that all these evils met at Rome, concentrated in a single person and a single pope." He tells us (p. 380) how Wm. St. Amour, writing against Joachim's predicting after a terrible scourging, etc., a still brilliant future (Joachim's period of the Holy Ghost) for the Church, "discovered that all the signs of a coming Antichrist were already present," and that, instead of a better future, "the Church has now to look for nothing else but the advent of the great adversary;" and finally how, through the persecution of the Spirituals (p. 386), "sprung up the fearful thought that the Papal Chair might have been for a time the seat of the Antichrist, or yet should be." Jacopone of Todi pronounced Boniface VIII. the "new Lucifer;" so (p. 387) "the view of the Joachimites, that the chair of St. Peter should be for a considerable period the spoil of an adversary of Christ, who was to bear all the marks foretold of the Antichrist, came to appear more probable in the eyes of many persons," instancing the great Italian Dante (Parad., 27, 22-24), the classical Petrarch (p. 395—referring to the sonnet beginning with "Covetous Babylon of wrath divine," etc.—Sonnet C., V. I., Macgregor's Transl. of Petrarch). Comp. Smith's Bib. Dic., art. Antichrist, where, in addition Almaric, Telesphorus, Ubertinus, John of Paris, Grostete, and Eberhard are mentioned as attaching the name Antichrist to the Pope; Buckle's Mis., vol. 2, p. 257, etc.; Hurd's Twelve Sermons; Bengel's Gnomon; Calmet, Herzog, etc.

Luther's views are so well known, being expressed in the various popular Lives, D'Aubigne's His. of the Ref., etc., that they need not be repeated. Melancthon, more conciliatory, was inclined to make the Turk the Antichrist. The opinions of the others are also expressed in numerous works, and are very decided in their utterance. Thus, e.g. Cranmer, when about to be committed to the flames (Brooks, El. Prop. Interp., p. 266), said: "As for the Pope, I refuse him as Christ's enemy and Antichrist, with all his false doctrine;" and Ridley, just before his martyrdom, declared: "The See of Rome is the seat of Satan, and the Bishop of the same, that maintaineth the abominations thereof, is Antichrist himself indeed. And for the same cause this See at this day is the same which St. John called in his Revelation Babylon," etc. Others might be mentioned, as e.g. Bucer, who, in the disputation at Berne, Jan. 7th, 1528 (D'Aubigne's His. Ref., vol. 4, p. 290), said: "When Antichrist gained the upper hand throughout the world—in the East by Mahomet, in the West by the Pope—he was able to keep the people in the unity of error." Alfierio (1542), in his address to Luther, in the name of the churches of Venice, Vicenza and Triesto (Michelet's Life of Luther, Ap., p. 405), calls the Pope "Antichrist." John Huss, in De Anatomia Antichristi, preceded these in calling the Pope Antichristian. So also Beza, Bullinger, Calixtus, Hutchinson, Sandys, Philpot, Rogers, and others, have been instanced. Bickersteth, Guide, p. 165, says: "The Reformer, Bernard Gilpin, thus argued, assuming Babylon and Antichrist to be the same: 'If the Pope be Antichrist, I see not only probable, but even necessary, causes to depart from the Popish Church. But if the Pope be not Antichrist, I see no sufficient ground for such a departure. It is not lawful to make a separation from the Church. But we are not only enjoined to come out of the Church of the Antichrist, but we see the fearful anger of the living God and hear His dreadful threats thundered out against those who shall remain in Babylon, that synagogue of Antichrist, Rev. 17 and 18.' The personal references of Luther and others are frequently severe, as illustrated by (Mosheim, Ch. His., vol. 2, p. 381, note 34) Wickliffe calling the Pope "Antichrist, the proud worldly priest of Rome, and the most cursed of clippers and purse-cutters." This was keenly felt by the Pope and his adherents, as shown e.g. (Mosheim, vol. 3, p. 296, note) when Christopher Rojas proposed the return of the Protestants, one of the terms annexed was "the acquittal of the Protestants from the charge of heresy, provided they would cease to call the Pope Antichrist." One fact alone evidences the interest in this direction; the first book mentioned by Panzer, in his Cat. of the Older German Lit., is The Book of Antichrist, or "Little Book Concerning Antichrist's Life and Rule through God's Providence, how he doth pervert the world with his false Doctrine and Counsel of the Devil," reprinted at Erfurt, 1516 (Cyclop. Bib. Lit.).

<sup>7</sup> In view of the fact that the Pope, Clement VIII., keenly felt the act of the Synod, that the King of France, Henry IV., resented it as implying that he was "an imp of Antichrist," that the French Government being offended caused the printing of it to be suppressed, we give the article taken from Bickersteth's Guide (foot-note, p. 174, and quoted from Quick's Synodicon, vol. 1, p. 226) as follows: "Whereas the Bishop of Rome has erected for himself a temporal monarchy in the Christian world, and usurping a sovereign authority and lordship over all churches and pastors, exalts himself to that degree of insolence, as to be called God, and will be adored, arrogating to himself all power in heaven and earth; and to dispose of all ecclesiastical matters, to define articles of faith, to authorize and expound at his pleasure the Sacred Scriptures, and to buy and sell the souls of men—to dispense with vows, oaths, and covenants, and to institute new ordinances of religious worship. And in the civil state he tramples under foot all lawful authority of magistrates, setting up and putting down kings, disposing of kings and of their kingdoms at his pleasure. We therefore believe and maintain that he is truly and properly the Antichrist, the Son of Perdition, predicted by the holy prophets—that great whore clothed with scarlet, sitting upon seven mountains in that great city which had dominion over the kings of the earth; and we hope and wait that the Lord, according to His promise, and as He hath already begun, will confound him by the spirit of His mouth and destroy him by the brightness of His coming." This Synod stated that "this was the common faith and confession of all our churches, and of this present synod, and one of the principal causes of our separation from the Church of Rome; and that this confession we find contained in and extracted out of the Holy Scriptures, and had been sealed with the blood of a world of martyrs," etc. Comp. the Bohemian and Belgian confessions (Bickersteth, p. 174).

<sup>8</sup> The spirit of animosity often suggested the title, as e.g. when Pope Gregory called Frederick the Sec. "the apocalyptic beast," and Frederick retorted by designating the Pope "the great dragon." Even Bh. Andrews, not so far removed from the Romish type, in his Response to Cardinal Bellarmine maintains, in opposition to Papal supremacy, in one of his theses, "that it may be probably gathered from the 2d ch. of the 2d Epis. to the Thess. that the Roman Pontiff is Antichrist." So Melchior Cano, a Spanish Ecclesiastic and Dominican, in his opposition to the Jesuits, taught that they were the forerunners and emissaries of the Antichrist, who was about to appear. A thousand similar instances could be quoted, where passion, or prejudice, or party spirit suggested and enforced the application, there being not the slightest attempt to investigate the subject calmly or dispassionately. Such perversions and simply denunciatory interpretations, probably, led Sir Thom. Browne (Relig. Med., S. 46) to profess that the prophecies pertaining to Antichrist, as explained in his day, were unsatisfactory, making too much of a present existing fulfilment, so that he concluded "that Antichrist is the philosopher's stone in divinity."

<sup>9</sup> Others thought that when Luther married Catherine von Bora "that Antichrist must be the fruit of such a union, for it was predicted by some that he would be the offspring of a monk and a nun." This caused Erasmus to utter that biting sarcasm: "If that prophecy be true, what thousands of Antichrists the world has before now seen."

<sup>10</sup> To these might be added, Ellis's Pseudo-Christus, against W. Franklin and Mary Gladburg; the title as given to several fanatics who claimed special Divine honors or position (as e.g. Munzer, Burchardt, etc.); Arnold's Antichrist of Priesthood; Black's application

(in Messias and Anti-Messias) to Satan; "the Priestcraft Antichrist," and "the Antichrist of Utilitarian Unbelief," and "the Spirit of Chivalry" (Stanley's Life of Arnold, vol. 2, p. 88, and vol. 1, p. 255); Claude Harms's "Pope of our Times, our Antichrist, in respect to faith is reason, in respect to action is conscience." The various expressed views result mainly (1) from a disregard to the distinctive marks of Antichrist; (2) from a mistaking and confounding Scripture which describes some other hostile power with that portion descriptive of the Antichrist; (3) from mere prejudice or bigotry attempting to make others odious; (4) from the efforts to avoid the application of the title to themselves (as e.g. the Papacy, nationalized establishment advocates, etc., seeking various theories as an offset); (5) from the entertained idea that as there are "many Antichrists," the name might, without detracting from the notion of a still future Antichrist, be applied to individuals, systems, etc., exhibiting more or less of an Antichristian spirit; (6) from the fact that such Antichrists are by many merely regarded as types or forerunners of an Antichrist still to arise in the future. This diversity—the resultant of human infirmity and common to all doctrine—should teach us the more caution in cleaving to Scripture, seeing that, as Mede long ago observed, "the wit of man is able, where it is persuaded, to find shifts and answers until the day of doom, as appears in so differing opinions held among Christians, with so much endless pertinacity on both sides."

<sup>12</sup> Comp. Bengel's Gnomon, vol. 5, p. 351, who gives a number of writers who insisted, that whatever Antichrist had arisen, one of pre-eminent wickedness was still future. He quotes Bernard, F. Lambert, the Divines of Heidelberg, 1561, and of Zurich, Jo. Brent, Crocius, Heding, Weisman, Horchius, Michaelis, and Vitringa.

<sup>13</sup> Yet it is a sad fact that many theological works, professing to give a systematic and detailed scriptural account of Eschatology, utterly ignore the whole subject, just as if the Bible did not give it any prominence. Such efforts in eschatology are seriously defective and misleading.

Obs. 4. In addition, the student will observe that the ancients and the moderns (more recent writers) coincide in making this Antichrist a personal one, and not merely a system of doctrine, etc. The force of the article attached (comp. e.g. Lange's Com., 2 Thess. 2 : 3-5) leads to the idea of "a single personality," over against the collective (Zwingle, etc.) notion which (as applied to the Papacy, etc.) has also its upholders. Brooks (El. of Proph. Interp., p. 257) asserts: "The Fathers were unanimous in their opinion that the Antichrist was to be a person; nor has the Greek Church, which in most respects has maintained the sentiments of the Fathers on this point, ever made a question of it." Many Roman Catholic writers also described him as a person, and this individuality or personality is found in the writings of men in the various churches, some limiting it to a single individual, others extending it to a succession of persons.<sup>1</sup> The more ancient view of confining it to a single person, the leader of anti-Christian forces, is revived and ably defended by recent writers, as the most consistent with the titles given to him, the acts to be performed by him, etc. Our leading commentators (Lange, Delitzsch, Alford, etc.) favor it, while prominent prophetic writers (as Tregelles, Bonar, Purdon, Dean Trench, Bell, Birks, Chester, etc.) fully indorse it, as numerous works indicate. Even such writers as Pressense (Early Years of Christianity, p. 438, foot-note), are inclined to the view that Antichrist will be "a personality." Van Oosterzee (Theol. of the N. T., sec. 42) makes him "the highest and more individual concentration," and (Ch. Dog., vol. 2, S. 145) declares: "Here it can only be said, that for him who interprets the Scripture without preconceived views and allows his thoughts to be brought into captivity to the obedience of the Word, there can be no doubt that a personal Antichrist will yet arise before the close of the world's history." He repudiates "an ideal personality" (advocated by Hengstenberg), admits that other Antichrists have appeared, but only as the forerunners of a "central personality" still future. (He makes the characteristics pride and deception, which work by false signs, Matt. 24 : 24 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 9, adding : "Truly it is entirely natural, but at the same time the terrible irony of a higher Nemesis, that disbelief in the true miracle should yet once more be punished with a superstitious belief in false signs.") The position and prevailing view is that of Cyprian, who pronounced all heretics—all that was opposed to Christ—"the precursors of that one and special Antichrist which is to come at the last end of the world" (quoted by Bickersteth, p. 165). Comparatively few entertain the idea of a Satanic incarnation, or a resurrected Judas (reviving in another form and person the old resurrected Nero—comp. Stuart, Apoc., vol. 2, p. 441—theory, Sulp. Severus saying : "At the close of the age, he is to be sent again that he may exercise the mystery of iniquity"); the large majority inclining to his being a mere man, wonderfully endowed, and in whom wickedness shall reach its consummation (some incorporating in a measure Theodoret's or Chrysostom's idea that he shall be under the special energy of the devil and exhibit therefore Satanic might). Smith's Bib. Dic., Art. Antichrist, 5, commenting on the titles given to Antichrist (2 Thess. 2), remarks : "If words have meaning, these words designate an individual," and Olshausen (Com., 2 Thess. 2) declares : "The individuality of Antichrist can manifestly be excluded from this passage only by forcing its meaning."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The Waldenses, more early (as in "The Noble Lesson," Smith's Bib. Dic., art. Antichrist), held also to a personal, individual Antichrist, which later was changed as we already quoted. Those limiting it to a single person were divided respecting the nature of him. The quite early Fathers, judging from their expressions, expected him to be a man in whom wickedness would culminate ; at least the additions afterward made are not found in their writings. Hippolytus made Antichrist (Baring Gould's Curious Myths) the devil, occupying a phantom body, or (Brooks, El. Proph. Interp.) the devil assuming "the appearance of flesh, but not be really so, and boast himself to be born of a virgin." Others, as Hilary, made him "true man and true devil," a diabolical parody of the Incarnation. John Damascene says he will be "a devilish man," i. e. a man inspired by the devil. Lactantius, Sulpitius, Bede, made him the son of the devil and his mother a harlot. Hilary's opinion that the devil would become incarnate, as the Word was in the Man Jesus, was continued by others on the ground that "the mystery of godliness" was exhibited in its highest form in the Incarnation and so also would "the mystery of iniquity." Jerome says (Bickersteth's Guide, p. 161), "Let us not suppose him, according to the opinion of some, either to be a devil or a demon, but one of the human race in whom all Satan shall dwell bodily," etc. (on 2 Thess. 2, and comp. Ambrose Com. on Apoc.). Brooks (p. 258, comp. Lange, 2 Thess. 2 : 1-12 ; Doc. 3 : 1) remarks : "Chrysostom, Theophylact, and Theodoret thought he would be a real man, but the agent of Satan. Most, however, of those who thought he would appear as man (whether he would be Satan incarnate or not) concluded likewise that he would appear as a Jew, or actually be "a Jew, of the tribe of Dan" (the tribe of Dan being omitted in Rev. 7, suggesting the Jewish origin). So extensively was this entertained that Bickersteth (p. 159) remarks : "the Early Fathers of the Church held generally, that there would be a personal Antichrist—born of a Jew to be developed shortly before the Sec. Coming of Christ, and to be destroyed in Judea." * During the Middle Ages many believed (Hagenbach's

* After writing the preceding, I found that Meyrick (Smith's Bib. Dic., art. Antich.), says : "The authors of the Sibylline Oracles A.D. 150, and of the Apost. Constitutions, Celsus (see Origen c. Celsus 6. 6), Ephrem Syrus A.D. 370, Theodoret A.D. 430, and a few other writers seem to have regarded the Antichrist as the devil himself rather than as his minister, or an emanation from him. But they may, perhaps, have meant no more than

His. of Doc., vol. 1, p. 120, Döllinger's Prophecies of the Middle Ages) "that Antichrist would either be brought forth of a virgin, or be the offspring of a bishop and a nun." Vincens Ferrer (Döllinger, p. 329) "was fully aware, when he wrote to Pope Boniface XIII., that the Antichrist was already nine years old; it had been contemporaneously revealed to many, demons had been forced by exorcism to declare it; a revival of an old opinion as e.g. Martin, Bh. of Tours, about A.D. 380 gave out that the Antichrist was then living, though still a boy. Such views led to those curious works noticed by Baring-Gould, Döllinger, etc., in which the birth, life, and death of the Antichrist is represented in rude woodcuts. The Minorite Peter de Boreth (Chron. of Alberich, Döllinger, p. 344), had the Antichrist already born and ten years old (1237), Bowers (His. Popes, vol. 2, p. 439), relates how Paschal II. came to Florence, whose bishop maintained that the Antichrist was already born and the end of the world at hand, and held a council respecting it, resulting in his enjoining the bishop's silence. In the Annals of Roger De Hoveden, vol. 2, p. 177, etc. (Bohn's Lib.), Joachim's (Abbot of Curazzo) views are given, and among other things it is asserted that the Antichrist which was to come, "He is already born in the city of Rome and will be elevated to the Apostolic See" etc. And, to indicate the views afloat, in the interview between Joachim and Richard the King of England, the latter in reply to the former said: "I thought that Antichrist was to be born in Antioch or at Babylon of the descendants of Dan, and was to reign in the temple of the Lord at Jerusalem," etc. Joachim virtually had a number of Antichrists, making "the seven kings" to be "Herod, Nero, Constantius, Mohamet, Melsurmet, Saladin, and the Antichrist." Döllinger (p. 377) observes: "With reference to the Antichrist, who is meantime to appear, there are contradictory statements in the writings of Joachim, which are, however, capable of reconciliation since he adopted the opinion that there are to be many Antichrists, partly in succession, partly contemporaneously, and that near the end of the world's history so much the more would they be multiplied." (Comp. art. Antich., Smith's Bib. Dic., 6:1.) Sir John Mandeville (Travels, ch. 10) says: "In Chorazin shall Antichrist be born, as some men say; and others say he shall be born in Babylon; for the prophet saith, out of Babylon shall come a serpent that shall devour all the world." "This Antichrist shall be nourished in Bethsaida, and he shall reign in Capernaum, Luke 10:13, 15," a revival of Adso's opinion repeated by Th. Aquinas, etc. Turner (His. of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. 2, p. 477, etc.), gives a summary of Aquinas's views respecting the Antichrist: "He is to be born of a most flagitious robber and harlot, with the aid of the devil, at Babylon. He will pervade Palestine; convert kings, princes, and people; and send his missionaries all over the world. He will work many miracles; bring fire from heaven; make trees vegetate in a moment; calm and agitate the sea at his will; transform various objects; change the course of rivers; command the winds; and apparently raise the dead. He will bitterly persecute Christianity. He will discover hidden treasures and lavish them among his followers; a dreadful period of tribulation will follow. He will not come until the Roman Empire has entirely ceased, and that cannot be while the kings of the French continue. One of the French kings is, at last, to obtain the whole Roman Empire and will be the greatest and last of all kings. He is to go to Jerusalem and lay down his crown and sceptre on Mt. Olivet. Then Antichrist is to appear, and Gog and Magog to emerge. Against them this French king of the Romans is to march; to conquer all nations, destroy all idols, and restore Christianity. The Jews are to be restored," etc. Malvenda (Rees' Cyclop. art. Antichrist), made, in his work, Antichrist born of a Jew of the tribe of Dan, basing his deductions upon Gen. 49; Jer. 8:16; Rev. 7. It is a little singular how some of those old notions are revived in recent writers. Thus e.g. Chapell (Proph. Times, Sep., 1873, p. 131), says: "if the mystery of godliness was God manifest in the flesh, perhaps, 'the mystery of iniquity' will be Satan manifest in the flesh." "It is a serious question whether the Incarnation will not have a Satanic parallel; whether Antichrist will not be a demon-man just as Christ was a God-man; whether he will not be miraculously begotten by Satan as Christ was by the Holy Ghost. So also Nathaniel, vol. 14, p. 6, Dec., 1870. (The student will see how this opens up the old story of angels mingling with the women in the Antediluvian world and producing giants, the old monkish legends of demon copulation, the claims of the heroes of antiquity to a supernatural origin, etc. Comp. Sir Th. Browne's Works.) Litch (A Complete Harmony to express the identity of his character and of his power with that of Satan." The same authority says, that a man energized by Satan, or having Satanic powers, was believed in by Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Hippolytus, Cyprian, Victorinus, Lactantius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Jerome, Chrysostom, Hilary of Poitiers, Augustine, and Ambrose.

of Dan. and the Apoc.) returns to the same, when he makes him a being from hell confederated with Satan, and introducing an infernal supernaturalism, etc. Reinke (Proph. Times, vol. 11, p. 92), also says: "The Antichrist will be a resurrection man, he will ascend out of the abyss; apparently Satan's masterpiece"—and he makes the false prophet confederated with him likewise a resurrected person, viz., Judas Iscariot because of John 17 : 12; Ps. 109, etc. So also Olshausen (Com. 2 Thess.) makes him a Satanic incarnation. And to this may be added Hofman's idea (Die Heil. Schrift N. Test., p. 330, vol. 1), that Antiochus Epiphanes is to be revived again, resurrected, and become this Antichrist; thus applying the Neronic resurrection theory to Antiochus. So Brown, the Evangelist, and others, revive this Neronic idea, viz., that Satan brings up some deceased one, like Antiochus, Nero, or Napoleon, and incarnates himself with him. Dr. Braune (Lange's Com., 1 John, p. 75), declares that the Antichrist, just as "the many antichrists," is a man, and opposes the Satanic theory as follows: "Hence Antichrist is not Satan himself (Pseudo-Hippolytos, Theodoret): the idea of Satan becoming man is inæzecutable, since the Eternal Word only, the Image of the Father, in which man has been created, can become man." The reason, apparently, for such a view of the Antichrist springs from the remarkable performances that are attributed to him in prophecy, which it is supposed that a mere man cannot possibly produce, and hence the supernatural even in birth or rise is attached to him, thus overlooking the prophecies which bring him in as one who regularly succeeds to this position in an allotted line of descent. If he be, as Cyril of Jerusalem pronounced him, "some great man raised up by the devil," or if evil culminates in him, yet this is done in reference to—not in opposition—his regular descent in the manner predicted.

A few considerations alone will indicate to the student the impossibility of receiving such notions of Satan being the Antichrist, or Satan's direct offspring, or a resurrected person in whom Satan is incarnate, or one (Lincoln's Lects. on Rev., p. 161), possessed by a lost spirit or demon, the chief one, most mighty, called Destroyer. 1. All prophecy, as already shown, indicates that he comes in regular succession out of the revived Roman Empire; like the other heads or powers he has an earthly origin, which is a fact taken for granted in logical connection. 2. The doom of Antichrist is one separate and distinct from Satan, as e.g. a comparison of Rev. 19 : 20 and Rev. 20 : 10 plainly shows. 3. This would be giving Satan a resurrecting power which alone is bestowed upon Jesus. 4. Such a caricature of Incarnation is utterly unnecessary, seeing that all the prophecies can be fulfilled in a person, specially under the influence of Satan. 5. Other reasons are given in the text and notes which confirm the personality and humanity of this Antichrist (to which the reader is referred), so that a constant reference is made to the "man" (as e.g. Ps. 52 : 1; Isa. 51 : 12; Ps. 118 : 6, etc.). 6. Other antichrists (many) are spoken of, and alluded to, as human, and analogy requires the same of this one.

† The student will be interested in a few expressions of opinion thus presented. Rigenbach (Lange's Com. 2 Thess. 2.), says: "The Man of Sin, again with the article, the one already known to them; plainly a personality." "The complete opposite to Christ is not a spiritual tendency, but a person. Nor is he called merely 'a martōiōs, but the Man of Sin, in contrast with Jesus, the Man of obedience." Dr. Fausset, the commentator (Christ. Herald, Ap. 10th, 1879), expresses his faith in "an individual Antichrist," and refers to John 5 : 43, where the contrast to the personal Christ in the words "another" and "him" "distinctly foretells an individual deceiver." (Comp. his Com. on 2 Thess. 2., and the Apoc., where the same views are given.) Irenæus, who conversed with the disciples of John, said: "By Antichrist we understand a single individual whom Satan shall use pre-eminently as his instrument, just in the same way as he did the serpent when tempting our first parents to rebel against God,"—calling him "an impious and unjust person." Alford in Proleg. to Thess., p. 50, says: "We still look for the Man of Sin, in the fulness of the prophetic sense, to appear, and that immediately before the Coming of the Lord. We look for him as the final and central embodiment of that anomia—lawlessness—that resistance to God and God's law, which has been for these many centuries fermenting under the crust of human society, and of which we have already witnessed so many partial and tentative eruptions. Whether he is to be expected personally, as one individual embodiment of evil, we would not dogmatically pronounce; still we would not forget that both ancient and historical interpretation points this way. Almost all great movements for good or for evil, have been gathered to a head by one central personal agency. Nor is there any reason to suppose that this will be otherwise in the coming ages." This conclusion reminds one of the language employed in Lange's Com. on 2 Thess. p. 137, where after specifying this personal Antichrist "as the Godless, self-deifying ruler of worldly empire," it is added: "In every worldly empire a tendency to apotheosis had been observable (Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander); of this current Paul notes the shameless consummation. Why should it be 'more conceivable' than in this last empire the personal climax should be omitted, which was wanting in none of its predecessors? In all history there exists a reciprocity of action between the actual movement of the time and the achievements of an energetic personality. For every historical individual there is a thousandfold work of preparation, and he makes his appearance not otherwise than as a child of his age. And again the drift of the time only reaches an irresistible supremacy, when one man conceives the spirit of the time at its height, with bold grasp brings to bear what is fermenting half obscurely in a thousand minds, and so stamps the age with his seal. He can do it, if he has the courage—after all, it will be the effrontery—to express and carry out what is in a thousand hearts." "A Member of the Boston Bar" in his Briefs on Prophetic Themes, justly argues that the same reasoning which makes out the personality (from prophecy) of the Christ also confirms the personality of the Antichrist, both being spoken of in the same way. Comp. a tabular statement given by Rev. Parsons in "The Present Age and Development of Antichrist" (Pre-Mill. Essays, published by Revell, p. 217), where it is shown that the language applicable to the personality of Jesus is likewise applied to the Antichrist. Indeed when John refers to "many antichrists" in his day, "even now," he evidently does not limit the notion to systems or dynasties, but includes individuals as such. When Jesus says: "I am come in My Father's name, and ye receive Me not; if another shall come in his own name, him will ye receive," we cannot divest ourselves of the idea of an individual thus coming, which is enforced by the express language relating to Antichrist, such as "Man of Sin," "son of perdition," "the wicked one," "the prince that shall come," etc. Hofman (Prophecy and Fulfilment) holds to a future personal Antichrist; so Gregory (Earth's Eventide) assumes the same, and that he shall aid in restoring the Jews, rebuilding the temple, prostituting the latter in the basest manner; so also Brookes (Maranatha, p. 435), says, he is "a person, appearing in the last days, as the exponent and head of the universal infidelity and blasphemy that shall prevail." Dr. Lange in art. "Antichrist" in Herzog's Ency., fully indorses the patristic idea of a future personal, individual Antichrist. Dr. Tregelles (On Daniel, p. 191), shows clearly that a worse power than even the Papacy causes the rise of the personal Antichrist, that Rationalistic Infidelity is paving the way for his appearance, etc., and quotes Krummacher (Evang. Christendom, Oct., 1851, p. 334), of Berlin, discussing the forms of opposition to belief current in Protestant Germany, and concluding thus: "Little more is necessary than that a mighty and talented personality should appear, who should set himself up as the centre of Infidelity, and represent it with energetic pathos and strong decision, and the reign of 'the Man of Sin' would be among us in more than a state of embryo." Dr. Braune (Lange's Com. 1 John 2:18) insists that as the Antichrists of v. 19 were persons so the Antichrist must also be a person, and emphasizes the word "man" in "the Man of Sin." Thus we might quote Seiss (Last Times), Burgh (Lects. Sec. Advent), Kelsall (Antichrist), Darby (Lects. on the Hopes of the Church), Denny (Comp. to the Chart of Seventy Weeks), Maitland (Apos. School of Proph. Interp.), as well as highly interesting statements enforcing the same by Baxter, Purdon, Strange, Kelly, Molyneux, Wilson, Porter, Phillips, Frere, Taunton, and many others.

Obs. 5. (1) Another feature in the discussion of the past, and fruitful of mistake (even in otherwise very able writers), is the indiscriminate application of all predictions relating to antichristian powers to this one Antichrist. Thus e.g. Protestant writers have quoted, Rev. 17, and interpreted the woman as representative of the Papacy. This favorite application, confirmed, too, by a historical record and association the most powerful, is also made out to be the Antichrist over against the most positive proof in the chapter itself, that (however much the Papacy may aid in the coming of the Antichrist and be with him in the initial career) this woman, delineative of the Romish Church, is likewise destined (v. 16) to be punished and overthrown by "the ten horns and the beast" (so Bengel, Stuart, etc., read, comp. Tischendorf's N. T.), i.e. by the confederation under the Antichrist as the context plainly shows. How, then, can the Papacy, here doomed to confiscation, fearful retribution, and utter destruction, be the Antichrist under whose leadership and inspiration this is performed? And yet this simple and indisputable distinction has been overlooked by many, thus burdening interpretation with palpable contradiction. (This also shows that the Papacy (as advocated by Faber, etc.) is not the false prophet, or the second beast, Rev. 13, associated with the last head of the first beast, because this prophet remains in flourishing existence down to the final catastrophe after the woman has met her fated end.)<sup>1</sup> The whore is not the Antichrist, since she comes to her doom when this Antichrist is at the height of his power, and to blend together what the Scriptures so plainly separates only introduces confusion. Any interpretation (as e.g. Bengel, Schmucker, etc.) which makes either the Beast out of the sea, or the Beast out of the earth (these existing down to the battle with Christ) to be the Papacy is most certainly erroneous, and involves the predictions into contradictory statements. For, however much this Beast out of the sea may have sustained the Papacy in the past (as taught in Rev. 17), it will, under the last head of this same Beast, be its deadly enemy, and it is only under this last head (still future, Prop. 160, etc., that this second Beast arises. The points of resemblance between these and the Papacy, however striking, are not sufficient to justify so wide a departure from the plain prediction. The Antichrist and his associate perish under the power of the Mighty King and His armies; the Papacy is previously overthrown by this Antichrist and his confederation.<sup>2</sup> To the believer, such a distinction is all-sufficient, although other reasons (such as the tracing of the seven heads in the Roman line, etc.) are to be found corroborative of the same.

(2) Again: Another and more plausible interpretation is that given to the little horn of Daniel, ch. 7, which is at great length and force—owing to strong resemblances—applied to the Papacy, and hence characterized as descriptive of the Antichrist (excepting Faber, and some others, who make this application without designating the little horn or the Papacy as the Antichrist). This theory, which has had a multitude of expounders (and is ably presented by recent writers, as Barnes, Com. Dan., Guinness, Approaching End, etc.) is not at all abashed by the fulfilment of its year day, 1260 years, dated from A. D. 533 or 606, without the corresponding destruction predicted to accompany the close of the times, times and a half. Its advocates still endeavor to find some explanation to satisfy, if not remove, the difficulty. But one, which clearly shows that this little horn is not the Papacy they cannot possibly overcome, viz., that the fate of this little horn is brought about not by the interposition of earthly powers (as e.g. is the case with the woman in Rev. 17), but (as in the case of the last head of the beast and the false prophet) by direct agency of a supernatural nature. The prediction of Dan. most certainly impresses the reader with the idea that this horn exists down to the coming of the Ancient of Days, to the personal Advent itself, thus corresponding—whatever inchoate fulfilment may be attributed to it—with the Antichrist destroyed at Christ's Sec. Advent and not with the whore previously destroyed by the Beast and ten horns. Faber's position is also untenable, owing to this identity of end, a crucial test that very few of the past theories are able to sustain. For this reason we must regard Daniel's little horn in the 7th ch. as both delineative of the Antichrist and still future. The only objection of a serious nature (which would support Faber's view) is, that

Daniel speaks of the beast as "slain and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame," while in Rev. 19 the beast is taken and "cast alive" into the lake of fire; but this is removed by considering that Daniel refers more to the Kingdom aspect (v. 23) of the beast and its utter destruction, and John more to the individual aspect, the leadership or last head, of the beast, for it is fully demonstrated (Prop. 160) that both beasts (in Dan. and John) are identical, and hence the language is not to be so pressed as to form an antagonism. If the objection, however, in the estimation of any, is a valid one, then the prophecy cannot be taken as descriptive of the Antichrist (seeing that their ends differ), but must be received very much in the manner specified by Faber, the Antichrist following after the little horn. The student in deciding this point will consider two things (1) that Daniel's prophecy, pertaining largely to the Jewish nation, as under Gentile domination, would hardly omit mention of the last great Antichrist in so connected an epitome; (2) that it would be strange to omit what directly (as e.g. Zech. 14, etc.) pertains to the nation and the great tribulation; and (3) link the overthrow of the Papacy (if denoted) with the immediate setting up of the Messianic Kingdom and reign of the saints, when virtually (according to this theory) the greatest of all enemies and the most fearful of all persecutions still intervened between. Hence, regarding the prophecy in its connection with the last things, we are forced by preponderating testimony to regard it—whatever inchoate fulfilment for wise purposes was allowed—as applicable to the still future history of the Antichrist, the last head of the beast, who as the representative head will be cast into the lake of fire, while his Kingdom is utterly consumed, i.e. the body, in his associated kings and followers will be slain, etc.*

(3) Again: Many writers when delineating the rise of the Antichrist, as given in Dan. 7 or Rev. 13 and 17, out of the seventh head unhesitatingly, and justly, too, have him developed out of the revived Roman power or Kingdom; but when they come to Dan., ch. 8, we have at once a discord, for they tell us that (as e.g. Reineke, Proph. Times, vol. 11, Baxter's Napoleon, etc.) this Antichrist "will take his rise out of one of the four Kingdoms into which the Greek Empire was divided at the time of Alexander's death," and without explanation how this can be so, make this little horn the exact counterpart of the little horn in ch. 7. If they are correct in the interpretation of ch. 8, then it follows that the little horn of ch. 7 is not, and cannot be, identical with it, seeing that the one springs out of the Eastern Kingdom and out of the third beast from one of its four heads, and the other arises out of the fourth beast or Kingdom. Hence some writers, noticing the discrepancy, advocate that each horn represents a distinct and separate hostile power. Thus, e.g. Faber, Barnes, and other writers, hold that the little horn of ch. 7 portrays the Papacy and the little horn of ch. 8 the Mohammedan power; others, as e.g. a writer in The Israelite Indeed, Dec., 1861, hold that ch. 8 describes the still future Antichrist who is to arise out of one of the emerged or revived four divisions of Alexander's Empire, and identifies it with that of ch. 7, without attempting to reconcile, or even notice, the difficulty. If the prophecy of ch. 8 really delineates the rise of a power out of the Greek Empire, then it cannot be applied to the power rising out of the Roman Empire, and, instead of quoting it as applicable to the last Antichrist developed out of the fourth beast, we must fall back upon the theories, either that it refers exclusively to the Mohammedan power or to another one that is to arise in the East (co-operating with the Western) at the time of the end. If, on the other hand, we accept of the views of Sir. I. Newton, Bh. Newton, Cunningham, etc., viz., that the little horn of the goat denotes the Roman Empire as established in the East, then there is a point of contact (considering the Roman Empire as a unity) by which the prophecy can be used as identical with that of ch. 7. But until this matter is cleared up, and the point of indentification fully stated and proven, it is uncritical, to say the least, to employ those prophecies so indiscriminately.<sup>4</sup>

(4) Again: Writers have taken the year-day fulfilment of the Apoc. (as given e.g. by Elliott, Lord, etc.) as proven, and from it have deduced a chronological arrangement (as e.g. Bagster, etc.) respecting the literal-day fulfilment still future. All such deductions are hazardous, and from the nature of the case cannot prove reliable, since, allowing even a sort of inchoate fulfilment to the Apoc., on the principle advocated, a regular and consecutive fulfilment of the seals, trumpets, and vials has not yet—however coincident and expressive the inchoate fulfilment hitherto may have been—been realized as predicted. Not only the variety of interpretations (some e.g. applying the first seals to the Church, others to the Roman power, etc.) forbid it, but a glance at the sixth seal (as e.g. compared with last vial, Rev. 16 : 17, 18 ; Isa. 24 : 18, 20 ; Joel 3 : 15, etc.) and at the simple fact that the vials which contain the seven last plagues in the out-pouring of God's wrath are preceded by the res. and translation of the 144,000, and stand closely related to the slaughter (Rev. 14 : 10) and harvest of the martyrs. Hence, whatever fulfilment may be accorded to portions of the Apoc., it is, in view of the unsettled and conflicting opinions concerning such fulfilment, impolitic to take it as a basis for a future one.<sup>5</sup>

(5) Again: The failure to abide by the force and propriety of symbolical language, when once admitted to be symbolical, is prevailing to a great extent, and forms a most fruitful source of erroneous conclusions. Thus, e.g. we have writers who adopt the year-day fulfilment, and insist upon its accuracy, basing their opinion upon the alleged fact that the symbols have been thus verified ; but when they come to the literal-day fulfilment the symbolical language is taken for literal, so that, by way of illustration, the locusts interpreted under the former as representative of human beings arising in their might, etc., are transformed by the latter method into real, literal locusts. Others make the language in one passage symbolical and in another literal, according to fancy, so that not only fruitful diversity but direct contradiction is involved. By the observance of a few rules legitimately drawn from, and abundantly exemplified in, the use of figurative language, an immense amount of irrelevant and misleading interpretation would have been avoided.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This is the more important to notice, since various writers of Europe and this country, not observing the overthrow of the woman before the final conflict, continue to make most inconsistently, the Papacy to be destroyed as the Antichrist at the Sec. Advent. The least consideration—if it once be allowed that the woman of Rev. ch. 17 is a portraiture of the Papacy—ought to suffice to set aside such an interpretation. Some few suppose that because the act of this destruction of the whore being mentioned after the war with the Lamb (v. 14) it follows that event, but (1) verse 15 to 18 is an appended explanation and addition to what preceded ; (2) the war with the Lamb results in a complete overthrow of the beast and confederation, so that it cannot follow ; (3) the order laid down in Rev. 14, where the fall of Babylon precedes the martyrdom under Antichrist is conclusive.

head ; others with the second beast as thus represented ; and others even making them both declarative of the Popedom. The simple fact that they exist in full strength after the Papacy has been overthrown ; that the Papacy does not fall at the open Parousia of Jesus and His saints but previously ; that the beast and false prophet after the doom of Babylon wage war with Jesus and perish—this is amply sufficient to set aside all such Papal references. Any theory, however plausible, which contains such self contradictions is most certainly defective and misleading. The Papacy is graphically described in the harlot supported by the beast, drunken with the blood of saints. Her portraiture, divinely given, is faithfully delineated by history, but when we convert—under any plea—the woman into the beast itself, we pervert the prophetic portrayal, and introduce our own representations. The confusion, even among able prophetic writers, on this point, after the express guard thrown around it by the Spirit, is something to be regretted. That class of interpreters who make the first beast of Rev. 13, the Antichrist, in its last head, are to be commended as correct, when thus made aside or separate from the Papacy. Those who make (like Napier, Bh. Newton, Cunningham, Woodhouse, Habershon, etc.), the second beast, on the principle that it applies to the Papacy, the Antichrist, are certainly in error. Those (like Brightman, Gill, Vitringa, Croly, Fysh, Elliott etc.), who make both beasts to be the Antichrist, do so in violation of express prophecy. Fansset (Com. Rev. 13) makes the second beast the Antichrist, being merely the first beast in another form, but this is forbidden by its separate mention, its aiding the other beast, its subordination to the first beast, its aiding the first beast in making war, and perishing in connection with it.

We repeat, therefore, with emphasis, that finding, as we do, in a logical consecutive manner that the Antichrist is the last, culminated head of the First Beast of Rev. 13 and 17, the same that is destroyed by the personal Second Advent of Jesus, and after he has desolated and burned the harlot, simple consistency demands us to consider—aside from other reasons—that the Antichrist of Dan. 7 and of 2 Thess. 2, which meets with the identical fate, is likewise the same, and cannot be applied to the great Apostasy or Papacy. We are forced to such a conclusion by the comparison already instituted. (Comp. Obs. 6.) Ebrard (The Rev. of John) takes the position that the Reformers were mistaken in confounding the Romish Babylon with the last and highest concentration of Antichristian power. This is so, and we need not be surprised that they, lacking the developments of history and the increased study and comparison given to the subject, should make this mistake, when it is yet evidenced in numerous prophetic writers of the present day, who cling to it with persistency and prejudice no matter how plainly refuted. Hengstenberg refuses to identify the beast of Rev. with the Papacy, but then referring to Bengel he wrongfully concludes : “ He (Bengel) held with the Church of his day that the beast was the Papacy, Chiliasm is the necessary consequence of this view.” It is not a necessary consequence as seen in the Church before the Papacy, Reformers, Pre-Millenarians, and opponents.

* Attention is directed to Meyrick's interesting art. “ Antichrist ” in Smith's Bib. Dic., who deciding from 2 Thess. 2 and John's Epistles that the Antichrist is an individual person, concludes that as Daniel's little horn indicates a polity (including also the Apoc. Beast as identical with this horn) it cannot be the Antichrist. This conclusion based upon such a premise is inconclusive for the simple reason that this Antichrist arises out of a polity, is at the head of a polity, and therefore the Spirit in tracing the rise of him may well predict of him both in his personal relationship and in that of his polity. Indeed if he is, as predicted, the last head of the beast, the only possible manner to identify him for purposes of warning, etc., is to represent him in both these aspects. As a single individual it is impossible for him to accomplish what is predicted ; it is as a person directing a powerful government, etc., that he performs such great things. Besides the continued existence of the little horn and of the last head of the Apoc. Beast down to the Open Advent, etc., clearly and unmistakably unites the same with the Antichrist of 2 Thess. 2. Consequently Riggenbach (Lange's Com. 2 Thess. 2 : 3-5) interprets, “ more correctly we shall recognize in this little horn of the 7th chapter (Daniel) the yet future adversary,” and makes it to agree with 2 Thess. 2. Tregelles (On Dan., p. 40, etc., and so others), correctly makes the little horn (and ten horns) the still future Antichrist, and in a sentence presents so cogent a reason for not applying it to the Papacy, that we see not how its conclusion can be avoided : “ The Papacy existed before the breaking up of even the Western Empire, instead of being a horn springing up after the other ten.” Baldwin (Armageddon, p. 191), making this horn the Papacy, is utterly opposed by the facts of history, and the relation that the Empire and Papacy mutually sustained.

* Another method by which the prophecy may be used as applicable to the future personal Antichrist is the old one given by Jerome, advocated by various authors, and indorsed in the art. "Antichrist" in Smith's Bib. Dic. That is, the prophecy is descriptive of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is a type—thus to be understood—of the coming Antichrist. See the quotation from Jerome and argument. The objection to this is, that Antiochus does not in all particulars meet the conditions of the prophecy, (as we have shown elsewhere, for that theory links Dan. 8 and 11 together) and that his overthrow is not followed by the grand results predicted. It is certain that the Antichrist, pre-eminent, will not arise out of the revived subdivided (four) Macedonian Empire (as e.g. held by Baxter Christian Herald, Jan. 23, 1879), because this is positively forbidden by Dan. 2 and 7, and Rev. 13 and 17, which all point to the Roman Empire in its divided form as the source from whence he springs. A writer in Waymarks in the Wilderness, vol. 3, p. 226, and vol. 3, p. 403, tries to reconcile Dan. 7 and 8 by making the Antichrist to arise in the Eastern and not in the Western portion of the Roman Empire, and to do this says that the four subdivisions of Dan. 8 will be revived in the future formation of the ten horns of Dan. 7. This, however, is opposed to the continuity of the prophecies, and the identity of the beasts. It is, however, ingenious and worthy of consideration. As the last head of the beast (the Antichrist) and his coadjutor (the second beast) are both future, we can only conjecture the method of reconciliation. If the idea of incorporation into the Roman Empire is not correct, then perhaps we may hazard another, viz., that Dan. 7 refers to the head, the leader, and Dan. 8 to the second beast, the false prophet. But we decidedly favor the interpretation suggested by able writers, viz., that these four kingdoms being absorbed by the Roman Empire they must be regarded, after such absorption, in the light of Roman unity. Fausset and Tregelles (so others) think that the Antichrist is the last head of the Roman power, but spring out of (as to location) the territory formerly occupied by one of those Grecian kingdoms, four of the ten horns virtually reviving those kingdoms. We, however, call the attention of the critical prophetic student to this fact, viz., that several of these (4) Grecian kingdoms fell to the Romans professedly as an inheritance and were merged into their polity; hence Dan. 2 and 7 preserve the Roman unity, while Dan. 8 intimates (not a violent overthrow but) a peaceful incorporative act, which virtually prolongs attained characteristics and, probably, fixes the location of Antichrist's rise. Antiochus must be dismissed because he was a king in the regular succession and the prediction relates to the time of the end and Jewish deliverance. Mohammedanism cannot be received because it did not continuously spring out of one of the Grecian kingdoms, and not out of the Roman Empire. The last head of the Roman Empire must (in union with Dan. 2 and 7, Rev. 13 and 17) be denoted, and this is historically made satisfactory in this way: Daniel having twice already presented the fourth kingdom, he now in reintroducing the Grecian, lays stress on Alexander's dominions being divided into four great parts, and that—at least—one continues on with a prolonged life until this king of fierce countenance—the Antichrist arises—and this prolongation is effected by being merged into the Roman by legacy and conquest, and yet retaining much of the Grecian characteristic. If we open the History of the Roman Power, we find that after the grants of Perseus and Cleopatra, after the vast Eastern absorption, the customs, etc., of the Greeks were largely adopted; and the adaptation and affiliation were so prominent especially in the Eastern division, that—without ignoring Roman unity—the line of Constantinopolitan Rulers were designated Greek Emperors. One thing is self-evident, that this fierce king rules at "the time of the end," at "the end of the indignation," when "the transgressors are come to the full," and that the time and actions ascribed to him, as well as the results, fully accord with that predicted of the last head of the Roman power. This prediction of Dan. 8, while not invalidating the legal unity of the Empire, may thus give us two hints: (1) the Grecian affinity that we have mentioned; (2) that this last head may arise within the territorial limits of one of these former kingdoms. (Those who favor Russia as developing the future Antichrist, can only do so, consistently with other predictions, by making it to obtain countries thus absorbed by the Roman Empire and in virtue of such relationship professing—even perhaps in Constantinople, the capitol—to revive and perpetuate the Roman Empire. Time must determine which is the best application.) One clause relating to this king is pregnant with meaning (Dan. 8:24 "his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power") serving to locate the time of fulfillment and to identify the king intended, for it points us at once to Rev. 13:2; 16:13, 14; 17:12, 17; and 19:19. We may rest assured that any interpretation that does not bring in "the last days," the Jewish restoration, the Messianic Kingdom as covenanted (the desire and hope of Daniel), the fulfilment of predictions relating to Mill. blessedness (the outcome of all, as e.g. shown in Dan. 7, etc.), is defective. So also any effort to make one of the Grecian kingdoms of Dan. 8 to be the fourth kingdom (i.e. not the Roman), seeing that that is specially guarded against in Dan. 7, where the four Grecian are in regular succession to Alexander's, while the fourth (Roman) is another and separate kingdom gaining the supremacy over all others. Hence we must carefully distinguish the powers, and also allow a certain amalgamation, as presented in prophecy and recorded in history.

<sup>5</sup> It is sufficient, against this theory, to point out that Rev. 15 expressly affirms the deliverance and exaltation of those who refused to worship the Antichrist and assume his mark before the vials are poured out, and that we are under the sixth, is premature and opposed to fact. The truth is, as our line of argument shows, that the Antichrist and his worship are still future, and that any supposed fulfilment of the vials is fanciful and misleading. This is becoming more and more clearly apprehended by prophetic writers.

<sup>6</sup> Even those who apprehend the symbolic language and endeavor to draw correct conclusions from its use, permit themselves too often to lay special stress on some trivial part of the symbolical representation as if it were the main idea, overlooking the fact that it is added in order to bring forth and enforce the leading idea. The writer is convinced, after long reflection, that in the Apocalypse we have pictures expressed in symbolical language (as e.g. 1st Seal representing Victory, 2d Seal Anarchy, 3d Seal Famine, 4th Seal Bloodshed or War, 5th Seal Martyrdom, etc.), and that the details are given to complete the idea that the pictures are to represent.

Obs. 6. Another characteristic exhibited in the writings of the past, and which has had a decided influence in forming interpretations, is the tendency to make the apostasy and the man of sin, in 2 Thess. 2, the same, both being by many Protestants applied to the Papacy. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, Augustine, and others, took the falling away to be the Antichrist himself who caused it, but the record distinctly teaches (comp. Olshausen, Com. 2 Thess. 2 : 3, 4; Lange, Com. do., Doc. 3. (4) 1; Smith's Dic., Art. Antichrist, 3'), as Riggenbach expresses it, that "the falling away is by no means identical with the Antichrist (as the Fathers understood it), or even merely (as De Wetto thinks) the working exclusively of Antichrist; rather, the general rush of violent departure from the faith precedes that final disclosure of the Antichristian despot." The most careful writers thus discriminate between the apostasy itself and the Antichrist which is developed from or arises out of it; the former being regarded as introductory, the latter as its ripened fruit. This falling away, too, is applied to an apostatizing from Christianity, extending in its effects to all nations, and embracing a denial of fundamental truths, which culminates finally in this apostatizing from all truth (as centred in God and His Word) being represented to us in the acts and brief rule of a single person, who, by way of eminence, is styled the Antichrist. We are not told how long this apostatizing is to precede this person; commencing already in the days of the apostles, it works on in its leavening process from century to century, until finally it breaks forth with a power and energy, controlled and directed by a single head, which distinguishes the last part of its history from all the preceding. The emphasis attached to this apostasy by the Spirit indicates that it shall, even before the rise of the personal Antichrist, be a great, distinguishing departure from the faith. Hence, while the reformers and many others did not properly distinguish between the preliminaries and the Antichrist, yet they were abundantly justified in applying 2 Thess. 2 to the Papacy, in so far as they showed that it departed from the truth. They were also correct in making the same application to Mohammedanism and other opposing systems, in so far as the apostatizing in a general sense may include a wilful departure from the knowledge of God and the substitution of other forms of belief in its place. The apostasy is not confined simply to one person, one party or sect, but may embrace many persons and various systems under the one general term. Starting in the Church or at the side of it, it extends to all men who are commanded to repent and obey, and all who refuse to do so, are, in virtue of moral and religious obligation attested to by the Word and self-consciousness, regarded as included in this apostatizing class, as is readily seen by looking at the characters described as prominent in the last days. Strictly limited, it relates to those who profess Christ and depart from the truth in Him; comprehensively it includes those who, knowing of Christ, still reject Him, and both these pave the way for the Antichrist, who, in his own person, concentrates and manifests hostility to the Christ and His truth. Therefore it is, that while regarding this personal Antichrist as still future (the one to whom prophecy points as pre-eminently deserving the title, and being the one specially predicted), yet the reformers and others were undoubtedly correct in designating opposing systems, etc., as Antichristian, from the fact that "many Antichrists" (distinguished from the last great one) shall exist. The conclusion at which we arrive is, that, whatever inchoate fulfilment is evident in the past and present, the apostasy (however antichristian) only paves the way for the still future rise of the prophetic Antichrist, and that just previous to his manifestation this apostatizing from the truth will, in and outside of the Church, be more widely extended. The spirit of Antichrist already in John's days (so he declares) exhibiting itself in persons hostile to the truth, departing from the faith, teachers of infidelity and of doctrine leading to sin, has been largely manifested in succeeding ages, and to-day in its aggregate, both in the professed Church and world, assumes proportions that makes it exceedingly significant to the thoughtful student, who believes with Irenæus (Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. "Antichrist") that this apostasy will be summed up in a personal, individual Antichrist.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> But Smith's art. (6 (4)), endeavors to make a distinction not allowable by the general analogy of prophecy on this subject, viz., that the apostasy follows the withdrawal of that which hinders or restrains. This is not asserted in the prediction but that which hindereth only stands related to the revelation of the Man of Sin; for the apostatizing from the truth was already manifesting itself in John's day. The writer (Meyrick), however, correctly defines the apostasy as a falling away from the faith and not necessarily a rejection of all belief; and that it is applicable to the professing Church in so far as it is corrupted.

<sup>2</sup> The reader will observe that the apostasy paves the way for, and is an exciting cause to, the uprising of the Man of Sin. We have only to point to the sad fact that departures from the faith, and the resultant abuses, as exhibited in Roman, Greek, and Protestant churches, has been a fruitful source of infidelity, so that to-day thousands of unbelieving works chiefly base their rejection of Christianity upon the doctrines and fruits of such apostatizing, as if they flowed legitimately from the religion taught by Jesus. Leading minds, like Voltaire, Draper, Lecky, and others, draw their sharpest arrows from this source. It is important to notice this, as it meets an objection urged by those (Dr. Falconer, and others), who make the Papacy the Antichrist, viz., that the Antichrist must be found in the Church itself, and not outside of it. Now prophecy does not assert this, but the reverse. The apostasy is found in the Church and prepares the way, as 2 Thess. 2 teaches, for the Antichrist, but a glance at parallel predictions shows, as we have proven, that he arises (Dan. 7. Rev. 13 and 17) out of the Roman Empire; that (Rev. 14 and 17) he persecutes the apostasy (harlot) itself and the saints. The condition of the professing Church materially aids in that development which meets the conditions requisite for his uprising. The attention of the student is directed, by way of illustration, to only one historical fact to indicate the influence of the apostasy in this direction, viz., in its supporting the Roman Empire, bestowing upon it alleged divine sanctions, and pronouncing it—a beast, so called by the Spirit—a Holy Empire.

After a careful consideration of all the Scriptures bearing on the subject, we are forced to distinguish the antecedent Apostasy from the Antichrist. Reason itself corroborates such a position, seeing that, in the nature of the case, there must be something preparatory before such a Man of Sin can possibly be developed. In addition, it prevents that sweeping and most uncharitable condemnation—wholesale—of the Church of Rome, which is based upon the identity of the Apostasy and Man of Sin. The dreadful portraiture of the woman, Rev. 17, verified by history, is surely ample enough to cover the falsity and bloody spirit of the Papacy, without adding that which certainly belongs to another party before which the Popedom will be crushed. While the Papacy, and outlying heresies and hierarchical claims, painfully manifest the Apostasy, yet, as all candid writers must admit, here and there examples of piety and devotion, a vital union with Christ evidenced by the producing fruits of the Spirit, are presented even in the darkest periods of the Hierarchy. God always had His people, and they never were exclusively confined to this or that church. Error has indeed often been allied with piety, but the former has been mercifully overlooked because of faith in Jesus; if it were not so, alas for our own hopes of salvation. We must not forget that the Pope professes only to be vicegerent and that his authority is acknowledged officially to be derived from God, while the Man of Sin denies this vicegerency and this derivation; the Pope in all his decretals, bulls, etc., recognizes God and His supremacy while the Man of Sin refuses such recognition; the Pope confesses to a subordination, while the Man of Sin makes himself supreme and claims homage to himself as God; Popery (whatever may be the individual expressions of some adherents or the blasphemous assumptions of superiority, etc.), directs worship to be tendered to God and His Son, while the Man of Sin persecutes all who worship God and His Christ, exalting himself to a superiority over God, and insists, as an essential element of his arrogance, to receive as his legitimate due the homage demanded by God; the Papacy makes much of the Father and the Son in its creed, forms of worship, etc., while the Antichrist denies the Father and the Son; Popery confesses that Jesus came in the flesh, while Antichrist denies this coming; the Papacy acknowledges as a cardinal point that Jesus will come again, while Antichrist refuses to believe in such a Second Advent. In order to make the Papacy the Antichrist there must be, if prediction is true, not merely striking coincidences, but an exact fulfilment. Now this cannot historically be asserted respecting the Papacy without resorting to a species of exaggeration, which is both unfair to the precise words of prophecy and to the actual facts as presented by history. Logically and consistently we are forced to our present position. The claims, arrogance, independence, opposition, exceeding impiety, arrogation of divine attributes, express denial of the Father and Son, demands of worship from adherents, lawlessness, wonder-working power, of the Antichrist are, however, they may have been imitated in the past, such as exceed anything that history has recorded of human wickedness. It is the culmination of depravity, calling for signal divine vengeance. It is the personification of audacity, malice, deceit, cunning, hate, ambition, impiety, evil, rebellion, infamy and self-deification. Fausset (Com., 2 Thess. 2), says: "Two objections exist to Romanism being regarded the Antichrist, though probably Romanism will leave its culmination in him: (1) So far is Romanism from opposing all that is called God, that adoration of gods and lords many (the virgin Mary and saints) is a leading feature in it; (2) the Papacy has existed for more than twelve centuries, and yet Christ is not come, whereas the prophecy regards the final Antichrist as short-lived, and soon going into perdition through the Coming of Christ (Rev. 17: 8, 11). Gregory the Great declared against the Patriarch of Constantinople, that whosoever should assume the title of 'Universal Bishop' would be 'the Forerunner of Antichrist.' The Papacy fulfilled this his undesigned prophecy. The Pope has been called by his followers 'Our Lord God the Pope;' and at his inauguration in St. Peter's, seated in his chair upon the high altar, which is treated as his footstool, he as vividly foreshadowed him who 'exalteth himself above all that is called God.'" In view of the Reformation application to the Papacy, and the indorsement of the same in some of the standards (Artic. Smalc. II. 4, p. 314, and in the Appendix, p. 347, Rechenberg's ed.) the matter was discussed (Luth. Obs., Aug. 20th, 1875), in the Iowa Synod, which declared: "We cannot acknowledge the expression 'the Pope is the Antichrist' as an Article of Faith, and, therefore, we cannot make it a condition of Church fellowship, that the complete and final fulfilment of the prophecy 2 Thess. 2 be found in the Pope." In addition, when we come to examine the historical (historico-prophetical) claims of the Papacy to be the Antichrist (as given by its advocates), they are not supported by the facts of history. Aside from the fact that the Papacy did not arise in the chronological succession (after ten kingdoms, etc.), that it did not root up three kingdoms out of ten (as evidenced by the difficulty of making them out, and the varied and conflicting enumeration given)* it is sufficient to say that the favorite view of many that the Bishop of Rome obtained Universal Supremacy either under Justinian or Phocas is not sustained by the facts of history. This is seen in the separate independence of the Patriarchs; that interference of one Patriarchate in another was disallowed; that the Emperors retained the real power (so the Apoc. has the whore sustained by the power of the beast) and the Popes had a delegated power; that the assumed supremacy was of later origin, being formulated under Hildebrand; that the conflicts with the Imperial power and the requirements of Imperial sanction; the severance of the Greek and Latin Churches, disputes of bishops, expressed opinions of Father and Emperors, acknowledged Imperial responsibility; the divisions in the Papal Church on the subject of the supremacy (some holding it to exist in General Councils, others advocating a restricted form, giving the supremacy to the Empire in matters of law); these considerations alone sustain our position.

Obs. 7. Another important matter to notice is this, that some Scripture predictions, directly applied by writers to the future personal Antichrist, are only applicable to a power or person associated with him; and that for the sake of consistency we must distinguish between them. The old view of Hippolytus that the false Prophet or sec. Beast of Rev. 13 is the future personal Antichrist has been a favorite with some, and is adopted in Smith's Bib. Dic., Art "Antichrist." While this interpretation is not near so objectionable as Faber's, etc. (seeing that it avoids the incongruity of making the Papacy to exist down to the Sec. Advent, when it is previously destroyed by the beast and ten horns), yet it is misleading from the simple fact that the last head of the first Beast is the great leading actor, under whose leadership the confederation is formed, etc.; and that this false prophet only occupies a subsidiary position, and one, too, which strives to honor and exalt the power and authority of this last head. The prophecy impresses us by the acts of this false prophet, all being allied with the revived last head, that he only arises and comes into play as an active agent during the career of this seventh-eighth (Prop. 160) head. Nothing in it is predicative of a previous existence; all, so far as recorded, is descriptive of that brief but fearful period when the mighty leader to whom worship is tendered—hence the Antichrist (if worship were given to the false prophet and he were the prime mover of the confederation, then the argument might have force)—has control over nations.

This chronological position of the prophet is conclusive against various theories. It at once and effectually disproves its application to the Papacy (Mede, Faber, Lord, Elliott, etc.), to the infidelity and revolutionary principles of the French Revolution (Kett, etc.), and to the French Republic (Galloway). Any interpretation which makes the First Beast the Papal polity or identical with the Romish Church (for it only supports and aids it as in Rev. 17, and finally turns against and destroys it), or the Sec. Beast an upholder and extender of the Romish Church is undoubtedly defective and contradictory for the reasons previously given in the text. Another view (Smith's Bib.

* Thus e.g. Mede has "Greeks, Longobards, or Franks;" Sir I. Newton: "Exarchate Ravenna, Kingdom Lombards, Senate and Dukedom of Rome;" Faber: "The Herulo-Turingic, the Ostrogothic, and the Lombardic;" Gausson: "Heruli, Ostrogoths, and Lombards;" others: "The Exarchate of Ravenna, the Pentapolis (i.e. afterward so named), the dukedom of Spoleti (i.e. formerly embraced the city and senate of Rome), comprising the three estates of the Church;" others: "The Heruli, Ostrogoths, and Vandals;" etc. It is sufficient to say, that none of these meet the conditions of prophecy, not being uprooted, etc., before the Papacy, for even in "The States of the Church" (to which we cannot consistently narrow down three of the ten kingdoms) the Pope had often but "a shadowy rule" (see e.g. Seeborn's Era of Protestant Revolution, Bower's His. of the Popes, Gibbon's Decl. and Fall of the Rom. Emp., etc.).

Die., art. Antich. 6. (2),) which in a certain sense (that of "many Antichrists") might be allowed is that both beasts, the first and second together form the Antichrist (are Antichrists, so Brightman, Parens, Vitranga, Gill, Bachman, Fraser, Croly, Fysh, and Elliott). Whatever of truth may be contained in the idea of both being Antichrists (as both act co-jointly), yet for the sake of perspicuity and to distinguish the leader from all others as the particular, pre-eminent Antichrist, singled out of all others, we must give this title, as the culminated head, only to the last head of the first beast, with (so Smith) Marlorat, King James I., Daubuz, and Galloway; to whom can be added numerous writers, who advocate not only that the Roman Empire is designated by the first beast, but that under the leadership of the last head, thus constituted above all others "the Antichrist," the final conflict with Christ will take place, of whom, above all others, Faber, in his later works, deserves special mention as eminently successful in prophetic interpretation of the beast, the very best sustained by the text and history. The reader is invited to consider in this connection Prop. 160.

Obs. 8. In the discussion of this subject, the student, in order to obtain an intelligent and consistent interpretation, must plant himself upon what we deem an impregnable position, viz., that the Roman Empire is the fourth Beast of Daniel (adopted literally by a host of able expositors, ancient and modern), and that the little horn of ch. 7 springs out of, is attached to, as part, and controlling part, of the beast. This is clearly taught, and, owing to remarkable points of resemblance, the most eminent expositors have, in some way, made this horn representative of the Papacy. Admitting wonderful and striking coincidences (based upon persecuting Antichristian power), yet, taking the prophecy as a whole, it is impossible to apply it to the Papacy, owing to the final end being diverse to that in Rev. 17; to the fact that the ten Kingdoms only arise, simultaneously or nearly so, at the time (Rev. 17) of the closing period of the fourth Beast's history (commentators have hitherto been unable to fix these ten Kingdoms, giving various lists of them, or else taking the number ten for an indefinite number which is forbidden by the prediction and the three removed); to the fact that this horn arises after the ten Kingdoms; and to the additional fact that, however ingeniously pressed, the Papacy did not uproot three horns or Kingdoms in its rise (those usually urged being inadequate to sustain the position). But we proceed another step, in saying that this little horn is the Antichrist that shall arise at the time of the end, the closing period, and be destroyed at the Sec. Advent. The reasons already given respecting the similarity of end, etc., are sufficient to indicate this, which was the view of the early Fathers, and has been the favorite one of a multitude of writers. The reader will observe that the quite early Fathers invariably linked the coming of the Antichrist with the Roman Empire, and it was after the idea arose that the Roman power was the hindering cause that the notion was promulgated, that after the Roman Empire was overthrown then only would Antichrist be revealed.<sup>1</sup> But still, in some way, he would reunite the Roman power and exercise sway over it and against Christianity. A comparison of Scripture forces us, if legitimately performed, to indorse the view that the Antichrist arises out of the Roman Empire, and arises, too, at the time it is in a divided state, the consolidation into a confederacy being performed under his auspices. Two objections that may be urged against this view ought to be considered. (1) The non-existence of the Beast or Roman Empire is supposed to militate against this view; but, in reply, it is sufficient to say that this very non-existence is also predicted, and that it is only after a period of lost headship that a revival takes place, and the last head or Antichrist appears, comp. Prop. 160. (2) The personality or individuality of Antichrist is alleged against it; but it is an ample answer to remind the student that Antichrist is presented to us by the Spirit in His several aspects (a) as an individual person, the leader of the confederation, as e.g. in 2 Thess. 2; (b) then the tracing the rise of this person (from whence he springs) as e.g. Rev. 13 : 3-8; Rev. 17 : 9-11; (c) as virtually—yet differing—a prolongation of the seventh revived head (comp. Prop. 160); (d) as a polity (for king and Kingdom are convertible terms, e.g. a person may stand for a Kingdom or polity, Dan. 2 : 38, last clause), thus showing that he is the head over a powerful government; (e) thus being a person who is the head or controlling leader of the Beast, he is in virtue of his position represented either as an individual or as a power springing out of and directing the Beast, or in virtue of his tremendous influence in directing the Beast, being its representative head, he is the Beast himself just as Nebuchadnezzar was the head of gold. In view of the fearful issues connected with the coming of this Antichrist, the Spirit mercifully presents those several aspects, so that when the time arrives for fulfilment the points of recognition may be multiplied to the sustaining of faith in the dreadful fiery trial.* Now we take another step in advance, viz., in identifying the sameness of Dan. 7 (the little horn), Rev. 13 (the last head), Rev. 17 (the last head), and 2 Thess. 2 (the man of sin). In the elucidation of this subject such an identity becomes imperative. In looking over the expositors, ancient and modern, nearly all agree in making Dan. 7, Rev. 13, and Rev. 17 descriptive of the same Roman Empire (some in its civil, others in its papal, prolongation, and still others in both of these), and in virtue of the civil headship attributed to the heads that were fallen (which John only designates as an additional fact of identification), it is impossible, without a violation of consistency, to attribute to this last head (of the same beast) any other but a civil headship like unto the rest of the heads. This is a point of vital importance, and cannot be yielded up without serious deviation from the prophecy.* If this were all revealed by John then we might fail in linking this last head with the Antichrist of 2 Thess. 2, but John informs us that this civil head sets up precisely the same claims to Divine honors, worship, etc., and is finally destroyed by the personal Advent of the Lord Jesus, just as Paul describes, so that we cannot doubt the correctness of that line of expositors who, whatever mistakes were made in details, applied all these predictions to the Antichrist. The personal Antichrist, taking these prophecies together, is then both a civil and religious head, endeavoring to control the civil, social, and religious interests of society, or, in other words, State and Church (such as the latter may be, viz., humanitarian), are represented in him. Our indebtedness to many able writers who, in some way, held up this Beast as the Roman Empire, and the Antichrist as springing out of it, is great (and here gratefully acknowledged), however much we may differ from them in the way of tracing (prophetically and historically) the final headship of this Beast, because they preserved, amid diversity, an important and essential element in the correct apprehension of the subject. It was owing to this feeling—based upon the prophetic idea that the Antichrist must be, in order to meet the requirements of prediction, related to the Roman power—that so many of the Fathers and writers (Brooks, El. Proph. Interp., p. 48, etc.; Smith's Bib. Dic., Art. Antichrist, etc.) thought that Rome itself would be the seat of the Antichrist (the latter, however, whatever power the Beast

<sup>1</sup> As this is an interesting point we append a few illustrations. Aside from the opinions, entertained respecting the persecuting Emperors, the early Fathers, even those advocating the breaking up of the Empire, linked the Antichrist with the Empire in that he would obtain possession of and control it. Thus e.g. Bh. Newton quotes (Diss., p. 411, etc.), Tertullian as saying (Apol. c. 32) that the division of the Roman State "into ten kingdoms will bring on the Antichrist;" Cyril locates (Cant. 15, c. 5), the coming of Antichrist at the future division of the Empire into the ten kingdoms, when "the eleventh is Antichrist, who by magical and wicked artifice shall seize the Roman power;" so also Hilary, Ambrose, but especially Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom, (vide quotations in Newton) who make the Antichrist follow a failing or breaking up of the Empire, and (as Chrysostom) "he shall seize on the vacant Empire, and shall endeavor to assume the power both of God and men." Comp. quotations in Smith's Bib. Dic., art. Antichrist, 6, (1) who gives additional, Andreas as "reuniting the Roman Empire" under him, Aretas as being "a king of the Romans;" so also John Damascene, Adso, and others have him reuniting the Empire. Nearly all the Fathers justly kept in view the foretold division of the Empire, and made the rise of the Antichrist synchronize with that time; and all agreed in having him destroyed at the personal Advent of Jesus. Comp. also pp. 318, 341, 353, 356 Döllinger's (Smith's ed.) Proph. of the Mid. Ages, Alford's Proleg. to 2 Thess. Lange's Com. on 2 Thess. 2, etc.

<sup>2</sup> In Dan. 7 he is also represented as a horn arising after the ten kingdoms, thus intimating to us, what the Apocalypse predicts, that he is not precisely an eighth head, having a relationship to the seventh, but has special characteristics of his own which, in one aspect, gives him a certain independency, and yet, in another, shows him to be virtually a seventh-eighth head, i.e. in some respects a seventh, and in others an eighth head. Thus prediction presents us with the varied aspects of the last Antichrist, so that in some respects he is a horn, in others a seventh head, and in virtue of these may be designated an eighth head.

<sup>3</sup> The importance of this is worthy of consideration. These points are fundamental in tracing the rise of the Antichrist: (1) There are only four great world empires in regular succession until he is revealed; (2) it is erroneous to make a fifth (as e.g. Russia, Turkey, Egypt, Greece), out of which he springs, unless hereafter incorporated as an integral part of it; (3) the Roman Empire will be headless, i.e. cease to exist, but will be revived, and out of this revival springs this Antichrist; (4) he, therefore, must proceed from the fourth or Roman revived; (5) any other power from which it might arise, can only be recognized, provided it is fully incorporated in the Roman, becomes part of it, and its leader (as e.g. if Russia would conquer Constantinople and make that its capital, etc.); (6) no special stress can be laid on "Gog," for the simple reason that the name was applied to different nations, and can be found nearly all over Europe (through the inundations of the barbarians) and in part of Asia—and besides it may be a general name descriptive of an enemy—so that the order of succession must be our guide; (7) the Czar professes to represent the Eastern part of the Roman Empire we are told, and hence Thomas, Cummings, and others, find the Antichrist in Russia, but this can only be true in the future, provided it conquers Roman territory and becomes thus an integral part of the Empire—for the Antichrist must proceed from the recognized fourth Empire; (8) this relation of the Antichrist to the Empire and being its civil head sets aside Wild's theory (The Lost Ten Tribes, p. 143), and St. Bonhomme's (Proph. Times, March, 1880, "Who is to be the Antichrist?") that the Antichrist will be a Jew over the Jewish nation (which nation he invades, fights, subdues, etc.), for the weighty consideration of order of succession forbids their inferences.

<sup>4</sup> The student will notice the important bearing that this view possesses in enabling us to avoid a mass of contradictory interpretation. The continuation of the Roman Empire—however divided and however headless in the past or present, down to the Sec. Advent, is fundamental as given by Daniel and John. The impossibility of accepting the Papacy as the culminated head of the Antichrist is fully evidenced by its destruction previous to that Advent by the beast and ten horns. The impossibility of receiving any power outside of, and not incorporated with, the Roman Empire as the last Antichrist, is self-evident from the connection that this Antichrist sustains to the Roman power as its last head. This also teaches us that the views now expressed by able writers that Rome is "the false prophet" (as e.g. Roberts in Prophecy and the Eastern Question), cannot be correct for two reasons: (1) the Papacy is previously destroyed, (2) this "false prophet" arises only in conjunction with this last head. This likewise shows us that we cannot possibly accept of the notion (entertained by many Expositors in the past and recently repeated by Roberts, Balfour, etc.), that the ten horns are to be regarded as fulfilled in the past, because (1) the last head of the beast is still future; (2) the horns are brought out under this last head; (3) the horns act in conjunction with this head, being controlled by him; (4) the horns act only at this period for a brief time, viz., an "hour;" and (5) the acts and result, ascribed to these horns have not been witnessed in the past, for the Papacy is still a gigantic power. Our position also meets in the same manner the objectionable interpretation of Barbour (Three Worlds), respecting the heads of the beast, the two-horned beast, the ten horns (he arbitrarily makes "horn" to refer to a short time after the division of the Empire and not to the division itself existing a short time), etc.—of Lord's (Exp. of Apoc.), exp. of the two-horned beast, ten horns, etc., of Barnes's (Apoc.) interpretation of the last head, ten horns, false prophet, etc., besides that of many others.

In view of the fact that so many prophetic writers insist upon the past existence of the ten horns in order to make out the following of the Papacy, it may be proper to add, that no such division can be proven to have preceded the rise of the Papacy, and to have existed contemporaneously. This is evidenced by the varied lists given. Thus e.g. Machiavelli's is adopted by some: (1) Ostrogoths; (2) Visigoths; (3) Suevis and Alans; (4) Vandals; (5) Franks; (6) Burgundians; (7) Heruli; (8) Saxons and Angles; (9) Huns; (10) Lombards. But this is an enumeration of nations to which others could be readily added. If the ten kingdoms thus arose and are thus to be traced, we have the incongruity of the image existing the longest in the period of the toes. No history of the Roman Empire (as Gibbon, etc.), gives such a division, which is sufficiently significant. Other ten are enumerated by Sir I. Newton, and variations are given by Bh. Newton, Mede, Bh. Lloyd, etc., so that many owing to the changes introduced, the rise and fall and succession of nations, the difficulty of making out precisely ten and these contemporaneous (and especially to three being uprooted by the Papacy), and the patent fact that no such ten have existed down to the present time (much less to the Sec. Advent), make out the number an indefinite one. We are not concerned to find them in the past; they relate to the future exclusively. Fausset (Com. Dan. 7) correctly says: "the definite ten will be the ultimate development of the Roman Empire, just before the rise of the Antichrist."

Obs. 9. The meaning of the word "Antichrist" can readily be made out from the force of "anti" in composition, denoting "against or opposed to, in place of or correspondence to," thus designating either opposition to Christ or imitation of Christ. It may then mean (1) one who sets himself up against Christ, denying or usurping His power, or (2) one who strives to resemble Christ in His prerogatives, power, etc., or (3) one who unites both these characteristics. Over against the opinion of Greswell (Exp. of Parab., vol. 1, p. 372), that it denotes rather a kind of rivalry than antagonism, a "Counterfeit-Christ," we have in the account given of the Antichrist abundant evidence to sustain the almost universally received one that he will be an opposer of Christ. This is unmistakably predicted both in his characteristics and in his acts, without, however, rejecting Greswell's idea that he also may, in the course of such opposition, claim, as Dean Trench (Synonymes of the N. T.) suggests, to be, without taking the name, a kind of Messiah (for the honor and worship tendered to him seems to indicate something of the kind). Trench's explanation, based upon the marks given to him that he will set himself up both against Christ and in the place of (as the world's Saviour) Christ, being thus both an Anti and False Christ, is fully sustained by His being a denier of Christ (1 John 2 : 22, Luther, a Wider Christ), an adversary or opposer of Christ (2 Thess. 2 : 4), one who fights against Christ (Rev. 17 : 19), and also one who sets Himself up as a kind of Redeemer worthy of worship (2 Thess. 2 : 4; Rev. 13 : 4, 12, etc.), thus occupying the place, the Theocratic position, assigned to Jesus.<sup>1</sup> It may also be remarked that in view of the latitude of meaning in the word, John already in his day (1 John 2 : 18) could well say, in view of the opposition to or denial of Christ (or, even the substitutions for Christ), "Little children, it is the last time, and as ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many Antichrists, whereby we know that it is the last time." Every age has, in his sense, both in and alongside of the Church, produced its Antichrists, the preliminary earnest of the great one still to come ; and because the Messiah has come and such opposers to Him can thus exist in opposition to Him, we know, too, that this is the last hour, or time, or dispensation preparatory to Christ's triumph over His adversary.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The Fathers generally speak of him as one who is an opposer of Christ, but some distinctively also intimate his twofold character, as e.g. Hippolytus says : "The deceiver wishes in every way to appear like the Son of Man," etc., (quoted by Brooks, El., p. 256), and so Lactantius and Jerome (quoted by Bh. Newton, Diss., p. 411), the former saying : "This is he, who is called Antichrist, but who shall feign himself to be Christ, and shall fight against the truth :"—the latter that Antichrist "shall sit in the temple of God, either at Jerusalem (as some imagine) or in the Church (as we more truly judge), showing himself that he is Christ and the Son of God," etc. It is in view of this latitude of meaning, that the Papacy bearing so many of the characteristics of the Antichrist was deservedly reckoned in several distinguishing particulars to be Antichristian, as e.g. in its Theocratic claims (Bengel's Gnomon, V., p. 306), in its assumption of the names and titles of "the Christ" (comp. Bellarmine as given by Dr. Butler in Lec. Apoc., p. 293), the worship of Mary (Cumming's Lec. on Romanism, Butler's Lec. Apoc., etc.), the persecution and slaughter of saints (Bickersteth's Prom. Glory, p. 90, etc.), its canonization and invocation of saints, its ambitious and warlike Popes, its profession of miraculous power (Cumming's Lec., Bede's Ecd. History, etc.), its changing of commandments (Stillingfleet's Works, vol. 6, p. 572, Cumming's Lec. on Romanism, Christian World, March, 1865, etc.) etc.

<sup>2</sup> We append a few statements as to the meaning of the word Antichrist. Bh. Hurd (Introd. to the Study of the Prophecies, Ser. 7) defines it : "a person of power, actuated with a spirit opposite to that of Christ." Barnes (Com., 1 John 2 : 18), says : "The proper meaning of anti in composition, is over against, contrary to, reciprocity, substitution. The word Antichrist, therefore, might denote any one who either was, or claimed to be, in the place of Christ, or one who, for any cause, was in opposition to him." "If the word stood alone, and there was nothing said further to explain its meaning, we should think, when the word Antichrist was used, either of one who claimed to be the Christ, and who thus was a rival ; or of one who stood in opposition to, on some other ground." Dr. Braune (Lange's Com., 1 John 2 : 18) says that "anti may mean both hostility and substitution," and favors "not substitution but hostility to Christ exhibited in the form of eminent strength." He also mentions Huther as combining the two ideas : "the enemy of Christ, who, under the lying appearance of being the true Christ, endeavors to destroy the work of Christ." Fausset (Com. 2 Thess. 2), says : "He not merely assumes Christ's character (as a false Christ), but opposes Christ," and adds : "Idolatry of self, spiritual pride, and rebellion against God, are his characteristics." Appleton's New Amer. Cyclop., art. "Antichrist," says : "The current opinion of the Roman Catholic Church, in accordance with the general doctrine of the Fathers, is, that Antichrist is an individual who will pretend to be the true Messiah, and be generally acknowledged as such throughout the earth, during the last epoch of the existence of the world." Dr. Lange in Herzog's Encyclop., art. "Antichrist," combines the two meanings, and says that the opposition (anti) is enforced by the form of a false (anti) Christ that the former is made powerful by an imitation of the claims of "the Christ," which imitation is presented and urged by lies and a perversion of things relating to Christ. Dr. Tregelles (Daniel, p. 192), objects to the idea of being a Pseudo-Christ in view of the Antichrists in John's time who were simply opposers to Christ, and consequently urges the meaning of opposer to Christ ; but in a subsequent page violates his own definite determined given meaning, when he declares that the Jews will receive him as a Messiah. McClinton and Strong's Cyclop., art. on, makes him both a "false-Christ" and "against Christ." Such illustrations, which could be indefinitely repeated, only show, that no satisfactory conclusions can be drawn from the philological meaning of the word, which may have one determinate meaning (e.g. hostility or substitution) and exclude another. The meaning to be applied to the word Antichrist as related to this one great future culminated power of evil, must be found on exegetical grounds by a comparison of the predictions descriptive of him. Such a comparison clearly demonstrates that the Antichrist is as many hold an "opposer of Christ" (for he persecutes believers in Jesus, organizes the nations against Christianity, and wages war against the Christ), and at the same time as Greswell (note to his Historical Testimony), "another Christ, a pro-Christ, a vice-Christ, an alter-Christ, a pretender to the name of Christ;" or as others a "Pseudo-Christ" or "Counterfeit Christ," (for he assumes the rights, honors, and worship of Christ, and is received by the Jewish nation as "the Messiah").

1. By John in the Epistles. 1 John 2 : 22, "Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son." By this we have a denier of Jesus, the Christ, and the Father who sent Him. This shows at once and conclusively (however men have ingenuously attempted to evade it) that it cannot be applied to the Papacy, which, whatever un-Christian (i.e. practical denial) may attach to it, never denied the Father and the Son, but acknowledges both in its confession of faith, and promulgates its decrees in their name. Here we have not simply an indirect denial of truths pertaining to them, but a plain, open, unblushing denial of their authority, and of allegiance to them. It is Infidelity in its highest phase. Again he says, 1 John 4 : 3 : "Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God : and this is that spirit of Antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come, and even now already is it in the world." Keeping in view what the ancients meant by "the Christ" (viz., the Theocratic ordering of Jesus, Prop. 205), we have here a refusal to acknowledge that Jesus as "the Christ," i.e. the covenanted David's Son, had come in His First Advent in humanity. It is a total rejection of the claims of Jesus to the Messiahship grounded upon disbelief in His incarnation; a spirit which was already exhibited in John's time.' But again John teaches, 2 John 7 : "Many deceivers are entered into the world who confess not that Jesus Christ is come" (Gr. is coming, or who cometh, so many writers have instanced, Lange's Com. loci, etc.) "in the flesh. This is a (or the) deceiver and an (or the) Antichrist." This is declarative not only of a denial of the humanity of Jesus Christ, but that He will again come as the Son of man and the Christ.* If we turn to the Apoc., John gives us, among other things, the following characteristics. He is to be a blasphemer (Rev. 13 : 5, 6, taking the Scriptural sense of blasphemy, viz., to say, claim and do that which properly belongs to God); an object of worship to the world (Rev. 13 : 4, 8, 12, etc.); a possessor of great military power (Rev. 13 : 4, 7, 12); a persecutor of the saints (Rev. 13 : 7) and of the Papacy (Rev. 17 : 16); and a direct hostile opposer of the Lamb (Rev. 17 : 14 and 19 : 19). In addition, we have, that he will be an eighth, but virtually seventh, head of the Roman beast (Rev. 13 : 3 and 17 : 10, 11. Comp. Prop. 160), and so intent upon establishing his power that he will slay all who will not receive his mark and tender homage to him (Rev. 13 : 15-17 and 14 : 9-13).

2. We notice now the marks given by Paul, in 2 Thess. 2 as follows : He is "the man of sin," i.e., one of pre-eminent wickedness, in whom sin culminates, being wholly and successfully devoted to it; "the Son of perdition," i.e. Judas-like he is filled with Satan, Judas-like he opposes Christ and is devoted to destruction (comp. Rev. 17 : 11), leading others (comp. Rev. 14 : 9-11) to perdition; the opposer or adversary (see comments) of God and the Christ; the Anti-God (as Chrysostom designates him; v. 4, exalting himself above all that is worshipped, etc.); the Lawless One (Coms.) centring in himself all law; a worker according to or through the energy of Satan "with power and signs, and lying wonders," etc. 3. We come to the delineation given by Daniel, chs. 7 and 11, where we have, in addition, this power related to, part of, and controlling the beast (the Roman), "speaking great words against the Most High; making war against the saints; invading Palestine, etc.; in brief, having the same arrogant and hostile last development out of the Roman Empire arrayed against the truth and God's people, and triumphing over them until deliverance comes from God. (And if we can take ch. 8 by either regarding—as many do—its fulfilment in some power (as e.g. Mohammedanism) as typical, or by making—as others—the little horn the Roman Empire succeeding to the Grecian, then other traits could be added, as being "a king of fierce countenance and understanding dark sentences," who "shall destroy wonderfully," cause "craft to prosper," and shall "stand up against the Prince of princes." Here he is said to be "broken without hand," i.e. by supernatural power, direct divine agency, as in Rev. 19, 2 Thess. 2, by Jesus Christ and His armies.)" 4. Allusions and descriptions are to be found in other Scriptures. Thus in Ps. 10 : 18 he is called "the man of the earth" and in Ps. 9 the "man" (e.g. Jerome applies these Ps. to Antichrist) who will be judged by God (various Psalms descriptive of a proud, wicked, overpowering "man" are quoted by the Fathers as illustrative of him, such as Ps. 109, 12, 14, 51, 52, 75, 94, 120, 140, etc., also Isa. 11 : 4; 14 : 25; 10 : 13; Hab. 2 : 5; Ezek. 38, etc.), conveying the same idea of self-exaltation, greatness of power, violence and hostility to God. As these references will be alluded to under a following observation, it will be sufficient to observe that the distinctive marks of the Antichrist, as presented by the Spirit, are (1) the last and great adversary of God and Christ; (2) the development of infidelity so that it results in a denial of Father and Son, both as it relates to their authority and redemptive work; (3) the denial of the Messiahship of Jesus based upon that of His having come in humanity; (4) the denial of the Theocratic position of Jesus, founded upon that He will not come again in humanity (i.e. as "Son of man"); (5) the retention of a religious element, which causes him to become the object of general worship; (6) the claimer of attributes and honor belonging to God; (7) the blasphemer by way of eminence, exceeding all that has hitherto transpired, being lawless and actuated by Satan, etc; (8) the most astounding capacity and success in obtaining adherents; (9) the obtainer of vast power over the nations; (10) the leader of ten subordinate powers; (11) the eulogized head of a sustaining power; (12) the persecutor of the believers; (13) the overthrower of the whore; (14) the slayer of all who will not worship him; (15) the performer of signs and lying wonders; (16) the direct antagonist of "the King" at His Coming; (17) and finally, the last head or controlling polity arising out of the revived fourth beast or Roman Empire. No wonder that he who humbly receives the Word contemplates such characteristics with astonishment and dread; and that, when locating this Antichrist still in the future (where undoubtedly the Scriptures place it), he regards this a subject well worthy of the closest attention and study.<sup>4</sup>

ing from "the Christship" of Jesus, is in so far aiding in the development of this spirit, or, to say the least, giving it ground for resistance.

<sup>2</sup> This should also be a caution to a certain class of believers who, with an evident desire to honor "the Christ" unconsciously and with a Gnostic element of opposition to matter, strip Jesus, the Messiah, of all humanity by a process of spiritualizing, so that when He comes again, it is not as the Son of Man, but as a purely spiritual being stripped of all human relationship. The Messiah that they present is not recognizable by covenant or prediction. While not denying His coming, they do deny the personality—as covenanted and predicted—of the Christ. (Comp. Props. 200 and 204.)

<sup>3</sup> We make Dan. 8 to be corroborative to Dan. 7, etc., and find the power of this Antichrist made mighty by the means stated Rev. 13 : 2 ; 16 : 13, 14 ; 17 : 12, 13 ; 19 : 19. His persecution of the Jewish nation is directly stated in these predictions (and in the 70 weeks) as a special characteristic, which must not be overlooked.

<sup>4</sup> History points to monsters of cruelty, like Rodrigo Borgia (Pope Alexander VI.), his son Cæsar, and others, but famous as these are in the annals of infamy, this Antichrist, setting aside and overriding all law, will be still more abominable in his deeds. Owing to his power being greater, the effects of his sinfulness will be more extended, and his victims more numerous. Sin, the greatest and most revolting, will culminate in his life and actions. When we consider the fulness of transgression is still future, and that the corresponding energetic indignation of God is to be still manifested, the fearfulness of this may be partly realized by looking at the past transgressions of the nations and God's past indignation providentially expressed : the former exhibited in oppression, persecution, and cruelty almost incredible, and the latter in judgments the most terrible ; and yet all these lack the fulness of wickedness and vengeance which is yet to come : the former in Antichrist and the False Prophet, and the latter in the dreadful last plagues, the vials of an insulted God. Notwithstanding all this so faithfully portrayed by inspiration, many men persistently close their minds and hearts to such warnings ! Yea more, they make them even the subject of jest and scoffing ! But jesting lips and scoffing hearts will tremble and quake with fear when the predicted vengeance comes. God has declared it, and we believe Him.

Obs. 11. When shall this Antichrist be revealed ? This is a question of great importance, seeing the tremendous issues pertaining to His advent. The Spirit has not left us without testimony on this point ; for while teaching us that the spirit of Antichrist from the days of the Apostolic Church has been in the world, and that all who corrupt the truth and oppose Christ (especially those great powers in a corrupted church, and beside it all that do this) deserve the reproachful name, He also directs us to the one great personal Antichrist, in whom wickedness shall culminate, and plainly tells us that the time of His coming is before the open revelation of Jesus Christ from heaven. It is this Antichrist, with his confederated forces, that makes war with the King at His Coming and is overthrown by Him, a point so clear (Prop. 123), and almost universally held, that it requires no additional notice. This Antichrist is the last head of the fourth Kingdom, the Roman, which when again revived (Prop. 160) persecutes the saints, brings in the fearful tribulation, and makes war with the Lamb. And notice that in Rev. 14, the time of His gigantic power, cruel persecution and worship follows the resurrection and translation of the chosen 144,000, the renewed proclamation of God's predictions and the fall of the Papal power (and State churches, etc). Antichrist, therefore, however developed previously, succeeds the first stage (Props. 130, 166, 174) of the Sec. Advent and the removal of a select body of saints, and flourishes in all his might, fierceness, and self-deification between the two stages of the Sec. Advent.

Let the student ponder this statement, because it sets aside a large number of erroneous interpretations and applications. This will be developed as we proceed. Seiss (Last Times), Brookes (Maranatha), Reineke, Newton, and many others of American and European prophetic writers take this view, which is most decidedly in accord with prediction and the order laid down by the Spirit.

Obs. 12. Before the Antichrist is revealed something which hinders or prevents (2 Thess. 2 : 6, 7) his manifestation must be removed. We have already shown (Prop. 160, and see Prop. on Translation 130, Obs. 8) how utterly untenable the prevailing theories on the subject are. The removal of the Roman power (so Chrysostom, Jerome, and many others) is not meant, because he (Antichrist) rises out of and forms the controlling part of the fourth beast (it is not even applicable to the case of Papacy, to which it is usually applied, seeing that the Papacy, as taught in Rev. 17, is supported and elevated by the Roman Empire); and that it cannot mean (as Bell, Seiss, etc.) the withdrawal of the Holy Spirit, both on account of the use of the neuter form of the word indicative of that which withholdeth, and from the predicted fact that the Spirit will sustain (not being withdrawn) the multitude of martyrs who die under the Antichristian persecution. The later opinion of some (Ellicott, Alford, etc.) that the reference in the neuter form is to the restraining influence of human law wielded by the Roman Empire and then by other succeeding governments, thus in the latter form (i.e. as a State or States) meeting the masculine form of the phraseology. This view overlooks that this Antichrist springs out of the Roman Empire revived, and that human law, i.e. the laws derived from and under a civil compact, will, in so far as he also represents a polity, be in full force. He, in fact, regulates society in all its relations by the enactment of law, made, indeed, to suit his ambition, but still the continued regulations of a civil polity.<sup>1</sup> After carefully considering the views hitherto given and the fact, stated in the previous Obs., that the chosen, elect number of saints (symbolized by the 144,000) are first removed, taken away before the revelation of Antichrist occurs, we find no better interpretation for this difficult passage than that suggestive one of Theodoret and Theodore of Mopsuestia (Smith's Bib. Dic., "Antichrist"), which gives a clue to a consistent one sustained by fact. It suggests (from their making that which withholdeth the determination, purpose, decree of God) that the Divine Purpose of God, relating to the number of these elect, chosen ones, must first be fulfilled (thus meeting the neuter form), and that this elect-body must be removed; He who restrains (the Divine Purposer), or the election (thus represented and considered in its corporate capacity) hindering until the predetermined number is completed and taken away—the masculine form being met by an allusion to Him who, by His Purpose in this direction, restrains the coming of Antichrist, or by a reference to the election itself resulting from the Purpose of God, keeping back this mighty evil until its removal as predicted. Passing by several conjectures (such as that the withholding power was Paul, or his supplication, or the apostles, or the prayers of Christians, or Elijah, etc.) as wholly unsustainable,<sup>2</sup> we may upon this obscure passage additionally suggest as favorable to the view presented by us, that evidently that which withholdeth continues to withhold down to the present day, seeing that the personal Antichrist is not yet revealed. Besides this, it preserves the idea, mentioned by some (Lange, Olshausen, etc.), that this withholding is to be regarded as "beneficent" and is performed by a "beneficent power" (which our view embraces) without making "the Roman Empire and the Roman Emperor presented in another relation, viz., its beneficent aspect" (so Olshausen) over against the express delineations of the fourth beast by Daniel and John as the reverse of beneficent through all its heads, culminating in the last one. To make, as Olshausen and others, the emperors types of Antichrist and then in their official position the (masculine) restraining power is, as Lange asserts, "too refined and artificial," and it may be added opposed to the impregnable position (Prop. 160) that it is really one of the last, the last, Rulers of the revived, but modified, Roman Empire (because it is to exist, with one or two periods of non-existence particularly asserted to avoid misapprehension, down to the Sec. Advent) who becomes the predicted Antichrist. (Comp. Prop. 130, Obs. 8.)

<sup>1</sup> Guinness in Approaching End revives the old opinion that the Roman Empire is the hindering cause; Olshausen makes it "the moral and conservative influence of political states;" Alford, "the fabric of human polity as a coercive power;" Fausset, "civil polity;" Lange (Herzog's Ency. art. Antich.), "the moral or ethical spirit of the states—life, —the state in its highest meaning;" Ellicott, "the restraining power of human law in the Roman Empire;" M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop. art. Antichrist, "the Roman Empire; Roos, who recognizes a single person, makes it the Imperial rule seized by the last Pope; Schneckenburger, "the Imperial power of Rome as the binding head of the polity;" (the Rationalistic interpretation which applies it to this or that emperor, or the Jews, etc., we pass by as needing no references); (so we need not comment on such views as Koppe's—that it is Paul and his intercession—or Diedrich's—the Apostles generally and their work—or Calvin's—the proclamation of the Gospel—or Schöttgen's—the intercessory Church—or Ewald's—coming and removal—etc.); all such evidently seeking a meaning opposed to the unity of prediction. On the other hand Dr. Tyng (He Will Come, p. 146), Brookes (Marantha, p. 191), Lincoln (Lects. on Epistles of St. John, p. 68), and many others, make that which hindereth or restraineth to be "the Holy Ghost." A writer in the Truth, vol. 3, on "The Glorious Appearing," says, that the Spirit is the One that hinders, and that when the Church is taken away, the Spirit no longer restrains. But as we have shown, this takes it for granted that no Church and no Spirit to convert, etc., then exists, which violates the order laid down e.g. in Rev. 14. De Burgh (quoted by Fausset) makes it "the elect Church and the Spirit," both of which, however, bear testimony to the truth during the tribulation as evidenced by the number of the martyrs. Even the extraordinary manifestations of the Spirit, as evinced in the supernatural (e.g. Rev. 11) and in resurrecting power (e.g. Rev. 20), are not withdrawn. We are forced, therefore, to adopt as the most consistent view that the neuter form (katechōn) refers to the divine purpose relating to the gathering out of the first-fruits (which we know is to be antecedently realized), and that the masculine form (katechon) refers to the body of the first-fruits taken away.

<sup>2</sup> Another, however, may be specified being advocated (Lange's Com. 2 Thess. 2) by Hofman, Luthardt, Baumgarten, Auberlen, Von Oettingen, viz., that it is an angel prince (similar to the one mentioned Dan. 10 : 5, 13, 20), active in the assize of worldly affairs that withholds or restrains. This view while not meeting the neuter form but only the masculine, yet might, as the Agent by which the Divine Purpose is sustained and carried out, be incorporated with the one presented in the text.

Obs. 13. A few remarks pertaining to the special partner of Antichrist, viz., the second beast of Rev. 13 : 11–18, are in place. This false prophet materially aids in exalting and enforcing the authority of the last head of the first beast, and hence deserves our attention. Briefly, it may be said that as the last head of the revived Roman power (the first beast) is still future, so also is this second beast, seeing that all his acts, policy, etc., is directed to sustaining the last head of the first beast, and therefore falls in with the period presented in Rev. 14, viz., after the removal of the 144,000, the renewed proclamation of coming judgments, and the fall of Babylon, and continues to co-operate with this last head down to their co-joined overthrow, Rev. 19 : 19, 20. Being also a beast, he, like the other beast, represents a polity (one, too, having a twofold power symbolized by the horns);

and yet attention is evidently called to one person, the representative or head of this polity, who as "the false prophet" assists the personal Antichrist and meets with his doom. This prophet is not the Antichrist himself, as many have supposed, because he is not the one that is the leader, or that is worshipped, but occupies a subordinate position under the last head of the beast, and aids in causing him to be worshipped. (This is so plainly stated, that any other view is untenable.) This false prophet is, therefore, also not the Papacy, an interpretation adopted by many, even able, writers. The time (see above) when he arises, the subordination to the Antichrist, the activity in causing all to worship the last revived head (and the Papacy instead of being active in causing worship to the Empire, endeavored to divert such honor and worship to itself<sup>1</sup>), and especially in view of the extraordinary power and manifestations of this second beast after the downfall of Babylon (or the Papacy), it is impossible, consistently with the chronological position of the beast and its acts in behalf of the restored last head of the first beast, to apply it to the Papacy (unless inchoately). It refers to a power still future, and which, as to its origin, from whence it will arise, is open to conjecture. Taking the symbolical language into consideration, we can only say this: that if the first beast arose out of the sea, i.e. out of the convulsions of the nations, the rising of the second one "out of the earth," indicates either his arising out of an empire or Kingdom having a more established form of government (so Lord, and others), or out of the Roman earth or Empire (so Faber, etc.), or out of the territorial limits of a Kingdom already established, or arising out of republicanism, etc. When compared with other phraseology, it somehow impresses us with the idea that it springs from a popular and general desire of the multitudes of a settled government pervaded by apostasy, which, now that the established forms of religion are overthrown, cannot free itself entirely from what the Creator has indelibly implanted in man, viz., a religious feeling. Hence this beast arises as the director of worship, to meet a felt and acknowledged want, but, rejecting the Father and the Son, turns man into a public worshipper, under severe penalties, of a self-deified humanity. Disdaining as foolishness the Redemptive process by which God becomes man to reach and embrace humanity in salvation, it, as an expression of human wisdom, seeks for Redemption in making out man to be God; thus seeking its highest good in man, and giving at the final end the most palpable proof that the often ridiculed temptation and fall in Eden is verified in terrible expressiveness. While it is idle to conjecture in what way or in what particular locality he will arise, yet God has given us a sufficiency to fully identify him when he does come. The outlines indicate a power not only devoted to the interests of a Humanitarian religion, but concentrating and enforcing the worship of such a religion in the person of the last head of the first beast. He is the chief miracle worker (Meyrick, art. "Antichrist," Smith's Bib. Dic., overlooks e.g. Rev. 16 : 13, 14, when he says that miracle working is not attributed to the first beast) in behalf of the first beast, exerts the power of the first beast in his presence, deceives the masses by his miracles, erects image worship in laudation of the Antichrist, and causes all to be killed who refuse such worship.<sup>2</sup>

right hand or on the forehead, cannot be consistently applied to the past. So also its application to Mohammedanism must be rejected as untenable, for the simple reason—if many others did not exist—that Mohammedanism has always been a bitter, hating enemy of the first beast or Roman Empire, and instead of being a subordinate co-worker has dealt the most fatal blows to it in the past.

* Several additional things may be briefly noticed in this connection. (1) The Dragon. In Rev. 13 : 2, 4, and 16 : 13, he is mentioned as also a party in arousing the last confederation, but what is remarkable in Rev. 19 in the overthrow of the confederacy the beast and false prophet are alone mentioned and afterward separately the fate of the Dragon, Rev. 20. The most difficult problem, to the writer, is the giving an interpretation to the Dragon that shall not violate the chronological order, the symbolical language, and the continuation of the Roman Empire as given by Daniel. The leading interpretations are all open to the most serious objections. Thus e.g. (1) it will not answer to say that the Dragon denotes Satan personally. However much the latter may inspire the former, yet the description of the Dragon with heads, horns, and crowns, the bestowal of his throne and power to the beast, the worship tendered to him, the cojoining directly with other powers on earth, the defeat attributed to him, etc., is language expressive of, and can only be predicated of, an earthly power. This is admitted even by those who think that Satan is denoted, so that some make it both, which is inconsistent. This Dragon denotes some great earthly power or kingdom; and the names Dragon and Satan are applicable even as Pharaoh is called a great dragon, and an adversary a Satan. The interpreter should maintain a firm position here; having found this Dragon to symbolize an empire or kingdom, consistency requires that he should preserve such an interpretation unimpaired throughout the entire prediction. (2) It cannot be made to mean Paganism or the Pagan Roman Empire because the Dragon exists down to the Millennial age, and bestows upon the Antichrist its throne and power, which cannot be said of Paganism nor of the Pagan form of the Empire (the seven heads, too, including the professedly Christianized forms). Besides this, the identity of this Dragon with Daniel's fourth beast, as noticed by numerous writers, is too marked to allow its being thus contracted to a special phase or form of the Empire. (3) It is not allowable for the same reason to make the Dragon the representative of the unfaithful members of the Church, since it is representative of the Roman Empire or its rulers, five heads of which were fallen before the Christian Church was organized. (4) It is not the Papacy, because the Papacy instead of having these heads and horns was supported by the beast or dragon having (Rev. 17) them, and the Papacy is utterly destroyed by its supporter while the Dragon still continues. (5) It is not opposition to God's authority personified, because the symbolical language directs us with too much preciseness to some power intended as actually existing during the period designated, and such a view is inconsistent with the falling of this Dragon, etc., without a diminution of opposition. (6) For the reasons assigned it cannot be representative of State churches, or of the Union of State and Church, or of Mohammedanism, or of the Greek Church. None of these meet the conditions imposed by the language. The remarks that we now make are merely suggestive and not presented as a positive elucidation of the difficulty of reconciling the prophetic picture presented by Daniel's fourth beast ch. 7, the Dragon Rev. 12, the first beast Rev. 13, and the beast of Rev. 17. The key, we apprehend will be found in regarding these beasts all descriptive of the same Roman Empire under its varied aspects, and hence with some variations in the portrayal, and yet sufficiently distinctive for the purpose of identification. Let the reader carefully notice these particulars. In Daniel the fourth beast is given and then there is a transition to the little horn which springs out of it, forms the controlling element, and is, although diverse in some respects, therefore designated as the beast (in its last form or manifestation Dan. 7 : 11, 26) that is overcome and destroyed. This prepares us then to anticipate a great and radical change in the beast himself. Next, the Dragon of Rev. 12, continues down in a certain distinguishable line until it reaches the definite allotted period of time, times and a half time, (during which the personal Antichrist is to exercise power, (Rev. 13), when just preceding it, there is a remarkable change in the ruling power, a descending from "the heavnlies," the imperial rule to a kind of popular, republican, or democratic rule as the phrase casting into the earth (i.e. being supported, upheld by the popular suffrages, etc.), may denote.* This specific period is still future, whatever inchoate fulfilments interpreters

* We think that Lord (Apoc.), and others, are correct, when they make the mixture of iron and clay, and the intermixing with themselves of the seed of men, not to denote the intermixture of Gothic tribes, etc., and the intermarriage of royal families; but that the

may have engrafted upon it, seeing that it is the time predetermined for the last head of the beast. What the Dragon performs after its fall is done through this last head to whom it gives, Rev. 13 : 2, yields up "his power and seat and authority," and which makes war. Then follows Rev. 13 : 1-10, in which this change already intimated comes forth with greater distinctness, so great and vital in fact that it might be almost denominated another beast, but to guard us against such a view the Spirit takes up the same beast and shows us that under the last head (as we find by comparing with Rev. 17 : 10, 11), there shall be a revival of the beast from a state of non-existence (a headless state) but in such a form that it loses its Dragon rulership aspect and is presented in another, more popular and attractive one, still retaining, however, the power, etc. of the Dragon. The Dragon aspect is really the foundation of the last head's rulership, only that instead of an Imperial rulership (as exhibited in the past) this is far more viz., an Imperial by popular choice elevated to the position of a man-God, the sole object of worship under the penalty of death. The state of this last head is so peculiar, so far in advance of all preceding, so striking in its manner of rising up, and in its claims, that it well deserves to be distinguished from all that preceded, and yet, its true virtual relationship to the same beast be preserved. This therefore is more definitely done in Rev. 17, where we have this same beast represented as the supporter of the Papacy (and this history most abundantly supports, see Com. and writers on this point), and then afterward, after a period of non-existence, this same identical beast is to be revived and is the one, under its last head that goeth into perdition (the same that the world wonders at Rev. 13 : 8 comp. with Rev. 17 : 8, thus teaching us at what period this is to transpire). But more than this, the Spirit indicates a marvellous transformation in the beast when he says "the beast that was and is not, even he is the eighth" (the head still called the beast however much changed) "and is of the seven and goeth into perdition," i.e., great as the transformation from the former head this last one is, so that it may be called a separate, distinct eighth head, yet it virtually grows out of and is supported by the seventh head. Our decided impression is, so far as a comparison of Scripture teaches us, and after a careful consideration of various interpretations, that the Spirit wishes to show us that the Roman Empire sustains this Dragon aspect down to this eighth head, at which time such a fearful change will be made in the form of rulership that the ordinary civil aspect continued down to that time falls completely in the background and yet is, as to the claimed rights of government, appealed to and virtually forms the basis of Antichrist's claims to civil government. The language therefore of Rev. 20 : 1-3, we must regard as symbolical. Antichrist, the personal one, being overpowered and the confederation destroyed, we have "the beast" (viz., the personal head of the beast, comp. Rev. 17 : 11 also called the beast) and the "false prophet" taken and cast into the lake of fire. The personal head, culminated into the great Antichrist, being thus removed there remains the shattered remnant of the beast, the civil government without those Antichristian claims, and even this, in virtue of the Theocratic rule now to be introduced by the Messiah, is now also to be subverted, so that not only Antichrist's most arrogant rule but even the accustomed Dragon rule is to be discontinued under the reign of Christ and His saints. This is symbolically represented. The angel (like the angels of Rev. 14 : 6, 8, 9) is the representation of a chosen body (most probably the 144,000) under whose auspices this shall be done, viz., they shall so restrain and confirm it that it shall exercise no power over the nations. (Perhaps Zech. 5 : 5-11, if we take the being wakened "as a man that is wakened out of his sleep" as an intimation that the events following are to be witnessed after his resurrection, may give us a clue to the place of confinement.) The objections that may be derived from the words "devil and Satan" have no force provided we allow that such opposing, hostile powers can be styled such as Scripture testifies, and that this by no means forbids but actually invites the opinion clay and the seed of men symbolize the people as a body, i.e. the common people apart from the rulers and therefore the admixture of the clay and the seed of men with the other denotes "the admission of the people to a share in the power and functions of the government," the result being a certain weakness arising from clashing interests. It certainly is remarkable that precisely such a leavening is working among the nations of the Roman earth, so that there has been even a mingling of suffrage with Imperialism. Such indications show us how, in some respects, this last head may be so diverse from all preceding that it may be designated by a separate head or form. Hence eminent writers (as e.g. Lange, Herzog's Ency., art. "Antich.") think that the culminated Antichrist will arise from a coalition of consummated Absolutism and Radicalism; or, as others, from a union of Imperialism and Democracy, or a Cæsaro-Republicanism.

that because of Satan they become such adversaries. As to "the bottomless pit" or "abyss" it is sufficient to refer the reader to the comments of writers on Rev. 9 : 1, 2, and simple consistency requires that when once the symbolical meaning of "the abyss" has been obtained to preserve it throughout. There is only one passage, so difficult of interpretation that but few preserve even the shadow of consistency in its explanation, that we cannot explain satisfactorily with this view, and we thus give it with the hope that some one may arise who shall be able to interpret it. We refer to Rev. 16 : 13, where the Dragon, the Beast, and the False Prophet appear to be represented as existing contemporaneously. The only possible way in which it can be incorporated in the view presented, is to suppose that when the Dragon is cast down, i. e., the seventh head, (for as we have seen a head can be called the beast and the beast a head, and so a head may be called the Dragon, etc.), it descends from its Imperial position and occupies during the ascendancy of virtually an eighth head, above it and controlling it, a subsidiary position. If it be objected that two heads cannot exist at the same time without special mention it may be alleged that this is perhaps the reason of that remarkable hesitancy in Rev. 17 : 11 to call in another head, and of that revival of a head in healing its deadly wound Rev. 13 : 3. At least we do not fall into the confusion that abounds on Rev. 16 : 13, making one or the other of these three a power that is fallen before the end, or of making the Dragon the Eastern Roman Empire and the beast the Western which violates the unity of the heads, etc. Such is the difficulty pertaining to this point, that in all probability time must determine the correctness of interpretation. 2. Next, the number of his name, 666, still pertains to the future, this is the number of the first beast and not of the second, thus again showing, against various interpretations, that the last head of the first beast is the Antichrist, and this number is evidently contained, as suggested by commentators in the numerical value of the letters of his name or title. Among all those hitherto presented as possible, the old one of Irenæus seems to be the favorite one, viz., that of Luteinos. Time alone will reveal what the number really is, and it will be understood by the wise and believing owing to its numerical value. The student will find suggested names in Smith's Bib. Dic., art. "Antichrist," Calmet do., Prof. Stuart, Com. Rev., Barnes, do., Faber's Diss., Elliott's Horæ Apoc., Lord's Apoc., etc., etc. 3. The image that was made to the first beast (again manifesting that the last head of this beast is the Antichrist), and causing the image to speak and issue authoritative commands is also future, and it may be premature to say what is denoted by it. The fact that the image itself is to be worshipped indicates that it forms, whatever it may be, an object of idolatrous worship. Faber and others may be correct when they deem it significant of actual idol worship. If the language is symbolical then it denotes something under the image that exists in connection with the first beast (some authoritative power co-operating, as councils, etc., under a leadership) but if to be understood literally, then idol worship is evidently meant. The latter conclusion is not to be rejected as unwarranted by the advance of civilization, seeing that other passages intimate such a return to image worship (Obs. fol.), and that we have indications even now that men of intelligence are not far removed from the same. (Thus, e. g. Gordon in Threefold Test, and Baxter in Louis Napoleon), narrate how Spear (1852) and other Spiritualists endeavored to construct the image of a man at the High Rock, Lynn, Mass., with vocal apparatus which was to be manipulated by the spirits and form the grand medium of communications. It was to form "the great Spiritual Revelation of the Age," "Heaven's last best Gift to man," etc., but it failed to meet expectations and nothing more is heard of it. This incident is suggestive, showing how, when the time is fully come, men may under some such plea succeed in palming off image worship—as a link between him and the spiritual—upon the masses.) Its symbolical or literal nature will be manifested in due time, and sufficient is revealed to cause its recognition in either case. 4. In reference to the two witnesses who are also embraced (Rev. 11) in this time, times and a half (as indicated by comparison of the predictions) of Antichrist's great power, and are killed by him (comp. v. 7 with Rev. 13), it is scarcely necessary to pass over the opinions respecting them (see Bib. Dic., coms., Proph. writers). Being also still future, it is impossible to definitely determine who they are. The opinion so prevalent that it will be Elijah and some other prophet is exceeding harsh and inconclusive (for we cannot believe that one translated to glory shall come to experience death). The likening of them to "two olive trees" and "two candlesticks" rather directs us to conceive of them as two churches, classes, or bodies of men standing related to the Divine truth and testifying in its favor. These, whoever they denote, are specially raised up and favored at this period until finally they are overcome, followed by a resurrection, thus directing us, in all probability, to two classes of the martyrs who thus die for their witnessing and refusing the mark and worship of the beast. Some characteristics must, in the way of proclamation (as e.g. Rev. 13 : 6-9) and resistance to the beast, distinguish them, or else, as others suggest, the number two is to be taken in the sense of completeness, a sufficiency of testimony to establish the truth (which seems however scarcely allowable by the reiteration of the two in trees and candlesticks). 5. In what "temple of God" does he (the Antichrist, 2 Thess. 2) sit? Much has been written on this point, some taking the ground that he sat in the temple of God at Jerusalem (as e.g. the Romans, forgetting that the temple was burnt and no such exhibition took place etc.); or that this temple will be rebuilt by the Jews at the time of the end and be occupied by the Antichrist (but such a building by the Jews would not make it the temple of God any more (less) than the churches erected in God's name and including the worship of Jesus) or that, as the Church is the temple, he arrogates to himself the power of lording it over the Christian Church (but this overlooks the predicted fact that instead of being in the Christian Church he is hostile to it, attacks, and overcomes it). What then does the temple of God mean? The key is found in the added language : " showing himself that he is God ;" that is, just as he professes to be God but is not, so he professes (as a God) to sit in the temple of God, which, however, is really no temple of God as he is no God. The phrase temple of God is thus employed as the most expressive to indicate the worship (associated with the idea of a temple) which he claims, as explained, as God and points out that as an opposer of Christ, he also as one that is worshipped professes to occupy the temple of God. The phraseology is therefore simply descriptive of the false and arrogant claims of the Antichrist and not to be allowed by us. It is illustrative of his success in constituting himself the object of religious reverence and adoration. 6. We repeat in this connection, that the ten (not "many" as Falke, etc.), kingdoms are also yet future. They are associated with and support this last head of the beast, this personal Antichrist, and at some period three of them (a mark of recognition for the time to come) shall be uprooted (Dan. 7), leaving seven remaining. Before this uprooting it is asserted that the ten horns together with the beast shall destroy the harlot woman (Rev. 17 : 16). It would be premature and presumptuous to designate those kingdoms, seeing that the number only is given without particularizing.* 7. In the text we have repeatedly taken it for granted that the Papacy is represented to us by the Babylon of Rev. 17. A few remarks may be added by way of enforcing such an interpretation. A host of able writers and coms. have fully identified the Beast of Rev. 17 with the fourth Beast of Daniel 7, viz., the Roman Empire, and have also shown that the harlot symbolizes a corrupted, apostatizing Church. Those two points are impregnable, and it follows that this Roman Empire is portrayed to us as supporting a corrupt Church. Now history gives us the fulfilment of particulars, so minutely and accurately, in that of the Roman Empire and the Papacy, that the student carefully weighing the evidence must acknowledge a sad but unmistakable fulfilment, which no theorizing (such as Arnold's making Rome the type of the world in his Interp. of Proph., etc.) can set aside. We have all the decisive marks in the Papacy, such as, its being fostered and elevated into power by the aid extended by the Roman Emperors, the nations it influenced, the kings it led into corrupting ways, the vast control over the inhabitants of the earth by its spiritual * Writers who insist that the ten horns arose about the 5th century and continue down although changed to others, take an unwarranted liberty with the prophecy, although claiming (as e.g. Thomas in Epis Israel, p. 291) that the prediction does not require the ten originally established, but simply ten when the image is smitten. But this is essentially modifying the prophecy, for by adopting its principle we might take the liberty of changing the beasts themselves. It is an interpretation made to suit a theory. Dan. 2 and 7 and Rev. 17 say not that the ten horns are to arise and give place to other ten, and this successively, and then finally to come out ten again at the smiting, but ten arise and these same ten thus arisen, assail the harlot and destroy her, etc. Again, on this theory, so popular with many, in order to make out the Papacy to be the Antichrist, we would find, on account of the changes and succession of kingdoms not ten but over fifty or sixty horns or toes. Again, if the ten kingdoms arose in the fifth cent. as such writers assert, then the image is disproportionate as to time, for the toes endure longer than the feet or legs, thus occupying the most conspicuous portion of the image. Now the Spirit seeks homogeneity in its figures and fulfilment, and, therefore, in Rev. 17 the toes or horns are limited to one hour or a brief period of time, and not, as these interpreters claim, extending over thirteen centuries. Again, these horns that arise are to hate and destroy the harlot, but the horns that these writers enumerate, have in the past, sustained and built up the Papacy.

fornication, its representatives arrayed in purple, scarlet, gold, etc., its fearful blood-guiltiness in slaying "the martyrs of Jesus," the location assigned to the woman and the identification with "that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth." These, and others, are so conclusive that there can be no hesitancy in maintaining, with the multitude of expositors, that the Papacy is denoted and that it is called Babylon because of its being the head (as ancient Babylon) of a powerful corrupting organization, etc. The reader is referred to commentaries and prophetic writers for an abundance of illustrations establishing such an exposition; out of the multitude, we select one, as evincing the contrast between what the Spirit says and what the woman says, (taken from Bengel's Gnomon, vol. 5, p. 343 and quoted from the Indiction for a Jubilee given by Benedict XIII., A.D. 1725): "To this holy city, illustrious with the memory of so many holy martyrs, and especially instructed in the doctrine of the blessed apostles, the princes of the Church, and hallowed with their glorious blood, flock together with religious eagerness of mind. Hasten to the place which God hath chosen; ascend to this New Jerusalem, whence from the very beginning of the infant Church the law of the Lord and the light of evangelical truth has flowed forth to all nations. (Hasten to) a city honored with so many and so great benefits, loaded with so many gifts, that it is most deservedly called the city of priests and kings, built for the guide of ages, the city of the Lord, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel. Here in truth make confession unto God in the great assembly, praise Him among much people. Inasmuch as this very Catholic and Apostolic Roman Church, constituted the Head of the World, by the sacred seat of the blessed Peter, is the mother of all believers, the faithful interpreter of the Divinity, and the mistress of all churches. Here the unsullied deposit of the faith, here the fountain of sacerdotal unity, here the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, and the supreme power of binding and loosing, here, finally, that inexhaustible treasure of the sacred indulgences of the Church, of which the Roman Pontiff is the dispenser, is guarded."* But it must be added, that one clause in this prediction extends over the Church or churches wherever corrupted, viz., that this Babylon is "the Mother of harlots," the chief or leader in apostatizing, and that other harlots, on a smaller scale and not so distinctively marked as great, leading powers, exist outside of her communion, imitating her spirit and corruptions. What these daughters are, it is, perhaps, impossible to particularize, and yet history with its unsparring testimony does teach us that even in Protestantism the spirit of the Mother has too often manifested itself in enforcing legalized doctrines, in persecuting, etc.; the same exclusiveness and arrogance extending even to the most numerically small sects. This is a sad but alas too true portraiture, of the past and the present. † 8. The Gog and

* We direct attention to a wonderful admission made by a Roman Catholic, Bh. Walmsley in his Exp. of the Apoc., p. 127, (quoted by Brooks, p. 346, Ap. to El. Proph. Interp.), who, while trying to save Papal Rome, admits that Rome is denoted, calling it however "Pagan Rome." Thus: "This same woman is further said to carry on her forehead the following inscription: A Mystery: Babylon, the great, the mother of the fornications, and the abominations of the earth. Here is a mystery, or an enigma to be unravelled, viz., Babylon, the great, the fornications, and the abominations of the earth. The reader, we apprehend, is already prepared in great measure for the solving of this enigma. Babylon the great, is the great Imperial city of Pagan Rome. And she is the Woman, as we have just shown, who is the mother of the fornications and abominations of the earth. This is the explanation of the proposed mystery. But to make it more clear, that by Babylon the great is here meant idolatrous Rome, we appeal to the angel's words: "The Woman which thou sawest is the great city which hath kingdom over the kings of the earth, which, as we have before observed, plainly points out the great ancient city of Rome, that domineered over the greatest part of the kingdoms of the then known world. The woman therefore is the image of that city, and in the inscription on her forehead she is styled, Babylon the great; consequently Babylon the great is here the same as the city of Rome. In the primitive ages this figurative name of Babylon was frequently given heathen Rome by the Christians, on account of the resemblance of the character of those two cities, for their idolatry and for their oppressing—one the Jews; the other the Christians. St. Peter dates his first letter from Babylon (1 Pet. 5: 13), that is, from Rome as St. Jerome and Eusebius tell us. 'The appellation of Babylon (said Tertullian) is used by St. John for the city of Rome, because she resembles ancient Babylon, in the extent of her walls; in her haughtiness; on account of her dominion; and in persecuting the saints' (Lib. adv. Jud.). St. Austin also says, 'Rome is a second Babylon and a daughter of the ancient Babylon' (de Civ. lib. 22, c. 18). Babylon the great is therefore sufficiently distinguished."

Magog of Ezekiel chs. 38 and 39, are supposed by many ancient and modern writers to be descriptive of the ravages of this last, great Antichrist, and correctly so, owing to the similarity of character, invasion of Palestine, and final overthrow. The reader is referred to Bib. Dic. and Encycds. for the various opinions respecting Gog and Magog, and to proph. writers and commentators for particular applications of the same. We are only now concerned to show that the name and prediction is applicable to the last head of the beast; and that this power, delineated by the prophet may be found in the territorial limits of the Roman Empire, and not outside of it as in Russia, in the Turks, in distant Asia, etc. (1) The four kingdoms or empires are continuous to the Advent (with the exception of a non-existence or headless state of the last one for a time), but according to the theories that we oppose, another fifth kingdom under Gog and Magog is introduced previous to the Sec. Advent, which violates the chronological order. (2) The Antichrist is only found in the last development of the Roman power and hence must be found, if Gog is delineative of him, in that power, for prophecy does not contradict itself. (3) This we find even in the name, for if we allow its original application to nations in Asia, we find these same nations emigrating into and inundating the Roman Empire, and becoming so predominantly the ruling force in directing the Empire, whence it seems appropriate to reproduce it. If the name is simply symbolical or indicative of unknown enemies (called after those that were known, as Babylon is used) then it also applies even to the signification of the name "covered or hidden" or "exalted" (as given by Priest, etc., indicative of his concealed purposes, or character, dissembling, etc.), if that is to be received. The student will find, after a careful examination of authorities, that opinions entertained respecting the names given by Ezek. are based upon mere conjecture, and so far as these have any plausible foundation, are as applicable to the people who overcame and re-established the Roman Empire as to any other. If mere conjecture, without sufficient proof, is to decide the matter then against all the prevailing theories we must limit the rise etc. of Gog and Magog to that portion of Asia between the Black and Caspian seas. The real truth in the case is that they are unknown nations and that a knowledge of them can only be derived from a comparison of other Scripture which more particularly specifies and traces this Antichristian power. (4) And here we plant ourselves firmly upon Ezek. 38 : 17,* which expressly says: "Thus saith the Lord God, Art thou not he of whom I have spoken in old time by my servants the prophets of Israel, which prophesied in those days many years, that I would bring thee against them." God described this identical Antichristian power previously in olden time, but not by the name of Gog (unless we take the Sep. and Samar. versions of Balaam's Agag a name used similarly, viz., representative of an enemy) but (as comparison of previously given predictions show) under a variety of names expressive of his being a powerful adversary that shall arise in the last days. The mention of "the prophets" shows that it was generally the subject of prediction (which

thus far correct, but just so soon, whatever it may denote, as they make this Babylon an equivalent of the last Antichrist and have this Babylon to fall at the same time with him, they violate the order of prediction. A writer of ability with signature "B" in Proph. Times, vol. 7, p. 61, 64, makes out Babylon to be partly a representation of civil government and in its last phase a universal monarchy, but that this is not meant is evident from its being supported by, and finally overturned by, civil powers, and that when fallen, civil power, and in its widest extent under Antichrist, still exists.

* Hence we reject all theories which would distinguish Gog and Magog from the Antichrist. Thus e.g. Lincoln (Lects. on Rev., vol. 2, p. 137,) takes the position that Gog of Ezek. 38 and 39 is not mentioned in Rev. and is an enemy that appears in "Palestine some short while subsequent to Israel's deliverance by the interposition of the Lord of Hosts." This denial of identity with the last culminated Antichrist smitten at the Sec. Advent introduces unnecessary confusion and antagonism, as a comparison of Dan. 7, and 11, and 12; Rev. 13 and 17 plainly shows, seeing that the characteristics, invasion, and end of the one are precisely what pertain to Gog and Magog. The reason for such an inference by Lincoln, and others, is, that the description of the Jewish nation established in Palestine in unwalled villages, etc., does not fit with the theory of the interval between the two stages of the Advent being only seven years. Hence they are forced to make it later in time. We, however, make the interval not less than seventy-five years, and the seven years we date only from the time that a covenant is made by Antichrist with the Jewish nation. The interval (comp. Prop. 130, etc.), must be lengthy seeing that in it we have a renewed proclamation of the Gospel, the partial restoration of the Jews, the development of the Antichrist with the ten horns, the fall of Babylon, etc.

excuses the references in the text to him, if any are disposed to object to their number) and we cannot for a moment doubt that Daniel, who also prophesied about this time, and was specially commissioned to predict the things pertaining to this Antichristian power (as his prophecies proclaim), would omit direct mention of this Gog. We insist from the corresponding marks given, etc., that he also portrays Gog to us, not as the Russian power, or as the Turks, but as the last head of the Roman Empire in its revived state (Prop. 160, etc.). With this tracing of the Antichrist, John the Revelator accurately corresponds, and hence to make Gog a separate, distinctive Antichrist is opposed to the analogy of prophecy. Instead of confining ourselves to conjectures respecting the name, we rather take a plain prophecy, which predicts his rise out of a certain empire, and accept it as certainly descriptive of him. The only valid objection that can be urged against this position must not be based upon the names (involved in obscurity) but upon showing that the acts of this Gog, his final end etc., are not in correspondence with those attributed to the personal Antichrist. (5) This Gog has not yet appeared (for to make it applicable to the Turks, as Prof. Bush, without such a predicted overthrow and restoration of the Jewish nation etc., is to violate all prophetic propriety) and from the tenor of the prediction will not appear until a partial restoration of the Jews to their land which corresponds precisely with (Prop. 160, etc.), the revelation of this last head of the beast. (6) The marks of identity are these: a confederation formed, an invasion of Palestine, Lybia and Ethiopia also connected with him, smitten by six plagues, comes against God's ancient people the Jews (comp. Zech. 14), encamps upon and falls upon the mountains of Israel, this done through the power of God that He may be sanctified and magnified, the time specified in the latter years, the Jews shall recognize and the heathen acknowledge God's power, the fury of God against this power, the shaking, sword, rain, fire, feast, spoil, subsequent outpouring of spirit, dwelling safely, etc., all accurately correspond with what attends and follows the invasion of Palestine by this last head of the Roman beast. So many points of coincidence are amply sufficient to justify its interpretation as entirely applicable to the Antichrist of Daniel and John.* 7. The ancient opinion, before Paul and John wrote, was that the great opposer of the Messiah, the one whom the Messiah would overcome with vengeance was this Gog. (This opinion of the Jews that "at the very end of time" "Gog and Magog shall come up against Jerusalem and they shall fall by the hand of King Messiah," etc., is noticed by numerous writers as e.g. Priest's View, p. 39, Clarke's Com., vol. 3, p. 646, Mede's Works, Book 1, p. 374, B. 3, pp. 713, 751, Dr. Etheridge's Transl. of Targums, p. 430, etc.) This resulted from their combining the prophecies of Ezekiel, Daniel, Zechariah, etc., as relating to one and the same power. Now if this view so generally entertained was erroneous, then certainly the apostles when actually adverting to the same subject viz., the Anti-Messiah ought to have given us some intimation of the incorrectness of the interpretation. In place of this, they confirm the Jewish opinion by applying the destruction, etc., of this Anti-Messiah to the personal Sec. Advent (so e.g. 2 Thess. 2; Rev. 19) of Jesus Christ. 8. The mention of Gog and Magog after the thousand years seems to favor the idea that the names are, like Edom, Moab, Babylon, taken as representative of enemies. While making this allusion, we may refer to the effort made by some (as Bush, On the Mill.) to unite the overthrow of Rev. 19 before the Millennial age

* Hence the view of Purdon (Last Vials, Dec., 1865), and Reineke (Proph. Times, May, 1866), that Gog succeeds the Antichrist after some interval of time is not allowable, seeing that it violates the order of events as given by Daniel and John, both introducing the Millennial era with no second overthrow of another power. To thus distinguish and separate what the Scriptures unite destroys the unity of prophecy. The reasons assigned for such a view are readily met by the partial restoration of the Jews, that in addition to the Antichrist's hostility to the truth he also seeks for spoil, that the phrase "all of them" (upon which so much stress is laid, v. 8 and 11) does not by any means prove the restoration of all the tribes or all of the Jews, but only refers to the fact that all of those who were restored supposed themselves to be safe, etc., in brief, they are too inconclusive to set aside the common and prevailing view that the Gog and the Antichrist are the same. The latter part of the prediction shows that the restoration of "the whole house of Israel" and the blessings resulting therefrom follow this invasion of Gog. So the references to Antiochus, or the Turk, or the Pope, or Russia (in the past, e.g. Crimean war; for as to the future, we have shown under Prop. 160 how only it can be denoted, if incorporated, by conquest, as an integral part of the Roman Empire), must be discarded, seeing that nothing commensurate in fulfilment has been witnessed, and that it violates the unity of prediction. Simple consistency demands the position taken by us.

with that described after the same period as a singular and self-contradictory mode of interpretation. Who this Gog and Magog is, arising after the one thousand years, owing to the exceeding brevity of the description, we cannot determine. Conjectures abound (such as the confinement of some powers to an allotted territory during the thousand years and subsequent release, the resurrected wicked dead allowed to organize, etc.), but our subject does not require its elucidation, not being related to the Antichrist which precedes the ushering in of the Mill. Kingdom. This much, however, we can say, that whatever difficulties are connected with this last Gog, following as it does the Millennial glory, they are such which must attach themselves to any theory which accepts of a general, universal conversion of the world under the reign of the Messiah, whatever intimations of exception may be given. However inexplicable, resulting from conciseness and lack of explanation, it must be received by faith, resting assured that when the time of fulfilment comes it also will be verified. Being an event predicted by the Spirit, it does not (like the Incarnation, resurrection, etc.), depend for its accuracy upon our ability to reconcile it with our ideas of fitness or propriety but upon God's power to bring it to pass. It is one of the things which does not affect us either in this dispensation or in the one to come (for it does not injure the restored Davidic Kingdom being speedily and terribly crushed), being an event far in the distant future, so that the slightest hint is only given, it being taken for granted that before the event itself occurs we shall receive more and abundant revelation upon the subject as co-rulers with the Christ. It does not stand related to our subject because we only have to do with the course of events down to the re-establishment of the Davidic Kingdom, and to the fulfilment of the covenants and the promises based upon them. It seems to be introduced in order to teach us the enduring prosperity and perpetuity of this Kingdom, notwithstanding a still future, and the final effort of the power of evil against it, and this should be sufficient for us, resting in the consciousness produced by what has been so remarkably fulfilled in thousands of instances previously that God knows the future and makes no statements concerning it that shall not come to pass. We are not of those who would limit God's knowledge, or His ability to work, or His words as they stand recorded.*

Obs. 14. Leaving some things which this Antichrist is to perform for the following Propositions, a few things relating to him may be introduced here. The position assumed is that the apostasy—emphasized as the distinctive great apostasy—precedes and introduces the Antichrist, and this only when the last head of the fourth revived Empire is attained; a head, too, so remarkable in its claims, etc., that it deserves to be called an eighth head, and yet, in virtue of its connection with the seventh, really pertains to it. Therefore, neither the Papacy (which is the apostasy, i.e. the great one) nor the Roman Empire (however unchristian and under apostatizing influences) until down to a particular time when it changes its form as intimated in the last head, is the Antichrist (Antichrists in John's sense of "many Antichrists" they may be, but not the particularly predicted last Antichrist). For, as shown, the Papacy is destroyed by this Antichrist, and the Roman Empire does not develop it until this last, final modification takes place. Attention is called again to this point to indicate that this Antichrist is a civil head, the absolute ruler over a vast government, the Imperial Lord over an extended Empire which embraces in it subordinated but too willing civil agents. Connected with this purely civil relationship there is also the religious claim of power to direct the worship of the nations, and it is this especially which gives him the title of Antichrist. Both are combined, and it is this combination which makes Him so fearful to contemplate; the former giving him the ability to enforce the penalties relating to the latter. Now, to understand the prophecies pertaining to him, it must be allowed that the Spirit describes him under his several aspects. Thus e.g. in one place, as 2 Thess. 2, he is portrayed to us more in his religious aspect and hostility to Christ, but linking him by his overthrow through the Advent of Jesus with the virtually eighth head of the fourth beast, which has the same characteristics and fate; in another place, as Rev. 17, he is represented more in his civil aspect, who makes war with Christ and is overcome; and in still another place, as Rev. 13, he is described as combining these in himself. It is only therefore by a comparison of Scripture that we can arrive at the full description—for purposes of recognition and warning—of this gigantic power, concentrated and directed in a single person. This feature makes a regular ascending scale in his portraiture, having him first of all presented simply as a man of great wickedness (as in the Ps.), then as a powerful ruler (as in Isa.), then as identified with the fourth Empire (implied in Dan. 2 and amplified in Dan. 7. Comp. Irenæus, b. v., ch. 25), then respectively we are directed by Paul and John to additional particulars respecting his religious and civil relationship; all of which clearly and unmistakably presents us with a personage, excelling all that has ever yet been manifested in the way of arrogance and sinfulness. The picture presented is too circumstantial, and the results in the blood shed, etc., too horribly particularized for us to believe that it is overdrawn or exaggerated in the least particular. Let the world say what it will, let professed believers explain away as they may the testimony of the Spirit, yet such an Antichrist will, must come. The apostatizing does include a falling away from the truth in those who profess to be in the Church (and this history verifies in that of the Church), but this is only preliminary, preparative to the emergence of the Antichrist. The Antichrist is nowhere asserted to be even a professed member of the Christian Church (see note to preceding Obs. and (5) ); his open and unsparing hostility is too apparent to admit of it, but he is the virtually eighth head of the Roman beast, and designated as such, because in this very respect he differs from the immediate preceding head which professed to be still Christian. Yet we must ever keep in mind, as the tenor of prophecy proclaims, that he is one who knows the truth of God as it is recorded (which he opposes), but positively and obstinately rejects it, and sets up another standard for the truth. Therefore he is no heathen, in the sense of one who has never heard the Word, but is one conversant with Bible doctrine and determined upon crushing it. Keeping, therefore, in view these several aspects of the Antichrist, we are the better prepared to recognize and appreciate the Scriptures appertaining to him. Thus e.g. who else but this Antichrist is denoted (Ps. 52) in the "mighty man" (Luther : Tyrant) who "boasts himself in mischief," denies (as implied) the providence of God, deviseth mischief and deceit with his "tongue" (with "the tongue" will he prevail), loves "evil," "lying," and "devouring words ;" whom God is to "destroy," "take away," "pluck out of his dwelling place," and "root out of the land of the living ;" and of whom it shall be said : "Lo ! this is the man that made not God his strength, but trusted in the abundance of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness ?" To confine its fulfilment simply to Doeg the Edomite, is to weaken the description, impair its force and propriety, and immeasurably exalt the standing and power of Doeg. In the light of other predictions the Fathers were not mistaken when (Ps. 140) they applied "the evil man," "the violent man," "the evil speaker" or "a man of tongue," who purposes to overthrow the believer in the most insidious manner, and upon whom vengeance is denounced, to the Antichrist. The allusion (Isa. 51 : 12) to "the man that shall die" and to "the Son of man that shall be made as grass," also styled "the oppressor," is sufficiently significant when taken in its connection with the promised deliverance. Indeed, by observing that the Spirit, while not passing by the preliminary antichristian development, specially describes the culmination, as seen by the relationship it sustains to certain results (the deliverance of God's people, the restoration of the Jewish nation, the introduction of Mill. blessedness, etc.), we will find allusions, scattered here and there, which otherwise would escape the notice and comparison that they richly deserve.

* The Pre-Mill. doctrine, the covenanted Kingdom of the Messiah, etc., do not depend upon our ability to explain in detail the Gog of Rev. 20. It serves, however, to show us that the predictions that "all are righteous," etc., refer to the Jewish nation, and such nations as are incorporated into the Kingdom. The glory of the Lord covering the whole earth is a gradual work, extending itself, and evil will only be wholly eradicated from the earth after the little season following the thousand years. Several explanations sufficiently meet the difficulty, as that (Lange, etc.), distant nations—so intimated in prediction by "the four corners of the earth—not as yet brought under the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom, are denoted; or that (Thomas, etc.), certain ones are left purposely to develop still further human schemes of self-aggrandizement, etc.—shut up in distant regions (Shinar, etc.), who then come forth to attack, under Satanic delusion, the Messianic Kingdom; or, that (Perry, etc), the resurrected wicked dead are thus led on, gathered from the ends of the earth, to such an attack (which receives e.g. some countenance from Ps. 59, etc.); or, that a combination of distant living nations and of the wicked dead are denoted. It is scarcely necessary to say that such theories as (Burchell) that evil spirits headed by Satan, or (Burnet) that a new race is specially generated, must be discarded as untenable. Being a subject independent of our doctrine, it has no special relation to it, saving that it suggests the limitation mentioned by us—a limitation which every Mill. theory must, more or less, preserve to meet the fulfilment. Its very relation to the supernatural is the key to its conciseness; our inexperience would only increase the perplexities of an attempted explanation.

However significantly in the past certain divine declarations have been realized, the same will stand forth with far greater force and power when Antichrist is crushed. Thus e.g. Prov. 21 : 30 : "There is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel against the Lord." Prov. 29 : 16 : "When the wicked are multiplied, transgression increaseth ; but the righteous shall see their fall." So also Prov. 1 : 24-32 ; Ps. 92 : 7 ; Prov. 18 : 12, and 19 : 21 ; Ps. 37 : 2, 7, 9, 10, 12-15, etc.

Obs. 15. This Antichrist will be destroyed before the re-establishment of the Davidic throne and Kingdom. The plain predictions of the Word absolutely require it. The reader, even in a cursory examination of the prophecies, must be struck with the fact that nearly all Millennial descriptions, either in the text or context, incorporate this idea of some great power being suddenly and overwhelmingly overcome by the exertion of Divine interposition and power. Having already abundantly shown (Prop. 123, etc.) this feature of the subject, it is unnecessary to repeat it, seeing how conclusively this is asserted in Rev. 19, 2 Thess. 2, Dan. 7, etc.<sup>1</sup> The identity of the man of sin (Paul), the little horn (Dan.), the eighth head of the seven-headed beast (John), the last Wilful King (Dan.), is abundantly shown in the same claims, the same characteristics, the same end at the same time and by the same means, so that it is impossible, without inconsistency, to reject the overwhelming testimony. With these agree various other predictions already specified, and that will be advanced in following propositions. To indicate how largely the Spirit describes this overthrow of this culminated antichristian head, we, by way of illustration only, present a few passages. Thus e.g. in Ps. 72, where the blessed and most glorious reign of Jesus, the Messiah, is delineated, it is represented as having broken "in pieces the oppressor," and in saving the poor and needy (Justin, Dial. with Trypho, ch. 34, says, "from the man of power") from "deceit, violence, and bloodshed" (for the expression "precious shall their blood be in His sight" is indicative of a previously experienced martyrdom). The Assyrian of Micah 5 : 5 has been held by many (as e.g. Victorinus, Com. on Apoc., etc.) to be descriptive of the Antichrist. Notwithstanding the diversity of translations and the conjectures engrafted upon the passage, the student will find that some propriety pertains to this suggestion, because in point of time, as the context shows, it stands related to the Messianic reign over the restored Jews which is effected by the destruction of the Assyrian (the name of the present enemy being used to designate a coming one—a principle advocated by Jews, commentators, and prophetic writers). It at least, whatever difficulty appertains to a correct explanation of a portion of it, pertains to some power who is, at the time when this reign is to be inaugurated and the Jews are to be restored, to invade Palestine, etc., and must, in view of its obscurity, be interpreted in the light of more extended predictions. Again, it is the might of King Jesus that overcomes this "Assyrian." Isa. 66 : 15-24 is descriptive of this period, as a comparison with other Scripture unmistakably proves, for we have the Coming of the Lord to deliver His people, the fearful destruction by fire and sword of a gathered multitude, followed by the restoration of the Jewish nation, the conversion of the nations that are spared, and the setting up of the new heavens and new earth. In Isa., chs. 25 and 26, the Millennial era is immediately preceded by the violent downfall of some great oppressing power (which was as "the blast of the terrible ones") called "the branch of the terrible ones" (the Anti-Branch). And this retribution, with the Kingdom and blessings immediately following, is pointedly ascribed to the special manifestation and might of the Lord who comes for salvation. Such references could be multiplied,<sup>1</sup> expressively enforcing the unity of prophecy in describing the last times immediately preceding the restored Davidic Kingdom under Jesus, the Christ.

<sup>1</sup> Some, who apply the Antichrist of 2 Thess. 2 to the Papacy, lay great stress on the phrase "shall consume with the spirit (or breath) of his mouth," as indicating a gradual wasting or consumption of his power (finding a fulfillment in the past history of the Papacy). But we have to remind such, that many critics read, as the New Revision: "shall slay with the breath of His mouth," which accords fully with the parallelism, with the action ascribed to Jesus at His Coming, and with other parallel passages as e.g. Rev. 19 : 15 ; Isa. 11 : 4, etc.

<sup>2</sup> The reader may refer to Ps. 21, where the exaltation of the King is specified (which can only apply to David's Son, the Christ), and the destruction of his enemies "in the time of anger," because "they intended evil against Thee ; they imagined a mischievous device, which they were not able to perform," etc. Or, to Isa. 11 : 4 when the smiting of the earth and the slaying of the wicked (applied by the Jews to Antichrist and rendered in Chald. "impious Roman") is done for the deliverance of His people from their power, and which stands related in precedence to the incoming Millennial glory. Or again, to Ps. 110 where this King is represented conquering his enemies because the Lord will "strike through kings in the day of his wrath" (the confederated forces of Antichrist Rev. 19) and "wound the heads (many have it in the singular, "the head" so Luther, "das Haupt," etc.), over many (or great) countries." So plain are many of these references, that it is a matter of surprise that any should fail to notice them. Cocceius, Treatise on Antichrist, thinks that Isa. chs. 13 and 14 ; Ezek. chs. 23 and 27, etc., are applicable to the Antichrist, and so many others have thought on the ground that such fulfillments are only typical of a greater one in the future. Whatever truth there may be in this, we need not employ them by way of argument because of the abundance of direct prediction.

Obs. 16. The subject of the Antichrist teaches, if we will only receive it, that we must come to the interpretation of the Apocalypse in a manner very different from that usually hitherto presented. We find it to be a distinguishing chronological mark and test of various interpretations. Only that mode of explaining the Apocalypse (whatever inchoate fulfilment some may be pleased to engraft upon it) which preserves the Antichrist as the last head of the beast (Rev. 13), and raises up no conflict or contradiction (as to characteristics and final end) between Paul and the Prophets, is alone worthy of our acceptance. The plausibility of interpreting an isolated portion of the Apocalypse, etc., by finding remarkable coincidences in history, must, if true, be corroborated by a comparison of prophecy as given through all of the prophets. The crucial test is found here, and sets aside (whatever of merit, ability, and valuable information may be connected with them) a host of prophetic writings. Let the student, e.g. find the Antichrist overcome by Jesus in Rev. 19 (which all admit), and then let him trace this beast, and he finds at once that by it is denoted the last head of the first beast in Rev. 13. What necessarily follows? First, that this last head is no representative of the Papacy (and neither the false prophet) because the harlot (Papacy) is previously destroyed by this last head and confederated kings. Secondly, that this last head persecuting (Rev. 14) after the fall of Babylon, all of which is still future in fulfilment, has then to experience the outpouring of God's wrath (Rev. 14 : 10). Now the wrath of God is contained in the seven "vials of the wrath of God" (Rev. 15 : 1, and 16 : 1). It follows, therefore, since this last head, arising in his might only after the fall of Babylon and slaying the martyrs of Jesus who refuse his worship and image, is still future, that the outpouring of the vials is also future, for the first one is poured out upon "the men which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image" (Rev. 16 : 2), and which can only be done when this last head of the beast has arisen. The conclusion irresistibly comes upon us, that these vials, at least, are all yet to be fulfilled. Thirdly, the Spirit, as if to guard us against holding a premature fulfilment (as exemplified in otherwise valuable works, Elliott's Horæ Apoc., Faber's Diss., Lord's Apoc., Barnes's Com., etc.), shows us the relationship that this last head of the beast sustains to prior events (considered in most schemes mentioned as the most satisfactorily proven by history). Thus in Rev. 11 : 7, the two witnesses are killed by the beast of Rev. 13 (this is admitted), and a comparison of the time mentioned, etc. unmistakably shows that this too is only done by this last head of the beast still future. The prediction hence refers to scenes that are yet to be realized; the proof being irresistible, if we allow the force of comparison logically applied. We are assured (Rev. 11 : 14) that this is included already in "the second woe," from which we conclude either that we have not entered into it, or that the scenes to be enacted under its duration have not yet been realized, and, therefore, at least from this point, it is premature to engraft a consecutive series of events as fulfilled in the remaining trumpet and vials. Fourthly, the chronological order or regular consecutive series of events upon which so great stress is laid by the Preterist Expositors (although they materially differ as to the events really denoted, e.g. comp. Elliott's seals with Lord's Exp., etc.) is hereby shown to be defective, and that they therefore do not merit the degree of confidence that so many extend to them. The only possible way to reconcile these schemes with the future fulfilment is to allow that the Spirit has so framed them as to permit a kind of partial, inchoate fulfilment (which position some, as Baxter, etc. take). Whatever of truth there may be in such a mode of double interpretation, our subject is one that demands no special examination into its merits. Neither affirming nor denying that some of these predictions may have been inchoately fulfilled, we feel constrained to declare that such a regular, consecutive fulfilment, extending down even to, and through most of, the vials, has no foundation in any fulfilment that history has recorded; seeing that, as shown, many alleged to be past fall within the allotted period of the Antichrist, the virtual eighth head of the beast. Fifthly, this finds its strongest corroboration in the fact that the identity of this last head corresponds with all the other predictions, giving the same time when he exists, attributing the same self-deification and acts, and describing the same Divine agency in his destruction with the subsequent blessings resulting from his removal. In addition, let the expounder of Rev. obtain once the proven position stated by Christlieb (Essay on Mod. Infidel.), that "the Antichrist, who denies the Father and the Son, can be destroyed, not by men, but only by the Lord in the brightness of His Coming," or attributed by Schmid (Bib. Theol., p. 510) to Paul, "the idea that the appearance of Antichrist will immediately precede the manifestation of Christ," then it materially changes the interpretation of a large portion of the Apocalypse. The Advent of Rev. 19, instead of being spiritualized away as something merely providential, etc.; the Millennium, instead of being transformed into a period when the martyr spirit is to be revived; the reign of Christ and of the saints, instead of being regarded and treated as the ordinary operations of grace, etc.; then stand forth with a vividness, reality, and power which again finds its confirmation in the plain, grammatical meaning of the Prophets combined. Whatever faults in details may be noticeable in such interpreters, they at least preserve the distinctive outlines in their consistency, and do not mistake when they distinguish (e.g. like Dr. Gess, Proph. Times, vol. 5, p. 130) the Antichrist as belonging to the beast, to which we have applied it in its last head, and as different even from the corrupt Church which it overthrows, and who is to be destroyed by "the second visible manifestation of Jesus" "as the Son of Man in His glorified body and accompanied by His saints," preparatory to "the reign of a thousand years," etc.

A work has recently appeared, most confidently reaffirming the Papacy as the great Antichrist of prophecy, and really making it the pivotal point of the book and its calculations, that deserves some attention. It is Guinness's Approaching End of the Age, and it contains some excellent suggestions, being thoroughly Pre-Millennial. But it is unfair in some of its statements, and classes all Futurists (i.e. those who locate the culminated Antichrist still future) among those few who interpret the symbolic language of the seals, trumpets, and vials literally.* Much that Guinness says respecting progressive revelation and interpretation and the symbolic language, Futurists, with some limitation, also receive, but without necessarily coming to the same conclusions. Much that he says respecting the Papacy, we also heartily indorse seeing that we regard it as the great apostasy and in its organized form Antichristian, but this does not force us to apply * For among the Futurists are those who regard much of the portraiture of Rev. as symbolical, and insist upon it, that not every particular of a representative picture is to be pressed literally, or find a corresponding fulfilment, but that the main leading idea (as under the seals, trumpets, and vials), is only to be received and urged. The symbolical language is fully recognized, and the meaning of the representation as a whole is to be received, thus according with the laws of language. Some excellent writers have—as must be sadly acknowledged—marred their interpretations and applications by literalizing much that is evidently symbolical. If they were consistent in their theory, then the same principle might e.g. be applied to Dan. 9, Rev. 13, etc.

the same prophecies to it that he asserts are applicable. And, when he declares that we make nothing of the Papacy as an Antichrist, and thus oppose the almost uniform Protestant interpretation and application of the Apocalypse, he affirms what is not correct, seeing that nearly all, if not all, based their view of the Papacy being delineated upon the portraiture of the harlot in Rev. 17, which we also receive and hold forth most prominently. His work in making the Papacy to cover the predictions relating to the Antichrist, involves itself in numerous difficulties, some of which are herewith appended.

1. He makes the Papacy the eighth head of the beast of Rev. 13, and in order to do this, he has seven heads passed away before its rise. Now to make out the seventh head he takes the unwarranted historical liberty of dividing the sixth imperial line or head into (p. 162) two classes, "military emperors" and "despotic emperors," when Roman law and history pronounce them a regular succession (Prop. 160).
2. He entirely ignores the historical continuation of the Roman Empire; the revival of the Western portion before the Eastern fall; the continued Imperial headship and its acknowledgment (Prop. 160).
3. He properly concedes that all the previous heads were civil heads, and then attaches the Papacy which never was a civil head of the Empire, never was so recognized but actually received its small temporal authority exercised over a portion of Italy from the hands of the recognized civil head of the Empire.
4. He properly makes the harlot in Rev. 17 supported by the beast to be the Papacy, but immediately turns around and converts the harlot into the beast by making the former the latter's leading, controlling head, thus presenting them as identical, when the prophecy and history show that they were separate and distinctive, one supporting the other.
5. The end likewise of the beast and of the woman are distinctive, showing unmistakably that the Papacy is not a head of the beast, for the beast and the horns destroy the woman, while the beast and horns continuing on are destroyed by the judgments of the Sec. Advent.
6. Ignoring fundamental historical facts in relation to the Empire, he assumes—without seeing the palpable contradictions—that the Papacy becomes that Empire, and then to prove this assumption again assumes that the year-day system (applicable to some predictions, as the seven times, etc.), must apply to all time announced in prophecy pertaining to this Empire, and seeks by a series of correspondences in chronological calculations to sustain his position.
7. He makes this assumption respecting the Papacy to become (p. 223) "the key to the whole system of times and seasons, natural and revealed." But to make this "key" open the times, he must resort to calculations based on lunar, calendar, and solar time, so that one or the other may fit, giving himself the widest possible range by (p. 475), declaring "that all the prophetic periods have double, and some of them triple, and even fourfold, eras of commencement and conclusion."
8. The year-day system is dogmatically asserted in reference to the Apocalypse (not as an inchoate fulfilment but) as a final one, without the least attempt to meet the serious and fatal objections (excepting in some small matters as to excessive literalism, horn denoting a dynasty, etc., much of which corresponds with our own ideas) urged against such an application as final. Aside from the variety of such year-day interpretation in the application to the Church or to the world etc., it is sufficient to point out only two things which alone amply refute it. No events commensurate with the sixth seal have ever taken place upon earth, and to apply to it the downfall of Paganism (which did not interfere with the existence of the beast) is simply to caricature "the great day of the wrath of the Lamb." (Comp. e.g. Dr. Keith's Appendix, pp. 430-439 in Harm. of Proph.)* Again, the vials have never been poured out—although Guinness places us under the sixth, and the proof is positive. Examine the order of events in ch. 14 (see Prop. 130) and see in ch. 15 the saints removed before the vials are poured out upon the marked and worshippers of the beast, and we are assured that before the vials are poured out the first stage of the Advent must necessarily have preceded. A system or theory which can pass by an order indicated by the prophecy itself is, to say the least, open to grave suspicion.
9. In his eagerness to make the Papal chronology "the key to times and seasons," he reverses the order of prophecy. Thus, e.g. he assures us that "the little horn" of Dan. 7 is also the Papacy. Now according to the plain prediction it arises after the ten horns, but according to his own estimates the Papacy (e.g. A. D. 533), arose before the ten horns were in existence, * Comp. also the reasons assigned by Dr. Seiss, Lects. On the Apoc., Tregelles On Daniel, Brookes, Marantha, etc. However largely used as a weapon against the Papacy (e.g. in the 1260 and 1290), numerous writers are returning to the early Church view of the literal day interpretation (some admitting an inchoate fulfilment, others rejecting it). Elliott Horns Apoc., Faber Diss. On Proph., etc., give the reasons for holding the year-day system. Tregelles discusses these in detail, to which discussion the reader is referred.

thus flatly contradicting its origin. 10. But Dan. 7 assures us that of those ten horns which existed before "the little horn" arose, three fell on account of its power, but Guineas informs us (p. 174) that these horns must be found in powers that followed successively one after the other when the Papacy was already established, and were really destroyed, not by the Papacy, but by the civil head of the Empire. 11. He does not observe that the ten horns of Rev. 17 resist and overcome the Papacy, which he cannot reconcile with his theory, owing to three being rooted up and the time when he locates the rise of those kingdoms. Without proof, or the least attempt to enumerate the ten kingdoms, he assumes their existence as well known, when the fact is, that all attempts to enumerate them has led to the utmost diversity, and in some instances to real absurdity. If so easy of historical verification, he ought to have presented them. 12. In order to obtain coincidences of dates he applies to the Papacy a status which does not historically belong to it. Thus (p. 466) he refers the 1260 years to a period between the decree of Phocas and the downfall of the temporal power of the Pope, claiming an exact fulfilment. But unfortunately for the theory, the decree of Phocas did not bestow temporal power (which he admits in another place was bestowed long after), hence there was no 1260 years of temporal power, and when the temporal power was taken away it left the Bishop of Rome in the identical ecclesiastical position and power which he had under Phocas. 13. He admits (p. 479), that it is not "easy" "in the light of historic fulfilment" "to affix the exact limits of these 490 years" (Daniel's 70 weeks), and yet without the least attempt to show how the latter part of it has been fulfilled, coolly appropriates the whole as fulfilled in the past, and bases upon it the notion (which his own chronological calculations require) that an accurate fulfilment as to time is not requisite. 14. He appropriates 2 Thess. 2 as undoubtedly applicable to his theory of the Papacy, owing to a similarity of Antichristian traits found in it, but admits (p. 171) "it is not denied that the Thessalonian prophecy gives the impression, on a cursory perusal, that it predicts a single individual." He thinks this necessary (after Paul had privately informed them respecting the Antichrist) in order that under a false interpretation and hope they might be induced to "watching and waiting for the Lord's return." 15. After admitting thus (and in several other places) the Futurist idea of a personal Antichrist in the early Church, he attempts to bring reproach on the view by (p. 303) linking it with the interpretation of "Ribera and other Jesuit writers," and complains here and there in his work that we forsake Protestant principles and incorporate a defence of Romanism, when the fact is that we delineate the Papacy in its relation to the Empire, as to moral and religious characteristics, just as he does, and delineate its doom as given in Rev. 17, so that our views are in direct antagonism to and severely deprecated by Romanism. 16. Because we apply certain predictions to the Papacy (which are overlooked, and the impression made as if we did not regard it as a great apostasy and Antichristian power), which we deem legitimate and sustained by history, and refuse to interpret others, which he thus applies, in the same way (owing to order and result as predicted being diverse, and the inability of finding a satisfactory historical fulfilment) he charges us (p. 304) as follows: "We believe the Futurist view to be an erroneous and mischievous one; it precludes any adequate conception of the majestic range of the predictions of Scripture; it deprives the Church of the guidance of Divine prophecy, as to the character and doom of the great Apostasy; and of the stimulus to faith and hope, afforded by the true interpretation." It would be easy, from our standpoint, to make similar charges against his view, but such statements, appealing to personal opinion and prejudice, have no force as arguments. They certainly (Pref. p. 15) do not spring from "the enlightenings of the Holy Spirit," for such enlightenments will accord only with an interpretation that is in harmony with the order of prophecy and the fulfilment of history. 17. Because we will not receive his chronology of the Papacy but look for an Antichrist which will destroy the Papacy and persecute the Church of Christ, and be overthrown at the open Parousia of Jesus, he asserts (p. 490) that we diminish the certainty of Christ's speedy Coming. But the uncertainty of that Coming is not made a particle more certain by chronological applications which are opposed both by the tenor of predictions and the facts of history. Besides the intervention of definite dates, does not, by any means, enforce the commanded posture of constant watching. 18. To oppose our idea of an Antichrist, culminated, after Babylon is fallen, he (p. 96) reflects upon the early Church view of a future personal Antichrist under the plea that their views must necessarily be imperfect owing to progressive interpretation, but just so soon (p. 164-5) as he finds anything in the early Church which he can incorporate into his own application, then the Fathers were correct, for "there is the strongest presumption that they were right, for how could Irenæus and the Fathers invent such an improbable notion;" "Paul says to the early Church 'ye know,' the early Church (though not the identical generation) tell us what they knew, and who are we, that we should say they are mistaken? How can we be in a position to correct their error?" We have every reason to believe that under the guidance of inspired men who founded the churches, the broad outlines, including the personality of the Antichrist, were given, while the exact details, order, and time were left to future study and comparison. 19. Again and again he charges our position to be such, that it does not sufficiently warn the Church. How can this be so, when he points only to an Antichrist that is past as to persecuting power, that is at present in consumption and from whom the Church, according to his own statements of decline, need apprehend no more danger, while we hold up an Antichrist still future, who shall dreadfully persecute the Church, shall rule over the nations, and array himself against Jesus the Christ—Christians, Romanism, and the Jews feeling the power of his arrogance? Who is it that warns the Church of coming danger, and who assumes the responsibility of declaring that the power of the predicted Antichrist, to be destroyed at the Sec. Advent, has powerfully waned. Which class of motives are best calculated to warn believers? 20. Under the plea of the year-day fulfilment respecting the Papacy, he again and again pretends that it most effectually disproves the future existence of an Antichrist, and implies that all who indorse this year-day system entertain his own opinion on this point. Now the facts are, that some of the most eminent writers (as G. S. Faber, and others), who have adopted and defended the year-day system, have also held that the last Antichrist is not the Papacy but some other power that arises; others (as Baxter, etc.), who adopt the same have a kind of double fulfilment, one on the year-day principle applicable to the Papacy and the other on the literal day interpretation to be applied to another and last Antichrist. Thus the adoption of his own principle, does not necessarily as he asserts, lead to his own conclusions. 21. His work being largely taken up with chronological calculations, he enlogizes chronology (which has approximatively its value, and ought not to be discarded by the students), and (p. 297) he indorses the view that chronology is far above signs to excite "the liveliness of our expectation of the Lord's speedy return." We regard both as valuable, and cannot exalt the latter above the former, when our Master, to call forth such expectation, Himself lays special stress on the signs. 22. After denouncing (p. 97) "the Futurist scheme" as a view which rejects the light thrown on the purposes of God by Providence, which exalts the ignorance of the early Church over the wisdom and mature judgment of the Church now, he declares: "The Futurist view denies progressive revelation" and asserts that the early Church understood the Apocalypse better than the Church of after times, which is contrary to the analogy of Scripture, and to the apparent purpose of God." Suppose we take this position of his, and what is the result. Because the Church almost en masse, after eighteen hundred years of matured wisdom, believes that the Apocalypse, teaches the conversion of the world before the Sec. Advent and a spiritual Millennium, are we to receive this testimony that the early Church was mistaken? No! an extreme is to be avoided. On some essential points, the grand outlines of Eschatology, the early Church under teachers who were inspired was conversant, but on details, the exact order or time, they were left, as we are, to study, comparison, signs, and fulfilment of prophecy. We do deny "progressive revelation" in the sense implied above (not the idea of having been progressively given in the Word), viz., that every one who thinks that his interpretation and application of prophecy is the result of enlightenment of the Holy Spirit, and hence ought to be accepted as a divine revelation. The world is full of such claims, and prophetic interpretation especially, has many who deem their special theory or system the child of prayer and an answer from God, when it is the outgrowth of their own speculations and imaginations. Every student of God's Word will, of course, ask His guidance and the Spirit's influence, but he knows that such are only available and practical in so far as he accommodates himself to the guidance already given in the Holy Scriptures and to the utterances of the Spirit already recorded therein. If we find any interpretation directly opposed to the tenor of prediction, and the effort made to accommodate such an interpretation by the application of accommodating chronological eras, we cannot be widely mistaken in our estimate concerning its human origin. These and other objections cause us to dissent from many of Guinness's conclusions. He plainly denounced our view; we as plainly point out his shortcomings in self-defence, as he has invited us to do, if it were possible. We have, however, not repeated his terms against us and applied them to his system, believing that reasons rather than reproach are required in such a reply. Believing his work on several points to be misleading and to present a mere caricature of our views, yet, owing to its strong Pre-Millenarian bias, and to its utterance of valuable truths in connection, and to its suggestiveness on some chronological points, we deem it worthy of a candid perusal, and trust that as the author himself desired, it may cause others to give the whole subject more attention and study.

Obs. 17. Something may appropriately be said respecting the tendencies which must necessarily exist previous to, and aid in the development of, this Antichrist. It is evident that such a powerful and wicked personage can never arise and gain the ascendancy over the nations as predicted, unless there is a previous preparation for him. This inquiry becomes the more important, seeing that the period of his manifestation is not far distant. The same reasoning that we have applied to the Sec. Advent in this respect, will also teach us that the coming of this last head cannot be long delayed, with the exception that the Advent (in its first stage, Prop. 130) may occur at any time, while that of the Antichrist will follow certain events (Rev. 14), and will be so recognizable that a previous proclamation to that effect will be general among believers. If the position that is assumed in this work is correct, then we ought to see tendencies leading toward the recognition of such an antichristian power, a drifting of the nations into such a state of unbelief that the way is gradually but surely preparing for this monster manifestation. The predictions of men on this point differ very materially from that given in the Bible. Thus, e.g. Castelar, in the series of able papers on "The Republican Movement in Europe" (Harper's Mag.), declares that "the education of the human race must end in the Universal Republic." The inspired Word, on the other hand, pronounces this an idle dream, pointing us, as a resultant of human nature, to a monarchy more arrogant, far-reaching, encroaching, and tyrannical than the world has ever yet witnessed. Eaton (Perm. of Christianity, Lect. 5) argues that scepticism is but transient, and will, by the present use of means, ultimately pass away, being but "a definite stage, a passing phase in the process of intellectual growth," and approvingly quotes Carlyle as saying that "this darkness is but a transitory obscuration; these ashes are the soil of future herbage and richer harvests," etc. But God's Word warns us not to receive such predictions of improvement based upon the coming culture, refinement, civilization, science, etc., of man, but to believe that the self-relying efforts of man to exalt humanity will result in his degradation—a degradation, too, so debasing that it falls down to the worship of man in the person of Antichrist—that it even stoops to image worship enforced by the death penalty, and that it imbrues its hands in the blood of a vast number of martyrs. Let the reader study the characteristics of this last head and of the period in which he rules, and prominently stands forth the self-deification of the Antichrist and the worship tendered to him. Men may say this is impossible; but let them look around and see the seed now sown, the opinions now entertained by multitudes respecting the greatness, power, and glory of humanity. Are not Comte, Bauer, Renan, and a large number of writers, lauding and magnifying the incoming "Church of Humanity?" are not to-day a vast body of the leading minds of the world aiming at the overthrow of Christianity and the substitution of the boasted "Religion of Humanity?" Is this an Antichrist? Are there not literally masses who glory (as e.g. the Nat. Assoc. of Spiritualists that met in Chicago September 17, 1873, and through one of the speakers declared: "We are called Spiritualists, but we have another name for our sect, 'Antichristian'") that they are Antichristian in principle and practice? Does this Antichrist set himself above God and all divine law? What does this necessarily imply, but that which is directly taught, viz., that men, in foolishness and wantonness, will reject the idea of a personal God—a God who has the claims of a Creator and Redeemer.

Look around and behold men of the greatest influence, of acknowledged scientific and literary ability, deliberately engaged in the destructive work of setting aside the personality of God, the foundation of all law. Is it not a sad fact, that literally masses among the nations, led on by intelligence and learning, are already discarding the God of the Bible as one who has no existence and to whom, therefore, no man is responsible. Infidelity, guided by the much-lauded scientific learning, is now doing what it never before was able to accomplish, viz., to elevate this rejection of a personal God from its former lower and almost isolated condition into a higher and more dignified position by the artful blandishments of human reason controlled by a proud dislike to the humbling doctrines of the cross. Its advocates can be counted by the million, and occupy the most favorable places to influence the multitude.<sup>1</sup> What in the day of David (Ps. 53) was true in particular instances, and has more or less been seen repeated in history, now under the plea of enlightenment and progress, has become so general that it is unblushingly asserted and defended by numerous writers and lecturers of literary and scientific ability. Dr. Auberlen has well remarked that one of the distinguishing characteristics of the Antichrist is "intellectual culture." In the very nature of the case this must be so, for it is only under the guidance of professed intelligence that the foundations of moral obligation can thus be removed, and that the nations, so far advanced in civilization, can be induced to receive him as the Ruler over them. A just Nemesis seems to bring retribution in the line of offence; for rejecting God as unworthy of homage and worship, they, exalting Nature and Humanity, are led by the insidious doctrine of natural development (the direct opposite of the Bib. doctrine) and by the removal of the restraints imposed by faith in Holy Writ, to honor and worship man himself as the highest embodiment of law and order; and the result is, that they impose upon themselves the most tyrannical and cruel tyrant that ever yet trod the earth. Let no one turn away from such predictions, and say that it is impossible for intelligence to sink so low in the scale of worship, etc., for, as if purposely to meet this objection, it is expressly foretold, to account for such a fall, that God, "because they received not the love of the truth," "shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie," etc. (2 Thess. 2:10-12), owing to their having "pleasure in unrighteousness." God will permit human nature to carry out the principles now at work to its legitimate end, and will so order it in His Providence that it shall have the liberty and power to culminate, to bring forth the fruitage of its devices, and to abundantly harvest the too faithfully cultivated seed so diligently sown by the multitude of sowers. God's purpose is that man, in his efforts at regeneration in his own way and not after God's plan, shall experience in bitterness and sorrow the falsehood of his own obstinacy and pride, and this, too, by God's ordering, in the adoration of a blasphemer. Having already alluded to the principles at work in this direction (Props. 123, 147, 160, and see Props. 162, 163, 174), it is unnecessary to detain the reader upon a point that must be, in view of abundant existing facts, self-evident. The representations of Antichrist are fearfully dark—"the godless, self-deifying ruler of worldly Empire," the Restorer of a worse abomination than the ancient emperor worship, the instigator and propagator of the most seducing, blasphemous, and persecuting falsehoods—but they are sustained, not merely by their being God's faithful and true portraiture, but by the appalling facts already presented in the dark history of the preceding and preparative apostatizing from the truth which teaches us that when man is cut loose from the Gospel truth, and follows his own imaginings, there is no iniquity and no crime too great which he is not ready to commit. The threats already uttered against Christianity by representatives of large classes of men ; the hatred with which the Bible and its doctrines are received ; the fanatical following of reason when its deductions are palpably founded upon unproven premises ; the laudation and glorification of humanely concocted schemes for the amelioration and exaltation of the race ; the widening denial that the world needs Divine interposition and a Divine Redeemer ; the elevation of Materialism, Naturalism, Spiritualism, Humanitarianism into the commanding posture of promising Redemption ; the sure and steady breaking down of the religious barriers by the interposition and substitution of natural law and the consequent increase of laxity of morals—these are just the indications that we ought to see, if Antichrist's approach draws nigh. It is folly to deny these things or to lessen the value of their warning.* Riggenbach (Lange's Com., 2 Thess. 2, and Comp. his quotations from Auberlen, Huebner, etc.) justly observes : " It is well worth while to give heed to the prophetic word, and that so much the more, as the day comes nearer ; not throwing it into the shade with a shrug of the shoulder, as if it were a matter of fanaticism." The refusal of man to believe does not alter the predictions or change God's purpose in their fulfilment ; and the fact, aside from the greatness, etc., of this enemy, that the Spirit so largely enters into the description of this personage, ought certainly to influence the reverent believer into a careful contemplation and study of this subject. The false faith, now already so prevalent, in man as his own Saviour, when once supported by the predicted wonder-working power of this Antichrist and his associate, the False Prophet, will have no difficulty in accepting of and acknowledging the Antichrist in his most daring of claims, for it will conclude that such faith, attested to and proven by "lying wonders," is pre-eminently worthy of being entertained, especially when it falls in with the carnal desires of the heart and tramples upon the detested Biblical repentance and self-sacrificing faith. Plausibility and human desires enforced by miracles, finds the masses so well prepared that the man coming in the name of Humanity (Comp. Jno. 5 : 43, which extends beyond the Jews, although the Jews, too, are to be prepared by an adherence to " the new religion of Humanity," which many now in-dorse, to receive its highest exponent, the Antichrist as their Messiah) will find, as predicted, a mighty host of adherents, which will be only too ready to do his bidding. Men are already busy proclaiming a " New Religion," a " new order of things" which is to supersede Christianity ; and when we turn to the Bible to inform us in what this boasted Religion and Order shall consist, we shudder at the fearful exchange made, at the horrible transmutation experienced, feeling assured that it can never, as God's Word teaches, be introduced without a previous falling away from the truth, and without the superadded agencies of a most astounding nature. Theories and words flattering to man, the unification of some ideas congenial to the corrupt nature of man, the specious promises of deliverance to humanity in religion and government, the tenders of beguiling enjoyments and pleasures, the cry of a common and universal brotherhood under one central headship to meet the longings of ages, and all this under the manipulation of the wonderful prophet, leads to the culmination of the sin of Adam to be like God in a headship which theocratically only belongs to God and

His Christ. Antichrist is the last step in the development of Satanic influence and power in and through man, and we are assured that this last phase shall be specially pervaded by his energy in order to resist the incoming Messianic Kingdom. Amazing climax! so astonishing is it, that (Rev. 13 : 3 and 17 : 8) "all the world wondered after the beast," excepting only those who are believing and wise.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Men even now rebel against the Theocratic idea, and proclaim it. Christlieb (Mod. Doubt, p. 421) shows how unbelievers are indignant that Jesus should dare to bind the whole course of the world to His person, and should call all men, even Dr. Strauss, before His judgment throne; and quotes Bruno Bauer (Crit. of the Evang. His. Pref.) as feeling "injured, offended, and angered" by the prominent dignity and claims of Jesus. "because one man is always set up as a model against the wickedness and stupidity of all others." And (p. 139) he refers to a student's Congress at Liege, where it was declared amid applause that "their aim was to do away with all religions, to destroy all churches, and to eradicate every thought of God from the consciousness of their fellow-men; and that in their opinion Atheism was the ultimate aim of all human science." The same is found in the "Manifestos" of the Commune, International, and other organizations. Thus e.g. Gustave Flourens, leader of the Red Republican party, writes in his journal La Libre Pensée, Oct., 1870: "Our enemy is God. Hatred of God is the beginning of wisdom. If mankind would make true progress, it must be on the basis of Atheism. Every trace of religion must be banished from the education of our children," etc. So Christlieb speaks of "a well-known representative" of the German people, who has laid down the task "to educate in Atheism personal enemies of a personal God." Feuerbach (a so-called philosopher) says: "There is no God; it is as clear as the sun and as evident as the day that there is no God, and still more that there can be none." "For if there were a God, then there must be one; he would be necessary. But now if there is no God, then there can be no God; therefore, there is no God. There is no God because there cannot be any" (a logic which instantly reminds us of Ps. 53 : 1, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God"). Frothingham (Address to West. Conf.) remarks that "our creed is creedlessness; our organization is disorganization"; and Garnet (same) eulogizes free thought as far greater than faith in God. Multitudes of such utterances might be produced. Even women largely aid in this effort; not merely that low class allied with Spiritism, Free-loveism, but many who delight to be designated

"Liberal" and "Broad" in their views. Thus e.g. one of the best of these, Sara S. Hennell, in her work Thoughts in Aid of Faith (p. 106), says: "As a systematic whole, it is essentially true, that Christianity has passed away from us and has left us only an inheritance out of its influences;" and (p. 55) "it has become a thing of the past, buried with the past, for any share that we have in it." Sometimes on the ground of feeling or need, she seems to regret the change, but on that of reason and philosophy she claims that it must be received, and in place of Christianity we must be satisfied with a vague feeling of natural religion, and the hope of an ultimate lapse at death into "The Universal Being," if such an one exists and Pantheism is a truth. Spencer's philosophy, as to influence, can be illustrated by a thousand painful references. We refer to one as an example. This same S. S. Hennell, in the work alluded to, eulogizes Spencer as bringing in "the proper beginning of Intelligence," by which Creation and a personal Creator are discarded for "the Unknown," and gives us a sample of this intelligence by saying: "Religious Science sees the mind of man by means of its highest faculties, painting itself in the image of God—forming a vast and shadowy representation of human lineaments thrown out before it upon the surface of the Unknown." The student who desires to notice how talented minds, discarding Christianity, fall into a worship of pure Naturalism allied with Pantheistic notions, consummating in the exaltation of Humanity, and in the rejection of the Supernatural and a belief in "the Unknown," can see it exemplified at length in an art. in the North Brit. Review, August, 1860, entitled "Modern Thought—its Progress and Consummation." Such sentiments are widespread. Ponder e.g. Dr. Draper's article, "Political Effect of the Decline of Faith in Continental Europe" (Princeton Review, Jan. 1879), in which he refers to "that black thundercloud Nihilism, now lowering over Eastern Europe. The most despotic of all civilized governments looks on it with alarm;" to "that blood-red sceptre Communism threatening Western Europe;" to "Socialism in Central Europe. It lifts its head defiantly in Germany. If it cannot have its way, it threatens revolution and civil war;" and by "the International" which "gives a bond of union" and "harmonizes their plans to a common end." He says that "their supporters are counted by millions—a host rapidly increasing in number and power," so that "Society itself is in peril," etc. He gravely and in detail informs us that these result from a "widespread religious unbelief," "the total extinction of religious belief," and that this "mental unsettling" is going "steadily forward," "increasing," until "it has now not merely religious intentions; it affects politics and even the basis of society." It is saddening to find such men as Bunsen ("Bunsen and his Wife," Littell's Lit. Age, Dec. 23, 1876), swell the crowd of unbelievers, when he would have even the Apostle's Creed removed as an impediment and containing the mythical, and declares: "I more and more feel it to be an axiom, that Christology, as taught by the churches, cannot be brought into union with the right interpretation of the Scripture; the historical views, speculative thought and moral consciousness of the times we live in." Even professed defenders of Christianity against the materialistic tendencies, by conceding too much to mere hypothesis, fearfully undermine the Scriptures. Thus e.g. Martineau in his able replies to Tyndall leaves the orthodox ground of a divinely inspired Word containing an infallible record of Divine truth, and while making the Bible sacred—in the sense of sacred as applied to other sacred books of various religions, embodying "the great pieties of the world"—teaches that it is fallible, and that parts (as e.g. the Old Test. cosmogony, etc.), of it may be rejected without injury to the rest. This is evidence of great weakness, a yielding up unnecessarily and prematurely an important fortress, and confirms the unbelief of multitudes, and draws others into its vortex. Unbelievers (as evidenced in The Pop. Science Monthly, Apr., 1876, p. 748) seize upon such concessions as decided "heterodoxy," and triumphantly declare that if this is all that the Bible presents, a sacredness similar to that appertaining to other religions, then it is open to scientific exploration, for the phenomena of the religious become the phenomena of nature. The concession of important error on some points, leaves it a question whether it may not be also in error in others, and thus unsettles the faith of many. Such defenders are numerous and producing a sad fruitage. But eminent divines, not realizing the destructive tendencies of such popular and prevailing teaching, even condescend to fraternize with it as something required to bring forth the truth. Thus Beecher (in the sermon "The True Test," Christian Union, Sep. 19, 1877), after a caricature of orthodoxy, says: "They (i.e. these orthodox) think the Goths and Vandals are upon us in the shape of Huxley, and Spencer, and Tyndall. These men are in the hand of God, and, though they know it not, they are Evangelizers, John the Baptists, clearing the path for the Messiah, who is to bring in a more glorious development of the nature of God to men; and yet thousands of persons are up in arms against them." To compare such men, who are steadily opposing Christianity, to Evangelists and John the Baptists, is an estimate very different from that given by the Spirit in the Word. To say, by way of apology for such, that they live better lives than some of the orthodox, does not mend the matter, for the Bible equally condemns such "orthodox" as rejecters of the truth. The prediction too as to the final result, is just the opposite of that given by the Scriptures, for, instead of "clearing the path for the Messiah," their teaching is to cause a general rejection of His claims until it culminates into the great Antichristian persecution and war. Influential religious papers and numerous pulpits are engaged in aiding this destructive work. Brookes (Maranatha, p. 435-6) observes: "Whatever, therefore, tends to degrade Christ as the divine and only Saviour, and to exalt and deify man, is essentially Antichrist in its spirit and aim, whether it be found in the Roman Catholic or Protestant body. But this is precisely the tendency of the popular preaching of the day." He then refers to the preaching of "the gospel of manhood," "the development of the Divine element in every human soul," etc., and adds: "Nearly every religious journal furnishes painful proof, in one way or another, that the Church is drifting rapidly from the ancient landmarks both in doctrine and practice, to be speedily wrecked upon the fatal coast of the Laodiceans, while the secular press is helping the minister it most admires to ripen the fruit of the world's boasted progress in the appearance of the Antichrist." If any protest is presented, those who urge it are denominated "alarmists," "croakers," "old fogies," "behind-the-age men," etc.

Obs. 18. The worship of Antichrist evidences that man, however atheistic some of his utterances are, cannot divest himself of some conception of religion, the necessity of worship, and the superiority of some being. For, constituted by the mercy and love of the Creator a religious being, he cannot, as Luthardt justly observes in his Apolog. Lectures, "get rid of the idea;" because a belief in something higher than his individual self naturally arises from his moral constitution. This universality and indestructibility of religion is most forcibly developed by Dr. Sprecher in his Ground-work of Theol., and in relation to it he (p. 280) remarks: "It is a universal fact of human life, of man's existence as an individual and as a society. In every individual there is subjectively, and in every community objectively, the element of religion. This is now very generally acknowledged, even by the opponents of Christianity. It is now seen that religion in some form always has existed and always will exist. It may be neglected and practically ignored; men may stupefy themselves into habitual indifference to it, but they can never destroy its existence. Even Idealism with its pantheism, and Materialism with its Atheism, are now seen to be forms of religion. And even absolute Nescience, which denies the valid being of the knower and the known, and recognizes only the knowing as real, must yield itself to 'the theory of knowledge,' as its God. That it has always and everywhere existed, is now acknowledged as an indisputable fact." Now this very innate adaptability and susceptibility of man to religion and worship will be taken advantage of in order to pave the way for a recognition of the Antichrist, aided by the infernal machinery set in operation by the False Prophet. Christlieb (Mod. Doubt, p. 143), after showing that the rejection of God is "an arbitrary act of the will," adds: "It was therefore a perfectly correct instinct which led the Greeks to look upon atheism as a moral fault. And every moral fault avenges itself. The refusal to acknowledge which is, and absolutely is, and is directly certain to every heart, leads to the acceptance of that which is nothing but a deceptive shadow. Man must have a God. If he rejects the true God, he must make a God for himself, and this is of necessity a false one." Already we see the signs of religious concession from many able unbelieving pens, for, passing from the purely materialistic idea which makes man a mere "sentient automaton," they argue that man in course of development must have, in correspondence with what nature has bestowed, some kind of religion adapted to his circumstances.

Prominent writers of unbelief insist upon a still higher development of man into natural religion. Thus e.g. Goldwin Smith (The Ascent of Man, in the Eclectic Mag., March, 1877) remarks: "The battle of criticism and science against superstition has been won, as every open-minded observer of the contest must be aware, though the remnants of the broken host still linger on the field. It is now time to consider whether religion must perish with superstition or whether the death of superstition may not be the new birth of religion;" and then proceeds in detail to advocate a new religion as a moral necessity imposed by development into a higher life. The difficulty of giving up religion entirely is exemplified in F. W. Newman (illustrated in his Phases of Faith and The Soul), who, after yielding up, step by step, the distinguishing doctrines of the Bible, and finally even Christ Himself, still retains a sort of religion, viz., "religion is a state of sentiment toward God" or "the intimate sympathy of the pure and perfect God with the heart of each faithful worshipper." Many hold to such a sentimental religion, from which everything evangelical has been carefully eliminated. Potter (Christianity and its Definitions) reduces Christianity to the level of a natural religion, and speaks of it as simply "provisional, preparatory, educational" to a higher natural religion of the future, to be reared under the fostering influences of science and philosophy, while Jesus, the Messiah, is to be regarded as a "naturally endowed man" who "will stand by the side of other great religious teachers and prophets, with no authority different from theirs." Rev. Chadwick, in his sermon, The Essential Piety of Modern Science, makes Modern Science the foster mother of piety and the producer of the purest religion. Fred. Harrison ("Symposium" in the Nineteenth Century), rejecting the supernatural in theology, still insists: "Those who trust that the future can ever be built on science and civilization, without religion, are attempting to build a pyramid of bricks without straw. The solution, we believe, is in a non-theological religion." Then, after making religion synonymous with a scheme explanatory of human relations to the soul, man, and world, and which calls for some object that must be obeyed, loved, and adored, he adds: "What is new in our scheme is merely that we avoid such terms as 'Infinite,' 'Absolute,' 'Immaterial,' and vague negatives altogether, resolutely confining ourselves to the sphere of what can be shown by experience, of what is relative and not absolute, and wholly and frankly human." What have we here but the exaltation of the mere human, and elevating it to the place of power and worship. Renan, in a recent dialogue (Art. "Realism in Unbelief," Littell's Liv. Age., May 5th, 1877), declares that after a re-organization of society in the interests of science, etc., then the next duty of thinking men will be "to organize God." A multitude of writers ignore the supernatural, Divine Providence, etc., in favor of Nature and its laws, sneering and scoffing at prayer to, and faith in, a personal God, but loud in their eulogies of humanity (e.g. Art. "Natural and Supernatural," in the National Quarterly Review, July 4th, 1877). The National Reformer, Physicus On Theism, Morgan's Ancient Society, Michelet's Bible of Humanity, and Fowle's Science and Immortality, and, literally, thousands of other works, some coarse in attack (as Bradlaugh, Ingersoll, etc.), others more refined and philosophical (as Huxley, Spencer, etc.), but all leading to the same goal—are at work exalting Humanity as the great and paramount outcome of Nature, thus paving the way for its ultimate worship. In order to remove every obstruction, and place Humanity on a solid basis, the Christian religion is under a professed "scientific method" placed under the category of "natural religions," thus at one blow getting rid of the Supernatural and miraculous. While eminent men are, with ill-concealed levity and delight, engaged in this destructive work, they still see that the removal of all religion would be a dreadful innovation, overriding all moral restraint, and breaking down the foundations of society and State, and hence substitute the worship of Nature and of Humanity as Nature's highest production.

The highest intellects devoted to unbelief unite with Spencer (Sociology, p. 313) in saying that "a religious system is a normal and essential factor in every evolving society." Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, and many others, admit this as a fact. Spencer, in "The Theological Bias" of The Study of Sociology, clearly contends that the religious element can never be radically removed; that "while its forms are temporary, its substance is permanent;" and predicts a transformation "to a higher and better form," so that even the "Religion of Humanity," which so many speak of as "the religion of the future," will only be a temporary religion. In his "Replies to Criticism" (Pop. Science Monthly,

Jan., 1874) he distinctly affirms that his teaching "supplies an indestructible basis for the religious sentiment," and approvingly quotes Grotz as affirming respecting his system: "Mr. Spencer, by standing on the ground of logic and psychology, without recurring to supernatural intervention, has established the legitimacy, the necessity, and the everlasting permanence of religion itself." The editor of the Pop. Science Monthly (May, 1873), in his reply to Godwin, after informing us that "Spencer is a profound believer in religion," then laudatory of Naturalism and its religious training, says: "When the method of science is raised to its rightful supremacy in the human mind, and the rule of science is recognized as supreme throughout the sphere of the phenomenal, and when the distractions of theology become unbearable, it will then be found that Mr. Spencer has proved that Science, so far from being its destroyer, is itself the promoter of the profoundest faith, while the central truth of all religion is saved to humanity. Malignant zealots will probably continue to secrete their vitriolic criticism, as, if stopped, they would probably die of their own acidities; but there are not wanting indications that many religious men of candor and discernment are already recognizing the claims of Mr. Spencer's system upon the serious consideration of their class." Then he predicts: "We believe that the time is not greatly distant when even theologians will seek it as a shelter against the rising tide of materialism and atheism." The religion thus advocated is a kind of Naturalistic-Pantheism, finding its highest expression in man. The Pop. Science Monthly has especially, and in detail, rejected as untrue the charges of atheism against eminent scientists, and as a specimen of the manner of defence, we append the following explanation. One party (as Haeckel, observed by Prof. Wynn in Wittenberger, Oct., 1877) declare that Darwin "has proved the purposelessness of nature," etc.; another party think him too much affiliated with the old idea of creation and purpose; now the editor ("Editor's Table," Dec., 1875, p. 236) refers, explanatory, to Darwin as follows: "Mr. Darwin is made out to be untheological by an exquisite bit of logic. It is true that he appeals to supernaturalism for the starting point of his doctrine, and gives exactly the same account of it that theology has offered, speaking of 'life with its several powers having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms, or into one.' But Mr. Darwin's science is saved by the charitable imputation that he used these words in a sort of Pickwickian or poetical sense, and was willing to conciliate the theologians by 'a slight difference of style' in referring to the origin of life." The editor defends Spencer against the attacks of The Nation and Chauncy Whright in German Darwinism, saying that Spencer "holds that the order of the Universe is not without its cause, although the nature of that cause is a mystery past finding out, and from the very nature of intelligence must forever transcend the human understanding." This cause, he terms, not God, but, as an indication of "his own sense of humility," "the unknowable." This does not, the writer contends, ignore religion, but makes it "the most exalted object of religious feeling, though beyond the grasp and analysis of intellect." Here is a loophole by which to affirm "that there can be no radical or fundamental conflict between religion and science," provided, however, that religion is left in this vague and indistinct manner (viz., a reverence for what we do not know) and science is limited to the phenomenal. Hence evolutionists are unwilling to be designated "atheists," claiming a religion, as e.g. seen in Savage's Religion of Evolution, where the God of Evolution is constructed, viz., the creative power or force, or whatever it may be, to which the Cosmos owes its existence, is to be venerated. So the writer in Macmillan's Mag. on "Natural Religion," sets up Nature, or rather that which evolves nature, as a God worthy of love and worship. While some may rest in this vagueness, the majority press beyond it, for they clearly see that the masses, far below their level in thinking, must have ideas impressed by representative forms; and hence, as we have shown, advocate the training of religious thought and feeling by external or representative signs relating to the laws of Nature or of Humanity. Just as Comte, when he first expounded his system of philosophy, excluded religion as superstition, but afterward, urged by the nature of man, admitted it as a necessity of society, and framed a corresponding humanitarian worship, so these, finding religion natural, are carefully seeking for some outlet—hostile to the personal Creator and Redeemer of the Bible—by which it may manifest itself consistently with the teachings of science, having, if possible, a scientific God, scientific worship, and scientific feeling. Flake, in his Outlines of a Cosmic Philosophy Based on the Doctrine of Evolution, brings forth religion as "the highest physical phase of life," a natural product; for (as Youmans informs us) it is "the manifestation of that striving after complete harmony of physical life with its requirements, stimulated by the sense of sin or moral shortcoming, for which the analogy is furnished by that striving for mere physical adjustment throughout the animal world, to which the sense of pain is the prompter." Hence Bixby, Art. "Science and Religion as Allies" (Pop.

Sci. Monthly, Oct., 1876), argues that the removal of the supernatural and miraculous, and the guidance of science, does not produce irreverence, but even something greater, reverence for the known, and adds, over against the Scripture prediction: "The more clearly we discern the path on which Science has led the world, the less fear shall we have that it is all a preparation for precipitating us into some godless abyss." Murphy (The Scientific Bases of Faith) and many others see no danger, such as the Bible portends in the future, and confidently prophesy a glorious harmony between Science and Religion with a resplendent future. Dr. Le Conte, in "Modern Biological Inquiry" (Pop. Sci. Monthly, Jan., 1876), presents the hope of many that scientific culture and the purifying and remodelling of existing religion will introduce the Millennium, saying: "In this manner alone may be realized the hope of the philosopher, the dream of the poet, and the expectation of the theologian—a universal science and a universal religion, co-operating harmoniously for the perfection of man and the glory of the Creator." But this hope is futile, for the Word of Inspiration, which has never yet failed in any of its predictions, declares to us that human depravity, guided by intelligence, will sink into greater depths of wickedness and godliness, and manifest a terrible and persecuting malice and hatred toward Christianity.

Obs. 19. This antichristian religion and worship culminates in the deification of man and his worship. It is strange that Christianity should meet as a final struggle the deification of humanity which it met when it started on its mission of gathering out the believers. In the beginning the apotheosis and worship of the emperors was a serious and strong opponent, and became the test of faith and perseverance. Uhlhorn (Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism, p. 56, etc.) shows in detail how important and extended this worship was, saying: "It would be a great misapprehension to regard the worship of the emperors solely as an indication of the extent to which human folly can go, and as deserving only ridicule and scorn. In reality it exerted the greatest influence not only upon the religious, but also upon the social, life of that time; and became of the greatest importance in the conflict of Christianity and Heathenism." He proceeds to show how deeply rooted this was among the ancients; how it extended over the provinces and became a duty, an act of patriotism, and an expression of gratitude; how it "gained great political and social importance" in provincial assemblies and fraternities; how it supplied a worship common to the whole Roman Empire, and thus introduced a unity; how "the worship of the emperors eclipsed all other worships" (quoting Melito as saying: "The statues of the emperors are more revered than those of the ancient gods"); and how it became a test of the faith and religion of the subjects. This religious development, culminating in imperial worship, will be repeated on a more fearful scale. The deification of man will bring forth a more dreadful fruitage at the close of this dispensation.

Let the student ponder Compté's ponderous (6 vols.) Course of Positive Philosophy, and in his "Church of the Future," his "Church of Humanity" containing a Hierarchy to give it unity, we have, among other things indicative of this tendency to worship man, a "Positive Calendar" designed to regulate "the Systematic Worship of Humanity." Some prominent person that lived in the past is allied with each day of the year, but Jesus Christ is totally ignored as unworthy of a position, although Confucius, Moses, and others are duly recognized. The North Brit. Review, May, 1851, contains some specimens of this calendar with criticisms. McClinton and Strong's Cyclop., Art. "Compté," epitomizes this worship of humanity: "The new divinity is humanity." "It is a complete deification of man, a complete resolution of divinity into humanity. It is a strange counterpart to Pantheism which is produced in this scheme of thorough-going Pan-humanism. The new divinity was to be adored, to be approached with prayer, to be honored with an appropriate ceremonial, worshipped with due rites, and served by a numerous army of priests." Compté feels that a reconstruction of society without some kind of religion would be incomplete and opposed to the needs of man and the impulses of nature. Hence he gives a natural religion in which Humanity is dressed up and paraded as a divinity to be idolized. Around this idealized form is placed a singular revival and transformation of doctrine and practice taken from Christianity and Paganism. It establishes a regular priesthood and a rigid Hierarchy—an authoritative "Sociocracy" to which all must bow in reverence. This mixture of Naturalism, Pan-humanism, Romanism, and Paganism, is tendered as the deliverer of society, the purifier of the moral relations, and the means of "the systematic glorification of man." We give an illustration of this worship of Humanity, taken from "The Positivist Strike for a Liturgy" (Littell's Liv. Age, Ap. 19th, 1879, taken from The Spectator). In a liturgy that was used "on the Festival of Humanity, 1st Moses, 91" (i. e. Jan. 1st, 1879), we have the following order laid down: "Holy and Glorious Humanity, on this Thy High Day, at the beginning of a new year, we are met in praise, in prayer, in thanksgiving, to celebrate thy coming, in the fulness of time, for the visible perfecting of thy as yet unseen work.

People. As children of thy Past.

Priest. We adore thee in hope.

People. As thy ministers and stewards of the Future.

Priest. We would commune with thee humbly in prayer;

People. As thy servants in the Present.

All. May our worship, as our lives, grow more and more worthy of thy great name."

We append the benediction: "The Faith of Humanity, the Hope of Humanity, the Love of Humanity, bring you comfort, and teach you sympathy, give you peace in yourselves and peace with others, now and forever, Amen." This imitation of, or parody on, Christian worship is fully exemplified by the reading of the Imitation of Christ by Thomas à Kempis with the following substitutions: "We substitute Humanity for God; the social type for the personal type of Jesus; our own inward growth in goodness for outward reward; the innate benevolent instincts for grace; our selfish instincts for nature." Men of intelligence advocate such worship and substitutions. In an article in the North Brit. Review, July-August, 1878, entitled "An Advertisement for a New Religion," the writer declares that past and present religions "are waxing old and must soon die;" that this is the belief of "advanced thinkers;" and that as nearly all admit the religious element cannot be eliminated from man there must be, of necessity, a new religion substituted for the present. He discusses the nature of the religion which is to take the place of the preceding, because "as man must have a religion, and the old religions are sick, dying, or dead, so we must have a new-born religion." He declares that the new religion "cannot have a God living and personal;" it "cannot insist on a personal immortality of the soul;" it cannot have "terrors drawn from a day of judgment;" it cannot have "sanctions or motives derived from a supernatural power or a world to come," etc., and then unhesitatingly affirms that this religion should have "Humanity for its God," with festivals in his honor, a Sunday ("once in ten days"), lectures, "hymns in honor of the great mother Nature," dances, and withal "with this there might be idols representing in symbol the great world powers, such as Evolution, Persistence of Force, Heredity, Panzoism, and Physiological units. Around the places of worship there might be groves, like those dedicated in old time to Baal, the powerful fire-god." "This new religion must come. The conditions are ready." "The world is ready to receive it." Is it not surprising that after Christianity has done so much for humanity in morals, relation of woman, slavery, civilization, literature, etc., Humanity should proudly and arrogantly attempt to crush its best friend and arrogate to itself all honor and power? Cicero once said, in reference to human character, that if perfect excellence could exist in one person, the world would bow down and worship. But, as has been remarked (by Lord, Blessed Hope, p. 15), this was not verified in the Advent of Jesus, when perfect excellence had visible embodiment. The world is not inclined to such worship; human nature finds it too reproachful and self-denying; the proof is found in the ultimate and general worship of Antichrist, in whom are embodied the grossest and most sinful imperfections. Ambitious men have (e.g. Pressense's Religion and Reign of Terror, B. 4, ch. 1) employed religion "as an instrument of government, a means of controlling and winning the masses," for, as Bonaparte (p. 334) declared, "a nation must have a religion; this religion should be in the hands of the government," being "an affair purely political." This will be repeated on a wider and grander scale. Unbelievers may now smile at the credulity of poor fanatics who have professed divinity and themselves as proper objects of worship; they may e.g. pity the delusion of the Devil-temple priest (Art. "Demonology," Ec'cletic Mag., Ap., 1876), who, victim to a self-imposed bath of melted lead, exclaimed at the very last: "It is, indeed, I who am the true God!" but a far more extended and imposing delusion, as a punishment for humanity in the line of its greatest sinfulness, shall visit and scourge the nations. It is a matter of amazement and profound regret that a multitude of intelligent and able men are engaged in a revival of ancient heathenism, eulogizing its spirit, morals, adherents far above Christianity. Uhlhorn closes his Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism with these impressive words: "For though outwardly conquered, Heathenism was not yet completely subdued within; but as in each of us 'the old man' perpetually fights against 'the new man' so in the history of the Church the ancient Heathenism is ever rising from the depths of the natural man to do battle against the new life of Christianity. This conflict is not ended. The history of the Church is only the story of this conflict. Therefore the peace which the Church won is as yet no perfect peace, but only marks a new phase of the struggle which is not yet fought out. Indeed, to-day we are in the midst of it; for stronger almost than ever, the heathen spirit in modern guise is wrestling against Christian thought and life, and it almost seems as if the questions of the time should be gathered up in the question: 'Shall we remain Christians, or become Heathen again?'" His trust (which is ours also) is "the victory which the Lord will bring in His great day." Dr. Arnold (Lects. on Mod. His.) calls attention to the fact that a distinguishing sign of modern times is the disposition to discuss religion in its political relations, and this is repeated by many recent writers. Humanitarians, while predicting the decay and fall of theological literature, the overthrow of the Christian religion, etc., still firmly hold to a belief that religion of some kind must be accepted (as e.g. Wasson, Longfellow, Johnson, Weiss, Potter, Abbot, Frothingham, Chadwick, Higginson, Cheney, and others, in Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, and hence advocate that religion as a social and political force, as a natural development of man's moral and social nature, as a factor of universal complexion, as a resultant of past and present history, must (as we have shown under previous observation) in some form or other be retained. Von Gerlach (quoted by Riegenbach, Lange's Com., 2 Thessa., p. 138) says: "In our days there has actually been made a beginning of a worship, in which humanity is deified and adored; and the complete dissolution of the Christian Church into the kingdoms of this world is already expected by many." Numerous writers refer to this strange return to Heathenism and its worship, with a plea of symbolistic meaning attached, adapting it to modern progress.

PROPOSITION 162. This Kingdom will be preceded by a fearful time of trouble, both in the Church and the World.

This already follows from the preceding Propositions. The rise and progress of the Antichrist, the acts performed by him, the persecution experienced under him, and the outpouring of God's judgments, all embrace a series of trial and trouble unexampled in the history of the world.

We say unexampled, for the declaration of Jesus, Matt. 24 : 21 ("For there shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, nor ever shall be"), must not be confined to the destruction of Jerusalem, which (as the parallel reference of Luke clearly shows) forms only the sad and awful beginning of "the days of vengeance" that extend over the captivity among the nations and the treading down of Jerusalem, until it culminates (Zech. 14, etc.) in the direful persecution of the Antichrist. Jesus, in a comprehensive way, applies that which Daniel (ch. 12 : 1, 2) specifically refers to the time of the wilful king. The unprecedented tribulation is continuous, as the prophets predict, and reaches its climax just before the appearing of the Messiah and His saints. The general analogy of Scripture teaches (comp. e.g. Cox's Thoughts on the Com. and Kingd., p. 40, Brooks's Essays, p. 12, etc.) that a special period of universal trouble, trial, and sorrow is associated with the culminated Antichrist and the open Parousia of the Messiah.

Obs. 1. Coming now to specify more particularly the persecutions that shall arise, a few introductory remarks are in place. Some, when the subject is mentioned, are at once ready to discredit, and even (as the writer knows from experience) to ridicule, it, presuming that human nature so enlightened and civilized cannot and will not break forth into such acts of persecution and cruelty as are predicted. But God knows human nature better than we do, and can assuredly foretell its depraved manifestations. It has often been remarked, taking the evidence given by the sad history of the past, that the most cruel enemy of man is man himself. The same old man still exists, and, under favorable circumstances, will manifest himself. When men like Bossuet, Massillon, and a host of others, equally famous, can indorse the persecutions and tortures inflicted by fanaticism ; when misguided zeal and unenlightened piety can, without pity, bestow as an alleged act of self-protection the most fearful deaths ; when men and women can, in the supposed interest of their rights, pass from violence to murder ; when M. Venillot (Harper's Mag., Ap., 1874, p. 784) in the Univers can say : " For my part, I frankly avow my regret not only that John Hus was not burned sooner, but that Luther was not burned too. And I regret, further, that there has not been some prince sufficiently pious and politic to have made a crusade against the Protestants ;"—all this, and much more that columns of any newspaper will afford, teaches us what confidence to place in human nature. The latter, without the superadded grace of God, is (however learned and wise) wicked and ready, when interest prompts, to do evil ; and even with that grace in a measure added but not wholly controlling the man, it may, as alas ! too many cases attest, fall into a spirit of persecution that is antichristian.' It was probably this view of the incorrigible nature of man that causes even a Renan to despairingly say (Ded. to St Paul): "I am fearful that Fate has stored up no good for us in this world," in direct contradiction to his dreams of a golden future. In the discussion of this subject we plant ourselves firmly upon the Word of God ; what that Word says respecting it we receive, and believe, and teach. (1) It will not do to say, as some, that the progress of the Gospel forbids such an enactment of bloody scenes, for the Bible does not tell us that down to the Sec. Advent the Gospel will be accepted by the masses, but exactly the reverse (Prop. 175, etc.). The tares exist down to Christ's coming, and at the time of His Advent in such abundance, too, that they form a mighty array in contrast to the wheat. The simple fact that the great confederation is arrayed against Christ at His coming is sufficient proof of the correctness of our position ; and that human nature, notwithstanding the privileges and mercy enjoyed, is capable of any act when under the influence of passion and selfishness. Finding this recorded, we receive it. (2) Well-meaning and pious persons, by an expression of affected humility which makes it only the more deceptive, coolly inform us that although recorded we can know nothing about it. Thus e.g. that otherwise excellent writer, James (The Church in Earnest, p. 289), although he can in his way know and tell us of the triumphs of the Church, says : "What vials of wrath have yet to be exhausted upon the world, or through what tribulations the Church has yet to pass on her way to her Millennial and to her triumphant state, it is not for us even to conjecture. Perhaps there are conflicts for her to endure, of which she is now happily ignorant." "Perhaps !" "Conjecture !" is it possible, in the light of so much Scripture, and the exhortations to take heed thereto, to make such an utterance ? Allow that there is symbolical language and details difficult to explain, yet a child even can comprehend that this very language is descriptive of fearful tribulation to the Church under some gigantic power. There is no "conjecture" and "perhaps" in the meaning intended, and the man, whoever he is, and however pious, who implies that the future trial of the Church is one of doubt, is to that extent responsible of concealing the truth from the people." (3) Another class are found who know the severe ordeal through which the Church is to pass, but refrain from expressing themselves. Thus e.g. Dr. Clarke, in closing his comments (Com.) on Dan. 7, employs the following language : "In considering these things and looking at the evils that shall come upon the world before those auspicious times can take place, I may say with Daniel : My cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me, but I keep the matter of my conjectures and consequent feelings in my own heart." Dr. Clarke, however, has not concealed, as many places show, the fact that the church and world is yet to endure great tribulation ; but there are literally a great number who know that the fact is unmistakably predicted and yet make no mention of it, speaking "peace and safety" to the people. They receive and believe, but do not teach, for fear of being regarded enthusiastic, or fanatical, forgetting that they will be held responsible by the Saviour for withholding the Divine warnings." (4). Simple honesty and candor, with a reverence for God's faithful Word, and a desire to warn others, urge us to direct attention to these last times, and to conceal nothing which God has deemed proper to reveal, and which He has commanded us to read, study and proclaim (2 Tim. 4 : 6, Rev. 1 : 3, Luke 11 : 42, etc.). We dare not, with our convictions of duty, do less ; and hence, therefore, even those who may not be willing to receive what is here asserted, will, at least, credit us with being deeply impressed by a sense of responsibility in this matter, seeing that in the immediate connection of this Antichrist the Spirit (Rev. 13 : 9) says : "If any man have an ear, let him hear," — a phrase most expressive that the matter in hand is one of special importance and deserving of our closest attention. We constantly feel too, that we are not so much writing for the present time as for the time of tribulation to come.

When the true Church finds herself struggling amid the thickest gloom, and the false predictions of peace, safety and prosperity are found delusive ; when the world instead of being converted, is found arrayed against the truth, reason holding the sway in place of faith, and the Word of God is abjured and derided as unworthy of enlightened man ; when the multitude follow wondering after the revived beast, the Antichrist, and a bloody death, or a dastardly forsaking and denial of Christ is presented as the only alternative ; when there is no hope or way of escape, and the godly among men are to cease amid the penalties of image-worship, then it is that anything and everything that can throw any light upon the painful situation will be eagerly accepted and pondered. The Bible will be read and searched with increasing interest—intensified by actual trial and suffering—and everything illustrative of the times then existing will be most carefully examined. Then it is that such a work like this—perhaps now derided and sneered at by some professed believers—will be thankfully perused and its deductions from the Scriptures gratefully contrasted with the then existing manifestations and the Divine original. It is both an honor and a privilege to write for such a period, thus becoming, by God's grace, instrumental in upholding the faith and consoling the hearts of martyrs, of sustaining men and women under Antichrist's cruel rule by the assurance that this very trial shall redound, if faithful, to their everlasting honor and glory (Rev. 20 : 4, 6). The same can be said of the faithful warnings given of this period by various writers of ability and eminence in England, Germany, Holland, America, etc., whose works, now appreciated by the few, will be specially read and studied by all the pious (when Antichrist comes) to give them strength and comfort amid the terrible incoming trouble. The very fact that this tribulation has been predicted, that reverent students of the Word insisted upon its fulfilment, etc., will have no little influence in confirming the martyr faith of many.* God help them to suffer and to triumph.

* In preceding Prop. some writers are quoted as predicting "peace and safety" in place of coming antichristian persecution. Such prophets compose a multitude ; and they are found in the Church predicting the speedy conversion of the world, or outside of the Church prophesying progress, etc. Reliance either upon Christianity, or Nature, or Man, causes men (like Buckle, in Mill on Liberty, Mis., vol. 2, p. 22) to take it for granted that the reign of open persecution for uttering religious sentiments is at an end and will never again be revived. Writers, like Draper (Mis. Civ.), contrast the past with the present, and, congratulating themselves upon the decrease of persecution (ascribed to a humanitarian progress), predict an entire removal of the same for the future. These are merely the assumptions of man ; over against such deceptive predictions are the prophecies of God.

* Such is the plain complexion of the predictions, that even Dr. Brown, writing against us (Ch. Sec. Coming, p. 356), is reluctantly obliged to admit this future trial : "But we prophesy not. There has been too much of this. The whole horizon of Christendom may yet be overcast, and the safety of the truth and cause of God be brought into such peril that 'men's hearts may fail them for fear and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth.' But 'when these things begin to come to pass,' we are taught to look and lift up our heads, for 'our Redemption draweth nigh.'" So even a Roman Catholic, Dr. Rutter (Life of Christ, Kelly's Ed., p. 414, foot-note), refers to this future Antichrist and persecution as "dreadful beyond description, and executed in every part of the world," to last "three years and a half," referring to "for in those days shall be such tribulations as were not from the beginning of the creation which God created, until now, neither shall be," and to Apoc. 13 : 7, Dan. 7 : 21, Augustine in De Civ., B. 10, c. 11.

<sup>2</sup> Alas! they are afraid to endure the reproaches, innuendoes, sarcasms, if not worse, of their fellow-ministers or laymen. For it is notorious that just so soon as a man receives the Primitive Church view on these subjects, he becomes the object of contemptuous pity or scorn, and the most uncharitable construction is put upon his belief and piety. The writer has had sad experience in this direction, but it is the experience, more or less, of every true believer.

<sup>4</sup> It is gratifying that from all sides come forth the sober words of warning, God not leaving Himself without faithful witnesses. As the names of many have been already given, it is unnecessary to repeat. Deep thinkers, critical students, and able commentators of the Bible, the most remote from fanaticism, agree in proclaiming the coming of this sore tribulation under the great Antichrist, repeating the early Patristic exhortation (The Pastor of Hermas): "Happy ye who endure the great tribulation that is coming on, and happy they who shall not deny their own life," etc. Many enter their hearty protest against the seducing development theory, which promises still higher and progressive stages through existing means, until the world is overcome and "transformed by the preaching of the truth into a temple of Christ," and point, as sufficient rebutting testimony, to Antichrist and his confederated hosts. Many are sounding the alarm that the tendencies of the age, both in the Church and the world, are indicative of a falling away from the truth, and thus preparative for an incoming Antichrist. (Thus e.g. Delitzsch, in Ser. to Ap. of Bib. Psyc., says of the coming persecution: "But these sufferings also will, as in the first centuries, break out again over the Church of Christ; and if our Christianity were less conformed to the world, we should even now experience sufficient preludes of them.") That there is a time of great trouble still future is admitted by those who are most inclined to spiritualize, as e.g. Barnes Com., Fairbairn On Proph., p. 391, etc. The Reformers gave no uncertain sound, and after the Reformation, many writers, however diverse in other respects, agreed in this, that most violent persecutions were still future, such as Nicolai, Hoe, Doelingius, M. Hofmann, and others. Von Döllinger, Essay on the Prophs., gives many instances derived from the Middle Ages. This may be truthfully stated, that, whatever diversity there may exist among writers of a Millenarian tendency, they are a unit in proclaiming a still future persecution awaiting the Church. Bickersteth (Promised Glory, p. 82) speaks of "the certainty and nearness of the last great tribulation" as "a most reasonable truth in this day;" and points out (p. 91) that "the future tribulation was also distinctly referred to by our Reformers," directing attention to the utterances of King Edward VI.'s Catechism, Becon, the chaplain of Arch. Cranmer, and Latimer. Having already presented such testimony, it needs no additions. It may be added, however, that the vengeance of the 2d Psalm was understood by Luther (so Michelet, Life of Luther, App. p. 411, Hazlett's Ed.) to be future. This has an important bearing on other Scripture.

Obs. 2. That fearful times are immediately to precede the open manifestations of Jesus Christ was so distinctly taught in the Old Test. by various prophets and especially by Daniel, that the Jews universally held to a great time of trouble preceding the times of the Messiah. They anticipated, as Lightfoot, Berthold, and others, remarked: "Dolores Messiaë, or calamitous times to precede the reign of the Messiah," (comp. views of Rabbins, Lange's Com. Matt. 2 : 3, etc.) and which Olshausen (Com. Matt. 24 : 6-8) states the Rabbins called "the birth pangs of the Messiah." Even such passages as Isa. 59 : 19 were thus interpreted by them — upon which verse Clarke (Com. loci) remarks: "This all the Rabbins refer to the Coming of the Messiah. If ye see a generation that endures much tribulation, then (say they) expect Him according to what is written,

'when the enemy shall come in as a flood,' etc. As is well known, these predictions were not verified at the First Advent; no such hostile power as was predicted was overcome by Christ, and no such glorious reign followed (the reasons for this have already been given), and to avoid making this an objection to the Messiahship of Jesus we find that in the New Test. these predictions are incorporated and applied in their fulfilment to the Sec. Advent of this same Jesus. Instead of a denial of them, or an effort to spiritualize them away to mean something else, the Jewish faith is retained, explained, amplified, and referred to the period preceding and at the open revelation of the resurrected and ascended Lord. The confirmation of the Jewish belief is found in the utterances of Jesus (Matt. 24, etc.) in the warnings of the Apostles, and especially in the Revelation of John. "The terrible one that is brought to naught" (Isa. 29 : 19, 20. Comp. Alexander's Version) at the Coming of "the Holy One of Israel" because he oppressed the people of God, is applied to the last head of the beast at the Advent of King Jesus; and the wonderful healing of the people followed by continuous blessings but preceded by the Coming of the Lord in anger toward the nations and in confining the King (the head) in the ordained Tophet (Isa. 30), is in the New Test. referred to that virtually eighth head of the revived beast who is taken at the Coming of the Lord and cast (Rev. 19) into the Lake of Fire. Such adoption and continued amplification of Old Test. prophecies engrafted upon the Sec. Advent are indispensable to preserve the unity of prophecy; and we most gratefully receive and adopt them as essential to the consistency of Revelation, however much some may sneeringly call them "Jewish fables." Satisfied with the grammatical sense of these prophecies—a sense abundantly sustained by past and present fulfilment—and fortified by the Jewish and Primitive interpretation; sustained by a long series of the most eminent divines and expositors, we receive as eminently Scriptural the following clause (quoted by Dr. Soiss in A Question in Eschatology, p. 37—see his references in same connection to other confessions and especially to Melancthon's views respecting "the last times, immediately before the end of the world," etc.) taken from the Latter Confession of Helvetia (1566), XI Art., "Out of heaven the same Christ will return unto Judgment, even then, when wickedness shall chiefly reign in the world, and when Antichrist, having corrupted true religion, shall fill all things with superstition and impiety, and shall most cruelly destroy the Church with fire and bloodshed."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> The early church belief has been repeatedly given, as well as that drawn from Jewish and Apocryphal sources (showing how extensively the view of great tribulation before the incoming Kingdom was held), but an illustration from Augustine (City of God, B. 16, s. 24), owing to its singularity, may be appreciated by the student: Alluding to the "horror of great darkness that fell upon Abraham," he says it "signifies that about the end of this world believers shall be in great perturbation and tribulation." And of the smoking furnace, etc. he adds: "This signifies that at the end of the world, the carnal shall be judged by fire." He appears to regard the sun setting as typical of the drawing nigh of the end of the world, and that Abraham's fear, horror, etc. was typical of what is to be "expected to take place under Antichrist."

Obs. 3. The careful reader of the Bible must have observed this remarkable peculiarity connected with it, viz., that in a multitude of places it speaks of the vengeance poured out upon the nations of the earth by God at being allied to a destruction of Jerusalem, never took place, and the prediction thus failed. Some Apologists, in replying, not seeing how Jesus connects "the days of vengeance" with "the times of the Gentiles," and not recognizing the still future terrible oppression of Jerusalem under the Antichrist as predicted, blunder most lamely in their interpretations.

Obs. 5. All believers in Jesus Christ then existing shall endure a sharp and excessively severe persecution under Antichrist. Many predictions in the Old Test. plainly teach this, when we consider that the Bible regards all such as adopted Jews, engrafted and accounted as the seed of Abraham. Therefore it is, that many prophecies pertaining to this period which describe the sufferings and oppression of God's people, include not merely the elect Jewish nation but also the adopted faithful from among the nations—a continuation of the elect people. Having already presented much Scripture bearing on this point, it is only necessary to direct the attention of the reader to a few passages directly teaching the greatness and universality of this tribulation under this last head of the beast, and this too affirmed of the faithful in Christ Jesus. The time is surely coming, whether men credit it or not, when this Antichrist, in the greatness of his power and the wantonness of his will, shall reproduce the edict of the ancient King of Babylon, and the compelled worship of the golden image on the plains of Dura will be reasserted in the homage demanded for Antichrist and his image. All men are required to worship the beast and to receive, as evidence of it, his distinguishing mark, or else forfeit life itself. The description is too precise and simple to allow us to mistake its dreadful meaning. Turn to Rev. 13, and read what is to be done under this last head, how he shall "blaspheme" God, "make war with the saints and overcome them," "and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed" (comp. Rev. 14 : 9-13, and 17 : 10-14). Then when we turn to Rev. 20 : 4, and 7 : 14, we find that a multitude of persons have, rather than forsake the worship and honor of Jesus, refused to yield obedience to the cruel edict in reverence to the self-deifying Antichrist, and have laid down their lives in martyr faith and grace. Alas! man again will so hate the truth, the humbling but elevating truth, as it is in Christ Jesus, that he will be satisfied with nothing less than a denial of Him who exhibited His costly love for us on the cross, and in the shedding of precious blood consecrated to God through His Son. Alas! it stands recorded that "all that dwell upon the earth shall worship, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." Wonders of which Spiritualism may give the faintest earnest, connected with Humanity following out its fleshly desires and sustained by the powerful civil and military power of the beast, will so impress the minds of the masses that, notwithstanding the impression and even terrific warnings (Rev. 14 : 9-11) of God, they will not only receive the mark of the beast and worship his image, but even carry out his sanguinary edicts and stain their hands with innocent and righteous blood. Thanks be to God, that many, on the other hand, upheld by the Word and the Spirit, urged on by the promises of, and love for, the Saviour, shall not be deceived by the miracles—shall not quail under the demands of worship—shall not sacrifice their honor and glory to abject fear and transitory pain—shall not refuse to tread in the bloody footsteps of their Master who loved them also unto death. We rejoice to-day while writing, that, if faithful ourselves, we shall have the honor and pleasure of seeing, in the Coming Kingdom, that glorious multitude, stripped of their bloody garments and arrayed in white, and of hearing from their own lips the story of trial, of sustaining faith, and of triumph over Antichrist. When these scenes transpire; when death or man-worship is the alternative; when Christ or the Antichrist is to be chosen, then, more impressively than ever, will such Scripture stand forth to bestow encouragement and warning to decide for Jesus, as, e.g., Matt. 10 : 39 ; 16 : 25 ; Mark 8 : 35 ; John 12 : 25, etc. Then, too, that class of passages which exhort us to endure persecution, as e.g. 2 Tim. 3 : 12 ; John 15 : 20 ; Acts 14 : 22 ; 1 Thessa. 3 : 3 ; 1 Pet. 4 : 9, etc.—which encourage us to meet it, as e.g., Phil. 1 : 8, 28, 29 ; 1 Pet. 1 : 6 ; 2 Thessa. 1 : 4, 5 ; 1 Pet. 4 : 12, 13, etc.—which stimulate us to suffering by the promise of blessing, as e.g., Matt. 5 : 12 ; Rom. 8 : 18 ; 1 Pet. 1 : 7 ; Luke 6 : 22, 23, etc., will all be deeply pondered and cherished in loving hearts." The warning given by Arch. Usher (see statement in detail, Brooks's El. Proph. Interp., p. 168), just previous to his death, "that a very great persecution would fall upon all the Protestant churches of Europe" adding "I tell you, all you have yet seen hath been but the beginning of sorrows to what is yet to come upon the Protestant churches of Christ, which will ere long fall under a sharper persecution than ever," is only one of a multitude that might be quoted from eminent men—all based upon the decided teachings of the Word. When conservative men, like Usher, are forced to make such acknowledgments; when the most able and learned divines, the leading commentators and expositors have no hesitancy (comp. Olshausen, Lange, Alford etc.) in repeating the same, and exhorting to observation, etc.; when the Spirit has presented it to us in a form that leaves no possible doubt (saving in unbelief) of its occurrence, it is folly and rashness in us to turn away from the subject. If we have no regard for ourselves (not deeming ourselves in danger of experiencing it) let us consider those who may and will experience it, peradventure our own children or children's children. Love for these, love for the Church, love for our fellow-men, love for the truth and the Redeemer, should influence us neither to neglect these things nor to keep silence respecting them. Allow that we are mistaken in the minor details, that we have misapprehended this or that particular statement in the description yet there remains the broad and distinctive outlines of a coming dreadful, persecuting power under which believers shall fall as the wheat before the reaper. If there is a truth recorded in God's Word easy of comprehension, and abundantly confirmed by reiteration, it is, that, just before the open revelation of Jesus Christ, the Antichrist, whoever he may be, shall terribly persecute the people of God. While deprecating that precise fixing of time which so many, to the injury of the cause, adopt in their writings, yet it is true (as Rieneke and many others have very ably shown) that the precise time, during which this persecution is to last, has been pointed out in Rev. 13 : 5-8, comp. Rev. 11 : 3-7, etc. The double assurance is thus given that this Antichrist has his time limited, and that the persecution is to be a short one.* This persecution too shall be "suddenly"—after "the secret counsel of the wicked and "the privily laid snares" have been concocted—sprung upon the righteous to take them if possible unawares, and just as "suddenly" (Ps. 64, comp. Rev. 16 : 15 ; 1 Thessa. 5 : 3, etc.) shall God ensnare the persecutors in destruction. No doubt too, one cause of the exceeding bitterness and animosity manifested toward the followers of Jesus, will be the previous proclamation (see Obs. below) that this last revived head will be the Antichrist. The personal hatred toward believers is thus easily accounted for; naturally, it will be excited by the faithful portraiture which, by way of warning, Christians will extensively circulate. We can well imagine, when contemplating the extent of the bloodshed which is to be inflicted by "the throne of iniquity" "which frameth mischief by a law" (Ps. 94), and causes its upholders to "gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous and condemn innocent blood" how then the prayer (same Ps.) shall ascend "O Lord God, to whom vengeance belongeth; O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, show Thyself. Lift up thyself, Thou Judge of the earth; render a reward to the proud. Lord, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph? How long shall they utter and speak hard things? and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves? they break in pieces Thy people, O Lord, and afflict thine heritage. They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless. Yet they say the Lord shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it." Then comes the response (same Ps.) that God does hear and see, and that "He shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and shall cut them off in their own wickedness; yea, the Lord our God shall cut them off." Yes, and even before the vials of God's wrath are poured out upon this last great enemy we find those delivered who "had gotten the victory" (strange but glorious victory through death) "over the beast and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God," etc. (see Rev. 15 : 2-4 and comp. e. g., with Rev. 16 : 2). They, owing to faithfulness, shall see their prayer answered—shall behold the outpouring of the judgments "upon the men which had the mark of the beast and upon them which worshipped his image," and "upon the seat of the beast"—shall witness the awful overthrow of the once mighty enemy forming "the supper of the great God" for the fowls of heaven (Rev. 19 : 17). What an astounding change from persecution to inexpressible glory, and in glory to behold the burning, devouring wrath of a justly incensed God descend upon a self-exalted, self-deifying and vilely murderous Humanity."

operations, which yet are called miracles of falsehood (Roos), because men who regard them as proofs of the divinity of the unrighteous one are thereby miserably deceived. Performed by dark, gloomy powers, they are indeed at bottom nothing really, creative but assumptions, imitations, manifestations of a sham strength, which at last is a wretched impotence, monstrosities without any saving object, but not, therefore, mere juggleries." (Comp. Alford, Olshausen, etc., on 2 Thess. 2).

<sup>3</sup> May we add, by way of encouragement, if men of the world have gladly sacrificed life for earthly honor (as Greeks and Romans)—if they have cheerfully laid down life for country and glory (as history repeatedly attests)—if they have even met death with singing, triumphing over the retention of faith in some idea (as during the French Revolution), surely believers in "the Christ" should not deem life so precious as to sacrifice for it the highest and noblest gifts of heaven and eternity. Not the saying of Jesus will be verified: for every one who attempts, by a denial of Jesus, to save his life, shall lose it, and every one who for Christ's sake is willing to lose his life shall save it. If Jesus died for us, surely, if demanded, it should not be so terrible a matter to die for Him, especially when honor and glory shall be the joyful portion of all who thus manifest faith and hope. May God, in mercy, enlighten and sustain His dear children in this coming trial, and may they have the unspeakable happiness of rising in glorious honor and witnessing with their own eyes (comp. Rev. 14, 15, and 16) God's vengeance upon their arrogant and bloody enemy.

<sup>4</sup> That is, in reference to the persecution under this last head of the beast. The Jewish tribulation, which shall be "even unto the consummation" (Dan. 9:27), is a lengthy one, corresponding with the time predicted by Jesus and mentioned by Paul, running through the period of the times of the Gentiles and the blindness of the Jews, until the fulness of the Gentiles has come in—thus embracing "the consumption determined" (Isa. 28:22). When "the consummation," the end, comes, then this brief but disastrous career of the Antichrist is witnessed. Even if we take Lincoln's (Lects. on Rev., vol. 2, p. 31) idea of the "one hour" being equivalent to "one time," over against the generally received view, yet the general teaching on the subject still makes it the last outbreak of wickedness, enduring but a short time.

<sup>5</sup> We are glad that able men sound this warning to the Church; that Auberlen, Riggerbach, Huebner, Luthardt, Von Gerlach (comp. e.g. Lange's Com. Thess., p. 138, etc.), Alford, and many others, give no uncertain teaching; that here and there, in almost all denominations, some of the pious ponder these things and tell them to others. It is gratifying to find such men as G. Müller (Sermon preached at Mildmay Park, June 29th, 1879) pointedly refer to this coming trouble, and exhort believers in view of the crisis; as Rev. Dr. Wordsworth, Bp. of Lincoln (Chris. Herald, March 27th, 1879), calling special attention to "The Coming Persecution" of the Church because a plainly revealed fact; as various German, English, French, Dutch, Swiss, and American writers, who fully indorse the dreadful nature of the incoming tribulation, some likening (as Epp) the initiatory to a "Gethsemane of the Church," and its climax to a "Golgotha of the Church." Works more or less specifically devoted to bring forth with prominence this idea of future tribulation are presented to us by Millenarian writers of ability, such as Seiss, Brooks, etc. Essays calling attention to the serious character of the predictions relating to the subject are circulated, as e.g. Rev. Parson's before the Proph. Conf. at New York, on "The Present Age and Development of Antichrist." Recent commentators clearly teach it, as e.g. Fausset (Com., Dan. 7:24) holds to a future terrible persecution of the Church under a personal Antichrist, saying: "The Church has endured a pagan and a papal persecution; there remains for her an infidel persecution, general, purifying, and cementing. He (Antichrist) will not merely, as Popery, substitute himself for Christ in Christ's name, but deny the Father and the Son (1 Jno. 2:22). The persecution is to continue up to Christ's second coming (v. 21, 22); the hour of blasphemy cannot therefore be past; for now there is almost a general cessation of persecution." Indeed, the view is sometimes expressed in the most unexpected quarters, as e.g. Pressense (The Early Days of Christianity, p. 285) says of Paul's teaching: "Before this (the glorious consummation of the Kingdom of God), however, a terrible conflict will take place between the Church and Antichrist personified in the 'man of sin,' 2 Thess. 2:3-8, and the close of this conflict will be the return of Christ in the clouds to judge the world and to raise the dead, 1 Thess. 4:14-18."

Obs. 6. The Papacy too, however faithless and unchristian, however apostatizing and antichristian in the past, and future, shall also fall beneath this Antichrist. The Papacy, with all its arrogant claims and its persecution of the saints, is too Christian even for this lawless, godless Leader. Whatever aid (as many believe) it may at first extend in paving the way for the development of the Antichrist, it is in antagonism with his ambitious projects and his personal claims to universal homage, and it, too, finds in him a deadly enemy. The proof of its downfall and destruction is distinctly given in Rev. 17 : 15, 16, and having already called attention to it, a repetition of argument is unnecessary. The line of punishment falls in with that of previously committed offence ; strenuously opposed to "religious liberty" and ready, wherever it had the power, to crush it as a dangerous and deadly crime, the Papacy now in turn feels the effective and crushing blows of a Tyrant who also will not tolerate "religious liberty." Instead of the Pope as the vicegerent of Jesus Christ on earth, now One arises claiming to be God, who will not permit any such claimant to honor and power to exist contemporaneously with himself. The Papacy, therefore, is doomed to perish ; the beast and the ten horns (so Bengel, Stuart, etc.) shall hate her, shall make her desolate and naked, shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. This, we are assured, too, is fully determined (Rev. 17 : 17) by God Himself.

The critical student, when comparing Rev. 14 : 8 ; Rev. 16 : 19 and Rev. 18 : 15-18, will find that the overthrow of the Papacy (and State churches) begins and is consummated under the Antichrist, the dregs being drunken when vengeance itself begins to fall upon Antichrist and his followers. It certainly is completed in its most destructive form before the Antichrist and his co-laborers are met by the open Parousia of Christ. The divine portraiture of the future is very different from that presented by Rev. Burke, in his lecture, "The Pope's Tiara : its Past, Present, and Future," where he most confidently predicts the restoration of the regal power of the Pope and its vast extension over the nations.

Obs. 7. The world, the nations, shall not escape this tribulation. Led on by their rejection of the truth, they willingly place themselves under the yoke of this Antichrist, and the result is, that they shall feel the tyranny of their received master, be participants in the reception of the avenging vials, and finally fall under the contest with the Lamb. Jesus tells us, Luke 21 : 25, that there shall be "upon earth distress of nations, with perplexity ; the sea and the waves roaring ; men's hearts failing them from fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth ; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." With this the prophets all agree, giving us when brought together a most gloomy and fearful portrayal of wickedness, misery, suffering, and punishment. If any desire to look at the Divine description, let them read, e.g., the pouring out of the vials—Rev. 16, or the overthrow by Christ Rev. 19, or the opening of the sixth seal Rev. 6, or the utterances of the prophets Isa. 24 ; Ps. 2 ; Zech. 14 ; Joel 3 ; Zeph. 3, etc. Having already referred to Scripture (Props. 147, 133. Obs. 8, (11) 160, 161, 130, etc.) relating to this matter, it is unnecessary to repeat what is so plain. It is pre-eminently the day of God's vengeance, the period of God's controversy with the nations, the time when God rises up to the prey, the season when God's anger and fury and indignation shall be poured out, when fire and sword and plague and all manner of evil shall find its affrighted victims, and when the once weeping, dying, loving Jesus shall come with His mighty messengers "in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." Let men say what they please, God is abundantly justified in thus exhibiting a dreadful day of vengeance. Behold the situation as the Spirit describes it. Here upon this very earth created by God, the people, for whom He even provided a Redeemer, rebel against and actually disown him, contemptuously reject His Son, the Son of His love whom He designs as the Theocratic Ruler, and proceed to manifest this disregard and hatred by elevating a man into the place of God, and brutally putting to death all who will not worship him. Is it any wonder that God is angry? Is it a matter of astonishment that "the earth shall be devoured with the fire of His jealousy," seeing that another is exalted to His place? Should it be a matter of surprise, that the Theocratic King—the One to whom the honor of ruling the nations justly belongs—should come in wrath against this arrogant and boasting claimant and his adherents? No! it is only a matter of wonder that the long-suffering of God, the patience of Jesus, should endure so long, and allow such encroachments upon the Divine prerogatives. The solution of this, we are told, is found in God's desire to complete the number of His elect, to test the faith of His people, to permit human nature for its own punishment to set up and try its saviour, to indicate more strikingly the impotency of man and the greatness and majesty of His own power, to teach the race the impressive lesson that He is a Covenant-keeping God, who has mercifully held that Covenant in abeyance for purposes of mercy but who, when men in the highest of earthly relations deny Him and substitute another to be their God, vindicates His own sense of justice by destroying those enemies and fulfilling His Covenant promises both to the Son and the Son's brethren. An expressive declaration that also teaches how desperately blinded and wicked the nations are when entering under the judicial visitations of God before the final catastrophe, is found in the words: "they repented not to give Him the glory"—they "repented not of their deeds," but continued on in "blaspheming the Name of God." For the destruction of such unmitigated rebels, God needs no justification; if, in justice and love to the martyrs, to His Son and to Himself, He did not do so, then and then only might we question both the justice and love of our God.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The critical student is referred to Delitzsch's rendering of Isa. 63 : 3, where, instead of having the English version "and of the people there was none with me," he gives, "and of the nations no one was with me," which is in accordance with the general analogy of the Word, (1) that no nations are converted in this dispensation, but only individuals out of them; (2) that at the time of the Second Advent all nations, as such, are opposed to Christ; and (3) that the saints are with Him at this coming vengeance. This also shows, what able writers have insisted upon, that such highly favored nations as e.g. England and the United States shall not escape. The simple fact is, that no nation, aside from its sinfulness, etc., will be willing to give up its own government and submit to the incoming Theocracy under the Messiah. Hence it is, as we shall show under Prop. 164, that Gentile domination, under its varied forms, will utterly come to an end.

stand in judgment over the future actions of Christ and His saints, and to denounce them, if they conform to the plain grammatical sense, as wrong, outrageous, etc. Such an attitude may suit unbelievers, but is unfitted for believers in the Word. (Comp. Prop. 115.) Sufficient is given to abundantly justify God's proceedings; a sufficiency is presented in the past history of the Theocracy, the employment of angels in destruction, the proceedings against the Jewish nation and other nations, to show that God will, if the circumstances demand it, resort to violence, to the pouring out of His wrath and vengeance, in order to overwhelm His enemies. The principle announced in Isa. 50 : 11 holds good down to the present, and will be most fearfully verified in the last days, and then how great the "sorrow!" We may appropriately quote Alford: "If it be said, that this is somewhat a dark view to take of the prospects of mankind, we may answer, first, that we are not speculating on the phenomena of the world, but we are interpreting God's Word; secondly, that we believe in One in whose hands all evil is working for good—with whom there are no accidents nor failures—who is bringing out of all this struggle, which shall mould and measure the history of the world, the ultimate good of man and the glorification of His boundless love in Christ; and thirdly, that no prospect is dark for those who believe in Him. For them all things are working together for good; and in the midst of the struggle itself, they know that every event is their gain; every apparent defeat, real success; and even the last dread conflict, the herald of that victory, in which all who have striven on God's part shall have a glorious and everlasting share."

Obs. 8. The reader need not be detained for us to prove that this tribulation immediately precedes the re-establishment of the Davidic throne and kingdom. This has been done under various Propositions and in numerous Observations. It is sufficiently clear that immediately after the tyranny and persecution of this last head of the beast, and that after the overthrow of the confederation under this Antichrist, the Kingdom of the Lord Jesus appears with its Millennial blessedness, and extends itself over the nations of the earth. Leaving the abundant Scripture already presented, we confine ourselves to a solitary illustration, which forcibly describes this period of the enemies' triumph, their overthrow, and the peaceful kingdom that succeeds. Take Ps. 46 and consider how the Spirit describes the confidence of the true believer in a time of unparalleled trouble and commotion, precisely such as attends this period of tribulation. It is a time when "the heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved," and God helps His people amid the waving, troubled and swelling waters "when the morning appeareth" (marg. reading, comp. Prop. 139) and He breaks to pieces the warlike equipments of the nations, exalting Himself among the heathen—that "a river (i.e., a kingdom), the streams whereof shall make glad the City of God," appears and is firmly established, because "God is in the midst of her." (Comp. other versions which, with some change, even make it more expressive as e.g., Luther's, that the City of God, in which are the holy habitations of the Most High shall be joyful, etc.). The testimony on this point is overwhelming, and to an extent too that leaves every one who rejects it inexcusable. There is no doubt whatever that so much is said respecting it, that when the hour of the sorest trial comes to the Church, she may console and encourage herself by the glorious prospect before her.

The Church will come out of this tribulation radiant with glory, honoring her living Head with a love stronger than death. While the development and the culmination of Antichrist is permitted in order to evidence the outgrowth of human reason unaided by divine grace (thus corroborating the results as portrayed so depreciatory in the Scriptures), and to show that human depravity makes it impossible for civilization, without Christianity, to produce the highest morality (the unbelieving boast—not seeing that Grecian and Roman civilization is repeating itself in entailing corruption as the outcome of a modernized heathenism), this brings with it a severe and galling tyranny and punishment under which the nations themselves groan, wishing for deliverance. While the Church, owing to her highmindedness, pride, departure from truth, and sins, is allowed to pass under this terrible rod, she comes out of it purified, refined, and exalted, securing the admiration and allegiance of the nations, for she will participate in the honor, power and glory of her mighty Theocratic King.

Obs. 9. This subject now so much neglected, even despised by many, will at a future time be made the special subject of preaching. Holy Writ informs us that on the withdrawal of the 144,000 (Rev. 14), the Church will then so definitely know its nearness to the tribulation under Antichrist, will be so profoundly impressed with the greatness and imminency of danger—will so accurately realize what are the cruel demands of the Antichrist, that the most extensive proclamation is not only made (vs. 6, 7.) to fear and worship God because “the hour of His judgment is come;” but in the plainest of terms (vs. 9–13) the Antichrist is pointed out, and men are exhorted by the most powerful of motives not to worship the beast or his image and not to receive his mark. Then believers, instead of neglecting these prophecies and ridiculing those who engage in their study, will earnestly investigate and compare all that the Spirit has mercifully given, and will acknowledge the wisdom of those who honored God’s Word in accepting of the testimony. The preaching will give no uncertain sound; the classes symbolized will faithfully proclaim the message, and, thank God, with so great success that they will persuade a multitude not to engage in the worship of Antichrist but to lay down their lives in honor of the truth, in love for their Redeemer, and in hope of speedy and glorious deliverance. By faith, we now see that noble band of preachers and hear the burning words of warning fall from their lips: “If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of His indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels and in the presence of the Lamb,” etc. By faith we see fathers, mothers and children, unbroken families, delicate females, feeble age and childhood, receive God’s Word and trusting in it, spurn the worship tendered to them and fall beneath the bloody stroke of self-deifying Humanity. Then too, the seducing dream now proclaimed from so many pulpits by even earnest and honest hearts (viz., that the Church by present means and instrumentalities is progressing onward to sure triumphs over the world) will be heard no more giving place to the warnings, the threatenings of Antichrist’s brief victory over the Church (for he shall overcome the saints and the godly shall cease), and to exhortations to faithfulness and steadfastness in the coming bloody drama. And, of this too, we feel assured from the complexion of the predictions implying it, that the sense of a common danger, that the knowledge that all believers without exception are now to enter the great tribulation, that the fact that all who love Jesus more than Antichrist must suffer, will unite all believers the more firmly together in love and fellowship. Before the incoming Antichrist, that mighty enemy who shall so freely and unsparingly shed the blood of the faithful, the differences of confession, worship, government, etc., will sink into insignificance before the great and vital point now alone insisted upon, viz., Have you such faith in, and such love for, Jesus Christ that for His sake you are willing to die? All, all, who have such faith and love, who are determined by grace sustaining them not to worship the beast or his image, are then indeed and in truth brethren, and in their common trial will mutually encourage each other. God help them to triumph.

Let not persons shrink from the idea that such an Antichrist will be developed. Over against Tennyson's dream of the "parliament of man" and the "federation of the world" by higher stages of progress, we face this stern reality thus predicted; over against Goldwin Smith's ("The Ascent of Man," in Eclectic Mag., March, 1877) confident prediction that vice is natural, and will be eliminated under natural effort and development, we have man's moral nature unchanged and culminating in wickedness under this humanitarian sway; over against the lauded and magnified perfectibility of man and the eloquently portrayed glorious future (in which eulogy many sincerely unite, thus ridding themselves of the humbling cross of Christ), we have this boasted progress manifesting itself in fearful despotism and cruelty; over against Herbert Spencer's (Social Statics, p. 79) prophecy that through the development of evolution we shall have "evanescence of evil" (which he makes as "logically certain," as "that all men shall die," we have evil extending and widening until it reaches this tyrannical and cruel climax. The rise and the career of the Antichrist will effectually remove the notions, now so confidently expressed, concerning the conversion of the world by Christianity, or its subjection to Romanism, or its being made happy and blessed by "the religion of the future," civilization, evolution, natural development, republicanism, education, science, etc. (See Prop. 175.) The nations seeking freedom from the just claims of God and the cross of Jesus, shall reap the liberty that depraved human nature inaugurates in intensified selfishness and oppression.

Obs. 10. Lastly it may be proper to dwell, briefly, upon a single point connected with the worship of Antichrist, viz., that of the worship of the image. The image is made to represent the revived first beast (Rev. 13 : 14, 15), and the second beast or false prophet "had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed." This is an image of the revived last head of the beast, or of the personal Antichrist; and it is expressly designed to contribute to the honor and worship of this last head.<sup>1</sup> Without being able to describe, precisely, in what this image will consist; without being able to tell what is meant by giving it life (unless foreshadowed by the attempt of those Spiritualists to make an image through which communications might be derived); yet from the tenor of the prediction we strongly incline to the view that it embraces idol worship, and in this position we are sustained by other predictions. The original word denotes an image, an idol image (Barnes and other coms.) and it being an object of worship, representative, in some way, of this last personal head, it then becomes an idol, i. e., something that is revered, etc.<sup>2</sup> If this were the only prophecy descriptive of the worship of these last days, there might be some hesitancy (seeing that it might be taken symbolically) in ascribing literal idol worship to this period. The proclamation of Rev. 14, to worship God implies a return to idol worship in the phraseology that is used, although it may have exclusive reference to the coming worship claimed by Antichrist. It denotes, at least, that men shall now be called upon to worship something else than the true God. Before deciding how far we are to limit this, it is necessary to look over the predictions relating to the same time, and in doing this, we find such intimations given of existing idol worship, that, whatever, difficulty there may be to explain the language in its allusions to the future, we must be inclined to the belief that an image erected to a personal Antichrist refers to one set up for worship as a kind of test of and authoritative medium to Antichrist's worshippers. It is supposed by some, that Antichrist being lawless and godless, will have no idolatry. Thus, e. g., Chrysostom (Ency.

Britan., art. Antichrist) observes on 2 Thess. 2, "that Antichrist will not lead men to idolatry, but will rather abolish the worship of false gods as well as that of the true God, commanding the world to worship himself alone as the only Deity." This entirely misapprehends the spirit and intent of the prophecy, which expressly affirms the retention of a religious element and worship, but has it directed as a climax to the worship of "the man of sin," without specifying, as John does, through what medium this worship shall be presented. Paul tells us that he will set aside all worship excepting that directed to himself; and John informs us that this will be done by him but through the agency of a remarkable image worship which is representative of himself. Chrysostom is only correct if the ordinary past idol worship is meant by him; for that idolatry, the use of images, is retained in Antichrist's worship is not denied by Paul, seeing that he does not explain the manner in which the worship is tendered, whether direct or indirect. Why is it that in so many passages allusions to idol worship are made, if it is not designed to teach us that when men are once prepared to deify a fellow-man, they are also in a condition to do this through the instrumentality and reminding influences of images? Look, e.g., at Isa. 66 : 17, and 65 : 11-17 in their connection as they stand related to the period immediately preceding the Coming of the Lord to consume His enemies in anger, to deliver His people, and to create the New Heavens and New Earth, and directly it is asserted, however we may explain the details, that, in some way, idol worship is then exhibited, and is one of the things which provokes the anger of the Lord. Indeed all commentators, however difficult they find the passages, however much they vary in their renderings, however much they differ in their application, are agreed that it is (Barnes' loci) "a general description of idolatry and of idolaters as the enemies of God, and that the idea is that God would come with vengeance to cut off all His foes." (Comp. Fausset, etc.) More than this, obscure as the passages are (it would be desirable, if some one competent for the task would aid in deciding their definite meaning) yet sufficient remains, as is seen in expositions, to show that reference is had to a singular and hitherto unexplained worship; for under the notion that it is something that has transpired numerous conjectures have been offered in explanation, none of which finds its mate in past history. If it be said, that these references more particularly relate to the Jewish people, this is admitted with the remark: that the Jewish nation, like all others, who are not believers in Jesus Christ, will be forced into the worship of this beast and image, which is one reason why they, in punishment, suffer under this Antichrist, who, for some reason, turns against them in his anger. Whatever this may be, the difficulty in explaining the details of this worship, the general affirmation that it shall prevail, remains true, and is found even in such passages as Isa. 45 : 16, 20, which in their fulness of meaning with the context are not exhausted until the salvation promised is fully bestowed; or Isa. 44 and 46, and 56, Jer. 10, etc., for whatever inchoate or typical fulfilment are assigned in the past they have such a striking relationship to some great manifestation of idolatry which shall excite the special vengeance of God, followed by a glorious deliverance of His people, that we are at no loss how to estimate their fitness in portraying this very period, at least in spirit. The freedom of the Jews from idolatry since the Advent of Jesus and the destruction of their city, has been their particular boast, especially in these days from Rationalizing pens; this boast shall also be taken from them, and John 5 : 43, be verified, in that rejecting Jesus who "came in the Father's name," they will, in this Antichrist, "receive another who shall come in his own name." If the reader still doubts the prevalence of idol worship at a period still future, let him turn to Isa. 2, and read how in connection with the Coming of the Lord in His terrible Majesty to humble the loftiness and haughtiness of man and to exalt Himself, etc., "the land is full of idols" and "they worship the work of their own hands" and "the mean man boweth down and the great man humbleth himself" before them, viz. (v. 20) "idols of silver and idols of gold" which they made for their worship (comp. Ps. 97 : 7 ; 96 : 5 ; Hos. 13 : 8 ; Zech. 10 : 2 ; Rev. 9 : 20 ; Isa. 17, etc.). And in verse 6, the Jews are especially implicated as also being engaged, joining hands with strangers, etc. (comp. diff. versions, and notice the Chaldee, "their land is filled with idols as at the beginning"). Men may now ridicule the idea that enlightened nations should again return to idol worship, just as they may that of nations accepting of and worshipping a self-deifying man. They may tell us that the notion is too disparaging to the human understanding to be credited. But it stands recorded that man's depravity shall then lead him into the grossest delusions, and into believing and trusting in damnable lies. The falling back upon heathen philosophy, the denial of the personality of God, the exaltation of Humanity, etc., is clearly paving the way for a modified form of idolatry. We have no idea that it will be introduced in the form in which it once existed, or, that it can be accepted by the people without the special wonderful co-operation of the False Prophet. It will be suited to the professed enlightenment of the age—it will be made subservient to the exaltation of the Antichrist ; it will, in all probability be claimed to be a mere directory and acknowledgment of worship to the beast ; that the idols themselves are not worshipped but only used as a test and medium of worship to him to whom it is then legally awarded. Human nature repeats itself ; and when men thus boldly deny God and elevate one of their own number to the position of a God, the great representative of a worshipped Humanity, then the greater may well include the lesser offense, viz.—that with the mark received, with the acknowledgment of this usurper of God's rights, and with the worship rendered unto him, each one should keep in his house an image to this beast, through which (as Romanists now through images operate) such worship is made manifest, so that in the persecution of unbelievers, the faith and spirit of a true adherent of Antichrist's may be exhibited. The religious element in man cannot be entirely crushed, and the masses must have something to satisfy an inherent craving ; this is afforded in the substituted worship, artfully constructed to increase the greatness and power of its directing head? It may require ten thousand additional powerful pens to teach the non-personality of God and to deify law, or nature, or man, before the people are fully ripened for such a manifestation ; it may yet require a vast amount of "false philosophy" Spiritualism, formative principles of "the New Religion of Humanity," etc., before such a worship can be instituted ; it may yet call for repeated attacks upon the Bible, its God and its Messiah, scattered by willing hands over the earth to root out a sense of accountability, before such a transfer is possible, but it will come, sooner or later. How enlightened reason will act in its hatred to the truth can be seen in the past ; and we may rest assured that the same spirit which led men, proud of their reason, to worship it in the person of a harlot at the French Revolution, has not yet perished, but that it lives, widely extended, and only needs the miracle working power of the False Prophet to concentrate and direct it in the way predicted. Alas! men, unthinkingly and rashly, are engaged in the destructive work of paving the way—by their efforts against the teachings of God's Word and to lessen its authority among the people—for an incoming worship and persecution, which, if they could see it in all its vileness and horror as it will exist, would fill them with remorse at the initiative of their own labors.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Having abundantly shown that this last head has not yet appeared, this at once removes the notion of many that the image is something in the past. The image is only constructed when this last head appears and not before. The favorite view with numerous writers of the past and present is, that this image is the Papacy, thus representing and aiding the power of the Empire; but this is utterly inconsistent with the prophecy, seeing that this image exists and is worshipped after the Papacy is destroyed by this beast and the confederated ten horns. This is clear from our entire argument, and needs no additional remark.

<sup>2</sup> We repeat, owing to its importance: It cannot possibly be anything relating to the Papal Power, as many have supposed, simply because that power, instead of being worshipped, etc., is destroyed by the beast. It can scarcely be a power, Ecclesiastical, or Civil, simply because it is not afterward mentioned as meeting the same doom with the beast and false prophet. The narrative seems to imply that it is merely an instrumentality of imposture—something to represent the beast, like the statues erected to the Roman emperors, and becoming, in consequence of the likeness or representative character, an object of worship and homage. Hence we cannot receive the idea (e.g. Craven, Lange's Com. Rev., p. 273) that the image is the little horn of Dan. 7: 8, 24 (because that horn is the culminated Antichrist to and for whom the image is constructed); or that it is the revived Papal Roman Empire as seen in the Papacy (because the Roman Empire existed continuously and supported the Papacy or harlot); or that (as Lange, p. 270) the image of the beast is the reappearance of heathenism or the heathen world power in the Christian world (for while this is true, the design of this image is not to represent this fact, but to aid to enforcing it as manifested in the last head of this power).

<sup>3</sup> We shall then have in terrible force the "abomination of desolation," and Luther's prediction (Michelet's Life of Luther, Ap., p. 379) will be verified: "By and by we shall have visionaries who will undertake to give all the various sorts of idolatries (religious) an appearance of faith, and so excuse idolatry itself." Then "the Goddess of Destiny" (Delitzsch's rend. of Isa. 65: 11) will find her cruel worshippers. There is a deep significance in the sudden conclusion of 1 Jno. 5: 21, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols" (i.e. from images or figures calculated to represent an object of worship). While applicable to the age in which John wrote and after (as in Mariolatry, etc., Lange's Com. loci), yet it is specially applicable to this period, for in the epistle itself is prominently held forth the true and divine Christ and the false Antichrist substituted in His place, and the concluding warning is weighty. But what can we expect when men prostitute splendid talents in arraying heathen in the stolen virtues of Jesus, the Christ (as e.g. Arnold in the Light of Asia), and present them, varnished all over with poetical and eloquent laudation, for admiration and reverence.

<sup>4</sup> Alas! men turn a deaf ear to God's warnings, pointing to education, intelligence, etc., as if they were barriers to human depravity, and insured freedom from persecution. History repeats itself, and ten thousand instances like that of Vinegar Hill (Froude, English in Ireland, vol. 3, p. 396), indicate how depravity can override all considerations. Literary men (De Tocqueville The Old Régime, p. 170), paved the way for the scenes of the French Revolution, and many of the most intelligent were leaders in the most brutal scenes. The sentiments so actively propagated by them are still prevalent and extending. The spirit of a Chammette, of an Anacharsis Clootz (Thiers's His. French Rev., vol. 2, p. 366, etc.), is still actively at work, as thousands of volumes and myriads of pages evidence. Niebuhr (Lec. on Rome), has repeatedly noticed a simple historical fact, that the absolute power to do all things is productive of "double vices." The history of the past, both in Popery and Protestantism, shows that when men are once in power, and then get the notion that others are hindering their advancement or the development of man's higher interests (as associated with themselves), it is easy, under such a plea, to excite—even in apparently sincere hearts—the spirit of persecution. Facts—bloody facts almost beyond credence—form such a testimony, that God's foreknowledge in this direction is in correspondence with what is in man—especially when he casts himself loose from God's restraining Word. It is a sad commentary on human nature (so landed by reason), that this dispensation begins and closes with the persecution of the Church, thus showing that so many centuries of divine forbearance, mercy, and grace have not crushed the inherent spirit of evil. Lecky (Hist. of European Morals, vol. 1, p. 157), gives this corroborative remark: "It is one of the plainest facts that neither the individuals nor the ages that have been most distinguished for intellectual achievements have been most distinguished for moral excellence, and that a higher intellectual and material civilization has often co-existed with much depravity." Eocles. His. informs us, how under religious prejudice the Greeks massacred the Latins, the Latins butchered the Greeks, and both condemned and killed the heretics; and civil history tells us that the most cruel and terrible wars and acts perpetrated were based on religious principle. One of the most painful exhibitions of human nature in the past is that urging Romanists to kill Protestants and the latter to retaliate; while in the name of "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity" the rights of conscience were trampled into the gore-stained dust. Prescott (Library Notes, p. 240), has well said: "that in every country the most fiendish passions of the human heart are those kindled in the name of religion." Human nature is so readily perverted that even women (like Queen Isabella) rejoiced over the sight of suffering, coolly (as the ladies of her court) examined the half-naked bodies of the Huguenots with indecent remarks, and brutally trifled (as in the Reign of Terror) with scenes of blood and horror as if they were of the most ordinary nature. History repeats itself, the only difference being in the intensity exhibited. No matter how great delusion is connected with the same, the mind can be completely controlled; and, as Dr. Carpenter (Lect. on Mesmerism, etc.), has stated concerning Epidemic Delusions, "that the condition which underlies them all is the subjection of the mind to a dominant idea," we may reasonably expect such an exemplification repeated in the Antichristian development. Let the time come when the righteous shall be removed by a translation (Prop. 130), and then the nations, under the influence of the last head of the beast and his co-workers, will ascend the extreme of impiety and wickedness, of which the principles and results of the French Revolution are a specimen, indicative of what a polished and intelligent, but unrepentant, man can do when frenzied by high-sounding ideas, "the divinity of the human race, the only sovereign," "no other worship than that of reason, equality, and eternal truth," "the empire of reason and liberty," "the religion of Reason," etc., (Pressense's Religion and the Reign of Terror, pp. 202, 219, 225, etc.). It is well to notice that men, whom Michelet, and others, laud as "the founders of the religion of the future, and of religious liberty," established decrees making all worship and religion opposed to the introduced worship and religion of Reason penal in "the sacred name of Liberty," and that while for a brief period Atheism ruled the rulers, yet bloody men speedily returned to the idea that some kind of religion was indispensable, and hence the terrible prostitution of religion under Robespierre and his adherents. Lord Carnovan in an address before the London Birbeck Institution (Pop. Science Monthly, Feb., 1874), refers to the tendency of making science the predominant study, of causing it to encroach more and more on the domain of theology and to repudiate Christianity, and then expresses the thought, that "he, for one, would regret to see the affairs of men regulated by such a standard as they would apply. If such views as they held were pushed to an extreme, he could scarcely imagine a Pharisee more arrogant, a Sadducee more self-opinioned, a fanatical monk of the middle ages more intolerant than they who practiced them were likely to be." He warns against the extremists, and emphatically declares that "he entertains a great dread of scientific men as the ultimate rulers of a community," directing attention to the effect that Mill's teaching has to harden the heart, to Compté's design to transfer all power to a philosophical class, thus forming a sort of corporate hierarchy; to the fact that "Italian cruelty" was a proverb when Italy counted more men of science than the rest of Europe, etc., so that history indicated that science "was no safeguard or guarantee of itself for tenderness and affection." We may expect fanaticism (of which Gibbon says, Decl. and Fall, vol. 5, p. 134, "that fanaticism obliterates the feelings of humanity"), bigotry and intolerance (of which unbelief has so much to say) will be invoked to make the new religion obligatory, and a compulsory worship will be enforced without pity to sex or age. It was not merely Nero, stained with the blood of brother, wife, mother, and many innocents, given up to lust and degrading licentiousness, who presented himself amid the burning Christians attired as a Charioteer, and the populace greet him with shouts of applause, but even Marcus Aurelius, who prided himself on his philosophy, who gave learned dissertations on morality, who is lifted up by modern unbelief as a model of perfection, was after all a bigoted, determined persecutor of Christians, amid the praise of a multitude.

PROPOSITION 163. This Kingdom will be preceded by the predicted "battle of that great day of God Almighty."

This Proposition is given not to prove that a great conflict will ensue between Antichrist with his confederated forces and the Lord Jesus Christ and His army (for this has been done in previous Propositions, as e.g. Props. 115, 123, etc., and is too plainly predicted, as e.g. Rev. 19 : 15-21 ; Rev. 17 : 14, and 16 : 14, etc., to require additional notice, but to direct attention to some particulars connected with it.

We are reminded of Rev. Dr. J. G. Schmucker's (Exp. of Apoc., p. 36) remark, when referring to the last struggle with Antichrist : "O God! these things are so near at hand, and we continue so careless and unconcerned for ourselves and our children ; they are so certain and important, and we are so unprepared to meet them, as our heavenly calling requires". It is a remarkable fact (which students will do well to ponder), that even the most spiritualizing of commentators fully concede a terrible period to precede the Millennium, as e.g. Scott, Com., Rev. 19 : 17-21, Barnes, Com. loci, etc. So writers, who spiritualize the prophecies, and make a large number of "mystical comings," are compelled to advocate a still future terrible period before the Church. Thus e. g. Smith (Key to Rev., p. 169, etc.) contends that the spread of missions should not prevent the Church from also anticipating a fearful persecution, likewise predicted. He says : "If the Church has scenes of danger before her, and God has given us warning of it, it will not aid the cause of Christ to cry peace, and assure her that her warfare is already accomplished. If soldiers have a battle to fight, it but ill prepares them for it to assure them they have already gained the victory, and the enemy are vanquished. Should such assurance be given them, lest they be discouraged, would this prepare them for the battle? The Millennium is certain, and will be glorious. But it will be just preceded by the battle of that great day of God—the last and most violent attack of Satan. And no victory must be shouted previous to this, unless by anticipation. The armor must be put on and kept bright, and the warnings of the Word of God sounded." So also, under ch. 14 and 19, he speaks of "fiery trials yet to pass before the Millennial sun will smile upon the earth. The people of God who may then live will have a signal opportunity to glorify our Lord Jesus Christ, and to brighten their eternal crown." We are glad that the warning is given, even if surrounded by much that weakens its force or clearness, for it is immensely better that that deceptive cry which utterly ignores those future predictions as if they did not exist, and declares (as e. g. Dr. Harkey in the Church's Best State, p. 168—with which compare Dr. Sprague, On Revivals) : "We believe that it will be one great and universal Revival, that Messiah will finally subdue the world to Himself, and amid the bliss and hallelujahs of such a state, He will reign in Millennial glory." (Comp. Prop. 175.) Even such a political prophet as Chateaubriand (Ticknor's Memoirs), although ridiculed, has a more truthful view of the future, when he says what shall be produced (1818) : "The cloud is too dark for human vision ; too dark, it may almost be said, to be penetrated by prophecy. There perhaps is the misery of our situation ; perhaps we live not only in the decrepitude of Europe, but in the decrepitude of the world.

Obs. 1. The greatness of this Antichrist in his civil and military aspects, which are, as we have shown, sustained by the religious, is also predicted. The Spirit beholding in prospect the coming of this gigantic power says (Rev. 13 : 3, 4), that "All the world wondered after the beast" and "they worshipped the beast, saying : Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with the beast?" The beast is a civil polity; it is, as we have shown Prop. 160, the revived Roman Empire in a modified form; and the last head, the virtually eighth, is, as the controlling head or the representative of it, this beast. It is by virtue of his being thus the head of civil government that he is enabled to make and carry on the extensive military preparations announced by Daniel (latter part of ch. 11, see Prop. 160) and the prophets. He will surely overcome all opposition that other civil powers may excite, for it is written: "and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations." We are told that he will not reach the climax of power and arrogance without meeting foes whom he will overcome with much bloodshed. But in the wars carried on, he shall be successful, being prospered beyond all precedent. This is purposely allowed both as a punishment to the nations (inflicting the predicted distress of nations), and to make the final overthrow of Antichrist the more impressive in the eyes of the world. Under the most specious pretexts, including that of religion, he will exterminate his foes, and seat himself upon the pinnacle of power, preparatory to the final conflict. While he is thus meeting with success and elevating himself to the most lofty and commanding position, believers will ponder such passages as Joel 3 : 16; Ps. 92 : 7-9, Micah 4 : 11, 12; Ps. 37 and 73; Heb. 1 : 12-17; Isa. 35 : 4, etc., anticipating, by faith, his utter destruction. It seems that God intends to show in the most striking manner, both by allowing this ascendancy and by the subsequent overthrow, how utterly vain and false are the high-swelling expectations inculcated by rebellious reason in behalf of "Collective Humanity," unified and deified in the person of the last head.

The Antichrist, owing in part to his greatness, will contemptuously regard the predictions of God's Word. He knows what the prophecies say respecting him, for the utterance of the Church (after the removal of the 144,000) concerning him only excites his hatred, while his doom, as delineated by the Spirit, and applied to him by believers, secures his increased scorn and bitterness. He will depend upon the vastness of his confederated forces, to carry out the malignant plans of a godless, and yet god-like, ambition. Thus e.g. although it is plainly predicted (Zech. 12 : 3) that "God will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people : all that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces, though all the people of the earth be gathered together against it," yet relying upon his vast power, he will arrogantly fancy to himself an easy and secure victory. Secure it would indeed become, if the King of Israel did not interfere, and "make Jerusalem a cup of trembling."

Obs. 2. The extraordinary power of this Antichrist could not be obtained without the concurrence and co-operation of other civil rulers. Hence, the Spirit expressly predicts the formation of a mighty confederation under the auspices of this last head, as e.g., in Rev. 17 : 12, of which it is asserted: "These (i.e., the ten horns) have one mind and shall give their power and strength unto the beast." Let the reader too notice that as these "receive power as kings one hour with the beast," i.e., but for a short, brief period of time, and as they are associated with this last head in his conflict with the Lamb, the formation of this confederacy is still future, and hence, not knowing who they are, it would be rashly premature to attempt even to designate any of them. Many passages refer to this last confederation, and to the result. Whatever confederations have existed in the past, the Spirit, while not excluding these (as, e.g., 2 Ps. quoted by the Apostle as having an inchoate fulfilment), yet looks onward to that last great array of the kings of the earth against the Messiah. The fulness of the 2d Ps., as is seen by comparing with the occurrences at the open revelation of Jesus (Rev. 19) is to be verified in the future when this confederation is formed and "the wrath" of the Son is manifested; when He shall break "the nations" that "rage" (or "tumultuously assemble") and "the people that imagine a vain thing" "with a rod of iron and dash them in pieces as a potter's vessel" (comp. Rev. 2 : 27, etc.)<sup>1</sup> The same is true, Hab. 2, of "the vision that is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak and not lie; though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry," and which is related to "the proud man" (so proud that he makes himself a god) "who enlargeth his desire as hell, and is as death" (martyrdom), "and cannot be satisfied, but gathereth unto him all nations and heapeth unto him all people," and thus becometh (ch. 3) "the head over the house of the wicked." Other references are found in Isa. 54 : 15, where it is said : "Behold, they shall surely gather together but not by me," etc. (comp. Rev. 16 : 14); in Ps. 118, where in view of the destruction that shall most certainly befall all those (comp., e.g., Zech. 12 : 2, 3) who array themselves against the people of God, and because the mercy of God is extended and His right hand doeth valiantly, it is said significantly of this time of trusting in and worshipping of man and confederating against believers and the Lamb : "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man. It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes. All nations compassed me about; but in the name of the Lord will I destroy them. They compassed me about; yea, they compassed me about, but in the name of the Lord I will destroy them. They compassed me about like bees; they are quenched as the fire of thorns; for in the name of the Lord I will destroy them." The impressive repetition is indicative of the greatness and formidable nature of the confederation, it being added "thou hast thrust sore at me" (as, e.g., in the martyr bloodshed and the tribulation of the Jews) "that I might fall; but the Lord helped me. The Lord is my strength and song, and is become my salvation," etc. In many places the confederation is implied, as e.g., Ps. 48 : 4; Ps. 59, etc., and in others, as many believe, typically represented, as, e.g., Isa. 13; Nahum 1, 2 and 3, etc. In Isa. 17 : 12-14, the connection with the "evening tide," as the time of "trouble," and with the "morning," as the time of the utter removal, fixes (Prop. 139) the period when this "rushing of the nations, like the rushing of mighty waters" shall take place and God "shall rebuke them."''

<sup>1</sup> The notion of softening such expressions into converting processes (see Prop. 175) is utterly untenable. For while the wielding "a rod of iron" is in itself suggestive of irresistible power manifested in the smiting and punishment of enemies, the fact that this is associated with God's anger, vengeance, etc., and explained e.g. by the enemies being dashed to pieces as a potter's vessel, showing that violence is intended. A slight comparison of Scripture will clearly show that when this period comes, there will be manifested a destruction and subjugation of enemies by a series of judgments resulting in a terrible loss of life—life forfeited by its insolent and blasphemous opposition to the intended Messianic Theocratic ordering. The time is coming when (Delitzsch's rend. of Isa. 42 : 13) "Jehovah, like a hero will He go forth, kindle jealousy like a man of war; He will break forth into a war cry, a yelling war cry, prove Himself a Hero upon His enemies," and the outcome is fully described in Jer. 25 : 31-33; Zeph. 3 : 8; Joel 3 : 9-21; Rev. 19 : 11-21, etc.

<sup>2</sup> The apostolic and succeeding Fathers all held to this confederation of kings, so far as we have them to describe the Antichrist's rule. Some interesting fragments are also preserved, as e.g. Stuart (Apoc., vol. 1, p. 37) gives Clemens Alexd., quoting from a writing of the Apostle Paul (not now extant, and supposed to be apocryphal) and asserting that Paul recommended the work of Hystaspes (mentioned by Justin), in which "the Son of God is more gloriously and clearly described (than in the Sibylline oracles), and also how that many kings will make war against Christ, hating Him and those that bear His name, and His faithful followers, and His patience, and His Coming." The Sibylline books are full of it. Others also refer to it, as the Fourth Book of Ezra (Dr. Laurence's Transl.) declares that when "My Son" (the Messiah) "shall be revealed, the nations will assemble to make war and shall be overthrown and destroyed by Him." The simple fact is so clearly announced, in the Scriptures, that we know of no prophetic writer who does not fully admit it, from Irenæus (B. V., ch. 25, 26) down to the present. If it be asked how, in opposition to many kingdoms with their varied and clashing interests, it is possible such a head over different nations can be raised up, the answer, not dogmatically expressed, may be as follows: the conflicts now going on under Socialistic, Communistic, Nihilistic, International, and Unbelieving influences are producing in many countries a similarity of feeling, sentiment, and aim. Whatever measure of success may attend their views and measures, it will soon be found that the tendencies and results are mutually destructive, unless a centralization of power is somewhere established. State and society cannot possibly exist, the direst anarchy must prevail, unless some safeguards in behalf of government are erected and sustained. Hence the idea of self-preservation, in the line of humanitarian ideas, will suggest this confederation under Antichrist. We are satisfied with the declaration of the Spirit that this is done under Divine Providence, for it is so declared, Rev. 17: 17.

Obs. 3. This confederation arises "out of, and forms part of, the revived Roman Empire, because the "horns" or kings appertain to the beast (comp. Prop. 160) who is said to have "ten horns." And of these horns, in order to avoid the very interpretation usually engrafted, and to mistake them for a succession in the past, it is said by way of explanation, and to indicate their diversity in this respect from the successive heads, that they exist simultaneously or contemporaneously. They arise only when the beast for some time—how long it is not stated—has been headless, i. e., has ceased to exist, or is not recognized as an empire. They arise only when the last head appears, being limited to a brief existence, and as they and the head both fight with the Lamb at His Coming, they are still future, coming after the Empire has become broken and enfeebled. But in the revival of the beast there is a most astonishing change presented, indicated by the transference to the horns of the diadems formerly belonging to the heads, thus showing that they are strong kingdoms, or that they are to exercise supreme rule, in conjunction with the eighth head, over men. This remarkable transference does not prove, as some would have it, that the heads are ended, for it is expressly asserted that while the seven heads are ended, yet an eighth, which, in some way, is still related to the seventh, is still in existence, and has greater power than all the heads before it. Therefore, as repeatedly stated (and let not the reader consider this a small matter, seeing that, as the Spirit says, it requires and embraces wisdom, being one of the points of identification), the virtually eighth head which is of the seven sustains such a peculiar relationship and headship over the others that his official position and dignity, as assumed and exercised, transcends the former Imperial rule. He is more than a mere Emperor; he professes to be and is worshipped as a God. Great as the rule of the horns is, that of this head is superior, and is so acknowledged by the horns who give their power and strength to him. There is here a wonderful transition in the form of government under which these confederates act. In what this shall consist, it is premature to say, excepting that the supreme political power shall be wielded in conjunction with the religious power, and that to sustain and extend especially the latter the False Prophet will arise as a chief confederate. Revolutions may be anticipated in order to the revival of this beast, and the formation of the allied confederates, and the relation that this new virtually eighth head sustains to the seventh may be in the fact, that aside from his religious (or if we may so call it, for even unbelief speaks of its own "Church of the Future") ecclesiastical rank (which makes him differ so materially from all other heads) he retains and exercises the same Imperial sway—more extended—as the seventh head, viz., has civil jurisdiction over the whole vast Empire. This head and these horns arise about the same time and owing to the remarkable features, the modifications introduced, and the concentration and exercise of absolute, despotic power, the one subordinately to the other, will excite universal surprise. One feature more: the prophecy proclaims that this beast and the horns come into existence after a period of non-existence; this teaches us to discard the theories which give the horns to the beast in the past, and trace them among the several kingdoms of Europe, because in that case the beast would not have had a time of non-existence, seeing that those very kingdoms so generally adduced have continuously existed. We see, however, now the beast headless and non-existing, and this fact, so much overlooked, is a startling sign corroborative of our general position (Prop. 160). It is precisely the condition in which we are to see the Roman Empire before it is possible for this last head and its confederated chiefs to arise, and so cruelly treat the Church and the world. And it is this condition which makes it certain to the prophetic student, that important political changes must take place in Europe before this organization can be effected. What convulsions shall agitate the nations, what revolutions must ensue, what conflicts between kingdoms must arise before this beast is revived and obtains his head and horns, we cannot tell. Statesmen, the most profound, inform us of the unsettled, insurrectionary, revolutionary tendencies at work among the masses in all these countries; this spirit, now so busy, may break forth, and lead the way for the predicted result. God only knows the details.

The simultaneous arising, and contemporary existence, of these ten kingdoms, not only sets aside a vast amount of irrelevant interpretation and application to the past and present, but it fully corroborates the position taken in previous Propositions. Whatever divisions, weakness, mixture of iron and clay, etc., has been witnessed in the past in the Roman Empire, these are only preparations to the exact form of ten as they shall be revealed at the consummation. In addition, the reader's special attention is called to the fact that it is while the whole number of ten are contemporaneously existing with the beast that the Papacy is destroyed, and not after three are fallen, because Rev. 17 is distinctive and most precise, thus showing: (1) that our view of the Papacy being the apostasy and not the Antichrist is correct; (2) that all those old theories of the ten kingdoms and three fallen before the Papacy are incorrect; and (3) that after the Papacy is overthrown by this confederation and before the war with Christ, three of those kingdoms, for some cause or other, will be uprooted by the Antichrist. Most probably to augment his own power and worship.

Obs. 4. We feel impelled by a sense of duty to warn the reader against allowing himself to be misled into the idea, advocated by very many, that it is only at the close of the twelve hundred and sixty days (years they make it) that this beast is to form this confederation, etc. Now, whatever inchoate fulfilment persons may be pleased to engraft upon these predictions, one thing is self-evident, that the twelve hundred and sixty days in their strict fulfilment cannot be applied, as given by John, to the past history of the beast. The reason is conclusive: John describes the revival of the beast under its last head, and it is of the beast in its revived form that he asserts that it is "to continue (or make war) forty and two months." All interpretations which ignore or violate this simple fact, viz., that these months and days are descriptive of the duration of the revived last head in the exercise of his extraordinary power, are in so far, at least, untenable. This at once sets aside a large number of ingenious and plausible calculations based upon the supposed beginning and ending of these days, as well as the deductions derived therefrom, and leads us to look to the future for their fulfilment. It is at the close of these forty and two months that the conflict takes place between the beasts allied with his confederates and the King of kings, the time previous being occupied with his wars and persecutions, etc. The time is thus purposely shortened, owing to the severity of the judgments.

Obs. 5. The critical student will also notice that the confederation arises after (Rev. 17) the harlot has been supported, as in the past, by the beast, and yet before the fall of Babylon (in which fall it participates), and (Rev. 14) before the universal demand to worship the beast and his image, and therefore previous to the persecution of the saints. The beast in revived state hates the harlot, which it formerly aided to power, and this indicates that there will be a gradual undermining of the Papal claims over the nations, and especially in its attitude of superiority over civil jurisdiction. This evidently will be resisted, and lead to a conflict resulting in the utter demolition of the Papacy. Whatever aid therefore, may be extended by the Papacy in assisting the development of this beast and confederation, or whatever resistance it may offer at any period of the same, it is fated to fall, owing to the antagonism of its claims, and the loss of power over the nations. That it continues to have adherents, and even strong ones, down to the fall, is apparent from the lamentations over her, thus indirectly indicating to us the great power of this confederation in suddenly producing such a result, and that it will not be accomplished without a measure of opposition. But it teaches us also, seeing that the beast under its revived form is the one that shall slay the witnesses, that the witnesses (who may include, Rev. 16 : 6, both saints and prophets) are slain, not because they refuse to worship the Papacy (as some suppose), but because they reject the worship of the beast and his image. This is seen by this (slaying not merely persecution) following the fall of Babylon, the closing of the forty-two months, and the mention of it in connection with the worship of the last head as, e.g., in Rev. 16 : 2 and 6. The witnesses testify against a more arrogant and cruel power than the Papacy—the culmination of all wickedness.<sup>1</sup> This, too, on account of the apparent success in overcoming his enemies and the saints, will prepare the way for the first desperate battle.

<sup>1</sup> The witnesses are those who testify to the truth ; they are represented as "two," i.e. being amply sufficient to present the testimony ; they are persons (not e.g. the Old and New Testaments, etc., as some hold), as is evidenced by the entire narrative, in the time specified, the condition of trial, the power ascribed and exerted, the war made upon them, the finishing of their testimony, the death inflicted, the resurrection experienced, and their ascension. The linking of these witnesses, slaying and resurrection with the still future beast, with the terrible vengeance and results under the last trumpet, etc., indicates that the main fulfilment is still future in the text. Nothing in the past is commensurate with the prediction as given. We have in this prophecy among other points the following presented : (1) a distinction and separation is made between believers (as illustrated e.g. under Prop. 130) ; (2) the control of Gentile domination ; (3) a faithful protest by believers ; (4) the protection and power awarded to these until a sufficient testimony is given ; (5) the slaughter of them by this last Antichristian power ; (6) the exultation of their enemies ; (7) the resurrection and exaltation of the witnesses ; (8) the wrath of God that follows, uniting it with the events under the seventh trumpet. Now all this so fully and accurately accords with the condition of the Church under this last head of the beast, enduring persecution and death, etc., that we refer it to the future and not to the past. We only now suggest to the critical student that an encouraging feature and contrast seems to be developed here, viz., in the miraculous power attributed to these witnesses. Under this last head, as we have shown, miraculous power is exerted to sustain the Antichrist, but as an offset to this, certain believers exert far greater power until their testimony is finished. This very exertion of power appears to excite the hatred of the beast. But God at this critical period honors His saints as He before honored His prophet in the contest with false prophets. We cannot accept of the view that these witnesses are Moses and Elijah, or Enoch and Elijah, or any other of the saints of the past, because the death, etc., can only be alleged of mortals. They are composed of the testifying Church (Rev. 14 : 6-12) ; represented as two (thus showing the completeness of testimony) ; are raised up and witness the dreadful doom of their enemies (Rev. 14 : 14-20, and chs. 15 and 16) ; are designated "saints and prophets" (the term prophet being used in the sense of teaching or foretelling the doom etc. of Antichrist), whose blood is shed (Rev. 14 : 9-12, etc.), by the last head of the beast ; stand related to the future 1260 days, etc. We have here symbolically represented, what is more plainly stated in other places, viz., a persecution of the Church (and, as the "two" may suggest, of the Jews). Elijah's mission in the future to the Jews, if we are to receive the prophet's statement, is a successful one, and does not require the sacrifice of his life.

Obs. 6. The design of this confederation is only stated in general terms ; that it shall materially aid in strengthening and extending the power of the beast ; that it shall assist him in his overthrow of the Papacy ; that it shall co-operate with him in overcoming the saints, and that, finally, it shall with him and the False Prophet, as leaders, make war with the Lamb. Much is left to be inferred ; much is implied in the filling of details, but the great outlines are so plainly drawn by the Spirit that no one can possibly mistake them. The design actuating these confederated powers is that of self-aggrandizement, the exaltation of Humanity, in the person of a recognized leader, above that of God Himself, the bringing of all nations in subjection to this denial of the true God and His Christ, and to the acknowledgment of the deification of Humanity in this last head. In the accomplishment of this purpose they resort to various means, in order to break down all protest and opposition to their wicked procedure, so that Hab. 1 : 15 will be pre-eminently verified : "they catch them in their net and gather them in their drag, therefore they rejoice and are glad. Therefore they sacrifice unto their net and burn incense unto their drag ; because by them their portion is fat and their meat plenteous. Shall they therefore empty their net and not spare continually to slay the nations ?" And this includes the "dealing treacherously," and "devouring the righteous." In describing "the man of the earth," Ps. 10, who shall be crushed by the king that he may no longer oppress, he is represented as one who "persecutes the poor," "boasts of his heart's desire," proudly (marg. reading) thinks that "there is no God," cannot discern God's judgments, "puffs at his enemies," exalts himself with the idea that he shall never be moved, produces cursing, deceit, fraud, mischief, and iniquity, "murders the innocent," makes "the poor to fall by his strong ones," and "contemns God," which characteristics belong to all his associates and abettors. In order to develop their plans of worship, persecution, and conquest they will (Ps. 64) take "secret counsel" to "encourage themselves in an evil matter," and

"they commune of laying snares privily;" "they search out iniquities; they accomplish a diligent search (comp. marg. read.), both the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart is deep." The result of this counselling, plotting, and searching is found in the rejection of God and the institution of man and image worship under the direst penalties, thus forming that dark and terrible persecuting confederation more particularly described by John. The culmination of all is found in the daring to make war with the Lamb Himself.

In the previous Propositions we have referred to an agency that will be powerfully exerted in order to move and control the masses, viz., the performance of miracles. That which unbelief has always ridiculed and scorned as the weakness of Christianity, will be assumed to support unbelief and will be appealed to as its grand persuasive. Unbelief so full of hatred to the miraculous of the Bible, will cause fire to come from heaven (Rev. 13 : 13), because in the revival of heathenism (modernized) there is a return to fire which played such an important part in ancient heathen worship, as representative of "the most active thing in nature." In the worship of nature, fire becomes a special emblem of its power, and is accordingly honored. What expectations are excited for the future, may, as illustrative, be seen in Froebel's The Future of Alchemy, where Evolution, etc., is predicted as provisional to a future glorious revival of Alchemy, which shall work out its ideals, aiding Nature or the Power underlying Nature in its purpose, "the creation of ultimate universal perfection." Jesus resisted Satan's offer of power when tempted, but Antichrist gladly accepts of Satan's tender, and his power is wonderfully extended, Dan. 8 : 24 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 9 ; Rev. 13 : 2, etc. Those who reject God are the most superstitious, seeking, as Shenkel says, after ghosts. Seiss, Reineke, and many others, believe (as Christlieb, Mod. Doubt, p. 290), that the False Prophet will be able to perform real miracles in behalf of "the new religion." Fausset (Com., 2 Thess. 2 : 9), speaks of these "prodigies of falsehood," and referring to Matt. 24 : 24, thinks that they are "real miracles," worked in support of falsehood, adding : "The same three Greek words occur for miracles of Jesus (Acts 2 : 22 ; Heb. 2 : 4), showing that as the Egyptian Magicians imitated Moses (2 Tim. 3 : 1-8), so Antichrist tries to imitate Christ's works as a 'sign' or proof of divinity." So Nast (Com., Matt. 24 : 23-28) makes the prediction of "false Christs and false prophets, showing great signs and wonders, insomuch that, if it were possible, they would deceive the very elect," to relate "to the latter days," saying that we find in no history such a fulfilment before or at the destruction of Jerusalem." Comp. Lange's Com. on Matt. 24 and 2 Thess. 2. For the reality of such miracles see e.g. an art. in The Princeton Review, Ap., 1856, "Miracles and their Counterfeits," which appeals to Rev. 16 : 19 ; 13 : 11-14 ; 19 : 20 ; 2 Thess. 2 ; Matt. 24, and contrasts these miracles with Pharaoh's Magicians, ascribing them to Satanic agency—"after the working of Satan with all power, and signs, and lying wonders." (Comp. Props. 161 and 162). To the critical student we will say : the manner of the oracular responses by means of the Urim and Thummin in the High Priest's breastplate is a mystery. The reason why left unexplained and hence unknown, evidently is, that it may not be imitated by impostors to impose on the credulity of others, and that even Antichrist may not employ it as an engine of policy.

Obs. 7. The war with the Lamb being mentioned, separately and distinctly, is not to be confounded with a previous persecution of the Church. The making war with the saints is specially mentioned, and in this war the Antichrist and his confederates are victorious, for it is expressly foretold that he shall "overcome them" (as e.g. Rev. 13 : 7) ; while the making war with the Lamb, separately stated, results in "the Lamb shall overcome them," Rev. 17 : 14 and Rev. 19. The Lamb, therefore, as we have hitherto abundantly proven, is not merely a representative of the Church, and one who makes war with those enemies through the Church. The Lamb is personally denoted, as the doctrine of the Sec. Advent unmistakably teaches, coming with His redeemed people to destroy the confederation arrayed against Him. The pledge that He will thus come, aside from other prophecy, is given in Zech. 9 : 9. The connection of this verse with the context which declares the complete destruction of the enemies confederated against the people of God and the restoration of the Jews, shows us that the triumphal entry of Jesus at His First Advent into Jerusalem "lowly and riding upon an ass and upon a colt, the foal of an ass" is presented to us as the pledge and earnest of another and greater triumphal entry, when He also, "the Lord shall be seen over them and His arrow shall go forth as the lightning," etc.

So plain are the predictions making Messiah to come as a mighty Man of war, that even Impostors allied the same with their pretences, as e.g. Sabbathai, of whom it is said (Milman's His. Jews, vol. 3, p. 370): "Your Redeemer is come; his name is Sabbathai Levi; he shall go forth as a Mighty One, inflamed with wrath as a warrior; he shall cry, he shall war, he shall prevail against his enemies," (comp. Isa. 42:13). This Sabbathai "took the title of King of the kings of the earth,"—the 21st Ps. was sung before him (showing how the Jews understood the same), and he was largely acknowledged as the Messiah. In the Encyclop. Metrop. art. Cox's Biblical Antiquities, allusion is made to the opinions of Jewish Rabbis respecting the last battle, and the beasts are made to be literal, not noticing that the Jews expressed their views in symbolical language. The Jews (Smith's Bib. Dic., M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop., art. Antichrist), held to a dire conflict with Antichrist, and an overthrow by him before the appearing of the Messiah Ben-David, who then shall overcome Antichrist. So also the Mohammedans (same authorities, and Mohammedan Legends by Dr. Weil) have a future Antichrist and conflict, making Jesus to return and overcome him. Those who object to this exhibition of God coming forth to fight His enemies, must then object to the plainest statements (e.g. Rev. 19:11, etc.), of Scripture. They might try, as a test of faith, to reconcile e.g. Zech. 14:3 with Ex. 14:13, 14, 23, 24, indicative of the manner in which "Jehovah shall fight for you and ye shall hold your peace."

Obs. 8. The cause of this war, this final conflict with Jesus Christ, is found in the hatred to His truth, in the hostility to His person, because the same are in direct opposition to the fundamental principles underlying the government and worship of this Antichristian confederacy. Let the reader but consider how many things, now but obscurely understood, will be clearly proclaimed by the Church before this Antichrist appears and the confederation is formed, and he will see abundant reason why Antichrist shall be filled with bitterness and enmity toward Christ. Thus e.g. the withdrawal of the 144,000, followed by the earnest proclamation of Antichrist's career, the faithful portraiture of his wickedness, etc., the accurate knowledge then entertained respecting the Kingdom of God which is speedily to come in accordance with the covenanted Word—these things will so enrage (comp. Rev. 11:18 "the nations were angry,") the Antichristian powers that they will put to death these confessors, and prepare themselves to resist the promised incoming kingdom. Here is the clew to the final scene, and to the animosity toward the Jewish nation. Antichrist, and the False Prophet, and the allied Chiefs, will not forget this faithful preaching, and especially this anticipated kingdom. They will not overlook the fact, that this Theocratic ordering is to be initiated at Mt. Sinai (Prop. 166), and that to perfect it, a restoration of the Jews is necessary. What news may reach them of God's already "strange work" commenced at Mt. Sinai we cannot tell, but that they are not ignorant of something being inaugurated at Sinai, which looks forward to the re-establishment of the covenanted Davidic throne and kingdom, is abundantly clear from the tenor of the predictions. Whatever ideas Antichrist may have had respecting the real power then concealed (in all probability very low and contemptuous ones), he in self-protection, having a sufficiency of proof that some power hostile to himself is then concentrated, proceeds to forestall the danger by making special arrangements (Rev. 16 : 13, 14) in gathering the nations, and marches in the direction of the threatening cloud, and, as a first measure, to insure the failure of such a kingdom being realized, triumphantly seizes upon Jerusalem and Palestine. They plot against the predicted king (which, perhaps, may be attributed to the vain and human expectations of some who are secretly striving to have it realized); "they (Ps. 62 : 4) consult to cast Him down from His excellency," and in so doing, the Spirit informs us, (Ps. 83) that in their hatred "they have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against Thy hidden ones. They have said, come and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance. For they have consulted together with one consent (or heart); they are confederate against Thee" (then follows, under the familiar names of enemies, those still future, and their fearful doom). By this we know, that a leading motive in exciting this war springs from the knowledge of Antichrist respecting the prophecies and faith of believers that Christ Jesus, as promised, will rebuild the fallen tabernacle of David into a world-dominion. Rejecting these prophecies and this faith in scorn (as some even now do) as visionary, so far as God Himself and His Christ are concerned (for he denies the Father and the Son), yet he apprehends trouble so long as the Jews are permitted to occupy Jerusalem, and so long as the anticipations excited by the faith in the Sinaitic ordering, and the reports reaching the ears of the nations from thence, are not crushed. Believing that those "hidden ones" form the nucleus of a dangerous inroad upon his own prerogatives and claims, the Leader prepares to crush it. As Faber and many others have justly called it, there arises "a religious war" (Baron Bunsen, Signs of the Times, II., 235, predicts a religious war impending over Europe)—a war against the saints, and then more directly against Christ, verifying Ps. 2 : "The Kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against His anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder and cast away their cords from us" (comp. Micah 4 : 11, 13, Luther's version, Ps. 21 : 11, etc.) This spirit is fostered and excited to the utmost by the wonder-working power of certain agents (Rev. 16 : 13, 14) sent forth on their mission of miracle performance and deception of the kings and nations. It is still premature to fix with any degree of certainty, upon the exact nature and mode of operation of these agents,<sup>1</sup> but when they come they are recognizable by the special charge committed unto them, viz., of urging those to whom they are sent to enter upon this religious war of extermination. Their "miracles," however astounding and well calculated to entrap the unwary and unbelieving, will not deceive the humble believer in the Word of God, simply because these scenes and agencies are too plainly foretold.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Those who believe in a past and present fulfilment of the vials give a variety of interpretations to these agents, and designate sundry things as a manifestation of them; but all this is premature and positively forbidden by these last plagues contained in the vials being preceded by the exaltation of those who had already suffered under the last head of the beast (as seen e.g. in Rev., ch. 15 : 2 and 16 : 2, 6, etc.). The simple, undeniable fact is that these agents follow the rise of this last head still future (Props. 160 and 161).

<sup>2</sup> Religion (for Lessing's idea, now seized and exultingly paraded, will be carried out, viz., that all religions are but fragments of one religion inherent in humanity, which are to progressively educate the race until it arrives at its highest development) is intimately connected with politics; both suggest and enforce, from a humanitarian standpoint, opposition to "the Christ." This explains the widespread influence exerted; for religious revolutions (as De Tocqueville, the Old Regime, p. 24, and others have shown) are not confined to one country or nation, as those merely political and civil often are, because the interests involved are general, and cannot be confined. It is alleged by some that it would be absurd for men to fight against "the Christ;" but such forget that unbelief rejects "the Christ" until it is suddenly confronted before His irresistible power; that infidelity down to the very catastrophe ridicules the predictions relating to the subject; that special agencies, called "seducing spirits," lead unbelief on to its confederation against the people of God; that the long-delayed mercy and forbearance of God culminates in vengeance (Ps. 115, etc.), which is poured out when unbelief has reached its highest point, and "the pit" digged for the wicked has been reached. The believer is satisfied with the simple statement (confirmed by numerous others) that (Zech. 14 : 3) "then shall Jehovah go forth and fight against those nations, as when He fought in the day of battle" (with which comp. Ex. 14 : 13, 14, 23, 24, when Jehovah is sent to fight for them, etc.). And such Scriptures, as Pa. 2 (comp. Lange's Com., etc.) give the divine assurance of a decided and most glorious victory.

Obs. 9. The objective march of this last great enemy and of his forces gathered for the final battle, is, from a comparison of Scripture, easily ascertained. The place is expressly designated in such a way that we cannot properly misapprehend it. One of the prophets (Daniel 11) declares that the Antichrist shall come to his end "between the seas in the glorious holy mountain;" this Joel 3 : 2, 12, tells us is in "the valley of Jehoshaphat;" Ezekiel (chs. 38 and 39) informs us that he "shall come against the land of Israel" and that he "shall fall upon the mountains of Israel;" Zechariah (ch. 14) has him at Jerusalem, which he has taken, or at least not far distant, placing the final action in Palestine; Joel also (ch. 2 : 20) has him destroyed between two seas; John (Apoc. 16 : 16) has them "gathered together in a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon," and, finally, John (Apoc. 14 : 20) in the treading of the vintage wine-press (which synchronizes with the same overthrow) has the blood to come out of the wine-press "by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs," i. e., two hundred miles, which as Faber (Diss., vol. 2, p. 241) and many others, and even Jerome, have remarked (and recent surveys have attested) is the length of Palestine between the two seas. Taking all these predictions together, we need not be surprised the Fathers so universally held to the idea that Antichrist would fight the last battle and perish in Palestine. It is when he comes to Jerusalem and takes the city that the Lord appears to fight against him, either immediately after, or after a brief interval. Probably it is impossible for us to definitely fix, owing to conflicting views, the exact locality of this battle. Jehoshaphat may, as some contend, be only a descriptive and not a proper name, signifying "the judgment of the Lord." We incline, however, to the view that it is a proper name, and that Antichrist's career is closed at or near the city of Jerusalem. However this may be, the prophets unite in making the decided impression, that he shall certainly fall in Palestine, and such will be the vast slaughter that special provision (Ezek. 39 : 11-16) will be made to remove the annoyance caused by it. Indeed, the Spirit gives incidental reference (in connection with the direct), which also teach that his overthrow is witnessed in Palestine, as e. g. Ps. 76 : 3, Isa. 10 : 26-34, Pa. 46 : 4-6. It is true that at this period a dreadful slaughter shall also be witnessed in Idumea, (Isa. 34, 63, etc.) and has led some (Reineke) to suppose that the battle will be fought in that locality. But this is easily reconciled if we keep in view the exact position of the parties. Antichrist arrives at, and takes, Jerusalem, he immediately sends (or probably sent before the fall of the city) a portion of his vast army under some of the kings toward and into Idumea, for the purpose of crushing any opposition that may develop itself from Mt. Sinai.<sup>1</sup> It is at this crisis that Jesus and His brethren proceed toward Jerusalem, and on the road meet and fearfully overwhelm a large body of the Antichristian host, and then advancing to the Mt. of Olives, confronts His daring adversary, and crushes him there as the prophets declare. It would only be a repetition on a grander scale of the fighting in the wilderness, and in the land itself under the first Theocratic march from Mt. Sinai.

<sup>1</sup> Many (as Reineke, etc.) believe that Isa. 34 has had a mere inchoate fulfilment in the past, and will most strikingly be repeated on a grander scale in the future. The Spirit passes on from the inchoate to the Advent of the mighty ones, for "the year of recompenses for the controversies of Zion" (or as Delitzsch "a year of recompense, to contend for Zion" or Lowth, Clarke, etc., the year of recompense to the defender of the cause of Zion"). The description is upon such a scale (followed by Millennial blessedness,) that it cannot, without violence, be limited to the past. If it relates to the future, as suggested, then it indicates that the first onset of Christ and his army is upon a large mass of the confederation in Idumea, thus corresponding with other passages. And this does not complete the picture, being only one important part of it, for a collation of Scripture shows that after this fearful slaughter the remainder of the confederacy is confronted in Palestine and there overcome (as e.g. the cleansing of the land indicates,). The Spirit, urging us to diligent comparison, presents in one prediction this feature, and in another a different aspect, and we, if wise, will collate what has been given. The result will be, that the restoration of the Theocracy indicates that, just as at the first establishment, enemies will be overcome on the road from Sinai to Palestine, and enemies will be conquered in the Holy Land itself. But the student, to obtain a correct interpretation and application, must compare Prop. 166.

Obs. 10. While compelled by the force of authority to differ from Reineke and others in the locality of Antichrist's fall (all, however, being included in the expressive phrase "the battle of the great day of God Almighty," viz., the slaughter in Idumea and that in Palestine) yet we agree with him that a prevailing mistake has been long current and adopted, unthinkingly, by able writers, viz., that this gathering of Antichrist's forces is to Armageddon, from whence springs the popular phrase, "the Battle of Armageddon"—a phrase not found in the Bible, but still adopted as the title of some books, under the plea that it is biblical. Without detaining the reader, let us observe that nothing is more certain than this, that the adoption of the phrase is derived from a total misapprehension of Rev. 16 : 16, "and he gathered them," etc., it being supposed that the one gathering refers to the seducing spirits, and those gathered to the kings of the earth, mentioned in verse 14. But the singular construction rather requires, as many critics contend, a reference to some one person who gathers, and hence Hengstenberg and others suggest, that one only performs this, referring it to God or Christ. Others feeling the difficulty of applying it to the plural spirits, think that Satan, or the sixth angel, or the beast must be denoted. Now from Propositions which are given (Props. 166 and 130, on Mt. Sinai and Translation) it is found that previous to the overthrow of Antichrist, the saints (even those who have been persecuted and killed by him, as is proven by Rev. 15 : 2, comp. with 16 : 2, etc.) shall be gathered by the Lord Jesus Christ and be brought to Mt. Sinai the original founding place of the Theocratic ordering. Notice again, that the appearance of Jesus and the gathering of the saints unto Him are united in the Scriptures (as e.g. 2 Thess. 2 : 1, etc.), and as this gathering is preceded by the Advent phraseology, "Behold, I come as a thief," etc., the gathering that immediately follows has sole reference to that which legitimately flows—being in many places united with it—from the Advent of Jesus, viz., is a gathering of saints, even of those who have suffered under this Antichrist. Jesus is the one who gathers them, and He comes in a thief-like manner, because the time has not yet come for His open revelation with the saints, which occurs only when Antichrist has reached Jerusalem, etc. Therefore we must regard these verses 15, 16, in this light: Having portrayed the gathering of the forces of the Antichrist, the Spirit assures us in these verses that Jesus also gathers His army preparative to the conflict. Mentioning the one party preparing for the battle, it was natural, suggestive and striking to specify that preparation—a gathering—was also in progress on the other side. It might be almost designated parenthetical, introduced to show that both parties were alike engaged in marshalling their hosts for the impending battle. The conciseness of the description, in view of other predictions, should not mislead us. Again; those that are thus gathered are, as we shall show (Prop. 166) taken to Mt. Sinai to be introduced into the initiative Theocratic arrangement; now is Armageddon in the Hebrew tongue an equivalent or expressive of Mt. Sinai? We think that Reineke (Proph. Times, vol. 2, Nos. 3 and 11) has clearly shown this when he says: "It (i.e., Armageddon) is evidently composed of two parts Ar and Mageddon. That the Greek Ar stands for the Hebrew Har, which signifies 'a mountain,' is so plain that it may be taken for granted. We have then the Mountain of Mageddon. But what is Mageddon? It is evidently a participial form, although it is no regular derivative, and nowhere occurs in the Hebrew Bible as such. It may be derived either from the word magad, which means 'to be precious, costly, glorious,' or else, which is more likely, from the verb gadad, which, in the Hithpael, signifies to 'assemble.' We may, therefore, translate Armageddon either 'the Mount of Assembling,' or 'the Mount of Glorious Gifts.'" (See his remarks on the word Megiddo, etc., and then comp. the derivations of Faber in his Diss., and of commentators generally, the derivation being one of conjecture, so that Dr. Clarke, Com. Rev. 16:16, remarks: "The original of this word has been variously formed and variously translated. It is har megiddon, 'the Mount of Assembly;' or chormah gedehon, 'the destruction of the army,' or it is har megiddo, 'mount megiddo.'" (Faber makes it the "destruction of Megiddo."). For, in a matter so largely dependent upon conjecture (so that, as Reineke informs us, it had been even made the "synonym for the New Jerusalem, and an old German commentary "suggests that Armageddon is substituted for Harmaged, 'the mountains of costly and precious gifts.'"), that conjecture is the best founded, which agrees with the general analogy of the Word. Having shown that a gathering takes place at the first stage of the Advent; that these are taken to Mt. Sinai; that there will be an assembling of the saints at that mountain previous to going forth to the destruction of Antichrist; that this gathering here is also one allied with the Advent, it is reasonable to conclude, that the gathering here is to the same "mountain of assembly," where precious gifts are indeed bestowed.

The Revision has it "Har-Magedon," and Lange's Com. Rev. p. 295 says this denotes the "Mount of Decision or Sentence" (and refers it to the Mt. of Olives to accord with Zech. 14:4), which would apply to Mt. Sinai. The references to "mountain of destruction," "destruction of the army," "valley of Jehoshaphat," "plain of Esdraelon," "mountain of cutting to pieces," "city of Megiddo," etc., is referable to a pre-conceived idea that it must relate to the locality of the battle. The wildest conjectures have been foisted on the expression, simply to suit a pre-conceived theory, as e.g. Wild, who makes the battle to be between England (the Ten Lost Tribes) and the Antichrist, putting Victoria (or ruler of England) at the head instead of Jesus, because of an alleged (unproven) descent from David. Bonhomme (Proph. Times, N. Ser. Oct. 1877, p. 224) remarks that some writers have made Armageddon to denote Sebastopol, and others a place in Italy, some making it Rome; Baldwin (Armageddon) places it in the valley of the Mississippi near Paducah in Ky.; Dr. Berg fixes it in England; Lester (The Pre-Adamite) makes it significant of locality and speaks of "the Battle of Armageddon," etc.

Obs. 11. This then brings out in forcible contrast the two armies in the process of gathering. The statement that the kings of the earth are gathered for this battle, suggests the party which is to oppose them in it, and those two are being gathered for that battle. In ch. 19 both parties, gathered as represented, enter into the conflict; on the one side the beast, the false prophet and the kings of the earth with their hosts; and on the other, the Son of Man and His glorified ones. These saints in the army of King Jesus, and co-judges with Him, are kings. This may give us a clue to that variously explained passage (Rev. 16 : 12) just preceding this gathering of the kings of the earth, viz., "And the sixth angel poured out his vial on the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the Kings of the East (or from the sunrising) might be prepared." The interpretations usually given to this verse (as applying to the nationalized hierarchies, Turkish Empire, etc.) are founded on a misapprehension of its chronological position in the Apocalypse, it being supposed to be either fulfilled or in the course of fulfilment, when the most positive assurance is given that not one of those vials has yet been poured out (which is seen by comparing Rev. 15 : 2, etc., with Rev. 16 : 2, showing that before they are poured out the Antichristian worship, etc., of the last head has been manifested.) Now if we are allowed to conjecture its meaning, judging merely from facts that shall occur, it would be something like the following: the Euphrates stands related to the modern Babylon, just as the ancient river Euphrates did to ancient Babylon; the drying up of this river, indicative of the alienation and abandonment of her supporters who defend her, is a symbolical representation of the entire withdrawal, complete alienation of the faith which the supporters once had in Babylon. Let the reader notice, that when Babylon falls we are told that many shall lament over her fall, they still have faith in her, etc., but this is to be changed; the waters (i.e. people) that strengthened and defended her, shall be absorbed in that (Rev. 14) universal worship of the beast that immediately succeeds the fall of Babylon. This absorption takes place preparative to the gathering of the kings of the earth; indeed one of the means employed in performing this work is the sending forth of those seducing spirits to these kings. If the question is asked, how does this prepare the way for the Kings of the East, or the kings from the sunrising, and who are those kings, the answer would be: the kings are the saints who shall reign as such with Christ; they are kings pertaining to the rising of the sun (so numerous critics, versions, etc., as e.g. Luther, "den Königen von Aufgang der Sonne"); they are kings appertaining to the Sun of Righteousness, who is to arise and shine forth when the terrible day of the Lord has come (Mal. 4, etc.) i.e., they come with, belong unto, and proceed from this rising sun; the way is prepared for their coming by the drying up of the Euphratean waters. i. e., the entire alienation of faith and desire in a restored Papacy, State Churches, etc., and the yielding up of the world (excepting true believers) after the fall of Babylon, and this absorption (Rev. 14) to the worship of the beast and the killing of the righteous. That which appears adverse to the coming of these kings and to render it hopeless, viz., "the universality of Antichrist's worship (now swelled by the millions of Papists, etc.) and rule, really prepares the way for the speedy fulfilment of the gathering and hostile array of Antichrist and his overthrow by the coming of the King (the Sun) with His associated kings. Such an interpretation heightens the beauty and force of the contrast presented in these verses: first we have the kings of the sunrising presented as already existing, waiting until the culmination of wickedness is reached, through the complete absorption of the Euphratean waters and the gathering of the earthly kings is effected by the seducing spirits; then, and only then, are they ready for decisive action. Next in contrast to these kings, are the kings of the earth forming a vast confederacy to be engaged in the battle of the great day. Next, having specified the gathering of the kings of the earth and the agents through whom performed, the Spirit also tells us that the gathering of these kings pertaining to the rising of the sun is also in progress, and that the Agent by whom it is effected is the Saviour Himself, who comes in a concealed manner (previous to His open manifestation) to perform this work, and that He gathers them, in the meanwhile, to "the Mount of Assembly" or "the mountain of precious gifts," or "the Mountain of Decision."

We are confident that the fulfilment relates to the future and hence vastly prefer its application, in some way, to the future than to the past and present, as e.g. Lange's (Com. Rev., p. 295), who makes it typical of the re-introduction of heathenism and barbarism modernized. So we reject the idea that these kings refer to the Jews (Elliott, etc.) or to the rulers of the East (Barnes, etc.), or to those who alienate power etc., from rulers and teachers (Lord, etc.,) and, from the analogy of prediction, prefer the interpretation given in the text.

Obs. 12. The two armies when gathered are fully delineated by the Spirit. On the one side, there is the beast, the false prophet, the kings of the earth and their armies (Rev. 19 : 19, 20), including the worshippers of the beast and his image, those who receive his mark, "kings, captains, mighty men, men both small and great." The vastness of this army can be readily appreciated by referring to the passages which liken it to a fearful flood of roaring waters, a tumultuous incoming sea, etc., as e.g., Isa. 17 : 12-14, Hab. 3, etc. The extent of the confederacy, already closely exhibited in such passages as Rev. 16 : 14, Rev. 13 : 7, Zeph. 3 : 8, etc., is so graphically presented by Joel 3 : 2, 9-16; that a universal uprising for this war, this final contest with the Lord Himself, is certain to take place. The prophecies unite in describing it to be so great as to be unexampled in the history of the world; and this is purposely allowed and encouraged (as e.g. in permitting the saints to be overcome, the miracle working of the agents, etc.), in order that the impotency of man and his punishment as a rebel may be the more strikingly displayed. They assemble in their vastness to utterly destroy the last remnant of the worship and name of God from the earth—this is their design in furthering self-exaltation; God's design is that they shall assemble for Him to execute His judgments upon them. They being gathered (Micah 4 : 12) "as the sheaves in the floor" for the terrible threshing that shall follow. On the other side, there is Jesus the Christ, the Mighty One, and His saints, the associated kings pertaining to Him. They are represented, e.g. in Rev. 19 : 11-14, as the "Faithful and True" (i.e. coming to fulfil His promises and threatenings), "The Word of God," (i.e. the One through whom the purposes of God are to be accomplished and manifested), and "King of kings and Lord of lords" (i.e., kings and lords are subordinately associated with Him), who "in righteousness doth judge and make war," and "the armies which were in heaven" (the reader will consider the symbolical import of "heaven" as given by numerous writers that it signifies, so Faber, ch. 2 Diss., etc., "the body politic"—to such a body these armies belong, seeing that the Theocratic ordering or government has, previously to this coming, been initiatively inaugurated (Prop. 166) at Mt. Sinai, embracing the sun, the moon, and the stars belonging to a heaven. The symbolical import and consistent use of the word "heaven" and "heavens" and its relationship to the Theocratic idea, is yet an interesting field for some students to enter) "followed him upon white horses" (symbolical of their triumphant exaltation and co-heirship with Jesus, coming in the same manner as He does) "clothed in fine linen, white and clean" (comp. v. 8). These are "the Lord Coming with ten thousand of His saints to execute judgment" of Jude 14, 15 ; "the Coming of the Lord and all the saints with Him," of Zech. 14 : 5 ; "the Coming of the Son of Man in the glory of His Father with His messengers," of Matt. 17 : 27, etc. ; "the revelation of the Lord Jesus with the messengers of His power to take vengeance," of 2 Thess. 2 : 7, 8, etc., etc. This strange, stupendous array was long ago described, through the Spirit that foreseeeth all things, by Enoch, Moses, the Prophets, Jesus, and the Apostles.<sup>1</sup> The Jews (Prop. 125) are also incorporated with this army after the first assault."

<sup>1</sup> One of the most remarkable descriptions of this army is given by the prophet Joel, ch. 2, and we are inclined to adopt the opinion of those who believe that it refers to the army of saints. It is usually interpreted as descriptive of a literal flight of locusts and is called "the locust army" but locusts are not mentioned and it is impossible to reconcile some of the statements made with the nature, habits, etc., of the locust. This army is peculiar for "there hath not been ever the like, neither shall be any more after it," which can scarcely be attributed to huge flights of locusts because of their being no rare occurrence. The description is too exalted and the events designated too great to be applied to anything else than the symbolized army of the saints. This takes place in "the great and terrible day of the Lord," and this army is called "His army" and "camp" with whom He is associated, uttering "His voice before them." The army is irresistible, it is composed of those who cannot be injured, it produces fearful consternation, and it is expressly called "a great people and a strong." The quaking of the earth, trembling of the heavens, darkening of the sun and moon and stars, etc., aid in identifying the army denoted. To the critical student, who loves to find surprises in the Word, let me add: that in v. 2, it is asserted (comp. Luther's version) that such a mighty people will never again be formed to all eternity. Now this corresponds with our entire line of argument, viz., that these first-fruits, first-born thus associated with King Jesus form a select, chosen, elect body forever separate and distinct from the children of the barren woman afterward gathered, etc., (comp. Prop. 118, 130). The reader too, may, for himself, decide what army is designated in Isa. 5 : 26-30. To fritter away such predictions, symbolical, by locusts, thunder-storms, etc., is to make the prophet guilty of exaggeration. Fauser (Com. loci) is undoubtedly correct when he says, that it contains an "ultimate reference to be connected with Messiah's Sec. Coming to judgment."

ishment is filled for the Jewish nation ; in that, rejecting the testimony given for 1800 years, it, refusing the true Messiah, now under the hope of worldly advancement is induced to accept of the Antichrist as its Messiah—for coming in his name and claiming deification, it receives him. Their punishment proceeds from him, and the amazing mercy of the true Messiah is seen in that He—rejected and despised—comes to its rescue, and then it will make the confession recorded in Jer. 3 : 22-25.

Obs. 13. The battle itself and the result are unmistakably presented. The Lamb and His army “shall overcome (Rev. 17 : 14) them” (the beast and his army), “for He is the Lord of lords and King of kings, and they that are with Him are called, and chosen, and faithful.” The triumph and the catastrophe are presented, Rev. 19 : 15-21 ; Rev. 14 : 17-20 ; Dan. 7 ; Ezek. 38 and 39 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 8, etc. The Bible reader must be familiar with the Scriptures, which describe on the one hand the joy and exultation of the righteous over the defeat of the wicked ; and on the other, the grief and despair of the Antichristian forces when they find themselves suddenly confronted by the—to them—terrible revelation of the once despised Jesus in the power of His majesty and of the glorified saints, many of whom were put to death by them. A mortal army, with all the advantages of military resources wielded by a vast multitude, melts away before the might of an immortal army, as the snow disappears under the heat of the sun. Owing to the conciseness of the predictions and the intermingling of figure and symbol, it is difficult for us to enter into details, to give even the precise order in which the encounters between the two hosts shall be conducted (although the hints seem to convey the idea that part of the enemy are met on the way to Jerusalem from Mount Sinai, the Antichrist and another portion at Jerusalem or near it, and that other portions are attacked and defeated by the Jews ; the principal engagement, and that which decides the matter, being by Christ and His saints), or to show in every case how much is literal and how much figurative. Thus, while some latitude must be allowed to application, because of our imperfect understanding of language, yet one thing is certain, that the general description, as well as the minor details, whether figurative or not, convey the notion of a terrible conflict directly carried on between these two hosts, and which results in complete victory to Christ and His army, and in utter destruction to Antichrist and his forces. What agencies are exerted, in all cases we cannot tell, but that natural and supernatural ones are both employed is so evident from the Scriptures that it needs no argumentation, seeing that the very Advent of Jesus and His glorified ones is supernatural, and stamps the whole drama with a powerful, overwhelming, supernatural cast. Even whatever agencies of a natural order may be employed, these, too, are directed and made invincible by the power of King Jesus, so that truthfully, whether His might in some things is exerted directly and in others indirectly through animate and inanimate agents, the entire result is attributed solely and exclusively to the greatness and almighty power of the descended Jesus, “the Christ.” Let any one sit down and endeavor to collate the Scripture illustration of this tremendous and sublime “battle of that great day of God Almighty,” and if he can enter into the spirit of the same sufficiently to anticipate it by faith, then his heart must sink and his cheek pale when he endeavors to comprehend the awful terrors of that great day of wrath and vengeance (he will in a measure feel like the prophet who described them, Hab. 3 : 16). Is there anything in human language so expressive of the terrific as Rev. 19 : 15-20, or Isa. 63 : 1-6, or Rev. 14 : 18-

20, or Isa. 49 : 24-26, and kindred passages? The Spirit, in the abundance of warning, and evidently to impress upon us the correct idea that it will be the most fearful of all times that the world has ever witnessed, employs the most powerful language in delineating it that can be produced. "Treading the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God" (Rev. 19 : 15); His garments sprinkled with the blood of His enemies (Isa. 63 : 3); in brief, "slaughter," "tempest," "whirlwind," "fire," "lightnings," "hailstones," "earthquakes," "pestilence," "plagues," "madness," "wailing," "the indignation of anger," "rod of iron," "the day of vengeance," "anger with fury," etc., etc., are some of the impressive utterances to awaken within us a lively sense of the greatness and dreadful nature of this period to the wicked. We are assured that when it takes place and the world has seen this extraordinary, supernatural manifestation, men shall be afraid (Isa. 2 : 10, 11, 19, 21; Micah 7 : 16, 17) before the majesty exhibited, and fearing and trembling (Jer. 33 : 9; Isa. 66 : 19; Isa. 26 : 9, etc.) they shall acknowledge God's just judgments and praise Him for His wonderful doings. For, in the midst of deserving wrath, God still, as He is wont to be, is merciful, sparing some of Antichrist's hosts (Isa. 66 : 19) to be the bearers of the news of the conflict and its result to all nations. While this is "the day of vengeance," it is, blessed be God, the time of deliverance, because "the year of the Redeemed is come" (Isa. 63 : 4); and therefore it is that, after the utter rout of this beast and his army, John describes the reign of Christ and His saints and the introduction of millennial blessedness. With this all the prophets agree—as e. g. Daniel 7, Joel 3, Isa. 24 and 25, Zech. 14, Zeph. 3, Ezek. 38 and 39, etc.—describing the fall of the Antichrist, the last great enemy, followed by a glorious restoration of God's Kingdom under the Messiah and the happy condition of those who believe in God. In the mean time, we may contemplate those war Psalms which contrast the two parties, and tell of the grand issues flowing from victory, as Psls. 2, 21, 76, 110, etc., feeling assured that our King shall be exalted over all His enemies, that David's Son is indeed "most blessed forever" and "set for blessing" whom "all nations shall call blessed." Then will be verified the saying against "the multitude of all the nations that fight against Mount Zion" (see Isa. 29) and "the meek also shall increase their joy in the Lord and the poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel. For, the terrible one is brought to nought" (as stated in verse 5 be made "like small dust" and "as chaff," and this "suddenly," corresponding with the open revelation of Jesus, which occurs suddenly), "and the scorner is consumed, and all that watch for iniquity are cut off," etc.*

* Critics say not "battle," but polemon, "war" of the great day of God, the Almighty (so e.g. also the New Revision, Rev. 16 : 14), and properly so, because it agrees with other expressions indicative of the fact that a "war" is waged which is not simply confined to a single battle. And these battles of the last great conflict are not waged against different powers successively arising (as Swormstedt, and others), but as delineated Rev. 19, etc., with the one great confederation, which is crushed, one portion on the road to Palestine from Sinai, and another in Palestine itself. Simple unity of prediction demands such an interpretation, the neglect of which introduces confusion and antagonism.

* We only remind the reader that Gideon's remarkable slaughter of enemies may be typical of this period. Gideon and a chosen band, with the shout of Israel like "the shout of a king" (Numb. 23 : 11) make the first onslaught, then follows a second and third attack. And Isa. 9 : 4 evidently refers to this in the phrase "the breaking the rod of the oppressors, as in the days of Midian;" for the last oppressors say precisely what the Midianites said (see Ps. 83 : 12). Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 396, renders : " Let us take to ourselves the pastures of God in possession." Then, in the momentous developments will it be found how universally deceived those are (as e.g. Jowett, Com. 1 Thess., pp. 108-111) who declare that Christ's predictions have failed (respecting the Advent, etc.), because inseparably connected with the destruction of Jerusalem. We hold that they will be verified because thus connected, and seeing eighteen centuries of literal fulfilment in the treading down of the city by the Gentiles, we feel impelled to await the final catastrophe. So e.g. Fausset (Com. Zech.) heads the last ch. as follows : " Last struggle with the hostile world-powers ; Messiah-Jehovah saves Jerusalem and destroys the foe, of whom the remnant turns to the Lord at Jerusalem."

* This is such a fruitful subject that the reader's indulgence is asked for the consideration of some Scripture, not usually applied to this period. Thus e.g. Isa. 9 : 4, 5. Whatever difficulties there are in the rendering, all commentators are agreed that the undoubted reference here is, to a great battle fought in which " the rod of the oppressor shall be broken," and this is done by David's Son, the Theocratic King, who shall exercise His government " upon the throne of David and upon His Kingdom, to order it and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth even forever." Now it is in view of this battle and this reign on David's throne that in verse preceding, the nation is represented as made strong and mighty, increased with joy, so that " they joy before thee according to the joy in harvest," etc. Nothing of this was verified at the First Advent owing to the sinfulness of the nation, but will be at the Sec. Advent. Take Isa. 34 and 35, which we have unhesitatingly used, and behold the same contrast and connection. Bh. Lowth, Clarke and many " learned expositors" (so Lowth) place both these chs. in the future, nothing thus far having occurred to justify any other interpretation. They justly tell us that they relate to the future Advent of Christ, to the restoration of the Jews, etc. Verse 8 alone is significantly decisive if we allow parallel passages due force. The same remarks will apply to Zech. 9. One of the most interesting portions of Scripture is the 41st ch. of Isaiah, which describes the Advent of Christ, the confederacy sustained by image worship, their overthrow, the restoration of God's people and the Millennial glory that shall follow. Allowing an inchoate fulfilment, as in several other chapters, it is certain that nothing in the past history of the Jewish nation has ever fulfilled this prediction according to its tenor, seeing that no such glorious restoration and blessedness has yet been witnessed. The language is applied to Jesus, who also is a man of war ; the same acts are applied to Christ ; the same results follow the Second Advent ; the parallel passages sustain its application to the Sec. Advent and the Mill. glory that shall be introduced after the defeat of the nations and the exaltation of the Jewish nation. Here in this work, it has been unhesitatingly employed as eminently descriptive of the future. The simple truth is, that interpreters too much forget that the prophets contemplate the restoration of Davidic rule through the Messiah, and that when the time comes for its restoration, there must be of necessity, owing to worldly dominion being in the hands of the Gentiles, a terrible conflict before David's throne and kingdom can possibly be re-established. This conflict is therefore constantly represented, and also necessarily from a Jewish standpoint.

Obs. 14. Finally: let no one who is a believer in the Word think that this subject, upon which the Spirit so largely dwells and endeavors to impress by the use of figures, etc., conveying terrible realities, is unworthy of his serious and earnest attention. While much of folly has been penned in reference to " the battle of Armageddon" (as e. g. in the name, and locating the battle in the United States, in the valley of the Mississippi, in Italy, as well as formerly at Moscow, Waterloo, in the French Revolution, etc.), the mistakes of men do not vitiare that which is clearly predicted. Men may transplant the scene of the conflict from the place designated by the Spirit ; they may change the actors in it and the results flowing from it ; they may antedate its occurrence and spiritualize away its meaning, but all this cannot affect the ultimate fulfilment or diminish the fearful and actual realization of it as described. Whether able or not to fully understand how this or that particular is to be accomplished, it becomes us to receive in faith the unerring description of Holy Writ, and ponder well that future which culminates in a conflict the most tremendous, both as to extent and consequences, that is on record anywhere. When the spirit of hatred, which leads to this battle, is already so widely prevalent (we append but a single illustration, owing to the peculiar language employed, The Banner of Light, Dec. 8th, 1861, says: "Once mankind clung to the cross, and adored the form of Him who was crucified on Calvary as a God. But reason has asserted its supremacy, and the world has declared it would not have this man to reign over it any longer") and extending itself, when this battle with its confederated hosts shows the absurdity of putting trust in the development theories of men, when, in brief, all things are tending in the direction to bring forth the rejection of Christianity and the self-deification of humanity, thus making the fulfilment in the line of existing tendencies, it is folly, yea worse, to ignore the testimony of Jesus and the prophets on the subject. Let men sneer at it now; let professed believers turn away from it as an unwelcome subject; yet the time is coming when men shall profoundly study it in order to comfort and sustain themselves under Antichrist's fearful persecution. With the hope, therefore, that what we now write may be of service in strengthening the hearts of some who shall be willing to die for Jesus' sake, we are willing to endure the incredulity (even worse) of the world and of many (saving a few here and there) in the Church. Let us even say, to increase, if possible, the unbelief of the unbelieving, that, whether dead or living when this time of the end shall come, we expect, if faithful to the end, personally to see this very battle that we have, in weakness, attempted to describe. (See Props. 126-130, etc.)

The reader, if he desires to see all the proof relating to this subject, must consider Props. 115, 123, 147, 160, 161, and 162 in connection. Let Prop. 115 enforce our urging this subject upon the student's attention, and tender our apology for the same. When God Himself gives so large a space and so many predictions to this period, it is wisdom and prudence on our part to honor this fact. Men run directly against the most direct predictions of God's Word. Thus to add illustrations to those given: "The Peace Assembly of Friends in America" issued an Appeal to Christians on the subject of war. Among just and excellent observations, they (overlooking that wars exist down to the end), fall into the error of taking it for granted (for no proof is attached—Scripture being quoted at haphazard, without reference to time or dispensation), that war will cease to exist in this dispensation, and Dr. Chalmers is quoted (who is thus made to contradict himself, seeing his utterances as given by Taylor, Voice of the Church, and by the author of The Time of the End). The "Appeal" specifically states its belief, that it is only a full and proper application of the Gospel in the affairs of nations as well as of individuals that the prophecies in regard to war will be fulfilled," (i.e. that universal peace will be secured). This utterly ignores the war that the kings and nations make against Christ, all the terrible predictions of conflict and bloodshed down to the end, and antedates the prophecies by making their fulfilment (i.e. in relation to peace, the cessation of war), to precede the Sec. Advent whereas the analogy of Scripture plainly locates the same after the Sec. Coming. It passes by the clearest predictions that men will not learn righteousness until the judgments of God are poured out upon the earth; until Jesus comes with vengeance to overthrow His enemies; and, for the direct agency by which peace is to be secured and wars ended, it substitutes the Gospel (only designed to save "them that believe,") in the place of Jesus Christ and His army. It forgets what is said of the "desolations" which God makes when "the heathen raged" and "the kingdoms were moved" in order to cause "wars to cease unto the end of the earth" (Ps. 46: 6-11); in brief, it overlooks a thousand prophecies, confining itself to isolated fragments torn from their connection. That class who are favorable to a Pre-Mill. conversion of the world, teach such a doctrine, some advocating the Gospel as the agent, others, civilization, art, science, education as the instrumentalities (so unbelieving scientists, etc.); others, that Commerce will bring about such a result (so Rich. Cobden, etc.); others, make "Arbitration," or "A High Court of Nations," the grand agent (just as if it had power to enforce its decisions; as if it would be always disinterested, non-susceptible to influence and bribes ; as if it could not be misled, cause dissatisfaction, and as if it was able to remove the ambition, revenge, passion, etc., which urge men on to war). Honest and sincere men, earnestly desirous for the good of others, are doomed to a bitter disappointment, owing to the depravity of man. Bh. Simpson (Ch. World, Ap. 1871, p. 110 with which compare his Centennial prayer), in advocating the Kingdom of God as now existing and its embracing a speedy conversion of the world "not to be brought about by miraculous power but through the agency of man," then adds : "God has bound Himself not to enlarge that Kingdom by means of force, conquest, heavenly appearances, or exhibition of Divine power directly displayed." Alas ! what a suppression of Scripture this position includes ! and what an amount of spiritualizing away the plain grammatical sense it requires to sustain it ! Before the reader occupies such an attitude, let him just blot out Zech. 14, Isa. 63, Rev. 19, and a host of other recorded declarations. So Stanley (His Jewish Church, 1 Ser. Lect. 20, p. 519) reiterates the sentiments of many, when he speaks of Christ, saying : "He is to be a King, a Conqueror, yet not by the common weapons of earthly warfare, but by those only weapons which the Prophetic order recognized — by justice, mercy, truth, and goodness — by suffering, by endurance, by identification of Himself with the joys, the sufferings of His nation, by opening a wider sympathy to the whole human race than had ever been opened before." We rejoice that justice, mercy, etc., characterizes Jesus now, and will in the age to come and forever more, but the prophetic order recognizes weapons that Stanley utterly overlooks. For as e.g. Dr. Moll (Lange's Com. Psalms, Ps. 2, p. 61), we are to distinguish between the means of grace and the blessings now tendered, and "the powers which infinitely surpass all the powers of this world, and which are greatly to be feared when they unfold in their strength, in the exhibition of wrath in the Messianic judgment." It is folly to close our eyes to the prophetic exhibit of violence, bloodshed, etc., in the day of the wrath of the Lamb, expressly asserted as manifested to vindicate and establish His Kingship. The view of the early Church is far more Scriptural than that thus presented, and as evidence of the extent in which it was held, the Sibylline Oracles, Book of Enoch, and many of the Apocryphal books, refer to the future reign of the Christ as preceded by a most terrible war and distress. But such predictions suit the development theory, and even infidels confidently proclaim them. Thus e.g. in the Evolution of Nov., 1877, Th. Cushing ends an article of extreme "Liberal" tendency with this prediction : "Although the prediction 'Then shall the wolf dwell with the lamb,' etc., may not find its literal fulfilment in that age, yet it is no stretch of fancy to say that 'nation will not lift up sword against nation' for opinion's sake ; that 'war for the maintenance of a religious idea will not be known, and that those who pray for the universal brotherhood of man will more nearly see the fruition of their hopes than ever before'—i. e. when a religion of the future is established. This is man's fancy : God's portraiture of the future under man's control is very different."

Infidels of every age, with a show of piety and mercy somewhat remarkable, and a love for humanity truly astonishing, have denounced the cruelty, enormity of vengeance, etc., of Moses' commands, of some of the Psalms, and of this portrayal of the future, so that (as Bolingbroke) they declare the man "as worse even than an Atheist, who could impute it to the Supreme Being." The Apologists, Selden, Patrick, Graves, etc., many Christian and Jewish, try to soften (as e.g. Fairbairn, Typology, vol. 2, p. 381), the account of Moses by affirming that in case of submission, forsaking idolatry, acknowledging God, etc., they were spared. But this is forbidden by Deut. 20 : 16, 17 ; Ex. 23 : 33, and 34 : 12, which indicate no reconciliation but a predetermined destruction. We are told that their iniquity was come to the full, and that they were under the ban of heaven. Moreover the failure of the Jewish nation to perform God's will in this matter involved them (Judges 2 : 1-5) in trouble. Others (Michaelis, Ewald, Jahn, etc.), try to make out a prior claim—a natural right to the land by the occupation of it before the temporary descent in Egypt, and hence justify the resort to the sword and extermination. But as Fairbairn conclusively shows (e.g. by reference to Gen. 12 : 6 Abraham, etc., being a stranger in it), this is "a baseless theory." The only right that they had was that given by God to whom all lands belong. Now all such objections and apologies are conjectured to be in place in order to show, on the one hand, that the God represented in the Old Test. is not the God of the New Test., and on the other hand, to reconcile the God of the Old Test. to the supposed softening portraiture of the God of the New Test. Both are mistaken, the same God of vengeance exists in the New Test. that existed under the Old, and while mercy and forbearance is now shown, we are abundantly cautioned that the day of vengeance and wrath will again, when iniquity is full, come. The time is rapidly approaching when God's people will again return to Canaan, and the foes congregated there will again be doomed to vengeance. The sins of the Canaanites are typical of the sins of Antichrist and his host, filling the land with abominations, idolatry, defilements, and pollutions so that God's land is defiled (Lev. 18 : 25), notwithstanding previous forbearance and mercy, and God, preparatory to establishing His theocracy removes these defiled ones from His inheritance. Fairbairn (Typology, vol. 2, p. 55-57), fully admits that the destruction of Pharaoh and his host is typical of the destruction of the Antichrist; that this is confirmed by the use of the Song of Moses in "the immediate prospect (Rev. 15 : 3) of the last judgment of God, and by the language of Paul (2 Thesa. 2 : 8) " manifestly borrowed from that Song of Moses ;" but then under the bias of the Whitbyan theory of the conversion of the world, he holds that this is done by " spiritual weapons," by " Divine truth" undermining error, by " the victorious energy of the truth," and not by " acts of violence," " bloodshed," and the personal presence of Christ, etc., (as there was no God corporeally present then). He forgets that Pharaoh and his host were not overthrown by " spiritual weapons," such as he enumerates, but by violence through direct supernatural power exerted by a personally present God (for see his concessions concerning the pillar of fire and cloud, p. 75, it being " the seat in which Jehovah, or the Angel of His presence, appeared, and the form in which He manifested His glory " (comp. Kurtz's remark, His. of Old Covenant); and that the applicability of the Song of Moses is only realized by supernatural intervention and vengeance (and for the ease with which Omnipotence amites, see Alexander's Com. Isa. 51 : 6, 8, and 40 : 24). The first onset will be of a supernatural nature, which will be more or less continued, and of which the case of Jericho (which unbelief ridicules as an appeal to our credulity) is an inchoate fulfilment or representation. Infidelity objects to the result of this future war, the supernatural vengeance, just as they have done in reference to the past as recorded in God's Word, on the ground of right, justice, and mercy, overlooking the facts incorporated, viz., that this terrible divine wrath is brought about by an Antichristian array which tramples upon right, justice, and mercy; which is guilty of the most outrageous wickedness and idolatry; which despises the Sovereign of the world and most cruelly persecutes and kills His disciples; which is determined that the Theocratic ordering shall not be erected over the nations, and to prevent it resorts even to crushing the Church with dire bloodshed. God, in deference to His own rights, His own inheritance, His own Kingdom, His own saints, His own honor and glory, is compelled in consistency to arise and take vengeance on that humanity which is so impious, merciless, and cruel, (compare Prop. 115). Then the question and the answer of Isa. 49 : 24-26 (Delitzsch's rend.) will be verified: "Can the booty indeed be wrested from a giant, or will the captive host of the righteous escape? Yea, thus saith Jehovah, Even the captive hosts of a giant are wrested from him, and the booty of a tyrant escapes; and I will make war upon him that warreth with thee, and I will bring salvation to thy children. And I will feed them that pain thee with their own flesh; and they shall be drunken with their own blood, as if with new wine; and all flesh sees that I Jehovah, am thy Saviour, and that thy Redeemer is the mighty One of Jacob."

This has been noticed under various Propositions, and is thus distinctively presented to impress the fact upon the reader's mind. Such a Theocracy, as God contemplates, to bring back the world under His special manifested rule to its Paradisaical state, is utterly hostile to the notion that worldly empires outside of it shall control large portions of the earth under separate and distinct governments, whether kingly or republican. King Jesus is the covenanted King, not only over His special inheritance, the Jewish nation, but also over all the earth; and, as already abundantly proven from Scripture, the time is surely coming when all governments will be overthrown, making place for the universal Kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Obs. 1. The inheritance of David's Son (from whence His royalty is to be manifested) is left under Gentile power until "the times of the Gentiles" are completed (Prop. 66); until the number of the elect is filled up (Props. 65, 86, etc.); until the time of the resurrection and rewarding of the saints (Rev. 11 : 15-18; Props. 126-130); until the time of the Second Advent (Props. 74, 121, etc.); until "the end of the age" (Prop. 140); until a people is raised up to sustain the dignity, etc., of the Kingdom (Props. 124, 154); until the power of Christ is exhibited (Props. 120, 121); until the destruction of Antichrist (Props. 123, 161); until the revelation of the Judgeship of Christ (Prop. 132) and "the judgment-day" (Props. 133 and 134); until "the day of the Lord Jesus" (Props. 138 and 139) is to be ushered in; until the last great battle is fought (Prop. 163), etc. It is significant that the fulfilment of the predictions relating to the inheritance of David's Son has been continuously witnessed for many centuries, and that it is presented before us, still confirmed, this day. This increases, with other reasons, our confidence in the fulfilment of the remainder, viz., the deliverance and exaltation of the same over all the earth. If, as a punishment, and for purposes of mercy, God can so minutely foretell and historically overrule the overthrow of the Theocracy and Theocratic people, He can as readily predict and bring to pass the restoration of the same and the overthrow of the Gentile powers.

Obs. 2. The predictions relating to this point are so numerous, so plain and decisive, that a mere reference to some of them, in view of what has already preceded, is all-sufficient. There is to be a shaking and removal of earthly kingdoms (Prop. 147) making place for the universal establishment of the Messianic Kingdom (Prop. 116), in which saints as co-heirs with Christ shall gloriously preside (Prop. 154), thus fulfilling Dan. 7 : 14, 27 (comp. Props. 121 and 123). The supremacy of the Jewish nation (Prop.

114) and the place of manifested royalty (Prop. 168), in view of the homage, worship, and tribute rendered, can only be satisfactorily explained by the Theocratic ordering, uniting Church and State over all the earth under one central Head. Such a visible Theocracy (Prop. 117) can, in the very nature of the case, only allow its own form of government to exist, seeing that its design is to restore through it (Prop. 119, etc.) all forfeited blessings, and to insure to man the much-longed-for perfect government on earth (Props. 202, 203, 206 and 207), as well as to exalt the blessed King (Props. 203, 204, 205). Hence such a change of domination is included in "the New Heavens and New Earth" (Props. 148-152), in "the world to come" (Prop. 137), in "the Restitution" (Prop. 144), in "the Regeneration" (Prop. 145), in the removal of the curse from creation (Prop. 146), etc. The testimony is so abundant and cumulative that not only every Millenarian writer has accepted of it, but even many of our opponents, who advocate that a time is coming when Church and State shall be happily united, etc., affirm that present governments will give place to another and higher form, having some central point of unity on earth. That unity of the race, dreamed of even by humanitarians, etc., can, however, only thus be secured.

Obs. 3. These present "times of the Gentiles" are not perpetual; they must come to an end. This is evidenced both by the election of the Jewish nation (Prop. 24, etc.) and by the oath-bound covenant of God with David (Props. 46, 47, 48, 49), which will yet be realized at the Sec. Advent (Props. 66, 69, 72, 75, 121, etc.). This being "the times of the Gentiles" (i. e. the period in which Gentile nations shall rule over the world and no visible Theocratic Kingship shall exist), and as these "times" are to end, giving place to covenant fulfilment—this serves to remove the objection alleged by unbelief, viz., that in the history of the Jewish nation and in that of the Church nothing has been witnessed commensurate with the grandeur, etc., of prophetic announcements, and that hence the prophecies are mere Oriental exaggerations. The reply is an old one, given even by an Augustine: discriminate the times, and the Scripture utterances will reconcile themselves. For the times of triumph are not in "the times of the Gentiles;" the latter are "times" of trial and testing, "times" in which the institutions of the world hold their sway, in which the saints are "pilgrims and strangers," and which are also plainly delineated (comp. Props. 174, 175). The Word of God forbids us to look for the fulfilment of a covenanted Kingdom and the triumphant Millennial glory during these "times"; if we do, we then embrace mere delusion and do violence to Holy Writ. We must patiently await the ending of these "times," and then, and then only, will "the sure mercies of David" be realized in the Theocratic ordering and the rich blessings resulting therefrom.

These times of the Gentiles have been variously estimated to accord with some favorite chronological views, so that the times of Lev. 26 and Dan. 4, have had various endings (depending on the commencement) given to them, even extending to A. D. 1918 (Habershon, Guide, p. 34), and to A. D. 1923 (by Guinness in his recent work, Approaching End). We are not concerned in the exactitude of such calculations; only approximately have they any value.

Obs. 4. This again reminds us of the folly, so widely prevalent, of exalting this present period of time—embracing as it does "the times of the Gentiles"—above the position assigned to it in Holy Scripture. Eminent and good men, overlooking the utterances of the Spirit of truth, and in their eagerness to honor the Church, call that "day" which the Spirit designates "night," and that "light," which the Word recognizes as "darkness." This dispensation includes "the times of the Gentiles," for they are only closed by their fearful overthrow at the Second Advent (Rev. 19, etc.), and while in this dispensation the Church, with all her blessings and privileges, is still in "the night," surrounded by darkness (herself led by "the light shining in the dark place," and by "the day-star," 2 Pet. 1:19, or by "the light," 1 Jno. 1:9, etc.), looking for an absent bridegroom, fighting, struggling, and pressed with the curse, it is certainly unwise, both against Scripture and existing fact, to appropriate to her blessings which only belong to her after these "times" are ended.

Obs. 5. This fact, viz., the positive end of Gentile domination to give place to the Theocratic reign of Christ and His brethren, will become more and more impressed upon, not only believers, but the world. Already deep thinkers have received and boldly advocated what is so eminently Biblical; devoted men in all denominations proclaim the same; and this will become more intensive as infidelity, etc., advances. This fact in its historical connection, and as part of the Divine Plan, will especially be unwelcome to the kings of the earth and to nearly all who are in power, ecclesiastical or civil. This, too, will evidently be one cause of that deep hatred against Christ, and result in the widespread confederation and gathering of the nations against Him (Props. 161, 162, and 163.) The kings and mighty men of the earth (Rev. 19:19, etc.) will be unwilling to yield up (Ps. 2:2, 3) their power and submit to the rule that must be imposed for the good of man.

The early Church, and Millenarians since, have taken this position. Even Disraeli (Cur. of Lit., vol. 3, p. 275), quotes Dr. Hartley as follows: "In 1749 Dr. Hartley published his 'Observations of Man,' and predicted the fall of the existing governments and hierarchies in two simple Propositions; among others: Prop. 81. It is probable that all the civil governments will be overturned. Prop. 82. It is probable that the present forms of Church government will be dissolved." Many were alarmed at these predicted falls of Church and State," etc. The student of the Bible, if reverent and receptive, will make this probability to be an absolute certainty. The warning is distinctively given; the necessity for such a change is specifically pointed out, and to close our eyes to the truth only indicates lack of faith in God's own utterances. Indeed, as intimated already, this overthrow, thus predicted and based on the incoming Theocratic Kingdom, will be sufficiently understood—however scornfully rejected—to be a warning to those kingdoms, as evidenced by the events to occur at the closing of this dispensation, by the order of fulfilment (as given e.g. in Rev. 14), and by the special entreaty given (as e.g. in 2d Ps.) to such kingdoms.

Obs. 6. But the nations, in their selfishness and opposition to the truth, refused to recognize what at the same time is so plainly revealed, viz., that while Gentile domination ceases, it simply ceases because the new order or dominion introduced is immensely its superior in securing the happiness and glory of the Gentile nations. This has been so clearly portrayed in various propositions (as e.g. Props. 119, 142, 144, 154, 156, etc.) that it is unnecessary to repeat. Paul rightfully presents this point in Rom., ch. 11, because when the Redeemer comes and restores the elect people, His dominion will perform that for the nations (Props. 120, 144, etc.) which mere human governments, with all the aids that man can possibly apply, can never accomplish, viz., remove the curse and introduce the millennial bless- ings. But the enmity of man, while recoiling upon himself in deserved punishment, cannot prevent the abounding grace of God from bringing in a dominion designed both for his benefit and his glory. And in this government, the ancient promise (Gen. 9: 27) will still hold good, viz., that God will enlarge Japhet, but specially, yea personally, dwell with Shem as He did in the past, and again will, Ps. 132: 13, 14, etc.

God does not delight in employing violence, but force, terrible and destructive, must be used. The long-continued and cumulative depravity of the nations finally culminating in Antichristian blasphemy and cruelty, which despises God's warnings and kills His own, makes it a necessity, in order to introduce a deliverance and the promised blessings of redemption. God's own honor and glory, as well as the happiness of those who trust in Him, demand this change. The nations, however great, who undertake to crush His truth and people are doomed to vengeance. It has been observed that the Bible presents the history of great nations that figure so prominently in secular history, only in so far as they stand related to the development of the Theocratic idea in its preparatory stages and final realization. This omission, of what so largely composes the world's history, has been said by unbelief to be either the result of a narrow, bigoted Jewish prejudice (leading the writers to make Jehovah one who did not concern himself in the fortunes of the world, but only in those of the Hebrews), or the outcome of Jewish vanity (which exalted the Jewish nation by ignoring the affairs of other nations). But as Roger's (Superhuman Origin of the Bible, p. 16, etc.), has well shown, the former is refuted by the abundant assertions to the contrary (as in the case of Pharaoh, Sennacherib, Cyrus, etc.), and the positive predictions relating to other nations; while the latter is set aside by the simple fact that such "vanity" should speak of other nations as "scourges" of their own and predict their own overthrow and the dominion of the Gentiles. The omission must be found in the Theocratic idea, viz., that God regards only one form of government, and the people who are to be incorporated with it, as deserving of His particular continued and detailed notice.

Obs. 7. Reference has been made several times to the guarded manner in which the primitive Christians, including even Jesus and the apostles, spoke of the downfall of Gentile dominion. This was done in order to avoid the hostility and persecution of the Roman Emperors. Yet the view was more or less distinctly proclaimed by the believers, and was one reason why the millenarian doctrine fell into disrepute, especially after a union of State and Church, with those in power. To illustrate how, nevertheless with reluctance, this truth was proclaimed, Lactantius (De Instit., ch. 15) expresses himself: "The Roman Power which now governs the world (my mind dreads to declare it, yet I must speak it, because it will surely come to pass)—the Roman Power will be taken away from the earth, and the Empire will return to Asia, and the East will again have the chief dominion, and the West will be in subjection." The general sentiment with all millenarians, based upon Dan., Isa., etc., was that King Jesus with His subordinate rulers would sway an undisputed sceptre over all the earth, the Gentile dominion being crushed by an overwhelming manifestation of divine power and vengeance, owing to its final array against the truth, etc.

The round apple of gold, the token of Universal Lordship over the earth, fallen from the hand of the image of the Emperor Justinian, can never be replaced (Sir John Maundeville, ch. 1), until it is grasped again by the Antichrist, who shall perish in the attempt. Like the apple of Eden, it only proves a curse to its holder, until He comes whose right it is. The student will not fail to observe (see next Prop.) that while civil government is ordained of God as something that necessarily proceeds from the nature of man and society, God has nowhere excepting only the Theocratic—given His approval to a special form. This exception indicates the form, which, above all others, meets the Divine approval, and we may rest assured from the praises that He bestows upon it, that His Divine Purpose relating to it will not fail. Hence we cannot receive the predictions of otherwise able writers on the perpetuity and prosperity of "the times of the Gentiles." Thus e.g. Wines (Com. on Hebrew Laws, Introd. p. 62) growing enthusiastic over his delineation of American "liberty and self-government," confidently (speaking of nations as they now exist, and of knowledge progressing, etc.), predicts: "The great principle of popular right and popular sovereignty, in some form or other, is predestined to a universal triumph. It may achieve this triumph in one century, or it may not achieve it in five; but its ultimate success is as certain as its truth. God never made a truth, into which He did not put a power, that sooner or later would cause it to prevail. Despotism, therefore, will have to bow before the majesty and supremacy of the people. Even the frozen gates of Siberia shall yet dissolve and disappear beneath the genial warmth of the sun of freedom. Tyranny, with its chains and its blood, will everywhere come to an end. Humanity will recover her rights. And an enfranchised world shall yet exult in the liberty and happiness, for which it has sighed and struggled through many a weary century of injustice and oppression." So again p. 62 he prophesies respecting the American Republic: "Standing upon the soil of freedom, and using the lever of Christian civilization, he has a place whereon, and a power wherewith, not only to move the world, but to transform it from a desolate wilderness into the garden of the Lord, covering it with the light of truth and the beauty of goodness." Let the reader look at this uninspired prediction and then at the inspired portraiture given by Scripture of the future Antichrist, etc. Wines's prophecy is based on a false principle, viz., that truth must inevitably prevail and triumph, which is proven by history to be untrue, as exemplified in the Antediluvian world, in the Theocracy, in the life and death of Jesus, in the retrogressions of Christianity, in the overthrow of nations, etc.

Obs. 8. The reader may regard it as significant that the Theocratic King was born at the very time that the Gentile dominion was in its most extended and consolidated form. The fairest portions of Europe, Asia, and Africa then known formed one vast Empire—the Roman—when Jesus, "the Christ," appeared and tendered the Kingdom to the elect nation (Props. 54, 55, etc.) which, if accepted (by a national repentance), would have broken the Roman Power with irresistible force. The One through whom that Gentile dominion is to cease, comes singly and alone, when at its height, and then, owing to the sinfulness of His own inheritance, permits this dominion to continue on and on until He shall come the Second time. And this, too, is done both as a punishment to His own rebellious people, and that special grace and mercy should be extended to the Gentiles. When He comes again, the time selected is also one in which this Gentile dominion shall be manifested in a vast confederation (Prop. 160, etc.), and when, humanely speaking, the Church shall so experience its persecuting power that no hope for its continuance appears possible.

God, for wise and merciful purposes (to correct his nation for their unbelief, to call out a people for His name, etc.), and also to indicate by actual experiment how man is a ruler over man, has allowed Gentile domination. His own Theocratic Kingdom was withdrawn, and the most ample opportunity afforded to Gentiles to show forth their ability to rule, and subserve the interests of mankind. Nimrod's rebellion probably first originated the worldly and selfish form of government, and this culminated in the four great Empires of Daniel. This domination was tried with the most intelligent and cultivated nations under different forms of government, and history records the results in the wars, violence, crime, oppressions, etc. The blood, tears, terrors, sufferings, despair, and cruelty, that they have entailed in the name of glory, religion, liberty, etc., is fearful to contemplate, and the victims of persecution and pride are counted by millions and millions. We are gravely told that civilization, education, humanity, philosophy, science and art are changing the nations for the better. Are the standing armies less? Are the engines of war, and fortifications, and fleets less? Do establishments that manufacture weapons of destruction languish and die for lack of work? Is taxation less? Are the jealousies and desire for revenge less? Is the spirit between rulers and subjects more harmonious? Is the conflict between the high and low, the rich and poor, the capitalist and laborer diminished? Are the interests of nations and classes reconciled? Such questions need no answer.

Obs. 9. It is a significant fact, fully attested by history, past and present, that no Christian nation has ever existed among the Gentiles. No matter how largely the laws of Moses and the precepts of Christ have been incorporated, and no matter how men of a Christian spirit have endeavored at times to legislate and execute laws in a proper spirit, it still remains true that the design of this dispensation has never been to convert nations (Prop. 86. etc.), and that every nation, however professedly Christian, has been guilty of oppression, injustice, and wickedness. The spirit of self-interest, aggrandizement, earthly glory, etc., has led nations into paths of sin, violence and cruelty, and with the principles at work they are utterly unfitted to co-operate with a pure Theocratic Kingdom, and hence their domination must come to an end.

Ultraists, in their eulogy of "Christian nations," speak loudly of such "nations tendering allegiance to Christianity" and of their "recognizing the authority of Jesus," but conveniently ignore the acts and unbelief of such nations. Those very nations, as we abundantly show in other places, develop the Antichrist and array themselves against the Christ. The final complete overthrow not only indicates the lack of sanctity, so often claimed, but the worthlessness of those ultra views (e.g. see art. "Reformed Presbyterian Church," or Covenanters, in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclop.), which make the State one of the "departments of Christ's visible Kingdom on earth." If any one desires to see what evils are engendered by the Church arrogating power over the civil authorities or of the civil exercising power over the Church, history is full of it, from the days of Constantine down to the present, as witnessed in the history of Rome, France, England, Germany, Holland (Motley's Life of Barneveld), etc.

Obs. 10. The reader will not fail (which we repeat, in order to impress) to observe, that while civil government is ordained by God as something that necessarily proceeds from the nature of man and of society (next Prop.), yet as the forms of it are of man's ordinance, and subject more or less to depravity, God has nowhere, excepting only the Theocratic form, given His approval to any special one. If we open the Old Testament, and read the numerous passages in which God praises and eulogizes this form, we find that this exception indicates most forcibly the form of government that, above all others, meets the divine approbation.

Consequently we deprecate the fulsome and unscriptural eulogies heaped upon earthly governments by various writers. Thus e.g. Wines (Com. on Heb. Laws.) in a most enthusiastic manner praises the advance in government as illustrated by the Republican form in the United States; predicts in behalf of popular sovereignty "a universal triumph," (see Obs. 7 and note). The wildest of all efforts to glorify the United States is presented by Baldwin (Armageddon), who pushes it to an extreme allied to the blasphemous. The student has only to contrast this uninspired picture with the inspired portraiture of the future, and he finds instead of the former, the Antichrist ruling over the nations, the nations confederated against Christ, despotism and tyranny the most violent, tribulation, etc. When Wild, in his work The Lost Ten Tribes, exalts England and the United States under the plea of being the "Israel," he only shows that he does not comprehend the nature of the Kingdom which is to be set up. When he predicts "smooth things," including a continued progress in prosperity and greatness, a most triumphant career, he indicates a lack of comparison of prophecy.

Some students of prophecy, owing to England's State Church, or the aid given to the Reformation, or its missionary and Bible extension, or its contest with the Papacy, or its removing Jewish disabilities, think that (as e.g. Thruston in England Safe and Triumphant), the future of England is a decidedly prosperous one, etc. A recent writer, Cummings (The Great Tribulation), concludes that England will escape the tribulation of the nations. In his Lecture "The Destiny of England in the Prophetic Record," he takes the favorite position of many that owing to England assisting to carry the Jews to Palestine, she shall escape the doom of other nations. On the other hand, a large number of prophetic students emphatically declare (as e.g. Thorpe in The Destinies of the British Empire), that owing to her national sins (oppression, policy, opium trade, connivance of idolatry in India, aid extended to Popery, etc.), England is fated to meet the divine vengeance. Bickersteth (The Practical Guide), Varley (National Calamities, in The Chris. Herald, Aug. 28, 1879), and others give a vivid list of the sins of England, and indorse Thorpe's view. Indeed, whatever England, and others, may do in reference to the Jews (through policy, etc.), the universality of prophecy (e.g. Isa. 2 : 10-17), the positive declarations that no nations are on the Lord's side when He comes for vengeance and redemption (as Isa. 63 : 3, Delitzsch's rend. "of the nations no one was with me," and Lange's Com. loci declares the same, Doc. 2, 3, and Exeg. says : "The statement indicates the universal antichristian spirit of the nations,") the extent of the divine vengeance reaching to "all nations," even "all the kingdoms of the world, which are upon the face of the earth" (as Jer. 25), the complete overthrow of world-dominions and their incorporation with Christ's Theocratic rule (Rev. 11 : 15), the ending of Gentile times and the manner of closing (e.g. Dan. 2) with no exception of the nations made (unless we except those heathen mentioned in Isa. 66 : 19), all this fully indicates that the latter view is the most tenable.*

Some present the United States as the great element for "the regeneration" of the nations, expressing themselves in eulogies which appropriate the promises solely belonging to Jesus, "the Son of Man." Wise statesmen (as Webster, etc.), have pointed out the great evils connected with our system of government, such as result from office-seeking, the licentiousness of the press, the abuse and perversion of suffrage, the dangers of emigration, the corruption of officials, the violence of party spirit, the conflicting interests of sections, and the misunderstanding of the rights of the general government and of individual States. But there is a portent of danger before us far greater than all these, which must eventually result disastrously, and that is, the growth of unbelief, socialism and its kindred brood with their demands. The government is in the hands of the people, and just so soon as the majority becomes leavened with socialistic ideas (which will come when the laboring population becomes more dense, wages become low, labor itself becomes difficult to obtain, distress brings discontent, etc.); then its doctrines respecting capital will be enforced (for the rich being in the minority, will be helpless) legally in the Legislative halls, and a series of spoliations ensue. Each blow at capital relieving distress but temporarily, will be succeeded by another and another, until the means of wealth being exhausted and the motives to its being obtained are destroyed, anarchy, engendered by a fearful experience, will evidence the worth of all such predictions. Unbelief will attack the Church, and in every way cause it to suffer. Both capital, because of its former extortion and monopolies, and the Church, because of its unfaithfulness and worldliness, will then suffer. This may be thought to be a gloomy view of the future, but how can we close our eyes to the fearful increase of infidelity, the danger already threatened, the demands already made, the views of disorganization already held by a multitude, the communistic parties already organized, the facilities already provided for joint action, etc. The aim is finally to control legislation, introduce universal co-operation, make the State a universal co-operative corporation, and enforce, under coercion, a universal and equal distribution of property. (For the demands, plans, extent, etc., of Socialism, see e.g. the series of articles entitled "German Socialism in America" in The North Amer. Review, 1879, Cook's Lecture "The Infidel Attack on Property," etc.). The membership is numerous, for a Socialistic gathering at Chicago (Luth. Obs., July 12, 1878), on Sunday, alone was estimated at 30,000. It is boldly avowed to be "a political party" (as e.g. Morris Cohen before the Hewitt Committee in New York, as stated in Cin. Enquirer, Aug. 5, 1878). Emigration is rapidly swelling their numbers; numerous papers and journals, some with a large daily circulation, adopt and circulate their principles. The people have worshipped Mammon, and their god will bring them misery. "The National Platform and Principles of the Socialistic Labor Party," adopted by the National Congress at Newark, N. J., Dec., 1877, has for its motto : "The earth is man's, and the fulness thereof," which is but a parody on Ps. 24 : 1, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." The abuse poured out upon God, Christ, and Christianity is so virulent and blasphemous

* During the revisal of the text, the writer observed an interesting article on "The Ships of Tarshish," by Rev. Hytche in The Proph. News, Ap., 1882. It takes Thorpe's position, and gives the following order : (1) England at first resists Antichrist ; (2) then allies herself with him ; (3) her navy in the Mediterranean is destroyed by the Lord ; (4) influenced by the spared Gentiles at the fall of Antichrist, she will be the foremost in conveying with her ships the Jews to Palestine.

as to be exceedingly shocking. While some to gain adherents quote Jesus as a Socialistic Reformer (but refuse his cross), and the Bible as teaching Socialism, Communism, etc., others denominate Christianity "Poison, and an eighteen hundred years' sickness," and declare (as Volkstaat, No. 25, 1876), "that Christianity and Socialism are opposed to each other as fire and water." We transcribe only one sentence as indicative of the fiery hate, given by a public speaker: "We hold God for an Ass of foolishness; we view God as the greatest evil in the world, and, therefore, declare against God the war." (He will meet them in "the war," and their blasphemy, pride, and boasting will have a terrible fall.) It is this mixture of unbelief, socialism, communism, etc., which will bring this country into an endurance of tribulation. By eloquently expressed appeals to humanitarian ideas, and by ravishing pictures of bountiful help from the State, removal of care, the certainty of competency, freedom from all restraint, and the surety of help under all circumstances, a majority will finally accrue to them, and infidelity will rule: There is one feature that may mitigate the severity of God's judgments on the United States, provided that it is retained to the end, viz., the general and State governments have ever been friendly to the Jews. So Lawrence ("The Jews and their Persecutors," Harper's Mag., June, 1874, ref. to Jost's His. of the Jews) remarks: "A fair Republic sprang up in the New World, that was the first of all the nations to offer a peaceful and happy home to the persecuted people." Now God's threatenings are specially levelled against the nations who in the past or future oppress that people and burden themselves with it; they particularly shall feel His vengeance. Therefore there is propriety in the observation of Wines (Com. on the Laws of the Anc. Hebrews, p. 340), who, after referring to the manner in which the Jews were treated in Europe, Africa, and Asia, and how in this country they have from the first enjoyed freedom, equality, protection of rights, etc., says: "May we not hope, that, when Jehovah shall judge the nations, He will in mercy remember the land, which has afforded a refuge and a home to the sons of Jacob."

Obs. 11. Turning back to Props. 131, 154, 159, and others (e. g. Prop. 201, 202, 206, etc.) of similar import, it will be seen that a Theocracy embracing a pure Infallibility, administered through righteous and glorified agents, is to possess the rule over the earth. Fallible Imperialism, with its weakness and vices, will be crushed under its force; Constitutional Monarchy, with its utter inability to meet the clashing interests of classes and Republicanism which suffers from the suffrage of self-interest and ignorance being made the basis of its ordering, all forms of government, unable to remove the evils under which their subjects are groaning, must be subverted and give place to this one, which in itself honors God and blesses humanity with a perfect government that fully performs, yea immensely more, what others promise. This is clearly taught. All that oppose this coming Kingdom and its august Ruler shall be destroyed. Kings and nobles, high and low, rich and poor, who resist, shall fall beneath its invincible power—a power which will settle all difficulties between nation and nation, aristocracy and commoner, capital and labor, man and man.

The divine assurances (as e.g. Prov. 11:25; 19:17; Matt. 5:7; Isa. 32:8; Matt. 10:42, etc.) of an ultimate repayment given by God Himself, indicates THE COGNIZANCE OF ONE abundantly able to fulfil His promises. May an ample realization of His faithfulness be their happy experience. Faith in the same "blessed Hope," in the same Theocratic Kingdom, influenced them to give their needed assistance, and, therefore, it is but proper for me to express, in this form, the desire and prayer, that the mighty Theocratic King—whom they thus honored—may honor them in His Coming Kingdom.

*The author likewise acknowledges his deep indebtedness to Hon. J. W. Bookwalter; S. A. Bowman, Esq.; Ed. P. Christie; Augustus Kountze, Esq.; A. D. Jones, Esq.; P. Schindler, Esq., and others, for aid and sympathy extended. A sense of gratitude prompts this brief, but DESERVED, mention.

“And as it is decreed that the whole scheme of Scripture is not yet understood, so if it ever comes to be understood before the restitution of all things, and without miraculous interpositions, it must be in the same way as natural knowledge is come at, by the continuance and progress of learning and liberty, and by particular persons attending to, comparing, and pursuing intimations scattered up and down, which are overlooked and disregarded by the majority of the world. For this is the way in which all improvements are made by thoughtful men, tracing on obscure hints, as it were, dropped to us by nature accidentally, or what seems to come into our minds by chance. For is it incredible that a book which has been so long in possession of mankind should contain many truths as yet undiscovered, for all the phenomena and the same faculties of investigation from which such great discoveries have been made in the present and the past age were equally in possession of mankind several thousand years before. And possibly it might be intended that events as they come to pass should open and ascertain the meaning of several parts of Scripture.”—BUTLER’S Analogy, Part II., Ch. 3.

CYPRIAN, PREF. TO TESTIMONIA: “More strength will be imparted to thee, and the eyes of thine understanding will continually grow clearer, if thou searchest more carefully through the Old and New Test., and diligently perusest all parts of the Holy Scriptures; for I have only drawn a little out of the divine fountain to send thee in the meantime. Thou canst drink more copiously and satisfy thyself, when, with us, thou also approachest to the same fountain of divine fulness, in order to drink after the same manner.”—Quoted by Dr. NEANDER, Genl. Ch. His., Vol. 2, p. 447.

PROPOSITION 165. The doctrine of this Kingdom enables us to form a correct estimate of human governments.

This already appears from the contemplated cessation of all Gentile domination, the complete overthrow of all kingdoms and states, and the bringing of all nations directly (by the rule of the saints, etc.) under the one great central Theocratic authority. For, whatever purposes the institution of human government, in the past and the present dispensation, may subserve, it is distinctly announced that so much of imperfection and evil is attached to it in all its varied forms that it is incompatible with the new order of things which shall be presented in "the age to come."

Obs. 1. In the consideration of this subject men have been apt to rush to extremes, presenting conclusions which are not warranted by Scripture. One party lauds and magnifies human government, as it has existed and now exists, as a Divine institution, speaking loudly of "the divine rights of kings," or of "the sovereignty of the people," etc.—so numerous writers of the past and present. Another party, only regarding the threats, etc., against such government, and misapprehending the time, manner, etc., of God's kingdom to replace it, undertake to break down such government by substituting one of their own; so the Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchy Men, in the days of the Reformation, the Mormons, etc. Still another party so decrie all human government, that they insist upon it, that it is the duty of believers to avoid having any personal connection with them in any official capacity, or in upholding them in any form as a participator; so e.g. Quakers, Christadelphians, some Adventists, Seventh Day Baptists, etc. We avoid all such extravagant deductions by allowing the Scriptures to testify to three things pertaining to human government, viz., (1) its necessity; (2) its character; (3) its ultimate destiny. The necessity of having such government is grounded in the constitution of man, and is a legitimate outgrowth of his relations to society, finding its support in the proposed protection and maintenance of mutual rights, privileges, etc. As such, it is an ordinance of God (just as man himself, society in its simplest form, the family relation, etc., are ordinances or appointments of God, resulting from established law), and so expressly declared in Rom. 13 : 1-5, while the particular form in which it is specifically manifested is also the ordinance or appointment of man (growing out of the former) and so designated 1 Pet. 2 : 13. In the absence of the contemplated Theocratic Kingdom, it is God's will and pleasure that men should, in order to avoid anarchy and greater evils, be placed under government, which, more or less, exerts a restraining influence—arising from moral law—upon the outbreaks of depravity. Therefore obedience, excepting only when God's law (Acts 4 : 19 and 5 : 29) is to be directly violated, is enjoined as a duty. But while this is so, and necessarily follows from the laws which God has established, it does not by any means assert that the character of such government is acceptable to Him, for the very power which Paul tells us is thus ordained by God is at the same time, so far as its character is concerned, described by the Spirit as “the Beast,” exceedingly dreadful, etc., in Dan. 7 : 7, 19, 23 ; Rev. 17 : 4, 16 etc. Instead of being divine, it is bestial and wicked ; its conduct is denounced, and its doom declared. The same is true of the Babylonian and of all other kingdoms delineated in the Word of God, and the destiny of all of them is to perish ; but at the time, in the manner, and by the agencies, which God has also ordained. Man is not to assume that which God has placed in the hands of His own Son to accomplish, when the ordained “Times of the Gentiles” have come to an end. The visible Sovereignty of this world only becomes the Sovereignty of our Lord at the expiration of a pre-determined period, and for that we must patiently wait. In reference to the participation of believers in such government the Word also gives a clear utterance ; while preserving integrity and endorsing it only in so far as it does right, we are to accept it, rendering obedience, as a necessity for the protection of society. When the Theocracy was overthrown the righteous Daniel and his companions found it justly compatible with the laws of God to hold official stations under the Babylonian monarchy. Before the Theocracy was established, the pious Joseph was thus associated in the Egyptian kingdom. After the Theocracy was delayed and the Times of the Gentiles announced, obedience is enjoined, the support of the government by the payment of taxes enforced, the protection of the government (as in the case of Paul) invoked, submission even under injustice recommended, the whole embraced by the general and yet special affirmation : “Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.”

Baldwin (Armageddon, Sec. 3, p. 26), gives place, in his one-sided eulogy of Republicanism, to a tirade against “all human monarchy,” saying that God “hates it as a feature of hell and the devil,” “that God considers human monarchy as exceedingly sinful,” “that God is therefore hostile to human monarchy because the system is iniquitous in principle, and he will destroy it because of its wicked nature.” But he overlooks entirely, (1) that human government is necessary ; (2) that God Himself instituted and favored a monarchy ; (3) that, in the absence of a Theocratic government, God favors even monarchical governments as essential to the framework of society, and resulting from the laws instituted by Him ; (4) that God only regards governments, of every kind, with disfavor when the spirit, acts, etc., of the same are opposed to His truth and people ; (5) and that human governments, so essential to avoid anarchy, are no longer to be tolerated when He sets up again His own Theocratic Kingdom under the Messiah, which Kingdom is not one dependent on the boasted and regenerating “Popular Sovereignty” of Baldwin. Over against such wholesale denunciation, we have a remarkable delicacy manifested in Scripture. It has been noticed that in Daniel, when giving the succession of kingdoms to Nebuchadnezzar, the Spirit employs as symbols the precious and baser metals to indicate (ch. 2) the material progress, etc., but when the Spirit delineates the same kingdoms for Daniel and His own people, he employs symbols expressive of the character sustained by them. We must be sufficiently candid to allow that the word "ordained" (Rom. 13 : 1-7) intimates the divine sanction, as agreeable to the divine will, because an essential agency in society, and discriminative in seeing that God has ordained many things that are perverted.

Obs. 2. This doctrine enables us to detect the fallacy in the writings of some devoted men (Fulton, etc.) when they assume the existence of Christ's kingdom as already established, believers being its subjects, etc., and then reason from this assumption that believers being already the subjects of an instituted kingdom, they must stand aloof from all human government. Our whole argument utterly disproves such premise, demonstrating that the kingdom is postponed, and that believers, in virtue of their relationship to Christ, are only now "heirs of the Kingdom." The Kingdom of the Messiah not being set up, and yet the relation of man to civil society making some form of government an absolute necessity, the believer is directed to conform to the present arrangement of things, without sacrificing his Christian principle or violating the commands of God, until the time that the King Himself comes. This is done too by way of trial and to prepare him, as well as the race, to appreciate more fully the Divine government of the Messiah when manifested. Man, as a punishment and a test, is left to work out his ideas of government practically in order, as the end will prove, that depravity in the highest exhibition of man's relations (i.e. in the civil) will gain the ascendancy, and that human nature in the mass, when prosperity or greatness is attained, cannot withstand corruption. Hence it is, that these "heirs of the Kingdom" to come, are exhorted not to place their affections upon these things, and that eulogies of such human governments are lacking in God's Word ; for the Spirit ever keeps in view—whatever excellent and virtuous actions may be performed—the great predicted fact that the character and destiny of earthly kingdoms, as exhibited at the time of the Sec. Advent, renders them utterly unworthy of them. They become the instruments of persecution and cruelty (as even an inchoate fulfilment in the past evidences), culminating in one great combined confederation against God's people. The Spirit in forming His estimate looks at human government, not as it may present itself at this or that particular favorable crisis in history, but, at the general spirit and tendency which finally assumes full sway at the end. This leads us to add : while it is true that government is necessary, notwithstanding its past or future unfriendliness to the Church, it is owing to this manifestation of character that believers are exhorted to hold themselves in patience, and to anticipate for the future an increased wickedness, which will be severely afflictive to them ; to discharge their duties as far as possible and to suffer, if needs be, for the sake of the truth. This also gives a satisfactory answer to Shaftesbury, etc., who objects to the New Test. that it does not enjoin "patriotism" or an expression of love and esteem for the government under which believers may live. While it does give precepts, etc., which if followed out will largely contribute to the welfare of any government ; while it insists upon that which is right and just, and enjoins the same upon all, yet this distinctive point is indeed lacking, and the reason is only additional evidence of the Divine inspiration of the Word, seeing that the ultimate end of such government is contemplated, and in view of the facts in relation to it, it would be against both the character and destiny of such government to enjoin "the heirs" of a future nobler government to come, and withdraw their hopes and affections from the latter, and set them upon that which is fated to miserably perish. Shaftesbury's objection is taking a mere transient view of government; the Bible considers its culminated wickedness and end still future. The simple truth is, as the Church will yet most painfully experience (Prop. 162), that this very government, for which unbelief calls for patriotic demonstrations, will yet most bitterly persecute her, so that the silence of Scripture complained of is fitting and just. Therefore, at present, we indorse Luther's position (Kurtz, Ch. His.) "that the Gospel secured spiritual liberty, but did not subvert civil government and social institutions," but enables us under such government to exemplify Christian character.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This is only bringing to a strictly logical conclusion a premise laid down by numerous writers. Thus e.g. Neander, advocating a present existing Kingdom of the Messiah, says: "The fundamental principle of the Christian community is, that there shall be other subordination than that of its members to God and Christ, and that this shall be absolute," etc. Now while Neander himself, as is well known, would have protested against pushing this to its logical sequence, Fulton and others have done it. The truth is, that we are also, in this dispensation, to be individually subordinate, i.e. render obedience to civil power, but make the authority of God supreme. Many honest men under a mistaken idea, unnecessarily excite against themselves odium by an attitude of unscriptural hostility to governments.

<sup>2</sup> How men have endeavored to give a degree of sanctity to Gentile governments is apparent e.g. in anointing kings with "the holy unction," thus professing to transfer them into "the Lord's anointed," of which Gibbon (Decl. and Fall, vol. 5, p. 29), singularly says: "this Jewish rite has been diffused and maintained by the superstition and vanity of modern Europe." This was supposed to confer a Divine or Theocratic right and this "divine right of kings" was often exhibited in the most fantastic manner possible, as e.g. in the proudest of men and women regarding it an honor to perform the most menial of services, even to the holding and presenting the divine king's shirt, etc.

Obs. 3. This estimate and end of human government not only enable us to discard the Utopian notion of its development into a state of perfectibility, but the attempted union of Church and State during "Times of the Gentiles." The character and destiny of the State forbids such a union. The State, as now constituted, is selfish, and for the sake of self-interest, as the history of the past painfully illustrates, and as the history of the future predicted shows, will sacrifice the Church. The State, in the very nature of the case, cannot be safely attached to the Church, seeing that the sanctifying Theocratic element, which alone can elevate it to the position of a truly Christian organization in perfect union with the religious, is lacking. The feeling, however, is greatly to be respected which would endeavor to bring about such a union with the State, that the highest interests of mankind in the highest form of organization should be the Protector and Advancer of truth and happiness. This feeling, so honorable, will be realized but not now; humanity, owing to its depravity, is not prepared for it, and will not be, as predicted in this dispensation; it can only be verified under the Christ personally in the anointed Theocratic Kingdom.

Many writers, not satisfied with a general supremacy of God over the nations of earth (Prop. 79)—God's ability to overrule, exert a divine providence—must unite with it the Theocratic element, as e.g. exemplified in the Theocratic History of English History, in which the adverse circumstances are carefully kept in the background, and the estimated providential brought forth prominently, and then men as honored divine instrumentalities are eulogized beyond their merits. While "God is in History," and the order of events are under His supervision and control, it is also true that no such alleged Theocratic rule exists, for that Theocratic relationship is confined to the Jewish nation and to the future. The fact is, that from the head of the image (Dan. 2) this existing world-dominion, can be denominated "Babylonish," seeing that the same spirit runs from the head to the feet. While the former dominion is taken away from Babylon, Medo-Persia, Macedonia, yet the spirit actuating all such in the nations is perpetuated (Dan. 7 : 12), so that when the image is smitten on its feet and overthrown, we have virtually the whole image, (gold, silver, brass, and iron), representing this spirit of world dominion, also overthrown (Dan. 2 : 35, 45), for in the last world-power, the Roman, we have these included and intensified. As these empires are successive, we look for—as the analogy of Scripture teaches—a revival of the spirit of all these in the last head of the fourth beast, who dominates over the nations, and concentrates in himself their past hostility to God and man.

Obs. 4. The student, in corroboration of our position, will observe a singular feature, viz., that although the Roman Empire (and its divisions) has loudly proclaimed its profession of religion, appealed in laudation to its conversion under Constantine, praised itself as "most Christian," and even pronounced itself as a "Holy Empire," yet God, in view of no radical change, takes no notice whatever of all this boasted profession, and by this very significant silence (excepting in Rev. where the Empire is still recognized to be, as in Daniel, a "beast") places over against the extravagant eulogies of men His own estimate of such conversion and profession. The same is true of England, Germany, the United States, and others, for, notwithstanding the professed claim of "Christian nation," none of these receive the slightest recognition as such in the Word. The reason for such omission is self-evident.

In looking over the history of "Christian nations," we sometimes wonder that right and justice do not triumph over wrong and oppression. Thus e.g. when Russia, Prussia, and Austria proceeded to the spoliation of Poland, the Poles, in their declaration against this iniquitous measure, said : "And lastly, full of confidence in the justice of the Almighty, we lay our rights at the foot of His eternal throne, and put our cause into the hands of the King of kings, the Supreme Judge of nations ; and, in the full assurance of His succor, we protest solemnly and before the whole universe, against every step taken, or to be taken toward the dismemberment of Poland" (art. "Poland and the Poles," Galaxy, vol. 18, 1874, p. 40). This nation which was the least persecuting, the most tolerant, falls underneath the intolerant and highly professing Christian. Now while Poland itself, as its history too plainly attests, was but nominally Christian (and consequently in view of its character could not expect the divine blessing to answer a prayer so confidently expressed), and was dismembered by nominal Christian nations, yet God does not entirely disregard such a prayer and appeal. Those nations have suffered, and will yet more bitterly suffer, on account of their sins.

Obs. 5. It is a fact, as various able writers on the laws of the Theocracy have shown, that the nearer governments adopt, and carry out, the great principles underlying the Theocracy, the purer and more elevated is the civil polity, and the greater strength, security and happiness is imparted to all classes, rulers and ruled. The reverse of this holds true as exemplified in the history of nations ; for the greater the departure from those principles, the more oppressive and ruinous has been the result. But while this is so, the reader will not fail to notice that a mistake—serious—is made by supposing, that the Theocracy is merely given as a pattern—an enunciation of principles—for other governments to follow because it is to be superseded by others, instead of its being, as the Bible plainly predicts, for a time held in abeyance, owing to depravity, until the proper material is gathered out for its overwhelming inauguration.

Hence able writers (as Wines, Michaelis, Graves, Lowman, Jahn, and others), while justly noticing the political features of the Theocracy, and showing how worthy of adoption by the nations are its fundamental principles, either overlook, or are in ignorance of this divine intention; and besides they do not realize the simple fact that the which gave vitality and force to a Theocracy (viz., God's personally acting as the Ruler of the nation) is lacking in all other governments, and, therefore, no other can possibly be substituted in its place. Again, men of the highest eminence assume the perpetuity of earthly governments from the fact that man is so constituted by God that he must, in view of his adaptedness, live under some form of government—that society cannot properly exist without it—that it commends itself as a positive necessity, etc. Now while it is true that civil government is required, yet the perpetuity of the same the way advocated does not follow. On the other hand, the Bible distinctly teaches, that until God claims, by an actual re-establishment of His Theocracy, the Sovereignty of the world, these civil governments must, even if under beastial influence, exist in order to meet the requirements and necessities of man. God ordains their existence as a necessity springing from man's constitution, but only until the Theocracy is revealed. Then the highest possible form of civil (united with the religious) government shall be substituted for the present forms. Civil government is not set aside (for this is forbidden by the nature of man, the demands of social position, the continued aptitude and necessity for government, the analogy drawn from God's working, nature, uses of government, etc.), but it is set forth in its God-given and God-enforced form, abrogating the mere human form. The fact that civil government, as now constituted, is the result of the Divine Will, and that obedience is inculcated as a duty, etc., does not necessitate its perpetuity. All depends on the Divine Will, and we must form our conclusions respecting the future in accordance with the declarations of that Will. It has never, in any place, asserted the perpetuity of earthly governments, but the exact reverse. That Will, and its contemplated expressed determination, is the foundation of the Coming Theocracy, and that Will shall be made manifest in the Theocratic person and rule of Jesus "the Christ." This effectually settles the question of perpetuity and the predictions based upon it.

To indicate how others express themselves on the subjects embraced in this and previous Prop., a few illustrations are in place. Fausset (Com., Dan. 7) remarks: "Daniel sees the world kingdoms in their essence as of an animal nature lower than human, being estranged from God; and that only in the Kingdom of God ('the Son of Man,' the representative Man) is the true dignity of man realized." "Nebuchadnezzar's colossal image represents mankind in his own strength, but only the outward man. Daniel sees man spiritually degraded to the beast level, led by blind impulses, through his alienation from God. It is only from above that the perfect Son of Man comes, and in His Kingdom man attains his true destiny. Cf. Ps. 8 with Gen. 1: 26-28. Humanity is impossible without divinity; it sinks to beastiality (Ps. 32: 9, and 49: 20, and 22). Obstinate heathen nations are compared to 'bulls' (Ps. 68: 30); Egypt, to a dragon in the Nile (Isa. 27: 1, and 51: 9; Ezek. 29: 3). The animal with all its sagacity looks always to the ground, without consciousness of relation to God. What elevates man is communion with God, in willing subjection to Him. The moment he tries to exalt himself to independence of God, like Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 4: 30), he sinks to beast's level." Lange's Com., Dan. 7, Doc. 5, remarks: "The ideal and fundamental thought of the prophecy, which substantially coincides with that of the image of monarchies in chap. 2, and may be expressed by the statement, 'that all the kingdoms of the earth must be put to shame' (Rev. 11: 15; 12: 10) before the Kingdom of everlasting God and of His Anointed, must evidently be made prominent" (without entering largely into "the details of its realization in the history of the world"). The same gives the Tübingen Bible as declaring: "In His eternal decree God has fixed a limit to every kingdom; beyond this it cannot go, and the Divine Providence exerts a special agency to this end." "How uncertain is the glory and majesty of the kingdoms of earth. Even when they have attained to the highest prosperity they must yet be humbled, and pass away, like every other earthly good and honor. The Kingdom of Heaven is immutable, and forms the hope of every believer, Ps. 145: 13." Such expressions drawn from the writings of Anberlen (On Daniel), Newton (Diss. on Proph.), and others might be presented.

PROPOSITION 166. The rudimentary reorganization of this Kingdom will be made at Mt. Sinai.

The organization of the Theocracy was affected before the Jewish nation entered Palestine. The appointment of officials, the giving of laws, the commandments to destroy the enemies of God, etc., were issued at Mt. Sinai. It is eminently suitable that the reorganization of the same should be effected in the same place. The reasons will be adduced in the following observations.

This is one of the Propositions, which, if torn from its connection, can be injuriously employed against us. The writer felt the force of Prov. 12 : 23 "a prudent man concealeth knowledge," but in view of the importance of the subject, its instructiveness especially pertaining to the interval, and the encouragements to instruct, etc., he felt persuaded that in this case, Prov. 13 : 16, "every prudent man dealeth with knowledge," and Prov. 15 : 2, "the tongue of the wise useth knowledge aright," insured its presentation to be acceptable to the class whose good-will we ought to esteem. We only now say that this Prop. serves to clear up some—otherwise—difficult passages. Thus e.g. it throws light on the question where Jesus and the saints are during the interval; on the fact that during the interval Jesus is spoken of as being present on the earth; on the setting up and existence of thrones (Rev. 20 : 4) indicative of a formative Kingdom; on the stages of the same Advent; on the object of the first res. and translation; on the Kingdom not coming with observation, being concealed and sudden; on the hatred and intentions of the Antichrist; on the march of the Christ and His saints; on the subsequent war and its results; and on various Mill. predictions.

Obs. 1. Taking it for granted that the Theocracy will be again reorganized in its Theocratic-Davidic form, so that God in the person of David's descendant (inseparably connected) again descends to dwell with the Jewish nation, and act in the capacity of an earthly ruler, we may suggest, that if such is the divine order, no place on earth could be selected more suitable or better adapted for such an arrangement than Mt. Sinai, and its adjoining territory. It is a place so isolated, separated from other countries, that such a work undertaken would, for a time, at least, attract but little attention among other nations. It lies at the same time contiguous to the inheritance of David's Son, which at the time will be sorely pressed by the Antichrist with its confederated power. The Holy Land occupied, as it then will be, by the forces of enemies, and all other lands having their kingdoms or civil power in full sway, forbids in them a peaceful, previous arrangement as indicated; and hence this locality, surrounded by its sandy deserts, under no special civil jurisdiction, occupied only by wandering tribes, is well adapted to secure, as it once did before, uninterrupted facilities for a preliminary national organization. Besides this, it is a place already highly distinguished, having enjoyed the presence of God, and having witnessed the entrance of God and people into the desirable Theocratic relationship, being honored by the camp of the elect nation, and the manifestations of the King, made memorable by the giving of the law, and expressly pronounced, in view of its associations, to be "holy." In all respects, therefore, considering that the nations will then be hostile to the Saviour (in fact arrayed against Him), it is of all places the one most suitable to be used for such a purpose. The question is, do the Scriptures give us sufficient intimations to believe the Proposition? We shall present the reasons for holding to such a belief, premising (1) that they are not nearly so indistinctive as predictions relating to the First Advent; and (2) that, mistaken in this particular, it cannot affect our main leading arguer which is independent of the discussion of minor points relating to the order or introduction of the Kingdom, upon which differences of opinion are reasonably to be anticipated.

The critical student will observe (what Mede on the one hand, and Brown on the other, insist on) that Dan. 2 : 44 particularly declares that "in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom." That is, previous to the final ending of the Roman Empire, of Gentile domination, of the horns that arise, this kingdom will already commenced, organized. These writers, Bengel, and many others, declare the position assigned to the time of setting up the Messianic Kingdom must be maintained in order to meet the conditions annexed. This Sinaitic view meets them fully, and the only place, and under the only circumstances possible, in view of the conflicts Idumea and Palestine. It harmonizes all the predictions, and presents us with an ex Scriptural solution of what otherwise would be full of difficulties.

Obs. 2. In considering this subject, some preliminary matters must be duly regarded, viz. (1) That the most prominent students of prophecy are now agreed that the Second Advent, to be appreciated, must be comprehended in its several phases, being at first secret, hidden to carry out certain purposes, and finally open, revealed. The reasons for this belief are given under Prop. 130. (2) That the First Advent, embracing within itself about thirty-three years, teaches us not to limit the acts of Jesus the Second within a brief period of time; and that His preparatory private life of about thirty years before His open manifestation to the nation should lead us not to circumscribe His Second Advent to an immediate open Revelation, unless a comparison of Scripture makes it absolutely necessary. (3) That if it be admitted that the establishment of the Theocracy at Mt. Sinai was a pattern of something that should follow in the future (which nearly all writers confess however much they may differ in the ultimate fulfilment), then an open door is at once presented for the introduction of our Proposition. (4) That the passages bearing on this subject are to be considered in their general scope, in their connection with context and analogy, and shall involve no contradiction of Scripture.

The student will also observe the following: (1) that dispensations may, as the Jew and Gospel overlap each other for some years; (2) that this Theocratic Kingdom is organized before the times of the Gentiles are ended; (3) the breaking and consummation process upon which the Kingdom immediately enters, is expressive of a previous organization—for it is evidently an intelligent organized force that is set in motion against the kings of the earth and their armies; (4) Rev. 10 : 7 implies, in view of finishing the mystery of God (which appertains to the Kingdom), that to the believing there will be such a manifestation, that before the epoch is concluded this will be done; (5) the Coming of the Son of Man in His Kingdom (implying a previous organization) is to be distinguished from His thief-like Coming.

Obs. 3. The Bible seems to declare that Jesus, the Messiah, at His Second Advent, will especially exhibit two acts or phases in this Coming and between these two, He and His saints will pass the intervening period at Mt. Sinai. That he comes "as a thief" for the removal of the saints.

is clearly taught, and that He also openly comes with these saints on the Mt. of Olives (Zech. 14 : 4) is unmistakably announced. But He and His saints are also represented as being at Mt. Sinai. A comparison of Scripture shows, that when the saints are removed by the power of resurrection and translation, they do not remain in "the air," but are conveyed to Mt. Sinai, where, as at the establishment of the Theocracy, positions are assigned, the kingship and priesthood inaugurated, the instructions given preparatory to the ushering in of "the dispensation of the fulness of times." After all the preparations are completed, and the time has come for "the manifestation of the sons of God," the deliverance of the Jewish nation, the destruction of Antichrist, this associated body of Rulers with the King of kings at their head (Rev. 19) present themselves to the confusion of all enemies, and to the joy of the ancient elect nation. Let the reader ponder the 68th Psalm, and its references to Mt. Sinai. This Psalm, allowing its prophetic character, was never fulfilled, as is generally supposed, at the appearing of God in the wilderness at the institution of the Theocracy. The reasons are the following : (1) the description is too exalted to meet the facts as they transpired in the wilderness, in the march to Canaan, and in obtaining possession of the land. The comparative feebleness and repeated transgressions of the nation ; their inability, owing to sin, to extend their power as here predicted ; the continued existence of their enemies ; their final subjection to other nations, etc.—all this is opposed to the spirit of the Psalm. (2) The Psalm is Messianic, and relates not to the past but to the future. This is proven by the direct reference and application of a portion of the Psalm to Christ. This is done by Paul in Eph. 4 : 9, where he applies it as significant of results produced by the resurrection and ascension of Jesus. The Spirit thus gives us a key to its interpretation. (3) Its reference to the future is evinced by its allusion to the resurrection (v. 20) ; the great slaughter and complete overthrow of all enemies (v. 1-3, 14, 21-23, 30) ; the restoration of the Jewish nation (see v. 22 and notice force of "again") although oppressed by a multitude ("sea") ; the restoration of Theocratic rule (v. 24-35) ; the kings of the earth bringing presents, and the extended, world-wide dominion exerted (v. 29-35). On the other hand, what is here delineated to occur corresponds fully and accurately in every respect with the predictions pertaining to the ushering in of the Millennial age or Christ's Kingdom. Then, we know, the enemies will indeed be removed as here described ; then the exaltation, the purity, beauty, rejoicing, safety, and power of the righteous will be witnessed as here portrayed ; then the dwelling of God with man, the exertion of supernatural power, the power of delivering from death, the restoration of the people, the universal dominion, the re-organization of the nation under rulers, kings coming to present their allegiance and worship at Jerusalem, nations submitting themselves, the praise and glory manifested—all this, as here predicted, will come to pass. Hence seeing that the general tenor of the Psalm does not suit the history of the past, in the non-fulfilment of large portions of it, but faithfully describes the future, it is not an arbitrary act to interpret verses 8 and 17 as also realized in the future, and this the more readily because this Advent accords with what is ascribed to Christ at His Second Coming. Let the mighty King come as predicted in other places, and there is nothing in these verses, unless it be the locality designated, which differs from the others. But why object to the specified locality? Can a reason be assigned for the rejection of it in such a connection? No, we are content to receive it as it reads, believing that as Sinai at the inauguration of the Theocracy witnessed the presence of the Theocratic King, so when God's Son comes to restore the Theocratic rule "even Sinai itself is moved to the presence of God, the God of Israel" (v. 8.), and in view of His surroundings it can be said (v. 17) "the chariots of God are twenty thousand (myriads) even thousands of angels (even many thousands or thousands of heavenly powers); the Lord is among them as in" (or simply, "in" or "at Sinai among the holy mountains," as rendered by Lederer) "Sinai in the holy place."<sup>1</sup> Accepting of the Psalm as a prophetic announcement of the future, it is impossible, without violence, to rid ourselves of the persuasion that at the future Advent the Messiah will appear not only on the Mt. of Olives, but antecedently on Mt. Sinai, where evidently the gathering together occurs, with which gathered body Christ is afterward accompanied. In all this, there is eminent propriety, if we but consider that this Theocratic Kingdom is to be restored and manifested through the Seed of David, and hence in its relations to humanity and to the Jewish race, necessarily requires an outward exhibition of its earthly re-inauguration. There is also a peculiar fitness in the choice of place where this is done, inasmuch as Sinai itself is identified with the organization pertaining to Theocratic rulership.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Reineke, Prop'h. Times, Nov., 1864, p. 163, renders "The horsemen of God are two companies of myriads, thousands of changed ones; the Lord in them Sinai in holiness or "The horsemen of God are two companies of thousands of myriads; the Lord in them Sinai in holiness." Rabbi Greenabaum renders the verses: "The earth quake also the heaven dropped at the presence of God; yea this Sinai, at the presence of God the God of Israel." "The chariots of God are two myriads; thousands of angels follow him; the Lord is among them, so is Sinai holy among mountains." Lange's Com., Ex. has "Yon Sinai before the face of Elohim, the God of Israel," and "The Chariots of God are myriads, thousands and again thousands, the Lord among them, a Sinai in sanctity."

<sup>2</sup> Sinai was even esteemed holy before the giving of the law (Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, p. 48, Josephus, Ant., 3, v. 1), and the only reason that can be satisfactorily assigned is that pertaining to its foreknown Theocratic usage, making it a special favor of God's. What a distinguished place Mt. Sinai will be in the future ages! The place of God's marriage (so according to Oriental usage, the inauguration of a Ruler), with the Jewish nation; the place where Jesus' marriage takes place before the bridal process proceeds to Jerusalem. God in view of this, may, as we anticipate, adorn the wilderness and make it a place of resort. We cannot help but feel that Elijah will again, under different circumstances, visit this place. This prophet visited Horeb (Smith's Bib. 1 makes Sinai and Horeb—the latter standing in the shadow of the former—to be interchangeable as e.g. Deut. 1 : 2, 6, 19, and 4 : 10, 15, and 9 : 8, and 29 : 1, 1 Kings 8 : 9, and 19 : 8, and 2 Chron. 5 : 10; Mal. 4 : 4) when persecuted (1 Kings 19), and "the mount of God" found special nearness to God, and realized that, amid the general defection, God had reserved for Himself a people. How changed the relations, and what a glorious reservation he will there meet! If faithful our glad eyes will behold the same and our glad hearts will associate with those "myriads."

Obs. 4. If this deduction were founded simply on one passage it might suggest doubt, but we find it sustained in other places. Thus take Deut. 33 : 1-2, which embraces the blessings pronounced on the several tribes and which from other predictions we know shall only be fully realized the restoration of the nation at the Second Coming of its King. None of these blessings are introduced by a description which, however applicable in some particulars to the giving of the law, was never verified in the past. For we read: "The Lord came from Sinai and rose up from Sier u them, He shined forth from Mt. Paran, and He came with ten thousand saints; from His right hand went a fiery law to them," etc.<sup>1</sup> Such a Coming with myriads of saints is only predicated of the still future Advent. We have no account of any other, and this correspondence with what will occur at the predicted Second Advent of Jesus (when myriads of saints are with Him) is indicative of its intended application. In Hab. 3 : 3 we have another allusion. Intending to refer to the chapter at length in another place, it is sufficient to say that the opinion so generally held that it refers to the past manifestation of God at Mt. Sinai and in the wilderness, is utterly untenable. Aside from various considerations, the simple fact that the prophet himself locates it in the future and prays (v. 16) that he may find deliverance when it takes place, is ample to remove the prevailing interpretation. It most certainly—if we preserve its unity and compare with other Scripture—pertains to the future Advent. The prophet tells us "God came from Teman (or the South) and the Holy One from Mt. Paran," at a time when an overthrow of enemies and a deliverance is experienced on a scale so great that the past sinks into insignificance before it. Even Judges 5 : 4, 5, may in the mind of the Spirit be far-reaching; and many predictions respecting "the wilderness" may have a deeper, more significant meaning than is usually attached to them. Let there be such a restoration of Theocratic rule inaugurated at Mt. Sinai, and it imparts new force to Isa. 35 : 1 "the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them and the desert shall rejoice," etc., or to Isa. 32 : 15, 16 "the wilderness (shall) be a fruitful field," "then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness," or to Isa. 35 : 6 "for in the wilderness shall waters (i.e. people) break out and streams in the desert." In view of the apportionment of the stations, etc., in the Kingdom at such a time and place, it may even be questioned whether the planting in the wilderness of those several trees mentioned by Isa. 41 : 19, 20 is not to be interpreted of the assignments of rank, etc., in this Theocracy, seeing that the Spirit likens in other places the saints to "Trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord" (Isa. 61 : 3), and men and rulers are thus designated. The specific mention of rejoicing, shouting, singing, etc., in the wilderness at some period still future is seen, if this idea is accepted, to be highly appropriate, and what under the circumstances is to be anticipated. Surely "the grace in the wilderness," Jer. 31 : 2, which is yet, as the prophecy indicates, to be realized by the Jewish nation in an unexampled restoration; the pleading in the wilderness, Ezek. 20 : 35-36) still future with that people; the speaking comfortably to His people in the wilderness, Hos. 2 : 14—this, with similar intimations, should teach us that the wilderness, just as in the beginning, is an important feature strikingly associated with the re-establishment of the Theocracy.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Lederer, The Israelite Indeed, Dec., 1863, p. 141, renders it : "Jehovah is coming from Sinai, and rises unto them from Seir; He beams from Mt. Paran, and comes (out) from the myriads of saints, from His right hand (the) fire statue unto them," etc. This "fiery law" or "fire statue" is also, as every one can see, a distinguishing characteristic of the Sec. Advent with the saints, being expressive of "judgments."

<sup>2</sup> Hos. 2 : 14 deserves special attention, and the connection evidently shows the time of fulfillment to be in the future. If the student observes two things he cannot fail to catch its spirit. (1) The elect now gathered being engrafted, and thus become identified with the true Israel, are inseparable with this period of blessing; (2) the time of this marriage, Pre-Millennial, as noticed Props. 118, 169, etc. Ps. 74 : 14 will be impressively realized : "Thou breakest the heads of leviathan in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting (sojourning in) the wilderness."

Obs. 5. Isa. 63 : 1-6 cannot possibly, without the grossest inconsistency, be applied to the First Advent of Jesus. For, aside from other reasons, it is not true that He then came in anger, fury and vengeance, and shed the blood of His enemies, until His own garments were stained, seeing that His mission was one of love, mercy and submission to death. But at His Second Advent numerous passages expressly mention wrath, vengeance on enemies, and a fearful slaughter and supper. It is therefore a description only applicable to the Second Advent, as the early Church taught (see Prop. 121). But the prophet in vision sees Him Coming from the direction of Mt. Sinai, asking : " Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah ?" Indeed, when we come to compare Scripture with Scripture, we have the route taken by the mighty King from Mt. Sinai until He arrives at Jerusalem clearly pointed out. Prophecy distinctly mentions Mt. Sinai, Paran, the Wilderness, Mt. Seir, Edom, Tema or the South, Bozrah, giving us a direct route from Sinai northward to Palestine. This does not occur by chance, but is descriptive of what shall truly take place. Having the Mighty One with His Saints manifested at Sinai, and also by way of the wilderness of Paran on through Idumea, it seems to us faithless not to accept of these things. Especially when we find an under-current of prophecy, which serves to bring them out in more distinctive proportions." Thus, e.g. in " the new thing" (Isa. 43 : 18-21) which God is to perform, He " will even make a way in the wilderness rivers (notice its figurative meaning) in the desert." I give waters in the wilderness and rivers in the deserts, to give drink to my people, my chosen. This people have I formed for myself ; they shall show forth my praise. Here we have intimated under impressive figures the blessings that will result from a re-formation of Theocratic rule out of a people expressly raised up (and gathered) for this purpose, and this is done in the wilderness, in the very place where the Theocracy was originally instituted. If such a restoration as the Proposition states is really contemplated and intended, could the language of the prophet be more expressive of the fact? The saintly body of " peculiar people" and engrafted, thus constituting the " holy nation" (and thus forming " a river," etc., in the figurative language of Scripture), gathered to Mt. Sinai, and associated with Christ in the formative reorganization of the fallen Theocracy, would fulfil in the most impressive manner such predictions. Then again, if we turn to Isa. 43 : 3, it is extremely doubtful whether we have more than a mere typical fulfilment in John's mission. And, when the prediction is carefully studied in the light of other predictions, the doubt resolves itself into a certainty that this also (whatever inchoate fulfilment there may be) refers to this period of time. Let the reader notice (1) that this cry in the wilderness, etc., is taken as commentators, Barnes, etc., inform us from the approach of a mighty Conqueror, and is expressive of irresistible power and a triumphant march; (2) that the preparations are suitably completed, and " the glory of the Lord shall be revealed" so that " all flesh shall see it ;" (3) that before the march of Jehovah, all flesh being as grass, opposition shall be overcome; (4) and the results of this triumphal appearance in deliverance and restoration. To say that all this was strictly fulfilled at the First Advent, having been the rejection of John, and Jesus, in the triumph of enemies, and such experience of deliverance of the nation, etc., as delineated, is certainly a lowering and altering of the prophecy. On the other hand, the offer of the Kingdom at the First Advent necessitated a typical repre-

tion of this act in the wilderness (and hence applied to John), but owing to the foreknown unbelief and sinfulness of the nation both the Kingdom and the real preparatory acts here predicted were postponed. Jesus did not exhibit Himself as the King; His glory was concealed under humiliation; the time had not yet arrived for such a triumphal passage; He Himself locating it in the future at His Sec. Coming. Admit such a re-establishment of the Theocracy at Mt. Sinai in the wilderness—consider the route from there through the wilderness to Judea, and then the prophecy shines forth with a clearness and vividness that is startling. “The Voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, ‘Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God’”—the completeness of the preparation, the majestic march revealing the glory of the Lord, the helplessness of His enemies contrasted with His power, the reward bestowed, the blessed rule and safety experienced; all eminence such an exalted condition of manifested Kingly authority, etc., and connected with, as a starting point, the wilderness, that it is only to be fulfilled in the future. At least such a fulfilment accords with the glory of the Lord, and His work as connected with the Second Advent, and we can see no valid reason to reject its identification, in some way, with the wilderness, as the place from whence this King of kings comes, and before whom “a highway,” like that of a mighty conqueror, shall be opened. Such passages include the idea, that the authoritative manifestation of Theocratic rule is exhibited, before it issues forth from the desert. It is a form ready for action before it emerges from the wilderness. Considering the formation of the Theocracy with its added hosts of kings and priests in so isolated a place, secluded from the observation of the nations, and its sudden and overwhelming appearance, it may be a question whether Christ had not this initiatory stage in view when He told the Pharisees, “the Kingdom of God cometh not with observation,” seeing that it is not only divinely instituted, but this is done in a secluded manner and place, so that when it appears it is already so organized as to be irresistible, etc.<sup>1</sup>

and of all the heathen (Amos 9 : 11, 12). As we understand the Lord's work of destruction depicted in Ps. 110 : 5, 6, so must we understand the judgment on Edom has described." We only add, that nearly all expositors not knowing what else to do with the names "Edom" and "Bosrah" have regarded them as mystical or figurative term expressive of enemies, but this view gives a deeper significance to them—just as the names relating to the First Advent. Hannah's prayer will be verified (1 Sam. 2), and the nations (Zeph. 3 : 8, etc.), be crushed under the long predicted (Deut 32 : 41-45) vengeance. If the reader turn to Props. 115 and 163, he will find by connecting the saw with this one, additional reasons for our position.

The student will observe that the place where the First Advent occurred is but indirectly given, and that all other accounts of the same imply the coming first to Bethlehem. So in the Sec. Advent, when the locality is once stated that is amply sufficient and all other predictions imply it. This at once opens a wide field for reference which can only be indicated. Thus e.g. take Isa. 63 : 1-6, and notice in connection the vengeance, the Redemption, etc. This compared with numerous parallel passages presents additional points of identification. Such a comparison having been instituted under various Propositions, it is not requisite to repeat. Several passages not before specified may briefly be suggested : Isa. 42 : 11, is remarkable, as the context indicates that "new things" are to be performed, introducing Millennial blessedness and glory, worthy of "new song." This is done in the manner we have advocated : "The Lord shall go forth as a mighty man, He shall stir up jealousy like a man of war, He shall cry, yea war ; I shall prevail against His enemies," etc. (see context). But notice verse 11, and its manifest allusions (as Bh. Lowth, and others), to the desert of Arabia Deserta, to the rocky country of Arabia Petraea, etc., and surely the careful student of the Word must be impressed that some deep reason underlies such references. What other reason applicable as the one advocated by us? For aught we know, such references as Zec 9 : 14, going "with whirlwinds of the South;" as Ps. 126 : 4, "as streams in the South and similar phraseology, may contain allusions which a fulfilment will render expressive in this direction. The student will not overlook Isa. 9 : 1 (Delitzsch's rendering), Is. 59 : 16-20 (comp Lowth and the Chaldee).

Delitzsch's rendering is impressive : "Behold I work out a new thing : will ye not live to see it" (resurrection)? "Yea, I make a road through the desert," etc.

Lowth and Noyes separate the clause as follows : A voice crieth, "In the wilderness prepare ye the way of Jehovah," and Barnes loci declares "the parallelism seems to require the translation proposed by Lowth." This, if correct, would add to its significance. Delitzsch : "Hark a crier! In the wilderness prepare ye a way for Jehovah, make smooth in the desert a road for our God."

An additional reason is found in Prop. 163 on the meaning of "Armageddon" (which see), and to this idea of "the Assembling" or "the Gathering" many passages refer, e.g. Ps. 110 : 3 (Barker's Bible, London 1815, renders), "Thy people shall come willingly at the time of the assembling thine army in holy beauty," etc. Ps. 46 according to the text refers to "the hidden ones or virgins," and is highly expressive of this period (comp. L. 26 : 20, 21 ; Jer. 2 : 3 ; Luke 21 : 36, etc.). Even the "fleeing to the mountain" of L. 11 : 1, if we are to receive some renderings, may refer to this withdrawal. The passages which speak of the removal and hiding of God's people just before the last great tribulation breaks forth might be used as illustrative of this period. Here, indeed, they would be in safety and honor. The world will be more or less unconscious of this gathering the days of Noah repeating themselves, and persistent unbelief in such a preparati existing until too late. The secrecy of all this, is plainly implied, even in the meeting the Bridegroom and those that were ready, which no one of the world will witness. Those taken to Mt. Sinai are pre-eminently favored, and as then "the door will be shut it will be too late for others to be added to the special blessed number. These are "the firstfruits" of the harvest—specially belonging to the Lord—the harvest itself—"the great multitude"—follows later in the divine order. Various passages relating to this subject are worthy of consideration, such as Isa. 18 : 1-5 ; Isa. chs. 34, 35, 13, etc. When these things are realized, men will be amazed to find how largely and minutely, all this has been described in the Word, and yet how little it has been noticed and appreciated, just as the things relating to the First Advent were overlooked.

There is only one difficulty, suggested by a friend (Dr. Morehead), viz., that in R. 19 at the open Advent of Jesus and His saints it is represented that "heaven opened and the armies in heaven followed Him," so that He and the saints literally come from the third heaven and not from Sinai, etc. But this is simply to overlook the symbolic meaning of the word "heaven" as used in Revelation. If we are to give it this meani then e.g. ch. 12 : 7 there was literally "war in heaven," ch. 4 : 1, 2, John was literally in heaven, etc. Hence all commentators e.g. Barnes, Lange, etc., refer the expression to the introduction of a new vision and its relation to the heavenly powers. Faber, etc., give us correct ideas of its reference, and, for aught we know, if reference is made to the same heaven mentioned in ch. 6 : 13, it would be sustained if the symbolical import is accepted, and even if the literal, without including the third heaven (for Jesus and His saints can and will come transported in the aerial by supernatural power). A consistent interpretation of the Word in accordance with its usage (see Prop. 107) in the book will remove the objection; and we are not to force the language, just as we do not that which relates or pertains to the sword out of His mouth, etc. It is a symbolical representation of the authority, majesty, power, etc., of the Advent.

Obs. 6. This view instead of conflicting with the other predictions, serves to illustrate and enforce them. Take, e.g. Dan. 7, and there is something remarkable in the structure of the prophecy, which on any other hypothesis baffles interpretation. The investiture (Prop. 83) of the Son of Man, David's Son, with the Kingdom, and the bestowment of judgment or rulership upon the saints associated with Him, is done by the Ancient of Days, for the Kingdom is given by Him to the Son of Man and His saints. But this is done here on the earth—as the representation in its entire scope demands—even while the Antichristian power, so arrogant and hostile, is in existence and holds sway over the nations. A difficulty at once presents itself, how could such an investiture which presupposes an order of arrangements, etc., take place without exciting immediate attention and attack from the enemy if conducted within his territory and in a public manner. The prophecy implies on its face a perfectly free unembarrassed, and even unexpected by the enemy, accomplishment of preliminary arrangements pertaining to the Kingdom. Admit that Sinai and the wilderness is the locality where the Ancient of Days invests David's Son and His own with Theocratic power, and bestows upon Him and the saints the covenanted dominion, and the difficulty vanishes. The prophet looks in vision at the horn, and then, looking away from him, turns to gaze upon the prophetic picture presented at Mt. Sinai without specifying the locality; thus passing from one to the other without a commingling of them. Although the investiture (i.e. the public official recognition in the presence of holy intelligences) is on the earth, yet it is effectually concealed from the interference and annoyance of the powerful enemy which it is to destroy. Such an explanation, to say the least, is more natural and reasonable—if the Theocracy is indeed to be restored in David's Son—than that usually given, which, against the Coming of the Ancient One and the evident description of scenes witnessed on earth, makes this a transaction in the third heaven. When the Theocracy was originally established, it was done amid the most solemn and glorious manifestations, and Mt. Sinai was purposely selected for the same; now when the same Theocracy is to be reorganized in the most august manner under the leadership of the King specially provided, is it not reasonable that (instead of the third heaven or the air, etc.) it should be effected in precisely the same place and with exhibitions of splendor and power far more impressive than any hitherto given.<sup>1</sup> Is it not also suitable that such an arrangement when taking place on earth, should receive the most solemn outward official sanction of the Most High God?

<sup>1</sup> There is nothing whatever in the Scriptures which teaches directly or indirectly that Jesus during this interval is in the third heaven. Wilson (Proph. Times, N. S., Aug., 1877, p. 183), correctly makes an extended period between the two stages, but misled by the withdrawal of the saints to the air (or aerial), concludes that Christ and His saints are in the air during the forty years. But his view of an organized form of government being established during this interval is eminently just: "And so, when they shall come with Christ at the end of the forty years they will be a completely organized body politic." To apply the title "Ancient of Days" to the Son is harsh and utterly untenable, although many do this, not knowing how else to interpret it, although the prophecy distinguishes between the two, the one being the giver and the other the receiver. We cannot receive the view that this investiture is a transaction in the third heaven, as held by Tregelles and others, because the Ancient of Days Coming (v. 22) and the Coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven (v. 13), cannot have a reference to the third heaven, but, as the entire tenor of the prophecy demands, is a Coming to this earth where the judgment is to be executed and the rule enforced. Hence we cannot receive Fausset's (Com. Dan. 7 : 13) that this Coming and investiture was "at His ascension," and this title is exercised invisibly, but "at His Second Coming it shall be in visible administration," for this violates the unity of the prediction by the introduction of an interval utterly unauthorized, and is based on a misapprehension of the Kingdom that belongs to the Son of Man as David's Son. This investiture is certainly not witnessed before the rise of the ten horns, the little horn, etc., and before the time has arrived for judgment (upon which the action of the Ancient of Days is founded). The only interpretation that we can safely follow is the one that does not violate the natural order, relating to time and events, given in the prophecy. The Ancient of Days did, at one time, visit Mt. Sinai when His Kingdom was instituted, and it is most reasonable, aside from the Scripture intimations, to believe that when it will be gloriously reorganized with the Son of Man at its head, that He will again manifest Himself, as predicted, in the same place. We deem it not a little significant that a number of highly interesting works (like Stanley's Sinai and Palestine) have recently been published calling special attention to Sinai. Hence we reject Thomas's (Exp. of Dan. p. 16), view that the Ancient of Days is equivalent to the Coming of Jesus (see Prop. 83), and Smith's (Thoughts on Dan., p. 71), idea that the scene of investiture is in the third heaven. Whatever the right, exaltation, etc., of Jesus, we must keep in mind that this predicted, is a special inauguration scene visibly exhibited to the saints at the restoration. (Wild, Ten Lost Tribes, p. 156, has the wildest conception, when he makes the two witnesses of Rev. to be the Ancient of Days and the Son of Man—the former being Moses and the latter Elijah!)

<sup>3</sup> This subject may also throw light on such passages as 1 Thess. 5 : 1-5, "But ye brethren are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief," etc. Consider that this was addressed to Thessalonian brethren and includes them. Now if they are thus raised up, brought to Mt. Sinai, and made part of that reorganization, preliminary to the terrible scenes following, and even with Christ participate in them—will it not be pre-eminently true that being the acknowledged "children of the day" they cannot possibly be "in darkness." Again, the Passover is only partly fulfilled, the Lamb has been slain, the eating of its flesh in faith has been going on for centuries (showing forth His death until He come), but the Passover itself we are told by Jesus (Luke 22 : 15, 16), is to be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God. In this Sinaitic arrangement, preparatory to "the day of vengeance," Jesus the mighty King will indeed be a refuge, etc., and no evil will befall them. The reader can find for himself other references to this period of deliverance from incoming judgments, all indicative of a visible manifestation and ordering in behalf of the covenanted Theocratic Kingdom.

Obs. 7. Other intimations are to be found, which, owing to their obscurity, have greatly perplexed critics. Let the student carefully examine the structure of Isa. 16 : 1-5, and it is self-evident, however we may give it an inchoate fulfilment, or make it typical, that it has not yet been fulfilled, seeing that in the immediate connection (v. 5) the throne is to be established, the Ruler is to sit upon it in the Kingdom of David, producing righteousness by His reign, which has not yet been verified. Seis (Apoc., Sec. 10, p. 282, footnote) corrects our version (which reads "Send ye the Lamb to the Ruler of the land from Sela to the wilderness unto the mount of the daughter of Zion") by giving, as the Vulgate Luther, and other translations, the following: "Send ye (or, I will send the Lamb, the Ruler of the land, from Sela of the wilderness unto the mount of the daughter of Zion." The Chaldee makes it allude to "the Messiah, the Anointed of Israel." This, with the hiding of certain ones, the overthrow of the oppressor, the establishment of the Kingdom of David with the Ruler (after He has come "from Sela of the wilderness" to Jerusalem) reigning in it makes it to coincide with the other Scripture adduced. The Lamb is put for Jesus Christ, and the Word fully identifies, in the future Coming of the Lamb, in His wrath, His marriage, His war, His throne, etc. (comp. Apoc.), this Lambhood with the Rulership that He shall exert over all the earth from the established throne and Kingdom of David.

Attention is invited to a passage, upon which a variety of opinion has been expressed, and which, perhaps, no one can confidently interpret, excepting as general analogy sustains, viz., Isa., ch. 41, and the connected chapters. Who is this "righteous man from the East?" Let any one look at the majesty, power, and glory declared of him, at the numerous promises descriptive of the same applied directly to the Messiah at His future Coming, at the Spirit's application of portions of the prediction expressly to Christ, and we are forced to the conclusion that the usual reference of this "righteous man" to Abraham or to Cyrus is utterly untenable—although, as some do, we make Abraham or Cyrus merely typical of the Christ, having a double fulfilment, etc. The trouble with interpreters is that they cannot explain how this "righteous man," if Jesus, comes "from the East." But we have to bear in mind that the term "East" (see e.g. Horne's Introd., vol. 2, p. 230, Encyc. R. Knowl., art. "East," etc.) has a wide range, and is applicable to Arabia Deserta, Idumea, etc., from whence Jesus comes, as we have pointed out. Hence the applicability of these predictions to Jesus, as the ancients held (e.g. Barnabas, Tertullian, Augustine, etc.), can be received in every particular. As the approach of Jesus and His saints will follow the route of the Israelites, and hence the coming to Jerusalem will be literally from the East, it is well to notice that Stanley (Sinai and Palestine, p. 167) pronounces the approach from Jericho and Bethany to be "really grand." It is the very route taken in the triumphal entry of the Gospels, and indicative of this future triumphal entry. Stanley (p. 315) quotes Palmer as saying, "From the Castle of Rubad, north of the Jabkok, are distinctly visible Lebanon, the Sea of Galilee, Esdraelon in its fullest extent, Carmel, the Mediterranean, and the whole range of Judah and Ephraim. It is the finest view that I ever saw in any part of the world." We may add, that this view may be used as confirmatory of Fausset's (Chr. Herald, Aug. 14th, 1879), respecting the "Kings from the East" (Rev. 16) viz., to be "Christ's transfigured saints returning from the East to reign as king priests with Him (Isa. 40 : 3 ; Ezek. 43 : 2 ; Zech. 14 : 4, 5 ; Rev. 1 : 6, and 19 : 8, 13, 14). Babylon must fall, that Jerusalem, literal and spiritual, may rise. 'The kings of the earth' (Rev. 16 : 14) shall be superseded by the Lord from heaven and 'the kings of (from) the East' with Him (Ezek. 21 : 27)."

Obs. 8. This removal to Mt. Sinai, and the union there consummated of Theocratic relationship (likened owing to its intimate, enduring, and permanent character, to a marriage), satisfactorily explains some allusions to the future marriage, which many writers ignore or fail to conciliate. Notice : In Matt. 25 : 1, the Bridegroom is Coming and the invited ones who are watching go with Him to the marriage, the rest being left ; in Luke 12 : 36, the exhortation is to wait for the Lord "when He will return from the wedding ;" in Rev. 19 a marriage is announced preceding this overthrow of Antichrist ; in Rev. 21, a marriage follows the removal of God's enemies. And how reconcile the exhortation to watch for the Bridegroom Coming to the wedding and the warning to watch for Him Coming from the wedding, and both these with Rev. ? If we keep in view how (as explained Props. 118 and 169), the figure of the marriage relation is employed to denote a variety of unions, and then notice this Theocratic union formed at Mt. Sinai previous to the open Advent of Jesus and His saints, and previous (as was observed e.g. Prop. 130, and Obs. 4) to the overthrow of the Antichristian powers, we have the key of an easy solution. The one (Matt.) refers to the thief-like Coming followed by the union at Mt. Sinai; the other (Luke) to the Coming of the Lord after this union at Mt. Sinai (likened to a marriage) and specially addressed to Jews and others; the one (Rev. 19), refers to the union at Mt. Sinai, and is the same explained under "the married wife" Prop. 118; the other (Rev. 21) follows the overthrow of Antichrist, and is the union delineated under Prop. 169. Thus several phases in the Sec. Advent, with respective unions entered into, are presented before us; the reconciliation being found complete in the order as presented to us.

The fact is, it helps us to see how a number of things, which must transpire before the open Advent, can take place. Thus e.g. how and where the judgment of believers is consummated, so that their respective stations in the Kingdom are assigned (Prop. 135). It teaches us that that special preparedness for the direct establishment of the Kingdom is of a supernatural nature, and done under the divine auspices at Mt. Sinai, and hence we cannot possibly receive the suppositions e.g. of the Catholic Apostolic Church that it, through the Apostolate established, is doing this work, or of Mormonism that it by its system, etc., is performing it. It evinces that Jesus, in more aspects than is generally supposed, is a "Prophet like unto Moses." It shows that in the great work specially delegated to Moses, for which he was particularly commissioned by the Almighty, viz., to erect and organize a Theocratic government, in this Jesus will follow his footsteps, and evidence the same work, only on a grander scale. The non-repentance of the Jewish nation, its rejection of the Messiah, caused the postponement of this, the mighty work, to the Sec. Advent; then will it be performed, and in the identical place, too, where Moses stood forth the head of the nation. The supernatural, which necessarily accompanied the setting up of a Theocracy (which unbelief rejects as unworthy of credence, although the absence of it would vitiate the Theocratic idea), will again be manifested in the gathering of the people; in the august inauguration; in the march to Palestine; in the encounter with the enemies of the Theocracy; in the establishment at Jerusalem, and in the advancement and progress of its power over the nations of the earth. The investiture of the Sovereignty of the world is so magnificent a feature that it justly, in view of its magnitude, design, the worthiness of the person invested, etc., demands a manifestation of it here on earth, and this it receives at Mt. Sinai, where again a scene will be enacted, which will present an overwhelming sense of the majesty, power, and glory of the Ruler. But in the re-inauguration there will be this great difference, that while the saints will undoubtedly be deeply affected by the wonderful transactions going on—while profoundly moved at the sublimity of the investiture, yet they will not be affected by fear, as the Jewish nation, and pray that the glorious manifestations may cease, for prepared by previous glorification for this service, and realizing their dearest Friend in the person of the Ruler, they have, as Paul says, "boldness in the day of judgment;" for the scene before them, and in which they participate, is not one of death, as the Jews apprehended, but one of salvation, joy, blessedness, and glory. When the covenants are so vividly remembered and exalted by fulfilment, then such Pals. as the 98th will be verified. Then will be fulfilled the saying of Cummings: "The world's greatest tribulation is the hour of the Christian's most magnificent deliverance." When the year of the redeemed and the day of vengeance both come, Jesus, the Theocratic King, will be glorified and admired by His own (Isa. 63 comp. with 2 Thess. 1:5-9). The Theocracy is established over "a willing people," who will exult and rejoice with fulness of joy in their King and Redeemer. Vengeance does not touch the saints; and when Jesus appears "a polished shaft hid in God's quiver" (Isa. 49:2), "in whom God will be glorified" when employed against His enemies, these saints themselves, by association of rulership and Theocratic power conferred on this "mount of God," shall participate in its execution, Ps. 149:6-9; Rev. 2:26, 27, etc.

PROPOSITION 167. The re-establishment of this Kingdom embraces also the reception of a New Revelation of the Divine Will.

This necessarily results, for while the Theocratic-Davidic Kingdom is restored, its restoration is accompanied by great and wonderful changes. The inaugurated rule of the Theocratic King, as predicted, the participation of the saints in such rule, the world-wide extent of the Kingdom, the supremacy of the Jewish nation, the entering upon a new age or dispensation, the change that will result in the condition of believers in this Kingdom, etc., calls for a revelation by which not only the official position of the saints is to be governed, but that of the Jewish and Gentile nations is to be controlled.

We have only to ponder the Theocratic idea embraced in the reign of Jesus and His saints, and the reasonableness of our Prop. at once appears. We cannot possibly conceive of a restored Theocracy with the extraordinary changes predicted, without increased Revelation as a directory to rulers and subjects.

Obs. 1. The reader will observe that our entire argument insists upon the present and continued sufficiency of Revelation down to the Sec. Advent, over against St. Simonians, Friends of Light, Swedenborgians, Mystics, Mormons, Spiritualists, etc. The Scriptures, as we now have them, are not only the highest but the last Revelation down to that period; and, hence, we reject all others, no matter by whom presented or by what argument enforced. Until the arrival of the Bridegroom, there is a sufficiency given to gather out and guide the elect. Nothing is lacking to meet the Divine Purpose respecting this dispensation, either in the way of instruction, motive, encouragement, etc.; and, therefore, it is unreasonable to anticipate another Revelation until we enter another and more glorious dispensation. Our position protects us against all vagaries, all pretended Revelations, on the one hand, and likewise against that assumed by some few, viz., that they are called upon to organize a Theocratic Society similar to the Mosaic and amalgamate Mosaic and Christian ordinances, etc. We gratefully accept of the apostolic arrangements for our present good, and await the arrival of Him, the Christ, who alone has the authority to institute the changes deemed necessary. Before we are enticed into any of the schemes which so largely prevail under the garb of piety, zeal, increased knowledge, bestowed gifts of the Spirit, etc., we are content to "occupy" with the things that are legitimately given to us until He, the King, comes.

Emerson once declared, "the need was never greater of a new revelation than now;" we, from our standpoint, would say the need was never greater of returning to the Revelation already given than now. We have no sympathy whatever for pretended revelations given by professed prophets and prophetesses, or drawn from a professed "inner light," etc. Our position has been fully set forth under Props. 9 and 10.
